The purists speak with a show of reason when they contend that an assisting singer has no just place in a concert of symphonic music, is, indeed, an anomaly therein. The ground, however, cracks beneath their feet when they assert that assisting pianists or violinists are in like case. Without them, Concertos would disappear from active repertories and Concertos pass commonly for symphonic pieces. At the least, tradition, custom, the liking of the public, hallow them. It is one thing, however, to invite the virtuoso to one Concerto, and another thing to permit him two or the equivalent of two. In such excess, the concert virtually becomes his with an assisting orchestra, whether it is short, as it was yesterday under Mr. Monteux, or long, as it happened to be when Dr. Muck once allowed Mr. Ysaye, the violinist, such luxury as Mr. Cortot enjoyed. Not without questionings, may one or another listener hear the Symphony Orchestra "assisting" at one of its own concerts, especially in these days when its public has warmed so whole-heartedly to it. Agreed that Mr. Cortot is interesting personality as well as pianist and musician—and for that very reason the concert seemed only the more to be his. With a rarely heard Concerto of Beethoven and a novel Fantasia of Debussy, between a relatively insignificant prelude and postlude, he was bound to prevail. At his first coming to Boston to play the piano-parts in Franck's Symphonic Variations and d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air, he quite swept poor old Rabaud into the background. Fortunately, Mr. Monteux is of another mettle and well divided with Mr. Cortot the honors of Debussy's Fantasia. Nevertheless it was he who came, played, conquered. From season to season the old régime at Symphony Hall used to surrender a pair of concerts to Mr. Paderewski. The new régime seems disposed to do likewise by Mr. Cortot Yet somehow the notion will persist that the Symphony Orchestra ought to be preponderant on its own days in its own house. Else why its official designation of soloists as "assisting artists"?

At two concerts in New York at midwinter, Mr. Cortot, with Mr. Damrosch's orchestra played all five of Beethoven's Concertos for piano. Thus prepared; he began yesterday with the third in C minor, heard but four times in the whole forty years of the Symphony Concerts. It deserves frequent revival—the more because the fifth ("The Emperor") tends to become a kiln-dried masterpiece; while the fourth grows tedious nowadays before and after the poetic slow movement. Presumably the first and the second are little brothers to Beethoven's first and second symphonies. The third, however, by intrinsic quality as well as by relative freshness, gives lively pleasure. No sooner has the orchestra opened the way into the first Allegro than the light energy and elastic pace of the music win the ear. The contrasting melody matches not a few of Mozart in grace of line and supple, fanciful progress. The succeeding slow division begins in Beethoven-like song, warm and rich; before long the piano, passing it to the orchestra, is garlanding melodious measures with Mozartean arabesques—to end with Mozartean euphonies, and something more, between the several voices. The closing Rondo, unlike some of Beethoven's finales, charms the listening perceptions rather than stretches taut the listening nerves. In fine, the music of Beethoven light-handed, lithe-footed, graceful, fanciful, transparent, lyric, writing a tone-poem that flows or sparkles through all the deference to orthodox form and method.

In turn, Mr. Cortot, cultivating his familiar dry lights, was as luminous as the piece. Phrase, period, modulation, progression, ran crystal-clear. Every jointure snapped gently upon the ear; every inflection fell as crisply. Animated, indeed a shade too urgent, was Mr. Cortot's pace in the first movement; but the light beat of his elastic rhythm never flagged. He polished the suavities of the Mozartean song, burnishing phrase into phrase. He touched it with a cool sentiment of the mind. Precision and elegance hand in hand achieved the euphonies of the Largo; while cool color played over its more songful measures. The interplay of motivs and rhythms in the Finale was a sportive jugglery, delicate, piquant, sure. Mr. Cortot's perceptive faculties were as unerring as his revealing fingers. Beethoven in high light, in dry light, could not have stood more clear. Perish the thought that the slow song might have pulsed more warmly; the Mozartean song flowed more tenderly. Enough that the lights upon Mr. Cortot's crystal were prismatic.

Debussy's Fantasia yielded the pianist room for more diversified and subtler tonal color; gave him and the orchestra opportunity for harmonic half-tint and suggestion; bade him to rhythmic intricacies; invited him to ornate and resilient rhapsody in the Finale; opened before him in the slow division a rarefied and poignant beauty; touched with mystery the preluding measures whence the music expands. A master of clarity was Mr. Cortot as he carried the germinating and unifying motiv through the whole body of the Fantasia. Whenever the harmonic color was characteristically Debussyan, he touched it in as with fine shining points. His communicating ardor sped the two displayful Allegros. His comprehension of the mood of mystery in the opening measures, of the aerial and penetrating voice of the slow movement, was unerring. Again Mr. Cortot's mind was as fine and keen as his touch. Whatever the limits of his temperament, it is in even balance. Its passion (as a Parisian wit once said) is poise.

As the Fantasia came and went, for the first time in American concert-hall, it was hard to understand Parisian and British regrets over it as a relatively early and uncharacteristic music that Debussy in his lifetime had of purpose denied to publishers and pianists. It is far more interesting than some of his pieces of the eighties that he himself revised and sanctioned for performance—the cantata of "The Prodigal Son," for example, or the "Springtime" suite. In retrospective glance from his prime, it is a more individualized music than the setting of "The Blessed Damozel" or the youthful piano-pieces. True, there are moments, especially in the first Allegro when the Fantasia treads water, and other moments, as in the Finale, when it is more displayful than choice of means. The mature Debussy endlessly selected, endlessly sifted. Before ripening, he was more easily content. On the other hand, the texture of the whole Fantasia is no small feat of technical, yet seemingly spontaneous, ingenuity; the preluding measures foretell the Debussy of shadowy atmospheres; while the slow movement not only prophesies but gains the sublimated and piercing beauty that overspreads "The Afternoon of a Faun" or permeates the slow section of "Iberia." Such measures are no

22D CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Interpretative Power of Orchestra Impresses Audience

MR. CORTOT AT PIANO SHARES APPLAUSE

By PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Fidelio" and Piano Concerto, C minor, No. 3; Debussy, Fantasy for piano and orchestra (first time in America); Rimsky-Korsakoff, Introduction and march from "Le Coq d'Or" (first time at these concerts). Alfred Cortot was the pianist.

The overture to "Fidelio" is usually played at performances of the opera in Germany, probably because it is the most non-committal of the five that Beethoven wrote. (The one intended for Prague disappeared.) There is nothing in the "Fidelio" overture that can lessen the effect of the opera itself. While the whole drama is in the "Leonore" No. 3 and even in the "Leonore" No. 2, some will agree to Vincent d'Indy's saying that "Leonore" No. 3 is a more dramatic and greater work than the opera that follows. The "Fidelio" overture might be for any opera of a conventional nature without a tragic subject. It might even serve for a light opera of the better class. Did Beethoven purposely write it in this vein, without reference to Florestan, the prison, the jailer digging the grave, the arrival of the governor with Pizzaro thwarted by the heroic wife, so that the one great and only dramatic scene in the opera might not be anticipated?

Strange to say, Beethoven's third concerto had been played at the Symphony concerts only twice. As it was performed yesterday it seemed a more engrossing and romantic composition than the two later concertos, although it was written in 1800. In the first movement the influence of Mozart is felt, but there is a depth of sentiment in the largo, a playful, whimsical spirit in the finale peculiar to Beethoven.

Or was this impression due to the extraordinary merit of the performance by the pianist and the orchestra? It is not easy to speak in measured terms of Mr. Cortot's interpretation. We have heard many pianists beginning with Rubenstein, Buelow, men and women of their period; famous pianists who were said by their audiences to excel in the performance of Beethoven's music. Their interpretations were described as dignified, profound, noble, classic, (as if Beethoven was not in his early maturity a romanticist), noble, sublime. They were admirable, each in its own way, yet having in the course of the years almost come to the conclusion that the piano is not a musical instrument in the highest sense of the word "musical", we are ready to cry "Peccavi" when a pianist like Mr. Cortot revealed the strength and the beauty of a great work and displays the qualities that characterize the great pianist-musician. To dwell on the nature of his interpretation; to analyze; to hunt for the fitting superlatives and purple phrases of praise would not convey to a reader not in the hall the glory of the performance. No wonder, the audience was enthsiastic; no wonder that Mr. Cortot was stormily recalled again and again, while Mr. Monteux, representing the orchestra, was not forgotten.

Debussy's Fantasy was written in 1889-90. It was not performed or published during his lifetime. Would he have been willing to grant a performance, even with Mr. Cortot as the pianist? The Fantasy was put in rehearsal long ago in Paris, but Debussy withdrew it. Surely, many of these early pages are more worthy of him than those in some of his latest compositions. The theme that pervades the Fantasy is ingeniously treated, but this is by no means the sole merit. There is a delightful freshness, exuberance, recklessness, that would have shocked the hidebound conservatives of the Institute if he had sent the Fantasy as his fourth envoi. There are charming bits of instrumentation; everywhere are marks of the originality that startled Paris when his succeeding works were produced. Perhaps the later Debussy thought the Fantasy too formal, too

...uch in accordance with respectable ...aditions; yet more than once he broke ...way from them; nor need he have de...lored the beauty of the Lento section ...s obvious, not subtle. The performance by pianist and orchestra was ...ropriately now sensuous, now dashingly brilliant.

The excerpts from "The Golden Cock" ...re not so effective in the concert hall ...s in the opera house. They are entertaining enough, but they are far more ...musing in the theatre.

The concert will be repeated tonight. ...he program of the concerts next week ... as fololws: Schubert, Symphony in ... major; Moussorgsky, "A Night on ...ald Mountain" (first time at these ...oncerts); Rabaud, "The Nocturnal ...rocession"; Svendsen, "Carnival in

CORTOT AT PIANO WITH SYMPHONY

Debussy's Fantasie Heard for First Time in America

BY OLIN DOWNES

Alfred Cortot, pianist, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, and the principal part of the programme was his. He played Beethoven's C minor concerto and Debussy's early Fantasie for piano and orchestra which was then performed for the first time in America. In both of these compositions Mr. Cortot again displayed the qualities which make him a commanding figure among his colleagues—his broad and noble conceptions of classic forms, his mastery of rythm and phrase, his pianist authority and brilliancy.

BEETHOVEN VERY HUMAN

Seldom has Beethoven's concerto been played here in so Beethovenish a manner—in the first movement with enormous virility of thought and touch, in the second movement with repose and deep feeling, in the last movement with the jocosity, the reckless merriment, which is one of Beethoven's characteristic moods. When Beethoven is so played he is very noble, at the same time very human and very simple. Yes! But to play him that way is not so simple.

But Mr. Cortot was very much in the right when he insisted on Mr. Monteux acknowledging with him the applause, for Mr. Monteux' reading of the orchestral parts was as virile and as musicianly as Mr. Cortot's playing. Let us add, as an amen, that with all this fine playing the concerto is very old-fashioned, and one's enjoyment of it must be partly historical, rather than wholly emotional.

Debussy's Early Work

Then came Debussy's Fantasie. This early work was one of the pieces the composer sent back from Rome when he won the Grand Prix at the Paris Conservatoire. It excited distrust, and it was not heard until the 19th of last November in London—six years after the composer's death. The performance yesterday was from the proof sheets. When this work was played in London some of the reviewers thought that it would have been best not to exhume it. But that seems rather an extreme judgment. If one can endure the Fidelio overture of Beethoven, with which yesterday's concert commenced, is not a hearing of an early work of a great modern composer wholly justified?

True, there is in this Fantasie but little of the mature Debussy—at least on a first hearing—but throughout there are intervals and an occasional harmonic twist agreeable in themselves and of much interest as specimens of the composer's early attempts at expression. What is also interesting and rather amusing is to perieve Debussy making an attempt, at least, at classic form and symphonic working out of motives. He fails.

A Good Concert Piece

The opening motive of the first movement is infinitely more original and interesting than its working out. Secondly, we find Mr. Debussy, the master of marvellous effects gained by the original and unforseen employment of a few instruments, using heavy, whacking orchestration—sometimes with very brilliant, if coarse effect. In fact, the first movement of the Fantasie, by itself, would not be a bad concert piece to keep in the repertory. It has brilliancy and some good orchestral tricks. It has interesting if immature thematic material, and a great deal of muscularity and what is technically known as "pep."

The slow movement meanders about in a Massenetish manner, sometimes with touches of a fanciful Orientalism, and we hear hints of the "Fetes" movement of the Nocturnes, and of figures which occur in sundry piano pieces of this Debussy. These are first impressions. The work was not only worth hearing, but would be worth hearing again, and he is rather a bold man who says that on account of its immaturity this interesting music of the early Debussy should not be played.

From "The Golden Cock"

So much for the commonplace Beethoven overture, which was excellently played, and Mr. Cortot's performances. The concert came to an end with an introduction and march from Rimsky-Korsakoff's fantastical opera, "The Golden Cock," heard here in 1918. The introduction consists of various motives—that of the wheedling Queen of Shemakha, the Queen who works the old man's ruin in the opera; the motive of the astrologer who is the evil magician of the piece; the crow of the cock; the song of the seductive Queen when she salutes the sun, and finally a delicious fragment of Russian folk melody given to the strings. Then modulations, and the grotesque march of King Dodon. At the last, drums pounding, brass blaring, one had almost said, flags waving, a trumpet is shrieking out a caricature of the Queen's motive—that same wheedling arabesque which runs through much of the score in the latter part of the opera, an whispers of bedevilling magic as the motive of Scheherazade in the "Thousand and One Nights" suite tells the craft and the outrageous yarning of that fair lady.

This music is slight, but very suggestive in its melodic substance, very well made, though with little development of the ideas, and masterfully orchestrated. Then there is the mad humor and the fairy tale quality of all the music. It is inhuman, it is grotesque. It tells of strange land haunted by wizards and sirens, where the sun rises on the wrong side of the horizon, where men are led astray by (1) demon astrologers, (2) by women who do not exist, and (3) golden birds! When the opera was given here the strange scenery was so captivating that one did not get the full value of the music. The scenery is in the music. The music will not stand by itself, but if you know the story of Rimsky's opera and listen you will

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on April 16 with the following program:

Beethoven.....Overture to "Fidelio"
Beethoven..Concerto for Pianoforte No. 3
Debussy, Fantasy for Pianoforte and Orchestra
Rimsky-Korsakoff, Excerpts from "Le Coq d' or"
Alfred Cortot was the pianist.

Beethoven's overture, although not among his greatest works, was a fitting introduction. Theatrical, romantic, it was played by Mr. Monteux with due appreciation of these qualities, and with spirit. The concerto, of Beethoven's earlier years, is too seldom heard. Many consider it, together with the first one in C major, to be proper in the class room only. What a sadly mistaken idea! Yet, it is not suited to the ordinary virtuoso, for in spite of its simple construction, and moderate technical demands, it requires a master musician, as well as pianist to play it properly. Unfortunately these qualities are not always united in the same person as is the case with Mr. Cortot. His playing was distinguished for its grace, nobility and feeling, particularly in the adagio and rondo, which were interpreted in the true Beethoven manner. He did not sentimentalize; he was never trivial. Such playing can be equaled by few, surpassed by none.

Debussy's Fantasy was played for the first time in America. The piece is divided into two parts by the composer although there are in reality four distinct movements—part one, introduction and allegro—part two slow movement and finale.

Chronologically the work belongs to the composer's early period—that of the Suite Bergamasque and the suite "Pour le piano"—but it seems to have been retouched by the composer in later years. The effect is not always happy. The opening is well conceived, but the succeeding allegro seems at a first hearing vague and ill-defined. There are characteristic progressions and orchestral effects but the total impression of the first part seems negligible.

Not so, however, that of the second part. The slow movement is poetic and imaginative and is full of beautiful orchestral color. The final allegro which follows without pause is festal in character. After a long crescendo terminating in a brilliant passage for the full orchestra there are reminiscences of the slow movement followed in turn by another crescendo nd resounding climax. In this latter ection, a theme of distinctly oriental haracter occurs. In fact the entire inale suggests some festival in the ar East.

The work as a whole is hardly characteristic of Debussy at his best. It makes but little subjective appeal save in the slow movement of the second part. The piano part, although evidently of great difficulty is far from effective and the delicate tints of Debussy's later style are lacking. It is undoubtedly worthy of many hearings but will scarcely add to the reputation of the composer of "L'après midi d'un Faun" or the "Sea pieces." The performance was wholly admirable. There was much applause, yet we venture to think that it was more in appreciation of the brilliant playing of Mr. Cortot and the orchestra than for the work itself.

The excerpts from "Le Coq d'or" were distinctly out of place in the concert room. This atmospheric music of the theater seemed weak and commonplace when derived of its natural setting, although played with extraordinary skill by the orchestra.

Albert Stadtl...

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF ENLIVENS CONCERT

Parts of "Le Coq d'Or" by Symphony Orchestra

Beethoven and Debussy Also Are Brilliantly Rendered

The most interesting number on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert was a spirited performance of excerpts from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera "Le Coq d'Or," which had been previously heard in this city only at a single performance by the Metropolitan Opera Company in April, 1918. Mr Monteux, who has conducted many operatic performances of the music, chose selections which included all of the chief themes on which it is founded. When fragments of the "Hymn to the Sun" were heard, there was a buzz of whispered recognition in the audience, to which Kreisler's transcription for violin has become familiar, through repeated hearings.

Sticklers for tradition may protest that operatic pot-pourris belong at the "Pops" and not on the regular Symphony programs, where they have not appeared in recent years. Yet where the music in question is of remarkable quality and able to stand alone in the concert hall, there seems no valid reason for objecting to the introduction of excerpts, especially from unfamiliar masterpieces, in which the voice parts are either absent or of minor importance.

Russian music is not, in the main, characterized by connected development of motives. Its charm lies in the themes themselves and in the harmonic and orchestral color. There was quite as much continuity in these fragments of "Le Coq d'Or" as there is in "Scheherezade" or in "Thamar," which were written for concert performance.

Alfred Cortot, the soloist, chose distinctly inferior specimens of Beethoven and of Debussy. To the piano part in each he brought a delicate, smooth tone and a considerable feeling for nuance in interpretation. His chief defect is a lack of reserve force behind his fortissimo, which is strained and brittle in quality.

Beethoven was far better represented by the noble Overture to "Fidelio" than by the unfamiliar Third Concerto, an early work. Its slow movement could be made to sound like an aftermath of Mozart, but Mr Monteux, by encouraging the 'cellos to strive for a warm and sticky tone and by eliminating all the secondary accents, made it an anticipation of Weber and of Mendelssohn's "Songs Without Words." The finale had several flashes of the originality and power of the later Beethoven, notably in the coda.

Debussy's Fantasy was performed for the first time in America, because the composer during his lifetime refrained from publishing this and other early works in which the influence of his mellifluous teacher, Massenet, is hidden only by the use of harmonies based on the whole tone scale. The rythmic vitality of the allegro sections is its chief merit, but the subtlety found in such later works as "Jeux" is lacking here. The performance was brilliant.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE AFTERNOON OF A PIANIST, ALFRED CORTOT

"Assisting Artist" or Assisting Orchestra?—Beethoven's Third Concerto Revived, and Debussy's Fantasia for the First Time in America—Notable Distinctions of Performance — A Prelude from "Fidelio," a Postlude from "The Golden Cockerel"

IT is possible to admire warmly Mr. Cortot as pianist and musician, to multiply praise of his share in the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, and yet to regret that so much of it fell to him. It was a pleasure to note the numbers of the audience—filling every seat and likely to be as large this evening—and the applause heaped upon him. Yet these circumstances only accented his relative possession of the occasion. The orchestra indeed had appreciable share in one of his pieces, a Fantasia of Debussy's earlier years, but by itself, it no more than provided prelude and postlude. It began the concert with Beethoven's overture, "Fidelio"—secondary and space-filling Beethoven—and it ended the concert with the introduction to the first act and the march from the third in Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel"—music of the stage and of no other place. In other words and in the homely dialect of the theatre, the orchestra "played the audience in" and "played the audience out." Furthermore it accompanied Mr. Cortot in the third Concerto (in C minor) of Beethoven, in Debussy's Fantasia already specified. The pianist was the rest.

The purists speak with a show of reason when they contend that an assisting singer has no just place in a concert of symphonic music, is, indeed, an anomaly therein. The ground, however, cracks beneath their feet when they assert that assisting pianists or violinists are in like case. Without them, Concertos would disappear from active repertories and Concertos pass commonly for symphonic pieces. At the least, tradition, custom, the liking of the public, hallow them. It is one thing, however, to invite the virtuoso to one Concerto, and another thing to permit him two or the equivalent of two. In such excess, the concert virtually becomes his with an assisting orchestra, whether it is short, as it was yesterday under Mr. Monteux, or long, as it happened to be when Dr. Muck once allowed Mr. Ysaye, the violinist, such luxury as Mr. Cortot enjoyed. Not without questionings, may one or another listener hear the Symphony Orchestra "assisting" at one of its own concerts, especially in these days when its public has warmed so whole-heartedly to it. Agreed that Mr. Cortot is interesting personality as well as pianist and musician—and for that very reason the concert seemed only the more to be his. With a rarely heard Concerto of Beethoven and a novel Fantasia of Debussy, between a relatively insignificant prelude and postlude, he was bound to prevail. At his first coming to Boston to play the piano-parts in Franck's Symphonic Variations and d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air, he quite swept poor old Rabaud into the background. Fortunately, Mr. Monteux is of another mettle and well divided with Mr. Cortot the honors of Debussy's Fantasia. Nevertheless it was he who came, played, conquered. From season to season the old régime at Symphony Hall used to surrender a pair of concerts to Mr. Paderewski. The new régime seems disposed to do likewise by Mr. Cortot. Yet somehow the notion will persist that the Symphony Orchestra ought to be preponderant on its own days in its own house. Else why its official designation of soloists as "assisting artists"?

At two concerts in New York at midwinter, Mr. Cortot, with Mr. Damrosch's orchestra played all five of Beethoven's Concertos for piano. Thus prepared, he began yesterday with the third in C minor, heard but four times in the whole forty years of the Symphony Concerts. It deserves frequent revival—the more because the fifth ("The Emperor") tends to become a kiln-dried masterpiece; while the fourth grows tedious nowadays before and after the poetic slow movement. Presumably the first and the second are little brothers to Beethoven's first and second symphonies. The third, however, by intrinsic quality as well as by relative freshness, gives lively pleasure. No sooner has the orchestra opened the way into the first Allegro than the light energy and elastic pace of the music win the ear. The contrasting melody matches not a few of Mozart in grace of line and supple, fanciful progress. The succeeding slow division begins in Beethoven-like song, warm and rich; before long the piano, passing it to the orchestra, is garlanding melodious measures with Mozartean arabesques—to end with Mozartean euphonies, and something more, between the several voices. The closing Rondo, unlike some of Beethoven's finales, charms the listening perceptions rather than stretches taut the listening nerves. In fine, the music of Beethoven light-handed, lithe-footed, graceful, fanciful, transparent, lyric, writing a tone-poem that flows or sparkles through all the deference to orthodox form and method.

In turn, Mr. Cortot, cultivating his familiar dry lights, was as luminous as the piece. Phrase, period, modulation, progression, ran crystal-clear. Every jointure snapped gently upon the ear; every inflection fell as crisply. Animated, indeed a shade too urgent, was Mr. Cortot's pace in the first movement; but the light beat of his elastic rhythm never flagged. He polished the suavities of the Mozartean song, burnishing phrase into phrase. He touched it with a cool sentiment of the mind. Precision and elegance hand in hand achieved the euphonies of the Largo; while cool color played over its more songful measures. The interplay of motivs and rhythms in the Finale was a sportive juggiery, delicate, piquant, sure. Mr. Cortot's perceptive faculties were as unerring as his revealing fingers. Beethoven in high light, in dry light, could not have stood more clear. Perish the thought that the slow song might have pulsed more warmly; the Mozartean song flowed more tenderly. Enough that the lights upon Mr. Cortot's crystal were prismatic.

Debussy's Fantasia yielded the pianist room for more diversified and subtler tonal color; gave him and the orchestra opportunity for harmonic half-tint and suggestion; bade him to rhythmic intricacies; invited him to ornate and resilient rhapsody in the Finale; opened before him in the slow division a rarefied and poignant beauty; touched with mystery the preluding measures whence the music expands. A master of clarity was Mr. Cortot as he carried the germinating and unifying motiv through the whole body of the Fantasia. Whenever the harmonic color was characteristically Debussyan, he touched it in as with fine shining points. His communicating ardor sped the two displayful Allegros. His comprehension of the mood of mystery in the opening measures, of the aerial and penetrating voice of the slow movement, was unerring. Again Mr. Cortot's mind was as fine and keen as his touch. Whatever the limits of his temperament, it is in even balance. Its passion (as a Parisian wit once said) is poise.

As the Fantasia came and went, for the first time in American concert-hall, it was hard to understand Parisian and British regrets over it as a relatively early and uncharacteristic music that Debussy in his lifetime had of purpose denied to publishers and pianists. It is far more interesting than some of his pieces of the eighties that he himself revised and sanctioned for performance—the cantata of "The Prodigal Son," for example, or the "Springtime" suite. In retrospective glance from his prime, it is a more individualized music than the setting of "The Blessed Damozel" or the youthful piano-pieces. True, there are moments, especially in the first Allegro when the Fantasia treads water, and other moments, as in the Finale, when it is more displayful than choice of means. The mature Debussy endlessly selected, endlessly sifted. Before ripening, he was more easily content. On the other hand, the texture of the whole Fantasia is no small feat of technical, yet seemingly spontaneous, ingenuity; the preluding measures foretell the Debussy of shadowy atmospheres; while the slow movement not only prophesies but gains the sublimated and piercing beauty that overspreads "The Afternoon of a Faun" or permeates the slow section of "Iberia." Such measures are not

So much for Mr. Cortot's concert, as has been said, was prelude- rest, as has been said, was prelude- Beethoven's overture, "Fidelio"—and pos lude—the fragments of Rimsky-Korsakov "Golden Cockerel." Both are music of th theatre, by which sign Mr. Monteux "read them graphically, fervidly. The excerpt from the Russian opera are also music the stage—a prelude designed to summo the sun-drenched, droning, somnolent a mosphere of the first act; a march designe to clothe and point a prescribed procession Removed to the concert-hall, stripped the accessory—or rather the essential stage, they become but cursory exampl of Rimsky-Korsakov's skill and imagini tion with rhythms, harmonies, timbres, vivid but also an empty vesture. As f the overture, "Fidelio," it would be very well were not the other overtu ("Leonora No. 3"), in which Beethovi concentrated and magnified his opera t times more familiar and twenty-fold mo eloquent.

H. T. PARKER

AIDS SYMPHONY PENSION FUND

Harvard Glee Club's Singing a Notable Feature of 34th Concert

CHORUSES RECEIVED WITH ENTHUSIASM

By PHILIP HALE

The 34th concert for the benefit of the Orchestra Pension Fund was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, Archibald T. Davison, conductor. There was a very large audience. The program was as follows: Saint-Saens, Symphony in C minor, No. 3; unaccompanied choruses: Palestrina, Adoramus Te; Lotti, Crucifixus; Leisring, O Filii et Filiae, conducted by Dr. Davison. Gluck, Minuet from "Orpheus" (flute solo, Mr. Laurent); chorus and orchestra. Rubinstein, Choruses of Ham and Japheth from "The Tower of Babel;" Netherland Folk Song, Prayer of Thanksgiving, conducted by Mr. Monteux. Orchestra: Rimsky-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish themes.

Music by Coleridge Taylor if we are not mistaken, to Newbolt's sturdy verses, "Drake's Drum," was sung after the first group of choruses in response to the enthusiastic applause. This applause was deserved. Harvard University may well be proud of its Glee Club and the conductor of it. It should be remembered that the personnel necessarily changes with each graduating class. This makes the task of drilling the more arduous.

There was a time when the Glee clubs of Harvard and Yale sang chiefly college and popular songs for their own amusement and for the pleasure of the alumni in the cities the clubs visited. The singing as a rule was of the rough and ready-go-as-you-please, muscular variety. Throats were strained, chords stuck out on the sides of the neck, faces were flushed, there was painfully evident bodily activity from the waist up. In these clubs were often good voices and a few men that had studied singing; but the general result was a fervent roar of mediocrity. Today the Harvard Club challenges the admiration of all those interested in chorus singing. Dr. Davison has taught these students intelligently, musically; he has not overtrained them, for they sang yesterday with delightful spontaneity, yet with a careful regard for nuances of expression, with a mastery of dynamic gradations. In piano passages there was security of infonation; when full vocal strength was demanded, tonal quality was not lost. Especially noteworthy was the performance of the music by Lotti and Leisring, a performance that might excite the envy of any male chorus composed of picked professional singers who had long worked together.

It was a pleasure to hear the choruses from "The Tower of Babel." When this oratorio was performed by the Handel and Haydn Society in 1883 the music given to the Shemites and the Hamites was thought to be extremely oriental. In 1920 young composers, French, Americans, English, when their musical thoughts turn eastward, are more oriental than the orientals themselves.

It was a happy thought to call in the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club for this occasion. The club responded in most generous spirit. Let us hope that these singers next season may be heard in some important work for male voices and orchestra at a subscription concert.

Saint-Saens's impressive symphony was finely played. The lyrical section with organ displayed the eloquence of the upper strings, sonorous and beautiful in the long cantilena. Mr. Monteux gave a dramatic reading, and prepared the grand climaxes in a masterly manner. Mr. Laurent's full tone and expressive interpretation in Gluck's heavenly music were warmly appreciated. A brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's familiar Caprice ended a concert of much more than ordinary interest.

MME. LIPKOWSKA

PENSION CONCERT BEST YET

Harvard Glee Club Sings With Symphony

Post Apr 19

BY OLIN DOWNES

Perhaps the finest programme in the history of the Pension Fund concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestral compositions, conducted by Pierre Monteux, were Saint-Saens' C minor symphony for organ and orchestra, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeously-colored "Spanish Caprice." These works and their performance would have made the concert well worth while. In addition, the Harvard Glee Club, directed by Dr. Archibald Davison, sang a cappela music by Palestrina, Lotti and Leisring, two "pictures" from a forgotten choral work of Rubinstein, "The Tower of Babel," and the Netherlands folk-song known as "Prayer of Thanksgiving," with accompaniment of orchestra and organ.

IDEAL PROGRAMME

In all respects this was an ideal programme for a Sunday afternoon concert. The Saint-Saens symphony is a sonorous and impressive work, very serious in conception, yet with sufficient brilliance and dramatic rhetoric in it to make it immediately popular. It enlisted the full resources of the orchestra, and those who do not regularly attend these concerts had unusual opportunity in this symphony and in the scintillating music of Rimsky-Korsakoff to realise what wonderful things these players bring to pass.

The singing of the chorus was extremely impressive. Too much praise cannot be given Dr. Davison for the work he accomplishes with these singers. They are young men, with voices of good or average quality, many of whom are not preparing for a musical career, with whom music is a side issue at the college. Yet the most noted chorus might be proud of such tone-quality, such musicianly pleasing fineness of nuance, clearness of enunciation. More: It was evident that the singers felt the music profoundly. It would be hard to overestimate the effect of this noble music on the audience, as it would be difficult to overestimate the effect on character which work such as Dr. Davison's must exert in a university.

As an encore to the first a capella group, the chorus sang a setting of "Drake's [illegible] and Japheth from Rubinstein's 'Tower of Babel' have a melodious and oriental character to commend and were greatly enjoyed by the audience. Enthusiasm rose to its height after the "Prayer of Thanksgiving."

Finally, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra distinguished themselves in a superb performance of the "Spanish Caprice." The audience was a very large one. The concert will long be remembered.

SAT

On Sunday afternoon at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension Fund, the conductor did as much for an other music of Rimsky-Korsakov that h was undertaking for the first time in Bos ton—the "Spanish Caprice," show-piece these many years at Symphony Hall. was not written for the theatre; but might well be shifted thither. The won der is, indeed, that Mr. Diaghilev or Mme Pavlova has not long since laid trans ferring hand upon it. The final "Fan dango of the Asturias" invites the rhyth mic and colorful whirl of the Russian dance; the repeated introduction is tempting; individual and artful prowes could display itself (as it does in the con cert-hall) to the variations and to the suc cession of cadenzas. The eye of fanc readily clothes the music in the glow o Spanish backgrounds and Spanish dresses. Certainly it was as music of the stage that Mr. Monteux brought the Caprice to such performance as in Boston it has never known before. Dr. Muck refines upon the Fandango; Mr. Monteux cut loose with the keenest intuition in the slackening or the tightening of the rhythm. It rushed; it glowed. There was like rhythmic flare, like tonal elasticity in his version of the introduction returning as intermezzo; while this or that virtuos of the orchestra proved his mettle in variations or cadenzas. Who but Rimsky Korsakov, in sheer exuberance of mastery would have set first violin over snare drum and bade the rest of the band be silent? Of all the show-pieces of Symphony Hall none is quite so good fun this "Spanish Caprice." The bearded spectacled composer, professor of this at that in one and t'other state school, must have had "the time of his life" as he wrote it.

In this Caprice, in the other orchestral numbers of Sunday afternoon—Saint-Saëns "organ" symphony and the dance of the blessed spirits in the Elysian Fields of Gluck's "Orpheus"; in Debussy's Fantasie and other music of Saturday evening, the quality of the reconstituted orchestra stood fairly clear. The wood-winds, of course—virtually an unchanged choir—kept their familiar distinctions. Mr. Laurent indeed, spoke for them when he played the flute-part in Gluck's dance with a felicity of tone that was the flower of technic, skill and musical perception. In the transparent, undulant voice of his flute were the simplicity, remoteness, wistfulness of Gluck's measures, painting in melody and modulation what a century later Puvis de Chavannes painted in line and color. The might have been softer, more shimmering texture in the voices of the accompanying violins. Warmth, animation, accent, alertness the string choir does not lack; its bows bite; its instruments sing. Yet might be mellower, more translucent, more golden of tone; while the darker voices are not yet numerous enough for full underbody, for rich or darkly glowing background. The brass keeps balance; the players upon the instruments of percussion feel rhythm and color. There was no doubting the power of the orchestra in the upswelling periods of Saint-Saëns's symphony or the climax of Rimsky-Korsakov's march. Its elasticities quickened the occasional monotonies of Debussy's Allegro. It sustained, full-throated, the ample progress of Saint-Saëns's slow movements. A finer-textured, a more sensitive, a more euphonious tone are necessarily works of time. Mr. Monteux's acute ear and tireless hand should yet achieve them. The autumn will not go far before the orchestra in quality as well as in numbers will again be the orchestra.

For a second time a choir from Harvard led by Dr. Davison shared in a concert for the Pension Fund—the Glee Club he has developed it into a body of admirable singers unsurpassed hereabouts, and probably through the whole country, in the music that it sings. As the tale is told Dr. Davison has a theory about the voice; he has brought to such perfections. The voices are of an age—he believes—that craves self-expression, emotional, even romantic self-expression. As individuals they will not so release themselves; it is bad taste according to the lights of their years and station. No more will they do so in choral work specifically from their hands, like a story for print, a play for the theatre, a drawing for public exhibition. Perforce, assemble them in numbers with an esprit separate identity merged into a mass; give them some common channel for mutual expression like choral song—and the inhibitions disappear, the checked impulses find voice and the outcome is a glow of warmth, sensibility, sincerity of utterance. Whatever the theory, the Glee Club under Dr. Davison's training and by its own united effort has certainly attained these qualities. Yet, being wise, he has been careful to instil and cultivate the technical means that best release them. The student-singers now share his care for roundness, smoothness, transparency of tone. They know and use the virtues of open

Continued on Following Page

1920 Apr 19 Globe

HARVARD GLEE CLUB SCORES A BIG HIT

Assists at the Symphony Pension Concert

Mme Raisa Wins Applause in Song and Operatic Recital

The Harvard Glee Club, which under Dr Davison's remarkably able leadership has become the finest chorus in Boston, assisted the Symphony Orchestra at yesterday's Pension Fund concert in Symphony Hall. Their singing, both a capella and with orchestral accompaniment, was of such phenomenal excellence that the prolonged and spontaneous applause which greeted it was thoroughly deserved. They gave one encore, "Drake's Drum," by Coleridge-Taylor, but, probably owing to the length of the program, resisted determined efforts to obtain other extras.

Following the present policy of the Glee Club at all its concerts their selections were of as high artistic quality as those of the Symphony Orchestra. Palestrina's "Adoramus Te," one of the most perfect and most moving pieces in the whole range of religious music, could hardly have been better sung by the Vatican Choir than it was yesterday by these college students.

The individual voices in the Glee Club are few of them exceptional, but the ensemble singing has a tone quality, a precision of attack and phrasing and a clarity of enunciation rare in the work of the best professional singers. Dr Davison both feels and understands the music he conducts, but it seems almost miraculous that he can get such intelligent and enthusiastic cooperation from an amateur chorus.

The two choruses from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," in which Mr Monteux led the Glee Club and orchestra, are seldom heard. Yet their oriental atmosphere, with its vivid rhythms and distinctive harmonies, recalled the work of Borodin and of Rimsky-Korsakoff rather than the pseudo German banality of the composer's more familiar works and suggested that other delvers among his forgotten pieces might, like Dr Davison, make interesting discoveries.

A performance which was both accurate and spirited won instant favor with the audience. The "Prayer of Thanksgiving," one of the loveliest of folk tunes, in an excellent arrangement for chorus, orchestra and organ, was the most memorable item in a memorable concert.

The orchestra gave excellent routine performances of two familiar numbers, Saint-Saens' "Organ" symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice." Mr Laurent played the flute solo in the minuet from Gluck's "Orpheus" in masterly fashion. One wished that operatic excerpts of this quality could replace some of the third-rate symphonic music heard at the regular concerts.

MME. RAISA

Trans Apr 16

Here in Boston

At last one of Musorgsky's few symphonic pieces is to be played at the Symphony Concerts—his tone-poem, "A Night on the Bald Mountain," included by Mr Monteux in his programme for Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 23 and 24. The "bald mountain," it appears, is a Russian haunt of witches and evil spirits like the German Brocken. For celestial antidote the concerts will begin with Schubert's long symphony in C major.

The other announced numbers are Rabaud's tone-poem, "The Midnight Procession," first heard last year, and Svendsen's gay "Carnival at Paris."

A concert for the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra may escape rule and custom at the regular Symphony Concerts themselves. Accordingly Dr. Davison's Harvard choir will be permitted to sing extra pieces at the concert for the Pension Fund next Sunday afternoon. There is little doubt that the audiences will ask for them.

There have [illegible]

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Trans Apr 17

The Busy Symphony Orchestra in Boston, in Cambridge and for Its Pension Fund with the Harvard Glee Club Assisting—Mmes. Raisa and Lipkowska from Opera Houses—Miss Buell and Bach—The New York Trio to Return

MUSORGSKY wrote hardly any symphonic pieces and few fragments may be advisedly detached from his music-dramas and shifted to the concert-room. The more welcome, then, will be his tone-picture, "A Nnght on Bald Mountain," to be played at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Musorgsky wrote it in 1867, utilizing not a few pages of an abandoned opera, "Salammbô"—the Carthaginian princess of Flaubert's novel. Mr. Cavalcoressi in his monograph on the composer counts "A Night on Bald Mountain" as one of the earliest Russian tone-pictures and praises the movement, the rhythm of the music. The piece, continues Mr. Nathan in his handbook of Russian music, "describes the unholy revels of a witches' sabbath on a mountain range in the province of Kiev. The spirits of darkness are joined in their festivities by Tchernobog, the infernal god. At the height of the orgy, the distant sound of a village church-bell is heard and at this hint of dawn, the spirits disperse."

For other numbers, Mr. Monteux has set upon his programme Schubert's songful symphony in C major; Svendsen's sparkling and showy, "Carnival at Paris," and Mr. Rabaud's tone-picture, "Midnight Procession"—Faust stirred by sight of a holy train—first heard and liked when the composer was temporary conductor of the Symphony Orchestra last season. Schubert's symphony, Musorgsky's tone-picture and Svendsen's fantasia will all be played in the final concert of the orchestra at Cambridge in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening. To these three items, Mr. Monteux joins Franck's "Symphonic Variations" in which the sensitive Mr. Schmitz will play the piano-part.

The orchestra will be heard yet again at Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon in the second of the yearly concerts for the increase of its Pension Fund. Then and there the Harvard Glee Club will assist it as chorus—the men's choir that Dr. Davison has made the exemplar of choral singing hereabouts. Unaccompanied, the Glee Club will sing ancient churchly music from Palestrina, Lotti and Leisring. With the orchestra it will be heard in two choruses from Rubinstein's oratorio, "The Tower of Babel" and in "A Song of Thanksgiving" out of Netherland folk-music. It is likely also to prove its mettle in extra pieces. The orchestral items of the programme are Saint-Saëns's sonorous "Organ Symphony," Rimsky-Korsakov's sharply rhythmed and highly colored "Spanish Caprice" and the "Dance of the Blessed Spirits" from Gluck's opera, "Orpheus," with Mr. Laurent playing the solo part for flute.

Clear Call for a Symphony Chorus

Now that Mr. Monteux, the management and the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra have displayed so admirable a talent for reorganization in the speedy bringing of the disrupted band to working dimensions and efficiency, they might profitably give a thought to the reconstitution next season of the Symphony Chorus. In the musical year in which it was first assembled and heard—in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, in Mahler's second and in Bach's Passion Music According to Matthew—it became one of the chief glories of the orchestra and gave to six audiences such pleasures of choral singing as for years Boston had not known. Subsequently it has been utilized, as it were, only in fragments; a few women's voices aided Mr. Rabaud in Debussy's Nocturne of the Sirens, Mr. Monteux in Debussy's "Blessed Damozel"; while, perhaps, half the original chorus was wasted on such paltry and profitless stuff as Saint-Saëns's "The Lyre and the Harp," probably the most withered and futile music ever heard at the Symphony Concerts. Meanwhile the original members of the chorus, nearly to full numbers, are eager to be employed again in large and exacting work. Meanwhile the watchful and ascendant Philadelphia Orchestra is utilizing the abilities that Mr. Stephen Townsend disclosed as chorus-master. Meanwhile yet again, Boston hears no choral music of the first order except as Dr. Davison and his Harvard Glee Club afford it.

It is an open secret that Mr. Monteux would be glad to mend these conditions and return to the three choral concerts, outside the orchestral series, of Dr. Muck's final year—if only his work for a new season can be laid out accordingly. He also is ambitious to be heard in Beethoven's Choral Symphony; he would gladly revive Franck's oratorio, "The Beatitudes"; d'Indy's "St. Christopher," now on the point of production in Paris, might well tempt him to a first performance, next season, in America. Mr. Townsend is as ready to divide his work between Boston and Philadelphia. The Symphony Chorus can be restored and recruited at call. With the present and probably continuing zest for all that Mr. Monteux and the orchestra undertake, audiences would not be lacking for the three choral concerts that might well become annual custom. Without them Boston hears none but hackneyed choral music in the larger forms and no music at all in which chorus and orchestra bear equal share. Putting them by, the Symphony Orchestra abandons a field in which it made a valiant beginning and which it is still half-obligated to till. Why, then, should not plans for next year be laid accordingly—and here and now when they are in the annual making?

Items and Incidents

Apr 12

The cards inviting renewal of subscriptions to the Symphony Concerts indicate a general increase of ten per cent in the price of tickets for next season. It might have been more, and not exceeded expectation.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

HARVEST FROM A WELL-FILLED WEEK-END

Apr 19

The Symphony Orchestra Plays for Its Pension Fund—Lights and Shadows Upon The New Quality of the Band—Mr. Monteux and Theatre-Music—Dr. Davison's Glee Club from Harvard Assists in Familiar Glories—Mmes Lipkowska and Raisa Reveal Themselves in Variegated Song—Mr. Griffes and Fate—Mr. Heifetz Departs

WITH music of the theatre, with music depending for impression, there or elsewhere, upon rhythm and color, there is no doubting Mr. Monteux's admirable powers. Thus, on Saturday evening, as after-piece to Mr. Cortot's concert, he repeated the introduction to the first act and the march from the third act in Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel." To the march, awaited by his simple-minded, obedient, inquisitive folk, foolish, doting old King Dodon brings back his bride, the capricious and fantastical Queen of Shemanakha. Warriors and slaves lead the procession; then come the giants, dwarfs, acrobats and "freaks" with which it was her custom to be amused; and last appear high in their gilded chariot their Majesties themselves. The folk, says the stage-direction, are as "excited as children"; akin to a page from some big, warmly colored child's picture-book should be the pageant; the music, like the rest of the opera, takes half-seriously, half-mockingly, the action it clothes and points. For a few measures before the march sounds, there is preluding of the expectant, bobbing; then from a distance it begins; soon the warriors, the slaves, are hastening across the scene. Then, look at the acrobats turning hand-springs, O Marousia! See the one-eyed giant, O my Feodor! And last—molto crescendo—the queen, the royal pair themselves.

Not many in Symphony Hall had seen and heard the opera; fewer still could have read and remembered it; there were no stage, no pageant, no crowd, no lights, settings, dresses and bustle. Yet by sheer imagination in the quickening or the staying of the rhythms, in the quality and the intensity of tone, in the varying play of harmonic and instrumental color, Mr. Monteux gave the music almost the effect it gains in the theatre—manifold and freakish, suspensive and exciting, pageant of the stage, picture-book of folk-lore. By like intuition and experience with rhythm, with like sensibility to sustained or modulated tone, Mr. Monteux kept the quality of the droning or the prattling music of the lazy, sunny introduction.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Continued from Preceding Page

intonation and clean-cut song. They have raised the finesse that modulates shades a long vocal gradient. At need they can summon vigor, but their tone never becomes harsh; at need they can sustain a clouded, a delicate softness of song; between goes unfailing elasticity. When a choir of men and boys from the Sistine of Rome visited the United States last autumn, it received just praise for the quality of its song. Yet it is excelled here in America, no farther away than Cambridge, by the youth of Harvard College.

So much for Mr. Cortot's concert. The rest, as has been said, was prelude: Beethoven's overture, "Fidelio"—and post lude—the fragments of Rimsky-Korsakov "Golden Cockerel." Both are music of th theatre, by which sign Mr. Monteux "read them graphically, fervidly. The excerpt from the Russian opera are also music o the stage—a prelude designed to summo the sun-drenched, droning, somnolent a mosphere of the first act; a march designe to clothe and point a prescribed processio Removed to the concert-hall, stripped o the accessory—or rather the essential stage, they become but cursory exampl of Rimsky-Korsakov's skill and imagina tion with rhythms, harmonies, timbres, vivid but also an empty vesture. As f the overture, "Fidelio," it would be s very well were not the other overtu ("Leonora No. 3"), in which Beethovi concentrated and magnified his opera t times more familiar and twenty-fold mo eloquent.

H. T. PARKER

AIDS SYMPHONY PENSION FUND

Herald Apr 19

Harvard Glee Club's Singing a Notable Feature of 34th Concert

CHORUSES RECEIVED WITH ENTHUSIASM

By PHILIP HALE

The 34th concert for the benefit of the Orchestra Pension Fund was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, Archibald T. Davison, conductor. There was a very large audience. The program was as follows: Saint-Saens, Symphony in C minor, No. 3; unaccompanied choruses: Palestrina, Adoramus Te; Lotti, Crucifixus; Leisring, O Filii et Filiae, conducted by Dr. Davison. Gluck, Minuet from "Orpheus" (flute solo, Mr. Laurent); chorus and orchestra. Rubinstein, Choruses of Ham and Japheth from "The Tower of Babel;" Netherland Folk Song, Prayer of Thanksgiving, conducted by Mr. Monteux. Orchestra: Rimsky-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish themes.

Music by Coleridge Taylor if we are not mistaken, to Newbolt's sturdy verses, "Drake's Drum," was sung after the first group of choruses in response to the enthusiastic applause. This applause was deserved. Harvard University may well be proud of its Glee Club and the conductor of it. It should be remembered that the personnel necessarily changes with each graduating class. This makes the task of drilling the more arduous.

There was a time when the Glee clubs of Harvard and Yale sang chiefly college and popular songs for their own amusement and for the pleasure of the alumni in the cities the clubs visited. The singing as a rule was of the rough and ready-go-as-you-please, muscular variety. Throats were strained, chords stuck out on the sides of the neck, faces were flushed, there was painfully evident bodily activity from the waist up. In these clubs were often good voices and a few men that had studied singing; but the general result was a fervent roar of mediocrity. Today the Harvard Club challenges the admiration of all those interested in chorus singing. Dr. Davison has taught these students intelligently, musically; he has not overtrained them, for they sang yesterday with delightful spontaneity, yet with a careful regard for nuances of expression, with a mastery of dynamic gradations. In piano passages there was security of intonation; when full vocal strength was demanded, tonal quality was not lost. Especially noteworthy was the performance of the music by Lotti and Leisring, a performance that might excite the envy of any male chorus composed of picked professional singers who had long worked together.

It was a pleasure to hear the choruses from "The Tower of Babel." When this oratorio was performed by the Handel and Haydn Society in 1883 the music given to the Shemites and the Hamites was thought to be extremely oriental. In 1920 young composers, French, Americans, English, when their musical thoughts turn eastward, are more oriental than the orientals themselves.

It was a happy thought to call in the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club for this occasion. The club responded in most generous spirit. Let us hope that these singers next season may be heard in some important work for male voices and orchestra at a subscription concert.

Saint-Saens's impressive symphony was finely played. The lyrical section with organ displayed the eloquence of the upper strings, sonorous and beautiful in the long cantilena. Mr. Monteux gave a dramatic reading, and prepared the grand climaxes in a masterly manner. Mr. Laurent's full tone and expressive interpretation in Gluck's heavenly music were warmly appreciated. A brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's familiar Caprice ended a concert of much more than ordinary interest.

MME. LIPKOWSKA

PENSION CONCERT BEST YET

Harvard Glee Club Sings With Symphony

Post Apr 19

BY OLIN DOWNES

Perhaps the finest programme in the history of the Pension Fund concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestral compositions, conducted by Pierre Monteux, were Saint-Saens' C minor symphony for organ and orchestra, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeously-colored "Spanish Caprice." These works and their performance would have made the concert well worth while. In addition, the Harvard Glee Club, directed by Dr. Archibald Davison, sang a cappela music by Palestrina, Lotti and Leisring, two "pictures" from a forgotten choral work of Rubinstein, "The Tower of Babel," and the Netherlands folk-song known as "Prayer of Thanksgiving," with accompaniment of orchestra and organ.

IDEAL PROGRAMME

In all respects this was an ideal programme for a Sunday afternoon concert. The Saint-Saens symphony is a sonorous and impressive work, very seriously composed, yet with sufficient brilliancy and dramatic rhetoric in it to make it immediately popular. It enlisted the full resources of the orchestra, and those who do not regularly attend these concerts had unusual opportunity in this symphony and in the scintillating music of Rimsky-Korsakoff to realize what wonderful things these players bring to pass.

The singing of the chorus was extremely impressive. Too much praise cannot be given Dr. Davison for the work he accomplishes with these singers. They are young men, with voices of good or average quality, many of whom are not preparing for a musical career, with whom music is a side issue at the college. Yet the most noted chorus might be proud of such tone-quality, such musicianly pleasing fineness of nuance, clearness of enunciation. More: It was evident that the singers felt the music profoundly. It would be hard to overestimate the effect of this noble music on the audience, as it would be difficult to overestimate the effect on character which work such as Dr. Davison's must exert in a university.

As an encore to the first a capella group, the chorus sang a setting of "Drake's Drum." ... and Japheth from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel" have a melodious and ... oriental character to commend ... and were greatly enjoyed by the au... ence. Enthusiasm rose to its heigh... after the "Prayer of Thanksgiving."

Finally, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra distinguished themselves in a superb performance of the "Spanish Caprice." The audience was a very large one. The concert will long be remembered.

SATU...

On Sunday afternoon at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension Fund, the conductor did as much for an other music of Rimsky-Korsakov that h... was undertaking for the first time in Bos... ton—the "Spanish Caprice," show-piece these many years at Symphony Hall. ... was not written for the theatre; but ... might well be shifted thither. The wor... der is, indeed, that Mr. Diaghilev or Mme Pavlova has not long since laid trans... ferring hand upon it. The final "Fan... dango of the Asturias" invites the rhyth... mic and colorful whirl of the Russian dance; the repeated introduction is a tempting; individual and artful prowes could display itself (as it does in the con... cert-hall) to the variations and to the suc... cession of cadenzas. The eye of fanc... readily clothes the music in the glow o... Spanish backgrounds and Spanish dresses. Certainly it was as music of the stage that Mr. Monteux brought the Caprice to such performance as in Boston it has never known before. Dr. Muck refine... upon the Fandango; Mr. Monteux cut ... loose with the keenest intuition in th... slackening or the tightening of the rhythm. It rushed; it glowed. There wa... like rhythmic flare, like tonal elasticit... in his version of the introduction returnin... as intermezzo; while this or that virtuos... of the orchestra proved his mettle in vari... ations or cadenzas. Who but Rimsky Korsakov, in sheer exuberance of mastery would have set first violin over snare drum and bade the rest of the band be s... lent? Of all the show-pieces of Sym... phony Hall none is quite so good fun a... this "Spanish Caprice." The bearde... spectacled composer, professor of this ar... that in one and t'other state school, mus... have had "the time of his life" as h... wrote it.

In this Caprice, in the other orchestra numbers of Sunday afternoon—Saint-Saëns "organ" symphony and the dance of th... blessed spirits in the Elysian Fields o... Gluck's "Orpheus"; in Debussy's Fantasi... and other music of Saturday evening, th... quality of the reconstituted orchestr... stood fairly clear. The wood-winds, o... course—virtually an unchanged choir—kee... their familiar distinctions. Mr. Lauren... indeed, spoke for them when he played th... flute-part in Gluck's dance with a felici... of tone that was the flower of technic... skill and musical perception. In the tran... parent, undulant voice of his flute we... the simplicity, remoteness, wistfulness ... Gluck's measures, painting in melody a... modulation what a century later Puvis ... Chavannes painted in line and color. The... might have been softer, more shimmerin... texture in the voices of the accompanyin... violins. Warmth, animation, accent, aler... ness the string choir does not lack; i... bows bite; its instruments sing. Yet ... might be mellower, more translucent, mo... golden of tone; while the darker voices a... not yet numerous enough for full unde... body, for rich or darkly glowing bac... ground. The brass keeps balance; t... players upon the instruments of percussi... feel rhythm and color. There was ... doubting the power of the orchestra in t... upswelling periods of Saint-Saëns's sym... phony or the climax of Rimsky-Korsakov... march. Its elasticities quickened the ... casional monotonies of Debussy's Allegr... It sustained, full-throated, the ample p... gress of Saint-Saëns's slow movements. ... finer-textured, a more sensitive, a more e... phonious tone are necessarily works ... time. Mr. Monteux's acute ear and tire... hand should yet achieve them. The autu... will not go far before the orches... in quality as well as in numbers will ag... be the orchestra.

For a second time a choir from Harva... led by Dr. Davison shared in a conc... for the Pension Fund—the Glee Club ... he has developed it into a body of adu... singers unsurpassed hereabouts, and pro... ably through the whole country, in ... music that it sings. As the tale is to... Dr. Davison has a theory about the voi... he has brought to such perfections. Th... are of an age—he believes—that cra... self-expression, emotional, even roman... self-expression. As individuals they w... not so release themselves; it is bad ... according to the lights of their years ... station. No more will they do so in ... work specifically from their hands, like ... story for print, a play for the theatre, ... drawing for public exhibition. Per c... tra, assemble them in numbers with ea... separate identity merged into a mass; g... them some common channel for mut... expression like choral song—and the ... hibitions disappear, the checked impu... find voice and the outcome is a r... warmth, sensibility, sincerity of utterar... Whatever the theory, the Glee Club un... Dr. Davision's training and by its ... united effort has certainly attained th... qualities. Yet, being wise, he has b... careful to instil and cultivate the techn... means that best release them. The ... dent-singers now share his ear for roc... ness, smoothness, transparency of t... They know and use the virtues of ea...

Continued on Following Page

1920 Apr 19 Globe

HARVARD GLEE CLUB SCORES A BIG HIT

Assists at the Symphony Pension Concert

Mme Raisa Wins Applause in Song and Operatic Recital

The Harvard Glee Club, which under Dr Davison's remarkably able leadership has become the finest chorus in Boston, assisted the Symphony Orchestra at yesterday's Pension Fund concert in Symphony Hall. Their singing, both a capella and with orchestral accompaniment, was of such phenomenal excellence that the prolonged and spontaneous applause which greeted it was thoroughly deserved. They gave one encore, "Drake's Drum," by Coleridge-Taylor, but, probably owing to the length of the program, resisted determined efforts to obtain other extras.

Following the present policy of the Glee Club at all its concerts their selections were of as high artistic quality as those of the Symphony Orchestra. Palestrina's "Adoramus Te," one of the most perfect and most moving pieces in the whole range of religious music, could hardly have been better sung by the Vatican Choir than it was yesterday by these college students.

The individual voices in the Glee Club are few of them exceptional, but the ensemble singing has a tone quality, a precision of attack and phrasing and a clarity of enunciation rare in the work of the best professional singers. Dr Davison both feels and understands the music he conducts, but it seems almost miraculous that he can get such intelligent and enthusiastic cooperation from an amateur chorus.

The two choruses from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," in which Mr Monteux led the Glee Club and orchestra, are seldom heard. Yet their oriental atmosphere, with its vivid rhythms and distinctive harmonies, recalled the work of Borodin and of Rimsky-Korsakoff rather than the pseudo German banality of the composer's more familiar works and suggested that other delvers among his forgotten pieces might, like Dr Davison, make interesting discoveries.

A performance which was both accurate and spirited won instant favor with the audience. The "Prayer of Thanksgiving," one of the loveliest of folk tunes, in an excellent arrangement for chorus, orchestra and organ, was the most memorable item in a memorable concert.

The orchestra gave excellent routine performances of two familiar numbers, Saint-Saens' "Organ" symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice." Mr Laurent played the flute solo in the minuet from Gluck's "Orpheus" in masterly fashion. One wished that operatic excerpts of this quality could replace some of the third-rate symphonic music heard at the regular concerts.

MME. RAISA A...

Trans Apr 16

Here in Boston

At last one of Musorgsky's few sym... phonic pieces is to be played at the Sym... phony Concerts—his tone-poem, "A Nig... on the Bald Mountain," included by M... Monteux in his programme for Frida... afternoon and Saturday evening, April ... and 24. The "bald mountain," it appear... is a Russian haunt of witches and ev... spirits like the German Brocken. Fo... celestial antidote the concerts will beg... with Schubert's long symphony in C majo...

The other announced numbers are Rabaud's tone-poem, "The Midnight Procession," first heard last year, and Svendsen's gay "Carnival at Paris."

A concert for the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra may escape rule and custom at the regular Symphony Concerts themselves. Accordingly Dr. Davison's Harvard choir will be permitted to sing extra pieces at the concert for the Pension Fund next Sunday afternoon. There is little doubt that the audiences will ask for them.

There have been ...

Clear Call for a Symphony Chorus

Now that Mr. Monteux, the management and the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra have displayed so admirable a talent for reorganization in the speedy bringing of the disrupted band to working dimensions and efficiency, they might profitably give a thought to the reconstitution next season of the Symphony Chorus. In the musical year in which it was first assembled and heard—in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, in Mahler's second and in Bach's Passion Music According to Matthew—it became one of the chief glories of the orchestra and gave to six audiences such pleasures of choral singing as for years Boston had not known. Subsequently it has been utilized, as it were, only in fragments; a few women's voices aided Mr. Rabaud in Debussy's Nocturne of the Sirens, Mr. Monteux in Debussy's "Blessed Damozel"; while, perhaps, half the original chorus was wasted on such paltry and profitless stuff as Saint-Saëns's "The Lyre and the Harp," probably the most withered and futile music ever heard at the Symphony Concerts. Meanwhile the original members of the chorus, nearly to full numbers, are eager to be employed again in large and exacting work. Meanwhile the watchful and ascendant Philadelphia Orchestra is utilizing the abilities that Mr. Stephen Townsend disclosed as chorusmaster. Meanwhile yet again, Boston hears no choral music of the first order except as Dr. Davison and his Harvard Glee Club afford it.

It is an open secret that Mr. Monteux would be glad to mend these conditions and return to the three choral concerts, outside the orchestral series, of Dr. Muck's final year—if only his work for a new season can be laid out accordingly. He also is ambitious to be heard in Beethoven's Choral Symphony; he would gladly revive Franck's oratorio, "The Beatitudes"; d'Indy's "St. Christopher," now on the point of production in Paris, might well tempt him to a first performance, next season, in America. Mr. Townsend is as ready to divide his work between Boston and Philadelphia. The Symphony Chorus can be restored and recruited at call. With the present and probably continuing zest for all that Mr. Monteux and the orchestra undertake, audiences would not be lacking for the three choral concerts that might well become annual custom. Without them Boston hears none but hackneyed choral music in the larger forms and no music at all in which chorus and orchestra bear equal share. Putting them by, the Symphony Orchestra abandons a field in which it made a valiant beginning and which it is still half-obligated to till. Why, then, should not plans for next year be laid accordingly—and here and now when they are in the annual making?

Items and Incidents Apr 12

The cards inviting renewal of subscriptions to the Symphony Concerts indicate a general increase of ten per cent in the price of tickets for next season. It might have been more, and not exceeded expectation.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Trans Apr 17

The Busy Symphony Orchestra in Boston, in Cambridge and for Its Pension Fund, with the Harvard Glee Club Assisting—Mmes. Raisa and Lipkowska from Opera Houses—Miss Buell and Bach—The New York Trio to Return

MUSORGSKY wrote hardly any symphonic pieces and few fragments may be advisedly detached from his music-dramas and shifted to the concert-room. The more welcome, then, will be his tone-picture, "A Night on Bald Mountain," to be played at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Musorgsky wrote it in 1867, utilizing not a few pages of an abandoned opera, "Salammbô"—the Carthaginian princess of Flaubert's novel. Mr. Cavalcoressi in his monograph on the composer counts "A Night on Bald Mountain" as one of the earliest Russian tone-pictures and praises the movement, the rhythm of the music. The piece, continues Mr. Nathan in his handbook of Russian music, "describes the unholy revels of a witches' sabbath on a mountain range in the province of Kiev. The spirits of darkness are joined in their festivities by Tchernobog, the infernal god. At the height of the orgy, the distant sound of a village church-bell is heard and at this hint of dawn, the spirits disperse."

For other numbers, Mr. Monteux has set upon his programme Schubert's songful symphony in C major; Svendsen's sparkling and showy, "Carnival at Paris," and Mr. Rabaud's tone-picture, "Midnight Procession"—Faust stirred by sight of a holy train—first heard and liked when the composer was temporary conductor of the Symphony Orchestra last season. Schubert's symphony, Musorgsky's tone-picture and Svendsen's fantasia will all be played in the final concert of the orchestra at Cambridge in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening. To these three items, Mr. Monteux joins Franck's "Symphonic Variations" in which the sensitive Mr. Schmitz will play the piano-part.

The orchestra will be heard yet again at Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon in the second of the yearly concerts for the increase of its Pension Fund. Then and there the Harvard Glee Club will assist it as chorus—the men's choir that Dr. Davison has made the exemplar of choral singing hereabouts. Unaccompanied, the Glee Club will sing ancient churchly music from Palestrina, Lotti and Leisring. With the orchestra it will be heard in two choruses from Rubinstein's oratorio, "The Tower of Babel" and in "A Song of Thanksgiving" out of Netherland folk-music. It is likely also to prove its mettle in extra pieces. The orchestral items of the programme are Saint-Saëns's sonorous "Organ Symphony," Rimsky-Korsakov's sharply rhythmed and highly colored "Spanish Caprice" and the "Dance of the Blessed Spirits" from Gluck's opera, "Orpheus," with Mr. Laurent playing the solo part for flute.

CONCERT - CHRONICLE

HARVEST FROM A WELL-FILLED WEEK-END

Apr. 20

The Symphony Orchestra Plays for Its Pension Fund—Lights and Shadows Upon The New Quality of the Band—Mr. Monteux and Theatre-Music—Dr. Davison's Glee Club from Harvard Assists in Familiar Glories—Mmes Lipkowska and Raisa Reveal Themselves in Variegated Song—Mr. Griffes and Fate—Mr. Heifetz Departs

WITH music of the theatre, with music depending for impression, there or elsewhere, upon rhythm and color, there is no doubting Mr. Monteux's admirable powers. Thus, on Saturday evening, as after-piece to Mr. Cortot's concert, he repeated the introduction to the first act and the march from the third act in Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel." To the march, awaited by his simple-minded, obedient, inquisitive folk, foolish, doting old King Dodon brings back his bride, the capricious and fantastical Queen of Shemanakha. Warriors and slaves lead the procession; then come the giants, dwarfs, acrobats and "freaks" with which it was her custom to be amused; and last appear high in their gilded chariot their Majesties themselves. The folk, says the stage-direction, are as "excited as children"; akin to a page from some big, warmly colored child's picture-book should be the pageant; the music, like the rest of the opera, takes half-seriously, half-mockingly, the action it clothes and points. For a few measures before the march sounds, there is preluding of the expectant, bobbing; then from a distance it begins; soon the warriors, the slaves, are hastening across the scene. Then, look at the acrobats turning hand-springs, O Marousia! See the one-eyed giant, O my Feodor! And last—molto crescendo—the queen, the royal pair themselves.

Not many in Symphony Hall had seen and heard the opera; fewer still could have read and remembered it; there were no stage, no pageant, no crowd, no lights, settings, dresses and bustle. Yet by sheer imagination in the quickening or the staying of the rhythms, in the quality and the intensity of tone, in the varying play of harmonic and instrumental color, Mr. Monteux gave the music almost the effect it gains in the theatre—manifold and freakish, suspensive and exciting, pageant of the stage, picture-book of folk-lore. By like intuition and experience with rhythm, with like sensibility to sustained or modulated tone, Mr. Monteux kept the quality of the droning or the prattling music of the lazy, sunny introduction.

Continued from Preceding Page

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

intonation and clean-cut ...ong. They ha... gained the finesse that modulates ... shades a long vocal gradient. At need t... can summon vigor, but their tone neve... comes harsh; at need they can sustain, ... clouded a delicate softness of song; wh... between goes unfailing elasticity. Wher... choir of men and boys from the basili... of Rome visited the United States last ... tumn, it received just praise for the qu... of its song. Yet it is excelled here ... America, no farther away than Cambr... by the youth of Harvard College—and ... of all, by Dr. Davison.

22d

...two choruses from Rubinstein, "The Tower of Babel," ...e-Taylor's setting of Newbolt's ballad, "Drake's Drum"—exemplifying these abilities on Sunday, with a ...chorus of the Netherlands, "Prayer of Thanksgiving," added for good measure. In this piece, moreover, and the fragments from Rubinstein, the orchestra joined the singers. The sons of Ham sing of their wanderings in murmuring, monotonously rhythmed, oriental song. The half-voice of the choir, the sustained yet flexible rhythm won on the ear. The sons of Japhet sing an idyl of mountain and sea. The Glee Club looped the gentle phrases as though not eighty voices, but rather one, were shaping them. In the clean-cut, sturdy singing of "Drake's Drum" Dr. Davison and his choir imparted exactly the stark sinewy vigors of English balladry when it puts by its bane which is over-sentiment. The folk-chorus ascended in broadly sustained and interlocked sonorities. Yet in the church pieces, the finest glories of conductor and chorus stood clear. Often the intrinsic beauty of the tone was an emotion in itself. At the beginning of Lotti's "Crucifixus," indeed throughout the piece, it melted not only the listening ear, but the answering heart. The contrasts of Palestrina's "Adoramus Te" seemed more as the quickened impulses of devout spirits stirred than as the prescriptions of the composer. When the ancient painters set on canvas the ascension of Jesus, they suffused the surrounding air with radiance. So sounded the voices as phrase upon phrase ascended in Leis-ing's seemingly simple hymn. In such singing live the very body and spirit of this ancient music of devotion. The mind follows the artfully interwoven strands, heeds the adroit contrasts; the ear receives the beauty of the singers' tone laid upon them, the heart swells to the warmth, the depth of the simple, the direct emotion. Far away across a gulf of method and spirit wider than the three centuries, seemed the Saint-Saëns of the "effective" climaxes, the smoothed slow movements, the neat Allegros of the "organ" symphony.

H. T. P.

Items and Announcements

Though present subscribers to the Symphony Concerts may, until May 1, retain their places for next season, new subscribers may now send to Symphony Hall their applications for seats. They will be filed, filled in order of receipt, and as near to the desired sittings as is possible. The prices range from $18 to $65.

Trans Ap. 24

Friday afternoon, April 30, in Symphony Hall, the twenty-fourth and last of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for the current season, with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. McCormack for assisting singer. Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," in which orchestra and conductor were eloquent, will be repeated, and Mr. McCormack will sing pieces by Händel and the Englishman, Frank Bridge.

Saturday evening, May 1, in Symphony Hall, the twenty-fourth and last of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for the current season with Mr. Monteux, Mr. McCormack assisting, and the pieces above noted.

Saturday evening, May 1, in the Art ..... Burleigh

At the Symphony Concerts of April 30 and May 1, when the tenor makes his final appearances in Boston, he will be heard in an unfamiliar aria by Mozart and in a setting of a sonnet of Rupert Brooke by the English composer, Frank Bridge.

Report runs in Paris that Monsieur Rabaud, temporary conductor of the Boston Orchestra through the season of 1918-1919, will soon succeed Monsieur Fauré as director of the Conservatory. Fauré's health is failing and so he retires. So also will Rabaud be well placed in the official hierarchy that is his natural abode. Mr. Monteux has long stood valiantly outside it.

In all probability, the Symphony Orchestra, departing from annual custom, will not visit cities of the Middle West next season for a week at midwinter. The cost of travel now makes the gain from the journey too small.

Items and Announcements

Apr 26

Mr. Monteux has set an interesting programme for the final pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. It begins, "by request," with Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," music in which conductor and band excelled themselves at a single performance on a Friday in March. The second never befell, because on the ensuing Saturday, the seceders quitted the orchestra. Hence probably, a repetition more than warrantable. Thereafter follow d'Indy's variations, "Istar," long unheard at the Symphony Concerts—a piece in which imagination and executive resource go hand in hand—and, for joyous ending to the musical year, the prelude to Wagner's opera, "The Mastersingers." Between whiles, Mr. McCormack will sing a little known concert-air of Mozart, "Non Temer. Amato Bene," and Frank Bridge's setting for tenor voice and orchestra of Rupert Brooke's grave and ...ely tempered sonnet:

...low out, you bugles over the rich Dead
...ere's none of these so lonely and poor of old,
...ying has made us rarer gifts than gold.
...no laid the world away; poured out the red
... wine of youth; gave up the years to be
... work and joy, and that unhoped serene,
... men call age; and those who would have been,
... sons, they gave their immortality.
..., bugles, blow! They brought us, for our dearth,
... lacked so long, and Love and Pain.
... has come back, as a king, to earth,
... subjects with a royal wage;
... alks in our ways again;
... stage.

BOSTON GLOBE—SA

23D CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald Apr 24

Orchestra Gives Eloquent Performance of Schubert Master Work

RUSSIAN'S SATANIC REVEL PICTURESQUE

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d symphony concert, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, Symphony in C; Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain", symphonic poem; Rabaud, "The Nocturnal Procession"; Svendsen, "Carnival at Paris."

Moussorgsky's Fantasie was composed in 1867 and was thus one of the few early Russian orchestral compositions of a fantastically picturesque nature. In the original form it was no doubt crude, for Moussorgsky had little technic for the larger forms of music; he despised "style" and believed that much knowledge would prevent him from attaining the realism that was his goal. That he himself was not satisfied with this symphonic poem is shown by the fact that he revised it two or three times. He died; Rimsky Korsakoff edited it and orchestrated it. The music was finally heard after Moussorgsky's death. Rimsky Korsakoff was a fastidious musician, a learned harmonist, a master of orchestrations. It is said that he sandpapered and polished "Boris Godorenoff" to the great detriment of Moussorgsky's opera; he chastened the wild spirit; he tamed the native savageness so it is said. What did he do to this musical picture of a Witches' Sabbath on Bald Mountain?

Having heard several musical descriptions of these unholy Sabbaths, where reverence was paid Satan, exultantly ruling in the form of a he-goat, where there was horrid, obscene revelry, if we may believe well-instructed ancient and modern writers on Satanism and witchcraft, we wonder why any woman, young or old, straddled a broomstick and made her way hopefully and joyfully to a lonely mountain or barren plain. If we can put faith in the musical descriptions given by Berlioz, Boito, Gounod, Satan's evening receptions were comparatively tame affairs, with dancing of a nature that would not have offended the selectmen and their wives and sisters of our little village in the Sixties; when the waltz was frowned on as a sensual and ungodly diversion. Liszt's Mephisto waltz is, indeed, sensuous, fleshly, but Satan in this instance only plays the fiddle; he is not master of Sabbatic revels. In Moussorgsky's symphonic poem, which was performed here for the first time at a Symphony concert—Mr. Longy conducted it 16 years ago at a concert of the Orchestral Club—the allegro devoted to the worshippers of the devil is rather commonplace; its laborious wildness becomes monotonous in spite of the editor's instrumentation. Far more original and effective is the second section, in which a church bell puts the blasphemous revelers to flight.

The performance of Schubert's great symphony was a most eloquent one, surpassing any performance that we remember, here or abroad. It was remarkable by reason of tempi happily chosen; of a poetic treatment of episodes that did not check the musical flow; of a masterly handling of dynamic gradations—witness the marvellously managed sinking from fortissimo to pianissimo in the finale; of brilliant solo work; of the constantly pervading romantic spirit with which the music is charged. One of the many memorable features of this performance was the reading of the opening flourish of the finale; music that would have suited the great feast at which Belshazzar drank wine before a thousand of his lords.

It was a pleasure to hear Rabaud's beautiful music again, beautifully played; not only because this music reminded one of the composer-conductor, his dignified, high-bred, and gentle nature, and the many imaginative interpretations during the last season; the music itself has character and charm.

Svendsen's "Carnival at Paris" had not been heard at a symphony concert for many years. As we remembered, it was an earnest, preconcerd effort to be jolly with slim results. Yesterday it was, for the most part, fresh and joyous, while the idyllic episode, developed at length, had a northern rather than a Parisian tenderness, and suggested abiding love rather than an accideantal amorous encounter.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week, the last of the season, will be as follows: Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony (by request); Mozart, Scene and Rondo, "Non temer"; d'Indy "Istar," variations; Frank Bridge, Sonnet for voice and orchestra, "Blow Out You Bugles"; Wagner, overture to "The Mastersingers," John McCormack will be the singer.

MONTEUX SHINES IN SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Shubert's Long Work Given Spirited Production

Mussorgsky, Svendsen and Rabaud Contribute to the List

Whatever his general merits and defects may be, there is plainly one point on which Mr Monteux surpasses most of his predecessors, the ability to choose interesting programs. At yesterday's Symphony concert there was no soloist and no new composition. The chief item was Schubert's C major Symphony, one of the masterpieces which a wise tradition requires to be played every other season.

Instead of getting other and perhaps less welcome routine numbers out of the way at the same concert, as Dr Muck would probably have done, Mr Monteux chose two unfamiliar numbers by Mussorgsky and Svendsen, and repeated from last season what was then a well-liked novelty, Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne."

The applause showed that the audience got as much pleasure from the concert as they would from one with special features in the shape of a soloist of the first rank or an outstanding novelty.

The length of Schubert's C major Symphony is proverbial. Some have found it heavenly, and others have hinted that a few cuts would do no harm. Mr Monteux did not take all the repeats, and he hurried the Andante into a sort of "Marche Militaire." The result was an exceptionally brief and spirited performance which stressed the gaiety of the music at the expense of its quiet lyric melancholy. Yet the peculiar charm of Schubert depends on a blending of both qualities.

Mussorgsky's orchestral fantasy, "A Night on Bald Mountain," was first written in 1867 and afterwards revised by the composer and by his friend Rimsky-Korsakoff. It had never been played till yesterday at the Symphony concerts. The music deals with a Russian Witches' Sabbath, which contrasts with the one in the last movement of Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony" to be heard next week. The themes are not strong enough intrinsically to avoid bombastic effects when they are given out fortissimo by full orchestra.

The work is, as a whole, rather tentative, but interesting historically as a specimen of the early work of the modern Russian school of composers. The performance had all the requisite dash and fire.

Svendsen's "Carnival" is one of those agreeable minor works easily listened to and as easily forgotten, which show great talent and a slender creative imagination. Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" escapes falling in the same category chiefly because every bit of it is delicately and finely wrought.

Perfect workmanship and the infinite capacity for taking pains are not quite genious, but when guided by a taste as exquisite as Mr Rabaud's they can produce works sure to give pleasure to the cultivated musician. Mr Monteux spared no pains to make the performance suit ...music.

Herald Apr 24

23RD SYMPHONY

Orchestra Plays "A Night on Bald Mountain," Poem

By J. V. CLARK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concerts yesterday played for the first time in Boston a symphonic poem, "A Night on Bald Mountain," by Moussorgsky, edited by Rimsky-Korsakoff. The piece is one of the older Moussorgsky works. Left in an orchestrally crude state by the composer, it was polished and repolished by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Even now that it has been treated by that master of orchestration, it is crude in spots. It is not always the brilliant, lurid picture of Satanic revels that the composer intended. It is not one of his master works.

The orchestra gave a strikingly beautiful performance of the Schubert Symphony in C minor, poetic, exquisite in its dynamic gradations. The work, itself one of the masterpieces that holds an indisputable place, seems long and a bit tedious to modern ears, though it may be sacrilege to say so. Its cool passions, its dignity and gentleness delighted the orthodox and the elderly in the audience. Every dog has his day; the greybeards had theirs with the playing of the symphony.

"The Nocturnal Procession," by Henri Rabaud, was played again and gratefully heard. Mr. Rabaud is remembered as a well-trained, thorough musician, a kindly, not-too-red-blooded gentleman, who carried the orchestra over a hard period. Eminently respected, his music is heard for its own sake as well as a matter of courtesy to its composer.

The concerts the coming week will be the finals of the season. Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony will be repeated. Its performances were interrupted at the time the seceders left the orchestra. John McCormack will sing an old Mozart aria and a setting by Frank Bridge of Rupert Brooke's sonnet, "Blow Out, You Bugles." D'Indy's "Istar" will complete the program.

Review of Week's Musical Events in Boston

AT last Sunday's pension fund concert the Symphony Orchestra shared the honors with the Harvard Glee Club. The concert was, indeed, unusual in this respect. So far as orchestral music alone is concerned, many previous pension fund concerts were far more noteworthy. Dr. Muck's Wagnerian programs set a standard which have not since been approached. There are fanatical folk who do not relish such statements, but the statements are indisputably true, nevertheless.

On this occasion the glee club from Dr. Lowell's well-known college distinguished itself in a cappella music—three selections from the liturgy of the Catholic Church, Palestrina's "Adoramus Te," Lotti's "Crucifixus," and Leisching's "O Filii et Filiae." In these hymns the club sang with admirable fervor and artistic finish. Such accomplishments reflect the high musical standard set by the director of the club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison. But most welcome of all, from the popular viewpoint, was the clubs beautiful singing of the famous Netherland folk-song, "Prayer of Thanksgiving," which was accompanied by organ and orchestra, and two choruses from the Rubinstein oratorio, "The Tower of Babel," with Mr. Monteux conducting. As an encore, the Harvard choristers sang the spirited "Drake's Drum," by Coleride-Taylor.

These choral numbers, together with the minuet from Gluck's "Orpheus" and the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes," two fascinating orchestral pieces, gave brilliancy to the concert. The orchestra also played the Saint-Saens Symphony in C minor, with Albert Snow at the organ and Alfred De Voto at the piano.

S.

Trans Apr 26

SYMPHONY PLAYERS GIVE FINE PROGRAM

The first number on the Symphony program, yesterday afternoon, was a Schubert symphony, in C major. The opening movement of this symphony is very rhythmic and melodic. In the second part there is a march-like theme. The third movement, blending happiness and sadness, is followed by a swift and intense finale. Could one find a better instrument to portray the greatness of Schubert as a composer and master of melody than the Boston Symphony orchestra?

The second number on the program was an orchestral fantasy by Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain." The composer's description published with the score of his work was as follows: "Subterranean din of supernatural voices. Appearance of spirits of darkness, followed by that of the Black God Tchernbog. Black mass. Witches' Sabbath. At the height of the Sabbath, there sounds far off the bell of the little church in a village, which scatters the spirits of Darkness. Daybreak." The portrayal of these fearsome creatures, their revelry and the contrasting peace and quinet after their heardlong retreat at daybreak was so vividly rendered by the orchestra one cannot help feeling that Mr. Monteux has a great imagination.

It was a pleasuer to hear again Henri Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne." It was most quieting after the orgies of the selection preceeding it.

The final number was a composition of Johan Svendsen, "The Carnival at Paris." Despite the rainy weather, a large audience attended. Next week John McCormack is to be soloist with the orchestra.

Trav Apr 26

McCORMACK AT LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT

The principal feature of the season's last pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening (April 30 and May 1), will be Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony. This mighty and difficult work for an especially large orchestra was played on Friday, March 5. Pierre Monteux is repeating it by general request. John McCormack will also make his last appearance in Boston this season as soloist of these concerts. Vincent D'Indy's "Istar" variations, and Wagner's overture to "Dei Meistersinger" will also be included in this program.

Globe Apr 25

Events and Comments

John McCormack's last appearance in Boston for two years will be as soloist at this week's Symphony concerts. With his usual intelligent zeal for the performance of good unfamiliar music, he has chosen a little known aria by Mozart and a setting of one of the sonnets of Rupert Brooke, the young English poet whose death in the war did much to stimulate public interest in his work, by Frank Bridge, regarded in England as an exceptionally promising composer. Mr Monteux has selected for the final number of the season the same piece that Dr Muck several times chose for the end of the last program, the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," an excellent choice.

POPS OPEN NEXT WEEK

The opening night of the popular concerts in Symphony Hall is scheduled for a week from tomorrow, Monday, May 3. This peculiarly Bostonian institution, which provides diverting music and excellent orchestral performances, to an accompaniment of light refreshments, nightly except Sundays, from 8 to 11 through the spring and early summer, reached its record in attendance last season. There is no reason why that record should not be broken. Agide Jacchia, one of the best conductors the Pops have ever had, is planning a set of programmes of exceptional interest, with a force of 80 regular Symphony players to execute his ideas. The innovation of waitresses, so successful last year, will be continued. The menu will be enlarged and improved. On Thursday of the first week will come "Operatic Night." The opening programme follows:

"Marche Militaire" ..... Schubert
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" ..... Nicolai
"Song Without Words" ..... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Bizet
"Gypsy Dance," from "Carmen" ..... Wagner
Organ solo, finale, "Sixth Symphony" ..... Widor
Mr. Albert W. Snow.
Tempest scene from "Othello" ..... Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
"Canzone" ..... Van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz" ..... Mascagni
"Hungarian Dance," No. 1 in G minor ..... Brahms

McCORMACK AT SYMPHONY

The season's last pair of Boston Symphony concerts (the coming Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 30-May 1) will witness a second performance by Mr. Monteux of Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony. This mighty and difficult work for an especially large orchestra was played on Friday, March 5, and Pierre Monteux will repeat it in response to numerous requests by the Friday as well as the Saturday patrons. In this music the composer immortalizes his love for Henrietta Smithson in the following romantic episodes: "Dreams, Passions"; "A Ball"; "Scene in the Meadows"; "March to the Scaffold"; "Witches' Sabbath."

The soloist will be John McCormack, also making his last Boston appearance of the season on this occasion. He will sing Mozart's aria "Non temer, amato bene," with violin obligato, and a musical setting by the noted English composer, Frank Bridge, of Rupert Brooke's sonnet, "Blow Out You Bugles." Also on the same notable programme stand Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" variations and Wagner's overture to "Die Meistersinger."

Rush for Pops' Tables to Open Tomorrow

Globe Apr 25

THE rush for tables will start tomorrow for the opening night of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, Monday, May 3. This peculiarly Bostonian institution which provides the diverting orchestral music, to an accompaniment of light refreshments, nightly except Sundays from 8 to 11 through the Spring and early Summer, reached its record in attendance last season. Agide Jacchia, the popular conductor, is planning a set of attractive programs with eighty Symphony players to execute this plan. The menu will be enlarged this season. On Thursday of the first week will come "Operatic Night."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The season's last pair of Symphony concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will offer Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony in C minor, which Pierre Monteux will repeat in response to numerous requests. The soloist will be John McCormack, who will sing Mozart's aria, "Non temer, amato bene," and a musical setting by Frank Bridge of Rupert Brooke's sonnet, "Blow Out, You Bugles." Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" variations and Wagner's "Mastersingers" overture are also on the program.

Globe Apr 28

"Pops" Open Next Week

The "Pop" concerts begin in Symphony Hall Monday night, May 3. This peculiarly Bostonian institution, which provides the most diverting music in the finest orchestral performance, to an accompaniment of light refreshments, nightly except Sundays, from 8 to 11, through the Spring and early Summer, reached its record in attendance last season.

Agide Jacchia, one of the most talented and most popular conductors the "Pops" have ever had, is planning a fine set of programs. With a force of 80 regular Symphony players to execute this plan, and with loyal "Pop" audiences to applaud their approval there ought to be a successful season. The innovation of waitresses, so successful last year, will be continued. The menu will be enlarged and improved. On Thursday of the first week will come "Operatic Night."

The opening program follows: March militaire, Schubert; Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; Song without Words, Tschaikowsky; Fantasia, "La Boheme," Puccini; Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; "Gypsy Dance" from "Carmen," Bizet; organ solo, Finale, Sixth Symphony, Widor; Tempest Scene from "Othello," Verdi; selection, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Canzone, Van Westerhout; Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni; Hungarian Dance, No. 1, in G minor, Brahms.

Fin...

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, twenty-fourth and last program. "Fantastic Symphony," Berlioz; Concert Aria, "Non temer, amato bene," Mozart; "Istar," D'Indy; "Blow Out, You Bugles," Frank Bridge; Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnburg," Wagner. Soloist, John McCormack, tenor.

22D...

...lo, "The Tower of Babel," ...e-Taylor's setting of Newbolt's ballad, "Drake's Drum"—exem- ...these abilities on Sunday, with a ...-chorus of the Netherlands, "Prayer of Thanksgiving," added for good measure. In this piece, moreover, and the fragments from Rubinstein, the orchestra joined the singers. The sons of Ham sing of their wanderings in murmuring, monotonously rhythmed oriental song. The half-voice of the choir, the sustained yet flexible rhythm won the ear. The sons of Japhet sing an idyl of mountain and sea. The Glee Club looped the gentle phrases as though not eighty voices, but rather one, were shaping them. In the clean-cut, sturdy singing of "Drake's Drum" Dr. Davison and his choir imparted exactly the stark sinewy vigors of English balladry when it puts by its bane which is over-sentiment. The folk-chorus ascended in broadly sustained and interlocked sonorities. Yet in the church-y pieces, the finest glories of conductor and chorus stood clear. Often the intrinsic beauty of the tone was an emotion in itself. At the beginning of Lotti's "Crucifixus," indeed throughout the piece, it melted not only the listening ear, but the answering heart. The contrasts of Palestrina's "Adoramus Te" seemed more as the quickened impulses of devout spirits stirred than as the prescriptions of the composer. When the ancient painters set on canvas the ascension of Jesus, they suffused the surrounding air with radiance. So sounded the voices as phrase upon phrase ascended in Leis-ing's seemingly simple hymn. In such singing, live the very body and spirit of this ancient music of devotion. The mind follows the artfully interwoven strands, heeds the adroit contrasts; the ear receives the beauty of the singers' tone laid upon them, the heart swells to the warmth, the depth of the simple, the direct emotion. Far away across a gulf of method and spirit wider than the three centuries, seemed the Saint-Saëns of the "effective" climaxes, the smoothed slow movements, the neat Allegros of the "organ" symphony.

H. T. P.

Items and Announcements

Though present subscribers to the Symphony Concerts may, until May 1, retain their places for next season, new subscribers may now send to Symphony Hall their applications for seats. They will be filed, filled in order of receipt, and as near to the desired sittings as is possible. The prices range from $18 to $65.

Trans. Apr. 24

Friday afternoon, April 30, in Symphony Hall, the twenty-fourth and last of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for the current season, with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. McCormack for assisting singer. Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," in which orchestra and conductor were eloquent, will be repeated, and Mr. McCormack will sing pieces by Händel and the Englishman, Frank Bridge.

Saturday evening, May 1, in Symphony Hall, the twenty-fourth and last of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for the current season with Mr. Monteux, Mr. McCormack assisting, and the pieces above noted.

Saturday evening, May 1, in the Art ...Burleigh

At the Symphony Concerts of April 30 and May 1, when the tenor makes his final appearances in Boston, he will be heard in an unfamiliar piece by Mozart and in a setting of a sonnet of Rupert Brooke by the English composer, Frank Bridge.

Report runs in Paris that Monsieur Rabaud, temporary conductor of the Boston Orchestra through the season of 1918-1919, will soon succeed Monsieur Fauré as director of the Conservatory. Fauré's health is failing and so he retires. So also will Rabaud be well placed in the official hierarchy that is his natural abode. Mr. Monteux has long stood valiantly outside it.

In all probability, the Symphony Orchestra, departing from annual custom, will not visit cities of the Middle West next season for a week at midwinter. The cost of travel now makes the gain from the journey too small.

Items and Announcements

Apr 22

Mr. Monteux has set an interesting programme for the final pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. It begins, "by request," with Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," music in which conductor and band excelled themselves at a single performance on a Friday in March. The second never befell, because on the ensuing Saturday, the seceders quitted the orchestra. Hence probably, a repetition more than warrantable. Thereafter follow d'Indy's variations, "Istar," long unheard at the Symphony Concerts—a piece in which imagination and executive resource go hand in hand—and, for joyous ending to the musical year, the prelude to Wagner's opera, "The Mastersingers." Between whiles, Mr. McCormack will sing a little known concert-air of Mozart, "Non Temer. Amato Bene," and Frank Bridge's setting for tenor voice and orchestra of Rupert Brooke's grave and finely tempered sonnet:

Blow out, you bugles over the rich Dead
There's none of these so lonely and poor of old,
But dying, has made us rarer gifts than gold.
These laid the world away; poured out the red Sweet wine of youth; gave up the years to be
Of work and joy, and that unhoped serene,
That men call age; and those who would have been,
Their sons, they gave, their immortality.
Blow, bugles, blow! They brought us, for our dearth,
Holiness, lacked so long, and Love and Pain.
Lo, they have come back, as a king, to earth,
To their own land, to their subjects with a royal wage;
And nobly walk in our ways again;
And we have come into our heritage.

23D CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald Apr 24

Orchestra Gives Eloquent Performance of Schubert Master Work

RUSSIAN'S SATANIC REVEL PICTURESQUE

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d symphony concert, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, Symphony in C; Moussorgsky. "A Night on Bald Mountain", symphonic poem; Rabaud, "The Nocturnal Procession"; Svendsen. "Carnival at Paris."

Moussorgsky's Fantasie was composed in 1867 and was thus one of the few early Russian orchestral compositions of a fantastically picturesque nature. In the original form it was no doubt crude, for Moussorgsky had little technic for the larger forms of music; he despised "style" and believed that much knowledge would prevent him from attaining the realism that was his goal. That he himself was not satisfied with this symphonic poem is shown by the fact that he revised it two or three times. He died; Rimsky Korsakoff edited it and orchestrated it. The music was finally heard after Moussorgsky's death. Rimsky Korsakoff was a fastidious musician, a learned harmonist, a master of orchestrations. It is said that he sandpapered and polished "Boris Godorenoff" to the great detriment of Moussorgsky's opera; he chastened the wild spirit; he tamed the native savageness so it is said. What did he do to this musical picture of a Witches' Sabbath on Bald Mountain?

Having heard several musical descriptions of these unholy Sabbaths, where reverence was paid Satan, exultantly ruling in the form of a he-goat, where there was horrid, obscene revelry, if we may believe well-instructed ancient and modern writers on Satanism and witchcraft, we wonder why any woman, young or old, straddled a broomstick and made her way hopefully and joyfully to a lonely mountain or barren plain. If we can put faith in the musical descriptions given by Berlioz, Boito, Gounod, Satan's evening receptions were comparatively tame affairs, with dancing of a nature that would not have offended the selectmen and their wives and sisters of our little village in the Sixties; when the waltz was frwoned on as a sensual and ungodly diversion. Liszt's Mephisto waltz is, indeed, sensuous, fleshly, but Satan in this instance only plays the fiddle; he is not master of Sabbatic revels. In Moussorgsky's symphonic poem, which was performed here for the first time at a Symphony concert—Mr. Longy conducted it 16 years ago at a concert of the Orchestral Club—the allegro devoted to the worshippers of the devil is rather commonplace; its laborious wildness becomes monotonous in spite of the editor's instrumentation. Far more original and effective is the second section, in which a church bell puts the blasphemous revelers to flight.

The performance of Schubert's great symphony was a most eloquent one, surpassing any performance that we remember, here or abroad. It was remarkable by reason of tempi happily chosen; of a poetic treatment of episodes that did not check the musical flow; of a masterly handling of dynamic gradations—witness the marvellously managed sinking from fortissimo to pianissimo in the finale; of brilliant solo work; of the constantly pervading romantic spirit with which the music is charged. One of the many memorable features of this performance was the reading of the opening flourish of the finale; music that would have suited the great feast at which Belshazzar drank wine before a thousand of his lords.

It was a pleasure to hear Rabaud's beautiful music again, beautifully played; not only because this music reminded one of the composer-conductor, his dignified, high-bred, and gentle nature, and the many imaginative interpretations during the last season; the music itself has character and charm.

Svendsen's "Carnival at Paris" had not been heard at a symphony concert for many years. As we remembered, it was an earnest, preconcertd effort to be jolly with slim results. Yesterday it was, for the most part, fresh and joyous, while the idyllic episode, developed at length, had a northern rather than a Parisian tenderness, and suggested abiding love rather than an accideantal amorous encounter.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week, the last of the season, will be as follows: Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony (by request); Mozart, Scene and Rondo, "Non temer"; d'Indy "Istar," variations; Frank Bridge, Sonnet for voice and orchestra, "Blow Out You Bugles"; Wagner, overture to "The Mastersingers," John McCormack will be the singer.

BOSTON GLOBE—SA

MONTEUX SHINES IN SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Shubert's Long Work Given Spirited Production

Mussorgsky, Svendsen and Rabaud Contribute to the List

Whatever his general merits and defects may be, there is plainly one point on which Mr Monteux surpasses most of his predecessors, the ability to choose interesting programs. At yesterday's Symphony concert there was no soloist and no new composition. The chief item was Schubert's C major Symphony, one of the masterpieces which a wise tradition requires to be played every other season.

Instead of getting other and perhaps less welcome routine numbers out of the way at the same concert, as Dr Muck would probably have done, Mr Monteux chose two unfamiliar numbers by Mussorgsky and Svendsen, and repeated from last season what was then a well-liked novelty, Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne."

The applause showed that the audience got as much pleasure from the concert as they would from one with special features in the shape of a soloist of the first rank or an outstanding novelty.

The length of Schubert's C major Symphony is proverbial. Some have found it heavenly, and others have hinted that a few cuts would do no harm. Mr Monteux did not take all the repeats, and he hurried the Andante into a sort of "Marche Militaire." The result was an exceptionally brief and spirited performance which stressed the gaiety of the music at the expense of its quiet lyric melancholy. Yet the peculiar charm of Schubert depends on a blending of both qualities.

Mussorgsky's orchestral fantasy, "A Night on Bald Mountain," was first written in 1867 and afterwards revised by the composer and by his friend Rimsky-Korsakoff. It had never been played till yesterday at the Symphony concerts. The music deals with a Russian Witches' Sabbath, which contrasts with the one in the last movement of Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony" to be heard next week. The themes are not strong enough intrinsically to avoid bombastic effects when they are given out fortissimo by full orchestra.

The work is, as a whole, rather tentative, but interesting historically as a specimen of the early work of the modern Russian school of composers. The performance had all the requisite dash and fire.

Svendsen's "Carnival" is one of those agreeable minor works easily listened to and as easily forgotten, which show great talent and a slender creative imagination. Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" escapes falling in the same category chiefly because every bar of it is delicately and finely wrought.

Perfect workmanship and the infinite capacity for taking pains are not quite genious, but when guided by a taste as exquisite as Mr Rabaud's they can produce works sure to give pleasure to the cultivated musician. Mr Monteux spared no pains to make the performance suit ...music.

Herald Apr 24

23RD SYMPHONY

Orchestra Plays "A Night on Bald Mountain," Poem

By J. V. CLARK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concerts yesterday played for the first time in Boston a symphonic poem, "A Night on Bald Mountain," by Moussorgsky, edited by Rimsky-Korsakoff. The piece is one of the older Moussorgsky works. Left in an orchestrally crude state by the composer, it was polished and repolished by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Even now that it has been treated by that master of orchestration, it is crude in spots. It is not always the brilliant, lurid picture of Satanic revels that the composer intended. It is not one of his master works.

The orchestra gave a strikingly beautiful performance of the Schubert Symphony in C minor, poetic, exquisite in its dynamic gradations. The work, itself one of the masterpieces that holds an indisputable place, seems long and a bit tedious to modern ears, though it may be sacrilege to say so. Its cool passions, its dignity and gentleness delighted the orthodox and the elderly in the audience. Every dog has his day; the greybeards had theirs with the playing of the symphony.

"The Nocturnal Procession," by Henri Rabaud, was played again and gratefully heard. Mr. Rabaud is remembered as a well-trained, thorough musician, a kindly, not-too-red-blooded gentleman, who carried the orchestra over a hard period. Eminently respected, his music is heard for its own sake as well as a matter of courtesy to its composer.

The concerts the coming week will be the finals of the season. Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony will be repeated. Its performances were interrupted at the time the seceders left the orchestra. John McCormack will sing an old Mozart aria and a setting by Frank Bridge of Rupert Brooke's sonnet, "Blow Out, You Bugles." D'Indy's "Istar" will complete the program.

Review of Week's Musical Events in Boston

At last Sunday's pension fund concert the Symphony Orchestra shared the honors with the Harvard Glee Club. The concert was, indeed, unusual in this respect. So far as orchestral music alone is concerned, many previous pension fund concerts were far more noteworthy. Dr. Muck's Wagnerian programs set a standard which have not since been approached. There are fanatical folk who do not relish such statements, but the statements are indisputably true, nevertheless.

On this occasion the glee club from Dr. Lowell's well-known college distinguished itself in a cappella music—three selections from the liturgy of the Catholic Church, Palestrina's "Adoramus Te," Lotti's "Crucifixus," and Leishing's "O Filii et Filiae." In these hymns the club sang with admirable fervor and artistic finish. Such accomplishments reflect the high musical standard set by the director of the club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison. But most welcome of all, from the popular viewpoint, was the clubs beautiful singing of the famous Netherland folk-song, "Prayer of Thanksgiving," which was accompanied by organ and orchestra, and two choruses from the Rubinstein oratorio, "The Tower of Babel," with Mr. Monteux conducting. As an encore, the Harvard choristers sang the spirited "Drake's Drum," by Coleride-Taylor.

These choral numbers, together with the minuet from Gluck's "Orpheus" and the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes," two fascinating orchestral pieces, gave brilliancy to the concert. The orchestra also played the Saint-Saens Symphony in C minor, with Albert Snow at the organ and Alfred De Voto at the piano.

Transcript Apr 26

SYMPHONY PLAYERS GIVE FINE PROGRAM

The first number on the Symphony program, yesterday afternoon, was a Schubert symphony, in C major. The opening movement of this symphony is very rhythmic and melodic. In the second part there is a march-like theme. The third movement, blending happiness and sadness, is followed by a swift and intense finale. Could one find a better instrument to portray the greatness of Schubert as a composer and master of melody than the Boston Symphony orchestra?

The second number on the program was an orchestral fantasy by Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain." The composer's description published with the score of his work was as follows: "Subterranean din of supernatural voices. Appearance of spirits of darkness, followed by that of the Black God Tchernbog. Black mass. Witches' Sabbath. At the height of the Sabbath, there sounds far off the bell of the little church in a village, which scatters the spirits of Darkness. Daybreak." The portrayal of these fearsome creatures, their revelry and the contrasting peace and quinet after their heardlong retreat at daybreak was so vividly rendered by the orchestra one cannot help feeling that Mr. Monteux has a great imagination.

It was a pleasuer to hear again Henri Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne." It was most quieting after the orgies of the selection preceeding it.

The final number was a composition of Johan Svendsen, "The Carnival at Paris." Despite the rainy weather, a large audience attended. Next week John McCormack is to be soloist with the orchestra.

Trans Apr 26

McCORMACK AT LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT

The principal feature of the season's last pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening (April 30 and May 1), will be Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony. This mighty and difficult work for an especially large orchestra was played on Friday, March 5. Pierre Monteux is repeating it by general request. John McCormack will also make his last appearance in Boston this season as soloist of these concerts. Vincent D'Indy's "Istar" variations, and Wagner's overture to "Dei Meistersinger" will also be included in this program.

Globe Apr 26

Events and Comments

John McCormack's last appearance in Boston for two years will be as soloist at this week's Symphony concerts. With his usual intelligent zeal for the performance of good unfamiliar music, he has chosen a little known aria by Mozart and a setting of one of the sonnets of Rupert Brooke, the young English poet whose death in the war did much to stimulate public interest in his work, by Frank Bridge, regarded in England as an exceptionally promising composer. Mr Monteux has selected for the final number of the season the same piece that Dr Muck several times rhose for the end of the last program, the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," an excellent choice.

POPS OPEN NEXT WEEK

The opening night of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall is scheduled for a week from tomorrow, Monday, May 3. This peculiarly Bostonian institution, which provides diverting music and excellent orchestral performances, to an accompaniment of light refreshments, nightly except Sundays, from 8 to 11 through the spring and early summer, reached its record in attendance last season. There is no reason why that record should not be broken. Agide Jacchia, one of the best conductors the Pops have ever had, is planning a set of programmes of exceptional interest, with a force of 80 regular Symphony players to execute his ideas. The innovation of waitresses, so successful last year, will be continued. The menu will be enlarged and improved. On Thursday of the first week will come "Operatic Night." The opening programme follows:

"Marche Militaire" ..... Schubert
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" ..... Nicolai
"Song Without Words" ..... Nicolai
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ..... Tschaikowsky
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Puccini
Gypsy Dance," from "Carmen" ..... Wagner
Organ solo, finale, "Sixth Symphony" ..... Bizet
Mr. Albert W. Snow.
Tempest scene from "Othello" ..... Widor
Selection, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Verdi
"Canzone" ..... Saint-Saens
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz" ..... Van Westerhout
"Hungarian Dance," No. 1 in G minor ..... Mascagni
..... Brahms

McCORMACK AT SYMPHONY

The season's last pair of Boston Symphony concerts (the coming Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 30-May 1) will witness a second performance by Mr. Monteux of Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony. This mighty and difficult work for an especially large orchestra was played on Friday, March 5, and Pierre Monteux will repeat it in response to numerous requests by the Friday as well as the Saturday patrons. In this music the composer immortalizes his love for Henrietta Smithson in the following romantic episodes: "Dreams, Passions"; "A Ball"; "Scene in the Meadows"; "March to the Scaffoid"; "Witches' Sabbath."

The soloist will be John McCormack, also making his last Boston appearance of the season on this occasion. He will sing Mozart's aria "Non temer, amato bene," with violin obligato, and a musical setting by the noted English composer, Frank Bridge, of Rupert Brooke's sonnet, "Blow Out You Bugles." Also on the same notable programme stand Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" variations and Wagner's overture to "Die Meistersinger."

Rush for Pops' Tables to Open Tomorrow

THE rush for tables will start tomorrow for the opening night of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, Monday, May 3. This peculiarly Bostonian institution, which provides the diverting orchestral music, to an accompaniment of light refreshments, nightly except Sundays from 8 to 11 through the Spring and early Summer, reached its record in attendance last season. Agide Jacchia, the popular conductor, is planning a set of attractive programs with eighty Symphony players to execute this plan. The menu will be enlarged this season. On Thursday of the first week will come "Operatic Night."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The season's last pair of Symphony concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will offer Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony in C minor, which Pierre Monteux will repeat in response to numerous requests. The soloist will be John McCormack, who will sing Mozart's aria, "Non temer, amato bene," and a musical setting by Frank Bridge of Rupert Brooke's sonnet, "Blow Out, You Bugles." Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" Variations and Wagner's "Mastersingers" overture are also on the program.

"Pops" Open Next Week

The "Pop" concerts begin in Symphony Hall Monday night, May 3. This peculiarly Bostonian institution, which provides the most diverting music in the finest orchestral performance, to an accompaniment of light refreshments, nightly except Sundays, from 8 to 11, through the Spring and early Summer, reached its record in attendance last season.

Agide Jacchia, one of the most talented and most popular conductors the "Pops" have ever had, is planning a fine set of programs. With a force of 80 regular Symphony players to execute this plan, and with loyal "Pop" audiences to applaud their approval there ought to be a successful season. The innovation of waitresses, so successful last year, will be continued. The menu will be enlarged and improved. On Thursday of the first week will come "Operatic Night."

The opening program follows: March militaire, Schubert; Overture to "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; Song without Words, Tschaikowsky; Fantasia, "La Boheme," Puccini; Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; "Gypsy Dance" from "Carmen," Bizet; organ solo, Finale, Sixth Symphony, Widor; Tempest Scene from "Othello," Verdi; selection, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Canzone, Van Westerhout; Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni; Hungarian Dance, No. 1, in G minor, Brahms.

Flint, bass.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, twenty-fourth and last program. "Fantastic Symphony," Berlioz; Concert Aria, "Non temer, amato bene," Mozart; "Istar," D'Indy; "Blow Out, You Bugles," Frank Bridge; Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnburg," Wagner. Soloist, John McCormack, tenor.

SYMPHONY CONCERT
Saturday

R. MONTEUX FINDS NEW VOICE FOR SCHUBERT

Performance of the Symphony in C Major, Departing from "the Tradition," Shunning Sentimentality, Rekindling and Exalting the Music—The Disappointing Musorgsky of a Tone-Picture—Rabaud and Svendsen, Carnival and Contemplation, Set in Contrast

NOT long ago Monsieur Camille Chevillard, the eminent Parisian conductor, paid a professional visit to the German cities on the west bank of the Rhine, now occupied by French soldiery. At one of them, Mainz, he led a German orchestra through various French and German pieces. An English listener, who happened to be in the audience, recorded in a letter to a friend in America the tendency of the German band to linger over songful measures, to sentimentalize them; whereas the French director was disposed to brisker pace and more energetic progress. In Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, thought of this contrast returned before Mr. Monteux and his orchestra had proceeded far into Schubert's symphony in C major. Never before had most of the audience received the music from a French conductor; while few could have heard it anywhere or from any hand in such quick movement. Mr. Gericke, in his days at Symphony Hall, liked to say that Schubert spoke for himself; that with this symphony all the conductor needed to do was "to let it run." Yet neither he nor his German successors, if they shared that belief, quite fulfilled it. In spite of their minds, their hearts and also their hands drew out long Schubert's instrumental melodies. With reason they loved them—for it is the way of his music to inspire an almost personal affection—and they were prone to dwell upon their love. They were disposed also and in like spirit, to soften the composer's vigors in contrasting measures and to set forth the whole symphony in "sweetness and light," as so much lyric song with the orchestra as singer. So treated, the music almost always seemed lengthy, repetitious, overwritten. There was not only beauty, but a surfeit of beauty.

A year and more ago, when Mr. Rabaud undertook the Unfinished Symphony, he gave hint of a French way with Schubert's music; while yesterday, with the symphony in C, Mr. Monteux supplemented suggestion with revelation. Throughout, and particularly in the first movement, he took the music at a swifter pace than is the German way. He indeed disclosed it as instrumental song, stirring the ear, stimulating fancy, warming emotions; but at every turn he shunned the sentimentality that lingers and sugars. More: when Schubert spoke boldly, largely, as he does, for example, in the introductory Andante and in the Finale, the conductor sustained his vigors, communicated his energies. Then the music strode, as in tonal mass, wide-spaced, plastic, buoyant. In such voice the symphony, for once and in spite of Schubert's repetitions, escaped tedious lengths, sustained animation, gained contrasts, tingled upon the ear as well as caressed it. Modulations seemed more impulsive; decorative figures ran more brightly; the music had sinew as well as grace; suggestion replaced over-emphasis; spacious simplicities relieved linked sweetness. On the other hand, in this speed, vigor and breadth of contour, not a few of Schubert's marvellous euphonies, tremulous modulations, flecks of ornament, merely swept past—barely heeded eddies upon the flood of tone. Even so, it was new and penetrating sensation to hear this symphony in C unsentimentalized, led, as it were, out of the hothouse of reverent and affectionate tradition, into the open air of direct yet romantic speech.

So played and heard, moreover, the symphony gained in appeal to the mind and the imagination. No longer did it address only the innocently sensuous ear. The instrumental melody of Schubert is often like to the opening of a window in a bright morning upon a fair prospect. Fresh is the air, warm and quivering the sunshine. Akin to rapture is the first deep sensation. But Schubert lingers over the melody; while the listener tarries, as it were, at the opened casement. Before long, the prospect becomes familiar, soon a little monotonous. Look, look and look again Schubert seems to be saying with his tremulous modulations and gliding figures; whereas Beethoven, for example, more variously developing his instrumental song, is ever finding new vistas, arraying new lights and shadows. Schubert may cloy; Beethoven never satiates. The quick pace, the kindling energies, the bold contrasts of Mr. Monteux with this symphony in C relaxed these limitations. Upon a terrace sweeping the tonal landscape, rather than from window to window in more separate contemplation, walked the listener. Besides, in the introductory Andante, in the Finale, in measure through the slow movement, it was possible to feel as in new sensation the frequent spaciousness, the recurring exaltation of Schubert's speech in tones. After all, he was more than writer of relatively simple song, in endless fertility, for orchestra as for voice. In the symphony in C, in the Unfinished Symphony he also achieved the noble period, the tongue of power. Achieving them, moreover, he strode onward; while it is over his purest and most naïve instrumental song that he lingers until satiety numbs the hearer. One and another, of late, has argued for a sympathetic revision of this symphony of the "heavenly lengths," excising repetitions, daring discreet compressions. When Mr. Monteux wings the music as he did yesterday, the listener is not so sure of such necessity.

Thus did Schubert prevail through the length and breadth of the concert, though it was no distinguished miscellany that followed his symphony. Expectation was [illegible] over Musorgsky's tone-picture of a [illegible] Night on Bald Moun-

there are at least three Musorgskys. First the Musorgsky of the songs and a few piano-pieces (like "Pictures at an Exhibition")—composer of rare delineative imagination playing through the barest of expressive means. Second, the Musorgsky of the theatre—of the music-dramas of "Boris Godunov" and in less degree, "Khovanchitchina"—who could summon to the stage beyond any other composer, the voice and the spirit of the folk; who, again, could strip tones until they are like a naked nerve of speech or emotion. Third, the Musorgsky of this tone-picture and of a few other symphonic pieces, wherein he is in no respect individual or significant composer. Toward the end of "A Night on Bald Mountain," a distant church-bell interrupts the satanic revels; they subside; the dawn breaks serene upon a smiling earth, upon the untroubled spirits of a sleeping, pious folk. And the music that is to summon this illusion is veritable commonplace—Mid-Victorian or worse. An English "successor to Mendelssohn" would have made it more graphic. As amorphous, cloudy and relatively feeble is the din of the devilish rout. Suspensive pauses, sharp juxtapositions, insistent or broken rhythms, wild reels, tonal mutterings and shriekings are Musorgsky's means. Valiantly he strives with them; unmoved the hearer watches the struggle. Never once does the listener say to himself "I am there," and only rarely "This is Musorgsky." "Allegro Feroce" he labels the piece. "The Black Mass"—the impious sacrifice of the buck goat—is, he says, celebrated. Memory recalls Berlioz's infernal trombones designed by the composer "to shout obscenities"—and the one stage direction is as foolish and futile as the other. No: Musorgsky, even revised—once more—by the indispensable Rimsky-Korsakov was not a composer of symphonic music.

Two more tone-pictures—Rabaud's "Midnight Procession" and Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris"—at least set each other in contrast. So far as they go, the Frenchman's exact and economical measures summon vision of the still, solitary, foreboding forest; of the train of old men, boys and virgins that cross it singing a holy chant, bathed in semi-celestial glow; of the bitter, torturing emotion in the soul of the watching Faust. Precisely the composer has shaped his design, assembled and adjusted his means; even the proper page of Wagner to recall and utilize never once escapes him. A deliberate music accomplishes as deliberate an end. Better far than these calculations, the Svendsen that "cuts loose." His rhythms snap; his phrases chortle; his tumult is gay; his dissonances squeak and scream; and how warm-hearted and warm-voiced is his amorous interlude upon the songful strings and horns. (For symphonic carnivals are as obliging as stage-carnivals when lovers crave solitude.) Hardly a brilliant or a highly fanciful music; yet colorful, brightly rhythmed, vivid and animated withal. Handiwork, if the hearer chooses, yet not altogether the handiwork of a thoughtful, an eminently respectable gentleman making effective music. The bourgeoisie may have their Rabaud and welcome. They could not and did not quite kill Svendsen's native wildness.

H. T. PARKER

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

The Symphony Orchestra with Mr. McCormack Assisting—Novel Numbers from the Musical Association — The Harvard Glee Club at the Art Museum—Mr. Ruffo and Miss Nielsen in Prospect

THE final Symphony Concerts for the current season befall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Unusually an "assisting artist" will grace them—Mr. McCormack, the tenor, singing for the last times in Boston before he departs to Australia and to Europe. He will be heard first in the eighteenth-century music in which he excels—a little known air of Mozart, "Non temer, Amato bene," written for the concert-hall. His second number is Frank Bridge's setting of Rupert Brooke's sonnet, "Blow out, you Bugles," verse that gravely and simply exalts the dead in the recent war. Mr. McCormack is a diligent explorer of new music. In the sonnet two Englishmen of the younger generation have yielded him a piece by which he sets store.

The orchestral part of the programme traverses Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony; d'Indy's Variations, "Istar"; and Wagner's Prelude to his opera, "The Mastersingers." By general desire Mr. Monteux will repeat the symphony of which he and the orchestra made much on a Friday afternoon in March. On the following evening came the secession from the band; the symphony was put by; so that thus far but half the public of the concerts has heard it. "Istar," like d'Indy's second symphony, has been too long overlooked and Mr. Monteux does well to restore it to the active repertory. If it abounds in technical resource as variations should do, it is warm also with imagination. For in it the composer follows the Phœnician legend wherein the goddess descends into the underworld and strips off veil after veil that she may make her way to her lover. For each veil a variation until at last she—and the theme—emerge in naked beauty. As for the prelude to "The Mastersingers," it is almost traditional piece for joyous ending to the Symphony Concerts.

SATURDAY, MAY — THE BOSTON HERALD, S — BOSTON POST, SATU

"FANTASTIC" AGAIN AT THE SYMPHONY

Berlioz' Work Rendered With Distinction

The chief item on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert was Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," played for the second time this season by request of many subscribers. It was at the close of the former performance that the much dicussed Fradkin incident took place. Owing to the ensuing strike, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony had to be substituted at the Saturday concert. Yesterday the renewed orchestra gave an interpretation as finished and brilliant as that last March.

Berlioz certainly had the power of inventing distinctively beautiful themes, and his skill at orchestration is proverbial. His imagination is of the sort which subordinates formal proportioned perfection of structure to vivid and dramatic effects. All his works live chiefly by virtue of the striking musical episodes they contain. They lack the power, and nobility Beethoven gained by sustained and unified structural development. They are all dramatic lyrics which lack epic grandeur.

D'Indy, who is commonly regarded as cerebral rather than emotional, succeeds in the "Istar" variations in suggesting the sensuous, almost sensual, emotional quality of the legend by means of music which like all his later works is, nevertheless, almost too painstakingly well constructed.

Wagner in the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" is as erudite as D'Indy, though he does not do any stunts comparable to the Frenchman's clever but rather perplexing trick of giving his variations first and his theme afterward. But the emotional force back of Wagner's music is so tremendous that most listeners never notice its intricate construction.

John McCormack showed his wonted artistry and taste in his Mozart recitative and aria. No tenor now before the public can excel him in such music. His other number, a setting of one of Rupert Brooke's sonnets on the war, by Frank Bridge, an English composer little known in America, was effective in a rather banal way. The music suited the words, which are platitudinously optimistic in the face of a tragedy still too near for any artist to approach objectively. It was well sung and capably played.

The end of the season sees the orchestra back in its old form. The return of Mr Neumann to the tympani, is an especial cause for congratulation. He is in a class by himself as far as American orchestras are concerned and could not be adequately replaced. The list of members of the orchestra, printed in the programs for the first time since the strike, showed other welcome accessions and few vacancies still to be filled.

The concert will be repeated as usual tonight at 8. The 40th season begins Oct 8 and 9, with Mr Monteux as conductor.

LONGSHORE

Herald May 2

POPS OPEN NEXT WEEK

The rush for tables will start tomorrow for the opening night of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall a week from tomorrow, Monday, May 3. This peculiarly Bostonian institution, which provides diverting music in the finest orchestral performance, to an accompaniment of light refreshments, nightly except Sundays from 8 to 11, through the spring and early summer, reached its record in attendance last season. There is no reason why that record should not be broken. Agide Jacchia, who is certainly the most talented, inspiring, enthusiastic and all-around popular conductor the Pops have had, is planning a brilliant set of programs. With a splendid force of 80 regular Symphony players to execute this plan, and with loyal Pop audiences to applaud, unmitigated pleasure should reign at Symphony Hall. The innovation of waitresses, so successful last year, will be continued. The menu will be enlarged and improved. On Thursday of the first week will come "Operatic night." The opening program is as follows:

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor" Nicolai
Song without Words.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
"Gypsy Dance" from "Carmen".....Bizet
Organ solo, Finale, Sixth Symphony.....Widor
Albert W. Snow
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
Canzone.....Van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
Hungarian Dance, No. 1, in G minor.....Brahms

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK

SUNDAY—[illegible] Times.

McCORMACK-SYMPHONY

The season's last pair of Boston Symphony concerts, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be made memorable by the performance of Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony in C minor. This mighty and difficult work for an especially large orchestra was played on Friday, March 5. Mr. Monteux will repeat it in response to numerous requests by the Friday as well as the Saturday patrons. In this music the composer immortalizes his love for Henrietta Smithson in the following romantic episodes: "Dreams, Passions"; "A Ball"; "Scene in the Meadows";

24TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

D'Indy's "Istar" Variations Heard Again After Interval of Eight Years

JOHN M'CORMACK ON THE PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The 24th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony (by request); Mozart, scene with Rondo, "Von Temer" (John McCormack); d'Indy, "Istar" variations; Frank Bridge, sonnet for voice and orchestra, "Blow out, you Bugles" (Mr. McCormack); Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers."

It was a pleasure to hear d'Indy's "Istar" variations again after an interval of eight years. They are to be ranked with his symphony on a mountain air and his symphony in B flat major. Taking an oriental subject, he did not succumb to orientalism either in the invention of thematic material or in harmonic or orchestral treatment. Nor is the originality of the structure, the announcement of the theme at the very end, typifying the stripping of Istar's last veil and the revelation of her splendid nudity, the chief feature of the workmanship. Each variation, as it marks the progress of Istar's descent to the immutable land, and the stripping in turn of tiara, pendans, precious stones, etc., in itself and as it comes nearer to the theme, is a masterpiece in musical construction and in color. The performance was a brilliant one, as was that of Berlioz's remarkable symphony, which played here on March 5 was requested for the concert of yesterday. Again the scene in the fields, with the famous pastoral music and the still more famous measures for kettle-drums, the wild nightmare, March to the Scaffold, and the Witches Sabbath were enthusiastically applauded.

Mr. McCormack is a master of the Mozartian style. In this respect he is among tenors what Mme. Sembrich in her prime was among sopranos. Yesterday he chose a Scene and Rondo written by Mozart for a private performance of his "Idomeneo" in Vienna. Mr. McCormack's delivery of the Recitative was dramatically varied and effective. The Rondo he sang skilfully, but the voice itself did not always have body or pleasing quality. His other selection was a setting to music by Frank Bridge to a sonnet of Rupert Brooke. This Bridge, an Englishman, but not to be confounded with the Bridge that turned out oratorios—is there not a "Jonah" among them, a "Jonah" but without music for the whale?—made the mistake of attempting to give musical significance to nearly every word of the sonnet. As a result there is a far nobler spirit in Brooke's poem than in Bridge's music. The attempt was laborious. In spite of Mr. McCormack's earnest and lofty interpretation, he could not raise this music to the poet's or his own noble conception.

The concert will be repeated tonight, when the 39th season of the orchestra will end.

In the weeks preceding the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, Mr. Monteux formed practically a new orchestra. He brought it to so high a state of perfection that Mr. Rabaud found it a euphonious and plastic instrument to play upon.

In the course of this season, when, suddenly, another conductor might have lost heart, he again formed an orchestra and in a few weeks worked a miracle. The concerts of the last month have been worthy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the height of its reputation. Nor has Mr. Monteux shone only as a drill-master; throughout the season he has proved himself an interpreter of the very first rank. A glance at the review of the season, which will be published in the Herald tomorrow, will show the catholicity of his taste. As an interpreter, no school, no period, is foreign to him: Beethoven and Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Griffes, Handel and Berlioz—he understands then, he shares his understanding and appreciation with the audience. He has been dramatic, but not sensational; reverential, but not dull; poetic, but not sentimental. And throughout the season, he has conducted himself as a modest, sincere gentleman; serious in his purpose, but not taking himself too seriously, for he has the saving grace of humor. Once asked if he was disturbed or upset by a wholly unforeseen and annoying occurrence, he smiled and said that he had been conductor of the Russian Ballet for several years.

Boston should be today as proud of its orchestra as at any time during its glorious past. It should also be proud of this orchestra's conductor. With him the future of the orchestra will be glorious.

NAMED IN [illegible]

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE RESPONDS

Tribute to Monteux and Players. McCormack Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. John McCormack was soloist. The orchestra, almost completed today in its membership, and performing with the superb virtuosity and sonority of its best days, played Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony, which was on a former programme this season, and yesterday repeated by request, d'Indy's "Istar" variations, and Wagner's overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Mr. McCormack sang the recitative, "Non piu! tutto ascoltae" and the aria, "Non temer, amato bene," of Mozart, and Frank Bridge's sonnet for voice and orchestra, "Blow Out, You Bugles." Throughout the concert the audience was very enthusiastic. It greeted Mr. Monteux long and loudly and the concert was a crescendo of applause, until at the last conductor and orchestra stood, acknowledging the tribute.

TO MONTEUX AND BRENNAN

This concert was indeed a tribute to Mr. Monteux's ability in whipping an orchestra recently reorganized in many positions into shape and making it capable, in a very few days, of virtuoso performances.

It was also testimony to the sagacity and energy of Mr. William H. Brennan, without whose judgment and masterly control of recent untoward conditions Mr. Monteux would not have had such a membership to work with.

Bridge's Song Poor Music

Mr. McCormack never interpreted a dramatic recitative more artistically than he treated Mozart's opening lines. The first two-thirds of the piece went admirably; but, probably for the reason that Mr. McCormack has been singing so much of late years, his voice was not in the best shape when he came to the rapid passages of the concluding rondo. It would be a pity if such a singer, such an artist, to be prodigal of his voice that such conditions should recur.

In the song of Frank Bridge, a song very taxing because of its range and its tonal demands, Mr. McCormack was as dramatic as he could have been under the circumstances. But from repetition of this composition may [illegible] be delivered! It is false music from the first bar to the last, strained for effects, with no well-established lines of any kind. The composer underscoring each word and syllable his text, becomes episodic and wanders now hither, and when he attempts to the terse and manly he is merely affected and dull. Mr. McCormack and Mr. Monteux did much for Mr. Bridge but Mr. Bridge did very little for Mr. Monteux and Mr. McCormack.

D'Indy's Variations

Berlioz's symphony was given a performance felt by many to be superior to the brilliant performance of the work given earlier in the season. For others the feature of the concert was the performance of d'Indy's variations. Here is a white heat of musical inspiration, imagination and intellectuality, might be called by some intellectual emotion, for there are those who recognize only what is called emotion and is but an aspect of sensuality.

There is transparent, blazing, whi heat of beauty in this noble mus which can be understood only by listening to the music itself. Its architectu towers to the skies, yet there is prese also the note of that which is ancie Oriental and languorous. Of such pag are those of the introduction itself, a the motive of three notes played first by the horn, a motive which, curring again and again as a salie feature of the theme of Istar, is as cry of the goddess, or the woman, her lover, whom she goes to the dep of hell to reclaim.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. MONTEUX FINDS NEW VOICE FOR SCHUBERT

A Performance of the Symphony in C Major, Departing from "the Tradition," Shunning Sentimentality, Rekindling and Exalting the Music—The Disappointing Musorgsky of a Tone-Picture—Rabaud and Svendsen, Carnival and Contemplation, Set in Contrast

Not long ago Monsieur Camille Chevillard, the eminent Parisian conductor, paid a professional visit to the German cities on the west bank of the Rhine, now occupied by French soldiery. At one of them, Mainz, he led a German orchestra through various French and German pieces. An English listener, who happened to be in the audience, recorded in a letter to a friend in America the tendency of the German band to linger over songful measures, to sentimentalize them: whereas the French director was disposed to brisker pace and more energetic progress. In Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, thought of this contrast returned before Mr. Monteux and his orchestra had proceeded far into Schubert's symphony in C major. Never before had most of the audience received the music from a French conductor; while few could have heard it anywhere or from any hand in such quick movement. Mr. Gericke, in his days at Symphony Hall, liked to say that Schubert spoke for himself; that with this symphony all the conductor needed to do was "to let it run." Yet neither he nor his German successors, if they shared that belief, quite fulfilled it. In spite of their minds, their hearts and also their hands drew out long Schubert's instrumental melodies. With reason they loved them—for it is the way of his music to inspire an almost personal affection—and they were prone to dwell upon their love. They were disposed also and in like spirit, to soften the composer's vigors in contrasting measures and to set forth the whole symphony in "sweetness and light," as so much lyric song with the orchestra as singer. So treated, the music almost always seemed lengthy, repetitious, overwritten. There was not only beauty, but a surfeit of beauty.

A year and more ago, when Mr. Rabaud undertook the Unfinished Symphony, he gave hint of a French way with Schubert's music; while yesterday, with the symphony in C, Mr. Monteux supplemented suggestion with revelation. Throughout, and particularly in the first movement, he took the music at a swifter pace than is the German way. He indeed disclosed it as instrumental song, stirring the ear, stimulating fancy, warming emotions; but at every turn he shunned the sentimentality that lingers and sugars. More: when Schubert spoke boldly, largely, as he does, for example, in the introductory Andante and in the Finale, the conductor sustained his vigors, communicated his energies. Then the music strode, as in tonal masswide-spaced, plastic, buoyant. In such voice the symphony, for once and in spite of Schubert's repetitions, escaped tedious lengths, sustained animation, gained contrasts, tingled upon the ear as well as caressed it. Modulations seemed more impulsive; decorative figures ran more brightly; the music had sinew as well as grace; suggestion replaced over-emphasis; spacious simplicities relieved linked sweetness. On the other hand, in this speed, vigor and breadth of contour, not a few of Schubert's marvellous euphonies, tremulous modulations, flecks of ornament, merely swept past—barely heeded eddies upon the flood of tone. Even so, it was new and penetrating sensation to hear this symphony in C unsentimentalized, led, as it were, out of the hothouse of reverent and affectionate tradition, into the open air of direct yet romantic speech.

So played and heard, moreover, the symphony gained in appeal to the mind and the imagination. No longer did it address only the innocently sensuous ear. The instrumental melody of Schubert is often like to the opening of a window in a bright morning upon a fair prospect. Fresh is the air, warm and quivering the sunshine. Akin to rapture is the first deep sensation. But Schubert lingers over the melody; while the listener tarries, as it were, at the opened casement. Before long, the prospect becomes familiar, soon a little monotonous. Look, look and look again Schubert seems to be saying with his tremulous modulations and gliding figures; whereas Beethoven, for example, more variously developing his instrumental song, is ever finding new vistas, arraying new lights and shadows. Schubert may cloy; Beethoven never satiates. The quick pace, the kindling energies, the bold contrasts of Mr. Monteux with this symphony in C relaxed these limitations. Upon a terrace sweeping the tonal landscape, rather than from window to window in more separate contemplation, walked the listener. Besides, in the introductory Andante, in the Finale, in measure through the slow movement, it was possible to feel as in new sensation the frequent spaciousness, the recurring exultation of Schubert's speech in tones. After all, he was more than writer of relatively simple song, in endless fertility, for orchestra as for voice. In the symphony in C, in the Unfinished Symphony he also achieved the noble period, the tongue of power. Achieving them, moreover, he strode onward; while it is over his purest and most naive instrumental song that he lingers until satiety numbs the hearer. One and another, of late, has argued for a sympathetic revision of this symphony of the "heavenly lengths," exciting repetitions, daring discreet compressions. When Mr. Monteux wings the music as he did yesterday, the listener is not so sure of such necessity.

Thus did Schubert prevail through the length and breadth of the concert, though it was no distinguished miscellany that followed his symphony. Expectation was keen over Musorgsky's tone-picture of a [illegible]—"A Night on Bald Moun-

there are at least three Musorgskys. First the Musorgsky of the songs and a few piano-pieces (like "Pictures at an Exhibition")—composer of rare delineative imagination playing through the barest of expressive means. Second, the Musorgsky of the theatre—of the music-dramas of "Boris Godunov" and in less degree, "Khovanchitchina"—who could summon to the stage beyond any other composer, the voice and the spirit of the folk; who, again, could strip tones until they are like a naked nerve of speech or emotion. Third, the Musorgsky of this tone-picture and of a few other symphonic pieces, wherein he is in no respect individual or significant composer. Toward the end of "A Night on Bald Mountain," a distant church-bell interrupts the satanic revels; they subside; the dawn breaks serene upon a smiling earth, upon the untroubled spirits of a sleeping, pious folk. And the music that is to summon this illusion is veritable commonplace—Mid-Victorian or worse. An English "successor to Mendelssohn" would have made it more graphic. As amorphous, cloudy and relatively feeble is the din of the devilish rout. Suspensive pauses, sharp juxtapositions, insistant or broken rhythms, wild reels, tonal mutterings and shriekings are Musorgsky's means. Valiantly he strives with them; unmoved the hearer watches the struggle. Never once does the listener say to himself "I am there," and only rarely "This is Musorgsky." "Allegro Feroce" he labels the piece, "The Black Mass"—the impious sacrifice of the buck goat—is, he says, celebrated. Memory recalls Berlioz's infernal trombones designed by the composer "to shout obscenities"—and the one stage direction is as foolish and futile as the other. No: Musorgsky, even revised—once more—by the indispensable Rimsky-Korsakov was not a composer of symphonic music.

Two more tone-pictures—Rabaud's "Midnight Procession" and Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris"—at least set each other in contrast. So far as they go, the Frenchman's exact and economical measures summon vision of the still, solitary, foreboding forest; of the train of old men, boys and virgins that cross it singing a holy chant, bathed in semi-celestial glow; of the bitter, torturing emotion in the soul of the watching Faust. Precisely the composer has shaped his design, assembled and adjusted his means; even the proper page of Wagner to recall and utilize never once escapes him. A deliberate music accomplishes as deliberate an end. Better far than these calculations, the Svendsen that "cuts loose." His rhythms snap; his phrases chortle; his tumult is gay; his dissonances squeak and scream; and how warm-hearted and warm-voiced is his amorous interlude upon the songful strings and horns. (For symphonic carnivals are as obliging as stage-carnivals when lovers crave solitude.) Hardly a brilliant or a highly fanciful music; yet colorful, brightly rhythmed, vivid and animated withal. Handiwork, if the hearer chooses, yet not altogether the handiwork of a thoughtful, an eminently respectable gentleman making effective music. The bourgeoisie may have their Rabaud and welcome. They could not and did not quite kill Svendsen's native wildness.

H. T. PARKER

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

The Symphony Orchestra with Mr. McCormack Assisting—Novel Numbers from the Musical Association — The Harvard Glee Club at the Art Museum—Mr. Ruffo and Miss Nielsen in Prospect

THE final Symphony Concerts for the current season befall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Unusually an "assisting artist" will grace them—Mr. McCormack, the tenor, singing for the last times in Boston before he departs to Australia and to Europe. He will be heard first in the eighteenth-century music in which he excels—a little known air of Mozart, "Non temer, Amato bene," written for the concert-hall. His second number is Frank Bridge's setting of Rupert Brooke's sonnet, "Blow out, you Bugles," verse that gravely and simply exalts the dead in the recent war. Mr. McCormack is a diligent explorer of new music. In the sonnet two Englishmen of the younger generation have yielded him a piece by which he sets store.

The orchestral part of the programme traverses Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony; d'Indy's Variations, "Istar"; and Wagner's Prelude to his opera, "The Mastersingers." By general desire Mr. Monteux will repeat the symphony of which he and the orchestra made much on a Friday afternoon in March. On the following evening came the secession from the band; the symphony was put by; so that thus far but half the public of the concerts has heard it. "Istar," like d'Indy's second symphony, has been too long overlooked and Mr. Monteux does well to restore it to the active repertory. If it abounds in technical resource as variations should do, it is warm also with imagination. For in it the composer follows the Phœnician legend wherein the goddess descends into the underworld and strips off veil after veil that she may make her way to her lover. For each veil a variation until at last she—and the theme—emerge in naked beauty. As for the prelude to "The Mastersingers," it is almost traditional piece for joyous ending to the Symphony Concerts.

"FANTASTIC" AGAIN AT THE SYMPHONY

Berlioz' Work Rendered With Distinction

The chief item on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert was Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," played for the second time this season by request of many subscribers. It was at the close of the former performance that the much dicussed Fradkin incident took place. Owing to the ensuing strike, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony had to be substituted at the Saturday concert. Yesterday the renewed orchestra gave an interpretation as finished and brilliant as that last March.

Berlioz certainly had the power of inventing distinctively beautiful themes, and his skill at orchestration is proverbial. His imagination is of the sort which subordinates formal proportioned perfection of structure to vivid and dramatic effects. All his works live chiefly by virtue of the striking musical episodes they contain. They lack the power, and nobility Beethoven gained by sustained and unified structural development. They are all dramatic lyrics which lack epic grandeur.

D'Indy, who is commonly regarded as cerebral rather than emotional, succeeds in the "Istar" variations in suggesting the sensuous, almost sensual, emotional quality of the legend by means of music which like all his later works is, nevertheless, almost too painstakingly well constructed.

Wagner in the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" is as erudite as D'Indy, though he does not do any stunts comparable to the Frenchman's clever but rather perplexing trick of giving his variations first and his theme afterward. But the emotional force back of Wagner's music is so tremendous that most listeners never notice its intricate construction.

John McCormack showed his wonted artistry and taste in his Mozart recitative and aria. No tenor now before the public can excel him in such music. His other number, a setting of one of Rupert Brooke's sonnets on the war, by Frank Bridge, an English composer little known in America, was effective in a rather banal way. The music suited the words, which are platitudinously optimistic in the face of a tragedy still too near for any artist to approach objectively. It was well sung and capably played.

The end of the season sees the orchestra back in its old form. The return of Mr Neumann to the tympani, is an especial cause for congratulation. He is in a class by himself as far as American orchestras are concerned and could not be adequately replaced. The list of members of the orchestra, printed in the programs for the first time since the strike, showed other welcome accessions and few vacancies still to be filled.

The concert will be repeated as usual tonight at 8. The 40th season begins Oct 8 and 9, with Mr Monteux as conductor.

POPS OPEN NEXT WEEK

The rush for tables will start tomorrow for the opening night of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall a week from tomorrow, Monday, May 3. This peculiarly Bostonian institution, which provides diverting music in the finest orchestral performance, to an accompaniment of light refreshments, nightly except Sundays from 8 to 11, through the spring and early summer, reached its record in attendance last season. There is no reason why that record should not be broken. Agide Jacchia, who is certainly the most talented, inspiring, enthusiastic and all-around popular conductor the Pops have had, is planning a brilliant set of programs. With a splendid force of 80 regular Symphony players to execute this plan, and with loyal Pop audiences to applaud, unmitigated pleasure should reign at Symphony Hall. The innovation of waitresses, so successful last year, will be continued. The menu will be enlarged and improved. On Thursday of the first week will come "Operatic night." The opening program is as follows:

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Song without Words.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
"Gypsy Dance" from "Carmen".....Bizet
Organ solo, Finale, Sixth Symphony.....Widor
Albert W. Snow
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
Canzone.....Van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
Hungarian Dance, No. 1, in G minor..Brahms

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK

SUNDAY—Symphony Orchestra.

McCORMACK-SYMPHONY

The season's last pair of Boston Symphony concerts, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be made memorable by the performance of Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony in C minor. This mighty and difficult work for an especially large orchestra was played on Friday, March 5. Mr. Monteux will repeat it in response to numerous requests by the Friday as well as the Saturday patrons. In this music the composer immortalizes his love for Henrietta Smithson in the following romantic episodes: "Dreams, Passions"; "A Ball"; "Scene in the Meadows";

24TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

D'Indy's "Istar" Variations Heard Again After Interval of Eight Years

JOHN M'CORMACK ON THE PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The 24th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony (by request); Mozart, scene with Rondo, "Von Temer" (John McCormack); d'Indy, "Istar" variations; Frank Bridge, sonnet for voice and orchestra, "Blow out, you Bugles" (Mr. McCormack); Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers."

It was a pleasure to hear d'Indy's "Istar" variations again after an interval of eight years. They are to be ranked with his symphony on a mountain air and his symphony in B flat major. Taking an oriental subject, he did not succumb to orientalism either in the invention of thematic material or in harmonic or orchestral treatment. Nor is the originality of the structure, the announcement of the theme at the very end, typifying the stripping of Istar's last veil and the revelation of her splendid nudity, the chief feature of the workmanship. Each variation, as it marks the progress of Istar's descent to the immufable land, and the stripping in turn of tiara, pendans, precious stones, etc., in itself and as it comes nearer to the theme, is a masterpiece in musical construction and in color. The performance was a brilliant one, as was that of Berlioz's remarkable symphony, which played here on March 5 was requested for the concert of yesterday. Again the scene in the fields, with the famous pastoral music and the still more famous measures for kettle-drums, the wild nightmare, March to the Scaffold, and the Witches Sabbath were enthusiastically applauded.

Mr. McCormack is a master of the Mozartian style. In this respect he is among tenors what Mme. Sembrich in her prime was among sopranos. Yesterday he chose a Scene and Rondo written by Mozart for a private performance of his "Idomeneo" in Vienna. Mr. McCormack's delivery of the Recitative was dramatically varied and effective. The Rondo he sang skilfully, but the voice itself did not always have body or pleasing quality. His other selection was a setting to music by Frank Bridge to a sonnet of Rupert Brooke. This Bridge, an Englishman, but not to be confounded with the Bridge that turned out oratorios—is there not a "Jonah" among them, a "Jonah" but without music for the whale?—made the mistake of attempting to give musical significance to nearly every word of the sonnet. As a result there is a far nobler spirit in Brooke's poem than in Bridge's music. The attempt was laborious. In spite of Mr. McCormack's earnest and lofty interpretation, he could not raise this music to the poet's or his own noble conception.

The concert will be repeated tonight, when the 39th season of the orchestra will end.

In the weeks preceding the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, Mr. Monteux formed practically a new orchestra. He brought it to so high a state of perfection that Mr. Rabaud found it a euphonious and plastic instrument to play upon.

In the course of this season, when, suddenly, another conductor might have lost heart, he again formed an orchestra and in a few weeks worked a miracle. The concerts of the last month have been worthy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the height of its reputation. Nor has Mr. Monteux shone only as a drill-master; throughout the season he has proved himself an interpreter of the very first rank. A glance at the review of the season, which will be published in the Herald tomorrow, will show the catholicity of his taste. As an interpreter, no school, no period, is foreign to him: Beethoven and Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Griffes, Handel and Berlioz—he understands then, he shares his understanding and appreciation with the audience. He has been dramatic, but not sensational; reverential, but not dull; poetic, but not sentimental. And throughout the season, he has conducted himself as a modest, sincere gentleman; serious in his purpose, but not taking himself too seriously, for he has the saving grace of humor. Once asked if he was disturbed or upset by a wholly unforeseen and annoying occurrence, he smiled and said that he had been conductor of the Russian Ballet for several years.

Boston should be today as proud of its orchestra as at any time during its glorious past. It should also be proud of this orchestra's conductor. With him the future of the orchestra will be glorious.

NAMED IN RING

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE RESPONDS

Tribute to Monteux and Players. McCormack Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. John McCormack was soloist. The orchestra, almost completed today in its membership, and performing with the superb virtuosity and sonority of its best days, played Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony, which was on a former programme this season, and yesterday repeated by request, d'Indy's "Istar" variations, and Wagner's overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Mr. McCormack sang the recitative, "Non piu! tutto ascoltae" and the aria, "Non temer, amato bene," of Mozart, and Frank Bridge's sonnet for voice and orchestra, "Blow Out, You Bugles." Throughout the concert the audience was very enthusiastic. It greeted Mr. Monteux long and loudly and the concert was a crescendo of applause, until at the last conductor and orchestra stood, acknowledging the tribute.

TO MONTEUX AND BRENNAN

This concert was indeed a tribute to Mr. Monteux's ability in whipping an orchestra recently reorganized in many positions into shape and making it capable, in a very few days, of virtuoso performances.

It was also testimony to the sagacity and energy of Mr. William H. Brennan, without whose judgment and masterly control of recent untoward conditions Mr. Monteux would not have had such a membership to work with.

Bridge's Song Poor Music

Mr. McCormack never interpreted a dramatic recitative more artistically than he treated Mozart's opening lines. The first two-thirds of the piece went admirably; but, probably for the reason that Mr. McCormack has been singing so much of late years, his voice was not in the best shape when he came to the rapid passages of the concluding rondo. It would be a pity for such a singer, such an artist, to be so prodigal of his voice that such conditions should recur.

In the song of Frank Bridge, a song very taxing because of its range and its tonal demands, Mr. McCormack was as dramatic as he could have been under the circumstances. But from a repetition of this composition may we be delivered! It is false music from the first bar to the last, strained for effects, with no well-established lines of any kind. The composer underscoring each word and syllable of his text, becomes episodic and wanders now hither, and when he attempts to be the terse and manly he is merely affected and dull. Mr. McCormack and Mr. Monteux did much for Mr. Bridge, but Mr. Bridge did very little for Mr. Monteux and Mr. McCormack.

D'Indy's Variations

Berlioz's symphony was given a performance felt by many to be superior to the brilliant performance of this work given earlier in the season. For others the feature of the concert was the performance of d'Indy's variations. Here is a white heat of musical inspiration, imagination and intellectuality. It might be called by some intellectual emotion, for there are those who recognize only what is called emotion and is but an aspect of sensuality.

There is transparent, blazing, white heat of beauty in this noble music which can be understood only by listening to the music itself. Its architecture towers to the skies, yet there is present also the note of that which is ancient Oriental and languorous. Of such pages are those of the introduction itself, with the motive of three notes played first by the horn, a motive which, recurring again and again as a salient feature of the theme of Istar, is as the cry of the goddess, or the woman, for her lover, whom she goes to the depths of hell to reclaim.

...nt Colors

And there is the thought of the gorgeousness of her dress, the glint of the jewels which are taken from her, and finally when Istar, deprived of one after one of her garments, stands forth in all the splendor of her nudity, D'Indy makes his orchestra throb and glow with a thousand radiant colors. It is a passage — this apostrophe to a beauty not seen by the crowd or known to those who have not come into contact with

...RDAY, MAY 1, 19...

...e pure spirit of art—which makes the ...roat tighten when the cry of longing ... heard for the last time and the ...rings hymn the triumph of love. To ...is music, with its supreme logic and ...orification of art, its miracles of workmanship, its elevation to a sublime ideal, ...e does indeed bow the knee.

...The concluding performance of the ...Meistersinger' overture was one singularly just to the music, singularly fortunate in the choice of tempi, in the ...arm, lyrical character of the love ...usic, the humor of the fugue, of the ...nclusion. In certain passages, it is ...ue, a part for a trombone or a trumpet, ...t in itself important, was over-emphasized. Otherwise this reading of the ...Meistersinger" overture was one of the ...eat readings of this score which Symphony audiences have known.

...MONITOR, BOSTON, U. ...

May 1

MUSIC

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-fourth and last concert of the present season on April 30 with the following program:

Berlioz .....Fantastic Symphony
Mozart .....Recitative and Aria
d'Indy ......"Istar"
Frank Bridge, Sonnet for voice and orchestra.
Wagner, Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
The soloist was John McCormack.

We venture to say that the music of Berlioz has never been so well played in Boston as during the past season. Mr. Monteux may well be said to have revealed this composer to us. He has played this music with conviction and sincerity, and we have learned from him that Berlioz was not simply a juggler in orchestral tone, a searcher for the picturesque and bizarre; but that he was above all a poetic, sensitive genius whose music is quite capable of exciting and holding the listener's interest apart from the excessively romantic programs which were attached to it by its composer.

No program is necessary to understand the "Scene in the Meadows" in all its calm and peaceful beauty, which is only intensified by the pianissimo rolls of the drums. Neither is a

...SATURDAY, MAY ...

...nted synopsis essential to the com...hension of the wild and brutally ...listic "Witches' Sabbath." All this ...d more has Mr. Monteux shown. ...D'Indy's "Istar" variations added one ...re to the already long list of au...oritative interpretations of works ...the modern French school which it ...s been our privilege to hear during ...past season. These variations, so ...en thought cold and unimaginative, ...wed with warmth and color under ... Monteux's baton. Frank Bridge's ...net for voice and orchestra aroused ...desire to hear more of the music of ...s gifted and original composer.

...The Boston symphony programs of ...s season have been of consistent ...rit. Though there has been an ...dent search for novelty, no piece ... been selected which had only ...elty to recommend it. American ...posers have had a fair share of ...ntion, and their works have been ...en with a care indicating a desire ...ring forward their merits. Many ...ks long absent from these pro...ms have been revived for the sym...ny patrons; and lastly, the classics ...e been interpreted with a new en...siasm which has made them once ...e vividly alive. Boston should take ... in its orchestra and above all ...s conductor, who has so bravely ...intelligently guided its course.

Here in Boston

Mr. Monteux has changed his plans for the spring and summer. He will not return to Paris as he originally proposed. For the present he will remain in Boston where there is much to do in preparation for the Symphony Concerts of next season.

Frequenters of the Pop Concerts, when they return to Symphony Hall next Monday will discover that a bar—or rather what passes for one in these days of sweet slops—has been installed in the little used corridor back of the lower balcony.

Mr. Neumann, the player upon the kettle-drums, who was persuaded into the recent secession from the Symphony Orchestra, returns to his place today, there to continue indefinitely. For years he has been one of the ornaments of the band and well deserves re-instatement. On the other had, it is definitely decided that Mr. Heim, the former first trumpet, will not be taken back.

Herald May 2

Statistics of the Symphony Season of 1919-1920

Forty-nine composers were represented at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season that closed last night.

Beethoven, 10 times; Wagner, 8; Debussy and Schumann, 5 each; Berlioz and Mozart, 4; Brahms, Handel, Haydn, d'Indy, Mendelssohn, Schubert, 3 each; Bloch, Borodin, Dvorak, Franck, Liszt, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Saint-Saens, 2 each; while Albeniz, Bach, Balakireff, Converse, Frank Bridge, Carpenter, Chabrier, Chadwick, Charpentier, Chausson, Converse, Dukas, Dupare, Enesco, Gilbert, Glazounoff, Gluck, Grieg, Griffes, Goldmark, Lalo, MacDowell, Malipiero, Rabaud, Rachmaninoff, Ravel, Schmitt, Smetana, Stojowski, Stravinsky, Svendsen, Verdi, were each represented once.

The American composer cannot complain that he was ignored by Mr. Monteux: Carpenter, Chadwick, Converse, Gilbert, Griffes, MacDowell.

There were 47 performances of works by German-Austrian composers, with Liszt the Hungarian included.

There were 23 performances of works by French composers; 10 of Russian compositions; 6 of American; 2 of Scandinavian; 2 of Italian; 1 of Spanish; 2 of Swiss.

We have not included Mr. Stojowski, who, born in Poland, has lived in the United States for at least 15 years; while Enesco, a Roumanian by birth, is practically a Parisian.

Many new or old but unfamiliar works were produced.

ORCHESTRAL COMPOSITIONS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME

Converse—Symphony in C minor.
Griffes—"The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" 2

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN AMERICA

Debussy—Fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra (Alfred Cortot, pianist).
Debussy—"Jeux," a Danced Poem.
D'Indy—"Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico," No. 2, op. 70..... 3

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON

Symphonies, Symphonic Poems, Etc.

Albeniz—"Catalonia," Folk Suite in three parts, No. 1.
Chadwick—"The Angel of Death," Symphonic Poem.
Debussy—Petite Suite.
Stojowski—Symphony in D minor..... 4

Concertos

Carpenter—Concertino for pianoforte and orchestra (E. Robert Schmitz, pianist).
Rachmaninoff—Concerto for pianoforte with orchestra, D minor, No. 3 (S. Rachmaninoff, pianist)..... 2

Arias and Songs

Bloch—Psalms 137 and 114 (Povla Frijsh).
Bridge, F.—Sonnet, "Blow Out, You Bugles." (John McCormack).
Franck—Aria, "Les Rois dont vous vantez la Gloire" (Povla Frijsh)... 4

10

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME AT THESE CONCERTS

Symphonies, Symphonic Poems, Etc.

Borodin—Polovtskian Dances, from "Prince Igor."
Dukas—Overture to "Polyeucte."
Gilbert—"The Dance in Place Congo," Symphonic Poem.
Glazounoff—"Stenka Razine."
Haydn—Symphony, "La Reine de France."
Moussorgsky—"A Night on Bald Mountain," Fantaisie for orchestra.
Rimsky-Korsakoff—"Le Coq d'Or"; Introduction and March.
Stravinsky—Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" 8

Concertos

Handel—Concerto in F major for organ and orchestra (Joseph Bonnet)..... 1

Choral Works

Debussy—"La Damoiselle Elue," lyric poem (Ethel Frank, soprano; Clara-mond Thompson, contralto, and chorus) 1

Arias and Songs

Beethoven—"Nature's Adoration," with orchestra (Louise Homer).
Duparc—"Invitation to Voyage," with orchestra (Povla Frijsh).
Moussorgsky—"Hopak," with orchestra (Povla Frijsh).
Schumann—Bride's Song No. 1, Bride's Song No. 2, with orchestra (Margaret Matzenauer) 5

15

The soloists were as follows:

Sopranos—Mmes. Frijsh, Matzenauer.... 2
Contralto—Mme. Homer 1
Tenor—Mr. McCormack 1
Pianists—Messrs. Cortot, Fox, Ganz, Gebhard, Ornstein, Rachmaninoff, Schmitz 7
Violinists—Messrs. Fradkin, Kreisler and Spalding 3
Violoncellist—Mr. Bedetti (two performances) 1
Organist—Mr. Bonnet 1

16

Mr. Denayer played the viola in Berlioz's "Harold in Italy."

Mr. Schmitz played for the first time in Boston. Mmes. Frijsh and Matzenauer, and Messrs. Fox and Ornstein took part here for the first time in a Symphony concert.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE FINAL AFTERNOON OF THE SEASON

Tribune May 1

Less Tribute to Mr. Monteux Than His Signal Services, Throughout the Year, Have Deserved — Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" in Vivid Voice, d'Indy's "Istar" Revived and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" in Its Old Place as Proud and Joyous Ending—Mr. McCormack and Perfections of Mozartean Song

A MODEST as well as an able and tireless conductor is Mr. Monteux. By his works, and by his works only, have his audiences known and applauded him from last October into this present May. The more the satisfaction, then, that the programme of the final afternoon concert of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday, gave room for not a few of his best abilities. The less the satisfaction also, as some bystanders noted the incidents of the day, that his hearers, filling Symphony Hall to the last seat, did not return him longer and warmer personal tribute. True, they clapped him heartily when he came first to his place and when, with Mr. McCormack as "assisting artist," he returned to it after the intermission. Plentiful, too, were the plaudits at each pause in Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," presumably for piece and performance both; while at the end, the standing orchestra received its usual meed. On the other hand, the audience received rather coolly d'Indy's tone-poem, "Istar," and in vivid voice; while it lingered no longer after the final number—the prelude to Wagner's opera, "The Mastersingers"—than was necessary to take courteous leave of the conductor. At the end of many a season, the public of Friday afternoons has tarried for heartier farewell to one or another of his predecessors. But the concert of yesterday was not short. . . .

On many a score, moreover, Mr. Monteux's deserts for the day and for the orchestral year in retrospect, ran high. He came to his post last autumn when the concerts were at lower ebb than they had been in long memory. The helpless provinciality of the passing Rabaud, the lingering prejudices of wartime, had stripped the programmes of catholicity, even of variety. They had become lists of formula and routine, like to those which Messieurs Pierné and Chevillard—but not the "intruding" and also eager Monsieur Rhené-Baton—impose upon the patient public of Paris. From the beginning to the end of the musical year, as the usual tables in the final programme-book attest, Mr. Monteux has restored the "active repertory" to familiar and established standards. His choice of pieces has ranged widely, interestingly; he has bidden his hearers to many novel, to not a few unfamiliar numbers, and almost every one has well deserved introduction or revival. He has assembled music for its merits as music, be it French, German, Italian, Czech, American, and not by reason of the nationality or the associations of the composers or the policies of their Governments through the years of war. He has whisked away the bigotries of that unhappy time. Once more the Symphony Conterts are catholic, with doors flung wide to new music. Once more a cosmopolitan man of the world, a well-read musician, a receptive and ambitious conductor orders them.

Similarly Mr. Monteux received the orchestra when, however able the band, individual by individual, the mediocrity and the mildness of the temporary Rabaud had dulled and relaxed standards of performance. Reasonably, courteously, but unyieldingly, the new conductor restored discipline. Once more rehearsal became unremitting. Anew the orchestra yielded the particular eloquence of the music in hand. If Mr. Monteux spared not his men, as little did he spare himself. His ear is keen; his hand often sensitive; gradually the band regained the beauty, the plasticity, the ardor of tone that had been familiar distinctions. Again it became the revealing, characterizing, enhancing voice of the chosen music, especially in the dramatic, pictorial, romantic, warmly colored, sharply rhythmed and generally high-pitched pieces in which the conductor excels. The orchestra was well on the way to these bettered standards when the strife and the secession of March again shook it. Mr. Monteux met the emergency with quiet resolution, with tranquil but inexhaustible energy. When his forces were diminished he yet made interesting programmes, and to the utmost of his own and the band's abilities maintained the quality of performance. When he and others had newly recruited the orchestra, and often for the better, he resumed in the spring—and nothing daunted—the assimilating work he had begun in the autumn. For a month past the outcome has weekly and richly praised him. Again the Symphony Orchestra goes forward; again its future in the season next to come sets fair. With reason the programme-book yesterday listed the personnel of the band; with just satisfaction the management reported scarcely a lapse in the renewal of subscriptions. Now and again in the forty years of the Symphony Concerts more eminent conductors than Mr. Monteux may have graced them. Not one, however, has done them so signal service. Double the plaudits he received yesterday would have fallen short of just reward.

Continued on Following Page

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Continued from Preceding Page

Programme and performance were alike characteristic of the conductor at his best. He began with Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," played once and remarkably on the eve of the secession; then necessarily set aside; now repeated at just and general request. It does not return so often to Symphony Hall as to become hackneyed. For nearly a century, in fact, the intrinsic vitality of the music has forestalled such fate. No more does it come back to the concert room of 1920 as interesting curiosity of a romantic composer and a romantic day in the arts. Rather, it still speaks for itself in highly individual and keenly penetrating voice. Fortunate in the years since Berlioz, in the years before him, the composer who could invent such a motiv and so enrich it as that which embodies the haunting woman, the "fixed idea" of this symphony of drugged dream. Fortunate, again, and over like span of time, the composer who could imagine and accomplish music of such grim, graphic, fantastic power as "The March to the Scaffold" whether it rage in outburst or drone in sombre repetition. Fortunate, once more the composer, through the long line of two centuries, who from the poetry of mind and heart could summon such beauty of design as that which shapes the scene "In The Fields" and such poignancy of utterance as that which there speaks mood and picture.

Fortunate, finally, the composer yesterday, today and forever, who can write with such individuality as that which still vitalizes at least three of the divisions of the "Fantastic Symphony." Agreed that the episode of the ball has waned into commonplace, albeit still faintly flaming with romantic glow. Agreed that the finale of the witches' Sabbath has declined into what seems now the routine of romantic extravagance. But the rest as already set down, the rest through which flows the long, lean, incisive line of the music, the marvellous directness of imagery and expression, the high intensity of mood, emotion, utterance, the sinewy harmonies, the vivid timbres, the melody that is unescapable voice of the passion or the vision behind! It is accounted the chief glory of Musorgsky that in his music the thing to be expressed and the expression have become inextricably fused in single impression upon the hearer. Surely the like glory falls to Berlioz in this "Fantastic Symphony" and the more amply because, while the Russian is avowed realist, the Frenchman is as frankly romantic. There is music of Berlioz that has withered—the symphony of Harold and Italy, heard afresh only last autumn; but not the "Fantastic Symphony" when it is played as Mr. Monteux and the orchestra played it yesterday. It has been the custom to say that only Mr. Weingartner, of living conductors, truly divines Berlioz's music, summons it anew to vivid and puissant voice. Mr. Monteux now parts the distinction with him.

Conductor and band shone again in the revival of Mr. d'Indy's "Istar," through nearly eight years unheard in Symphony Hall. The form of the music is characteristic of the familiar, the classified composer—seven successive variations with the theme whence they spring unheard until in the finale it emerges first in naked unisons and then in full harmonic panoply. Hear the "cerebral" d'Indy even in those relatively young years of the nineties, who makes music, first of all, an exercise of the intellect. Another d'Indy, however, speaks in this "Istar" as tone-poem—a d'Indy of clearly and pervadingly sensuous imagination. Upon a clew from Phœnician legend, he imagines the goddess descending into the underworld where her lover is held captive. Seven closed portals bar her way. Each she passes, but at each the guardian of the gate strips her of jewel or of veil. Only in the stripped splendor of her revealed body may she finally conquer. Not only sensuous imagery but sensuous treatment. The jewels glint, the mantles shimmer in the motion and the color of the music. With harmonies and timbres Mr. d'Indy is almost voluptuous. There is cumulative progress; there is the haunting and wistful background of the quest. The ear hears the music as the eye sees one of Moreau's jewelled palpitating pictures of old legend—of Phaeton, of Salome. Yet d'Indy would not be d'Indy were not his inverted form, his cumulative processes contrived and adroit reflection of the course of his tonal narrative. Sensuous he may will to be, but the old cerebral Adam within him does timely get its way. In such music of color, of fantastical imagery it is Mr. Monteux's way to excel. Nor did he and the orchestra fall short in the Prelude to "The Mastersingers"—music of unfolding manifold instrumental song as only ge... may write it; music of the richness, joy, the pride of life as only high-pitch... and amply dowered spirit may know a... release it; music that is very pæan to t... arts it exemplifies. There is no pie... so meet to end the Symphony Concert. It was stirring to hear it restored to wha... is, almost, its traditional place in them.

There were interludes also—interludes of Mr. McCormack in declamation and song out of Mozart; in a sonnet of Rupert Brooke to the glory of those who to death in the war gave all the promise of their future living, who, so doing, restored noble passions to a world as sorely needing them as it has soon forgotten them. Frank Bridge, of the younger generation of British composers set the verse for tenor voice and orchestra—straightforwardly, sinewily, man-fashion, but without too much distinction and with overemphasis recurring. In these interludes, however, more significant was the manner than the matter of Mr. McCormack's song. When he is on his mettle as he was yesterday, when he holds every ability in elastic command, when circumstance and audience plainly stir him, he is incomparable singer, save only with Mme. Sembrich in our time, of the music of Mozart. Lengthy measures of declamation—"Non Piu Tutto Ascoltae"—precede the air and rondo—"Non Temer, Amato Bene"—which he sang yesterday as the composer interpolated them into his early and usually overlooked opera, "Idomeneo."

LAST SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives Closing Concert of Winter

Record May 1

By J. V. CLARK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closes its season, a period of storm and stress, with its concerts of yesterday and today. The program is Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony; a little known Mozart aria, d'Indy's "Istar," symphonic variations; Frank Bridge's setting of Rupert Brooke's sonnet, "Blow Out, You Bugles," and Wagner's overture to "The Meistersingers."

The symphony was played at one performance this year; the second performance was interrupted by the symphonic strike. The work then, as yesterday, was brilliantly performed. One of the great works of the French repertoire it has been singularly absent from our programs. The d'Indy variations are gorgeous and perplexing, a joy to the dissector. The Wagner overture is one of the pages of musical literature that is almost incomparable.

But the Mozart and Bridge music! Poor John McCormack struggled with this music, but even his delicious voice, his consummate art and his personal popularity could not make it, or his performance, striking. The Mozart music is some that he has dug up. Possibly its ornateness appealed to the tenor as a tour de force. He sang it with as much perfection as he has sung other Mozart music here—witness his singing of "Giovanni"—but it left the auditor unmoved.

Bridge Music

The music that Bridge has written for the Brooke poem seems formless in comparison with the sonnet form in which the verses are written. Bridge, a man of great talent, can well be heard here in music other than that played for Mr. McCormack. How much music has ever been written for sonnets that better the sonnets themselves? Why not recite the sonnet, if it must be dragged from the library into public places? Mr. McCormack is to be commended for attempting to get from the beaten path, but let him, when he returns from his travels, choose other paths and bridges than those in his current repertoire.

The orchestra, we repeat what we have said at other times, is once more itself. Nearly all places vacated by strikers have been filled. The orchestra now plays so well that only an expert could detect the inroads made by internal troubles earlier in the year.

The conductor, an all round man rather than a "genius" of the prima donna conductor type, has many admirers. The trustees next year will undoubtedly provide soloists of the first grade. Many interesting works will be obtained for next season in Europe during this summer.

Boston should continue to support its great orchestra, the loss of which would be an inestimable blow to the city

McCORMACK SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

Tribune

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, gave its 24th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony (by request); Mozart, scene with Rondo, "Von Femer" (John McCormack); d'Indy, "Istar" variations; Frank Bridge, sonnet for voice and orchestra, "Blow Out, You Bugles" (Mr. McCormack); Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Under Mr. Monteux, the orchestra yesterday rose to great heights in the performance of Berlioz's brilliant music, particularly in the scene in the meadows and the march to the scaffold. It is dramatic suggestive music; it tells its own story. Take, for instance, the wandering music of the shepherds' pipes in the meadow scene; the vague, restless music which follows—the very product of a drugged brain—the disturbing thunder and the equally disturbing silence which follows. The whole thing, no less than the following march to the scaffold, paints its own vivid picture.

It would be hard to imagine a singer whose voice more naturally fits the music of Mozart than [illegible] McCormack

Unclouded, unbroken, Mr. McCormack sustained the long line of the recitative; impeccably he placed every pause, shaped and adjusted every phrase. His diction was clarity itself, while at every turn his tones took color from the sentiment of the verse. Equally adroit of contour and of expression went the unfolding periods. He passed to the air; and he outdid himself in grace of melodic line, in loveliness of phrase, in the melting of contour into contour, in the play of sentiment as in undulation upon the whole. He ended with the rondo in traceries of tone more delicate than even those which the violin was weaving between the periods in Mozart's gossamer figures. The perfect art of Mozartean song inset within a voice that yesterday did it matchless service. Brooke's and Bridge's sonnet invited Mr. McCormack's larger and more heroic vein—the vein which maturity of mind, heart, art and voice steadily ripens. Readily he gained and sustained it. Yet his particular glory was the glory of his Mozartean song. In kind and quality, it fitly companioned the Berlioz of the "Fantastic Symphony," the Wagner, even, of the prelude to "The Mastersingers."

H. T. PARKER

...Radiant Colors

And there is the thought of the gorgeousness of her dress, the glint of the jewels which are taken from her, and finally when Istar, deprived of one after one of her garments, stands forth in all the splendor of her nudity, D'Indy makes his orchestra throb and glow with a thousand radiant colors. It is a passage — this apostrophe to a beauty not seen by the crowd or known to those who have not come into contact with

...RDAY, MAY 1, 19...

...he pure spirit of art—which makes the ...hroat tighten when the cry of longing ... heard for the last time and the ...rings hymn the triumph of love. To ...is music, with its supreme logic and ...orification of art, its miracles of work...anship, its elevation to a sublime ideal, ...e does indeed bow the knee.

The concluding performance of the ...Meistersinger' overture was one sing...arly just to the music, singularly for...nate in the choice of tempi, in the ...arm, lyrical character of the love ...usic, the humor of the fugue, of the ...nclusion. In certain passages, it is ...ue, a part for a trombone or a trumpet, ...ot in itself important, was over-empha...zed. Otherwise this reading of the ...Meistersinger" overture was one of the ...reat readings of this score which Sym...hony audiences have known.

...IONITOR, BOSTON, U.S...

May 1

MUSIC

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-fourth and last concert of the present season on April 30 with the following program:

Berlioz .....Fantastic Symphony
Mozart .....Recitative and Aria
d'Indy ......"Istar"
Frank Bridge, Sonnet for voice and orchestra.
Wagner, Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
The soloist was John McCormack.

We venture to say that the music of Berlioz has never been so well played in Boston as during the past season. Mr. Monteux may well be said to have revealed this composer to us. He has played this music with conviction and sincerity, and we have learned from him that Berlioz was not simply a juggler in orchestral tone, a searcher for the picturesque and bizarre; but that he was above all a poetic, sensitive genius whose music is quite capable of exciting and holding the listener's interest apart from the excessively romantic programs which were attached to it by its composer.

No program is necessary to understand the "Scene in the Meadows" in all its calm and peaceful beauty, which is only intensified by the pianissimo rolls of the drums. Neither is a

...., SATURDAY, MAY...

...nted synopsis essential to the com...hension of the wild and brutally ...listic "Witches' Sabbath." All this ...d more has Mr. Monteux shown. ...'Indy's "Istar" variations added one ...re to the already long list of au...oritative interpretations of works ...the modern French school which it ...s been our privilege to hear during ...past season. These variations, so ...en thought cold and unimaginative, ...wed with warmth and color under ... Monteux's baton. Frank Bridge's ...net for voice and orchestra aroused ...lesire to hear more of the music of ...s gifted and original composer.

The Boston symphony programs of ...s season have been of consistent ...rit. Though there has been an ...dent search for novelty, no piece ...s been selected which had only ...velty to recommend it. American ...posers have had a fair share of ...ention, and their works have been ...en with a care indicating a desire ...bring forward their merits. Many ...ks long absent from these pro...ms have been revived for the sym...ny patrons; and lastly, the classics ...e been interpreted with a new en...siasm which has made them once ...e vividly alive. Boston should take ...e in its orchestra and above all ...ts conductor, who has so bravely ...intelligently guided its course.

Here in Boston

Mr. Monteux has changed his plans for the spring and summer. He will not return to Paris as he originally proposed. For the present he will remain in Boston where there is much to do in preparation for the Symphony Concerts of next season.

Frequenters of the Pop Concerts, when they return to Symphony Hall next Monday will discover that a bar—or rather what passes for one in these days of sweet slops—has been installed in the little used corridor back of the lower balcony.

Mr. Neumann, the player upon the kettle-drums, who was persuaded into the recent secession from the Symphony Orchestra, returns to his place today, there to continue indefinitely. For years he has been one of the ornaments of the band and well deserves re-instatement. On the other had, it is definitely decided that Mr. Heim, the former first trumpet, will not be taken back.

Statistics of the Symphony Season of 1919-1920

Forty-nine composers were represented at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season that closed last night.

Beethoven, 10 times; Wagner, 8; Debussy and Schumann, 5 each; Berlioz and Mozart, 4; Brahms, Handel, Haydn, d'Indy, Mendelssohn, Schubert, 3 each; Bloch, Borodin, Dvorak, Franck, Liszt, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Saint-Saens, 2 each; while Albeniz, Bach, Balakireff, Converse, Frank Bridge, Carpenter, Chabrier, Chadwick, Charpentier, Chausson, Converse, Dukas, Dupare, Enesco, Gilbert, Glazounoff, Gluck, Grieg, Griffes, Goldmark, Lalo, MacDowell, Malipiero, Rabaud, Rachmaninoff, Ravel, Schmitt, Smetana, Stojowski, Stravinsky, Svendsen, Verdi, were each represented once.

The American composer cannot complain that he was ignored by Mr. Monteux: Carpenter, Chadwick, Converse, Gilbert, Griffes, MacDowell.

There were 47 performances of works by German-Austrian composers, with Liszt the Hungarian included.

There were 23 performances of works by French composers; 10 of Russian compositions; 6 of American; 2 of Scandinavian; 2 of Italian; 1 of Spanish; 2 of Swiss.

We have not included Mr. Stojowski, who, born in Poland, has lived in the United States for at least 15 years; while Enesco, a Roumanian by birth, is practically a Parisian.

Many new or old but unfamiliar works were produced.

ORCHESTRAL COMPOSITIONS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME

Converse—Symphony in C minor.
Griffes—"The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" 2

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN AMERICA

Debussy—Fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra (Alfred Cortot, pianist).
Debussy—"Jeux," a Danced Poem.
D'Indy—"Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico," No. 2, op. 70..... 3

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON

Symphonies, Symphonic Poems, Etc.

Albeniz—"Catalonia," Folk Suite in three parts, No. 1.
Chadwick—"The Angel of Death," Symphonic Poem.
Debussy—Petite Suite.
Stojowski—Symphony in D minor..... 4

Concertos

Carpenter — Concertino for pianoforte and orchestra (E. Robert Schmitz, pianist).
Rachmaninoff—Concerto for pianoforte with orchestra, D. minor, No. 3 (S. Rachmaninoff, pianist)..... 2

Arias and Songs

Bloch—Psalms 137 and 114 (Povla Frijsh).
Bridge, F.—Sonnet, "Blow Out, You Bugles." (John McCormack).
Franck—Aria, "Les Rois dont vous vantez la Gloire" (Povla Frijsh)... 4

10

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME AT THESE CONCERTS

Symphonies, Symphonic Poems, Etc.

Borodin — Polovtskian Dances, from "Prince Igor."
Dukas—Overture to "Polyeucte."
Gilbert—"The Dance in Place Congo," Symphonic Poem.
Glazounoff—"Stenka Razine."
Haydn—Symphony, "La Reine de France."
Moussorgsky—"A Night on Bald Mountain," Fantaisie for orchestra.
Rimsky-Korsakoff—"Le Coq d'Or"; Introduction and March.
Stravinsky—Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" 8

Concertos

Handel—Concerto in F major for organ and orchestra (Joseph Bonnet)..... 1

Choral Works

Debussy—"La Damoiselle Elue," lyric poem (Ethel Frank, soprano; Claramond Thompson, contralto, and chorus) 1

Arias and Songs

Beethoven—"Nature's Adoration," with orchestra (Louise Homer).
Duparc—"Invitation à Voyage," with orchestra (Povla Frijsh).
Moussorgsky—"Hopak," with orchestra (Povla Frijsh).
Schumann—Bride's Song No. 1, Bride's Song No. 2, with orchestra (Margaret Matzenauer) 5

15

The soloists were as follows:

Sopranos—Mmes. Frijsh, Matzenauer.... 2
Contralto—Mme. Homer 1
Tenor—Mr. McCormack 1
Pianists—Messrs. Cortot, Fox, Ganz, Gebhard, Ornstein, Rachmaninoff, Schmitz 7
Violinists—Messrs. Fradkin, Kreisler and Spalding 3
Violoncellist—Mr. Bedetti (two performances) 1
Organist—Mr. Bonnet 1

16

Mr. Denayer played the viola in Berlioz's "Harold in Italy."

Mr. Schmitz played for the first time in Boston. Mmes. Frijsh and Matzenauer, and Messrs. Fox and Ornstein took part here for the first time in a Symphony concert.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE FINAL AFTERNOON OF THE SEASON

Tribute May 1

Less Tribute to Mr. Monteux Than His Signal Services, Throughout the Year, Have Deserved — Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" in Vivid Voice, d'Indy's "Istar" Revived and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" in Its Old Place as Proud and Joyous Ending—Mr. McCormack and Perfections of Mozartean Song

AMODEST as well as an able and tireless conductor is Mr. Monteux. By his works, and by his works only, have his audiences known and applauded him from last October into this present May. The more the satisfaction, then, that the programme of the final afternoon concert of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday, gave room for not a few of his best abilities. The less the satisfaction also, as some bystanders noted the incidents of the day, that his hearers, filling Symphony Hall to the last seat, did not return him longer and warmer personal tribute. True, they clapped him heartily when he came first to his place and when, with Mr. McCormack as "assisting artist," he returned to it after the intermission. Plentiful, too, were the plaudits at each pause in Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," presumably for piece and performance both; while at the end, the standing orchestra received its usual meed. On the other hand, the audience received rather coolly d'Indy's tone-poem, "Istar," and in vivid voice; while it lingered no longer after the final number—the prelude to Wagner's opera, "The Mastersingers"—than was necessary to take courteous leave of the conductor. At the end of many a season, the public of Friday afternoons has tarried for heartier farewell to one or another of his predecessors. But the concert of yesterday was not short. . . .

On many a score, moreover, Mr. Monteux's deserts for the day and for the orchestral year in retrospect, ran high. He came to his post last autumn when the concerts were at lower ebb than they had been in long memory. The helpless provinciality of the passing Rabaud, the lingering prejudices of wartime, had stripped the programmes of catholicity, even of variety. They had become lists of formula and routine, like to those which Messieurs Pierné and Chevillard—but not the "intruding") and also eager Monsieur Ehéné-Baton—impose upon the patient public of Paris. From the beginning to the end of the musical year, as the usual tables in the final programme-book attest, Mr. Monteux has restored the "active repertory" to familiar and established standards. His choice of pieces has ranged widely, interestingly; he has bidden his hearers to many novel, to not a few unfamiliar numbers, and almost every one has well deserved introduction or revival. He has assembled music for its merits as music, be it French, German, Italian, Czech, American, and not by reason of the nationality or the associations of the composers or the policies of their Governments through the years of war. He has whisked away the bigotries of that unhappy time. Once more the Symphony Conterts are catholic, with doors flung wide to new music. Once more a cosmopolitan man of the world, a well-read musician, a receptive and ambitious conductor orders them.

Similarly Mr. Monteux received the orchestra when, however able the band, individual by individual, the mediocrity and the mildness of the temporary Rabaud had dulled and relaxed standards of performance. Reasonably, courteously, but unyieldingly, the new conductor restored discipline. Once more rehearsal became unremitting. Anew the orchestra yielded the particular eloquence of the music in hand. If Mr. Monteux spared not his men, as little did he spare himself. His ear is keen; his hand often sensitive; gradually the band regained the beauty, the plasticity, the ardor of tone that had been familiar distinctions. Again it became the revealing, characterizing, enhancing voice of the chosen music, especially in the dramatic, pictorial, romantic, warmly colored, sharply rhythmed and generally high-pitched pieces in which the conductor excels. The orchestra was well on the way to these bettered standards when the strife and the secession of March again shook it. Mr. Monteux met the emergency with quiet resolution, with tranquil but inexhaustible energy. When his forces were diminished he yet made interesting programmes, and to the utmost of his own and the band's abilities maintained the quality of performance. When he and others had newly recruited the orchestra, and often for the better, he resumed in the spring—and nothing daunted—the assimilating work he had begun in the autumn. For a month past the outcome has weekly and richly praised him. Again the Symphony Orchestra goes forward; again its future in the season next to come sets fair. With reason the programme-book yesterday listed the personnel of the band; with just satisfaction the management reported scarcely a lapse in the renewal of subscriptions. Now and again in the forty years of the Symphony Concerts more eminent conductors than Mr. Monteux may have graced them. Not one, however, has done them so signal service. Double the plaudits he received yesterday would have fallen short of just reward.

Continued on Following Page

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Continued from Preceding Page

Programme and performance were alike characteristic of the conductor at his best. He began with Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," played once and remarkably on the eve of the secession; then necessarily set aside; now repeated at just and general request. It does not return so often to Symphony Hall as to become hackneyed. For nearly a century, in fact, the intrinsic vitality of the music has forestalled such fate. No more does it come back to the concert room of 1920 as interesting curiosity of a romantic composer and a romantic day in the arts. Rather, it still speaks for itself in highly individual and keenly penetrating voice. Fortunate in the years since Berlioz, in the years before him, the composer who could invent such a motiv and so enrich it as that which embodies the haunting woman, the "fixed idea" of this symphony of drugged dream. Fortunate, again, and over like span of time, the composer who could imagine and accomplish music of such grim, graphic, fantastic power as "The March to the Scaffold" whether it rage in outburst or drone in sombre repetition. Fortunate, once more the composer, through the long line of two centuries, who from the poetry of mind and heart could summon such beauty of design as that which shapes the scene "In The Fields" and such poignancy of utterance as that which there speaks mood and picture.

Fortunate, finally, the composer yesterday, today and forever, who can write with such individuality as that which still vitalizes at least three of the divisions of the "Fantastic Symphony." Agreed that the episode of the ball has waned into commonplace, albeit still faintly flaming with romantic glow. Agreed that the finale of the witches' Sabbath has declined into what seems now the routine of romantic extravagance. But the rest as already set down, the rest through which flows the long, lean, incisive line of the music, the marvellous directness of imagery and expression, the high intensity of mood, emotion, utterance, the sinewy harmonies, the vivid timbres, the melody that is unescapable voice of the passion or the vision behind! It is accounted the chief glory of Musorgsky that in his music the thing to be expressed and the expression have become inextricably fused in single impression upon the hearer. Surely the like glory falls to Berlioz in this "Fantastic Symphony" and the more amply because, while the Russian is avowed realist, the Frenchman is as frankly romantic. There is music of Berlioz that has withered—the symphony of Harold and Italy, heard afresh only last autumn; but not the "Fantastic Symphony" when it is played as Mr. Monteux and the orchestra played it yesterday. It has been the custom to say that only Mr. Weingartner, of living conductors, truly divines Berlioz's music, summons it anew to vivid and puissant voice. Mr. Monteux now parts the distinction with him.

Conductor and band shone again in the revival of Mr. d'Indy's "Istar," through nearly eight years unheard in Symphony Hall. The form of the music is characteristic of the familiar, the classified composer—seven successive variations with the theme whence they spring unheard until in the finale it emerges first in naked unisons and then in full harmonic panoply. Hear the "cerebral" d'Indy even in those relatively young years of the nineties, who makes music, first of all, an exercise of the intellect. Another d'Indy, however, speaks in this "Istar" as tone-poem—a d'Indy of clearly and pervadingly sensuous imagination. Upon a clew from Phœnician legend, he imagines the goddess descending into the underworld where her lover is held captive. Seven closed portals bar her way. Each she passes, but at each the guardian of the gate strips her of jewel or of veil. Only in the stripped splendor of her revealed body may she finally conquer. Not only sensuous imagery but sensuous treatment. The jewels glint, the mantles shimmer in the motion and the color of the music. With harmonies and timbres Mr. d'Indy is almost voluptuous. There is cumulative progress; there is the haunting and wistful background of the quest. The ear hears the music as the eye sees one of Moreau's jewelled palpitating pictures of old legend—of Phaeton, of Salome. Yet d'Indy would not be d'Indy were not his inverted form, his cumulative processes contrived and adroit reflection of the course of his tonal narrative. Sensuous he may will to be, but the old cerebral Adam within him does timely get its way. In such music of color, of fantastical imagery it is Mr. Monteux's way to excel. Nor did he and the orchestra fall short in the Prelude to "The Mastersingers"—music of unfolding manifold instrumental song as only ge... may write it; music of the richness, joy, the pride of life as only high-pitch... and amply dowered spirit may know a... release it; music that is very pæan to t... arts it exemplifies. There is no pie... so meet to end the Symphony Concerts. It was stirring to hear it restored to wha... is, almost, its traditional place in them.

There were interludes also—interludes of Mr. McCormack in declamation and song out of Mozart; in a sonnet of Rupert Brooke to the glory of those who to death in the war gave all the promise of their future living, who, so doing, restored noble passions to a world as sorely needing them as it has soon forgotten them. Frank Bridge, of the younger generation of British composers set the verse for tenor voice and orchestra—straightforwardly, sinewily, man-fashion, but without too much distinction and with overemphasis recurring. In these interludes, however, more significant was the manner than the matter of Mr. McCormack's song. When he is on his mettle as he was yesterday, when he holds every ability in elastic command, when circumstance and audience plainly stir him, he is incomparable singer, save only with Mme. Sembrich in our time, of the music of Mozart. Lengthy measures of declamation—"Non Piu! Tutto Ascoltae"—precede the air and rondo—"Non Temer, Amato Bene"—which he sang yesterday as the composer interpolated them into his early and usually overlooked opera, "Idomeneo."

LAST SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives Closing Concert of Winter

Read May 1

By J. V. CLARK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closes its season, a period of storm and stress, with its concerts of yesterday and today. The program is Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony; a little known Mozart aria, d'Indy's "Istar," symphonic variations; Frank Bridge's setting of Rupert Brooke's sonnet, "Blow Out, You Bugles," and Wagner's overture to "The Meistersingers."

The symphony was played at one performance this year; the second performance was interrupted by the symphonic strike. The work then, as yesterday, was brilliantly performed. One of the great works of the French repertoire it has been singularly absent from our programs. The d'Indy variations are gorgeous and perplexing, a joy to the dissector. The Wagner overture is one of the pages of musical literature that is almost incomparable.

But the Mozart and Bridge music! Poor John McCormack struggled with this music, but even his delicious voice, his consummate art and his personal popularity could not make it, or his performance, striking. The Mozart music is some that he has dug up. Possibly its ornateness appealed to the tenor as a tour de force. He sang it with as much perfection as he has sung other Mozart music here—witness his singing of "Giovanni"—but it left the auditor unmoved.

Bridge Music

The music that Bridge has written for the Brooke poem seems formless in comparison with the sonnet form in which the verses are written. Bridge, a man of great talent, can well be heard here in music other than that played for Mr. McCormack. How much music has ever been written for sonnets that better the sonnets themselves? Why not recite the sonnet, if it must be dragged from the library into public places? Mr. McCormack is to be commended for attempting to get from the beaten path, but let him, when he returns from his travels, choose other paths and bridges than those in his current repertoire.

The orchestra, we repeat what we have said at other times, is once more itself. Nearly all places vacated by strikers have been filled. The orchestra now plays so well that only an expert could detect the inroads made by internal troubles earlier in the year.

The conductor, an all round man rather than a "genius" of the prima donna conductor type, has many admirers. The trustees next year will undoubtedly provide soloists of the first grade. Many interesting works will be obtained for next season in Europe during this summer.

Boston should continue to support its great orchestra, the loss of which would be an inestimable blow to the city

McCORMACK SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, gave its 24th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony (by request); Mozart, scene with Rondo, "Von Femer" (John McCormack); d'Indy, "Istar" variations; Frank Bridge, sonnet for voice and orchestra, "Blow Out, You Bugles" (Mr. McCormack); Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Under Mr. Monteux, the orchestra yesterday rose to great heights in the performance of Berlioz's brilliant music, particularly in the scene in the meadows and the march to the scaffold. It is dramatic suggestive music; it tells its own story. Take, for instance, the wandering music of the shepherds' pipes in the meadow scene; the vague, restless music which follows—the very product of a drugged brain—the disturbing thunder and the equally disturbing silence which follows. The whole thing, no less than the following march to the scaffold, paints its own vivid picture.

It would be hard to imagine a singer whose voice more naturally fits the music of Mozart than [illegible] McCormack.

Unclouded, unbroken, Mr. McCormack sustained the long line of the recitative; impeccably he placed every pause, shaped and adjusted every phrase. His diction was clarity itself, while at every turn his tones took color from the sentiment of the verse. Equally adroit of contour and of expression went the unfolding periods. He passed to the air; and he outdid himself in grace of melodic line, in loveliness of phrase, in the melting of contour into contour. In the play of sentiment as in undulation upon the whole. He ended with the rondo in traceries of tone more delicate than even those which the violin was weaving between the periods in Mozart's gossamer figures. The perfect art of Mozartean song inset within a voice that yesterday did it matchless service. Brooke's and Bridge's sonnet invited Mr. McCormack's larger and more heroic vein —the vein which maturity of mind, heart, art and voice steadily ripens. Readily he gained and sustained it. Yet his particular glory was the glory of his Mozartean song. In kind and quality, it fitly companioned the Berlioz of the "Fantastic Symphony," the Wagner, even, of the prelude to "The Mastersingers."

H. T. PARKER

...ant Colors

And there is the thought of the gorgeousness of her dress, the glint of the jewels which are taken from her, and finally when Istar, deprived of one after one of her garments, stands forth in all the splendor of her nudity. D'Indy makes his orchestra throb and glow with a thousand radiant colors. It is a passage — this apostrophe to a beauty not seen by the crowd or known to those who have not come into contact with

RDAY, MAY 1, 19

...e pure spirit of art—which makes the ...roat tighten when the cry of longing ... heard for the last time and the ...rings hymn the triumph of love. To ...is music, with its supreme logic and ...orification of art, its miracles of work...anship, its elevation to a sublime ideal, ...e does indeed bow the knee.

The concluding performance of the ...Meistersinger' overture was one sing...arly just to the music, singularly for...nate in the choice of tempi, in the ...arm, lyrical character of the love ...usic, the humor of the fugue, of the ...nclusion. In certain passages, it is ...ue, a part for a trombone or a trumpet, ...t in itself important, was over-empha...zed. Otherwise this reading of the ...Meistersinger" overture was one of the ...eat readings of this score which Sym...hony audiences have known.

MONITOR, BOSTON, U.S.

May 1

MUSIC

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-fourth and last concert of the present season on April 30 with the following program:

Berlioz .....Fantastic Symphony
Mozart .....Recitative and Aria
d'Indy ......"Istar"
Frank Bridge, Sonnet for voice and orchestra.
Wagner, Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
The soloist was John McCormack.

We venture to say that the music of Berlioz has never been so well played in Boston as during the past season. Mr. Monteux may well be said to have revealed this composer to us. He has played this music with conviction and sincerity, and we have learned from him that Berlioz was not simply a juggler in orchestral tone, a searcher for the picturesque and bizarre; but that he was above all a poetic, sensitive genius whose music is quite capable of exciting and holding the listener's interest apart from the excessively romantic programs which were attached to it by its composer.

No program is necessary to understand the "Scene in the Meadows" in all its calm and peaceful beauty, which is only intensified by the pianissimo rolls of the drums. Neither is a

SATURDAY, MAY

...nted synopsis essential to the com...hension of the wild and brutally ...listic "Witches' Sabbath." All this ...d more has Mr. Monteux shown. ...D'Indy's "Istar" variations added one ...re to the already long list of au...oritative interpretations of works ...the modern French school which it ...s been our privilege to hear during ...e past season. These variations, so ...en thought cold and unimaginative, ...wed with warmth and color under ... Monteux's baton. Frank Bridge's ...net for voice and orchestra aroused ...lesire to hear more of the music of ...s gifted and original composer. ...The Boston symphony programs of ...s season have been of consistent ...rit. Though there has been an ...dent search for novelty, no piece ...s been selected which had only ...velty to recommend it. American ...mposers have had a fair share of ...ention, and their works have been ...en with a care indicating a desire ...bring forward their merits. Many ...ks long absent from these pro...ms have been revived for the sym...ny patrons; and lastly, the classics ...e been interpreted with a new en...siasm which has made them once ...e vividly alive. Boston should take ...de in its orchestra and above all ...s conductor, who has so bravely ... intelligently guided its course.

Here in Boston

Mr. Monteux has changed his plans for the spring and summer. He will not return to Paris as he originally proposed. For the present he will remain in Boston where there is much to do in preparation for the Symphony Concerts of next season.

Frequenters of the Pop Concerts, when they return to Symphony Hall next Monday will discover that a bar—or rather what passes for one in these days of sweet slops—has been installed in the little used corridor back of the lower balcony.

Mr. Neumann, the player upon the kettle-drums, who was persuaded into the recent secession from the Symphony Orchestra, returns to his place today, there to continue indefinitely. For years he has been one of the ornaments of the band and well deserves re-instatement. On the other had, it is definitely decided that Mr. Heim, the former first trumpet, will not be taken back.

Herald May 2

Statistics of the Symphony Season of 1919-1920

Forty-nine composers were represented at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season that closed last night.

Beethoven, 10 times; Wagner, 8; Debussy and Schumann, 5 each; Berlioz and Mozart, 4; Brahms, Handel, Haydn, d'Indy, Mendelssohn, Schubert, 3 each; Bloch, Borodin, Dvorak, Franck, Liszt, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Saint-Saens, 2 each; while Albeniz, Bach, Balakireff, Converse, Frank Bridge, Carpenter, Chabrier, Chadwick, Charpentier, Chausson, Converse, Dukas, Dupare, Enesco, Gilbert, Glazounoff, Gluck, Grieg, Griffes, Goldmark, Lalo, MacDowell, Malipiero, Rabaud, Rachmaninoff, Ravel, Schmitt, Smetana, Stojowski, Stravinsky, Svendsen, Verdi, were each represented once.

The American composer cannot complain that he was ignored by Mr. Monteux: Carpenter, Chadwick, Converse, Gilbert, Griffes, MacDowell.

There were 47 performances of works by German-Austrian composers, with Liszt the Hungarian included.

There were 23 performances of works by French composers; 10 of Russian compositions; 6 of American; 2 of Scandinavian; 2 of Italian; 1 of Spanish; 2 of Swiss.

We have not included Mr. Stojowski, who, born in Poland, has lived in the United States for at least 15 years; while Enesco, a Roumanian by birth, is practically a Parisian.

Many new or old but unfamiliar works were produced.

ORCHESTRAL COMPOSITIONS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME

Converse—Symphony in C minor.
Griffes—"The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" 2

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN AMERICA

Debussy—Fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra (Alfred Cortot, pianist).
Debussy—"Jeux," a Danced Poem.
D'Indy—"Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico," No. 2, op. 70, ... 3

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON

Symphonies, Symphonic Poems, Etc.

Albeniz—"Catalonia," Folk Suite in three parts, No. 1.
Chadwick—"The Angel of Death," Symphonic Poem.
Debussy—Petite Suite.
Stojowski—Symphony in D minor..... 4

Concertos

Carpenter—Concertino for pianoforte and orchestra (E. Robert Schmitz, pianist).
Rachmaninoff—Concerto for pianoforte with orchestra, D minor, No. 3 (S. Rachmaninoff, pianist)..... 2

Arias and Songs

Bloch—Psalms 137 and 114 (Povla Frijsh).
Bridge, F.—Sonnet, "Blow Out, You Bugles." (John McCormack).
Franck—Aria, "Les Rois dont vous vantez la Gloire" (Povla Frijsh)... 4

10

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME AT THESE CONCERTS

Symphonies, Symphonic Poems, Etc.

Borodin—Polovtskian Dances, from "Prince Igor."
Dukas—Overture to "Polyeucte."
Gilbert—"The Dance in Place Congo," Symphonic Poem.
Glazounoff—"Stenka Razine."
Haydn—Symphony, "La Reine de France."
Moussorgsky—"A Night on Bald Mountain," Fantaisie for orchestra.
Rimsky-Korsakoff—"Le Coq d'Or"; Introduction and March.
Stravinsky—Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" 8

Concertos

Handel—Concerto in F major for organ and orchestra (Joseph Bonnet)..... 1

Choral Works

Debussy—"La Damoiselle Elue," lyric poem (Ethel Frank, soprano; Clara-mond Thompson, contralto, and chorus) 1

Arias and Songs

Beethoven—"Nature's Adoration," with orchestra (Louise Homer).
Duparc—"Invitation a Voyage," with orchestra (Povla Frijsh).
Moussorgsky—"Hopak," with orchestra (Povla Frijsh).
Schumann—Bride's Song No. 1, Bride's Song No. 2, with orchestra (Margaret Matzenauer) 5

15

The soloists were as follows:

Sopranos—Mmes. Frijsh, Matzenauer.... 2
Contralto—Mme. Homer 1
Tenor—Mr. McCormack 1
Pianists—Messrs. Cortot, Fox, Ganz, Gebhard, Ornstein, Rachmaninoff, Schmitz 7
Violinists—Messrs. Fradkin, Kreisler and Spalding 3
Violoncellist—Mr. Bedetti (two performances) 1
Organist—Mr. Bonnet 1

16

Mr. Denayer played the viola in Berlioz's "Harold in Italy."

Mr. Schmitz played for the first time in Boston. Mmes. Frijsh and Matzenauer, and Messrs. Fox and Ornstein took part here for the first time in a Symphony concert.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE FINAL AFTERNOON OF THE SEASON

Tribune May 1

Less Tribute to Mr. Monteux Than His Signal Services, Throughout the Year, Have Deserved — Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" in Vivid Voice, d'Indy's "Istar" Revived and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" in Its Old Place as Proud and Joyous Ending—Mr. McCormack and Perfections of Mozartean Song

A MODEST as well as an able and tireless conductor is Mr. Monteux. By his works, and by his works only, have his audiences known and applauded him from last October into this present May. The more the satisfaction, then, that the programme of the final afternoon concert of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday, gave room for not a few of his best abilities. The less the satisfaction also, as some bystanders noted the incidents of the day, that his hearers, filling Symphony Hall to the last seat, did not return him longer and warmer personal tribute. True, they clapped him heartily when he came first to his place and when, with Mr. McCormack as "assisting artist," he returned to it after the intermission. Plentiful, too, were the plaudits at each pause in Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," presumably for piece and performance both; while at the end, the standing orchestra received its usual meed. On the other hand, the audience received rather coolly d'Indy's tone-poem, "Istar," and in vivid voice; while it lingered no longer after the final number—the prelude to Wagner's opera, "The Mastersingers"—than was necessary to take courteous leave of the conductor. At the end of many a season, the public of Friday afternoons has tarried for heartier farewell to one or another of his predecessors. But the concert of yesterday was not short. . . .

On many a score, moreover, Mr. Monteux's deserts for the day and for the orchestral year in retrospect, ran high. He came to his post last autumn when the concerts were at lower ebb than they had been in long memory. The helpless provinciality of the passing Rabaud, the lingering prejudices of wartime, had stripped the programmes of catholicity, even of variety. They had become lists of formula and routine, like to those which Messieurs Pierné and Chevillard—but not the "intruding" and also eager Monsieur Ehéné-Baton—impose upon the patient public of Paris. From the beginning to the end of the musical year, as the usual tables in the final programme-book attest, Mr. Monteux has restored the "active repertory" to familiar and established standards. His choice of pieces has ranged widely, interestingly; he has bidden his hearers to many novel, to not a few unfamiliar numbers, and almost every one has well deserved introduction or revival. He has assembled music for its merits as music, be it French, German, Italian, Czech, American, and not by reason of the nationality or the associations of the composers or the policies of their Governments through the years of war. He has whisked away the bigotries of that unhappy time. Once more the Symphony Conterts are catholic, with doors flung wide to new music. Once more a cosmopolitan man of the world, a well-read musician, a receptive and ambitious conductor orders them.

Similarly Mr. Monteux received the orchestra when, however able the band, individual by individual, the mediocrity and the mildness of the temporary Rabaud had dulled and relaxed standards of performance. Reasonably, courteously, but unyieldingly, the new conductor restored discipline. Once more rehearsal became unremitting. Anew the orchestra yielded the particular eloquence of the music in hand. If Mr. Monteux spared not his men, as little did he spare himself. His ear is keen; his hand often sensitive; gradually the band regained the beauty, the plasticity, the ardor of tone that had been familiar distinctions. Again it became the revealing, characterizing, enhancing voice of the chosen music, especially in the dramatic, pictorial, romantic, warmly colored, sharply rhythmed and generally high-pitched pieces in which the conductor excels. The orchestra was well on the way to these bettered standards when the strife and the secession of March again shook it. Mr. Monteux met the emergency with quiet resolution, with tranquil but inexhaustible energy. When his forces were diminished he yet made interesting programmes, and to the utmost of his own and the band's abilities maintained the quality of performance. When he and others had newly recruited the orchestra, and often for the better, he resumed in the spring—and nothing daunted—the assimilating work he had begun in the autumn. For a month past the outcome has weekly and richly praised him. Again the Symphony Orchestra goes forward; again its future in the season next to come sets fair. With reason the programme-book yesterday listed the personnel of the band; with just satisfaction the management reported scarcely a lapse in the renewal of subscriptions. Now and again in the forty years of the Symphony Concerts more eminent conductors than Mr. Monteux may have graced them. Not one, however, has done them so signal service. Double the plaudits he received yesterday would have fallen short of just reward.

Continued on Following Page

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Continued from Preceding Page

Programme and performance were alike characteristic of the conductor at his best. He began with Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," played once and remarkably on the eve of the secession; then necessarily set aside; now repeated at just and general request. It does not return so often to Symphony Hall as to become hackneyed. For nearly a century, in fact, the intrinsic vitality of the music has forestalled such fate. No more does it come back to the concert room of 1920 as interesting curiosity of a romantic composer and a romantic day in the arts. Rather, it still speaks for itself in highly individual and keenly penetrating voice. Fortunate in the years since Berlioz, in the years before him, the composer who could invent such a motiv and so enrich it as that which embodies the haunting woman, the "fixed idea" of this symphony of drugged dream. Fortunate, again, and over like span of time, the composer who could imagine and accomplish music of such grim, graphic, fantastic power as "The March to the Scaffold" whether it rage in outburst or drone in sombre repetition. Fortunate, once more the composer, through the long line of two centuries, who from the poetry of mind and heart could summon such beauty of design as that which shapes the scene "In The Fields" and such poignancy of utterance as that which there speaks mood and picture.

Fortunate, finally, the composer yesterday, today and forever, who can write with such individuality as that which still vitalizes at least three of the divisions of the "Fantastic Symphony." Agreed that the episode of the ball has waned into commonplace, albeit still faintly flaming with romantic glow. Agreed that the finale of the witches' Sabbath has declined into what seems now the routine of romantic extravagance. But the rest as already set down, the rest through which flows the long, lean, incisive line of the music, the marvellous directness of imagery and expression, the high intensity of mood, emotion, utterance, the sinewy harmonies, the vivid timbres, the melody that is unescapable voice of the passion or the vision behind! It is accounted the chief glory of Musorgsky that in his music the thing to be expressed and the expression have become inextricably fused in single impression upon the hearer. Surely the like glory falls to Berlioz in this "Fantastic Symphony" and the more amply because, while the Russian is avowed realist, the Frenchman is as frankly romantic. There is music of Berlioz that has withered—the symphony of Harold and Italy, heard afresh only last autumn; but not the "Fantastic Symphony" when it is played as Mr. Monteux and the orchestra played it yesterday. It has been the custom to say that only Mr. Weingartner, of living conductors, truly divines Berlioz's music, summons it anew to vivid and puissant voice. Mr. Monteux now parts the distinction with him.

Conductor and band shone again in the revival of Mr. d'Indy's "Istar," through nearly eight years unheard in Symphony Hall. The form of the music is characteristic of the familiar, the classified composer—seven successive variations with the theme whence they spring unheard until in the finale it emerges first in naked unisons and then in full harmonic pa... Hear the "cerebral" d'Indy even in ... relatively young years of the ninetie... makes music, first of all, an exerc... the intellect. Another d'Indy, ho... speaks in this "Istar" as tone-p... d'Indy of clearly and pervadingly se... imagination. Upon a clew from Pho... legend, he imagines the goddess de... ing into the underworld where her ... is held captive. Seven closed porta... her way. Each she passes, but at e... the guardian of the gate strips her of je... or of veil. Only in the stripped splend... of her revealed body may she finally c... quer. Not only sensuous imagery ... sensuous treatment. The jewels glint, t... mantles shimmer in the motion and t... color of the music. With harmonies a... timbres Mr. d'Indy is almost voluptuou... There is cumulative progress; there is t... haunting and wistful background of t... quest. The ear hears the music as the eye sees one of Moreau's jewelled palpitating pictures of old legend—of Phaeton, of Salome. Yet d'Indy would not be d'Indy were not his inverted form, his cumulative processes contrived and adroit reflection of the course of his tonal narrative. Sensuous he may will to be, but the old cerebral Adam within him does timely get its way. In such music of color, of fantastical imagery it is Mr. Monteux's way to excel. Nor did he and the orchestra fall short in the Prelude to "The Mastersingers"—music of unfolding and manifold instrumental song as only genius may write it; music of the richness, the joy, the pride of life as only high-pitched and amply dowered spirit may know and release it; music that is very pæan to the arts it exemplifies. There is no piece so meet to end the Symphony Concerts. It was stirring to hear it restored to what is, almost, its traditional place in them.

There were interludes also—interludes of Mr. McCormack in declamation and song out of Mozart; in a sonnet of Rupert Brooke to the glory of those who to death in the war gave all the promise of their future living, who, so doing, restored noble passions to a world as sorely needing them as it has soon forgotten them. Frank Bridge, of the younger generation of British composers set the verse for tenor voice and orchestra—straightforwardly, sinewily, man-fashion, but without too much distinction and with overemphasis recurring. In these interludes, however, more significant was the manner than the matter of Mr. McCormack's song. When he is on his mettle as he was yesterday, when he holds every ability in elastic command, when circumstance and audience plainly stir him, he is incomparable singer, save only with Mme. Sembrich in our time, of the music of Mozart. Lengthy measures of declamation—"Non Piu! Tutto Ascoltae"—precede the air and rondo—"Non Temer, Amato Bene"—which he sang yesterday as the composer interpolated them into his early and usually overlooked opera, "Idomeneo."

LAST SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives Closing Concert of Winter

Record May 1

By J. V. CLARK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closes its season, a period of storm and stress, with its concerts of yesterday and today. The program is Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony; a little known Mozart aria, d'Indy's "Istar," symphonic variations; Frank Bridge's setting of Rupert Brooke's sonnet, "Blow Out, You Bugles," and Wagner's overture to "The Meistersingers."

The symphony was played at one performance this year; the second performance was interrupted by the symphonic strike. The work then, as yesterday, was brilliantly performed. One of the great works of the French repertoire it has been singularly absent from our programs. The d'Indy variations are gorgeous and perplexing, a joy to the dissector. The Wagner overture is one of the pages of musical literature that is almost incomparable.

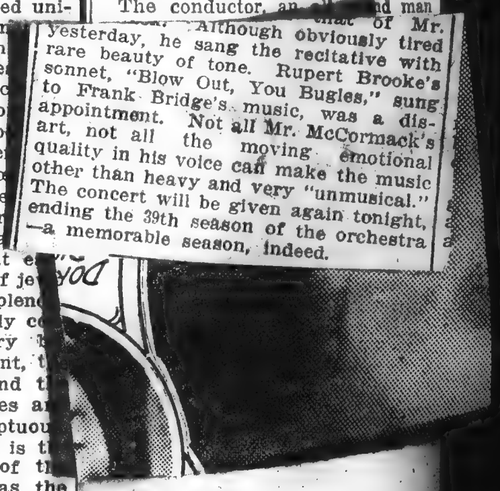
But the Mozart and Bridge music! Poor John McCormack struggled with this music, but even his delicious voice, his consummate art and his personal popularity could not make it, or his performance, striking. The Mozart music is some that he has dug up. Possibly its ornateness appealed to the tenor as a tour de force. He sang it with as much perfection as he has sung other Mozart music here—witness his singing of "Giovanni"—but it left the auditor unmoved.

Bridge Music

The music that Bridge has written for the Brooke poem seems formless in comparison with the sonnet form in which the verses are written. Bridge, a man of great talent, can well be heard here in music other than that played for Mr. McCormack. How much music has ever been written for sonnets that better the sonnets themselves? Why not recite the sonnet, if it must be dragged from the library into public places? Mr. McCormack is to be commended for attempting to get from the beaten path, but let him, when he returns from his travels, choose other paths and bridges than those in his current repertoire.

The orchestra, we repeat what we have said at other times, is once more itself. Nearly all places vacated by strikers have been filled. The orchestra now plays so well that only an expert could detect the inroads made by internal troubles earlier in the year.

The conductor, an ... and man ... that of Mr. ... Yesterday, he sang the recitative with ... rare beauty of tone. Rupert Brooke's sonnet, "Blow Out, You Bugles," sung to Frank Bridge's music, was a disappointment. Not all Mr. McCormack's art, not all the moving emotional quality in his voice can make the music other than heavy and very "unmusical." The concert will be given again tonight, ending the 39th season of the orchestra —a memorable season, indeed.



Unclouded, unbroken, Mr. McCormack sustained the long line of the recitative; impeccably he placed every pause, shaped and adjusted every phrase. His diction was clarity itself, while at every turn his tones took color from the sentiment of the verse. Equally adroit of contour and of expression went the unfolding periods. He passed to the air; and he outdid himself in grace of melodic line, in loveliness of phrase, in the melting of contour into contour, in the play of sentiment as in undulation upon the whole. He ended with the rondo in traceries of tone more delicate than even those which the violin was weaving between the periods in Mozart's gossamer figures. The perfect art of Mozartean song, inset within a voice that yesterday did it matchless service, Brooke's and Bridge's sonnet invited Mr. McCormack's larger and more heroic vein —the vein which maturity of mind, heart, art and voice steadily ripens. Readily he gained and sustained it. Yet his particular glory was the glory of his Mozartean song. In kind and quality, it fitly companioned the Berlioz of the "Fantastic Symphony," the Wagner, even, of the prelude to "The Mastersingers."

H. T. PARKER

SYMPHONY ENDS NOTABLE YEAR

Adv May 2

John McCormack Shares Honors With Monteux in Last Concerts

By E. F. HARKINS.

Half of the final Symphony program of the season was taken up with a repetition of Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," is if to invite comparison between the orchestra of today and that of two months ago. Anyhow, the repetition served to call attention to the building up that has been going on since the Fradkin flare-up and the consequent walk out of nearly one-third of the organization.

The personnel was printed for the first time in several weeks. The list contained ninety names. At least ten more will be required to bring the membership up to the ante-bellum standard, when in numbers and in virtuoso qualities the orchestra ranked with the best in the world. The reconstruction work will continue through Spring and Summer. Such work has been done successfully before, and it is to be hoped it will be done wih equal success this time.

The Berlioz work, repeated "by request," proved the sound musicianship of Mr. Monteux, and at the close of the performance the conductor and his men were given an ovation. The symphony has dry spots, especially in the "Scene in the Meadows." Berlioz, in lugubrious mood, does not spare his hearers, taking them over every inch of the ground, complaining all the while about his false "lady friend." The "March to the Scaffold" was played with thrilling effect. D'Indy's symphonic poem, "Istar," and the overture to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg" were the other orchestra numbers. "Istar" is still cavire except to the musician who appreciates ingenious technic and has the imagination to follow the composer's subtle tone pictures of Istar's disrobing on her way to Hades. The Wagner overture is always welcome.

John McCormack, the soloist at these last concerts of the season, chose to sing a Mozart number, and Frank Bridge's war song, "Blow Out, You Bugles," with words by Rupert Brooke, who died aboard a French hospital ship in the Aegean Sea in 1915. It is doubtful if any other living tenor could have matched McCormack's singing of two selections so wide apart in every respect. The Mozart selection included the scene "Non Piu! Tutto Ascoltae," and the Rondo, "Non Temer, Amato Bene,'" written for a private performance of Mozart's opera, "Idomeneo." The Scene calls for such suavity of tone and style as only the most accomplished lyric tenors have mastered—very few, besides Mr. McCormack, in the last dozen years. The Rondo is more dramatic, and it was at this point that the soloist was least impressive, possibly because his voice is tired after a long season.

But the distinguished soloist sang the Bridge song splendidly, ennobling the poet's lofty sentiment about those who heroically "poured out the red, sweet wine of youth." Unfortunately, the music is not worthy of the poem. Even McCormack's well-nigh perfect diction and mellifluous eloquence could not lift the number above the lyric conventionalities of the day.

The tenor was warmly applauded, for such artistic singing, as his is a rare event, even at Symphony concerts.

The Pop Concerts Start Next Week at Symphony Hall, Under the Direction of Agide Jacchia, Conductor. So Far as We Know, This Is the First Interior View to Be Published of One of These Concerts, and Was Taken at the War Camp Community Service Night Last June.

Heald May 2

THE POPS ARE HERE

Tomorrow night in Symphony Hall there will start what promises to be the biggest season of Pop concerts in the 35 years of their history. An orchestra of 80 musicians will present, under Mr. Jacchia's leadership, a record list of popular but worth while programs. Undaunted by the clamp of prohibition, the cafe service at the Pops last season was worked harder than ever before. To an unprecedented number of patrons $15,000 worth of "ginger pop" and the like was served, as against $11,000 worth in the last year of beer. Never were so many special nights dedicated to colleges, clubs, conventions, etc. In each of these respects the Pops will go still stronger this year. To meet the overflowing demand for refreshments, a bar is being installed in the large foyer in front of the first balcony. The prices of tables and seats have not been changed. A number of organizations have already arranged to spend some special nights at the Pops. For Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Commerce has requisitioned the entire hall. There will also be Amherst night, Roxbury Latin night, Simmons College, Boston University and Harvard nights; Boston City Club, Commercial Travelers, Professional Women's Club, Graduate Nurses, Euclid lodge, New England Conservatory, Insurance Society of Massachusetts, and National Bankers' Convention nights. Most of these nights are open to the public. A few dates still remain open for such purposes—but only a few. The programs of this week follow:

MONDAY

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Song without Words.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia "La Boheme".....Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Organ Solo, Finale 6th Symphony.....Widor
Mr. Snow
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"..Saint-Saens
Canzone.....Van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz"...Mascagni
Hungarian Dance No. 1, in G minor...Brahms

TUESDAY

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba"...Gounod
Overture to "Il Guarany".....Gomez
Capriccio.....Scarlatti-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Dance of the Hours.....Ponchielli
Harp Solo, "In Springtime".....Holy
Mr. Holy
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Finale from the Fourth Symphony.Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
Enfantillage.....Van Westerhout
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Hungarian Dance No. 3, in F major...Brahms

WEDNESDAY

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"..Mozart
Cortege de Bacchus.....Delibes
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Violin solo, Rondo.....Mozart-Kreisler
Mr. Theodorowicz
Serenade.....Schubert
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".....Vollstedt
Hungarian Dance No. 5, in G minor...Brahms

THURSDAY, Operatic Night

Triumphal March, from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltzes from "The Rose Cavalier".....Strauss
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Polonaise from "Eugin Onegin".Tschaikowsky
"Depuis le Jour" from "Louise"...Charpentier
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff".....Mascagni
Intermezzo, Act III, "Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
"Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda"
.....Ponchielli
FRIDAY
Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fucik
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Madrigal.....Caccini
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
First Hungarian Rhapsody, in F major...Liszt
Flute Solo:
Romance sans Paroles.....Guilmant
Polonaise.....Possard
Mr. Brooke
Prelude.....Rachmaninoff
Scenes Pittoresques.....Massenet
a, Air de Ballet. b, Fete Boheme.
Overture Solennelle, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
Ave Maria, from "Othello".....Verdi
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Slavonic Dance No. 1.....Dvorak
SATURDAY
French Military March.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Masaniello".....Auber
Whispering of the Flowers.....Blon
Fantasia, "Mefistofele".....Boito
Finale of "Scheherazade"....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Minuet for Strings.....Boccherini
Tarantella, Flute Solo.....Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Three Russian Folk Songs.....Arr. by Jacchia
The Marionettes.....Lacombe
Waltz, "The Skaters".....Waldteufel
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"..Tschaikowsky

THE POPS AGAIN

Trans May 1

Spring and Summer Pastime to Be Renewed at Symphony Hall—The Usual Arrangements, with Mr. Jacchia Returning as Conductor Through Widely Ranging Programmes

FOR a thirty-fifth spring and summer, the Pop Concerts will begin on Monday at Symphony Hall to continue there, every evening except Sunday, through Saturday, July 10. Once more the floor will be cleared of rows of seats and tables and chairs will replace them. Again it will be possible to eat at them, to drink at them—whatever the law allows; to smoke at them unmolested. Furthermore, for those who prefer liquid refreshment apart from music, a bar—as bars go nowadays—has been set up at the back of the first balcony. Food and drink at The Pops have long been of the best, and this spring there will be no departure from standard—and also no material increase in prices. According to custom also, the two balconies will be reserved for those who would take the pleasure of the music as at any other concert. The Symphony Orchestra, sixty or seventy strong, as need may require will provide that music; while again Mr. Jacchia returns to lead it. By this time his tireless energy with the band and with the music, his zest for instrumental melody, his fire of rhythm, his communicating verve are an old story. Orchestra and audience alike answer nightly to him.

As in the past, the conductor will make more various and interesting programmes than have any of his predecessors. Operatic overtures, waltzes and marches, occasional vivid fragments from symphonies, frequent fantasias from familiar operas, solo pieces, miniatures, ballet music and a generally pleasing miscellany will all figure upon them. This spring, moreover, Mr. Jacchia has ventured one more innovation—the playing of familiar operatic airs as instrumental numbers. Louise's monologue from Charpentier's like-named opera will be so heard on Thursday, and Desdemona's "Ave Maria" from Verdi's "Othello" on Friday. From that opera also, Mr. Jacchia has lifted the scene of storm and the Moor's eloquent declamation. For Monday evening, as specimen, the conductor has set the following programme:

Military March.....Schubert
Overture to the Opera, "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Song Without Words.....Chaikovsky
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Prelude to the Opera, "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Finale from Sixth Symphony, for Organ..Widor
(Mr. Snow)
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"....Saint-Saëns
Canzone.....Van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
Hungarian Dance No. 1.....Brahms

Trans May 1

THE POPS OPEN MONDAY NIGHT

That famous Boston institution, the pop concerts, will take possession of Symphony Hall, Monday, May 3, to continue nightly except Sundays, for 60 nights. Having attained unprecedented proportions last year, the Pops promise to exceed that record in 1920. Maestro Jacchia's opening set of programs speak for themselves. A symphony orchestra of 80 is ready to give the finest performances under his leadership. To meet the overflowing demand for refreshments, an actual bar is being installed in the large foyer in front of the first balcony. In defiance of the rising cost of living, the prices of tables, of seats reserved and unreserved, will remain as before.

As last season, a record number of special nights have been dedicated to colleges, clubs, conventions and the like. Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Commerce will lead the way. There will follow: Amherst night, Roxbury Latin night, Simmons College, Boston University and Harvard nights, Boston City Club, Commercial Travelers', Professional Women's Club, graduate nurses', Euclid Lodge, New England Conservatory, Insurance Society of Massachusetts and National Bankers' convention nights.

Program for Opening Night

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Song without Words.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia "La Boheme".....Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Gypsy dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Organ solo, finale 6th Symphony.....Widor
Albert W. Snow

Whose Marriage to

Pop Concerts to Open Monday Night

Adv May 1

THAT famous Bostonian institution, the Pop Concerts, will take possession of Symphony Hall tomorrow night and continue nightly, except Sundays, for sixty nights. Having attained unprecedented proportions last year (despite prohibition) the Pops promise to exceed that record in 1920. For every favorable condition that made for successful Pops then has been enhanced. Maestro Jacchia's opening set of programs speak for themselves. A symphony orchestra of eighty is ready to give the finest performances under his leadership. The program for tomorrow night follows:

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Song Without Words.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia "La Boheme".....Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Organ solo, Finale 6th Symphony.....Widor
Albert W. Snow.
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"..Saint-Saens
Canzone.....Van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz"...Mascagni
Hungarian Dance, No. 1, in G minor..Brahms

AGIDE JACCHIA, the popular leader of the Pop Concerts.

THE POPS ARE HERE

That famous Bostonian institution, the Pop Concerts, will take possession of Symphony Hall Monday, May 3, with a grand eclat, to continue nightly except Sundays, for sixty nights. Having attained unprecedented proportions last year (despite prohibition) the Pops promise to exceed that record in 1920. For every favorable condition that made for successful Pops then has been enhanced. Maestro Jacchia's opening set of programs speak for themselves.

A symphony orchestra of eighty is ready to give them the finest performances.

OPENING NIGHT, MONDAY, MAY 3.

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicoli
Song Without Words.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia "La Boheme".....Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Organ Solo, Finale 6th Symphony.....Widor
Albert W. Snow.
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"..Saint-Saens
Canzone.....van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz"...Mascagni
Hungarian Dance, No. 1, in G minor..Brahms

SCHOOL TO SING

Ame May 1

No less than four brand new attractions enter hopefully, the Pops begin their season of ice cream concerts at Symphony Hall, and Walter Hampden proposes to show Boston Shylock as Shakespeare intended him to be.

Cocoa May 1

Pops Are Here

That famous Bostonian institution, the Pop Concerts, will take possession of Symphany Hall Monday, May 3, with a grand eclat, to continue nightly, except Sundays, for 60 nights. Having attained unprecedented proportions last year (despite prohibition) the Pops promise to exceed that record in 1920. For every favorable condition that made for successful Pops then has been enhanced. Mr. Jacchia's opening set of programs speak for themselves. A symphony orchestra of 80 is ready to give them the finest performances under his ebullient leadership. To meet the overflowing demand for refreshments, an actual bar is being installed in the large foyer in front of the first balcony. In defiance of the rising cost of living, the prices of tables, of seats reserved and unreserved, will remain as before. Last season a record number of special nights were dedicated to colleges, clubs, conventions and the like. A still greater number have arranged to celebrate at the Pops this season. Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Com-

SYMPHONY ENDS NOTABLE YEAR

John McCormack Shares Honors With Monteux in Last Concerts

By E. F. HARKINS.

Half of the final Symphony program of the season was taken up with a repetition of Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," is if to invite comparison between the orchestra of today and that of two months ago. Anyhow, the repetition served to call attention to the building up that has been going on since the Fradkin flare-up and the consequent walk out of nearly one-third of the organization.

The personnel was printed for the first time in several weeks. The list contained ninety names. At least ten more will be required to bring the membership up to the ante-bellum standard, when in numbers and in virtuoso qualities the orchestra ranked with the best in the world. The reconstruction work will continue through Spring and Summer. Such work has been done successfully before, and it is to be hoped it will be done wih equal success this time.

The Berlioz work, repeated "by request," proved the sound musicianship of Mr. Monteux, and at the close of the performance the conductor and his men were given an ovation. The symphony has dry spots, especially in the "Scene in the Meadows." Berlioz, in lugubrious mood, does not spare his hearers, taking them over every inch of the ground, complaining all the while about his false "lady friend." The "March to the Scaffold" was played with thrilling effect. D'Indy's symphonic poem, "Istar," and the overture to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg" were the other orchestra numbers. "Istar" is still cavire except to the musician who appreciates ingenious technic and has the imagination to follow the composer's subtle tone pictures of Istar's disrobing on her way to Hades. The Wagner overture is always welcome.

John McCormack, the soloist at these last concerts of the season, chose to sing a Mozart number, and Frank Bridge's war song, "Blow Out, You Bugles," with words by Rupert Brooke, who died aboard a French hospital ship in the Aegean Sea in 1915. It is doubtful if any other living tenor could have matched McCormack's singing of two selections so wide apart in every respect. The Mozart selection included the scene "Non Piu! Tutto Ascoltae," and the Rondo, "Non Temer, Amato Bene," written for a private performance of Mozart's opera, "Idomeneo." The Scene calls for such suavity of tone and style as only the most accomplished lyric tenors have mastered—very few, besides Mr. McCormack, in the last dozen years. The Rondo is more dramatic, and it was at this point that the soloist was least impressive, possibly because his voice is tired after a long season.

But the distinguished soloist sang the Bridge song splendidly, ennobling the poet's lofty sentiment about those who heroically "poured out the red, sweet wine of youth." Unfortunately, the music is not worthy of the poem. Even McCormack's well-nigh perfect diction and mellifluous eloquence could not lift the number above the lyric conventionalities of the day.

The tenor was warmly applauded, for such artistic singing, as his is a rare event, even at Symphony concerts.

The Pop Concerts Start Next Week at Symphony Hall, Under the Direction of Agide Jacchia, Conductor. So Far as We Know, This Is the First Interior View to Be Published of One of These Concerts, and Was Taken at the War Camp Community Service Night Last June.

THE POPS ARE HERE

Tomorrow night in Symphony Hall there will start what promises to be the biggest season of Pop concerts in the 35 years of their history. An orchestra of 80 musicians will present, under Mr. Jacchia's leadership, a record list of popular but worth while programs. Undaunted by the clamp of prohibition, the cafe service at the Pops last season was worked harder than ever before. To an unprecedented number of patrons $15,000 worth of "ginger pop" and the like was served, as against $11,000 worth in the last year of beer. Never were so many special nights dedicated to colleges, clubs, conventions, etc. In each of these respects the Pops will go still stronger this year. To meet the overflowing demand for refreshments, a bar is being installed in the large foyer in front of the first balcony. The prices of tables and seats have not been changed. A number of organizations have already arranged to spend some special nights at the Pops. For Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Commerce has requisitioned the entire hall. There will also be Amherst night, Roxbury Latin night, Simmons College, Boston University and Harvard nights; Boston City Club, Commercial Travelers, Professional Women's Club, Graduate Nurses, Euclid lodge, New England Conservatory, Insurance Society of Massachusetts, and National Bankers' Convention nights. Most of these nights are open to the public. A few dates still remain open for such purposes—but only a few. The programs of this week follow:

MONDAY

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Song without Words.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia "La Boheme".....Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Organ Solo, Finale 6th Symphony.....Widor
Mr. Snow
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"..Saint-Saens
Canzone.....Van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz"....Mascagni
Hungarian Dance No. 1, in G minor....Brahms

TUESDAY

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba"...Gounod
Overture to "Il Guarany".....Gomez
Capriccio.....Scarlatti-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Dance of the Hours.....Ponchielli
Harp Solo, "In Springtime".....Holy
Mr. Holy
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Finale from the Fourth Symphony.Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
Enfantillage.....Van Westerhout
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Hungarian Dance No. 3, in F major....Brahms

WEDNESDAY

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"..Mozart
Cortege de Bacchus.....Delibes
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Violin solo, Rondo.....Mozart-Kreisler
Mr. Theodorowicz
Serenade.....Schubert
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".....Vollstedt
Hungarian Dance No. 5, in G minor...Brahms

THURSDAY, Operatic Night

Triumphal March, from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltzes from "The Rose Cavalier".....Strauss
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Polonaise from "Eugin Onegin"..Tschaikowsky
"Depuis le Jour" from "Louise"...Charpentier
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff".....Mascagni
Intermezzo, Act III., "Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
"Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda"
.....Ponchielli

FRIDAY

Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fuelk
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Madrigal.....Caccini
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
First Hungarian Rhapsody, in F major...Lizst
Flute solo:
Romance sans Paroles.....Guilmant
Polonaise.....Possard
Mr. Brooke
Prelude.....Rachmaninoff
Scenes Pittoresques.....Massenet
a. Air de Ballet. b. Fete Boheme.
Overture Solennelle, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
Ave Maria, from "Othello".....Verdi
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Slavonic Dance No. 1.....Dvorak

SATURDAY

French Military March.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Mascagnello".....Amber
Whispering of the Flowers.....Blon
Fantasia, "Mefistofele".....Boito
Finale of "Scheherazade"....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Minuet for Strings.....Boccherini
Tarantella, Flute Solo.....Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Three Russian Folk Songs.....Arr. by Jacchia
The Marionettes.....Lacombe
Waltz, "The Skaters".....Waldteufel
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"..Tschaikowsky

THE POPS AGAIN

Spring and Summer Pastime to Be Renewed at Symphony Hall—The Usual Arrangements, with Mr. Jacchia Returning as Conductor Through Widely Ranging Programmes

FOR a thirty-fifth spring and summer, the Pop Concerts will begin on Monday at Symphony Hall to continue there, every evening except Sunday, through Saturday, July 10. Once more the floor will be cleared of rows of seats and tables and chairs will replace them. Again it will be possible to eat at them, to drink at them—whatever the law allows; to smoke at them unmolested. Furthermore, for those who prefer liquid refreshment apart from music, a bar—as bars go nowadays—has been set up at the back of the first balcony. Food and drink at The Pops have long been of the best, and this spring there will be no departure from standard—and also no material increase in prices. According to custom also, the two balconies will be reserved for those who would take the pleasure of the music as at any other concert. The Symphony Orchestra, sixty or seventy strong, as need may require will provide that music; while again Mr. Jacchia returns to lead it. By this time his tireless energy with the band and with the music, his zest for instrumental melody, his fire of rhythm, his communicating verve are an old story. Orchestra and audience alike answer nightly to him.

As in the past, the conductor will make more various and interesting programmes than have any of his predecessors. Operatic overtures, waltzes and marches, occasional vivid fragments from symphonies, frequent fantasias from familiar operas, solo pieces, miniatures, ballet music and a generally pleasing miscellany will all figure upon them. This spring, moreover, Mr. Jacchia has ventured one more innovation—the playing of familiar operatic airs as instrumental numbers. Louise's monologue from Charpentier's like-named opera will be so heard on Thursday, and Desdemona's "Ave Maria" from Verdi's "Othello" on Friday. From that opera also, Mr. Jacchia has lifted the scene of storm and the Moor's eloquent declamation. For Monday evening, as specimen, the conductor has set the following programme:

Military March.....Schubert
Overture to the Opera, "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Song Without Words.....Chaikovsky
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Prelude to the Opera, "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Finale from Sixth Symphony, for Organ..Widor
(Mr. Snow)
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"....Saint-Saëns
Canzone.....Van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
Hungarian Dance No. 1.....Brahms

THE POPS OPEN MONDAY NIGHT

That famous Boston institution, the pop concerts, will take possession of Symphony Hall, Monday, May 3, to continue nightly except Sundays, for 60 nights. Having attained unprecedented proportions last year, the Pops promise to exceed that record in 1920. Maestro Jacchia's opening set of programs speak for themselves. A symphony orchestra of 80 is ready to give the finest performances under his leadership. To meet the overflowing demand for refreshments, an actual bar is being installed in the large foyer in front of the first balcony. In defiance of the rising cost of living, the prices of tables, of seats reserved and unreserved, will remain as before.

As last season, a record number of special nights have been dedicated to colleges, clubs, conventions and the like. Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Commerce will lead the way. There will follow: Amherst night, Roxbury Latin night, Simmons College, Boston University and Harvard nights, Boston City Club, Commercial Travelers', Professional Women's Club, graduate nurses', Euclid Lodge, New England Conservatory, Insurance Society of Massachusetts and National Bankers' convention nights.

Program for Opening Night

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Song without Words.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia "La Boheme".....Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Gypsy dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Organ solo, finale 6th Symphony.....Widor
Albert W. Snow

Pops Are Here

That famous Bostonian institution, the Pop Concerts, will take possession of Symphany Hall Monday, May 3, with a grand eclat, to continue nightly, except Sundays, for 60 nights. Having attained unprecedented proportions last year (despite prohibition) the Pops promise to exceed that record in 1920. For every favorable condition that made for successful Pops then has been enhanced. Mr. Jacchia's opening set of programs speak for themselves. A symphony orchestra of 80 is ready to give them the finest performances under his ebullient leadership. To meet the overflowing demand for refreshments, an actual bar is being installed in the large foyer in front of the first balcony. In defiance of the rising cost of living, the prices of tables, of seats reserved and unreserved, will remain as before. Last season a record number of special nights were dedicated to colleges, clubs, conventions and the like. A still greater number have arranged to celebrate at the Pops this season. Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Com-

Pop Concerts to Open Monday Night

THAT famous Bostonian institution, the Pop Concerts, will take possession of Symphony Hall tomorrow night and continue nightly, except Sundays, for sixty nights. Having attained unprecedented proportions last year (despite prohibition) the Pops promise to exceed that record in 1920. For every favorable condition that made for successful Pops then has been enhanced. Maestro Jacchia's opening set of programs speak for themselves. A symphony orchestra of eighty is ready to give the finest performances under his leadership. The program for tomorrow night follows:

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Song Without Words.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia "La Boheme".....Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Organ solo, Finale 6th Symphony.....Widor
Albert W. Snow.
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"..Saint-Saens
Canzone.....Van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz"...Mascagni
Hungarian Dance, No. 1, in G minor..Brahms

AGIDE JACCHIA, the popular leader of the Pop Concerts.

THE POPS ARE HERE

That famous Bostonian institution, the Pop Concerts, will take possession of Symphony Hall Monday, May 3, with a grand eclat, to continue nightly, except Sundays, for sixty nights. Having attained unprecedented proportions last year (despite prohibition) the Pops promise to exceed that record in 1920. For every favorable condition that made for successful Pops then has been enhanced. Maestro Jacchia's opening set of programs speak for themselves.

A symphony orchestra of eighty is ready to give them the finest performances.

OPENING NIGHT, MONDAY, MAY 3.

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicoli
Song Without Words.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia "La Boheme".....Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Organ Solo, Finale 6th Symphony.....Widor
Albert W. Snow.
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"..Saint-Saens
Canzone.....Van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz"...Mascagni
Hungarian Dance, No. 1, in G minor..Brahms

No less than four brand new attractions enter hopefully, the Pops begin their season of ice cream concerts at Symphony Hall, and Walter Hampden proposes to show Boston Shylock as Shakespeare intended him to be.

MPHONY

Closing Con-Winter

CLARK

nphony Orchestra period of storm concerts of yes-
The program is Symphony; a litt aria, d'Indy's variations; Frank Rupert Brooke's
You Bugles," and to "The Meister-

as played at one year; the second nterrupted by the
The work then, brilliantly pere great works of re it has been sin-
m our programs.
ons are gorgeous
y to the dissector.
re is one of the literature that is c.

nd Bridge music!
ck struggled with ven his delicious te art and his per-uld not make it,
e, striking. The one that he has ts ornateness
as a tour de force much perfection her Mozart music
nging of "Giovanauditor unmoved.

Music

ridge has written n seems formless
the sonnet form
ses are written.
great talent, can music other than McCormack. How ver been written tter the sonnets
ot recite the sec-dragged from the places? Mr. Mcmmended for at-the beaten path, returns from his her paths in his current repeat what was mes, is once more laces vacated by lled. The orchesell that only an

the inroads made s earlier in the all round man us" of the prima e, has many ads next year with soloists of the nteresting works

r next season in summer.
tinue to support
the loss of which able blow to the

SOLOIST I SYMPHONY

ony Orchestra, Mr. gave its 24th con-
noon in Symphony
n was as follows:
Symphony (by re-with Rondo, "Von Cormack); d'Indy, rank Bridge, sonnet ra, "Blow Out, You ormack); Wagner, stersingers."
the orchestra yes-heights in the pers brilliant music
ne in the meadows
e scaffold. It is music; it tells its for instance, the e shepherds' pipes
the vague, restless
—the very product
—the disturbing
equally disturbing
. The whole
s following march its own vivid imagine a singer aturally fits the an n, Mr. McCormack

e of the recitative;
every pause, shaped phrase. His diction while at every turn from the sentiment
y adroit of contour nt the unfolding be-he air; and he outdid melodic line, in love-e melting of contour play of sentiment
the whole. He end-n tracelets of tone
ven those which the
tween the periods in ures. The perfect art
nset within a voice
matchless service.
sonnet invited Mr.
nd more heroic vein
rity of mind he et.
ripens. Readily he
it. Yet his par-glory of his Mozart-quality, it fitly com-of the "Fantastic er, even, of the pre-gers."

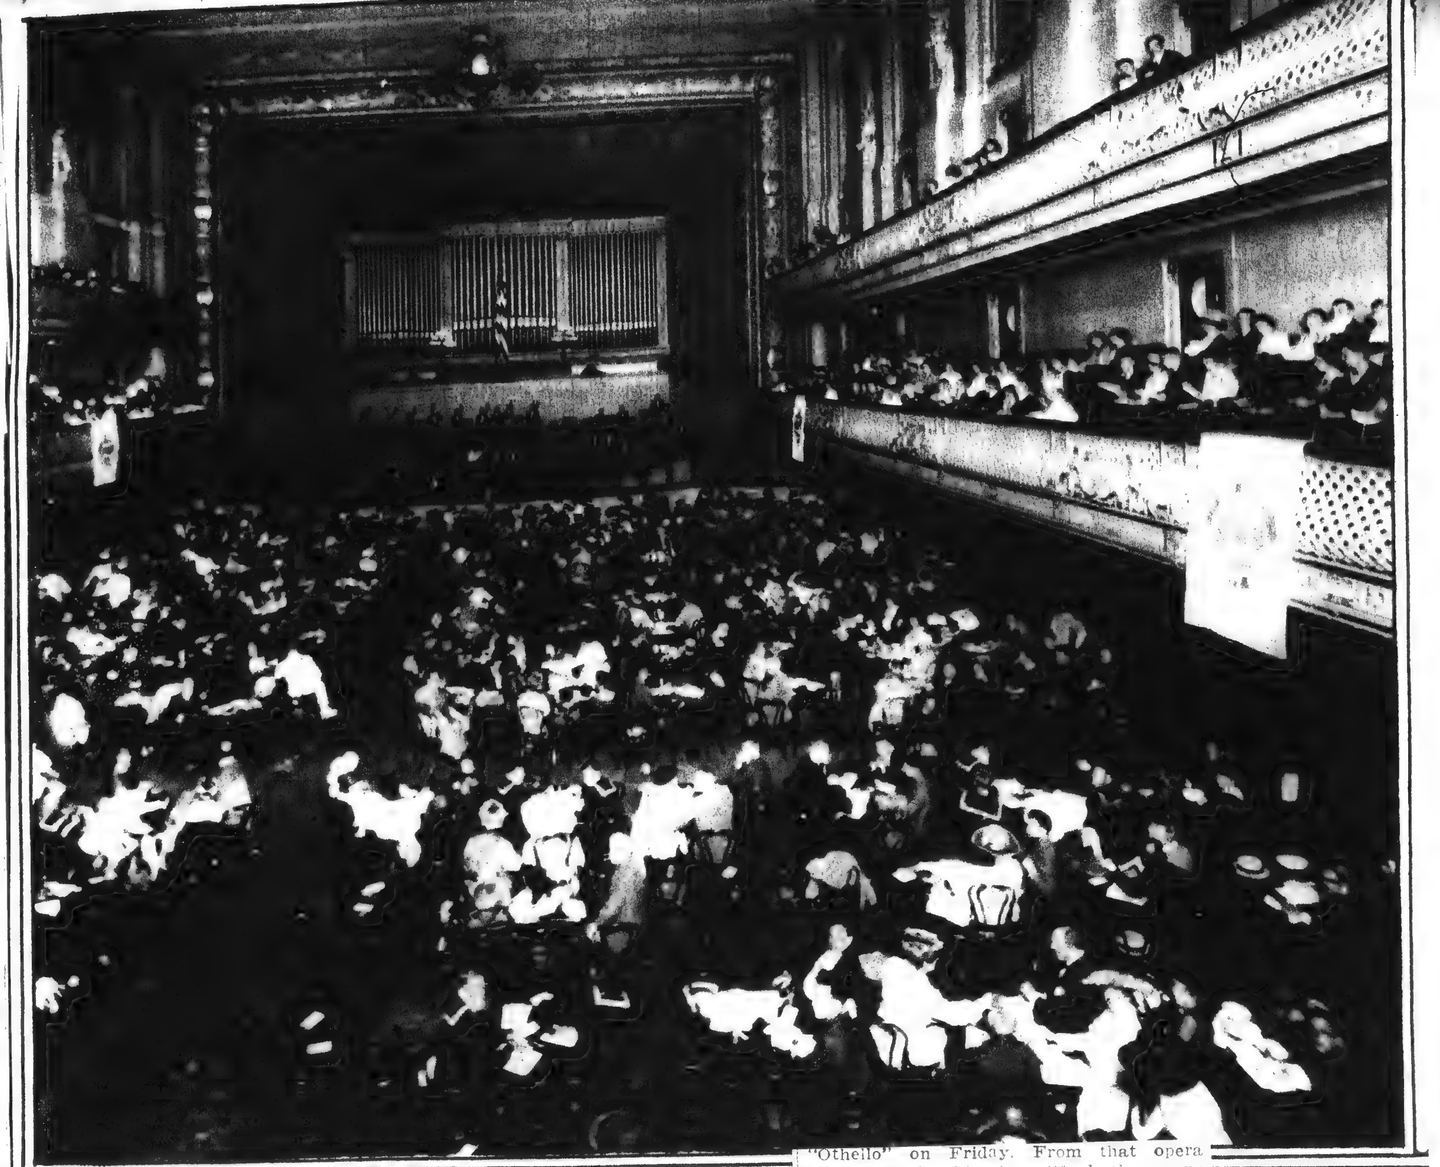
H. T. PARKER

SYMPHONY ENDS NOTABLE YEAR

John McCormack Shares Honors With Monteux in Last Concerts

By E. F. HASKINS.



The Pop Concerts Start Next Week at Symphony Hall, Under the Direction of Agide Jacchia, Conductor. So Far as We Know, This Is the First Interior View to Be Published of One of These Concerts, and Was Taken at the War Camp Community Service Night Last June.

THE POPS ARE HERE

THE POPS AGAIN

Spring and Summer Pastime to Be Renewed at Symphony Hall—The Usual Arrangements, with Mr. Jacchia Returning as Conductor Through Widely Ranging Programmes

FOR a thirty-fifth spring and summer the Pop Concerts will begin on Monday at Symphony Hall, to continue there every evening except Sunday through Saturday, July 19. Once more the floor will be cleared of rows of seats and tables and chairs will replace them. Again it will be possible to eat at them, to drink at them—whatever the law allows; to smoke at them unmolested. Entertainment for those who prefer it to refreshment apart from music, a part as they go now-adays—has been set in the back of the first balcony. Food and drink at Pop Concerts have long been of the best, and this spring there will be no departure from standard—and also no material increase in prices. According to custom also, the two balconies will be reserved for those who would take the pleasure of the music as at any other concert. The Symphony Orchestra, sixty or seventy players as need may require, will provide that music, while again Mr. Jacchia [illegible] By this time his [illegible] and with the [illegible] for instrumental melody, [illegible] communicating [illegible] Orchestra and audience [illegible] ly to him.

As in the past [illegible] will naturally make more [illegible] than have any of his [illegible] atic overtures, waltzes [illegible] solo pieces, miniatures, ballet music and a generally pleasing miscellany will all figure upon them. This spring, moreover, Mr. Jacchia has ventured one more innovation—the playing of familiar operatic airs as instrumental numbers. Louise's monologue from Charpentier's like-named opera will be so heard on Thursday, and Desdemona's "Ave Maria" from Verdi's "Othello" on Friday. From that opera also, Mr. Jacchia has lifted the scene of storm and [illegible] Moor's [illegible] declamation. For Monday evening, as specimen, the conductor has set the following programme:

Military March ..... Schubert
Overture to the Opera, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" ..... Nicolai
Song Without Words ..... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Finale from Sixth Symphony, for organ ..... Widor
Mr. Snow
Prayer Scene from "Otello" ..... Verdi
Intermezzo, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint Saëns
Canzonetta ..... Van Waterhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz" ..... Mascagni
Hungarian Dance No. 5 ..... Brahms

WEDNESDAY

Triumphal March ..... Verdi
Overture to "Aida" ..... Puccini
Waltzes from "La Boheme" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "La Tosca" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Polonaise from "Eugene Onegin" ..... Tschaikowsky
"Depuis le Jour" from "Louise" ..... Charpentier
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Suite from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff" ..... Mascagni
Intermezzo, Act III, "Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
"Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli

THURSDAY

Triumphal March ..... Verdi
Overture to "Aida" ..... Puccini
Waltzes from "La Boheme" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "La Tosca" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Polonaise from "Eugene Onegin" ..... Tschaikowsky
"Depuis le Jour" from "Louise" ..... Charpentier
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Suite from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff" ..... Mascagni
Intermezzo, Act III, "Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
"Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli

[illegible] Whose Marriage to

Pop Concerts to Open Monday Night

THAT famous Boston institution, the Pop Concerts, will take possession of Symphony Hall tomorrow night and continue nightly, except Sundays, for sixty nights. Having attained unprecedented proportions last year (despite prohibition) the Pops promise to exceed that record in 1920. For every favorable condition that made for successful Pops then has been enhanced. Maestro Jacchia's opening set of programs speak for themselves. A symphony orchestra of eighty is ready to give the finest performances under his leadership. The program for tomorrow night follows:

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor" ..... Nicolai
Song Without Words ..... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Gypsy Dance ..... Bizet
Finale 6th Symphony ..... Widor
Albert W. Snow
Prayer Scene from "Otello" ..... Verdi
Intermezzo, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint Saëns
Canzonetta ..... Van Waterhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz" ..... Mascagni
Hungarian Dance ..... Brahms

THE POPS OPEN MONDAY NIGHT

[illegible] Concerts [illegible] season, [illegible] Pop Concerts will [illegible] of Symphony Hall Monday, May 3, to continue nightly except Sundays, for 60 nights. Having attained unprecedented proportions last year (despite prohibition) the Pops promise to exceed that record in 1920. For every favorable condition that made for successful Pops then has been enhanced. Maestro Jacchia's opening set of programs speak for themselves. A symphony orchestra of 80 is ready to give the finest performances under his leadership. To meet the overflowing demand for refreshments, an actual bar is being installed in the large foyer in front of the first balcony. In defiance of the rising cost of living, the prices of tables, of seats reserved and unreserved, will remain as before.

As last season, a record number of special nights have been dedicated to colleges, clubs, conventions and the like. Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Commerce will [illegible] There will follow Architects' night, Society Latin night, Secondary Colleges, Boston University and Harvard nights, Boston City Club, Commercial Travellers', Professional Women's Club, graduate nurses', Elks', Lodge, New England Conservatory, Insurance Society of Massachusetts and National Bankers' convention nights.

Program for Opening Night

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor" ..... Nicolai
Song without Words ..... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan" ..... Wagner
Gypsy dance ..... Bizet
Organ solo ..... Widor
Albert W. Snow

Pops Are Here

[illegible] Pop Concerts, will take possession of Symphony Hall Monday, May [illegible] and continue [illegible] nightly, except Sundays, for 60 nights. Having attained unprecedented proportions last year (despite prohibition) the Pops promise to exceed that record in 1920. For every favorable condition that made for successful Pops then has been enhanced. Maestro Jacchia's opening set of programs speak for themselves. A symphony orchestra of 80 is ready to give them the finest performances under his ebullient leadership. To meet the overflowing demand for refreshments, an actual bar is being installed in the large foyer in front of the first balcony. In defiance of the rising cost of living, the prices of tables, of seats reserved and unreserved, will remain as before. Last season a record number of special nights were dedicated to colleges, clubs, conventions and the like. A still greater number have arranged to celebrate at the Pops this season. Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Com-

A[illegible] the [illegible] Pops on the [illegible]

[illegible] Pops [illegible] Pops [illegible] Pops [

INFORMATION OBSCURED

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Good Concerts Not All For Musical "Highbrows"

The success of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall in recent years has not been impaired by the gradual introduction by the various conductors of an ever-increasing proportion of what is commonly called "classical" music. Last year perhaps half the numbers played were by composers whose names figure on the regular Symphony concert programs, and more than half the residue was from composers who have furnished the mainstay of the Metropolitan Opera repertory, leaving at a liberal estimate only 25 percent of frankly "popular" pieces. Yet according to the management last season was the most successful in every sense these concerts have yet enjoyed.

The new season which opens tomorrow night under Mr Jacchia's practiced and able leadership will set the same high level in the choice of pieces which has obtained in the past. Yet there is no reason to believe that the audiences will be less numerous or less enthusiastic than hither to.

One moral to be drawn from the success of the "Pops" is obviously that the current way of reserving the term "popular" for trivial music, which at best is of minor interest to musicians, is not fair to the facts. Here is a series of orchestral concerts given on every week-day evening for more than two months, which, moreover, does not depend on celebrated soloists or on social prestige, drawing large audiences, where neither programs of great music nor the most celebrated performers, nor any amount of catering to "Society" with a capital "S" can insure the success of musical enterprises open to the reproach of being "highbrow" in character. Yet three-quarters of the programs at the "Pops" is always drawn from the works of composers who are taken seriously by professional musicians.

Evidently what the average man dislikes is not so much good music as musical snobbery. There have been too many self-styled lovers of music among both performers and listeners who glory in the supposed fact that they are not as their fellow men. Like Rousseau in his "Confessions" they have begun by thanking God that if they are no better than other men at least they are different, and then to prove their originality they let their hair grow and go around in freakish clothes with a supercilious air. When this results in their unpopularity with the rest of the community they raise a howl about "neglected genius."

If either their musical ability or their impudence is phenomenal they usually succeed in acquiring a devoted following, to whom they pose as the apostles of all that is good and beautiful in music. Incidentally they make non-musicians instinctively associate these follies on the part of some gifted and of many aspiring would-be musicians with music itself.

These musical snobs are afflicted with aziness and other vices, which they all "artistic temperament," and with conceit, which they call "high seriousness." It is little wonder that though they often make the average man respect their real and pretended abilities by their mastery of the art of self advertisement, they usually make him resolve to worship music from afar without attempting to understand it, or even going to hear it performed.

For who is there to tell the average man that Bach was the most respectable of middle-class householders, that Mozart had the sort of good manners one never notices until afterwards, that Schubert was shy and yet fond of quite ordinary good times with a rather average bunch of fellows, that Beethoven took infinite pains with every detail of his work and never thought about his clothes?

Half the secret of the amazing popularity of Kreisler and John McCormack is in the fact that their audiences instinctively feel a personal liking for them. Mr Kreisler puts on no airs whatever and goes about his business with perfect courtesy and obvious competence. Mr McCormack has a natural "way with him" which makes it impossible to imagine any one disliking him personally. He, too, never presumes because of his talent to be inconsiderate of any one, however unimportant.

Yet we can recall a rival of one of these artists, a would-be rival, at least, who performs as though he were mentally reckoning his playing at so many dollars per second, with the intention of giving the audience not one cent's worth more than it had paid for at present prices. We remember another lesser star who let his wife follow him from the stage at a concert where she had acted as his accompanist, causing a cynic who was present to remark that anybody would have known she was his wife by the way he treated her.

No, dear reader, not for worlds would we even hint at the names of these gentlemen. Libel suits are costly, and press agents have been known to charge unsuccessful ones up to "advertising."

It is the scort of nonsensical snobbery we have been describing which is the worst single obstacle in the way of making the average American like good music. The "Pops" are exempt from it, and therefore draw a crowd of average Americans of the sort one sees in the better "movie" houses to programs of music like that to be played tomorrow night from the following composers: Schubert, Tschaikowsky, Puccini, Wagner, Bizet, Verdi, Saint-Saens, Mascagni, Brahms, Widor, Nicolai. Note that only the last two are not well known to be so-called "highbrow" composers. But at the "Pops" you can smoke, and you can drink, with due deference to Mr Volstead, and at opera and Symphony you are almost obliged to put on airs.

"Pops" Begin Tomorrow

Monday's program will be as follows: "Marche Militaire," Schubert; overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; "Song Without Words," Tschaikowsky; fantasia, "La Boheme," Puccini; prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; gypsy dance from "Carmen," Bizet; organ solo, Finale Sixth Symphony, Widor; tempest scene from "Othello," Verdi; selection, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Canzone, van Westerhout; intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni; "Hungarian Dance No. 1, in G minor," Brahms.

Post May 3

POPS OPEN TONIGHT

The regular season of Pop concerts will open in Symphony Hall tonight. A full orchestra of 80 symphony players, led by Agide Jacchia, will play the following special programme:

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" ..... Nicolai
Song Without Words ..... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Organ solo, finale, Sixth Organ Symphony ..... Widor
(Mr. Albert Snow)
Tempest Scene from "Othello" ..... Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
Canzone ..... van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz" ..... Mascagni
Hungarian Dance, No. 1 in G minor ..... Brahms

concerts to feel the sublime greatness of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which, as it is with the exception of the ninth the most substantial, the most closely packed with thought and with romantic emotion of the remaining eight symphonies, was logically the one it took longest to grasp. Perhaps, also, it is the one which the world will take longest to forget. There are symphonies by Schubert, by Schumann, which we could not lose today, although we would have exchanged them, 15 years ago, with great willingness, for a work by Tschaikowsky or Richard Strauss. (Of course there are pages of Strauss one could never spare—for example, the "Also Sprach Zarathustra," "Tod und verklarung" and "Till Eulenspigel.) We are the last to yield in our admiration for Strauss, or for the Debussy of "Iberia" as well as "L'Apres-midi d'un faune," or for music of Ernest Bloch, or for symphonies and symphonic poems of Jean Sibelius. But, how much, after all, even of this glorious music we refer to, is as chaff in the wind by the side of a Beethoven, a Schubert, a Mozart in a great mood. The C major symphony of Mozart is, after all, a very grand affair. Beethoven's symphonies, in the hands of a real conductor, lose little of their spirituality, their plain brotherhood and humanity, with the years. These things have been said before. They will be said again. They will be hooted in all sincerity by the young fry, and reiterated with savage conviction by their elders. This is only to chronicle, for those who are passing through the writer's stage of 15 and 20 years ago, the experiences and conclusions of an average mind. The effect of these great compositions on the spirit is another matter. It cannot be told.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Triumphs Over Obstacles

Post May 2

With Band Happily Restored to Old-Time Efficiency, a Season Rich in Accomplishments Closes — Thrift of Certain Patrons of Boston Musical Association — Its Programmes

BY OLIN DOWNES

After three years, in which it was strongly and at times very disturbingly affected by issues of the war and the war's aftermath, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has emerged from its 39th season with flying colors and with unusually brilliant prospects, so far as one can judge in these troubled times, for the future.

It is reasonable to believe that the concerts next season will be fully as well patronized as they have during the winter past. The union issue, unfortunately and unwisely connected with the Fradkin issue, seems to have subsided, with the orchestra remaining intact and destined, by all signs and tokens, to be a better body than ever when the first concerts of next October take place. A campaign is on to secure guarantees of more money for the running expenses of this orchestra, which, like the expenses of everything else, have been constantly ascending during the last five years. This campaign should be vigorously and generously supported and no doubt it will be.

One element of the popularity of these concerts is Mr. Monteux's programmes. He is probably the best programme maker who has ever stood at the head of the orchestra, an ultra-modern in his keen musical perceptions and sympathies, yet a profound student of the music of classic masters. Mr. Monteux is very eclectic in his musical interests. During the winter past 15 French composers, 10 German composers, seven Russian composers, four American composers, Gluck and Goldmark, Austrians; the Rumanian, Enesco; Ernest Bloch, the Swiss Jew; two Bohemians, Dvorak and Smetana; the Hungarian, Liszt; the Pole, Stojowski; two Italian composers, Verdi and Malapiero; one Spanish composer, Albeniz, and one English composer, Frank Bridges, have been heard. Of single composers Beethoven had the greatest number of works given. Ten of his compositions were performed.

Then came Wagner with 8; Schumann and Debussy with 5 each; Berlioz with 4, Brahms, Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Schubert and d'Indy with 3 each; Bloch, Borodin, Dvorak, Franck, Liszt, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Saint-Saens, with 2 each, with the rest represented by a single work apiece. Haydn's "Queen Anne" symphony was repeated on two different programmes, as was Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique." Although there were but 10 names of German composers—including Handel, in his later life a naturalized Englishman—and 15 names of French composers, including the Belgian, Cesar Franck, there were 44 performances of German works and but 25 of compositions by Frenchmen—sufficient of a reply to those who have tried to fasten on Messrs. Rabaud and Monteux; the two French conductors of the Boston Symphony, the charge of chauvinism in music, chauvinism which, as a matter of fact, was a prevailing characteristic of every German conductor the Boston Symphony knew. One German, Max Fiedler, had an exceptional curiosity and breadth of appreciation, but the programmes have never been so inclusive as they have during the last three years under French leadership.

Conductors who are internationalists are certainly desired by American audiences. When to this internationalism is added an enthusiasm, an appreciation, subjective as well as objective, of the works of classic masters even of enemy countries, then the audiences are fortunate indeed. No conductor we have ever heard equalled Mr. Rabaud's performance of Beethoven's fifth symphony. The same thing is true of Mr. Monteux's reading, among other works of Schumann's symphony No. 1—the symphony of Spring, and of Shubert's symphonie in B minor; but neither Mr. Rabaud nor Mr. Monteux has yet approached Dr. Muck, for instance, in his interpretation of Brahms or of Wagner. We say these things because there appear still to be those who are worrying over the change from what they term the "French regime," which has replaced the "German regime" at Symphony Hall. They have tried to represent the Frenchmen as narrow or limited in their musical appreciations. The only answer required is a record of recent programmes and reference to a majority of unprejudiced opinion about the interpretations. The scope of the programmes has been broader, the musical atmosphere freer from provincialism or arbitrariness, since Messrs. Rabaud and Monteux came to Boston, than ever before.

The orchestral compositions performed for the first time anywhere were Converse's C minor symphony and Griffes' "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan." The tragic death of Charles T. Griffess, just as he was gaining widespread recognition as an American composer of rarely sensitive fancy and skill with the orchestra, is one of the real losses of American music. Mr. Converse's symphony is on a classical basis, and the writer personally did not find that it ranked in value with the same composer's "Mystic Trumpeter," which remains up to the present time Mr. Converse's masterpiece.

Of the works performed for the first time in America there were three. Debussy's "Jeux" and Fantasy for piano and orchestra—the piano part played by Alfred Cortot—and d'Indy's "Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico," a symphony inspired by the war which proved to be one of d'Indy's poorest works. Nor did the two compositions of Debussy, the one a very early work, the latter one of the latest efforts of the composer make a very deep impression on initial acquaintance.

Of the works performed for the first time in Boston Albeniz's "Catalonia" pleases some and offended others by its vulgarity, its swinging rhythms, its crackling color. Carpenter's brilliant concerto for piano and orchestra, the piano part superbly played by E. Robert Schmitz, was heartily applauded and much enjoyed. Whether it has as much permanent value as other works of the composer is another question. Rachmaninoff's 3d concerto is poor music but the composer played like a god; he has a very impressive personality. The audience was wild with delight.

Ernest Bloch's settings of Psalms 114 and 114 stand out in the memory as the greatest novelties of the season, and as works certain to live long because of their inspiration, their dramatic and emotional qualities. Here, thank heaven, is a living composer of true greatness, simplicity, sincerity, breath of vision. Other first performances in Boston need not detain us. The works are already forgotten, though it was just that they should be heard.

Of first performances at the Boston Symphony concerts of unusual interest were those of Borodin's "Polovtsian" dances from "Prince Igor," Gilbert's "Dance on Place Congo," and Stravinsky's suite from "L'Oiseaux de Feu." As shown, these works and others to be classified in the same category, had been performed previously in Boston by other organizations—the Borodin dances by the orchestra of the Boston Opera company and by the Russian ballet, which also gave repeated performances of Stravinsky's wonderful "Oiseau de eu." But one work, strictly speaking, had not been heard before to full advantage. This was Gilbert's "Dance on Place Congo," poorly suited for ballet performance by the Metropolitan Opera Company, and only heard to advantage when Mr. Monteux gave it in its original form as a symphonic poem in Symphony Hall. Then the music, in all its virility, its uncouthness, its romantic poetry, and its eerie conclusion was felt with its full force. For one listener, at least, Mr. Gilbert has produced in this work some of his greatest pages, pages which make him stand out, an individual and inimitable musical personality of today.

Another thing which has been brought overpoweringly to mind at these concerts is the unspeakable greatness of many works which young musicians of today—the writer has not been guiltless in this respect—describe condescendingly as "classic masterpieces," or in words more contemptuous. The reason this has come so forcibly to mind is threefold. First, Mr. Monteux has gone rather extensively into orchestral literature of the classic period; secondly, he understands most of this literature uncommonly well, and communicates his understanding to the listener; thirdly, listeners themselves grow, experiencing strange reversals of opinion and judgment in so doing.

For instance, the Schubert C major symphony is for us, now, none too long and it is a work which towers to the very stars, despite its sequences and its excess of thematic material. It has taken us 20 years of listening at these

Agide Jacchia, conductor of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall.

POPS ARE HERE

The thirty-fifth season of Pop Concerts will start tomorrow in Symphony Hall. Last season broke all records in attendance, in the interest and success of the programmes, in the amount of refreshments served (despite prohibition), the number of musicians, the number of special nights. This year Agide Jacchia's opening set of programmes is but a part of what he can do with his 80 symphony players. In defiance of the rising cost of living, the prices of tables, of seats reserved and unreserved, remain unchanged. Last season a record number of special nights were dedicated to colleges, clubs, conventions and the like. A still greater number have arranged to celebrate at the Pops this season. For Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Commerce has taken onto itself an evening of Pops. There will follow Amherst night, Roxbury Latin night, Simmons College, Boston University and Harvard nights, Boston City Club, Commercial Travelers', Professional Women's Clubs, Graduate Nurses, Euclid Lodge, New England Conservatory, Insurance Society of Massachusetts and National Bankers' convention nights. The programmes of the opening week follow:

OPENING NIGHT, MONDAY, MAY 3

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor" ..... Nicola
Song Without Words ..... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Organ Solo, Finale 6th Symphony ..... Widor
Albert W. Snow
Tempest Scene from "Othello" ..... Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
Canzone ..... Van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz" ..... Mascagni
Hungarian Dance, No. 1, in G minor ..... Brahms

TUESDAY, MAY 4

Cortere from "The Queen of Sheba" ..... Gounod
Overture to "Il Guarany" ..... Gomes
Capriccio (Arranged for String Orchestra by A. Jacchia) ..... Scarlatti
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Dance of the Hours ..... Ponchielli
Harp Solo, "In Springtime" ..... Holy
Mr. Alfred Holy
Rondo Capriccioso ..... Mendelssohn
Finale from the Fourth Symphony ..... Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Madame Butterfly" ..... Puccini
Enfantillage ..... Van Westerhout
Waltz, "Espana" ..... Waldteufel
Hungarian Dance, No. 3, in F major ..... Brahms

WEDNESDAY, MAY 5

Entrance of the Boyards ..... Halvorsen
Overture to "The Wedding of Figaro" ..... Mozart
Cortege de Bacchus ..... Delibes
Fantasia, "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Violin Solo: Rondo ..... Mozart-Kreisler
Mr. Julius Theodorowicz
Serenade ..... Schubert
Tempest Scene from "Othello" ..... Verdi
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ..... Mascagni
Reve Angelique ..... Rubenstein
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ..... Vollstedt
Hungarian Dance, No. 5, in G minor ..... Brahms

THURSDAY, MAY 6—OPERATIC NIGHT.

Triumphal March, from "Aida" ..... Verdi
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Waltzes from "The Rose Cavalier" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "La Tosca" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Polonaise from "Eugin Onegin" ..... Tschaikowski
"Depuis le Jour," from "Louise" ..... Charpentier
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Suite from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff" ..... Mascagni
Intermezzo, Act. III., "Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
"Dance of the Hours" from "La Giocon-da" ..... Ponchielli

FRIDAY, MAY 7.

Entrance of the Gladiators ..... Fucik
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Madrigal ..... Caccini
Fantasia, "Faust" ..... Gounod
First Hungarian Rhapsody, in F major ..... Liszt
Flute solo, Mr. Arthur Brooke—
a. Romance sans Paroles ..... Guilmant
b. Polonaise ..... Possard
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Scenes Pittoresques ..... Massenet
a. Air de Ballet. b. Fete Boheme.
Overture Solennelle, "1812" ..... Tschaikowsky
Ave Maria, from "Othello" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ..... Waldteufel
Slavonic Dance, No. 1 ..... Dvorak

SATURDAY, MAY 8.

French Military March ..... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Masaniello" ..... Auber
Whispering of the Flowers ..... Blon
Fantasia, "Mefistofele" ..... Boito
Finale of "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Minuet for Strings ..... Boccherini
Tarantelle, flute solo ..... Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Three Russian Folk Songs, arranged by Jacchia—
a. Volga Bargemen's Song
b. Cossack Song.
c. Dubinushka
The Marionettes ..... Lacombe
Waltz, "The Skaters" ..... Waldteufel
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" ..... Tschaikowsky

apply.

FIRST POP CONCERT OF SEASON TONIGHT

The regular season of pop concerts will open in Symphony Hall tonight. As usual, refreshments will be served at the tables, which occupy the entire floor. A full orchestra of 80 Symphony players, led by Agide Jacchia, will play the following special program:

March Militaire, Schubert; overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; "Song Without Words," Tschaikowsky; Fantasia, "La Boheme," Puccini; Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; Gypsy Dance from "Carmen," Bizet; Organ solo, finale, sixth organ symphony, Widor (Albert Snow); Tempest scene from "Othello," Verdi Selection, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Canzone, Van Westerhout; Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni; Hungarian Dance No. 1 in G minor, Brahms.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Good Concerts Not All For Musical "Highbrows"

The success of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall in recent years has not been impaired by the gradual introduction by the various conductors of an ever-increasing proportion of what is commonly called "classical" music. Last year perhaps half the numbers played were by composers whose names figure on the regular Symphony concert programs, and more than half the residue was from composers who have furnished the mainstay of the Metropolitan Opera repertory, leaving at a liberal estimate only 25 percent of frankly "popular" pieces. Yet according to the management last season was the most successful in every sense these concerts have yet enjoyed.

The new season which opens tomorrow night under Mr Jacchia's practiced and able leadership will set the same high level in the choice of pieces which has obtained in the past. Yet there is no reason to believe that the audiences will be less numerous or less enthusiastic than hither to.

One moral to be drawn from the success of the "Pops" is obviously that the current way of reserving the term "popular" for trivial music, which at best is of minor interest to musicians, is not fair to the facts. Here is a series of orchestral concerts given on every week-day evening for more than two months, which, moreover, does not depend on celebrated soloists or on social prestige, drawing large audiences, where neither programs of great music nor the most celebrated performers, nor any amount of catering to "Society" with a capital "S" can insure the success of musical enterprises open to the reproach of being "highbrow" in character. Yet three-quarters of the programs at the "Pops" is always drawn from the works of composers who are taken seriously by professional musicians.

Evidently what the average man dislikes is not so much good music as musical snobbery. There have been too many self-styled lovers of music among both performers and listeners who glory in the supposed fact that they are not as their fellow men. Like Rousseau in his "Confessions" they have begun by thanking God that if they are no better than other men at least they are different, and then to prove their originality they let their hair grow and go around in freakish clothes with a supercilious air. When this results in their unpopularity with the rest of the community they raise a howl about "neglected genius."

If either their musical ability or their impudence is phenomenal they usually succeed in acquiring a devoted following, to whom they pose as the apostles of all that is good and beautiful in music. Incidentally they make non-musicians instinctively associate these follies on the part of some gifted and of many aspiring would-be musicians with music itself.

These musical snobs are afflicted with laziness and other vices, which they call "artistic temperament," and with conceit, which they call "high seriousness." It is little wonder that though they often make the average man respect their real and pretended abilities by their mastery of the art of self advertisement, they usually make him resolve to worship music from afar without attempting to understand it, or even going to hear it performed.

For who is there to tell the average man that Bach was the most respectable of middle-class householders, that Mozart had the sort of good manners one never notices until afterwards, that Schubert was shy and yet fond of quite ordinary good times with a rather average bunch of fellows, that Beethoven took infinite pains with every detail of his work and never thought about his clothes?

Half the secret of the amazing popularity of Kreisler and John McCormack is in the fact that their audiences instinctively feel a personal liking for them. Mr Kreisler puts on no airs whatever and goes about his business with perfect courtesy and obvious competence. Mr McCormack has a natural "way with him" which makes it impossible to imagine any one disliking him personally. He, too, never presumes because of his talent to be inconsiderate of any one, however unimportant.

Yet we can recall a rival of one of these artists, a would-be rival, at least, who performs as though he were mentally reckoning his playing at so many dollars per second, with the intention of giving the audience not one cent's worth more than it had paid for at present prices. We remember another lesser star who let his wife follow him from the stage at a concert where she had acted as his accompanist, causing a cynic who was present to remark that anybody would have known she was his wife by the way he treated her.

No, dear reader, not for worlds would we even hint at the names of these gentlemen. Libel suits are costly, and press agents have been known to charge unsuccessful ones up to "advertising."

It is the scort of nonsensical snobbery we have been describing which is the worst single obstacle in the way of making the average American like good music. The "Pops" are exempt from it, and therefore draw a crowd of average Americans of the sort one sees in the better "movie" houses to programs of music like that to be played tomorrow night from the following composers: Schubert, Tschaikowsky, Puccini, Wagner, Bizet, Verdi, Saint-Saens, Mascagni, Brahms, Widor, Nicolai. Note that only the last two are not well known to be so-called "highbrow" composers. But at the "Pops" you can smoke, and you can drink, with due deference to Mr Volstead, and at opera and Symphony you are almost obliged to put on airs.

"Pops" Begin Tomorrow

Monday's program will be as follows: "Marche Militaire," Schubert; overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; "Song Without Words," Tschaikowsky; fantasia, "La Boheme," Puccini; prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; gypsy dance from "Carmen," Bizet; organ solo, Finale Sixth Symphony, Widor; tempest scene from "Othello," Verdi; selection, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Canzone, van Westerhout; intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni; "Hungarian Dance No. 1, in G mi-

---

concerts to feel the sublime greatness of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which, as it is with the exception of the ninth the most substantial, the most closely packed with thought and with romantic emotion of the remaining eight symphonies, was logically the one it took longest to grasp. Perhaps, also, it is the one which the world will take longest to forget. There are symphonies by Schubert, by Schumann, which we could not lose today, although we would have exchanged them, 15 years ago, with great willingness, for a work by Tschaikowsky or Richard Strauss. (Of course there are pages of Strauss one could never spare—for example, the "Also Sprach Zarathustra," "Tod und Verklarung" and "Till Eulenspigel.) We are the last to yield in our admiration for Strauss, or for the Debussy of "Iberia" as well as "L'Apres-midi d'un faune," or for music of Ernest Bloch, or for symphonies and symphonic poems of Jean Sibelius. But, how much, after all, even of this glorious music we refer to, is as chaff in the wind by the side of a Beethoven, a Schubert, a Mozart in a great mood. The C major symphony of Mozart is, after all, a very grand affair. Beethoven's symphonies, in the hands of a real conductor, lose little of their spirituality, their plain brotherhood and humanity, with the year. These things have been said before. They will be said again. They will be hooted in all sincerity by the young fry, and reiterated with savage conviction by their elders. This is only to chronicle, for those who are passing through the writer's stage of 15 and 20 years ago, the experiences and conclusions of an average mind. The effect of these great compositions on the spirit is another matter. It cannot be told.

---

Boston Symphony Orchestra Triumphs Over Obstacles

With Band Happily Restored to Old-Time Efficiency, a Season Rich in Accomplishments Closes — Thrift of Certain Patrons of Boston Musical Association — Its Programmes

BY OLIN DOWNES

After three years, in which it was strongly and at times very disturbingly affected by issues of the war and the war's aftermath, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has emerged from its 39th season with flying colors and with unusually brilliant prospects, so far as one can judge in these troubled times, for the future.

It is reasonable to believe that the concerts next season will be fully as well patronized as they have during the winter past. The union issue, unfortunately and unwisely connected with the Fradkin issue, seems to have subsided, with the orchestra remaining intact and destined, by all signs and tokens, to be a better body than ever when the first concerts of next October take place. A campaign is on to secure guarantees of more money for the running expenses of this orchestra, which, like the expenses of everything else, have been constantly ascending during the last five years. This campaign should be vigorously and generously supported and no doubt it will be.

One element of the popularity of these concerts is Mr. Monteux's programmes. He is probably the best programme maker who has ever stood at the head of the orchestra, an ultra-modern in his keen musical perceptions and sympathies, yet a profound student of the music of classic masters. Mr. Monteux is very eclectic in his musical interests. During the winter past 15 French composers, 10 German composers, seven Russian composers, four American composers, Gluck and Goldmark, Austrians; the Rumanian, Enesco; Ernest Bloch, the Swiss Jew; two Bohemians, Dvorak and Smetana; the Hungarian, Liszt; the Pole, Stojowski; two Italian composers, Verdi and Malapiero; one Spanish composer, Albeniz, and one English composer, Frank Bridges, have been heard. Of single composers Beethoven had the greatest number of works given. Ten of his compositions were performed.

Then came Wagner with 8; Schumann and Debussy with 5 each; Berlioz with 4, Brahms, Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Schubert and d'Indy with 3 each; Bloch, Borodin, Dvorak, Franck, Lizst, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Saint-Saens, with 2 each, with the rest represented by a single work apiece. Haydn's "Queen Anne" symphony was repeated on two different programmes, as was Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique." Although there were but 10 names of German composers—including Handel, in his later life a naturalized Englishman—and 15 names of French composers, including the Belgian, Cesar Franck, there were 44 performances of German works and but 25 of compositions by Frenchmen—sufficient of a reply to those who have tried to fasten on Messrs. Rabaud and Monteux, the two French conductors of the Boston Symphony, the charge of chauvinism in music, chauvinism which, as a matter of fact, was a prevailing characteristic of every German conductor the Boston Symphony knew. One German, Max Fiedler, had an exceptional curiosity and breadth of appreciation, but the programmes have never been so inclusive as they have during the last three years under French leadership.

Conductors who are internationalists are certainly desired by American audiences. When to this internationalism is added an enthusiasm, an appreciation, subjective as well as objective, of the works of classic masters even of enemy countries, then the audiences are fortunate indeed. No conductor we have ever heard equalled Mr. Rabaud's performance of Beethoven's fifth symphony. The same thing is true of Mr. Monteux's reading, among other works of Schumann's symphony No. 1—the symphony of Spring, and of Shubert's symphonie in B minor; but neither Mr. Rabaud nor Mr. Monteux has yet approached Dr. Muck, for instance, in his interpretation of Brahms or of Wagner. We say these things because there appear still to be those who are worrying over the change from what they term the "French regime," which has replaced the "German regime" at Symphony Hall. They have tried to represent the Frenchmen as narrow or limited in their musical appreciations. The only answer required is a record of recent programmes and reference to a majority of unprejudiced opinion about the interpretations. The scope of the programmes has been broader, the musical atmosphere freer from provincialism or arbitrariness, since Messrs. Rabaud and Monteux came to Boston, than ever before.

The orchestral compositions performed for the first time anywhere were Converse's C minor symphony and Griffes' "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan." The tragic death of Charles T. Griffess, just as he was gaining widespread recognition as an American composer of rarely sensitive fancy and skill with the orchestra, is one of the real losses of American music. Mr. Converse's symphony is on a classical basis, and the writer personally did not find that it ranked in value with the same composer's "Mystic Trumpeter," which remains up to the present time Mr. Converse's masterpiece.

Of the works performed for the first time in America there were three. Debussy's "Jeux" and Fantasy for piano and orchestra—the piano part played by Alfred Cortot—and d'Indy's "Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico," a symphony inspired by the war which proved to be one of d'Indy's poorest works. Nor did the two compositions of Debussy, the one a very early work, the latter one of the latest efforts of the composer make a very deep impression on initial acquaintance.

Of the works performed for the first time in Boston Albeniz's "Catalonia" pleases some and offended others by its vulgarity, its swinging rhythms, its crackling color. Carpenter's brilliant concerto for piano and orchestra, the piano part superbly played by E. Robert Schmitz, was heartily applauded and much enjoyed. Whether it has as much permanent value as other works of the composer is another question. Rachmaninoff's 3d concerto is poor music but the composer played like a god; he has a very impressive personality. The audience was wild with delight.

Ernest Bloch's settings of Psalms 114 and 114 stand out in the memory as the greatest novelties of the season, and as works certain to live long because of their inspiration, their dramatic and emotional qualities. Here, thank heaven, is a living composer of true greatness, simplicity, sincerity, breath of vision. Other first performances in Boston need not detain us. The works are already forgotten, though it was just that they should be heard.

Of first performances at the Boston Symphony concerts of unusual interest were those of Borodin's "Poloskian" dances from "Prince Igor," Gilbert's "Dance on Place Congo," and Stranisky's suite from "L'Oiseaux de Feu." As shown, these works and others to be classified in the same category, had been performed previously in Boston by other organizations—the Borodin dances by the orchestra of the Boston Opera company and by the Russian ballet, which also gave repeated performances of Stravinsky's wonderful "Oiseau de eu." But one work, strictly speaking, had not been heard before to full advantage. This was Gilbert's "Dance on Place Congo," poorly suited for ballet performance by the Metropolitan Opera Company, and only heard to advantage when Mr. Monteux gave it in its original form as a symphonic poem in Symphony Hall. Then the music, in all its virility, its uncouthness, its romantic poetry, and its eerie conclusion was felt with its full force. For one listener, at least, Mr. Gilbert has produced in this work some of his greatest pages, pages which make him stand out, an individual and inimitable musical personality of today.

Another thing which has been brought overpoweringly to mind at these concerts is the unspeakable greatness of many works which young musicians of today—the writer has not been guiltless in this respect—describe condescendingly as "classic masterpieces," or in words more contemptuous. The reason this has come so forcibly to mind is threefold. First, Mr. Monteux has gone rather extensively into orchestral literature of the classic period; secondly, he understands most of this literature uncommonly well, and communicates his understanding to the listener; thirdly, listeners themselves grow, experiencing strange reversals of opinion and judgment in so doing.

For instance, the Schubert C major symphony is for us, now, none too long and it is a work which towers to the very stars, despite its sequences and its excess of thematic material. It has taken us 20 years of listening at these

Agide Jacchia, conductor of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall.

POPS OPEN TONIGHT

The regular season of Pop concerts will open in Symphony Hall tonight. A full orchestra of 80 symphony players, led by Agide Jacchia, will play the following special programme;

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" ..... Nicolai
Song Without Words ..... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Organ solo, finale, Sixth Organ Symphony ..... Widor
(Mr. Albert Snow)
Tempest Scene from "Othello" ..... Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
Canzone ..... van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz" ..... Mascagni
Hungarian Dance No. 1 in G minor ..... Brahms

POPS ARE HERE

The thirty-fifth season of Pop Concerts will start tomorrow in Symphony Hall. Last season broke all records in attendance, in the interest and success of the programmes, in the amount of refreshments served (despite prohibition), the number of musicians, the number of special nights. This year Agide Jacchia's opening set of programmes is but a part of what he can do with his 80 symphony players. In defiance of the rising cost of living, the prices of tables, of seats reserved and unreserved, remain unchanged. Last season a record number of special nights were dedicated to colleges, clubs, conventions and the like. A still greater number have arranged to celebrate at the Pops this season. For Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Commerce has taken onto itself an evening of Pops. There will follow Amherst night, Roxbury Latin night, Simmons College, Boston University and Harvard nights, Boston City Club, Commercial Travelers', Professional Women's Clubs, Graduate Nurses, Euclid Lodge, New England Conservatory, Insurance Society of Massachusetts and National Bankers' convention nights. The programmes of the opening week follow:

OPENING NIGHT, MONDAY, MAY 3

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor" ..... Nicola
Song Without Words ..... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Organ Solo, Finale 6th Symphony ..... Widor
Albert W. Snow
Tempest Scene from "Othello" ..... Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
Canzone ..... Van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz" ..... Mascagni
Hungarian Dance, No. 1, in G minor ..... Brahms

TUESDAY, MAY 4

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba" ..... Gounod
Overture to "Il Guarany" ..... Gomez
Capriccio (Arranged for String Orchestra by A. Jacchia) ..... Scarlatti
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Dance of the Hours ..... Ponchielli
Harp Solo, "In Springtime" ..... Holy
Mr. Alfred Holy
Rondo Capriccioso ..... Mendelssohn
Finale from the Fourth Symphony ..... Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Madama Butterfly" ..... Puccini
Enfantillage ..... Van Westerhout
Waltz, "Espana" ..... Waldteufel
Hungarian Dance, No. 3, in F major ..... Brahms

WEDNESDAY, MAY 5

Entrance of the Boyards ..... Halvorsen
Overture to "The Wedding of Figaro" ..... Mozart
Cortege de Bacchus ..... Delibes
Fantasia, "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Violin Solo; Rondo ..... Mozart-Kreisler
Mr. Julius Theodorowicz
Serenade ..... Schubert
Tempest Scene from "Othello" ..... Verdi
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ..... Mascagni
Reve Angelique ..... Rubenstein
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ..... Vollstedt
Hungarian Dance, No. 5, in G minor ..... Brahms

THURSDAY, MAY 6—OPERATIC NIGHT.

Triumphal March, from "Aida" ..... Verdi
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Waltzes from "The Rose Cavalier" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "La Tosca" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Polonaise from "Eugin Onegin" ..... Tschaikowski
"Depuis le Jour," from "Louise" ..... Charpentier
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Suite from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff" ..... Mascagni
Intermezzo, Act. III., "Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
"Dance of the Hours" from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli

FRIDAY, MAY 7.

Entrance of the Gladiators ..... Fucik
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Madrigal ..... Caccini
Fantasia, "Faust" ..... Gounod
First Hungarian Rhapsody, in F major ..... Liszt
Flute solo, Mr. Arthur Brooke—
a. Romance sans Paroles ..... Guilmant
b. Polonaise ..... Possard
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Scenes Pittoresques ..... Massenet
a. Air de Ballet. b. Fete Boheme.
Overture Solennelle, "1812" ..... Tschaikowsky
Ave Maria, from "Othello" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ..... Waldteufel
Slavonic Dance, No. 1 ..... Dvorak

SATURDAY, MAY 8.

French Military March ..... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Masaniello" ..... Auber
Whispering of the Flowers ..... Blon
Fantasia, "Mefistofele" ..... Boito
Finale of "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Minuet for Strings ..... Boccherini
Tarantelle, flute solo ..... Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Three Russian Folk Songs, arranged by Jacchia—
a. Volga Bargemen's Song
b. Cossack Song.
c. Dubinushka
The Marionettes ..... Lacombe
Waltz, "The Skaters" ..... Waldteufel
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" ..... Tschaikowsky

FIRST POP CONCERT OF SEASON TONIGHT

The regular season of pop concerts will open in Symphony Hall tonight. As usual, refreshments will be served at the tables, which occupy the entire floor. A full orchestra of 80 Symphony players, led by Agide Jacchia, will play the following special program:

March Militaire, Schubert; overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; "Song Without Words," Tschaikowsky; Fantasia, "La Boheme," Puccini; Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; Gypsy Dance from "Carmen," Bizet; Organ solo, finale, sixth organ symphony, Widor (Albert Snow); Tempest scene from "Othello," Verdi Selection, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Canzone, Van Westerhout; Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni; Hungarian Dance No. 1 in G minor, Brahms.

Music

Tran May 5

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

MORE LAST RITES OF THE DEAD SEASON

Another and Warmer Leave-Taking for Mr. Monteux—Titta Ruffo, and Also His Audience, Entertain — Miss Neilsen in New Graces of Voice and Skill—Mr. Werrenrath to England

WHATEVER the audience at the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon lacked in heartiness toward Mr. Monteux, the succeeding audience of Saturday evening amply returned to him. For the conductor, for Mr. McCormack as assisting singer, for the orchestra, for the concerts as an institution, momentarily shaken but now firm-set again, the company filled Symphony Hall to the last seat. It was long, loud, sincere in applause when Mr. Monteux came to his place. It was first engrossed and then stirred by his version of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" which, unlike the listeners of Friday, it was hearing for the first time. The "Scene in the Fields," the "March to the Scaffold" won warm plaudits; and at the end of the whole piece conductor and orchestra shared round after round of clapping. Mr. d'Indy's tone-poem, "Istar," was likewise better received on Saturday; while with Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers," the pleasure of music and performance plainly ran high and deep. When both were done nearly the whole audience lingered and, standing, recalled Mr. Monteux again and again. Soon he had the orchestra on its feet around him. For, without its fortitude, loyalties and zeal, not even he could have saved and restored the Symphony Concerts.

As good fortune would have it, both the conductor and the band were on their mettle. Clearly out of Berlioz's stripped, concentrated, superlatively direct music, wherein so many instruments and choirs are used separately, stood the individual quality of the orchestra and Mr. Monteux's ability as fusing leader. Seldom has the band been more graphic voice to such a symphony of pictorial, romantic, highly strung fantasy or a conductor, here in Boston, shown larger and finer mastery of these exacting pages. The orchestra's command of harmonic and instrumental color, Mr. Monteux's imagination with it and ear for it, shone manifold throughout the performance of "Istar," while both were equally plastic, songful, sumptuous and striding of tone through Wagner's Prelude. Even in Dr. Muck's time, it was hardly more thrilling to hear as crown to an ending season. Since those days also and in happy omen for the autumn, there has not been warmer leave-taking between audience, conductor and orchestra. Thanks, most, to Mr. Monteux, the Symphony Concerts are themselves again.

"POPS" OPEN SEASON AT SYMPHONY

Am May 4

The "Pops" are with us again.

Hundreds of people gathered in Symphony Hall for the opening night of these ever-popular concerts by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To be sure, it was not like the opening nights of other years. The Eighteenth Constitutional Amendment, having to do with the dispensing of liquid refreshments with a "kick," has put an awful crimp in the "Pops," as well as in entertainment elsewhere.

The "pep" of opening nights of other years, when a fellow got outside a bottle or two of Scotch ale from earthenware bottles, was missing. An alliterative press agent might refer to them as the "Pepless Pops."

While the "Pops" are not quite like the "Pops" of yesteryear, they are still worth going to. It would be difficult to get such a high-class entertainment anywhere for so small a sum of money, especially in these days of the HCL of everything.

Not only was the floor crowded at the opener, but the balconies as well, and the true test of whether an entertainment is worth while is the attendance in the upper part of the house.

Many prefer to sit in the last row of the second balcony in Symphony Hall to listen to the music than on the floor. In the balconies you will find real music lovers.

Agide Jacchia is the conductor again this year. He is an artist of the first class. It was a pleasure to watch him as he put every ounce of energy into the direction of the musicians. His conducting of Mascagni's intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz" was superb.

Among the first nighters was Miss Alice Neilsen, who has sung many times in opera under Mr. Jacchia at Montreal. She regards him as the most capable conductor of "La Boheme" under whom she has sung.

Several persons who have attended every first night since the institution of the "Pops," more than thirty years ago, were present including some of Boston's best families. The season is to be of two w

OPENING OF "POPS" DRAWS BIG CROWD

Popular as Ever Despite Advent of Prohibition

Jacchia Conducts an Attractive Program With Spirit

Globe May 4

The annual Spring transformation of Symphony Hall occurred last evening, and the eager audience which flocked there for the opening of the 35th season of the "Pops" found the settings for this unique entertainment much the same as in former years.

In place of solid rows of seats which, during the rest of the year, fill the floor of the big hall, tables and chairs are scattered about it, while waitresses—waiters, no longer, since beer and light wines vanished from the menu of the "Pops"—in attractive costume, flit hither and thither, providing thirsty music-lovers with lemonade, ginger ale, root beer and similar beverages.

Apparently prohibition has made no difference whatever in the popularity of Boston's beloved institution, for literally every chair on the floor, as well as the seats in both balconies, was filled last evening for the attractive concert which Agide Jacchia, the popular conductor of last season, provided for the opening night.

An innovation which elicited much praise from old-timers at these concerts was the arrangement of a fringe of attractive potted ferns and other greens about the edge of the platform, with a big bank of pink azaleas directly in front of the conductor's stand. This simple arrangement of flowers and greens adds a touch of color which seems especially in keeping with the rather informal atmosphere of the "Pops."

Mr Jacchia conducted last evening with the spirit and fire for which he is so justly noted. Particularly stirring was the playing of the Tempest Scene from Verdi's "Othello," in which the orchestra achieved a tremendous success. The program opened with Schubert's familiar "Marche Militaire," followed by the spirited overture to Nicolai's "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

As a whole, the program contained fewer popular numbers than has been the general rule in former seasons, although a number were played as extra pieces, in response to prolonged and enthusiastic applause. The beautiful organ solo from Widor's "Sixth Symphony" was rendered with fine effect by Albert W. Snow, the noted organist, who was forced by the applause to grant an encore.

The prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" the "Gypsy Dance" from "Carmen," the intermezzo from Mascagni's "L'Amico Fritz" and a long selection from "Samson and Delilah" were all given in splendid fashion by the big orchestra, the final number on the program being Brahms' "Hungarian Dance No 1, in G minor."

A considerable portion of the audience was new to the "Pops" and from every outward sign, the new-comers appeared to enjoy the experience exceedingly.

This evening's program will have for soloist Alfred Holy, harpist. The selections will be: Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba," Gounod; overture to "Il Guarany," Gomez; Capriccio for strings, Scarlatti; Fantasia, "Lohengrin," Wagner; "Dance of the Hours," Ponchielli; harp solo, Holy; Rondo Capriccioso, Mendelssohn; finale from the Fourth Symphony, Tschaikowsky; selection, "Madama Butterfly," Puccini; "Enfantillage," Van Westerhout; waltz, "Espana," Waldteufel; Hungarian Dances, Brahms.

BIG CROWD OPENS 1920 POP SEASON

Everybody Glad and Everything is Applauded

Post May 5

BY OLIN DOWNES

A May night typical of New England, and not at all of that blessed season of which the poets sing, was not chilly and damp enough to keep a large and very enthusiastic audience away from the opening Pop concert of the "spring" season last night in Symphony Hall. Then the orchestra, 80 strong, led by Agide Jacchia, foregathered in the august auditorium, and in the shadows of statues of classical gods and picture hats worn by listeners of the feminine persuasion performed with superb sonority and gusto.

EVERYTHING APPROVED

Neither the absence of fluids of the stronger variety nor the comparative seriousness of the programme dampened the enthusiasm. The audience gossiped between the performances, but listened very attentively while they were in order, and applauded almost everything. The composition mattered comparatively little. Everyone was glad that the Pop season concurrently with the flowers that bloom in these merry months, had arrived, and all rejoiced in the performances of the orchestra.

Mr. Jacchia, a musician not afraid to carry out his ideals, had been daring in his programme. It included not only such classically popular things as the Schubert Marche Militaire, Nicolai's overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," selections from Puccini's "La Boheme," music from "Carmen," from "Samson and Delilah," but also the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and the storm music from Verdi's "Otello." When this latter piece commenced, with a prodigious bang of the cymbals and blare of the brass, one lady nearly tumbled from her seat in her consternation, but she recovered, and the orchestra went on happily, licketty-split, right through the waves.

"Tristan" Out of Element

Perhaps the "Tristan" prelude is a little too serious for the Pop concert-room. It should be heard in the darkness of the theatre pit, the whispers and cries of longing should vibrate from the depths of what d'Annunzio called the "mystic gulf," namely, Wagner's concealed orchestra. The orchestra of last night was not concealed. It lay prominent to view in a veritable Venusberg of potted plants and flowers and those infallible manikins performed with unerring accuracy and nonchalance.

Albert Snow, organist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was soloist of the occasion. He played the sonorous finale of Widor's Sixth Symphony, a piece which has pomp, ceremony and pretence. Truth to tell, it has for us a good deal of pedantic rumpus about nothing in particular. But Mr. Snow's performance gave much pleasure, and still more pleasure was given by the melodious encore which he added in response to the applause.

All Like Pop Music

Other numbers were better known and very much liked. We ourselves, hardened and surfeited (as all newspaper writers are supposed to be) with music, good, bad and indifferent, take a vast pleasure in the exhilarating music of Nicolai, in the sweet, sentimental slush of Puccini—Puccini, so admirably interpreted by Mr. Jacchia—in the skipping gypsy refrains from the introduction to Bizet's "Carmen," in the irresistible swing of the "Blue Danube" waltz.

The Pop programmes are now on for weeks to come, every night in the week save Sunday. A glimpse at the programmes planned for the future shows how resourceful Mr. Jacchia is in arranging his lists, which always have exceptional variety and interest. By every testimony of yesterday evening, his audiences esteem him highly, not only as programme-maker, but interpreter.

BIG AUDIENCE AT POPS' OPENING

Despite .00 Per Cent. Wet Refreshments People Are Enthusiastic

Herald

BRIGHT PLUMAGE NOT YET IN EVIDENCE

May 4

The opening concert of the Pops for the season was given last evening in Symphony Hall with every table on the main floor occupied, and all of the balcony seats taken. The front of the stage was attractively decorated with foliage, plants of many varieties, the centre space being filled with massed rhododendrons.

The atmosphere of gayety and the bright plumage which until the last few years had characterized the opening night of these popular concerts were still lacking, the war-time somberness of attire predominating. The latest decree of fashion that sleeves shall be short as well as skirts, had been followed by a few of those present, but in most cases dark wraps concealed whatever was hidden below, and a general air of sobriety prevailed.

In line with the dry law, wet goods of .00 per cent. proof were much in evidence, and the "bar" which had been installed in the rear of the first balcony did a brisk business. Tables were placed along one side of the wide passageway, and during the intermissions this new addition to the popular entertainment was well patronized. The usual light refreshments also were served in the hall.

An enlarged orchestra of Symphony players conducted by Agide Jacchia gave the following program:

OPENING NIGHT.

March Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Song Without Words.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"...Wagner
"Gypsy Dance" from "Carmen".....Bizet
Organ Solo: Finale, 6th Symphony—Widor
(Mr. Albert W. Snow)
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah."
Saint-Saens
Canzone.....Van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz."
Mascagni
Hungarian Dance No. 1, in G minor.
Brahms

This program of favorite pieces was received with enthusiasm by the large audience, the splendid and spirited playing of the men meriting the prolonged

ITEMS ABOUT MUSIC

Trans

A Piece by Strauss for the First Time in Boston Since the War—Satan as Operatic Figure—Debussy in Berlin—A New Ballet for New York

FOR the first time since the beginning, three years ago, of the late war between the United States and Germany, music of Richard Strauss will be played publicly this evening in Boston—the waltzes from his operatic comedy, "Der Rosenkavalier," on the programme of "The prints. Every one has seen so many colored prints of one sort and another of these subjects that the motive itself has become familiarized, and then again, there is too much detail in the picture, so that it loses in concentration of effect. "On Lake Como, Number Two," is far better Pops" in the familiar arrangement for the concert-hall. Next season, unless various signs fail, one or another of his tone-poems may be heard at the Symphony Concerts.

Without so much as half a smile, Musical America solemnly announces in heavy black type that there is little likelihood that the seceders from the Symphony Orchestra can or will assemble a rival band. Nearly everybody else had forgotten them and it.

Monsieur Raoul Gunsbourg, the director of the noted opera house at Monte Carlo occasionally takes exercise as a composer, sure of the performance of his music in at least one theatre. This time he has set Satan in a music-drama of like title, beginning with the revolt of the angels (as in "Paradise Lost") and then shifting the fiend to the building of the tower of Babel, the downfall of Jerusalem, the raids of Attila and, finally, the end of the world. Last month Monsieur Gunsbourg set his own handiwork on his own stage. In a way the outcome was amusing, though otherwise not exactly impressive. Mr. Muratore took the part of Satan.

At the Pops Tonight

(Operatic Night)

March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier".....Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin".....Chaikovsky
Air, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise".....Charpentier
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Intermezzo from "William Ratcliff".....Mascagni
Intermezzo from "The Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli

Conductor: A. Jacchia

...ballets with which Mr.

THIS IS OPERATIC NIGHT AT THE POPS

Herald May 5

All of the Pieces on the Program from Well Known Classics

Agide Jacchia, long famous as a conductor of opera, has made the following program for operatic night at the Pops tonight, which will consist entirely of selections from well-known operas:

Triumphal March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltzes from "The Rose Cavalier"..Strauss
Fantastia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Polonaise, from "Eugin Onegin".....
.....Tschaikowsky
"Depuis le Jour," from "Louise".....
.....Charpentier
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff"..Mascagni
Intermezzo, act III, "Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
Dance of the Hours, from "la Gioconda".....Ponchielli

...ENGLISH ARRIVALS

...infantry at the Springfield Armory.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Post May 6

Agide Jacchia, long famous as a conductor of opera, has made the following programme for Operatic Night at the Pops tonight, which will consist entirely of selections from well-known operas:

Triumphal March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltzes from "The Rose Cavalier".....Strauss
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Polonaise, from "Eugin Onegin".....Tschaikowsky
"Depuis le Jour," from "Louise"..Charpentier
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff".....Mascagni
Intermezzo Act III., "Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli

applause which followed many of the

Conductor Jacchia displayed much force and energy. He graciously acknowledged the tributes paid to the orchestra, but added few numbers to the program. Mr. Snow was enthusiastically recalled after his organ solo.

The next special Pop concert will be given Monday evening, May 10, when the house will be sold out to the Boston Chamber of Commerce.

THE EIDE RECORD

Post May 5

POPS TONIGHT

At the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall at 8 o'clock tonight, the programme will be as follows:

Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fucik
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Madrigal.....Caccini
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
First Hungarian Rhapsody, in F major..Liszt
Flute solo—
a. Romance sans Parols.....Guilmant
b. Polonaise.....Pessard
(Mr. Arthur Brooke)
Prelude.....Rachmaninoff
Scenes Pittoresques.....Massenet
a. Air de Ballet. b. Fete Boheme.
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"....Tschaikowsky
Ave Marie from "Othello".....Verdi

At the Pops Tonight

March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier".....Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin".....Chaikovsky
Air, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise".....Charpentier
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Intermezzo from "William Ratcliff"..Mascagni
Intermezzo from "The Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli

Conductor: A. Jacchia

At the Pops Tonight

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture to "Figaro's Wedding"..Mozart
The Rout of Bacchus from "Sylvia".....Delibes
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Ride of the Valkyrs.....Wagner
Violin Solo, Rondo.....Mozart-Kreisler
Serenade.....Schubert
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".....Vollstedt
Hungarian Dance No. 5.....Brahms

Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Soloist: J. Theodorowics

— Where is that man who was w dering what the newspapers would up with after the fighting was o [Chicago Evening Post

Mar 4

POP CONCERT

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall at 8 o'clock tonight the program will be as follows:

Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fucik
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Madrigal.....Caccini
First Hungarian Rhapsody, in F major.....Liszt
Flute Solo—
(a) Romance sans Paroles.....Guilmant
(b) Polonaise.....Pessard
(Arthur Brooke)
Prelude.....Rachmaninoff
Scenes Pittoresques.....Massenet
(a) Air de Ballet (b) Fete Boheme
Overture Solennelle, "1912"..Tschaikowsky
Ave Maria from "Othello".....Verdi
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Slavonic Dance No. 1.....Dvorak

Herald

...you?

'POPS' OPEN AT SYMPHONY HALL

Boston music lovers gathered at Symphony Hall last night at the opening concert of the Pops season. Every table on the floor was taken and the balconies were crowded with people, who enthusiastically applauded every number on the program, which was well chosen and presented some of the more popular of the musical classics.

Agide Jacchia received an ovation when he appeared on the platform. The audience applauded heartily as the conductor tapped his baton to signal the opening chords of the first number.

The feature of the evening was the organ solo by Albert W. Snow. After playing the Finale, Sixth Symphony, Snow was recalled again and again, and eventually compelled to give an encore which was "Cantilene Nuptiale," by Dubois.

"Blue Danube," by Strauss.

The program follows:

March Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Song without words.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
"Gypsy Dance" from "Carmen".....Bizet
Organ Solo: Finale, Sixth Symphony..Widor
(Mr. Albert W. Snow)
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah."
Saint-Saens
Canzone.....Van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni
Hungarian Dance No. 1, in G minor.
Brahms

Music

Trav May 3

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

MORE LAST RITES OF THE DEAD SEASON

Another and Warmer Leave-Taking for Mr. Monteux—Titta Ruffo, and Also His Audience, Entertain — Miss Neilsen in New Graces of Voice and Skill—Mr. Werrenrath to England

WHATEVER the audience at the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon lacked in heartiness toward Mr. Monteux, the succeeding audience of Saturday evening amply returned to him. For the conductor, for Mr. McCormack as assisting singer, for the orchestra, for the concerts as an institution, momentarily shaken but now firm-set again, the company filled Symphony Hall to the last seat. It was long, loud, sincere in applause when Mr. Monteux came to his place. It was first engrossed and then stirred by his version of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" which, unlike the listeners of Friday, it was hearing for the first time. The "Scene in the Fields," the "March to the Scaffold" won warm plaudits; and at the end of the whole piece conductor and orchestra shared round after round of clapping. Mr. d'Indy's tone-poem, "Istar," was likewise better received on Saturday; while with Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers," the pleasure of music and performance plainly ran high and deep. When both were done nearly the whole audience lingered and, standing, recalled Mr. Monteux again and again. Soon he had the orchestra on its feet around him. For, without its fortitude, loyalties and zeal, not even he could have saved and restored the Symphony Concerts.

As good fortune would have it, both the conductor and the band were on their mettle. Clearly out of Berlioz's stripped, concentrated, superlatively direct music, wherein so many instruments and choirs are used separately, stood the individual quality of the orchestra and Mr. Monteux's ability as fusing leader. Seldom has the band been more graphic voice to such a symphony of pictorial, romantic, highly strung fantasy or a conductor, here in Boston, shown larger and finer mastery of these exacting pages. The orchestra's command of harmonic and instrumental color, Mr. Monteux's imagination with it and ear for it, shone manifold throughout the performance of "Istar;" while both were equally plastic, songful, sumptuous and striding of tone through Wagner's Prelude. Even in Dr. Muck's time, it was hardly more thrilling to hear as crown to an ending season. Since those days also and in happy omen for the autumn, there has not been warmer leave-taking between audience, conductor and orchestra. Thanks, most, to Mr. Monteux, the Symphony Concerts are themselves again.

"POPS" OPEN SEASON AT SYMPHONY

The "Pops" are with us again.

Hundreds of people gathered in Symphony Hall for the opening night of these ever-popular concerts by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To be sure, it was not like the opening nights of other years. The Eighteenth Constitutional Amendment, having to do with the dispensing of liquid refreshments with a "kick," has put an awful crimp in the "Pops," as well as in entertainment elsewhere.

The "pep" of opening nights of other years, when a fellow got outside a bottle or two of Scotch ale from earthenware bottles, was missing. An alliterative press agent might refer to them as the "Pepless Pops."

While the "Pops" are not quite like the "Pops" of yesteryear, they are still worth going to. It would be difficult to get such a high-class entertainment anywhere for so small a sum of money, especially in these days of the HCL of everything.

Not only was the floor crowded at the opener, but the balconies as well, and the true test of whether an entertainment is worth while is the attendance in the upper part of the house.

Many prefer to sit in the last row of the second balcony in Symphony Hall to listen to the music than on the floor. In the balconies you will find real music lovers.

Agide Jacchia is the conductor again this year. He is an artist of the first class. It was a pleasure to watch him as he put every ounce of energy into the direction of the musicians. His conducting of Mascagni's intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz" was superb.

Among the first nighters was Miss Alice Neilsen, who has sung many times in opera under Mr. Jacchia at Montreal. She regards him as the most capable conductor of "La Boheme" under whom she has sung.

Several persons who have attended every first night since the institution of the "Pops," more than thirty years ago, were present including some of Boston's best families. The season is to be of ten w

OPENING OF "POPS" DRAWS BIG CROWD

Popular as Ever Despite Advent of Prohibition

Jacchia Conducts an Attractive Program With Spirit

Globe May 4

The annual Spring transformation of Symphony Hall occurred last evening, and the eager audience which flocked there for the opening of the 35th season of the "Pops" found the settings for this unique entertainment much the same as in former years.

In place of solid rows of seats which, during the rest of the year, fill the floor of the big hall, tables and chairs are scattered about it, while waitresses—waiters, no longer, since beer and light wines vanished from the menu of the "Pops"—in attractive costume, flit hither and thither, providing thirsty music-lovers with lemonade, ginger ale, root beer and similar beverages.

Apparently prohibition has made no difference whatever in the popularity of Boston's beloved institution, for literally every chair on the floor, as well as the seats in both balconies, was filled last evening for the attractive concert which Agide Jacchia, the popular conductor of last season, provided for the opening night.

An innovation which elicited much praise from old-timers at these concerts was the arrangement of a fringe of attractive potted ferns and other greens about the edge of the platform, with a big bank of pink azaleas directly in front of the conductor's stand. This simple arrangement of flowers and greens adds a touch of color which seems especially in keeping with the rather informal atmosphere of the "Pops."

Mr Jacchia conducted last evening with the spirit and fire for which he is so justly noted. Particularly stirring was the playing of the Tempest Scene from Verdi's "Othello," in which the orchestra achieved a tremendous success. The program opened with Schubert's familiar "Marche Militaire," followed by the spirited overture to Nicolai's "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

As a whole, the program contained fewer popular numbers than has been the general rule in former seasons, although a number were played as extra pieces, in response to prolonged and enthusiastic applause. The beautiful organ solo from Widor's "Sixth Symphony" was rendered with fine effect by Albert W. Snow, the noted organist, who was forced by the applause to grant an encore.

The prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" the "Gypsy Dance" from "Carmen," the intermezzo from Mascagni's "L'Amico Fritz" and a long selection from "Samson and Delilah" were all given in splendid fashion by the big orchestra, the final number on the program being Brahms' "Hungarian Dance No 1, in G minor."

A considerable portion of the audience was new to the "Pops" and from every outward sign, the new-comers appeared to enjoy the experience exceedingly.

This evening's program will have for soloist Alfred Holy, harpist. The selections will be: Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba," Gounod; overture to "Il Guarany," Gomez; Capriccio for strings, Scarlatti; Fantasia, "Lohengrin," Wagner; "Dance of the Hours," Ponchielli; harp solo, Holy; Rondo Capriccioso, Mendelssohn; finale from the Fourth Symphony, Tschaikowsky; selection, "Madama Butterfly," Puccini; "Enfantillage," Van Westerhout; waltz, "Espana," Waldteufel; Hungarian Dances, Brahms.

BIG CROWD OPENS 1920 POP SEASON

Everybody Glad and Everything is Applauded

Post May 4

BY OLIN DOWNES

A May night typical of New England, and not at all of that blessed season of which the poets sing, was not chilly and damp enough to keep a large and very enthusiastic audience away from the opening Pop concert of the "spring" season last night in Symphony Hall. Then the orchestra, 80 strong, led by Agide Jacchia, foregathered in the august auditorium, and in the shadows of statues of classical gods and picture hats worn by listeners of the feminine persuasion performed with superb sonority and gusto.

EVERYTHING APPROVED

Neither the absence of fluids of the stronger variety nor the comparative seriousness of the programme dampened the enthusiasm. The audience gossiped between the performances, but listened very attentively while they were in order, and applauded almost everything. The composition mattered comparatively little. Everyone was glad that the Pop season concurrently with the flowers that bloom in these merry months, had arrived, and all rejoiced in the performances of the orchestra.

Mr. Jacchia, a musician not afraid to carry out his ideals, had been daring in his programme. It included not only such classically popular things as the Schubert Marche Militaire, Nicolai's overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," selections from Puccini's "La Boheme," music from "Carmen," from "Samson and Delilah," but also the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and the storm music from Verdi's "Otello." When this latter piece commenced, with a prodigious bang of the cymbals and blare of the brass, one lady nearly tumbled from her seat in her consternation, but she recovered, and the orchestra went on happily, licketty-split, right through the waves.

"Tristan" Out of Element

Perhaps the "Tristan" prelude is a little too serious for the Pop concert-room. It should be heard in the darkness of the theatre pit, the whispers and cries of longing should vibrate from the depths of what d'Annunzio called the "mystic gulf," namely, Wagner's concealed orchestra. The orchestra of last night was not concealed. It lay prominent to view in a veritable Venusberg of potted plants and flowers and those infallible manikins performed with unerring accuracy and nonchalance.

Albert Snow, organist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was soloist of the occasion. He played the sonorous finale of Widor's Sixth Symphony, a piece which has pomp, ceremony and pretence. Truth to tell, it has for us a good deal of pedantic rumpus about nothing in particular. But Mr. Snow's performance gave much pleasure, and still more pleasure was given by the melodious encore which he added in response to the applause.

All Like Pop Music

Other numbers were better known and very much liked. We ourselves, hardened and surfeited (as all newspaper writers are supposed to be) with music, good, bad and indifferent, take a vast pleasure in the exhilarating music of Nicolai, in the sweet, sentimental slush of Puccini—Puccini, so admirably interpreted by Mr. Jacchia—in the skipping gypsy refrains from the introduction to Bizet's "Carmen," in the irresistible swing of the "Blue Danube" waltz.

The Pop programmes are now on for weeks to come, every night in the week save Sunday. A glimpse at the programmes planned for the future shows how resourceful Mr. Jacchia is in arranging his lists, which always have exceptional variety and interest. By every testimony of yesterday evening, his audiences esteem him highly, not only as programme-maker, but interpreter.

BIG AUDIENCE AT POPS' OPENING

Despite .00 Per Cent. Wet Refreshments People Are Enthusiastic

Herald May 4

BRIGHT PLUMAGE NOT YET IN EVIDENCE

The opening concert of the Pops for the season was given last evening in Symphony Hall with every table on the main floor occupied, and all of the balcony seats taken. The front of the stage was attractively decorated with foliage, plants of many varieties, the centre space being filled with massed rhododendrons.

The atmosphere of gayety and the bright plumage which until the last few years had characterized the opening night of these popular concerts were still lacking, the war-time somberness of attire predominating. The latest decree of fashion that sleeves shall be short as well as skirts, had been followed by a few of those present, but in most cases dark wraps concealed whatever was hidden below, and a general air of sobriety prevailed.

In lino with the dry law, wet goods of .00 per cent. proof were much in evidence, and the "bar" which had been installed in the rear of the first balcony did a brisk business. Tables were placed along one side of the wide passageway, and during the intermissions this new addition to the popular entertainment was well patronized. The usual light refreshments also were served in the hall.

An enlarged orchestra of Symphony players conducted by Agide Jacchia gave the following program:

OPENING NIGHT.

March Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Song Without Words.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"...Wagner
"Gypsy Dance" from "Carmen".....Bizet
Organ Solo: Finale, 6th Symphony—Widor
(Mr. Albert W. Snow)
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah."
Saint-Saens
Canzone.....Van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz."
Mascagni
Hungarian Dance No. 1, in G minor.
Brahms

This program of favorite pieces was received with enthusiasm by the large audience, the splendid and spirited playing of the men meriting the prolonged

Trav

ITEMS ABOUT MUSIC

A Piece by Strauss for the First Time in Boston Since the War—Satan as Operatic Figure—Debussy in Berlin—A New Ballet for New York

FOR the first time since the beginning, three years ago, of the late war between the United States and Germany, music of Richard Strauss will be played publicly this evening in Boston—the waltzes from his operatic comedy, "Der Rosenkavalier," on the programme of "The prints. Every one has seen so many colored prints of one sort and another of these subjects that the motive itself has become familiarized, and then again, there is too much detail in the picture, so that it loses in concentration of effect. "On Lake Como, Number Two," is far better Pops" in the familiar arrangement for the concert-hall. Next season, unless various signs fail, one or another of his tone-poems may be heard at the Symphony Concerts.

Without so much as half a smile, Musical America solemnly announces in heavy black type that there is little likelihood that the seceders from the Symphony Orchestra can or will assemble a rival band Nearly everybody else had forgotten them and it.

Monsieur Raoul Gunsbourg, the director of the noted opera house at Monte Carlo occasionally takes exercise as a composer, sure of the performance of his music in at least one theatre. This time he has set Satan in a music-drama of like title, beginning with the revolt of the angels (as in "Paradise Lost") and then shifting the fiend to the building of the tower of Babel, the downfall of Jerusalem, the raids of Attila and, finally, the end of the world. Last month Monsieur Gunsbourg set his own handiwork on his own stage. In a way the outcome was amusing, though otherwise not exactly impressive. Mr. Muratore took the part of Satan.

At the Pops Tonight

(Operatic Night)

March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier".....Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin".....Chaikovsky
Air, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise".....Charpentier
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Intermezzo from "William Ratcliff".....Mascagni
Intermezzo from "The Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli

Conductor: A. Jacchia

...wer ballets with which Mr.

THIS IS OPERATIC NIGHT AT THE POPS

Herald May

All of the Pieces on the Program from Well Known Classics

Agide Jacchia, long famous as a conductor of opera, has made the following program for operatic night at the Pops tonight, which will consist entirely of selections from well-known operas:

Triumphal March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltzes from "The Rose Cavalier"..Strauss
Fantastia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Polonaise, from "Eugin Onegin"...Tschaikowsky
"Depuis le Jour," from "Louise"...Charpentier
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff"...Mascagni
Intermezzo, act III, "Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
Dance of the Hours, from "la Gioconda".....Ponchielli

...GLISH ARRIVALS

...infantry at the Springfield ...

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Post May 6

Agide Jacchia, long famous as a conductor of opera, has made the following programme for Operatic Night at the Pops tonight, which will consist entirely of selections from well-known operas:

Triumphal March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltzes from "The Rose Cavalier"....Strauss
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Polonaise, from "Eugin Onegin"..Tschaikowsky
"Depuis le Jour," from "Louise"..Charpentier
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff".....Mascagni
Intermezzo Act III., "Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda"
Ponchielli

applause which followed many of the

Conductor Jacchia displayed much force and energy. He graciously acknowledged the tributes paid to the orchestra, but added few numbers to the program. Mr. Snow was enthusiastically recalled after his organ solo.

The next special Pop concert will be given Monday evening, May 10, when the house will be sold out to the Boston Chamber of Commerce.

THE FIRE RECORD

Post May

POPS TONIGHT

At the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall at 8 o'clock tonight, the programme will be as follows:

Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fucik
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Madrigal.....Caccini
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
First Hungarian Rhapsody, in F major..Liszt
Flute solo—
a. Romance sans Parols.....Guilmant
b. Polonaise.....Pessard
(Mr. Arthur Brooke)
Prelude.....Rachmaninoff
Scenes Pittoresques.....Massenet
a. Air de Ballet. b. Fete Boheme.
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
Ave Marie from "Othello".....Verdi

At the Pops Tonight

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture to "Figaro's Wedding"..Mozart
The Rout of Bacchus from "Sylvia".....Delibes
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Ride of the Valkyrs.....Wagner
Violin Solo, Rondo.....Mozart-Kreisler
Serenade.....Schubert
Tempest Scene from "Othello"....Verdi
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".....Vollstedt
Hungarian Dance No. 5.....Brahms

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: J. Theodorowicz

At the Pops Tonight

March from "The Queen of Sheba".....Gounod
Overture to "Il Guarany".....Gomez
Capriccio.....Scarlatti
Fantasia, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Harp Solo, "In Springtime".....Holy
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Finale from the Fourth Symphony.....Chaikovsky
Selection, "Madama Butterfly"..Puccini
Enfantillage.....Van Westerhout
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Hungarian Dance No. 3.....Brahms
Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: A. Holy

— Where is that man who was w...dering what the newspapers would up with after the fighting was o...
[Chicago Evening Post

POP CONCERT

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall at 8 o'clock tonight the program will be as follows:

Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fucik
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Madrigal.....Caccini
First Hungarian Rhapsody, in F major.....Liszt
Flute Solo—
(a) Romance sans Paroles.....Guilmant
(b) Polonaise.....Pessard
(Arthur Brooke)
Prelude.....Rachmaninoff
Scenes Pittoresques.....Massenet
(a) Air de Ballet (b) Fete Boheme
Overture Solennelle, "1912"..Tschaikowsky
Ave Maria from "Othello".....Verdi
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Slavonic Dance No. 1.....Dvorak

'POPS' OPEN AT SYMPHONY HALL

Boston music lovers gathered at Symphony Hall last night at the opening concert of the Pops season. Every table on the floor was taken and the balconies were crowded with people, who enthusiastically applauded every number on the program, which was well chosen and presented some of the more popular of the musical classics.

Agide Jacchia received an ovation when he appeared on the platform. The audience applauded heartily as the conductor tapped his baton to signal the opening chords of the first number.

The feature of the evening was the organ solo by Albert W. Snow. After playing the Finale, Sixth Symphony, Snow was recalled again and again, and eventually compelled to give an encore which was "Cantilene Nuptiale," by Dubois.

"Blue Danube," by Strauss.

The program follows:

March Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Song without words.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
"Gypsy Dance" from "Carmen".....Bizet
Organ Solo: Finale, Sixth Symphony..Widor
(Mr. Albert W. Snow)
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah."
Saint-Saens
Canzone.....Van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni
Hungarian Dance No. 1, in G minor.
Brahms

POPS PROGRAMME

The following programme will be played by Agide Jacchia and the Pops orchestra in Symphony Hall tonight:

French Military March ..... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Masaniello" ..... Auber
Whispering of the Flowers ..... Blon
Fantasia, "Mefistofele" ..... Boito
Finale of "Scheherazade" .. Rimsky-Korsakoff
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.
Minuet (for String Orchestra) .... Boccherini
Tarantelle ..... Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Three Russian Folk Songs.
Arranged by Agide Jacchia
a Volga Bargemen's Song. b Cossack Song. c Dubinushka.
The Marionettes ..... Lacombe
Waltz, "The Skaters" ..... Waldteufel
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" .. Tschaikowsky

At the Pops Tonight

Entrance of the Gladiators ..... Fucik
Overture to "William Tell" .. Rossini
Madrigal ..... Caccini
Fantasia, "Faust" ..... Gounod
First Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Flute Soli:
Romance sans Paroles .... Guilmant
Polonaise ..... Pessard
Prelude ..... Rakhmaninov
Scènes Pittoresques ..... Massenet
Overture ..... Chaikovsky
Ave Maria from "Othello" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ..... Waldteufel
Slavonic Dance, No. 1 ..... Dvorák
Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: Arthur Brooke

POPS PROGRAM

The following popular program will be played by Agide Jacchia and the Pops Orchestra in Symphony Hall tonight:

French Military March ..... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Masaniello" ..... Auber
Whispering of the Flowers ..... Blon
Fantasia, "Mefistofele" ..... Boito
Finale of "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Festival at Bagdad. The sea. The ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior. Conclusion.
Minuet (for string orchestra) ..... Boccherini
Tarantelle ..... Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Three Russian Folk Songs—
(a) Volga Bargemen's Song .. } Arranged by
(b) Cossack Song ..... } Agide Jacchia
(c) Dubinushka .....
The Marionettes ..... Lacomb
Waltz, "The Skaters" ..... Waldteufe
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" .. Tschaikowsky

STRAUSS AT POPS

First Time Since War Modern German Music Played Here

By J. V. CLARK

For the first time since the United States entered the war against Germany the name of Richard Strauss has stood on a Boston program when at the Pops last evening the orchestra played the waltzes from "The Rose Cavalier."

The German classics were long since admitted to our programs, but the music of Richard Strauss, the type of composer who stands for modern German economic and military ideals, has been barred. Strauss' statements concerning Germany's dominancy during the early part of the war absolutely prohibited his music in this country. Mr. Monteux drew the line at Richard Strauss.

Enmity, however, cannot last for ever. The work must resume its normal course. Strauss was tried out last evening—there was no public resentment. Report has it that Mr. Monteux will change his views the coming winter and again add Strauss to the Symphony repertoire.

The marvellous waltzes from the "Rose Cavalier," gorgeous in thematic material, dazzling in orchestration, were very finely played by Mr. Jacchia and his men.

The orchestra last evening in an all-operatic bill gave a performance of the highest rank. Mr. Jacchia conducted with the "pep" that distinguishes him, yet with a fine feeling for proportion and for various styles of music.

Some of the old "chestnuts" of an operatic program actually sounded fresh. Witness the performance of the "William Tell" overture.

The performance of Rossini's classic overture was embellished by superb cello playing by Georges Miquelle. This young man, presumably, will play the cello solo passages during the Pops. He should be more than first cellist; he should be occasionally soloist.

In the preludes to Act 1 and Act 3 of "Lohengrin" Mr. Jacchia showed that his string section and his full orchestra tone were equally good. Since the symphonic strike there has been some talk of lessening in quality, as well as quantity of the strings, and the hiding of this weakness. Both Mr. Monteux and Mr. Jacchia in recent concerts have proven that the string section, especially the first violins, is as lovely as ever.

The program had dignity and variety. It was heartily applauded by an audience that filled the hall to capacity. In no other American city can one hear, evening in, evening out, such delightful musical programs in spring as here in Boston at the

POPS

Following upon the heels of a successful opening week, the second week of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall will offer three special nights, and six programs which prove Maestro Jacchia's ability to jam each evening with brilliance and melody. Of course the conductor's infectious verve and the "talent" under him, eighty strong, are the prime factors in the high flow of spirits. There will be three special nights in the second week. On Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Commerce, Robert S. Weeks, chairman, will have a "get-together." On Wednesday, May 12, Amherst College Night will bring songs and other additional celebrations. William B. Merrill will be song leader. This night will be given under the auspices of the Amherst Alumni Association, Donald P. McKay, president. Carl Lamson, the famous accompanist of Kreisler, a graduate of '09, will be the organist. On Friday, May 14, there will be an All-Russian-Tschaikowsky program.

SECOND WEEK OF POP CONCERTS

A very large part of Boston has manifested delight at the opening week of Pop Concerts, sitting around the tables of Symphony Hall, where refreshments are served during the music, and crowding the balconies every night. The finest Symphony orchestra has stimulated spirits to the highest pitch. Maestro Jacchia, the conductor, has once more proved his ability to infuse quality and genuine interest into programs which are nevertheless agreeably light. For the second week, now in progress, there will be three special nights. On Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Commerce, Robert S. Weeks, chairman, will have a "get-together" evening at the Pops. On Wednesday, May 12, "Amherst Night" will mark the first college night of the season, when singing will be one of several additional features. William B. Merrill will be song leader. This night will be given under the auspices of the Amherst Alumni Association, Donald P. McKay, president. Carl Lamson, a graduate of '99, will be the organist. For Friday night, May 14, an All-Russian-Tschaikowsky program proves by its brilliance and melody that the Slavic race is musical to the core. The programs of the week are as follows:

MONDAY

March, "Second Connecticut" ..... Reeves
Overture, "Light Cavalry" ..... Suppe
Waltz "Estudiantina" ..... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .... Mascagni
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Souvenir ..... Drdla
Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Selection, "Monsieur Beaucaire" ..... Messager
"Indian Summer," an American Idyl .. Herbert
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
March, "El Capitan" ..... Sousa

TUESDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet" ..... Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Love's Dream After the Ball ..... Czibulka
Fantasia, "La Tosca" ..... Puccini
Rhapsody, "Espana" ..... Chabrier
Indian Idyl (Arranged by Agide Jacchia) ..... MacDowell
Ballet Music from "Rosamunde" ..... Schubert
Introduction to Act III of "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Selection, "Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Minuet ..... Bolzoni
Waltz, "Roses from the South" ..... Strauss
Hungarian Dance No. 6 in D major ..... Brahms

AMHERST COLLEGE NIGHT—WEDNESDAY

Entrance of the Gladiators ..... Fucik
Overture, "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Cheer for Old Amherst ..... Pierce, '02
Campus Dreams ..... Blake, '97
Lord Geoffrey Amherst ..... Hamilton, '06
Overture Solennelle, "1812" ..... Tschaikowsky
Largo (with organ) ..... Handel
Selection, "Apple Blossoms" ..... Kreisler
a. Paige's Horse ..... Woodbridge, '89
b. To the Fairest College of Them All ..... Bartlett, '03
(Organist, Carl Lamson, '99)
a. Amherst Alma Mater ..... Hamilton, '06
b. Stein Song (Words of Chorus by Burges Johnson, '99) ..... Bullard
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Rakoczy March ..... Berlioz

THURSDAY

Overture to "The Bronze Horse" ..... Auber
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song" ..... Strauss
Andante Cantabile ..... Smith
Fantasia, "Aida" ..... Verdi
Rhapsody, "The Bamboula" .. Coleridge-Taylor
Oboe Solo:
a. Romance for Oboe ..... Schumann
b. Musette ..... Lenom
(Mr. Speyer)
Polish Dance ..... Scharwenka
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Marche Slave ..... Tschaikowsky
Serenata Barcarola ..... De Nardis
Love's Dream After the Ball ..... Czibulka
Cortege de Bacchus ..... Delibes

FRIDAY

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" .. Tschaikowsky
Ballet Music from "The Demon" .. Rubinstein
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Finale, "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Marche Slave ..... Tschaikowsky
Andante Cantabile ..... Tschaikowsky
Waltz from "The Serenade" ..... Tschaikowsky
Third Movement, Pathetic Symphony ..... Tschaikowsky
Overture Solennelle, "1812" (with organ) ..... Tschaikowsky
Cossack Song (Arranged by Mr. Jacchia) ..... Borodin
Dances from "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin
Cortege from "Mlada" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff

SATURDAY

Overture to "Jeanne d'Arc" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Meditation, "Thais" ..... Massenet
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Suite, "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
Duet, "Elephant and Gnat" ..... Kling
Bassoon, B. Piller
Piccolo, A. Battles
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .. Mascagni
Third Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Selection, "Jack o' Lantern" ..... Caryll
Indian Idyl (Arranged by Mr. Jacchia) ..... MacDowell
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" .. Saint-Saens

Musical Lure at Modified Pop Concerts

IN the old days of the Pops there was some real popping. And beer glasses used to be rattled on the tables. Choruses arose from time to time—concerted demands for encores and "Thank you's" from the students enjoying their Offenbach and Pilsener. Sometimes it was necessary for the conductor to rap on his stand and turn around and frown to check the enthusiasm coming from deep potations.

But in spite of prohibition the Pops continue. Now the enthusiasm is of the less than one-half per cent. order—academic, esthetic, tinctured only by the smoke of cigars and cigarettes. Everything is changed, but the music, which still remains as a souvenir of the old German beer garden policy that introduced the Pops many years ago. The large orchestra is as usual made up of Symphony players; the programs are generally of a light nature—like the beer and wine that once flowed freely before the tea-room waitrsses descended upon Symphony Hall; and there is a conductor of the old Pop calibre, Agide Jacchia.

It will be a welcome day for regular Pop patrons when 2.75 beer and light wines come back; when music will not be the only means of exhilaration.

For the second week there will be three special nights. On Monday the Chamber of Commerce, Robert S. Weeks, chairman, will have a get-together evening. On Wednesday Amherst will have the first college night, when singing will be one of several additional features. William B. Merrill will be song leader. This night will be under the auspices of the alumni association, Donald P. McKay, president. Carl Lamson, the famous accompanist of Kreisler, a graduate of '99, will be organist. For Friday night an all-Russian-Tschaikowsky program proves by its brilliance and melody that the Slavic race is musical to the core.

Plan for Memorial Day

CONCERT MEMORANDA

Progress of The Pops—Cantor Rosenblatt to Be Heard Again—Four Noted Singers with Chorus

AS becomes an institution now established for thirty-five years in the favor of the public, The Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall are once more running prosperous course. Mr. Jacchia's programmes please; his zest as conductor for music and performance; his seventy men from the Symphony Orchestra play well. Many, as of old, take the pleasure of tobacco, drink, and "light refreshments" at the tables on the floor. As many more listen from the balconies as to any other concert of light music. So The Pops go well. Elsewhere on these pages is printed the programme for this evening. The arrangements for this week bring a "Chamber of Commerce Night" on Monday and an "Amherst College Night" on Wednesday, with both open to the public. The programmes promise the usual variety of agreeable pieces with plentiful operatic numbers and here and there a dash of "musical comedy."

FIRST SPECIAL NIGHT

Chamber of Commerce Members to Attend Tonight's Concert

The Boston Chamber of Commerce, Robert S. Weeks, chairman, will have a "get-together" celebration at the Pops tonight in Symphony Hall. The program for this, the first special night concert of the season (which will also be open to the public), follows:

March, "Second Connecticut," Reeves; overture, "Light Cavalry," Suppe; waltz, "Estudiantina," Waldteufel; fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Souvenir, Drdla; Pomp and Circumstance, Elgar; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; selection, "Monsieur Beaucaire," Messager; "Indian Summer," an American Idyl, Herbert; waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; march, "El Capitan," Sousa.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE POPS' NIGHT MONDAY

Monday evening will be Boston Chamber of Commerce night at the Pop Concert at Symphony Hall, and Conductor Agide Jacchia has arranged a special program for the benefit of chamber members and their friends. It will be the first time the chamber has ever arranged a function affording an opportunity for members to bring their families, and the innovation has already proved to be a highly popular one. Nearly all the tickets for the floor and balcony have already been distributed.

The occasion has been arranged by the chamber's committee on meetings and assemblies, and will be the final feature of the most successful social season ever enjoyed by chamber members.

SECOND WEEK OF POPS

For the second week of the "Pops" concerts in Symphony Hall, there will be three special nights. On Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Commerce, Robert S. Weeks, chairman, will have a "get-together" evening at the Pops. On Wednesday, May 12, "Amherst night" will mark the first college night of the season, when singing will be one of several additional features. William B Merrill will be song leader. This nigh will be given under the auspices o the Amherst Alumni Association, Donald P. McKay, president. Carl Lamson, the famous accompanist of Kreisler, a graduate of '99, will be the organist. For Friday night, May 14, an All-Russian-Tschaikowsky programme proves by its brilliance and melody that the Slavic race is musical to the core. The programmes of the week stand thus:

MONDAY, MAY 10.

March, "Second Connecticut" ..... Reeves
Overture, "Light Cavalry" ..... Suppe
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ..... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ... Mascagni
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Souvenir ..... Drdla
Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Selection, "Monsieur Beaucaire" .... Messager
"Indian Summer," an American Idyl .. Herbert
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
March, "El Capitan" ..... Sousa

TUESDAY, MAY 11.

Coronation March from "The Prophet" ..... Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Love's Dream After the Ball ... Czibulka
Fantasia, "La Tosca" ..... Puccini
Rhapsody, "Espana" ..... Chabrier
Indian Idyl (Arranged by Agide Jacchia) ..... MacDowell
Ballet Music from "Rosamunde" .... Schuber
Introduction to Act III. of "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Selection, "I Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Minuet ..... Bolzoni
Waltz, "Roses from the South" ..... Straus
Hungarian Dance No. 6 in D major—Brahm

AMHERST COLLEGE NIGHT, WEDNESDAY, May 12.

Entrance of the Gladiators ..... Fucik
Overture, "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Cheer for Old Amherst ..... J. N. Pierce, '02
Campus Dreams ..... E. N. Blake, '97
Lord Geoffrey Amherst—J. S. Hamilton, '06.
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" ... Tschaikowsky
Largo (with organ) ..... Handel
Selection, "Apple Blossoms" ..... Kreisler
a Paige's Horse. Prof. F. J. E. Woodbridge, '89
b To the Fairest College of Them All
D. C. Bartlett, '03
Organist—Carl Lamson, '09.
a Amherst Alma Mater ... J. S. Hamilton, '06
b Stein Song (words of chorus by Burges Johnson, '99) ..... Bullard
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Rakoczy March ..... Berlioz

THURSDAY, May 13.

Overture to "The Bronze Horse" ..... Auber
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song" ..... Strauss
Andante Cantabile ..... Smith
Fantasia, "Aida" ..... Verdi
Rhapsody, "The Bamboula" ... Coleridge-Taylor
Oboe Solo—a Romance for Oboe ..... Schumann
b Musette ..... Lenom
Mr. Louis Speyer.
Polish Dance ..... Scharwenka
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Marche Slave ..... Tschaikowsky
Serenata Barcarola ..... De Nardis
Love's Dream After the Ball ..... Czibulka
Cortege de Bacchus ..... Delibes

FRIDAY, MAY 14.

Russian Tschaikowsky Programme.
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" .. Tschaikowsky
Ballet Music from "The Demon" ... Rubinstein
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Finale, "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Marche Slave,
Andante Cantabile,
Waltz from "The Serenade,"
Third Movement, Pathetic Symphony, Tschaikowsky
(Allegro molto vivace.)

SATURDAY, MAY 15.

Overture to "Jeanne d'Arc" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Meditation, "Thais" ..... Massenet
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Suite, "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
a Les Chasseresses. b Pizzicato. c Cortege de Bacchus.
Duet, "Elephant and Gnat" ..... Kling
Bassoon—B. Piller,
Piccolo—A. Battles,
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .. Mascagni
Third Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Selection, "Jack o' Lantern" ..... Caryll
Indian Idyl (Arranged by Agide Jacchia) ..... MacDowell
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" .. Saint-Saens

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia, celebrated Italian conductor of the Pops Orchestra, has made the following program, to be played at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight:

Coronation March from "The Prophet" ..... Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Love's Dream After the Ball ..... Czibulka
Fantasia, "La Tosca" ..... Puccini
Rhapsody, "Espana" ..... Chabrier
Indian Idyl (arranged by Agide Jacchia) ..... MacDowell
Ballet Music from "Rosamunde" .. Schubert
Introduction to Act III of "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Selection, "I Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Minuet ..... Bolzoni
Waltz, "Roses from the South" .. Strauss
Hungarian Dance No. 6 in D major .. Brahms

Boston Symphony Concerts

Two new local organizations have given first seasons which in each case more than fulfilled the hopes roused by preliminary announcements. One of them, Mr Longy's Boston Musical Association, was described at length in this place two weeks ago. The other, Mr Wodell's People's Philharmonic Choir fills its less ambitious role well.

The season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had its much debated vicissitudes, now happily ended. The outstanding event is not the strike, which was a mere temporary flurry, but the two Symphony concerts for young people which marked the beginning of a highly desirable innovation. Mr Monteux's conductorship has justified his reengagement of two more seasons.

The other established musical institutions have intelligently and tranquilly followed their usual routine course to the satisfaction of all concerned. The free concerts at the Museum of Fine Arts and the Beethoven recitals by Bauer and Thibaud are the only remaining subjects for especial commendation. Both of them have been sufficiently praised here and by other commentators already.

The only remark one can make about the multitude of minor recitals without falling into odious comparisons and personalities is that all in all they have averaged surpisingly well. We remember very few concert-givers who could not justly claim a respectful hearing from their audiences, and many whose performance was highly commendable.

Second Week of the "Pops"

Mr Jacchia has arranged interesting programs for the "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall on each evening this week, the second of the season. Monday is Boston Chamber of Commerce Night, with a list containing such old favorites as "Estudiantina," the "William Tell" overture, "The Blue Danube," and "El Capitan." Tuesday brings Chabrier's "Espana," Schubert's ballet music from "Rosemunde," the "Coronation March" from "Le Prophete" and other popular classice. Wednesday is Amherst Night, with a number of college songs and several old standbys, such as the "Largo," the "1812 Overture" and excerpts from "Rigoletto." A selection from Kreisler's musical comedy, "Apple Blossoms," will also be performed.

Thursday there is to be a soloist, Louis Speyer, who will play two oboe numbers and an interesting unfamiliar piece, Coleridge-Taylor's setting of the "Bamboula," the Creole folk tune, which is the main theme of Mr Gilbert's "Dance in the Place Congo." Friday is Russian Tschaikowsky Night, with the finale from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherezade" and the dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," as the most attractive numbers. Sunday brings the usual miscellany, with a duet for piccolo and bassoon, entitled "Elephant and Gnat," for a novelty.

Second Week of Pops

Following upon the heels of a crowded and successful opening week, the second week of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall will offer three special nights, and six programs which prove Mr. Jacchia's ability to jam each evening with brilliance and melody. Of course, the conductor's infectious verve and the "talent" under him, 80 strong, are the chief factors in the high flow of spirits.

There will be three special nights in the second week. On Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Commerce, Robert S. Weeks, chairman, will have a "get-together" evening.

On Wednesday, May 12, Amherst College Night will bring songs and other additional celebrations. William B. Merrill will be song leader. This night will be given under the auspices of the Amherst Alumni Assn., Donald P. McKay, president. Carl Lamson, the famous accompanist of Kreisler, a graduate of '09, will be the organist.

On Friday, May 14, there will be an All-Russian-Tschaikowsky program.

At the Pops Tonight

(Chamber of Commerce Night but Open to the Public)

March, "Second Connecticut" ... Reeves
Overture, "Light Cavalry" ..... Suppé
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ..... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Souvenir ..... Drdla
Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Selection, "Monsieur Beaucaire," Messager
Indian Summer ..... Herbert
Waltz, "Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
March, "El Capitan" ..... Sousa
Conductor: A. Jacchia

AMHERST NIGHT AT POPS

Tonight will be the first college night of the Pops season, when Amherst will celebrate in Symphony Hall. Concerted singing will be but one special feature of the evening. The program follows:

Entrance of the Gladiators ..... Fucik
Overture, "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Cheer for Old Amherst ... J. N. Pierce '02
Campus Dreams ..... E. N. Blake '97
Lord Geoffrey Amherst, J. S. Hamilton '06
Overture Solennelle, "1812" .. Tschaikowsky
Largo (with organ) ..... Handel
Selection, "Apple Blossoms" ..... Kreisler
(a) Paige's Horse, Prof. F. J. E. Woodbridge '89
(b) To the Fairest College of Them All ..... D. C. Bartlett '03
(Organist, Carl Lamson '99)
(a) Amherst Alma Mater ... J. S. Hamilton '06
(b) Stein Song ..... Bullard
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi
Waltz, On the Beautiful Blue Danube, Strauss
Rakoczy March ..... Berlioz

20 Post May 8 | 12

POPS PROGRAMME

The following programme will be played by Agide Jacchia and the Pops orchestra in Symphony Hall tonight:

French Military March .....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Masaniello" .....Auber
Whispering of the Flowers.....Blon
Fantasia, "Mefistofele" .....Boito
Finale of "Scheherazade"..Rimsky-Korsakoff
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

Minuet (for String Orchestra)....Boccherini
Tarantelle .....Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Three Russian Folk Songs.
Arranged by Agide Jacchia
a Volga Bargemen's Song. b Cossack Song. c Dubinushka.

The Marionettes .....Lacombe
Waltz, 'The Skaters' .....Waldteufel
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin".Tschaikowsky

At the Pops Tonight

Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fucik
Overture to "William Tell"..Rossini
Madrigal ..... Caccini
Fantasia, "Faust" .....Gounod
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Flute Soli:
Romance sans Paroles....Guilmant
Polonaise .....Pessard
Prelude ..... Rakhmaninov
Scènes Pittoresques .....Massenet
Overture ..... Chaikovsky
Ave Maria from "Othello".....Verdi
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Slavonic Dance, No. 1.....Dvorák
Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: Arthur Brooke

Trans May 7

Herald May 8

POPS PROGRAM

The following popular program will be played by Agide Jacchia and the Pops Orchestra in Symphony Hall tonight:

French Military March .....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Masaniello".....Auber
Whispering of the Flowers.....Blon
Fantasia, "Mefistofele".....Boito
Finale of "Scheherazade"....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Festival at Bagdad. The sea. The ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior. Conclusion.
Minuet (for string orchestra).....Boccherini
Tarantelle.....Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Three Russian Folk Songs—
(a) Volga Bargemen's Song..
(b) Cossack Song.....} Arranged by Agide Jacchia
(c) Dubinushka.....
The Marionettes.....Lacombe
Waltz, "The Skaters".....Waldteufel
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"..Tschaikowsky

STRAUSS AT POPS

First Time Since War Modern German Music Played Here

By J. V. CLARK

For the first time since the United States entered the war against Germany the name of Richard Strauss has stood on a Boston program when at the Pops last evening the orchestra played the waltzes from "The Rose Cavalier."

The German classics were long since admitted to our programs, but the music of Richard Strauss, the type of composer who stands for modern German economic and military ideals, has been barred. Strauss' statements concerning Germany's dominancy during the early part of the war absolutely prohibited his music in this country. Mr. Monteux drew the line at Richard Strauss.

Enmity, however, cannot last for ever. The work must resume its normal course. Strauss was tried out last evening—there was no public resentment. Report has it that Mr. Monteux will change his views the coming winter and again add Strauss to the Symphony repertoire.

The marvellous waltzes from the "Rose Cavalier," gorgeous in thematic material, dazzling in orchestration, were very finely played by Mr. Jacchia and his men.

The orchestra last evening in an all-operatic bill gave a performance of the highest rank. Mr. Jacchia conducted with the "pep" that distinguishes him, yet with a fine feeling for proportion and for various styles of music.

Some of the old "chestnuts" of an operatic program actually sounded fresh. Witness the performance of the "William Tell" overture.

The performance of Rossini's classic overture was embellished by superb cello playing by Georges Miquelle. This young man, presumably, will play the cello solo passages during the Pops. He should be more than first cellist; he should be occasionally soloist.

In the preludes to Act 1 and Act 3 of "Lohengrin" Mr. Jacchia showed that his string section and his full orchestra tone were equally good. Since the symphonic strike there has been some talk of lessening in quality, as well as quantity of the strings, and the hiding of this weakness. Both Mr. Monteux and Mr. Jacchia in recent concerts have proven that the string section, especially the first violins, is as lovely as ever.

The program had dignity and variety. It was heartily applauded by an audience that filled the hall to capacity. In no other American city can one hear, evening in, evening out, such delightful musical programs in the spring as here in Boston at the

POPS Amer. May 8

Following upon the heels of a successful opening week, the second week of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall will offer three special nights, and six programs which prove Maestro Jacchia's ability to jam each evening with brilliance and melody. Of course the conductor's infectious verve and the "talent" under him, eighty strong, are the prime factors in the high flow of spirits. There will be three special nights in the second week. On Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Commerce, Robert S. Weeks, chairman, will have a "get-together." On Wednesday, May 12, Amherst College Night will bring songs and other additional celebrations. William B. Merrill will be song leader. This night will be given under the auspices of the Amherst Alumni Association, Donsald P. McKay, president. Carl Lamson, the famous accompanist of Kreisler, a graduate of '09, will be the organist. On Friday, May 14, there will be an All-Russian-Tschaikowsky program.

Herald May 9

SECOND WEEK OF POP CONCERTS

A very large part of Boston has manifested delight at the opening week of Pop Concerts, sitting around the tables of Symphony Hall, where refreshments are served during the music, and crowding the balconies every night. The finest Symphony orchestra has stimulated spirits to the highest pitch. Maestro Jacchia, the conductor, has once more proved his ability to infuse quality and genuine interest into programs which are nevertheless agreeably light. For the second week, now in progress, there will be three special nights. On Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Commerce, Robert S. Weeks, chairman, will have a "get-together" evening at the Pops. On Wednesday, May 12, "Amherst Night" will mark the first college night of the season, when singing will be one of several additional features. William B. Merrill will be song leader. This night will be given under the auspices of the Amherst Alumni Association, Donald P. McKay, president. Carl Lamson, a graduate of '99, will be the organist. For Friday night, May 14, an All-Russian-Tschaikowsky program proves by its brilliance and melody that the Slavic race is musical to the core. The programs of the week are as follows:

MONDAY

March, "Second Connecticut".....Reeves
Overture, "Light Cavalry".....Suppe
Waltz "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"....Mascagni
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Souvenir.....Drdla
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Selection, "Monsieur Beaucaire".....Messager
"Indian Summer," an American Idyl...Herbert
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"
Strauss
March, "El Capitan".....Sousa

TUESDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet"
Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Love's Dream After the Ball.....Czibulka
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Indian Idyl (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
MacDowell
Ballet Music from "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Introduction to Act III of "Lohengrin"
Wagner
Selection, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Waltz, "Roses from the South".....Strauss
Hungarian Dance No. 6 in D major....Brahms

AMHERST COLLEGE NIGHT—WEDNESDAY

Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fucik
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner
Cheer for Old Amherst.....Pierce, '02
Campus Dreams.....Blake, '97
Lord Geoffrey Amherst.....Hamilton, '06
Overture Solennelle, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
Largo (with organ).....Handel
Selection, "Apple Blossoms".....Kreisler
a. Paige's Horse.....Woodbridge, '89
b. To the Fairest College of Them All
Bartlett, '03
(Organist, Carl Lamson, '09)
a. Amherst Alma Mater.....Hamilton, '06
b. Stein Song (Words of Chorus by Burges Johnson, '99).....Bullard
Fantasia, "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"
Strauss
Rakoczy March.....Berlioz

THURSDAY

Overture to "The Bronze Horse".....Auber
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song".....Strauss
Andante Cantabile.....Smith
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Rhapsody, "The Bamboula"...Coleridge-Taylor
Oboe Solo:
a. Romance for Oboe.....Schumann
b. Musette.....Lenom
(Mr. Speyer)
Polish Dance.....Scharwenka
Cacchanale from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky
Serenata Barcarola.....De Nardis
Love's Dream After the Ball.....Czibulka
Cortege de Bacchus.....Delibes

FRIDAY

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"..Tschaikowsky
Ballet Music from "The Demon"...Rubinstein
Prelude.....Rachmaninoff
Finale, "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky
Andante Cantabile.....Tschaikowsky
Waltz from "The Serenade".....Tschaikowsky
Third Movement, Pathetic Symphony
Tschaikowsky
Overture Solennelle, "1812" (with organ)
Tschaikowsky
Cossack Song (Arranged by Mr. Jacchia).
Dances from "Prince Igor".....Borodin
Cortege from "Mlada".....Rimsky-Korsakoff

SATURDAY

Overture to "Jeanne d'Arc".....Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"
Strauss
Meditation, "Thais".....Massenet
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna"
Wolf-Ferrari
Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
Duet, "Elephant and Gnat".....Kling
Bassoon, B. Piller
Piccolo, A. Battles
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana"...Mascagni
Third Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Selection, "Jack o' Lantern".....Caryll
Indian Idyl (Arranged by Mr. Jacchia)
MacDowell
Prelude.....Rachmaninoff
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah".Saint-Saens

...CORDS ON

Adv May 9

Musical Lure at Modified Pop Concerts

IN the old days of the Pops there was some real popping. And beer glasses used to be rattled on the tables. Choruses arose from time to time—concerted demands for encores and "Thank you's" from the students enjoying their Offenbach and Pilsener. Sometimes it was necessary for the conductor to rap on his stand and turn around and frown to check the enthusiasm coming from deep potations.

But in spite of prohibition the Pops continue. Now the enthusiasm is of the less than one-half per cent. order—academic, esthetic, tinctured only by the smoke of cigars and cigarettes. Everything is changed, but the music, which still remains as a souvenir of the old German beer garden policy that introduced the Pops many years ago. The large orchestra is as usual made up of Symphony players; the programs are generally of a light nature—like the beer and wine that once flowed freely before the tea-room waitrsses descended upon Symphony Hall; and there is a conductor of the old Pop calibre, Agide Jacchia.

It will be a welcome day for regular Pop patrons when 2.75 beer and light wines come back; when music will not be the only means of exhilaration.

For the second week there will be three special nights. On Monday the Chamber of Commerce, Robert S. Weeks, chairman, will have a get-together evening. On Wednesday Amherst will have the first college night, when singing will be one of several additional features. William B. Merrill will be song leader. This night will be under the auspices of the alumni association, Donald P. McKay, president. Carl Lamson, the famous accompanist of Kreisler, a graduate of '99, will be organist. For Friday night an all-Russian-Tschaikowsky program proves by its brilliance and melody that the Slavic race is musical to the core.

Plan for Memorial Day

Trans May 6

CONCERT MEMORANDA

Progress of The Pops—Cantor Rosenblatt to Be Heard Again—Four Noted Singers with Chorus

AS becomes an institution now established for thirty-five years in the favor of the public, The Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall are once more running prosperous course. Mr. Jacchia's programmes please; his zest as conductor for music and performance; his seventy men from the Symphony Orchestra play well. Many, as of old, take the pleasure of tobacco, drink, and "light refreshments" at the tables on the floor. As many more listen from the balconies as to any other concert of light music. So The Pops go well. Elsewhere on these pages is printed the programme for this evening. The arrangements for this week bring a "Chamber of Commerce Night" on Monday and an "Amherst College Night" on Wednesday, with both open to the public. The programmes promise the usual variety of agreeable pieces with plentiful operatic numbers and here and there a dash of "musical comedy."

Herald May 10

FIRST SPECIAL NIGHT

Chamber of Commerce Members to Attend Tonight's Concert

The Boston Chamber of Commerce, Robert S. Weeks, chairman, will have a "get-together" celebration at the Pops tonight in Symphony Hall. The program for this, the first special night concert of the season (which will also be open to the public), follows:

March, "Second Connecticut," Reeves; overture, "Light Cavalry," Suppe; waltz, "Estudiantina," Waldteufel; fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Souvenir, Drdla; Pomp and Circumstance, Elgar; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; selection, "Monsieur Beaucaire," Messager; "Indian Summer," an American Idyl, Herbert; waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss; march, "El Capitan," Sousa

Post May 8

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE POPS' NIGHT MONDAY

Monday evening will be Boston Chamber of Commerce night at the Pop Concert at Symphony Hall, and Conductor Agide Jacchia has arranged a special program for the benefit of chamber members and their friends. It will be the first time the chamber has ever arranged a function affording an opportunity for members to bring their families, and the innovation has already proved to be a highly popular one. Nearly all the tickets for the floor and balcony have already been distributed.

The occasion has been arranged by the chamber's committee on meetings and assemblies, and will be the final feature of the most successful social season ever enjoyed by chamber members.

Post May 9

SECOND WEEK OF POPS

For the second week of the "Pops" concerts in Symphony Hall, there will be three special nights. On Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Commerce, Robert S. Weeks, chairman, will have a "get-together" evening at the Pops. On Wednesday, May 12, "Amherst night" will mark the first college night of the season, when singing will be one of several additional features. William B Merrill will be song leader. This night will be given under the auspices of the Amherst Alumni Association, Donald P. McKay, president. Carl Lamson, the famous accompanist of Kreisler, a graduate of '99, will be the organist. For Friday night, May 14, an All-Russian-Tschaikowsky programme proves by its brilliance and melody that the Slavic race is musical to the core. The programmes of the week stand thus:

MONDAY, MAY 10.

March, "Second Connecticut".....Reeves
Overture, "Light Cavalry".....Suppe
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"...Mascagni
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .....Liszt
Souvenir .....Drdla
Pomp and Circumstance .....Elgar
Overture to "William Tell" .....Rossini
Selection, "Monsieur Beaucaire" ....Messager
"Indian Summer," an American Idyl..Herbert
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"
Strauss
March, "El Capitan" .....Sousa

TUESDAY, MAY 11.

Coronation March from "The Prophet"
Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon" .....Thomas

...IN DOWNES

Love's Dream After the Ball ...Czibulka
Fantasia, "La Tosca" .....Puccini
Rhapsody, "Espana" .....Chabrier
Indian Idyl (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
MacDowell
Ballet Music from "Rosamunde" ....Schuber
Introduction to Act III. of "Lohengrin"
Wagner
Selection, "I Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Minuet .....Bolzoni
Waltz, "Roses from the South".....Strauss
Hungarian Dance No. 6 in D major—Brahms

AMHERST COLLEGE NIGHT, WEDNESDAY, May 12.

Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fucik
Overture, "Rienzi" .....Wagner
Cheer for Old Amherst.....J. N. Pierce, '02
Campus Dreams .....E. N. Blake, '97
Lord Geoffrey Amherst—J. S. Hamilton, '06.
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"...Tschaikowsky
Largo (with organ) .....Handel
Selection, "Apple Blossoms" .....Kreisler
a Paige's Horse. Prof. F. J. E. Woodbridge, '89
b To the Fairest College of Them All
D. C. Bartlett, '03
Organist—Carl Lamson, '09.
a Amherst Alma Mater...J. S. Hamilton, '06
b Stein Song (words of chorus by Burges Johnson, '99) .....Bullard
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" .....Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"
Strauss
Rakoczy March .....Berlioz

THURSDAY, May 13.

Overture to "The Bronze Horse".....Auber
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song".....Strauss
Andante Cantabile .....Smith
Fantasia, "Aida" .....Verdi
Rhapsody, "The Bamboula"...Coleridge-Taylor
Oboe Solo—a Romance for Oboe....Schumann
b Musette .....Lenom
Mr. Louis Speyer.
Polish Dance .....Scharwenka
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Marche Slave .....Tschaikowsky
Serenata Barcarola .....De Nardis
Love's Dream After the Ball.....Czibulka
Cortege de Bacchus .....Delibes

FRIDAY, MAY 14.

Russian Tschaikowsky Programme.
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"..Tschaikowsky
Ballet Music from "The Demon"...Rubinstein
Prelude .....Rachmaninoff
Finale, "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Marche Slave,
Andante Cantabile,
Waltz from "The Serenade,"
Third Movement, Pathetic Symphony
Tschaikowsky
(Allegro molto vivace.)

SATURDAY, MAY 15.

Overture to "Jeanne d'Arc" .....Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"
Strauss
Meditation, "Thais" .....Massenet
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna"
Wolf-Ferrari
Suite, "Sylvia" .....Delibes
a Les Chasseresses. b Pizzicato. c Cortege de Bacchus.
Duet, "Elephant and Gnat" .....Kling
Bassoon—B. Piller.
Piccolo—A. Battles.
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana"..Mascagni
Third Hungarian Rhapsody .....Liszt
Selection, "Jack o' Lantern".....Caryll
Indian Idyl (Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Prelude .....MacDowell
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah".Saint-Saens

...court."

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia, celebrated Italian conductor of the Pops Orchestra, has made the following program, to be played at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight:

Coronation March from "The Prophet"
Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Love's Dream After the Ball.....Czibulka
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Rhapsody "Espana".....Chabrier
Indian Idyl (arranged by Agide Jacchia) .....MacDowell
Ballet Music from "Rosamunde"..Schubert
Introduction to Act III of "Lohengrin"
Wagner
Selection, "I Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Minuet .....Bolzoni
Waltz, "Roses from the South"...Strauss
Hungarian Dance No. 6 in D major..Brahms

Globe May 9

Boston Symphony Concerts

Two new local organizations have given first seasons which in each case more than fulfilled the hopes roused by preliminary announcements. One of them, Mr Longy's Boston Musical Association, was described at length in this place two weeks ago. The other, Mr Wodell's People's Philharmonic Choir fills its less ambitious role well.

The season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had its much debated vicissitudes, now happily ended. The outstanding event is not the strike, which was a mere temporary flurry, but the two Symphony concerts for young people which marked the beginning of a highly desirable innovation. Mr Monteux's conductorship has justified his reengagement of two more seasons.

The other established musical institutions have intelligently and tranquilly followed their usual routine course to the satisfaction of all concerned. The free concerts at the Museum of Fine Arts and the Beethoven recitals by Bauer and Thibaud are the only remaining subjects for especial commendation. Both of them have been sufficiently praised here and by other commentators already.

The only remark one can make about the multitude of minor recitals without falling into odious comparisons and personalities is that all in all they have averaged surpisingly well. We remember very few concert-givers who could not justly claim a respectful hearing from their audiences, and many whose performance was highly commendable.

Second Week of the "Pops"

Mr Jacchia has arranged interesting programs for the "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall on each evening this week, the second of the season. Monday is Boston Chamber of Commerce Night, with a list containing such old favorites as "Estudiantina," the "William Tell" overture, "The Blue Danube," and "El Capitan." Tuesday brings Chabrier's "Espana," Schubert's ballet music from "Rosemunde," the "Coronation March" from "Le Prophete" and other popular classice. Wednesday is Amherst Night, with a number of college songs and several old standbys, such as the "Largo," the "1812 Overture" and excerpts from "Rigoletto." A selection from Kreisler's musical comedy, "Apple Blossoms," will also be performed.

Thursday there is to be a soloist, Louis Speyer, who will play two oboe numbers and an interesting unfamiliar piece, Coleridge-Taylor's setting of the "Bamboula," the Creole folk tune, which is the main theme of Mr Gilbert's "Dance in the Place Congo." Friday is Russian Tschaikowsky Night, with the finale from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherezade" and the dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," as the most attractive numbers. Sunday brings the usual miscellany, with a duet for piccolo and bassoon, entitled "Elephant and Gnat," for a novelty.

Globe May 6

town.

Second Week of Pops

Following upon the heels of a crowded and successful opening week, the second week of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall will offer three special nights, and six programs which prove Mr. Jacchia's ability to jam each evening with brilliance and melody. Of course, the conductor's infectious verve and the "talent" under him, 80 strong, are the chief factors in the high flow of spirits.

There will be three special nights in the second week. On Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Commerce, Robert S. Weeks, chairman, will have a "get-together" evening.

On Wednesday, May 12, Amherst College Night will bring songs and other additional celebrations. William B. Merrill will be song leader. This night will be given under the auspices of the Amherst Alumni Assn., Donald P. McKay, president. Carl Lamson, the famous accompanist of Kreisler, a graduate of '09, will be the organist.

On Friday, May 14, there will be an All-Russian-Tschaikowsky program.

At the Pops Tonight

(Chamber of Commerce Night but Open to the Public)

March, "Second Connecticut"....Reeves
Overture, "Light Cavalry".....Suppé
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana."
Mascagni
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Souvenir .....Drdla
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Selection, "Monsieur Beaucaire."
Messager
Indian Summer.....Herbert
Waltz, "Blue Danube".....Strauss
March, "El Capitan".....Sousa
Conductor: A. Jacchia

AMHERST NIGHT AT POPS

Tonight will be the first college night of the Pops season, when Amherst will celebrate in Symphony Hall. Concerted singing will be but one special feature of the evening. The program follows:

Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fucik
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner
Cheer for Old Amherst....J. N. Pierce '02
Campus Dreams.....E. N. Blake '97
Lord Geoffrey Amherst,
J. S. Hamilton '06
Overture Solennelle, "1812"..Tschaikowsky
Largo (with organ).....Handel
Selection, "Apple Blossoms".....Kreisler
(a) Paige's Horse.
Prof. F. J. E. Woodbridge '89
(b) To the Fairest College of Them All.....D. C. Bartlett '03
(Organist, Carl Lamson '09)
(a) Amherst Alma Mater.....Hamilton '06
(b) Stein Song.....Bullard
Fantasia, "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Waltz, On the Beautiful Blue Danube.
Strauss
Rakoczy March.....Berlioz

INFORMATION OBSCURED

At the Pops Tonight

Coronation March from "The Prophet" ..... Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Love's Dream After the Ball .. Czibulka
Fantasia, "Tosca" ..... Puccini
Rhapsody, "Espana" ..... Chabrier
Indian Idyl ..... MacDowell
Ballet Music from "Rosamunde" ... Schubert
Introduction to Act. III., "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Selection from "Pagliacci" .. Leoncavallo
Minuet ..... Bolzoni
Waltz, "Roses from the South" .. Strauss
Hungarian Dance No. 6 ..... Brahms
Conductor: A. Jacchia.

At the Pops Tonight

Overture to "The Bronze Horse" .. Auber
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," ..... Strauss
Andante Cantabile ..... Smith
Fantasia, "Aida" ..... Verdi
Rhapsody, "The Bamboula," ..... Coleridge-Taylor
Soli for Oboe:
Romance—Musette ..... Schumann
Polish Dance ..... Scharwenka
Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" . Wagner
Slavic March ..... Chaikovsky
Serenata Barcarola ..... De Nardis
Love's Dream After the Ball ... Czibulka
Procession of Bacchus ..... Delibes
Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Soloist: L. Speyer.

Mr. Jacchia has set in the programme for the Pop Concert this evening at Symphony Hall Coleridge-Taylor's version of the wild negro dance in New Orleans and the West Indies, the Bamboula. Mr. Gilbert utilized it in his tone-poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," heard at the Symphony Concerts last winter, but Taylor's handling of it is virtually new to Bostonian ears. And in him ran negro blood.

Trans. May 14

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

Fresh and Interesting Numbers Heard Last Evening — New Music by a Resident Composer, Coleridge-Taylor's "Bamboula" and Oboe-Pieces for Mr. Speyer

THERE were interesting items to be heard at the Pop Concert last evening. For the first time anywhere Mr. Jacchia and the orchestra played an Andante Cantabile, written by Warren Storey Smith, of the younger composers and writers about music in Boston. The piece develops, decorates and cumulates motives that soon become melody, distinctly songful, clearly in romantic vein. This instrumental song pleases the ear and touches the fancy. Though it was written earlier than some of Mr. Smith's maturer music, it suggests a like fineness of imagination and handling. Without audible effort Mr. Smith avoids the commonplace formulas for such pieces, yet escapes imitative and laborious subtleties; while he is plainly sensitive to individual voices in his orchestra. With reason the audience applauded piece and sympathetic performance.

Later in the concert Mr. Jacchia passed to Coleridge-Taylor's rhapsody, "The Bamboula"—version for orchestra of the wild and whirling dance of the blacks and the half-casts of New Orleans, described in a frenzy of words by Mr. Cable, transmuted into a frenzy of tones in Mr. Gilbert's symphonic poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," heard last winter from Mr. Monteux and earlier brought to the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House as a ballet. Mr. Gilbert's intention ran higher than his accomplishment, since his music hardly yielded to hearers the alternate furies and languors of the savage and salacious dance—the bite of the rhythms, the mounting din, the intervals of sensual lassitude. No better, if as well, has Coleridge-Taylor succeeded in such transfer to the concert-hall. He achieves orchestral sound and fury; he keeps the rhythms of the Bamboula sharply, but rather monotonously, in play; but when he would gain the languors, he sets to paper merely sentimental song a l'Anglaise. While his English blood thus simmers, hardly once does his negro blood really boil. Possibly only a Russian could write a truly fierce and flaming Bamboula.

Finally, Mr. Speyer, the skilful and artful player upon the English horn in the ordinary course of the Symphony Concerts, was heard in two solo-pieces for the kindred instrument, the oboe. One was a little known Romance of Schumann, in itself simple, sentimental song, with a touch of fancy here, a touch of tenderness there, written in the day's work and written also with a curious disregard of the particular quality and exactions of the oboe. Short as the piece is, it is sustained song and the hard-pressed oboist must catch breath as best he may in half seconds between the phrases. Similarly the music nowhere invites the penetrating, the wistful tone of the chosen instrument. It might have sounded quite as well upon a violin. Having done this feat of sustained tone and suave modulation, Mr. Speyer played a piece better devised for the oboe and better disclosing his abilities as virtuoso—a Musette by Mr. Lenom, his fellow-musician in the orchestra. Once upon a time musettes were French bagpipes, then simple airs, more or less adorned, designed for these instruments. As such Mr. Lenom has written his piece, with the oboe carrying, varying and decorating the melody, while the piano sustains a bass. An oboist himself, the composer readily writes ornate measures played by Mr. Speyer with ease and elegance. Similarly, he utilizes expertly the piercing voice of the oboe, thin but bright, sharp-set or plaintive—and Mr. Speyer readily compassed this range of tone, giving it the prescribed quality, keeping it clean-cut and flowing. There is the charm of old music in the ambling measures of Mr. Lenom's music; and animation when it capers into ornament. Mr. Speyer playing it, caught and conveyed both these traits.

H. T. P.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Tonight will be the first college night of the Pops season, when Amherst College will celebrate at Symphony Hall. Concerted singing will be but one special feature of the evening.

The programme will be as follows:

Entrance of the Gladiators ..... Fucik
Overture, "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Cheer for Old Amherst ..... J. N. Pierce, '02
Campus Dreams ..... E. N. Blake, '97
Lord Geoffrey Amherst ..... J. S. Hamilton, '06.
Overture Solennelle, "1812" ... Tschaikowsky
Largo (with organ) ..... Handel
Selection, "Apple Blossoms" ..... Kreisler
a Paige's Horse.. Prof. J. E. Woodbridge, '89
b To the Fairest College of Them All
D. C. Bartlett, '03
(Organist, Carl Lamson, '09)
a Amherst Alma Mater ... J. D. Hamilton, '06
b Stein Song ..... Bullard
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Rakoczy March ..... Berlioz

At the Pops Tonight

(Amherst College Night But Open Also to the Public)

Entrance of the Gladiators ..... Fucik
Overture to "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Cheer for Old Amherst ..... Pierce
Campus Dreams ..... Blake
Lord Geoffrey Amherst ..... Hamilton
Overture, "1812" ..... Chaikovsky
Largo ..... Händel
Selection, "Apple Blossoms," ..... Kreisler-Jacobi
Paige's Horse ..... Woodbridge
To the Fairest College ..... Bartlett
Amherst, Alma Mater ..... Hamilton
Stein Song ..... Bullard
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Rakoczy March ..... Berlioz
Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Organist: Carl Lamson.

ITEMS ABOUT MUSIC

Trans. May 12

THE good news comes that Mr. Casals, the violoncellist above all the rest, is likely to be heard at a pair of Symphony Concerts next season. Only once before, soon after his first coming to the United States, has he been assisting artist to the orchestra.

crew of 14 men were rescued.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight Agide Jacchia will conduct the following programme:

Overture to "The Bronze Horse" ..... Auber
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song" .... Strauss
Andante Cantabile ..... Smith
Fantasia, "Aida" ..... Verdi
Rhapsody, "The Bamboula" .. Coleridge-Taylor
Oboe Solo ..... Schumann
a Romance for Oboe.
b Musette.
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Marche Slave ..... Tschaikowsky
Serenata Barcarola ..... De Nardis
Love's Dream After the Ball ..... Czibulka
Cortege de Bacchus ..... Delibes

POPS TONIGHT

The Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program:

Overture to "The Bronze Horse" .... Auber
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song" .. Strauss
Andante Cantabile ..... Smith
Fantasia, "Aida" ..... Verdi
Rhapsody, "The Bamboula" ..... Coleridge-Taylor
Oboe Solo (a) Romance for Oboe; (b) Musette ..... Schumann
Polish Dance ..... Scharwenka
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Marche Slave ..... Tschaikowsky
Serenata Barcarola ..... De Nardis
Love's Dream After the Ball ..... Czibulka
Cortege de Bacchus ..... Delibes

[illegible] was destined to succeed."

POPS PROGRAM

An All-Russian-Tschaikowsky program has been arranged by Agide Jacchia for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight as follows:

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" .. Tschaikowsky
Third Movement "Pathetic Symphony"
Ballet Music from "The Demon" .... Rubinstein
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Finale, "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Slave March from "The Serenade" — Pathetic Symphony" ..... Tschaikowsky
(Allegro molto vivace.)
Overture Solennelle, "1812" ..... Tschaikowsky
(With organ.)
Cossack Song ..... Arr. by Agide Jacchia
Dances from "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin
Procession from "Mlada" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff

BOSTON ATHLETIC ASSOCIATION

Last year for the first time we had a B. A. A. Night at the "POPS," and it was a delightful success.

There was no real sentiment in having such a night then; but there is considerable now, for it is an endorsement of the loyal men who stood together and refused to desert the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it was in trouble. This Association is consistent in its admiration for such character displayed in any walk of life, and its members will undoubtedly show it by appearing in full force at the SECOND B. A. A. NIGHT AT THE POPS, on Monday, May 24th, at eight o'clock.

The management has prepared a special program for the occasion and reserved a choice section on the floor for members and friends. Tickets and reservations for tables or single seats may be obtained at the Club House, where a diagram is on exhibition. Tables seat four, five or six at one dollar per seat.

Let's have one big enthusiastic audience to pay tribute to the harmony of this incomparable band!

ENTERTAINMENT COMMITTEE.

May 14, 1920.

144

ENTERTAINMENT COMMITTEE,
B. A. A., Exeter St., Boston, Mass.

Please reserve..... table for me and charge to my house account.

At the Pops Tonight

Russian Programme

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" .... Chaikovsky
Ballet Music from "The Demon" ... Rubinstein
Prelude ..... Rakhmaninov
Finale from "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Slav March—Andante Cantabile—Waltz from "The Serenade"—March Movement from the Pathetic Symphony — Overture, "1812" ..... Chaikovsky
Cossack Song ..... Jacchia
Dances from "Prince Igor" .... Borodin
Procession from the Ballet, "Mlada" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Conductor: A. Jacchia.

POP CONCERT TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program:

Overture to "Jeanne d'Arc" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Meditation, "Thais" ..... Massenet
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Suite, "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
(a) Les Chasseresses. (b) Pizzicato.
(c) Cortege de Bacchus.
Duet, "Elephant and Gnat" ..... Kling
Bassoon, B. Piller; piccolo, A. Battles.
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana."
Third Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Selection, "Jack o' Lantern" ..... Caryll
Indian Idyl ..... MacDowell
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia.)
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" . Saint-Saens

Amer. May 12

THE POPS

If the American dollar now retains only half of its former purchasing value, then three hours of Pops' music, which is the finest as well as the gayest in town, may be heard from an unreserved seat for 12½ cents—from the best table seat in Symphony for 50 cents. Which is another way of saying that the 1914, antebellum scale of prices is still in use, and still untaxed. The wolf which the cartoonists label "H. C. of L." has had to slink baffled away from the locked portals of Boston's Temple of Music.

Meanwhile the Pops have been steadily improved. Agide Jacchia, the conductor, makes such fine programs and works such wonders with his symphony orchestra of maximum quality and size, that the crowded audiences are moved, night after night, to consume refreshments in inordinate quantities.

Globe May 16

Third Week of the "Pops"

There are two special nights announced for this, the third week of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall. Tuesday a Wagner program will be offered and Friday is Roxbury Latin School night, though tickets for it are available to the public.

Monday the usual agreeable miscellany is offered, with a solo by Paul Shirley on the viola d'amore as an added attraction. This instrument is part way between the viola and the 'cello in size. It has great musical possibilities, which composers since the 18th century have too much neglected. Mr Shirley, who has made it his specialty, will play an andante and minuet by Milandre, a forgotten 18th century composer.

The seven Wagner numbers for Tuesday are the "Bacchanale" and March from "Tannhauser"; the Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde"; the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure"; the Overture to "Rienzi"; the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and an arrangement for violin solo of the song, "Traume," which last, by the way, is really a sort of first version of a familiar passage in "Tristan."

Thursday Georges Miquelle will play a 'cello solo. There are so many interesting features on the other programs that space to enumerate them in detail fails us. Suffice it to say that both those who prefer serious music and those who like light music will find something to their respective tastes on each list Mr Jacchia offers.

POPS PROGRAM FOR TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program:

Overture to "Jeanne d'Arc" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Meditation, "Thais" ..... Massenet
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Suite, "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
a. Les Chasseresses.. b. Pizzicato.
c. Cortege de Bacchus.
Duet, "Elephant and Gnat" ..... Kling
Bassoon, B. Piller; piccolo, A. Battles.
Third Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Selection, "Jack o' Lantern" ..... Caryll
Indian Idyl ..... MacDowell
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens

For Tuesday, May 18, of the coming

Herald May 16

POP CONCERT TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program:

Overture to "Jesnne d'Arc" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Meditation, "Thais" ..... Massenet
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Suite, "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
(a) Les Chasseresses. (b) Pizzicato.
(c) Cortege de Bacchus.
Duet, "Elephant and Gnat" ..... Kling
Bassoon, B. Piller; piccolo, A. Battles.
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana."
Third Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Selection, "Jack o' Lantern" ..... Caryll
Indian Idyl ..... MacDowell
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia.)
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" . Saint-Saens

"POP" CONCERTS

The high cost of living has made no headway whatsoever in Symphony Hall, where the extremely popular Pop concerts are flourishing under the prices of 1914. If the dollar has shrunk to half its former purchasing value, then a Pop goer may have three hours of musical delights in a balcony seat for virtually 12½ cents, and what now amounts to 50 cents will usher him to the choicest table.

Mr. Jacchia seems to have found the ideal Pop programs, which combine fine symphonic quality with a more obvious tunefulness correctly mixed to create a leavening gayety. That his Symphony orchestra is of the largest and best goes without saying. Although no hot weather has parched the public throat, refreshments are already consumed night after night in great quantities. Next Tuesday night, May 18, will be noteworthy for a Wagner program; Friday night, May 21, for the presence of the Roxbury Latin school, although this night will also be open to the public.

Trans. May 15

CONCERT MEMORANDA

Progress of the Pops

ELSEWHERE on these pages is the programme for the Pop Concert at Symphony Hall this evening; while through next week the series will run familiar course. For Tuesday evening, the conductor, Mr. Jacchia, has drawn fully half his programme from the operas of Wagner—"Lohengrin," "Tannhauser," "Tristan," "Rienzi," "Die Walkure." For Wednesday, he has included seldom heard fragments of Charpentier's "Louise." On Monday, Mr. Shirley will play a solo piece upon the viola d'amore; on Thursday, Mr. Miquelle will be the solo violoncellist; on Friday, graduates of the Roxbury Latin School will have their annual "night." Otherwise the regular thing in the regular way from orchestra to refreshments.

Adv. May 16

POPULAR AS EVER

It is hard to find any amusement just now which has not been ravaged by the high cost of living, but this is strictly the case in Symphony Hall, where the doorkeeper has carefully debarred the roaming wolf from intruding upon the nightly festivities of the Pops. This is strict truth, for the scale of Pops prices has not been changed since 1914, and remains untaxed. In the ideally proportioned programs in which Maestro Agide Jacchia mixes fine symphonic quality with more obvious tunefulness, the inspiriting performances which he can conjure from the orchestra under him need no pointing out. Next Tuesday, May 18, will bring a Wagner program, and Friday, May 21, is Roxbury Latin Night, but also public.

BUSINESS WOMEN'S CLUB

THE POPS

In former seasons there were ominous prophecies concerning the result of prohibition at the Pop concerts. It is interesting to observe that the new laws haven't had the slightest effect on the numbers, or, apparently, the pleasure of the audiences there. Statistics, furthermore, come to our aid. The books showed a total attendance of 20 per cent more people in the season of 1919 than during the Pop season of 1918. What is still more surprising is that $15,000 worth of refreshments were consumed in 1919, the first season with prohibition, as against $11,000 worth in the season preceding. This is a different age, apparently, than that of the beer drinking '90s. Niel Patterson, chief steward of the Pop season, remembers big nights when the beer tap was never turned off. A waiting line of glasses was always in readiness, and he would shove one after another under the endless stream of beer, yelling down cellar again and again for more steam (the beer was pumped up from hogsheads by steam pressure). Sometimes six "halves" were emptied in a single night (six halves equal 240 gallons), and this was tapped beer, aside from the bottled goods. In the opinion of some of the older patrons of "The Pops" "them was the happiest days" of the Pop concerts. A majority, however, of these who attend seem entirely satisfied with the ministrations of Mr. Jacchia and his orchestra.

Next Tuesday night at the Pops, May 18, will bring a Wagner programme, and Friday, May 21, is Roxbury Latin Night, but also public.

• • • •

Coleridge-Taylor's "Bamboula" has been played recently at the Pop concerts. It recalls the fact that Henry F. Gilbert used the same dance theme—that of the vulgar, barbaric dance which is "ripped out" by his full orchestras in his "Dance on Place Congo," played at the Symphony concerts of last winter. The curious fact is this: That whereas Coleridge-Taylor, a negro of partly English descent, used the theme in a conventional and rather clap-trap manner, Mr. Gilbert has given it a "punch" and swing much more native to the motive. It goes back to the matter of environment and education vs. heredity. The exoticism one might expect from Coleridge-Taylor, educated at the Royal Conservatory of Music in London, and as debonair a gentleman as you would wish to see, is quite absent from his conventional fantasy to which this celebrated theme gave rise. The composer had had most of the originality educated out of him. He had been told by white professors, as ignorant as so many professors eternally remain of what is in the hearts of their pupils, to sandpaper away such exoticism and savagery as might remain in his nature. Unfortunately, Coleridge-Taylor appears to have obeyed these behests—witness his harmonizations of African folk-melodies, and the conventionality, only occasionally tinctured with a certain exoticism, of his "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast." Mr. Gilbert, happily escaping pedants of any land, roving over a good deal of America, travelling outside of the circles of pedagogues and esthetes, he has caught the inherent vigor and sensuality of this dance, and transferred it to his score. Will Marion Cook, the Negro composer of this country, once said to us that he did not believe a white man could ever teach a Negro to compose. We go farther, and wonder if any teacher can teach anyone to compose. We believe that if a few more teachers of composition felt likewise the world would have had a larger crop of original composers.

POP CONCERT TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia has made the following programme for the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Coronation March ..... Svendsen
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Waltz "La Barcarole" ..... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida" ..... Verdi
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
(a) Morning Mood; (b) Anitra's Dance;
(c) In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Viola d'Amore Solo, Andante and Minuet ..... Milandre 1780
(Mr. Paul Shirley)
Badinage ..... Herbert
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Selection, "Apple Blossoms" ..... Kreisler
March of the Little Lead Soldiers .. Pierne
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods," ..... Strauss
Second Polonnise.....

INFORMATION OBSCURED

At the Pops Tonight

Coronation March from "The Prophet" ..... Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Love's Dream After the Ball .. Czibulka
Fantasia, "Tosca" ..... Puccini
Rhapsody, "España" ..... Chabrier
Indian Idyl ..... MacDowell
Ballet Music from "Rosamünde" .. Schubert

Introduction to Act. III., "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Selection from "Pagliacci" .. Leoncavallo
Minuet ..... Bolzoni
Waltz, "Roses from the South" .. Strauss
Hungarian Dance No. 6 ..... Brahms

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

At the Pops Tonight

Overture to "The Bronze Horse" .. Auber
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," ... Strauss
Andante Cantabile ..... Smith
Fantasia, "Aida" ..... Verdi
Rhapsody, "The Bamboula," ... Coleridge-Taylor

Soli for Oboe:
Romance—Musette ..... Schumann
Polish Dance ..... Scharwenka
Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" .. Wagner
Slavic March ..... Chaikovsky
Serenata Barcarola ..... De Nardis
Love's Dream After the Ball ... Czibulka
Procession of Bacchus ..... Delibes

Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Soloist: L. Speyer.

Mr. Jacchia has set in the programme for the Pop Concert this evening at Symphony Hall Coleridge-Taylor's version of the wild negro dance in New Orleans and the West Indies, the Bamboula. Mr. Gilbert utilized it in his tone-poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," heard at the Symphony Concerts last winter; but Taylor's handling of it is virtually new to Bostonian ears. And in him ran negro blood.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Tonight will be the first college night of the Pops season, when Amherst College will celebrate at Symphony Hall. Concerted singing will be but one special feature of the evening.

The programme will be as follows:

Entrance of the Gladiators ..... Fucik
Overture, "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Cheer for Old Amherst ..... J. N. Pierce, '02
Campus Dreams ..... E. N. Blake, '97
Lord Geoffrey Amherst—J. S. Hamilton, '06.
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" ... Tschaikowsky
Largo (with organ) ..... Handel
Selection, "Apple Blossoms" ..... Kreisler
a Paige's Horse .. Prof. J. E. Woodbridge, '89
b To the Fairest College of Them All
D. C. Bartlett, '03

(Organist, Carl Lamson, '09)

a Amherst Alma Mater .... J. D. Hamilton, '06
b Stein Song ..... Bullard
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Rakoczy March ..... Berlioz

At the Pops Tonight

(Amherst College Night But Open Also to the Public)

Entrance of the Gladiators ..... Fucik
Overture to "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Cheer for Old Amherst ..... Pierce
Campus Dreams ..... Blake
Lord Geoffrey Amherst ..... Hamilton
Overture, "1812" ..... Chaikovsky
Largo ..... Händel
Selection, "Apple Blossoms," ... Kreisler-Jacobi
Paige's Horse ..... Woodbridge
To the Fairest College ..... Bartlett
Amherst, Alma Mater ..... Hamilton
Stein Song ..... Bullard
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Rakoczy March ..... Berlioz

Conductor: A. Jacchia.
Organist: Carl Lamson.

ITEMS ABOUT MUSIC

THE good news comes that Mr. Casals, the violoncellist above all the rest, is likely to be heard at a pair of Symphony Concerts next season. Only once before, soon after his first coming to the United States, has he been assisting artist to the orchestra.

A crew of 14 men were rescued.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS!

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight Agide Jacchia will conduct the following programme:

Overture to "The Bronze Horse" ..... Auber
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song" .... Strauss
Andante Cantabile ..... Smith
Fantasia, "Aida" ..... Verdi
Rhapsody, "The Bamboula" ... Coleridge-Taylor
Oboe Solo ..... Schumann
a Romance for Oboe.
b Musette.
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Marche Slave ..... Tschaikowsky
Serenata Barcarola ..... De Nardis
Love's Dream After the Ball ..... Czibulka
Cortege de Bacchus ..... Delibes

POPS TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program:

Overture to "The Bronze Horse" .... Auber
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song" .. Strauss
Andante Cantabile ..... Smith
Fantasia, "Aida" ..... Verdi
Rhapsody, "The Bamboula" ... Coleridge-Taylor
Oboe Solo (a) Romance for Oboe; (b) Musette ..... Schumann
Polish Dance ..... Scharwenka
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" .. Wagner
Marche Slave ..... Tschaikowsky
Serenata Barcarola ..... De Nardis
Love's Dream After the Ball ..... Czibulka
Cortege de Bacchus ..... Delibes

... was destined to succeed."

POPS PROGRAM

An All-Russian-Tschaikowsky program has been arranged by Agide Jacchia for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight as follows:

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" .. Tschaikowsky
Third Movement "Pathetic Smyphony"
Ballet Music from "The Demon" ... Rubinstein
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Finale, "Scherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Marche Slave ..... Tschaikowsky
Andante Cantabile ..... Tschaikowsky
Waltz from "The Serenade" ... Tschaikowsky
Third Movement Pathetic Symphony" .....
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" ..... Tschaikowsky
(Allegro molto vivace.)
(With organ.)
Cossack Song ..... Arr. by Agide Jacchia
Dances from "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin
Procession from "Mlada" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

Fresh and Interesting Numbers Heard Last Evening — New Music by a Resident Composer, Coleridge-Taylor's "Bamboula" and Oboe-Pieces for Mr. Speyer

THERE were interesting items to be heard at the Pop Concert last evening. For the first time anywhere Mr. Jacchia and the orchestra played an Andante Cantabile, written by Warren Storey Smith, of the younger composers and writers about music in Boston. The piece develops, decorates and cumulates motives that soon become melody, distinctly songful, clearly in romantic vein. This instrumental song pleases the ear and touches the fancy. Though it was written earlier than some of Mr. Smith's maturer music, it suggests a like fineness of imagination and handling. Without audible effort Mr. Smith avoids the commonplace formulas for such pieces, yet escapes imitative and laborious subtleties; while he is plainly sensitive to individual voices in his orchestra. With reason the audience applauded piece and sympathetic performance.

Later in the concert Mr. Jacchia passed to Coleridge-Taylor's rhapsody, "The Bamboula"—version for orchestra of the wild and whirling dance of the blacks and the half-casts of New Orleans, described in a frenzy of words by Mr. Cable, transmuted into a frenzy of tones in Mr. Gilbert's symphonic poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," heard last winter from Mr. Monteux and earlier brought to the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House as a ballet. Mr. Gilbert's intention ran higher than his accomplishment, since his music hardly yielded to hearers the alternate furies and languors of the savage and salacious dance—the bite of the rhythms, the mounting din, the intervals of sensual lassitude. No better, if as well, has Coleridge-Taylor succeeded in such transfer to the concert-hall. He achieves orchestral sound and fury; he keeps the rhythms of the Bamboula sharply, but rather monotonously, in play; but when he would gain the languors, he sets to paper merely sentimental song à l'Anglaise. While his English blood thus simmers, hardly once does his negro blood really boil. Possibly only a Russian could write a truly fierce and flaming Bamboula.

Finally, Mr. Speyer, the skilful and artful player upon the English horn in the ordinary course of the Symphony Concerts, was heard in two solo-pieces for the kindred instrument, the oboe. One was a little known Romance of Schumann, in itself simple, sentimental song, with a touch of fancy here, a touch of tenderness there, written in the day's work and written also with a curious disregard of the particular quality and exactions of the oboe. Short as the piece is, it is sustained song and the hard-pressed oboist must catch breath as best he may in half seconds between the phrases. Similarly the music nowhere invites the penetrating, the wistful tone of the chosen instrument. It might have sounded quite as well upon a violin. Having done this feat of sustained tone and suave modulation, Mr. Speyer played a piece better devised for the oboe and better disclosing his abilities as virtuoso—a Musette by Mr. Lenom, his fellow-musician in the orchestra. Once upon a time musettes were French bagpipes, then simple airs, more or less adorned, designed for these instruments. As such Mr. Lenom has written his piece, with the oboe carrying, varying and decorating the melody, while the piano sustains a bass. An oboist himself, the composer readily writes ornate measures played by Mr. Speyer with ease and elegance. Similarly, he utilizes expertly the piercing voice of the oboe, thin but bright, sharp-set or plaintive—and Mr. Speyer readily compassed this range of tone, giving it the prescribed quality, keeping it clean-cut and flowing. There is the charm of old music in the ambling measures of Mr. Lenom's music; and animation when it capers into ornament. Mr. Speyer playing it, caught and conveyed both these traits. H. T. P.

BOSTON ATHLETIC ASSOCIATION

Last year for the first time we had a B. A. A. Night at the "POPS," and it was a delightful success.

There was no real sentiment in having such a night then; but there is considerable now, for it is an endorsement of the loyal men who stood together and refused to desert the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it was in trouble. This Association is consistent in its admiration for such character displayed in any walk of life, and its members will undoubtedly show it by appearing in full force at the SECOND B. A. A. NIGHT AT THE POPS, on Monday, May 24th, at eight o'clock.

The management has prepared a special program for the occasion and reserved a choice section on the floor for members and friends. Tickets and reservations for tables or single seats may be obtained at the Club House, where a diagram is on exhibition. Tables seat four, five or six at one dollar per seat.

Let's have one big enthusiastic audience to pay tribute to the harmony of this incomparable band!

ENTERTAINMENT COMMITTEE.

May 14, 1920.

ENTERTAINMENT COMMITTEE,
B. A. A., Exeter St., Boston, Mass.

Please reserve ..... table for me and charge to my house account.
seats

At the Pops Tonight

Russian Programme

Polonaise from "Eugen Onègin" .... Chaikovsky
Ballet Music from "The Demon" ... Rubinstein
Prelude ..... Rakhmaninov
Finale from "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Slav March—Andante Cantabile—Waltz from "The Serenade"—March Movement from the Pathetic Symphony — Overture, "1812" ..... Chaikovsky
Cossack Song ..... Jacchia
Dances from "Prince Igor" .... Borodin
Procession from the Ballet, Mlada" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

POP CONCERT TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program:

Overture to "Jeanne d'Arc" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Meditation, "Thais" ..... Massenet
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Suite, "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
(a) Les Chasseresses, (b) Pizzicato.
(c) Cortege de Bacchus.
Duet, "Elephant and Gnat" ..... Kling
Bassoon, B. Piller; piccolo, A. Battles.
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana." ...
Third Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Selection, "Jack o' Lantern" ..... Caryll
Indian Idyl ..... MacDowell
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia.)
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" .. Saint-Saens

THE POPS

If the American dollar now retains only half of its former purchasing value, then three hours of Pops' music, which is the finest as well as the gayest in town, may be heard from an unreserved seat for 12½ cents—from the best table seat in Symphony for 50 cents. Which is another way of saying that the 1914, antebellum scale of prices is still in use, and still untaxed. The wolf which the cartoonists label "H. C. of L." has had to slink baffled away from the locked portals of Boston's Temple of Music.

Meanwhile the Pops have been steadily improved. Agide Jacchia, the conductor, makes such fine programs and works such wonders with his symphony orchestra of maximum quality and size, that the crowded audiences are moved, night after night, to consume refreshments in inordinate quantities.

Third Week of the "Pops"

There are two special nights announced for this, the third week of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall. Tuesday a Wagner program will be offered and Friday is Roxbury Latin School night, though tickets for it are available to the public.

Monday the usual agreeable miscellany is offered, with a solo by Paul Shirley on the viola d'amore as an added attraction. This instrument is part way between the viola and the 'cello in size. It has great musical possibilities, which composers since the 18th century have too much neglected. Mr Shirley, who has made it his specialty, will play an andante and minuet by Milandre, a forgotten 18th century composer.

The seven Wagner numbers for Tuesday are the "Bacchanale" and March from "Tannhauser"; the Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde"; the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure"; the Overture to "Rienzi"; the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and an arrangement for violin solo of the song, "Träume," which last, by the way, is really a sort of first version of a familiar passage in "Tristan."

Thursday Georges Miquelle will play a 'cello solo. There are so many interesting features on the other programs that space to enumerate them in detail fails us. Suffice it to say that both those who prefer serious music and those who like light music will find something to their respective tastes on each list Mr Jacchia offers.

POPS PROGRAM FOR TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program:

Overture to "Jeanne d'Arc" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Meditation, "Thais" ..... Massenet
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Suite, "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
a. Les Chasseresses. b. Pizzicato.
c. Cortege de Bacchus.
Duet, "Elephant and Gnat" ..... Kling
Bassoon, B. Piller; piccolo, A. Battles.
Third Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Selection, "Jack o' Lantern" ..... Caryll
Indian Idyl ..... MacDowell
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia.)
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" ... Saint-Saens

For Tuesday, May 18, of the coming ... are in charge of the concert.

"POP" CONCERTS

The high cost of living has made no headway whatsoever in Symphony Hall, where the extremely popular Pop concerts are flourishing under the prices of 1914. If the dollar has shrunk to half its former purchasing value, then a Pop goer may have three hours of musical delights in a balcony seat for virtually 12½ cents, and what now amounts to 50 cents will usher him to the choicest table.

Mr. Jacchia seems to have found the ideal Pop programs, which combine fine symphonic quality with a more obvious tunefulness correctly mixed to create a leavening gayety. That his Symphony orchesra is of the largest and best goes without saying. Although no hot weather has parched the public throat, refreshments are already consumed night after night in great quantities. Next Tuesday night, May 18, will be noteworthy for a Wagner program; Friday night, May 21, for the presence of the Roxbury Latin school, although this night will also be open to the public.

CONCERT MEMORANDA

Progress of the Pops

ELSEWHERE on these pages is the programme for the Pop Concert at Symphony Hall this evening; while through next week the series will run familiar course. For Tuesday evening, the conductor, Mr. Jacchia, has drawn fully half his programme from the operas of Wagner—"Lohengrin," "Tannhäuser," "Tristan," "Rienzi," "Die Walküre." For Wednesday, he has included seldom heard fragments of Charpentier's "Louise." On Monday, Mr. Shirley will play a solo piece upon the viola d'amore; on Thursday, Mr. Miquelle will be the solo violoncellist; on Friday, graduates of the Roxbury Latin School will have their annual "night." Otherwise the regular thing in the regular way from orchestra to refreshments.

CONCERTS AS POPULAR AS EVER

It is hard to find any amusement just now which has not been ravaged by the high cost of living, but this is strictly the case in Symphony Hall, where the doorkeeper has carefully debarred the roaming wolf from intruding upon the nightly festivities of the Pops. This is strict truth, for the scale of Pops prices has not been changed since 1914, and remains untaxed. In the ideally proportioned programs in which Maestro Agide Jacchia mixes fine symphonic quality with more obvious tunefulness, the inspiriting performances which he can conjure from the orchestra under him need no pointing out. Next Tuesday, May 18, will bring a Wagner program, and Friday, May 21, is Roxbury Latin Night, but also public.

BUSINESS WOMEN'S CLUB

THE POPS

In former seasons there were ominous prophecies concerning the result of prohibition at the Pop concerts. It is interesting to observe that the new laws haven't had the slightest effect on the numbers, or, apparently, the pleasure of the audiences there. Statistics, furthermore, come to our aid. The books showed a total attendance of 20 per cent more people in the season of 1919 than during the Pop season of 1918. What is still more surprising is that $15,000 worth of refreshments were consumed in 1919, the first season with prohibition, as against $11,000 worth in the season preceding. This is a different age, apparently, than that of the beer drinking '90s. Niel Patterson, chief steward of the Pop season, remembers big nights when the beer tap was never turned off. A waiting line of glasses was always in readiness, and he would shove one after another under the endless stream of beer, yelling down cellar again and again for more steam (the beer was pumped up from hogsheads by steam pressure). Sometimes six "halves" were emptied in a single night (six halves equal 240 gallons), and this was tapped beer, aside from the bottled goods. In the opinion of some of the older patrons of "The Pops" "them was the happiest days" of the Pop concerts. A majority, however, of those who attend seem entirely satisfied with the ministrations of Mr. Jacchia and his orchestra.

Next Tuesday night at the Pops, May 18, will bring a Wagner programme. and Friday, May 21, is Roxbury Latin Night, but also public.

* * * *

Coleridge-Taylor's "Bamboula" has been played recently at the Pop concerts. It recalls the fact that Henry F. Gilbert used the same dance theme—that of the vulgar, barbaric dance which is "ripped out" by his full orchestras in his "Dance on Place Congo," played at the Symphony concerts of last winter. The curious fact is this: That whereas Coleridge-Taylor, a negro of partly English descent, used the theme in a conventional and rather clap-trap manner, Mr. Gilbert has given it a "punch" and swing much more native to the motive. It goes back to the matter of environment and education vs. heredity. The exoticism one might expect from Coleridge-Taylor, educated at the Royal Conservatory of Music in London, and as debonair a gentleman as you would wish to see, is quite absent from his conventional fantasy to which this celebrated theme gave rise. The composer had had most of the originality educated out of him. He had been told by white professors, as ignorant as so many professors eternally remain of what is in the hearts of their pupils, to sandpaper away such exoticism and, savagery as might remain in his nature. Unfortunately Coleridge-Taylor appears to have obeyed these behests—witness his harmonizations of African folk-melodies, and the conventionality, only occasionally tinctured with a certain exoticism, of his "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast." Mr. Gilbert, happily escaping pedants of any land, roving over a good deal of America, travelling outside of the circles of pedagogues and esthetes, he has caught the inherent vigor and sensuality of this dance, and transferred it to his score. Will Marion Cook, the Negro composer of this country, once said to us that he did not believe a white man could ever teach a Negro to compose. We believe that if a few more teachers of composition felt likewise the world would have had a larger crop of original composers.

POP CONCERT TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia has made the following programme for the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Coronation March ..... Svendsen
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Waltz "La Barcarole" ..... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida" ..... Verdi
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
(a) Morning Mood; (b) Anitra's Dance;
(c) In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Viola d'Amore Solo, Andante and Minuet ..... Milandre 1780
(Mr. Paul Shirley)
Badinage ..... Herbert
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Selection, "Apple Blossoms" ..... Kreisler
March of the Little Lead Soldiers ... Pierne
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" ... Strauss Second Polonaise ..... Lack

e Got to Preach," Says Little Pops Waitress, Studying for Work Among Canadian Ranchmen

Muriel Caswall

re going to preach to the n out in Saskatchewan, you gazing incredulously into the brown eyes of the prettiest at the Pops in Symphony couldn't be a day over 22; her child-like and trusting. She very tall, and she is most dein her simple black dress with apron and head ruffle tied with bbon. As Gertrude Teel stood by my table poising her tray bottles and glasses, it was sim-possible to picture her in clerrb in the pulpit reading from a as big as herself. Yet she had ly, almost casually, stated the hich I had repeated in a quesmake sure.

nodded. "Yes, I'm looking forto preaching to the ranchmen—course to anybody else who hap-come to my church."
an't it scare you to think about must ask.
shook her brown fluffy head.
I know I'm going to love it.
as a matter of fact," she con-setting down the glasses and close to me, "I don't much bem women preachers. And I
't do it," the brown eyes wi-
"if I hadn't felt the call so strong couldn't resist. I just can't help got to preach. Nowadays, you they are training women misies to preach——"
haps," I interrupted. "But how training baby missionaries to
?" It was awfully rude of me, fess.
but I'm not so terribly young," ented seriously. "I'm—well, I'm over 20!"

lning to Become Preacher who are these people who are g these awfully old babies to

?" I wanted to know.
m attending the Gordon Bible
e in the Fenway," she announced
y. "This is my third year. I've all about sermons, and next I'll be a full-fledged missionary preaching powers."
ee," I replied, trying to recover the shock. "And this summer ill be a sort of curate?"
no. I'll have full charge of my
h. There won't be anybody to me except perhaps the church ittee or the deacons. Oh, I do they'll like me."

"I shouldn't think you need worry about that," I soothed her. I could see in my mind's eye, now, a very vivid picture of a little frame church out on the prairie, or in the wheat fields, or whatever it is they have out in the Canadian northwest, and of deacons sprinting up the narrow way of a Sunday morning and fighting with each other for front pews nearest the new minister. If that little church doesn't burst its thin sides for the crowds that it will magnetize this summer, I'll miss my guess.

I thought a lot about the evolution of woman during the 1812 Overture, and during the second intermission, when she came back with another order, I sandwiched in another question before she could get away.

"What else do you learn at your missionary college?"

"Oh, we study lots of things—psychology for one. I could tell you a lot about the crowd here tonight," she twinkled. "We have to know how to size up people either singly or in crowds, so as to know what to say if we are suddenly asked to get up and address them."

I was wishing with all my heart someone would ask this child preacher to get up and address this widely varying through typical Pops audience on the subject of religion. Would they listen as attentively, I wondered, as they did to the "Little Lead Soldiers"? I hadn't a doubt they would!

Is a Waitress While Studying

"Are you working your way through college?" I hurried on to ask.

"Yes," she nodded gayly. "I'm waiting on table at a restaurant—three meals a day—besides being here every night. And it's so hard to find time to study for exams!" she sighed. "We are so busy with the lectures, and all the time I have to study is a couple of hours in the afternoon. And sometimes," she whispered, "I bring my notebook or my Bible down here and study in the interval before the concert begins. Out back, of course," she explained.

I watched her deft, businesslike movements with new eyes. "Whatever gave you the idea, anyway?" I could not help asking.

"To be a missionary, you mean?"

"Yes, and a preacher, and all the rest of it."

She laughed, but behind the laugh that shone in her eyes was the light of an unquenchable zeal, the steady burning of profound conviction. "Why," she explained simply, "it was just a call. It came to me while I was working as a stenographer several years ago. Perhaps Billy Sunday's Bible class had something to do with it," she admitted. "It was so inspiring! Before that, I hadn't thought much about religion. I just had a good time, and the rest of my family were much more religious than I."

"What do they think about your going to the great Northwest?" I wanted to know.

"Well, of course, when the call comes—" she hedged. "You know, they wouldn't stop me from going. They don't say very much, but I think," she smiled, "that they're hoping I will keep on taking courses till I finally forget what I'm taking them for!"

Hopes to Go to China

"What part of the world are you going to convert when you have graduated?" I inquired.

"I'm going wherever I am sent," she returned with simple faith. "Only I sort of hope it will be China. The language is terrible, I know, but I'm studying phonetics, and they say that helps a lot with any language in the world."

Phonetics, psychology, Bible exegesis! How could such a small head hold it all!

"And I can ride and swim," she amended. This brought me back to earth with a thump.

"Just how is riding and swimming going to help the heathen?" I asked, trying to conjure up a vision of a pretty American girl riding over the Tibetan passes with a retinue of Chinese coolies for escort. Or swimming across one of the fetid pools of China in which live and die all breeds of life, human and animal.

"Why, you never know," she explained, "how far your congregation may be scattered from the church. You would have to know how to ride. And sometimes bridges get washed away, and you have to swim across the water or else miss the service."

"Perhaps," I suggested, "they might give you an elephant that would serve as horse and boat both."

"Oh, that would be great!"

The music was beginning again. She moved away, a happy smile on her face, a light assurance in her carriage.

It was a little difficult to get into the spirit of Brahms' dances.

Gertrude Teel, a Massachusetts girl and a waitress at the "Pops," who anticipates her ordination to the ministry to preach in the Canadian backwoods lumber camps.

JACCHIA AND THE POPS

Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, became as a lad in his teens, the eager pupil and life-long friend of Pietro Mascagni. Conducting with outstanding talent and distinction in Brescia, Rome, and Milan at the age of 23, he first came to America with Mascagni and his opera company as the master's chief assistant. He returned to Italy, then crossing the seas once more, toured the United States, Canada and Central America at the head of the Milan opera company. He next conducted four seasons of opera in Canada, and during the season of 1914-15 was Italian conductor at the Century Theatre in New York. Thence he toured with the Boston national opera company. This is his fourth season at the Pops.

Three organizations will celebrate at the Pops during the coming week. On Monday, May 24, the Boston Athletic Association, and on Thursday, May 27, the Boston City Club have requisitioned sections of Symphony Hall. On Tuesday, May 25, Simmons College will take possession of the floor tables—the first college of their sex thus to declare itself at the Pops. Each of these nights will be open to the public.

AGIDE JACCHIA

FOURTH SEASON FOR CONDUCTOR JACCHIA

Organizations to Celebrate at "Pops" This Coming Week

There are reasons for Mr. Jacchia's splendid success with operatic overtures and selections as conductor of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, now entering upon the fourth week of their largest season. In a Viennese waltz, a symphonic piece of the lighter sort, a suite or ballet, the orchestra is of course superfine, in that it is a summer version of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and Mr. Jacchia, however operatic by training, is a symphonic musician at heart. This symphonic instinct makes his readings of opera music even finer. As a conductor of opera, he "ought to know." As a lad in his teens he became the pupil and the life-long friend of Mascagni. Conducting with distinction in Brescia, Rome and Milan at the age of 23, he first came to America with Mascagni and his opera company as chief assistant. He returned to Italy, became famous and crossing the seas once more, toured the United States, Canada and Central America at the head of the Milan Opera Company. He next conducted four seasons of opera in Canada, and during the season of 1914-15 was Italian conductor at the Century Theatre in New York. Thence he toured with the Boston National Opera Company. This is his fourth season at the Pops.

Three organizations will celebrate at the Pops during the coming week. On Monday, May 24, the Boston Athletic Association, and on Thursday, May 27, the Boston City Club have requisitioned sections of Symphony Hall. On Tuesday, May 25, Simmons College will take possession of the floor tables—the first college of their sex thus to declare itself at the Pops. Each of these nights will be open to the public.

TO CELEBRATE AT THE POPS

Three organizations will celebrate at the Pops during the coming week. For Monday, May 24, the Boston Athletic Association, and for Thursday, May 27, the Boston City Club have requisitioned sections of Symphony Hall. On Tuesday, May 25, Simmons College will take possession of the floor tables—the first college of their sex thus to declare itself at the Pops. Each of these nights will be open to the public. Tonight's program will be:

March, "Stars and Stripes".....Sousa
Overture to "Pique Dame".....Suppe
"Loin du Bal".....Gillet
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
(For solo violin, strings and organ.)
An American Idyl, "Indian Summer"..Herbert
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner
Selection, "Apple Blossoms".....Kreisler
Dance of the Gnomes.....Carroll
Waltz, "Pomone".....Waldteufel
Prelude to ((Carmen".....Bizet

PEMBERTON INN OPENS MAY 29

Pemberton Inn opens for the season

Fourth Week of the "Pops"

Three special nights are announced for this, the fourth week of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall. Monday, the Boston Athletic Association will hear a program of familiar numbers by Saint-Saens, Puccini, Vardi, Schubert, Wagner, Tschaikowsky, Johann Strauss and others, with excerpts from Kreisler's new musical comedy, "Apple Blossoms," for an interesting new piece well liked earlier in the present season. Tuesday, Simmons College, which, by the way, is the first woman's college to follow the example of Harvard, Tech, Amherst and the rest of the masculine students who have annual nights there, will hear a program with college songs selection from "Monsieur Beaucaire" and new pieces by Mabel W. Daniels and Henry Hadley as its most interesting features.

Thursday, the Boston City Club is to listen to an attractive miscellany. Saturday, Julius Theodorowicz, concert master of the Symphony Orchestra, will play several solos. The other programs are fully up to Mr Jacchia's usual standard. Like Mr Monteaux, he is a remarkably good program maker, who considers all the elements in his audi-

...to the Gayety this week.

AT THE POPS

There are eloquent reasons for Agide Jacchia's success with opera selections as conductor of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, which are now entering upon the fourth week of their largest season. As a lad in his 'teens he became the ardent disciple of Pietro Mascagni. Conducting with distinction in Brescia, Rome, and Milan at the age of twenty-three, he first came to America with Mascagni and his opera company as the master's chief assistant. Since then his fame has been international. This is his fourth season at the Pops. Three organizations will celebrate at the Pops during the coming week. On Monday the Boston Athletic Association, on Tuesday the Simmons Col-

Progress of The Pops

Elsewhere on these pages is printed the programme of the Pop Concert at Symphony Hall this evening—the miscellany of well-liked pieces usual on Saturday night. For the earlier days of next week three "special nights" are announced—one for the Boston Athletic Club on Monday; another for Simmons College on Tuesday; a third for the Boston City Club on Thursday. On all three occasions, however, there will be room and welcome for the general public. Mr. Jacchia's programmes will bring back favorite pieces of past seasons like Händel's Largo and Offenbach's overture to his opéra-bouffe, "Orphée Aux Enfers"; renew acquaintance with the slow movement of Dvorák's symphony, "From the New World" and sundry dances in Chaikovsky's ballet, "The Nutcracker"; and make known for the first time hereabouts (on Tuesday) an Intermezzo from Mr. Hadley's opera, "Cleopatra's Night," recently represented at the Metropolitan, and an Allegretto for Strings from a Ballet Suite by Miss Mabel Daniels. As for the orchestra, it keeps its familiar virtues; while all else that goes with the Pops—dry or wet—is of like standard quality.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia and his famous orchestra of Symphony players will present the following programme tonight at the Pops:

1 March, Stars and Stripes.....Sousa
2 Overture to "Pique Dame".....Suppe
3 "Loin du Bal".....Gillet
4 Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
5 Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky
6 Ave Maria.....Schuber-Wilhelmj
(For solo violin, strings and organ)
7 An American Idyl "Indian Summer"
Herbert
8 Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner
9 Selection, "Apple Blossoms".....Kreisler
10 Dance of the Gnomes.....Carroll
11 Waltz, "Pomone".....Waldteufel
12 Prelude to "Carmen".....Bizet

POPS

Agide Jacchia, and his famous orchestra of Symphony players, will present the following program tonight at the Pops:

March, "Stars and Stripes".....Sousa
Overture, to "Pique Dame".....Suppe
"Loin du Bal".....Gillet
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
March, "Slave".....Tschaikowsky
"Ave Maria".....Schubert-Wilhelmj
(For solo violin, strings and organ.)

POPS TONIGHT

The program for the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight will be as follows:

Overture to "Il Guarany".....Gomez
Waltz from "The Bat".....Strauss
Traumerei.....Schumann
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens
Ballet Suite, "Coppelia".....Delibes
a. Waltz. b. Czardas.
Violin solo, a. Praeludium and Allegro, Pugnani-Kreisler
b. Tambourin Chinois.....Kreisler
(Mr. Julius Theodorowicz)
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
"My Golden Girl".....Herbert
Hymn to the Sun from "Le Coq d'Or" Rimsky-Korsakoff
Serenade from "Les Millions d'Arlequin," Drigo
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen"..Bizet

At the Pops Tonight

Prelude to "Carmen".....Bizet

...ed to boot, but he does not shoot himself

At the Pops Tonight

March, "The Merry Soldier"...Sabathil

Enesco's whirling "Roumanian Rhapsody,"

At the Pops Tonight

Overture to "La Forza del Destino" Verdi

...Waltz. Well liked pieces.

At the Pops Tonight

Coronation March.....Svendsen

At the Pops Tonight

Wagner-Programme

March from "Tannhäuser"

At the Pops Tonight

March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Slavic March.....Chaikovsky
"Depuis le Jour," from "Louise," Charpentier
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier," R. Strauss
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Rakóczy March.....Liszt
Intermezzo from "Ratcliff"....Mascagni
Dubinushka.....Jacchia
Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Conductor: A. Jacchia

POPS TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia and his illustrious forces of Symphony players will give the following program at the Pop concert t...

THE "POP" PROGRAM

For the Pop concert tonight the Boston Athletic Association has taken over a part of Symphony Hall. This concert

TONIGHT'S POP PROGRAM

Music lovers will flock to Symphony Hall tonight to hear the following Pop concert program, featuring the music of Wagner.

March from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
...of the guests into Wartburg)

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The program for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight will be as follows:

Overture to "Il Guarany".....Gomez

ROXBURY LATIN AT POPS

Although the Roxbury Latin School will hold its annual celebration at the Pops tonight, the concert will be of general interest and open to the public. The program follows:

March, "The Merry Soldier".....Sabathil
Overture "Oberon".....Weber

HARVARD NIGHT AT POPS

The annual Harvard night at the Pops, which is always a celebration on a large scale, will take place in Symphony Hall tonight. The Harvard Glee Club, 80 strong, will sing songs both with the orchestra and unaccompanied. They will be conducted by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, their regular leader. The program:

Saint-Saens

TRAVELERS AT POPS

Holding their annual convention in Boston, the United Commercial Travelers have elected to celebrate at the Pop concert in Sympony Hall tonight. As they have requisitioned the entire house, there will be no public sale. The program follows:

March, "El Capitan".....Sousa
Overture to "Light Cavalry".....Suppe
Waltz, "Girls of Baden".....Komzak
Fantasia, "Faust" (with organ).....Gounod
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Largo (with organ).....Handel
Introduction Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner
Selection, "Sometime"

At the Pops Tonight

Overture to "Gustave III."....Auber
Waltz, "Girls of Baden".....Komzak
Badinage.....Herbert
Fantasia

At the Pops Tonight

B. A. A. Night
But Open to the Public

Heroes' March.....Saint-Saëns
Overture to "Orpheus".....Offenbach
Whispering of the Flowers.....Blon

At the Pops Tonight

City Club Night
But Open to the Public

At the Pops Tonight

Teachers' Night
(Open to the Public)

Procession from "The Queen of

At the Pops Tonight

A Dance Programme

Galop Chromatique.....Liszt
Arazonaise from "The Cid"...Massenet
Waltz, "Blue Danube".....J. Strauss
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Ballet Music from "The Demon," Rubinstein
German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride," Mozart
Tarantella.....Jacchia
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Chaikovsky
Suite from the Ballet, "Sylvia"..Delibes
Menuet à l'Antique.....Paderewski
American Dances, Past and Present
Old Jigs and Reels.

"THE POP OF POPS"

BOSTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE NIGHT

at

THE POP CONCERTS

Symphony Hall

MONDAY EVENING, MAY 10, 1920

8:00 o'clock

A REAL BIG CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

"GET-TOGETHER EVENING"

Here in Boston

Contrary to expectation, the Intermezzo from Mr. Hadley's newest opera, 'Cleopatra's Night,' was not played at the Pop Concert last evening. Belated arrival of the orchestral parts left no time for rehearsal and Mr. Jacchia prudently put over the performance of the piece until next week. The other new number, an Allegretto for Strings from a Suite of Ballet Music by Miss Mabel Daniels, was heard according to schedule. It proved an innocent trifle, done with a light hand in the prettier ways of such ambling tunes. For this evening at The Pops Mr. Jacchia is making two resurrections—Liszt's version of the Rakoczy March, usually displaced by Berlioz's, and a forgotten overture of Auber to his opera of 1833, "Gustave III."

By the middle of July Mr. Monteux expects to return from his expedition to London and Paris in quest of new music and to spend the rest of the summer hereabouts. He is leaving New York today.

With patience we shall

Traveller

MORE 'SPECIAL' NIGHTS FOR "POPS"

The pending fifth week of Pops is crowded with special nights. On Monday May 31 the National anthem will be played in observance of Memorial day. Tuesday brings the annual Harvard night, when the very highly praised Harvard Glee Club of 60 voices will sing with the orchestra, and also by themselves, conducted by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, to whose training they owe their distinctive place among men's choruses. On Wednesday night, June 2, an entire program of dance and ballet music will probably be considered the most interesting of the week from a musical point of view. For Thursday night June 3, the Boston Teachers' Club has taken a number of seats, but this night is open to the public and all teachers are especially welcome. For Friday, June 4, the United Commercial Travelers have taken over the entire house. Tonight's program is as follows:

Overture to "Il Guarany"	Gomez
Waltz from "The Bat"	Strauss
Traumerei	Schumann
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saens
Ballet Suite, "Coppelia," a. Waltz, b. Czardas	Delibes
Violin solo, a. Praeludium and Allegro	Pugnani-Kreisler
b. Tambourin Chinois (Mr. Julius Theodorowicz.)	Kreisler
Rondo Capriccioso	Mendelssohn
First Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
"My Golden Girl"	Herbert
"Hymn to the Sun," from "Le Coq d'Or"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Serenade from "Les Millions d'Arlequin"	Drigo
Gypsy Dance, from "Carmen"	Bizet

Globe M 31

Fifth Week of the Pops

Harvard Night at the Pops comes Tuesday of this week, when the Harvard Glee Club, led by Prof A. T. Davison, will sing three a cappella selections and two with orchestral accompaniment. One of the latter is a new chorus by F. S. Converse to words by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, composed in memory of the Harvard men who fell in the war. The other numbers, as those who have heard the Glee Club recently will not need to be told, are of serious musical value and not the usual college glee club stuff.

Mr Jacchia will lead the orchestra in the usual miscellaneous array of pieces, which range this time all the way from Victor Herbert to Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherzade."

Wednesday's program is made up wholly of dance music. Thursday is Boston Teacher's Night, but seats are on public sale. Friday the house is sold out to the United Commercial Travelers. Saturday's list offers the usual assortment of favorite numbers old and new. Monday "The Star Spangled Banner" and "America" will be played in honor of Memorial Day.

An Impending Week of Special Nights and Special Programmes—The Harvard Glee Club on Tuesday

NIGHT until Monday evening of next week the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall run in usual course. Since a supplementary holiday has been added to the national holiday of Sunday, "The Star-Spangled Banner" and "America" will be inserted in the programme for Monday evening. Tuesday will bring the annual Harvard Night (open to the public) at which not only Mr. Jacchia's orchestra but also the Glee Club of the college will be heard. Dr. Davison will lead it and it will sing pieces that have justified and spread its note at recent concerts—three unaccompanied and two with orchestra. For Wednesday Mr. Jacchia has put together a curious and interesting programme of dance music. On it, for example, stand Liszt's "Chromatic Galop"; ballet music from Rubinstein's opera, "The Demon"; American jigs and reels and an actual fox-trot—to say nothing of more familiar items. For Thursday, the Boston Teachers' Club have taken many tables, but there will be room for the general public. On Friday, however, the United Commercial Travellers have taken every place in Symphony Hall—seats in the balconies as well as tables on the floor. On Saturday, three freshening pieces are listed: a Fantasia from Leoni's sinister opera of Chinatown in San Francisco, "L'Oracolo"; the Intermezzo from Mr. Hadley's new music-drama, "Cleopatra's Night," and Sibelius's sonorous tone-poem, "Finlandia." Elsewhere on these pages is printed the programme for this evening. For Monday next the proposed pieces are:

Wedding March	Mendelssohn
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers"	Verdi
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights"	J. Strauss
Fantasia, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Overture, Trepak and Flower-Waltz from The Ballet, "Nutcracker"	Chaikovsky
Ecstasy	Ganne
Introduction to Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf-Ferrari
Danse Macabre	Saint-Saëns
Overture to "Zampa"	Herold
Minuet from "Manon Lescaut"	Puccini
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube"	Ivanovici
Coronation March	Svendsen

Pictorial and Music Programme

Herald

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The programme for the Pop con in Symphony Hall tonight will be as follows:

Overture to "Il Guarany"	Gomez
Waltz from "The Bat"	Strauss

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Simmons College will celebrate at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, this being the first women's college to make this venture. The concert, however, will be open to the public and all the more interesting for this reason. The programme follows:

March from "Aida" ..... Verdi

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The annual Harvard night at the Pops, which is always a celebration on a large scale, will take place at Symphony Hall tonight. As a special fea-

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Although the Women's City Club will gather in numbers at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, the concert will also be open to the public. The programme follows:

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Tonight's Pop Concert in Symphony Hall will be in every sense public, although the graduate nurses, who are holding their annual convention this week, have taken a number of seats. The program follows:

Ganne

tention.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of 80 Symphony players will give the following programme at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Co have refused the	Delibes

POPS TONIGHT

The Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight is dedicated to the New England Conservatory of Music, but is also in every sense a public occasion, and the programme which follows is of special interest:

Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Overture to "Oberon"	Weber

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia and his Symphony Orchestra will play the following programme at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

French Military March	Saint-Saens
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The National Bankers' convention, having taken over Symphony Hall entire for the Pop Concert tonight, there will be no public sale. They will celebrate with the following Pop programme:

March from "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Overture, "Ruy Blas"	Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Espana"	Waldteufel
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo"	Leoni
"Pomp and Circumstance" (with organ)	Elgar
Traumerei	Schumann
Third Slavonic Dance	Dvorak
"Marche Slave"	Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Carmen"	Bizet
"Love's Dream After the Ball"	Czibulka
American Patrol	Meacham
March, "From Maine to California"	Sousa

Special Pop Nights

The most sociable and only musical gathering point hereabouts during the spring and summer is the Pop Concerts, which empty Symphony Hall every night with music of symphonic quality and dollar appeal.

The pending fifth week of Pops is crowded with special nights. On Monday (May 31) the national anthem will be played in observance of Memorial day. Tuesday brings the annual Harvard night, when the very highly praised Harvard Glee Club of 60 voices will sing, conducted by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, to whose training they owe their distinctive place among men's choruses. On Wednesday night (June 2) an entire program of dance and ballet music will probably be considered the most interesting of the week from a musical point of view. For Thursday night (June 3) the Boston Teachers' Club have taken a number of seats, but this night is open to the public and all teachers are especially welcome. For Friday (June 4) the United Commercial Travelers have taken over the entire house.

Globe

At the Pops Tonight

Overture to "Guarany" ..... Gomez

Waltz from "The Bat" ..... J. Strauss

At the Pops Tonight

Harvard Night

(Open to the Public)

Herold' Mirth ..... Saint-Saëns

At the Pops Tonight

Graduate-Nurses' Night

(Open to the Public)

Marche Lorraine ..... Ganne

At the Pops Tonight

Euclid Lodge Night

(Open to the Public)

Prelude to "Carmen" ..... Bizet

At the Pops Tonight

Women's City Club Night

(Open to the Public)

March from "Aida" ..... Verdi

(Morning, Noon and

At the Pops Tonight

The Commercial Travellers' Association Has Taken the Whole of Symphony Hall and the Concert Is Not Open to the Public

ALL BOSTON GOING TO THE POPS

Every night at Symphony Hall, except Sunday, the Pop concerts are the gathering place of all who enjoy sitting socially around a table, or from a balcony giving all their attention to the best music, the only real music which Boston affords this spring and summer time. That Mr. Jacchia can please the most popular musical tastes, and the highest, by his programs is more evident than ever this season. Nor do the audiences fail to appreciate the excellent performance of the 80 Symphony players.

Each night except Saturday of the coming week bears its special earmarks. On Monday night (May 31) the national anthem will be played in observance of Memorial day. Tuesday brings the annual Harvard night, when the highly praised Harvard Glee Club of 60 voices will sing, conducted by Dr. Davison. On Wednesday night (June 2) an entire program of dance and ballet music will be given. For Thursday night (June 3) the Boston Teachers' Club has taken a number of seats, but this night is open to the public, and all teachers are especially welcome. For Friday (June 4) the United Commercial Travelers have taken over the entire house. The programs of the fifth week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 31.

Wedding March	Mendelssohn
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers"	Verdi
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights"	Strauss
Fantasia, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
"The Star Spangled Banner"
Suite, "Nutcracker"	Tschaikowsky
"Extase"	Ganne
Intermezzo, Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf-Ferrari
Danse Macabre	Saint-Saens
"America"
Overture to "Zampa"	Herold
Minuet	Puccini
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube"	Ivanovici
Coronation March	Svendsen

TUESDAY, JUNE 1.

Harvard Night

Marche Heroique	Saint-Saens
Overture to "Mignon"	Thomas
Waltz, "Summer Ballet"	Eschman
Songs with orchestra:
Prayer of Thanksgiving	Kretschmer
"The Answer of the Stars" (In honor of the Harvard soldiers and sailors of the great war), words by M. A. DeWolfe Howe	Converse
Harvard Glee Club, A. T. Davison, conductor
Finale of "Scheherazade"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Allegretto for strings from Ballet Suite,	Mabel W. Daniels
Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner
Songs a cappella:
Matona, Lovely Maiden	Lassus
My Bonnie Lass	Morley
Drake's Drum	Coleridge-Taylor
Harvard Glee Club
Selection, "My Golden Girl"	Herbert
Slavonic Dance No. 2	Dvorak
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"	Vollstedt
"Fair Harvard"
"Cruiser Harvard"	Strube

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 2.

"Galop Chromatique"	Liszt
Aragonaise from "The Cid"	Massenet
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"	Straus
"Dance of the Hours"	Ponchielli
Ballet music from "The Demon"	Rubinstein
Germance dance, "The Sleigh Ride"	Mozart
Tarantelle (with flute solo)	Jacchia
Polonaise from "Eugen Oneigin"	Tschaikowsky
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia"	Delibes
"Menuet a l'Antique"	Paderewski
American Dances, Past and Present.
Danse Boheme from "Carmen"	Bizet

THURSDAY, JUNE 3.

Boston Teachers' Night

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
Overture to "Zampa"	Herold
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"	Strauss
Fantasia, "Otello"	Verdi
Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"	Wagner
Tarantelle (with flute solo)	Jacchia
Reve Angelique	Rubinstein
In the Hall of the Mountain King	Grieg
Selection, "Pinafore"	Sullivan
Menuet a l'Antique	Paderewski
"Indian Summer," an American Idyl	Herbert
Pomp and Circumstance (with organ)	Elgar

FRIDAY, JUNE 4.

Commercial Travelers' Night

March, "El Capitan"	Sousa
Overture to "Light Cavalry"	Suppe
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"	Komzak
Fantasia, "Faust" (with organ)	Gounod
Pomp and Circumstance	Elgar
Largo (with organ)	Handel
Introduction Act III. "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf-Ferrari
Overture to "Rienzi"	Wagner
Selection, "Sometime"	Frimi
American Idyl, "Indian Summer"	Herbert
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"	Strauss
March, "Entrance of the Gladiators"	Fucik

SATURDAY, JUNE 5.

Cortege de Bacchus	Delibes
Overture to "Raymond"	Thomas
Waltz, "Morning Journals"	Strauss
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo"	Leoni
Finlandia	Sibelius
(Jacques Hoffman)

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of 80 symphony players will give the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

WOMEN'S CLUB AT POPS

Although the Women's City Club will gather in numbers at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, the concert will also be open to the public. The program follows:

Triumphal March from "Aida" ..... Verdi

POP PROGRAM TONIGHT

Although the members of Lodge will hold their annual gatherin at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, seats at all prices are on public sale. The program, which is also of general interest, follows:

TECH NIGHT AT POPS

The Massachusetts Institute of Technology will make the Pop concert at Symphony Hall tonight (which is also open to the public) an occasion of special magnitude, with songs by the Tech Club figuring on the follow-

POP CONCERT PROGRAM

Although the Professional Women's

MONDAY, JUNE 7, 192

Club has bought a number of seats in advance for tonight's Pop concert in

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight will be:

March, "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner

POP PROGRAM TONIGHT

The Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, while dedicated to the New England Conservatory of Music, is open to the public. The program, which follows, is of special interest:

Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner

NEWS OF MUSIC

An Amusing Evening at The Pops with the Symphony Orchestra Playing a Fox-Trot—London Extols Cecil Fanning—Pavlova as a Peri—Dr. Muck Declines a Post—Incidents and Intentions

TWELVE pieces—all music of the dance—filled the printed programme at The Pops last evening. To them the applause of the audience added at least six more, likewise in rhythms of the dance. In a sense, a limited, a specialized one, but one, none the less, that could and did range widely. From the eighteenth century, for example, Mr. Jacchia picked not only Boccherini's Minuet, now sober, now arch, but also a playful German dance, flavored with sleigh-bells, from some nook in Mozart's exhaustless pages. There were turns in it characteristic of the composer in and out of trifles; there was also hint, now and then, of folk-tune. The French theatre yielded the conductor dances of Massenet, Delibes, Bizet—all conventionally artful and agreeable in kind. The Russians gave him the sonorous Polonaise from Chaikovsky's opera, "Eugen Onégin," and a dull number, designed to be rudely fantastic and mysteriously oriental, from the ballet-music of Rubinstein's forgotten opera, "The Demon." Even the classical Germans helped—Brahms with a Hungarian Dance; Liszt with a Chromatic Galop, flamboyant, furious, virtuoso-like with sharps and flats; and the perennial Strauss of Vienna, with his Danubean waltz. Ponchielli—"The Dance of the Hours," of course—and the conductor as composer of a Tarantella, filled Italian interstices.

Well toward the end of the concert, not even the Americans were overlooked; while, as it happened, the chosen were not the Americans of "serious music." Through jigs and reels of an older day, still lingering in rural ball-rooms—"The Arkansaw Traveler" and his kind—went the orchestra with snapping rhythms; and then passed to the fox-trot of 1920, which is "Dardanella." Never before, probably, were the whining tune and the ragtime rhythms of "Johnny" Black played by seventy-odd men from one of the ablest orchestras in the world. Never before, likewise, had that seventy strayed into such music—and found themselves at home. They pointed Mr. "Johnny" Black's music; they gave it even piquant turns of their own. Loud was the applause; quick the repetition. It is obligation of The Pops to be amusing. They were yesterday. H. T. P.

ties.

Special Pop Night for the Women's City Club

WEDNESDAY, June 9, will be Women's City Club Night at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall. The war years and the one succeeding the armistice have of necessity restricted the more pleasureable activties of the club and this occasion is a get-together effort. An added pleasure will be the opportunity to meet Mrs. James J. Storrow, Mrs. George W. Coleman and Mrs. Roland G. Hopkins before the concert.

POP CONCERTS

Each night except Saturday this week offers special attraction at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall. Monday night the National Anthem will be played in observance of Memorial Day. Tuesday brings the annual Harvard night, when the Harvard Glee Club of sixty voices will sing with the orchestra and also by themselves, conducted by Dr. Archibald T. Davison. Wednesday night (June 2) an entire program of dance and ballet music will be offered. For Thursday night the Boston Teachers' Club will have part of the house. For Friday the United Commercial Travellers have taken over the entire house.

POP CONCERTS

The present Pops season is the largest this institution of thirty-five Summers has ever known. Mr. Jacchia has an instinct for the public pulse to guide him in making Pop programs, but applause is not a sufficient test. Request Night will come on Monday, June 21. Suggestions must be limited to three pieces, and must have the name and address of the voter. They may be mailed to Agide Jacchia, Symphony Hall, Boston, or dropped in the Request Night ballot box at the Massachusetts avenue entrance. Reservations have been engaged by the Professional Women's Club, Graduate Nurses, Women's City Club and Euclid Lodge this week, but the Pops are in every sense public. The same applies to Technology Night next Friday.

"THE POP OF POPS"

BOSTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE NIGHT

at

THE POP CONCERTS

Symphony Hall

MONDAY EVENING, MAY 10, 1920

8:00 o'clock

A REAL BIG CHAMBER OF COMMERCE
"GET-TOGETHER EVENING"

An Impending Week of Special Nights and Special Programmes—The Harvard Glee Club on Tuesday

NEXT until Monday evening of next week the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall run their usual course. Since a supplementary holiday has been added to the national holiday of Sunday, "The Star-Spangled Banner" and "America" will be inserted in the programme for Monday evening. Tuesday will bring the annual Harvard Night (open to the public) at which not only Mr. Jacchia's orchestra but also the Glee Club of the college will be heard. Dr. Davison will lead it and it will sing pieces that have justified and spread its note at recent concerts—three unaccompanied and two with orchestra. For Wednesday Mr. Jacchia has put together a curious and interesting programme of dance music. On it, for example, stand Liszt's "Chromatic Galop"; ballet music from Rubinstein's opera, "The Demon"; American jigs and reels and an actual fox-trot—to say nothing of more familiar items. For Thursday, the Boston Teachers' Club have taken many tables, but there will be room for the general public. On Friday, however, the United Commercial Travellers have taken every place in Symphony Hall—seats in the balconies as well as tables on the floor. On Saturday, three freshening pieces are listed: a Fantasia from Leoni's sinister opera of Chinatown in San Francisco, "L'Oracolo"; the Intermezzo from Mr. Hadley's new music-drama, "Cleopatra's Night," and Sibelius's sonorous tone-poem, "Finlandia." Elsewhere on these pages is printed the programme for this evening. For Monday next the proposed pieces are:

Wedding March ..... Mendelssohn
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights" ..... J. Strauss
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Overture, Trepak and Flower-Waltz from The Ballet, "Nutcracker" ..... Chaikovsky
Ecstasy ..... Ganne
Introduction to Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Danse Macabre ..... Saint-Saëns
Overture to "Zampa" ..... Herold
Minuet from "Manon Lescaut" ..... Puccini
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube" ..... Ivanovici
Coronation March ..... Svendsen

ALL BOSTON GOING TO THE POPS

Every night at Symphony Hall, except Sunday, the Pop concerts are the gathering place of all who enjoy sitting socially around a table, or from a balcony giving all their attention to the best music, the only real music which Boston affords in the spring and summer time. That Mr. Jacchia can please the most popular musical tastes, and the highest, by his programs is more evident than ever this season. Nor do the audiences fail to appreciate the excellent performance of the 80 Symphony players.

Each night except Saturday of the coming week bears its special earmarks. On Monday night (May 31) the national anthem will be played in observance of Memorial day. Tuesday brings the annual Harvard night, when the highly praised Harvard Glee Club of 60 voices will sing, conducted by Dr. Davison. On Wednesday night (June 2) an entire program of dance and ballet music will be given. For Thursday night (June 3) the Boston Teachers' Club has taken a number of seats, but this night is open to the public, and all teachers are especially welcome. For Friday (June 4) the United Commercial Travelers have taken over the entire house. The programs of the fifth week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 31.

Wedding March ..... Mendelssohn
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
"The Star Spangled Banner"
Suite, "Nutcracker" ..... Tschaikowsky
"Extase" ..... Ganne
Intermezzo, Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Danse Macabre ..... Saint-Saens
"America"
Overture to "Zampa" ..... Herold
Minuet ..... Puccini
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube" ..... Ivanovici
Coronation March ..... Svendsen

TUESDAY, JUNE 1.

Harvard Night

Marche Heroique ..... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Waltz, "Summer Ballet" ..... Eschman
Songs with orchestra:
Prayer of Thanksgiving ..... Kretschmer
"The Answer of the Stars" (in honor of the Harvard soldiers and sailors of the great war), words by M. A. DeWolfe Howe ..... Converse
Harvard Glee Club, A. T. Davison, conductor
Finale of "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Allegretto for strings from Ballet Suite, Mabel W. Daniels
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Songs a cappella:
Matona, Lovely Maiden ..... Lassus
My Bonnie Lass ..... Morley
Drake's Drum ..... Coleridge-Taylor
Harvard Glee Club
Selection, "My Golden Girl" ..... Herbert
Slavonic Dance No. 2 ..... Dvorak
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ..... Vollstedt
"Fair Harvard"
"Cruiser Harvard" ..... Strube

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 2.

"Galop Chromatique" ..... Liszt
Aragonaise from "The Cid" ..... Massenet
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
"Dance of the Hours" ..... Ponchielli
Ballet music from "The Demon" ..... Rubinstein
Germance dance, "The Sleigh Ride" ..... Mozart
Tarantelle (with flute solo) ..... Jacchia
Polonaise from "Eugen Oneigin" ..... Tschaikowsky
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
"Menuet a l'Antique" ..... Paderewski
American Dances, Past and Present.
Danse Boheme from "Carmen" ..... Bizet

THURSDAY, JUNE 3.

Boston Teachers' Night

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba" ..... Gounod
Overture to "Zampa" ..... Herold
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "Otello" ..... Verdi
Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Tarantelle (with flute solo) ..... Jacchia
Reve Angelique ..... Rubinstein
In the Hall of the Mountain King ..... Grieg
Selection, "Pinafore" ..... Sullivan
Menuet a l'Antique ..... Paderewski
"Indian Summer," an American Idyl ..... Herbert
Pomp and Circumstance (with organ) ..... Elgar

FRIDAY, JUNE 4.

Commercial Travelers' Night

March, "El Capitan" ..... Sousa
Overture to "Light Cavalry" ..... Suppe
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" ..... Komzak
Fantasia, "Faust" (with organ) ..... Gounod
Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Largo (with organ) ..... Handel
Introduction Act III. "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Overture to "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Selection, "Sometime" ..... Friml
American Idyl, "Indian Summer" ..... Herbert
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
March, "Entrance of the Gladiators" ..... Fucik

SATURDAY, JUNE 5.

Cortege de Bacchus ..... Delibes
Overture to "Raymond" ..... Thomas
Waltz, "Morning Journals" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ..... Leoni
Finlandia ..... Sibelius
(Jeannes Hoffman)

NEWS OF MUSIC

An Amusing Evening at The Pops with the Symphony Orchestra Playing a Fox-Trot—London Extols Cecil Fanning—Pavlova as a Peri—Dr. Muck Declines a Post—Incidents and Intentions

TWELVE pieces, all music of the dance—filled the appointed programme at The Pops last evening. To them the applause of the audience added at least six more, likewise in rhythms of the dance. In a sense, a limited, a specialized list, but one, none the less, that could and did range widely. From the eighteenth century, for example, Mr. Jacchia picked not only Boccherini's Minuet, now sober, now arch, but also a playful German dance, flavored with sleigh-bells, from some nook in Mozart's exhaustless pages. There were turns in it characteristic of the composer in and out of trifles; there was also hint, now and then, of folk-tune. The French theatre yielded the conductor dances of Massenet, Delibes, Bizet—all conventionally artful and agreeable in kind. The Russians gave him the sonorous Polonaise from Chaikovsky's opera, "Eugen Onégin," and a dull number, designed to be rudely fantastic and mysteriously oriental, from the ballet-music of Rubinstein's forgotten opera, "The Demon." Even the classical Germans helped—Brahms with a Hungarian Dance; Liszt with a Chromatic Galop, flamboyant, furious, virtuoso-like with sharps and flats; and the perennial Strauss of Vienna, with his Danubean waltz. Ponchielli—"The Dance of the Hours," of course—and the conductor as composer of a Tarantella, filled Italian interstices.

Well toward the end of the concert, not even the Americans were overlooked; while, as it happened, the chosen were not the Americans of "serious music." Through jigs and reels of an older day, still lingering in rural ball-rooms—"The Arkansaw Traveler" and his kind—went the orchestra with snapping rhythms; and then passed to the fox-trot of 1920, which is "Dardanella." Never before, probably, were the whining tune and the ragtime rhythms of "Johnny" Black played by seventy-odd men from one of the ablest orchestras in the world. Never before, likewise, had that seventy strayed into such music—and found themselves at home. They pointed Mr. "Johnny" Black's music; they gave it even piquant turns of their own. Loud was the applause; quick the repetition. It is obligation of The Pops to be amusing. They were yesterday. H. T. P.

Special Pop Nights

The most sociable and only musical gathering point hereabouts during the spring and summer is the Pop Concerts, which enliven Symphony Hall every night with music of symphonic quality and popular appeal.

The pending fifth week of Pops is crowded with special nights. On Monday (May 31) the national anthem will be played in observance of Memorial day. Tuesday brings the annual Harvard night, when the very highly praised Harvard Glee Club will sing with the orchestra, and also by themselves, conducted by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, to whose training they owe their distinctive place among men's choruses. On Wednesday night (June 2) an entire program of dance and ballet music will probably be considered the most interesting of the week from a musical point of view. For Thursday night (June 3) the Boston Teachers' Club have taken a number of seats, but this night is open to the public and all teachers are especially welcome. For Friday (June 4) the United Commercial Travelers have taken over the entire house.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Simmons College will celebrate at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, this being the first women's college to make this venture. The concert, however, will be open to the public and all the more interesting for this reason. The programme follows:

March from "Aida" ..... Verdi

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The annual Harvard night at the Pops, which is always a celebration on a large scale, will take place at Symphony Hall tonight. As a special fea-

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Although the Women's City Club will gather in numbers at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, the concert will also be open to the public. The pro-

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Tonight's Pop Concert in Symphony Hall will be in every sense public, although the graduate nurses, who are holding their annual convention this week, have taken a number of seats. The program follows:

sions. It is attracting ..... (Ganne
tention.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of 80 Symphony players will give the following programme at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Co[illegible] have refused the ..... Delibes

POPS TONIGHT

The Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight is dedicated to the New England Conservatory of Music, but is also in every sense a public occasion, and the programme which follows is of special interest:

Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia and his Symphony Orchestra will play the following programme at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

French Military March ..... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Poet and Peasant" ..... [illegible]

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The National Bankers' convention, having taken over Symphony Hall entire for the Pop Concert tonight, there will be no public sale. They will celebrate with the following Pop programme:

March from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Overture, "Ruy Blas" ..... Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Espana" ..... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ..... Leoni
"Pomp and Circumstance" (with organ) ..... Elgar
Traumerei ..... Schumann
Third Slavonic Dance ..... Dvorak
"Marche Slave" ..... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Carmen" ..... Bizet
"Love's Dream After the Ball" ..... Czibulka
American Patrol ..... Meacham
March, "From Maine to California" ..... Sousa

MORE 'SPECIAL' NIGHTS FOR "POPS"

The pending fifth week of Pops is crowded with special nights. On Monday May 31 the National anthem will be played in observance of Memorial day. Tuesday brings the annual Harvard night, when the very highly praised Harvard Glee Club of 60 voices will sing with the orchestra, and also by themselves, conducted by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, to whose training they owe their distinctive place among men's choruses. On Wednesday night, June 2, an entire program of dance and ballet music will probably be considered the most interesting of the week from a musical point of view. For Thursday night June 3, the Boston Teachers' Club has taken a number of seats, but this night is open to the public and all teachers are especially welcome. For Friday, June 4, the United Commercial Travelers have taken over the entire house. Tonight's program is as follows:

Overture to "Il Guarany" ..... Gomez
Waltz from "The Bat" ..... Strauss
Traumerei ..... Schumann
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
Ballet Suite, "Coppelia," a. Waltz ..... Delibes
b. Czardas ..... Delibes
Violin solo, a. Praeludium and Allegro ..... Pugnani-Kreisler
b. Tambourin Chinois ..... Kreisler
(Mr. Julius Theodorowicz.)
Rondo Capriccioso ..... Mendelssohn
First Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
"My Golden Girl" ..... Herbert
"Hymn to the Sun," from "Le Coq d'Or" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Serenade from "Les Millions d'Arlequin" ..... Drigo
Gypsy Dance, from "Carmen" ..... Bizet

Fifth Week of the Pops

Harvard Night at the Pops comes Tuesday of this week, when the Harvard Glee Club, led by Prof A. T. Davison, will sing three a cappella selections and two with orchestral accompaniment. One of the latter is a new chorus by F. S. Converse to words by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, composed in memory of the Harvard men who fell in the war. The other numbers, as those who have heard the Glee Club recently will not need to be told, are of serious musical value and not the usual college glee club stuff.

Mr Jacchia will lead the orchestra in the usual miscellaneous array of pieces, which range this time all the way from Victor Herbert to Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade."

Wednesday's program is made up wholly of dance music. Thursday is Boston Teacher's Night, but seats are on public sale. Friday the house is sold out to the United Commercial Travelers. Saturday's list offers the usual assortment of favorite numbers old and new. Monday "The Star Spangled Banner" and "America" will be played in honor of Memorial Day.

At the Pops Tonight

Overture to "Il Guarany" ..... Gomez
Waltz from "The Bat" ..... J. Strauss

At the Pops Tonight

Harvard Night
(Open to the Public)

Heroic March ..... Saint-Saëns

At the Pops Tonight

Graduate-Nurses' Night
(Open to the Public)

Marche Lorraine ..... Ganne

At the Pops Tonight

Euclid Lodge Night
(Open to the Public)

Prelude to "Carmen" ..... Bizet

At the Pops Tonight

Women's City Club Night
(Open to the Public)

March from "Aida" ..... Verdi
"Morning, Noon and

At the Pops Tonight

The Commercial Travellers' Association Has Taken the Whole of Symphony Hall and the Concert Is Not Open to the Public

WOMEN'S CLUB AT POPS

Although the Women's City Club will gather in numbers at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, the concert will also be open to the public. The program follows:

Triumphal March from "Aida" ..... Verdi

POP PROGRAM TONIGHT

Although the members of [illegible] Lodge will hold their annual gathering at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, seats at all prices are on public sale. The program, which is also of general interest, follows:

TECH NIGHT AT POPS

The Massachusetts Institute of Technology will make the Pop concert at Symphony Hall tonight (which is also open to the public) an occasion of special magnitude, with songs by the Tech Glee Club figuring on the follow-

POP CONCERT PROGRAM

Although the Professional Women's [illegible]

MONDAY, JUNE 7, 192[illegible]

Club has bought a number of seats in advance for tonight's Pop concert in

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight will be:

March, "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner

POP PROGRAM TONIGHT

The Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, while dedicated to the New England Conservatory of Music, is open to the public. The program which follows, is of special interest:

Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner

Special Pop Night for the Women's City Club

WEDNESDAY, June 9, will be Women's City Club Night at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall. The war years and the one succeeding the armistice have of necessity restricted the more pleasureable activties of the club and this occasion is a get-together effort. An added pleasure will be the opportunity to meet Mrs. James J. Storrow, Mrs. George W. Coleman and Mrs. Roland G. Hopkins before the concert.

POP CONCERTS

Each night except Saturday of this week offers special attractions at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall. Monday night the National Anthem will be played in observance of Memorial Day. Tuesday brings the annual Harvard night, when the Harvard Glee Club of sixty voices will sing with the orchestra and also by themselves, conducted by Dr. Archibald T. Davison. Wednesday night (June 2) an entire program of dance and ballet music will be offered. For Thursday night the Boston Teachers' Club will have part of the house. For Friday the United Commercial Travellers have taken over the entire house.

POP CONCERTS

The present Pops season is the largest this institution of thirty-five Summers has ever known. Mr. Jacchia has an instinct for the public pulse to guide him in making Pop programs, but applause is not a sufficient test. Request Night will come on Monday, June 21. Suggestions must be limited to three pieces, and must have the name and address of the voter. They may be mailed to Agide Jacchia, Symphony Hall, Boston, or dropped in the Request Night ballot box at the Massachusetts avenue entrance. Reservations have been engaged by the Professional Women's Club, Graduate Nurses, Women's City Club and Euclid Lodge this week, but the Pops are in every sense public. The same applies to Technology Night next Friday.

BOSTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE NIGHT AT THE POPS
MONDAY, MAY 10TH
ORCHESTRA OF EIGHTY SYMPHONY PLAYERS
Agide Jacchia, Conductor
SPECIAL PROGRAMME

1. March, "Second Connecticut" ..... Reeves
2. Overture, "Light Cavalry" ..... Suppé
3. Waltz, "Estudiantina" ..... Waldteufel
4. Fantasia from "Cavalleria Rusticana" ..... Mascagni

Fifteen minutes intermission to visit your friends

5. Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
6. Souvenir ..... Drdla
7. Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
8. Overture, "William Tell" ..... Rossini

Fifteen minutes for them to visit you

9. Selection, "Monsieur Beaucaire" ..... Messager
10. "Indian Summer," "An American Idyl" ..... Herbert
(First time at the Pop Concerts)
11. Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
12. March, "El Capitan" ..... Sousa

Your Committee on Meetings and Assemblies has a new event for the members of the Chamber. This time it is a Pop Concert. Many members have wanted a chance to bring their families and friends to a Chamber affair and this gives them that opportunity.

A wonderful program has been arranged by Conductor Agide Jacchia and the orchestra of 80 symphony players. Hear the finest orchestra in the world playing popular music.

A sociable evening, nothing else.

No one will be asked to buy or sell new building stock.

No one will be asked to subscribe to anything.

No one will be asked to get new members.

Just a great big "get together evening" for Chamber members and their friends.

The time is 8:00 p.m., Monday, May 10th.

The place is Symphony Hall.

Regular Pop Concert prices, $1.00, 75c and 50c.

Seats at tables on the floor are $1.00 with a few at 75c. First Balcony seats are 75c and 50c.

All tickets on sale at the Chamber only.

Members may reserve a table by buying five seats. Tickets will be sold on the basis of first come, first served, the early applicants getting the best seats.

Fill out and return at once the application on the back of this page.

Committee on Meetings and Assemblies

Robert S. Weeks, Chairman

M. J. Brines	Frederick E. Jennings
E. Fred Cullen	George F. Kendall
Roger Flint	Maurice A. McBride
J. T. Gilman	Clarence G. McDavitt

An Impending Week of Special Nights and Special Programmes—The Harvard Glee Club on Tuesday

Not until Monday evening of next week will the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall run their usual course. Since a supplementary holiday has been added to the national holiday of Sunday, "The Star-Spangled Banner" and "America" will be inserted in the programme for Monday evening. Tuesday will bring the annual Harvard Night (open to the public) at which not only Mr. Jacchia's orchestra but also the Glee Club of the college will be heard. Dr. Davison will lead it and it will sing pieces that have justified and spread its note at recent concerts—three unaccompanied and two with orchestra. For Wednesday Mr. Jacchia has put together a curious and interesting programme of dance music. On it, for example, stand Liszt's "Chromatic Galop"; ballet music from Rubinstein's opera, "The Demon"; American jigs and reels and an actual fox-trot—to say nothing of more familiar items. For Thursday, the Boston Teachers' Club have taken many tables, but there will be room for the general public. On Friday, however, the United Commercial Travellers have taken every place in Symphony Hall—seats in the balconies as well as tables on the floor. On Saturday, three freshening pieces are listed: a Fantasia from Leoni's sinister opera of Chinatown in San Francisco, "L'Oracolo"; the Intermezzo from Mr. Hadley's new music-drama, "Cleopatra's Night," and Sibelius's sonorous tone-poem, "Finlandia." Elsewhere on these pages is printed the programme for this evening. For Monday next the proposed pieces are:

Wedding March ..... Mendelssohn
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights" ..... J. Strauss
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Overture, Trepak and Flower-Waltz from The Ballet, "Nutcracker" ..... Chaikovsky
Ecstasy ..... Ganne
Introduction to Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Danse Macabre ..... Saint-Saëns
Overture to "Zampa" ..... Herold
Minuet from "Manon Lescaut" ..... Puccini
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube" ..... Ivanovici
Coronation March ..... Svendsen

ALL BOSTON GOING TO THE POPS

Every night at Symphony Hall, except Sunday, the Pop concerts are the gathering place of all who enjoy sitting sociably around a table, or from a balcony giving all their attention to the best music, the only real music which Boston affords in the spring and summer time. That Mr. Jacchia can please the most popular musical tastes, and the highest, by his programs is more evident than ever this season. Nor do the audiences fail to appreciate the excellent performance of the 80 Symphony players.

Each night except Saturday of the coming week bears its special earmarks. On Monday night (May 31) the national anthem will be played in observance of Memorial day. Tuesday brings the annual Harvard night, when the highly praised Harvard Glee Club of 60 voices will sing, conducted by Dr. Davison. On Wednesday night (June 2) an entire program of dance and ballet music will be given. For Thursday night (June 3) the Boston Teachers' Club has taken a number of seats, but this night is open to the public, and all teachers are especially welcome. For Friday (June 4) the United Commercial Travelers have taken over the entire house. The programs of the fifth week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 31.

Wedding March ..... Mendelssohn
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
"The Star Spangled Banner"
Suite, "Nutcracker" ..... Tschaikowsky
"Extase" ..... Ganne
Intermezzo, Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Danse Macabre ..... Saint-Saens
"America"
Overture to "Zampa" ..... Herold
Minuet ..... Puccini
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube" ..... Ivanovici
Coronation March ..... Svendsen

TUESDAY, JUNE 1.

Harvard Night

Marche Heroique ..... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Waltz, "Summer Ballet" ..... Eschman
Songs with orchestra:
Prayer of Thanksgiving ..... Kretschmer
"The Answer of the Stars" (In honor of the Harvard soldiers and sailors of the great war), words by M. A. DeWolfe Howe ..... Converse
Harvard Glee Club, A. T. Davison, conductor
Finale of "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Allegretto for strings from Ballet Suite, ... Mabel W. Daniels
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Songs a cappella:
Matona, Lovely Maiden ..... Lassus
My Bonnie Lass ..... Morley
Drake's Drum ..... Coleridge-Taylor
Harvard Glee Club
Selection, "My Golden Girl" ..... Herbert
Slavonic Dance No. 2 ..... Dvorak
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ..... Vollstedt
"Fair Harvard"
"Cruiser Harvard" ..... Strube

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 2.

"Galop Chromatique" ..... Liszt
Aragonaise from "The Cid" ..... Massenet
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
"Dance of the Hours" ..... Ponchielli
Ballet music from "The Demon" ..... Rubinstein
Germance dance, "The Sleigh Ride" ..... Mozart
Tarantelle (with flute solo) ..... Jacchia
Polonaise from "Eugen Oneigin" ..... Tschaikowsky
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
"Menuet a l'Antique" ..... Paderewski
American Dances, Past and Present.
Danse Boheme from "Carmen" ..... Bizet

THURSDAY, JUNE 3.

Boston Teachers' Night
Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba" ..... Gounod
Overture to "Zampa" ..... Herold
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "Otello" ..... Verdi
Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Tarantelle (with flute solo) ..... Jacchia
Reve Angelique ..... Rubinstein
In the Hall of the Mountain King ..... Grieg
Selection, "Pinafore" ..... Sullivan
Menuet a l'Antique ..... Paderewski
"Indian Summer," an American Idyl ..... Herbert
Pomp and Circumstance (with organ) ..... Elgar

FRIDAY, JUNE 4.

Commercial Travelers' Night
March, "El Capitan" ..... Sousa
Overture to "Light Cavalry" ..... Suppe
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" ..... Komzak
Fantasia, "Faust" (with organ) ..... Gounod
Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Largo (with organ) ..... Handel
Introduction Act III. "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Overture to "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Selection, "Sometime" ..... Friml
American Idyl, "Indian Summer" ..... Herbert
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
March, "Entrance of the Gladiators" ..... Fucik

SATURDAY, JUNE 5.

Cortege de Bacchus ..... Delibes
Overture to "Raymond" ..... Thomas
Waltz, "Morning Journals" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ..... Leoni
Finlandia ..... Sibelius
(Jacques Hoffman)

NEWS OF MUSIC

An Amusing Evening at The Pops with the Symphony Orchestra Playing a Fox-Trot—London Extols Cecil Fanning—Pavlova as a Peri—Dr. Muck Declines a Post—Incidents and Intentions

Twelve pieces, all music of the dance—filled the appointed programme at The Pops last evening. To them the applause of the audience added at least six more, likewise in rhythms of the dance. In a sense, a limited, a specialized one, but one, none the less, that could and did range widely. From the eighteenth century, for example, Mr. Jacchia picked not only Boccherini's Minuet, now sober, now arch, but also a playful German dance, flavored with sleigh-bells, from some nook in Mozart's exhaustless pages. There were turns in it characteristic of the composer in and out of trifles; there was also hint, now and then, of folk-tune. The French theatre yielded the conductor dances of Massenet, Delibes, Bizet—all conventionally artful and agreeable in kind. The Russians gave him the sonorous Polonaise from Chaikovsky's opera, "Eugen Onégin," and a dull number, designed to be rudely fantastic and mysteriously oriental, from the ballet-music of Rubinstein's forgotten opera, "The Demon." Even the classical Germans helped—Brahms with a Hungarian Dance; Liszt with a Chromatic Galop, flamboyant, furious, virtuoso-like with sharps and flats; and the perennial Strauss of Vienna, with his Danubean waltz. Ponchielli—"The Dance of the Hours," of course—and the conductor as composer of a Tarantella, filled Italian interstices.

Well toward the end of the concert, not even the Americans were overlooked; while, as it happened, the chosen were not the Americans of "serious music." Through jigs and reels of an older day, still lingering in rural ball-rooms—"The Arkansaw Traveler" and his kind—went the orchestra with snapping rhythms; and then passed to the fox-trot of 1920, which is "Dardanella." Never before, probably, were the whining tune and the ragtime rhythms of "Johnny" Black played by seventy-odd men from one of the ablest orchestras in the world. Never before, likewise, had that seventy strayed into such music—and found themselves at home. They pointed Mr. "Johnny" Black's music; they gave it even piquant turns of their own. Loud was the applause; quick the repetition. It is obligation of The Pops to be amusing. They were yesterday. H. T. P.

ties. "An

Special Pop Nights

The most sociable and only musical gathering point hereabouts during the spring and summer is the Pop Concerts, which enliven Symphony Hall every night by music of symphonic quality and popular appeal.

The pending fifth week of Pops is crowded with special nights. On Monday (May 31) the national anthem will be played in observance of Memorial day. Tuesday brings the annual Harvard night, when the very highly praised Harvard Glee Club will sing with the orchestra, and also by themselves, conducted by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, to whose training they owe their distinctive place among men's choruses. On Wednesday night (June 2) an entire program of dance and ballet music will probably be considered the most interesting of the week from a musical point of view. For Thursday night (June 3) the Boston Teachers' Club have taken a number of seats, but this night is open to the public and all teachers are especially welcome. For Friday (June 4) the United Commercial Travelers have taken over the entire house.

Special Pop Night for the Women's City Club

WEDNESDAY, June 9, will be Women's City Club Night at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall. The war years and the one succeeding the armistice have of necessity restricted the more pleasureable activties of the club and this occasion is a get-together effort. An added pleasure will be the opportunity to meet Mrs. James J. Storrow, Mrs. George W. Coleman and Mrs. Roland G. Hopkins before the concert.

POP CONCERTS

Each night except Saturday of this week offers special attractions at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall. Monday night the National Anthem will be played in observance of Memorial Day. Tuesday brings the annual Harvard night, when the Harvard Glee Club of sixty voices will sing with the orchestra and also by themselves, conducted by Dr. Archibald T. Davison. Wednesday night (June 2) an entire program of dance and ballet music will be offered. For Thursday night the Boston Teachers' Club will have part of the house. For Friday the United Commercial Travellers have taken over the entire house.

POP CONCERTS

The present Pops season is the largest this institution of thirty-five Summers has ever known. Mr. Jacchia has an instinct for the public pulse to guide him in making Pop programs, but applause is not a sufficient test. Request Night will come on Monday, June 21. Suggestions must be limited to three pieces, and must have the name and address of the voter. They may be mailed to Agide Jacchia, Symphony Hall, Boston, or dropped in the Request Night ballot box at the Massachusetts avenue entrance. Reservations have been engaged by the Professional Women's Club, Graduate Nurses, Women's City Club and Euclid Lodge this week, but the Pops are in every sense public. The same applies to Technology Night next Friday.

...ore in Boston

Contrary to expectation, the Intermezzo from Mr. Hadley's newest opera, 'Cleopatra's Night,' was not played at the Pop Concert last evening. Belated arrival of the orchestral parts left no time for rehearsal and Mr. Jacchia prudently put over the performance of the piece until next week. The other new number, an Allegretto for Strings from a Suite of Ballet Music by Miss Mabel Daniels, was heard according to schedule. It proved an innocent trifle, done with a light hand, of the prettier ways of such ambling tunes. For this evening at The Pops Mr. Jacchia is making two resurrections—Liszt's version of the Rakoczy March, usually displaced by Berlioz's, and a forgotten overture of Auber to his opera of 1833, "Gustave III."

By the middle of July Mr. Monteux expects to return from his expedition to London and Paris in quest of new music and to spend the rest of the summer somewhere about. He is leaving New York today.

With patience we shall ...

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The programme for the Pop con... in Symphony Hall tonight will be as follows:

Overture to "Il Guarany" ..... Gomez
Waltz from "The Bat" ..... Strauss

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Simmons College will celebrate at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, this being the first women's college to make this venture. The concert, however, will be open to the public and all the more interesting for this reason. The programme follows:

March from "Aida" ..... Verdi

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The annual Harvard night at the Pops, which is always a celebration on a large scale, will take place at Symphony Hall tonight. As a special fea...

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Although the Women's City Club will gather in numbers at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, the concert will also be open to the public. The programme follows:

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Tonight's Pop Concert in Symphony Hall will be in every sense public, although the graduate nurses, who are holding their annual convention this week, have taken a number of seats. The program follows:

sions. It is attracting ... Ganne
tention.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of 80 Symphony players will give the following programme at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Co... have refused the ... Delibes

POPS TONIGHT

The Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight is dedicated to the New England Conservatory of Music, but is also in every sense a public occasion, and the programme which follows is of special interest:

Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia and his Symphony Orchestra will play the following programme at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

French Military March ..... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Poet and Peasant" ..... Saint-Saens

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The National Bankers' convention, having taken over Symphony Hall entire for the Pop Concert tonight, there will be no public sale. They will celebrate with the following Pop programme:

March from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Overture, "Ruy Blas" ..... Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Espana" ..... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ..... Leoni
"Pomp and Circumstance" (with organ) ..... Elgar
Traumerei ..... Schumann
Third Slavonic Dance ..... Dvorak
"Marche Slave" ..... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Carmen" ..... Bizet
"Love's Dream After the Ball" ..... Czibulka
American Patrol ..... Meacham
March, "From Maine to California" ..... Sousa

At the Pops Tonight

Overture to "Il Guarany" ..... Gomez
Waltz from "The Bat" ..... J. Strauss

At the Pops Tonight

Harvard Night
(Open to the Public)

Heroic March ..... Saint-Saëns

At the Pops Tonight

Graduate-Nurses' Night
(Open to the Public)

Marche Lorraine ..... Ganne

At the Pops Tonight

Euclid Lodge Night
(Open to the Public)

Prelude to "Carmen" ..... Bizet

At the Pops Tonight

Women's City Club Night
(Open to the Public)

March from "Aida" ..... Verdi
"Morning, Noon and

At the Pops Tonight

The Commercial Travellers' Association Has Taken the Whole of Symphony Hall and the Concert Is Not Open to the Public

WOMEN'S CLUB AT POPS

Although the Women's City Club will gather in numbers at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, the concert will also be open to the public. The program follows:

Triumphal March from "Aida" ..... Verdi

POP PROGRAM TONIGHT

Although the members of ... Lodge will hold their annual gatherin... at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, seats at all prices are on public sale. The program, which is also of general interest follows:

TECH NIGHT AT POPS

The Massachusetts Institute of Technology will make the Pop concert at Symphony Hall tonight (which is also open to the public) an occasion of special magnitude, with songs by the Tech Glee Club figuring on the follow-

POP CONCERT PROGRAM

Although the Professional Women's ... Club has bought a number of seats in advance for tonight's Pop concert in ...

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight will be:

March, "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner

POP PROGRAM TONIGHT

The Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, while dedicated to the New England Conservatory of Music, is open to the public. The program which follows, is of special interest:

Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin" ... Wagner

MONDAY, JUNE 7, 192...

...th Week of the Pops

...rd Night at the Pops comes ... of this week, when the Har...ee Club, led by Prof A. T. ... will sing three a cappella ... and two with orchestral ac...ment. One of the latter is a ...rus by P. S. Converse to words ... De Wolfe Howe, composed in ... of the Harvard men who fell ...ar. The other numbers, as ... have heard the Glee Club ... will not need to be told, are of ...musical value and not the ...llege glee club stuff. The ...chia will lead the orchestra in ... miscellaneous array of pieces, ...nge this time all the way from ...erbert to Rimsky-Korsakoff's ...zade."

...day's program is made up ... of dance music. Thursday is ...Teacher's Night, but seats are ...ic sale. Friday the house is ... to the United Commercial ...s. Saturday's list offers the ...sortment of favorite numbers ... new. Monday "The Star ... Banner" and "America" will ... in honor of Memorial Day.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

REQUEST NIGHT AT POPS

The 85 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who play every night at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, under the illustrious leadership of Mr. Jacchia, give such delight that the present season is the largest that this institution of 35 summers has ever known. Mr. Jacchia has an instinct for the public pulse to guide him in making Pop programs, but applause is not a sufficient test. Primitive peoples demonstrated their approval or disapproval in crowds, controlling their administration by clashing sword against shield, or gnashing their teeth. A civilized democracy, however, must use the ballot, and hence the annual request programs, determined entirely by public vote. Request night this season will come on Monday, June 21. Suggestions must be limited to three pieces, and must have the name and address of the voter. They may be mailed to Agide Jacchia, Symphony Hall, Boston, or dropped in the "Request Night" ballot box at the Massachusetts avenue entrance.

Although sections of Symphony Hall have been engaged by the Professional Women's Club for Monday, June 7, and by the graduate nurses, the Women's City Club and Euclid lodge for the succeeding nights, these Pop concerts are in every sense public. The same applies to Technology night on Friday, June 11. The week's programs follow:

MONDAY

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba"....Gounod
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor"....Nicolai
Waltz, "Les Sirenes"....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon"....Massenet
Ballet Suite "Sylvia"....Delibes
Prelude Religieux....Lang
Saint-d'Amour....Elgar
Ride of the Valkyries....Wagner
Selection, "My Golden Girl"....Herbert
Anitra's Dance....Grieg
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"....Strauss
The Fairest of the Fair....Sousa

TUESDAY

Marche Lorraine....Ganne
Overture to "Light Cavalry"....Suppe
"The Lost Chord"....Sullivan
Selection, "Carmen"....Bizet
"The Star Spangled Banner"
Suite, "Peer Gynt"....Grieg
Minuet....Bolzoni
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor"....Donizetti
Overture to "William Tell"....Rossini
Selection, "Chimes of Normandy"....Planquette
Largo (with organ)....Handel
"Rose of No Man's Land"....Caddigan
March, "The Merry Soldiers"....Sabathil

WEDNESDAY

Triumphal March from "Aida"....Verdi
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night"....Suppe
Waltzs "Roses from the South"....Strauss
Fantasia, "La Tosca"....Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin"....Wagner
Hungarian Dance No. 1....Brahms
"Depuis le Jour" from "Louise"....Charpentier
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"....Tschaikowsky
Suite from "Carmen"....Bizet
Reve Angelique....Rubinstein
Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream"....Mendelssohn
Pomp and Circumstance No. 2....Elgar

THURSDAY

Prelude to "Carmen"....Bizet
Overture to "The Magic Flute"....Mozart
Waltz, "Dornroeschen"....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Pagliacci"....Leoncavallo
Second Hungarian Rhapsody....Liszt
Harp solo (Mr. Holy)
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"....Wagner
Finale of First Symphony for Organ and Orchestra....Guilmant
Organ: Mr. Humphrey
Selection, "Yo San"....R. L. Harlow
Tarantelle (with flute solo)....Jacchia
Waltz, "Artist's Life"....Strauss
Backocz March....Berlioz

FRIDAY

Technology Night
Entrance of the Boyards....Halvorsen
Overture to "William Tell"....Rossini
Waltz, "Estudiantina"....Waldteufel
Selection, "Patsey" (1920 Tech show)
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"....Wagner
Hungarian Dance No. 1 in G minor....Brahms
Fantasia, "Aida"....Verdi
Songs by the Technology Glee Club
Selection, "My Golden Girl"....Herbert
"The Lost Chord" (with trumpet solo)....Sullivan
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"....Vollstedt
Stein Song....Bullard

SATURDAY

March from "Tannhauser"....Wagner
Overture to "The Bartered Bride"....Smetana
Prelude, "The Deluge"....Saint-Saens
Fantasia, "Carmen"....Bizet
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda"....Ponchielli
Valse Triste....Sibelius
Enfantillage (Children at Play)....Van Westerhout
Ouverture Solennelle "1812"....Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Espana"....Chabrier
Narcissus....Nevin
Dance of the Camorists, from the "Jewels of the Madonna"....Wolf-Ferrari
Invitation to the Dance....Weber-Berlioz

POP CONCERT CLOSES NURSES' CONVENTION

Miss Jessie E. Grant Is Elected President of Organization

The two days' convention of the Massachusetts State Nurses' Association, held in the Assembly Hall of the Boston University College of Business Administration, came to a close last night with a pop concert in Symphony Hall, attended by more than 300 of the delegates. Business sessions were held in the morning and afternoon when Carrie M. Hall, R. N., spoke on the importance of teaching chemistry before drugs, solutions and materia medica. Officers elected included: President, Miss Jessie E. Grant; vice-president, Miss Mary Coonahan; secretary, Miss Melissa Cooke. A tea for the delegates was given in Trinity Church parish hall.

"EUCLID NIGHT" AT THE POP CONCERT

Prominent Masons of Greater Boston yesterday attended "Euclid night" at the Pops. Compositions by members of the fraternity were played, and Guilmant's Finale of First Symphony. Honorary worshipful master of

TONIGHT'S POP PROGRAM

Agide Jacchia and his Symphony Orchestra will play the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

French military march....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"....Suppe
Waltz, "Il Bacio"....Arditi
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor"....Donizetti
Overture to "Sakuntala"....Goldmark
Sevilliana from "Don Cesar de Bazan"....Masenet
Adagio Pathetique....Godard
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"....Ponchielli
Selection, "Apple Blossoms"....Kreisler
Reverie, "Voice of Chimes"....Luigini
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hofmann"....Offenbach
Stars and Stripes Forever....Sousa

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Mr Jacchia as Program Maker

Possibly a few listeners with a speculative turn of mind have wondered from time to time why the programs at the Pop concerts seem to satisfy so great a variety of tastes. If they have looked at the problem of program making from the point of view of the conductor, and realized the difficulties Mr Jacchia has to face, they are probably inclined as the writer is to congratulating him on his tact and skill.

Choosing music to be performed at a series of Symphony concerts is a difficult job, but Mr Monteux, whatever his trials in satisfying both the people who turn up their noses at all music earlier than Debussy and those who deride everything written since the death of Beethoven, is at least never obliged to consider people with no knowledge of, and therefore no taste, for great music.

Mr Jacchia, besides pleasing both classicists and modernists, must also consider the large number of people who claim to know nothing about music except what they like. If he gave nothing but pieces from the regular Symphony repertory he would disgruntle many in his audiences. If he gave no such music he would displease as many others. If he never chose anything not familiar to the majority of his audience he would bore all the people who are tired of the "Largo," "Traumerei," the "1812 Overture" and his other old standbys. Yet there are plenty of listeners who would be perfectly satisfied to hear only their favorite composition on their occasional visits to the Pops.

Then there are all the numerous special nights, with special audiences demanding college songs and what not to be considered. To satisfy every one in short, the programs must be a hash of everything from Sousa to Mozart. Yet who is there who never tires of hash?

Nights of Russian music, dance music, Wagner, Italian opera and so on are the way out of the monotony of variety. If the miscellany on other occasions contains some pieces you don't care for remember that part of the audience likes them, and that these concerts are for the general public which never agrees on matters of taste.

This week's programs illustrate all the above generalizations. There is no night when the house is reserved as a whole, but various organizations have engaged portions of it for each evening except Saturday. Friday is Tech night. The others are Monday, the Professional Women's Club; Tuesday, the Graduate Nurses'; Wednesday, the Women's City Club, and Thursday, Euclid Lodge. All of these are open to the public.

June 22

Events and Comments

Request Night this season at the Pops will come on Monday, June 21. Suggestions must be limited to three pieces, and must have the name and address of the voter. They may be mailed to Agide Jacchia, Symphony Hall, Boston, or dropped in the "Request Night" ballot box at the Massachusetts av entrance.

stage training.

The sketch calls for picturesque costuming. There is a bevy of pretty girls, lots of graceful dancing and tuneful songs.

Record June 7

"PRELUDE RELIGIEUX" AT SYMPHONY TONIGHT

The members of the Professional Women's Club have bought up Symphony Hall for this evening and a prominent member of the club, Miss Edith Lang, will have the honor of having her "Prelude Religieux" played by the orchestra. A very exceptional program has been arranged and a varied number of "requests" and encores will be responded to and Mrs. Marie Dewing Faelten, the president, will receive the guests.

DON'T YOU music lovers like to watch Agide Jacchia's left hand when he's conducting at the Pops

Conductor Jacchia is a "hand and finger," more than "baton," leader of musicians.

Haven't you noticed he seems to lead with the finger or wrist motion of that left hand even more than he does with baton? First it's the little finger raised or dropped an inch, or sometimes less. Then the forefinger, ditto. Then the slightest raising up or down, of the whole hand with an indescribably delicate wrist motion. Yes, Mr. Jacchia is truly a "left-hand-and-finger" conductor," if ever there was one. Incidentally, his wife and daughter, Elsa, are leaving Rimini, on shores of the Adriatic, Italy, latter part of July, to join him here, after being separated since last October. "Bambina" that was, is no longer a "baby." "She's almost up to here," says "Agide," pointing to his shoulder. It will be a "Jacchia family reunion" during August, with no work for the "pater" until the opening of proposed four weeks' season of Pops in

'POPS' PROGRAM FOR THE WEEK

Music hath such charms at the nightly Pop concerts in Symphony Hall that out of the six weeks traversed in the present season, four have individually exceeded in attendance any previous week in Pops history. And Conductor Agide Jacchia has wrought further changes with his superfine Symphony orchestra and with the persuasive powers of music. Making no outward demands on the audiences which once conversed steadily around their tables from eight to eleven, he has enchanted them into silence during each piece, almost without their knowing it. The infectious zest of his conducting is one reason, and another is the variety and eventfulness of his programs, wherein the popular numbers of the minute vie as best they may with the popular numbers having pretensions to immortality.

On Monday, June 14, the New England Conservatory of Music will have their annual night at the Pops. This occasion will also be public, and the program, with the feature of a female chorus of fifty voices, led by Mr. George W. Chadwick, the Conservatory Director, will be of especial general interest. Save for Wednesday, June 16, and Thursday, June 17, for which nights Boston University and the Annual Convention of the American Institute of Banking, respectively, have engaged Symphony Hall entire, every night of the week will be public. The programs follow:

MONDAY

New England Conservatory Night
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"....Wagner
Overture to "Oberon"....Weber
Waltz, "Estudiantina"....Waldteufel
Tempest Scene from "Otello"....Verdi
Finale of "Scheherazade"....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion
(a) Spring Chorus from "Samson and Delilah"....Saint-Saens
(b) Chorus of Fairies, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"....Mendelssohn
(Female chorus from N. E. Conservatory, George W. Chadwick, Conductor)
"Lochinvar." Ballade for Baritone and Orchestra....Chadwick
(Soloist—Mr. F. M. Wempel)
Lyric Overture....Paul White
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly"....Puccini
American Idyl, "Indian Summer"....Herbert
Russian Dance, "Trepak"....Tschaikowsky
Ride of the Valkyries....Wagner

TUESDAY

French Military March....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"....Suppe
Waltz, "Il Bacio"....Arditi
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor"....Donizetti
Overture to "Sakuntala"....Goldmark
Sevilliana from "Don Cesar de Bazan"....Massenet
Adagio Pathetique....Godard
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"....Ponchielli
Selection, "Apple Blossoms"....Kreisler
Reverie, "Voice of Chimes"....Luigini
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hofmann"....Offenbach
Stars and Stripes Forever....Sousa

POP CONCERTS

Music hath such charms at the nightly Pop concerts in Symphony Hall that out of the six weeks traversed in the present season, four have individually exceeded in attendance any previous week in Pops history. And Conductor Agide Jacchia has won new favor with the variety

gland—JUNE 13, 1920

of his programs, wherein the popular numbers of the minute vie as best they may with the popular numbers having pretensions to immortality. Tomorrow the New England Conservatory of Music students will have their annual night. A female chorus led by George W. Chadwick will be a feature. Save for Wednesday and Thursday, every night of the week will be public.

MUSIC NOTES

THE POPS

Music hath such charms at the nightly Pop concerts in Symphony Hall that out of the six weeks traversed in the present season, four have individually exceeded in attendance any previous week in the Pops' history. Conductor Agide Jacchia has wrought further changes with his superfine orchestra and with the persuasive powers of music. Making no outward demands on the audiences which once conversed steadily around their tables from 8 to 11, he has enchanted them into silence during each piece, almost without their knowing it.

On Monday, June 14, the New England Conservatory of Music will have their annual night at the Pops. This occasion will also be public, and the programme, with the feature of a female chorus of 50 voices, led by Mr. George W. Chadwick, the Conservatory director, will be of especial general interest. Save for Wednesday, June 16, and Thursday, June 17, for which nights Boston University and the annual convention of the American Institute of Banking, respectively, have engaged Symphony Hall entire, every night of the week will be public.

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

Special Nights for Next Week—Fresh Pieces on Mr. Jacchia's Lists—An Assisting Chorus from the Conservatory

FOR two evenings next week the public must deny itself the pleasure of The Pops at Symphony Hall—on Wednesday, when the students and the alumni of Boston University have taken the whole house, and on Thursday, when the American Institute of Banking has done likewise. On the other hand Tuesday, Friday and Saturday will be nobody's nights, except the public's, Mr. Jacchia's and the orchestra's. For all three, moreover, he has made promising programmes. On Tuesday, he will bring back Goldmark's sensuous and songful overture to the Hindu play, "Sakuntala"; on Friday, Mr. Mimart of the orchestra will be heard as soloist in two pieces for clarinet; while on Saturday three movements of a Japanese suite by a Japanese composer, Yamada, will be heard for the first time in Boston along with a new waltz, "Marigold," by the resident Mr. Repper, and Liszt's rhapsody, "Carnival in Pest."

For the remaining evening of the new week—Monday—Mr. Jacchia has set a programme also out of the ordinary. The night is "New England Conservatory Night," and a chorus of women from that school, with Mr. Chadwick conducting, will sing a fragment from Saint-Saëns's opera, "Samson and Delilah," and a number from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's fantasy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Mr. Chadwick's vivid and vigorous Ballad for Baritone and Orchestra, "Lochinvar," will also be heard with Mr. Wemple for singer. It is music of the composer's prime, deserving more frequent performance than it receives. A "Lyric Overture" written by Paul White of the Conservatory will also be played. With these exceptions, the progress of The Pops through a seventh week will be normal.

Seventh Week of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall

The seventh week of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall will begin tomorrow with the annual night of the New England Conservatory of Music. This occasion will also be public, and the program, with the feature of a female chorus of 50 voices, led by George W. Chadwick, the conservatory director, will be of especial general interest.

Save for Wednesday, June 16, and Thursday, June 17, for which nights Boston University and the annual convention of the American Institute of Banking, respectively, have engaged the hall entire, every night of the week will be public.

In tomorrow's program F. M. Wempe will be soloist in the Chadwick number, "Lochinvar." The selections are as follows: Introduction to act 3, "Lohengrin," Wagner; overture to "Oberon," Weber; waltz, "Estudiantia," Waldteufel; tempest scene from "Othello," Verdi; finale of "Schehorazeade," Rimsky Korsakoff; Spring chorus from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; chorus of fairies, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; female chorus from the New England Conserv-

At the Pops Tonight

March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

At the Pops Tonight

New England Conservatory Night
(Open to the Public)
Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin."

At the Pops Tonight

Boston University Night
(Open to the Public)
Wedding March .....Mendelssohn
Overture to "Le Lac des Fées"..Auber

At the Pops Tonight

French Military March.....Saint-Saëns
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"..Suppé
Waltz, "Il Bacio".....Arditi
Fantasia, "Lucia".....Donizetti
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Sevillana from "Don César de Bazan"
Massenet
Adagio Pathétique .....Godard
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"
Ponchielli
Selection, "Apple Blossoms"
Kreisler-Jacobs
Revery, "Voice of Chimes".....Luigini
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann"
Offenbach
March, "Stars and Stripes Forever,"
Sousa
Conductor: A. Jacchia.

BOSTON GLOBE—SATURDAY, JUNE 5,

, BANQUET AND VISIT END TRAVELERS' CONVENTION

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 192

Commercial Travelers Given City's Greeting

GRAND OFFICERS OF THE UNITED COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS. They will guide the bagmen's order during the year and are, left to right, first row: Everett B. Stacey, grand junior counselor; Charles P. Dogherty, past grand counselor. Rear row, left to right: George E. Stevens, grand treasurer; Thomas H. Hersey, grand page; D. P. McKenna, executive committee; George A. Daniels, grand sentinel, and Alley R. Knight, grand conductor.

A concert at the Pops, Symphony Hall, furnished entertainment for fully 2000 members, delegates and friends of the United Commercial Travellers last evening at the close of the second day of their convention. Mayor Peters and Grand Counsellor Charles Poole, elected yesterday, made brief remarks.

Mayor Peters was given a hearty ovation when he entered the crowded hall, and was later applauded when Chairman Harry N. Guterman, assistant United States district attorney, announced the Mayor's contribution to

At the conclusion of this, adjournment was taken to the American House where more than 350 of the visiting commercial travelers, their wives and women friends attended the annual banquet of the Bagmen. Great Ruler Everet B. Stacey presided.

In the evening the visitors went in a body to the "Pops" at Symphony Hall. Every number on the program was applauded until the orchestra played encores.

Mayor Peters welcomed the travelers. Gov Coolidge could not attend the concert because of the prorogation of the Legislature.

Yesterday noon the wives of the delegates were entertained by Jordan Marsh Company in the exhibition hall on the seventh floor of the Annex Store, about 600 being in attendance. The visitors were greeted by a group of girls dressed in white and ushered into the hall, which was made attractive with cut flowers.

E. A. Finney, head of the personal service, represented the firm and welcomed the guests. He outlined the many activities for the betterment of its fellow-workers.

Miss Mary Hopkins, educational director, gave an entertaining address on the problems confronting the Department of Education in the store. She also staged a one-act drama, assisted by Miss

ll, W. P. V
B. Seigm
ing, Left to Right—R. H. Cross,
, A. Loveland, W. G. George, A. C.

TRAVELERS GO TO POP CONCERT

Addressed by Mayor Peters —Convention Ends Business Sessions

PARADE AND OUTING PLANNED FOR TODAY

Delegates to the 25th annual convention of the New England council, United Commercial Travelers of America, and their guests, attended the pop concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall last night. Mayor Peters welcomed the gathering to the city, and Charles A. Poole, newly elected grand councilor of the organization, also spoke.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

REQUEST NIGHT AT POPS

The 85 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who play every night at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, under the illustrious leadership of Mr. Jacchia, give such delight that the present season is the largest that this institution of 35 summers has ever known. Mr. Jacchia has an instinct for the public pulse to guide him in making Pop programs, but applause is not a sufficient test. Primitive peoples demonstrated their approval or disapproval in crowds, controlling their administration by clashing sword against shield, or gnashing their teeth. A civilized democracy, however, must use the ballot, and hence the annual request programs, determined entirely by public vote. Request night this season will come on Monday, June 21. Suggestions must be limited to three pieces, and must have the name and address of the voter. They may be mailed to Agide Jacchia, Symphony Hall, Boston, or dropped in the "Request Night" ballot box at the Massachusetts avenue entrance.

Although sections of Symphony Hall have been engaged by the Professional Women's Club for Monday, June 7, and by the graduate nurses, the Women's City Club and Euclid lodge for the succeeding nights, these Pop concerts are in every sense public. The same applies to Technology night on Friday, June 11. The week's programs follow:

MONDAY

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba"....Gounod
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" Nicolai
Waltz, "Les Sirenes".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon".....Massenet
Ballet Suite "Sylvia".....Delibes
Prelude Religieux.....Lang
Salut d'Amour.....Elgar
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Selection, "My Golden Girl".....Herbert
Anitra's Dance.....Grieg
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song".....Strauss
The Fairest of the Fair.....Sousa

TUESDAY

Marche Lorraine.....Ganne
Overture to "Light Cavalry".....Suppe
"The Lost Chord".....Sullivan
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
"The Star Spangled Banner"
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor".Donizetti
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Selection, "Chimes of Normandy".Planquette
Largo (with organ).....Handel
"Rose of No Man's Land".....Caddigan
March, "The Merry Soldiers".....Sabathil

WEDNESDAY

Triumphal March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night".Suppe
Waltz, "Roses from the South".....Strauss
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Hungarian Dance No. 1.....Brahms
"Depuis le Jour" from "Louise"...Charpentier
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"....Tschaikowsky
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn
Pomp and Circumstance No. 2.....Elgar

THURSDAY

Prelude to "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "The Magic Flute".....Mozart
Waltz, "Dornroeschen".....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Harp solo (Mr. Holy)
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde".Wagner
Finale of First Symphony for Organ and Orchestra.....Guilmant
Organ: Mr. Humphrey
Selection, "Yo San".....R. L. Harlow
Tarantelle (with flute solo).....Jacchia
Waltz, "Artist's Life".....Strauss
Rackoczy March.....Berlioz

FRIDAY

Technology Night
Entrance of the Bovards.....Halvorsen
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Selection, "Patsey" (1920 Tech show)
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Hungarian Dance No. 1 in G minor....Brahms
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Songs by the Technology Glee Club
Selection, "My Golden Girl".....Herbert
"The Lost Chord" (with trumpet solo).Sullivan
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".....Vollstedt
Stein Song.....Bullard

SATURDAY

March from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Overture to "The Bartered Bride"....Smetana
Prelude, "The Deluge".....Saint-Saens
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Valse Triste.....Sibelius
Enfantillage (Children at Play).Van Westerhout
Ouverture Solennelle "1812".....Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Narcissus.....Nevin
Dance of the Camorists, from the "Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz

POP CONCERT CLOSES NURSES' CONVENTION

Miss Jessie E. Grant Is Elected President of Organization

The two days' convention of the Massachusetts State Nurses' Association, held in the Assembly Hall of the Boston University College of Business Administration, came to a close last night with a pop concert in Symphony Hall, attended by more than 300 of the delegates. Business sessions were held in the morning and afternoon when Carrie M. Hall, R. N., spoke on the importance of teaching chemistry before drugs, solutions and materia medica. Officers elected included: President, Miss Jessie E. Grant; vice-president, Miss Mary Coonahan; secretary, Miss Melissa Cooke. A tea for the delegates was given in Trinity Church parish hall.

"EUCLID NIGHT" AT THE POP CONCERT

Prominent Masons of Greater Boston yesterday attended "Euclid night" at the Pops. Compositions by members of the fraternity were played, and Guilmant's Finale of First Symphony. Hon[illegible] master of

TONIGHT'S POP PROGRAM

Agide Jacchia and his Symphony Orchestra will play the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

French military march.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Waltz, "Il Bacio".....Arditi
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor".....Donizetti
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Sevilliana from "Don Cesar de Bazan".Massenet
Adagio Pathetique.....Godard
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Selection, "Apple Blossoms".....Kreisler
Reverie, "Voice of Chimes".....Luigini
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann".....Offenbach
Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Mr Jacchia as Program Maker

Possibly a few listeners with a speculative turn of mind have wondered from time to time why the programs at the Pop concerts seem to satisfy so great a variety of tastes. If they have looked at the problem of program making from the point of view of the conductor, and realized the difficulties Mr Jacchia has to face, they are probably inclined, as the writer is to congratulating him on his tact and skill.

Choosing music to be performed at a series of Symphony concerts is a difficult job, but Mr Monteux, whatever his trials in satisfying both the people who turn up their noses at all music earlier than Debussy and those who deride everything written since the death of Beethoven, is at least never obliged to consider people with no knowledge of, and therefore no taste, for great music.

Mr Jacchia, besides pleasing both classicists and modernists, must also consider the large number of people who claim to know nothing about music except what they like. If he gave nothing but pieces from the regular Symphony repertory he would disgruntle many in his audiences. If he gave no such music he would displease as many others. If he never chose anything not familiar to the majority of his audience he would bore all the people who are tired of the "Largo," "Traumerei," the "1812 Overture" and his other old standbys. Yet there are plenty of listeners who would be perfectly satisfied to hear only their favorite composition on their occasional visits to the Pops.

Then there are all the numerous special nights, with special audiences demanding college songs and what not to be considered. To satisfy every one in short, the programs must be a hash of everything from Sousa to Mozart. Yet who is there who never tires of hash?

Nights of Russian music, dance music, Wagner, Italian opera and so on absorb the way out of the monotony of variety. If the miscellany on other occasions contains some pieces you don't care for remember that part of the audience likes them, and that these concerts are for the general public which never agrees on matters of taste.

This week's programs illustrate all the above generalizations. There is no night when the house is reserved as a whole, but various organizations have engaged portions of it for each evening except Saturday. Friday is Tech night. The others are Monday, the Professional Women's Club; Tuesday, the Graduate Nurses'; Wednesday, the Women's City Club, and Thursday, Euclid Lodge. All of these are open to the public.

June 22.

Events and Comments

Request Night this season at the Pops will come on Monday, June 21. Suggestions must be limited to three pieces, and must have the name and address of the voter. They may be mailed to Agide Jacchia, Symphony Hall, Boston, or dropped in the "Request Night" ballot box at the Massachusetts av entrance.

Stage Lighting.

The sketch calls for picturesque costuming. There is a bevy of pretty girls, lots of graceful dancing and tuneful songs.

"PRELUDE RELIGIEUX" AT SYMPHONY TONIGHT

The members of the Professional Women's Club have bought up Symphony Hall for this evening and a prominent member of the club, Miss Edith Lang, will have the honor of having her "Prelude Religieux" played by the orchestra. A very exceptional program has been arranged and a varied number of "requests" and encores will be responded to and Mrs. Marie Dewing Faelten, the president, will receive the guests.

DON'T YOU music lovers like to watch Agide Jacchia's left hand when he's conducting at the Pops?

Conductor Jacchia is a "hand and finger," more than "baton," leader of musicians.

Haven't you noticed he seems to lead with the finger or wrist motion of that left hand even more than he does with baton? First it's the little finger raised or dropped an inch, or sometimes less. Then the forefinger, ditto. Then the slightest raising, up or down, of the whole hand with an indescribably delicate wrist motion. Yes, Mr. Jacchia is truly a "left-hand-and-finger" conductor," if ever there was one. Incidentally, his wife and daughter, Elsa, are leaving Rimini, on shores of the Adriatic, Italy, latter part of July, to join him here, after being separated since last October. "Bambina" that was, is no longer a "baby." "She's almost up to here," says "Agide," pointing to his shoulder. It will be a "Jacchia family reunion" during August, with no work for the "pater" until the opening of proposed four weeks' season of Pops in

'POPS' PROGRAM FOR THE WEEK

Music hath such charms at the nightly Pop concerts in Symphony Hall that out of the six weeks traversed in the present season, four have individually exceeded in attendance any previous week in Pops history. And Conductor Agide Jacchia has wrought further changes with his superfine Symphony orchestra and with the persuasive powers of music. Making no outward demands on the audiences which once conversed steadily around their tables from eight to eleven, he has enchanted them into silence during each piece, almost without their knowing it. The infectious zest of his conducting is one reason, and another is the variety and eventfulness of his programs, wherein the popular numbers of the minute vie as best they may with the popular numbers having pretensions to immortality.

On Monday, June 14, the New England Conservatory of Music will have their annual night at the Pops. This occasion will also be public, and the program, with the feature of a female chorus of fifty voices, led by Mr. George W. Chadwick, the Conservatory Director, will be of especial general interest. Save for Wednesday, June 16, and Thursday, June 17, for which nights Boston University and the Annual Convention of the American Institute of Banking, respectively, have engaged Symphony Hall entire, every night of the week will be public. The programs follow:

MONDAY

New England Conservatory Night
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"..Wagner
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Tempest Scene from "Otello".....Verdi
Finale of "Scheherazade"...Rimsky-Korsakoff
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion
(a) Spring Chorus from "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
(b) Chorus of Fairies, "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
(Female chorus from N. E. Conservatory, George W. Chadwick, Conductor)
"Lochinvar." Ballade for Baritone and Orchestra.....Chadwick
(Soloist—Mr. F. M. Wempel)
Lyric Overture.....Paul White
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
American Idyl, "Indian Summer".....Herbert
Russian Dance, "Trepak".....Tschaikowsky
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

TUESDAY

French Military March.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Waltz, "Il Bacio".....Arditi
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor"...Donizetti
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Sevilliana from "Don Cesar de Bazan" Massenet
Adagio Pathetique.....Godard
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"...Ponchielli
Selection, "Apple Blossoms".....Kreisler
Reverie, "Voice of Chimes".....Luigini
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hofmann" Offenbach
Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa

POP CONCERTS

Music hath such charms at the nightly Pop concerts in Symphony Hall that out of the six weeks traversed in the present season, four have individually exceeded in attendance any previous week in Pops history. And Conductor Agide Jacchia has won new favor with the variety

gland—JUNE 13, 1920

of his programs, wherein the popular numbers of the minute vie as best they may with the popular numbers having pretensions to immortality. Tomorrow the New England Conservatory of Music students will have their annual night. A female chorus led by George W. Chadwick will be a feature. Save for Wednesday and Thursday, every night of the week will be public.

MUSIC NOTES

THE POPS

Music hath such charms at the nightly Pop concerts in Symphony Hall that out of the six weeks traversed in the present season, four have individually exceeded in attendance any previous week in the Pops' history. Conductor Agide Jacchia has wrought further changes with his superfine orchestra and with the persuasive powers of music. Making no outward demands on the audiences which once conversed steadily around their tables from 8 to 11, he has enchanted them into silence during each piece, almost without their knowing it.

On Monday, June 14, the New England Conservatory of Music will have their annual night at the Pops. This occasion will also be public, and the programme, with the feature of a female chorus of 50 voices, led by Mr. George W. Chadwick, the Conservatory director, will be of especial general interest. Save for Wednesday, June 16, and Thursday, June 17, for which nights Boston University and the annual convention of the American Institute of Banking, respectively, have engaged Symphony Hall entire, every night of the week will be public.

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

Special Nights for Next Week—Fresh Pieces on Mr. Jacchia's Lists—An Assisting Chorus from the Conservatory

FOR two evenings next week the public must deny itself the pleasure of The Pops at Symphony Hall—on Wednesday, when the students and the alumni of Boston University have taken the whole house, and on Thursday, when the American Institute of Banking has done likewise. On the other hand Tuesday, Friday and Saturday will be nobody's nights, except the public's, Mr. Jacchia's and the orchestra's. For all three, moreover, he has made promising programmes. On Tuesday, he will bring back Goldmark's sensuous and songful overture to the Hindu play, "Sakuntala"; on Friday, Mr. Mimart of the orchestra will be heard as soloist in two pieces for clarinet; while on Saturday three movements of a Japanese suite by a Japanese composer, Yamada, will be heard for the first time in Boston along with a new waltz, "Marigold," by the resident Mr. Repper, and Liszt's rhapsody, "Carnival in Pest."

For the remaining evening of the new week—Monday—Mr. Jacchia has set a programme also out of the ordinary. The night is "New England Conservatory Night," and a chorus of women from that school, with Mr. Chadwick conducting, will sing a fragment from Saint-Saëns's opera, "Samson and Delilah," and a number from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's fantasy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Mr. Chadwick's vivid and vigorous Ballad for Baritone and Orchestra, "Lochinvar," will also be heard with Mr. Wemple for singer. It is music of the composer's prime, deserving more frequent performance than it receives. A "Lyric Overture" written by Paul White of the Conservatory will also be played. With these exceptions, the progress of The Pops through a seventh week will be normal.

Seventh Week of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall

The seventh week of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall will begin tomorrow with the annual night of the New England Conservatory of Music. This occasion will also be public, and the program, with the feature of a female chorus of 50 voices, led by George W. Chadwick, the conservatory director, will be of especial general interest.

Save for Wednesday, June 16, and Thursday, June 17, for which nights Boston University and the annual convention of the American Institute of Banking, respectively, have engaged the hall entire, every night of the week will be public.

In tomorrow's program F. M. Wempel will be soloist in the Chadwick number, "Lochinvar." The selections are as follows: Introduction to act 3, "Lohengrin," Wagner; overture to "Oberon," Weber; waltz, "Estudiantia," Waldteufel; tempest scene from "Othello," Verdi; finale of "Schehorazade," Rimsky Korsakoff; Spring chorus from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; chorus of fairies, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," female chorus from the New England Conserv-

At the Pops Tonight

March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

At the Pops Tonight

New England Conservatory Night
(Open to the Public)
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin,"

At the Pops Tonight

Boston University Night
(Open to the Public)
Wedding March.....Mendelssohn
Overture to "Le Lac des Fées"..Auber

At the Pops Tonight

French Military March.....Saint-Saëns
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"..Suppé
Waltz, "Il Bacio".....Arditi
Fantasia, "Lucia".....Donizetti
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Sevilliana from "Don César de Bazan" Massenet
Adagio Pathétique.....Godard
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Selection, "Apple Blossoms" Kreisler-Jacoby
Revery, "Voice of Chimes".....Luigini
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann" Offenbach
March, "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa
Conductor: A. Jacchia.

BOSTON GLOBE SATURDAY, JUNE 5.

, BANQUET AND VISIT END TRAVELERS' CONVENTION

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 192

Commercial Travelers Given City's Greeting

GRAND OFFICERS OF THE UNITED COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS. They will guide the bagmen's order during the year and are, left to right, first row: Everett B. Stacey, grand junior counselor; Charles P. Dogherty, past grand counselor. Rear row, left to right: George E. Stevens, grand treasurer; Thomas H. Hersey, grand page; D. P. McKenna, executive committee; George A. Daniels, grand sentinel, and Alley R. Knight, grand conductor.

A concert at the Pops, Symphony Hall, furnished entertainment for fully 2000 members, delegates and friends of the United Commercial Travellers last evening at the close of the second day of their convention. Mayor Peters and Grand Counsellor Charles Poole, elected yesterday, made brief remarks.

Mayor Peters was given a hearty ovation when he entered the crowded hall, and was later applauded when Chairman Harry N. Guterman, assistant United States district attorney, announced the Mayor's contribution to [illegible] aid in enter-

At the conclusion of this, adjournment was taken to the American House where more than 350 of the visiting commercial travelers, their wives and women friends attended the annual banquet of the Bagmen. Great Ruler Everet B. Stacey presided.

In the evening the visitors went in a body to the "Pops" at Symphony Hall. Every number on the program was applauded until the orchestra played encores.

Mayor Peters welcomed the travelers. Coolidge could not attend the concert because of the prorogation of the Legislature.

Charles A. Poole of W[illegible]

Yesterday noon the wives of the delegates were entertained by Jordan Marsh Company in the exhibition hall on the seventh floor of the Annex Store, about 600 being in attendance. The visitors were greeted by a group of girls dressed in white and ushered into the hall, which was made attractive with cut flowers.

E. A. Finney, head of the personal service, represented the firm and welcomed the guests. He outlined the many activities for the betterment of its fellow-workers.

Miss Mary Hopkins, educational director, gave an entertaining address on the problems confronting the Department of Education in the store. She also staged a one-act drama, assisted by Miss

TRAVELERS GO TO POP CONCERT

Addressed by Mayor Peters —Convention Ends Business Sessions

PARADE AND OUTING PLANNED FOR TODAY

Delegates to the 25th annual convention of the New England council, United Commercial Travelers of America, and their guests, attended the pop concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall last night. Mayor Peters welcomed the gathering to the city, and Charles A. Poole, newly elected grand councilor of the organization, also spoke.

[illegible], W. P. [illegible]
B. Seigm[illegible]
ing, Left to Right—R. H. Cross,
. A. Loveland, W. G. George, A. C.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

REQUEST NIGHT AT POPS

The 85 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who play every night at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, under the illustrious leadership of Mr. Jacchia, give such delight that the present season is the largest that this institution of 35 summers has ever known. Mr. Jacchia has an instinct for the public pulse to guide him in making Pop programs, but applause is not a sufficient test. Primitive peoples demonstrated their approval or disapproval in crowds, controlling their administrations by clashing sword against shield, or gnashing their teeth. A civilized democracy, however, must use the ballot, and hence the annual request programs, determined entirely by public vote. Request night this season will come on Monday, June 21. Suggestions must be limited to three pieces, and must have the name and address of the voter. They may be mailed to Agide Jacchia, Symphony Hall, Boston, or dropped in the "Request Night" ballot box at the Massachusetts avenue entrance.

Although sections of Symphony Hall have been engaged by the Professional Women's Club for Monday, June 7, and by the graduate nurses, the Women's City Club and Euclid lodge for the succeeding nights, these Pop concerts are in every sense public. The same applies to Technology night on Friday, June 11. The week's programs follow:

MONDAY

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba"....Gounod
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" ....Nicolai
Waltz, "Les Sirenes".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon".....Massenet
Ballet Suite "Sylvia".....Delibes
Prelude Religieux.....Lang
Salut d'Amour.....Elgar
Ride of the Valkyrtes.....Wagner
Selection, "My Golden Girl".....Herbert
Anitra's Dance.....Grieg
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song".....Strauss
The Fairest of the Fair.....Sousa

TUESDAY

Marche Lorraine.....Ganne
Overture to "Light Cavalry".....Suppe
"The Lost Chord".....Sullivan
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
"The Star Spangled Banner"
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor".Donizetti
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Selection, "Chimes of Normandy".Planquette
Largo (with organ).....Handel
"Rose of No Man's Land".....Caddigan
March, "The Merry Soldiers".....Sabathil

WEDNESDAY

Triumphal March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night"..Suppe
Waltz, "Roses from the South".....Strauss
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Hungarian Dance No. 1.....Brahms
"Depuis le Jour" from "Louise"..Charpentier
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"....Tschaikowsky
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream"
Mendelssohn
Pomp and Circumstance No. 2.....Elgar

THURSDAY

Prelude to "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "The Magic Flute".....Mozart
Waltz, "Dornroeschen".....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Harp solo (Mr. Holy)
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde".Wagner
Finale of First Symphony for Organ and Orchestra.....Guilmant
Organ: Mr. Humphrey
Selection, "Yo San".....R. L. Harlow
Tarantelle (with flute solo).....Jacchia
Waltz, "Artist's Life".....Strauss
Rackoczy March.....Berlioz

FRIDAY

Technology Night
Entrance of the Bovards.....Halvorsen
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Selection, "Patsey" (1920 Tech show)
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Hungarian Dance No. 1 in G minor...Brahms
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Songs by the Technology Glee Club
Selection, "My Golden Girl".....Herbert
"The Lost Chord" (with trumpet solo).Sullivan
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".....Vollstedt
Stein Song.....Bullard

SATURDAY

March from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Overture to "The Bartered Bride"....Smetana
Prelude, "The Deluge".....Saint-Saens
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda"
Ponchielli
Valse Triste.....Sibelius
Enfantillage (Children at Play).Van Westerhout
Ouverture Solennelle "1812".....Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Narcissus.....Nevin
Dance of the Camorists, from the "Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Mr Jacchia as Program Maker

Possibly a few listeners with a speculative turn of mind have wondered from time to time why the programs at the Pop concerts seem to satisfy so great a variety of tastes. If they have looked at the problem of program making from the point of view of the conductor, and realized the difficulties Mr Jacchia has to face, they are probably inclined as the writer is to congratulating him on his tact and skill.

Choosing music to be performed at a series of Symphony concerts is a difficult job, but Mr Monteux, whatever his trials in satisfying both the people who turn up their noses at all music earlier than Debussy and those who deride everything written since the death of Beethoven, is at least never obliged to consider people with no knowledge of, and therefore no taste, for great music.

Mr Jacchia, besides pleasing both classicists and modernists, must also consider the large number of people who claim to know nothing about music except what they like. If he gave nothing but pieces from the regular Symphony repertory he would disgruntle many in his audiences. If he gave no such music he would displease as many others. If he never chose anything not familiar to the majority of his audience he would bore all the people who are tired of the "Largo," "Traumerei," the "1812 Overture" and his other old standbys. Yet there are plenty of listeners who would be perfectly satisfied to hear only their favorite compositions on their occasional visits to the Pops.

Then there are all the numerous special nights, with special audiences demanding college songs and what not to be considered. To satisfy every one, in short, the programs must be a hash of everything from Sousa to Mozart. Yet who is there who never tires of hash?

Nights of Russian music, dance music, Wagner, Italian opera and so on are the way out of the monotony of variety. If the miscellany on other occasions contains some pieces you don't care for remember that part of the audience likes them, and that these concerts are for the general public which never agrees on matters of taste.

This week's programs illustrate all the above generalizations. There is no night when the house is reserved as a whole, but various organizations have engaged portions of it for each evening except Saturday. Friday is Tech night. The others are Monday, the Professional Women's Club; Tuesday, the Graduate Nurses'; Wednesday, the Women's City Club, and Thursday, Euclid Lodge. All of these are open to the public.

June 2.

Events and Comments

Request Night this season at the Pops will come on Monday, June 21. Suggestions must be limited to three pieces, and must have the name and address of the voter. They may be mailed to Agide Jacchia, Symphony Hall, Boston, or dropped in the "Request Night" ballot box at the Massachusetts av entrance.

'POPS' PROGRAM FOR THE WEEK

Music hath such charms at the nightly Pops concerts in Symphony Hall that out of the six weeks traversed in the present season, four have individually exceeded in attendance any previous week in the Pops' history. Conductor Jacchia has wrought further with his superfine orchestra and the persuasive powers of music. The outward demands on the audience, which once conversed steadily over their tables from 8 to 11, he has reduced them into silence during each piece almost without their knowing it. Next Monday, June 14, the New England Conservatory of Music will have its annual night at the Pops. This night will also be public, and the programme, with the feature of a female chorus of 50 voices, led by Mr. George W. Chadwick, the Conservatory director, will be of especial general interest.

Save for Wednesday, June 16, and Thursday, June 17, for which nights Boston University and the annual convention of the American Institute of Banking, respectively, have engaged the hall entire, every night of the week will be public.

In tomorrow's program F. M. Wemple will be soloist in the Chadwick number, "Lochinvar." The selections are as follows: Introduction to act 3, "Lohengrin," Wagner; overture to "Oberon," Weber; waltz, "Estudiantia," Waldteufel; Tempest scene from "Othello," Verdi; [illegible] of "Schehorazeade," Rimsky Korsakoff; Spring chorus from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; chorus of fairies, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; chorus from the New England Conservatory.

WEDNESDAY

Boston University Night at the Pops. Entire house taken.

THURSDAY

The 18th annual convention of the American Institute of Banking. (Section American Bankers' Association) have taken the entire house for this night.

FRIDAY

Festival March.....
Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea".....Borch
Clarinet Solo (Mr. Paul Mimart).....Suppe
(a) Petite Valse.....
(b) Quasi "Fox Trot".....E. B. Hill
Fantasia, "Rigoletto".....
Suite "L'Arlesienne" No. 1.....Verdi
(a) Minuet (b) Carillon.....Bizet
Largo from the "New World" Symphony
Whispering of the Flowers.....Dvorak
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Blon
Selection, "The Rainbow Girl".....Liszt
Prelude.....Hirsch
Waltz, "Artist's Life".....Rachmaninoff
Overture Solennelle "1812".....Strauss
Tschaikowsky

SATURDAY

March from "The Prophet".....Meyerbeer
Overture to "Phedre".....Massenet
Waltz, "Vienna Blood".....Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida".....
Rhapsody, "Carnival in Pestch".....Verdi
Hymn to "St. Cecilia" (with organ)...Liszt
Japanese Suite.....Koscah Yamada
(a) Sarashi (b) O Edo (c) Kapore
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste".....Herbert
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor".....Donizetti
Waltz, "Marigold".....Repper
March, "Sambre et Meuse".....Planquette

MUSIC NOTES

THE POPS

Music hath such charms at the nightly Pop concerts in Symphony Hall that out of the six weeks traversed in the present season, four have individually exceeded in attendance any previous week in the Pops' history. Conductor Jacchia has wrought further with his superfine orchestra and the persuasive powers of music. The outward demands on the audience, which once conversed steadily over their tables from 8 to 11, he has reduced them into silence during each piece almost without their knowing it. Next Monday, June 14, the New England Conservatory of Music will have its annual night at the Pops. This night will also be public, and the programme, with the feature of a female chorus of 50 voices, led by Mr. George W. Chadwick, the Conservatory director, will be of especial general interest.

Save for Wednesday, June 16, and Thursday, June 17, for which nights Boston University and the annual convention of the American Institute of Banking, respectively, have engaged the hall entire, every night of the week will be public.

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

Special Nights for Next Week—Fresh Pieces on Mr. Jacchia's Lists—An Assisting Chorus from the Conservatory

FOR two evenings next week the public must deny itself the pleasure of The Pops at Symphony Hall—on Wednesday, when the students and the alumni of Boston University have taken the whole house, and on Thursday, when the American Institute of Banking has done likewise. On the other hand Tuesday, Friday and Saturday will be nobody's nights, except the public's, Mr. Jacchia's and the orchestra's. For all three, moreover, he has made promising programmes. On Tuesday, he will bring back Goldmark's sensuous and songful overture to the Hindu play, "Sakuntala"; on Friday, Mr. Mimart of the orchestra will be heard as soloist in two pieces for clarinet; while on Saturday three movements of a Japanese suite by a Japanese composer, Yamada, will be heard for the first time in Boston along with a new waltz, "Marigold," by the resident Mr. Repper, and Liszt's rhapsody, "Carnival in Pest."

For the remaining evening of the new week—Monday—Mr. Jacchia has set a programme also out of the ordinary. The night is "New England Conservatory Night," and a chorus of women from that school, with Mr. Chadwick conducting, will sing a fragment from Saint-Saëns's opera, "Samson and Delilah," and a number from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's fantasy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Mr. Chadwick's vivid and vigorous Ballad for Baritone and Orchestra, "Lochinvar," will also be heard with Mr. Wemple for singer. It is music of the composer's prime, deserving more frequent performance than it receives. A "Lyric Overture" written by Paul White of the Conservatory will also be played. With these exceptions, the progress of The Pops through a seventh week will be normal.

Seventh Week of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall

The seventh week of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall will begin tomorrow with the annual night of the New England Conservatory of Music. This occasion will also be public, and the programme, with the feature of a female chorus of 50 voices, led by George W. Chadwick, the conservatory director, will be of especial general interest.

Save for Wednesday, June 16, and Thursday, June 17, for which nights Boston University and the annual convention of the American Institute of Banking, respectively, have engaged the hall entire, every night of the week will be public.

In tomorrow's program F. M. Wemple will be soloist in the Chadwick number, "Lochinvar." The selections are as follows: Introduction to act 3, "Lohengrin," Wagner; overture to "Oberon," Weber; waltz, "Estudiantia," Waldteufel; Tempest scene from "Othello," Verdi; [illegible] of "Schehorazeade," Rimsky Korsakoff; Spring chorus from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; chorus of fairies, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; chorus from the New England Conservatory.

At the Pops Tonight

March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

At the Pops Tonight

New England Conservatory Night
(Open to the Public)
Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin."

At the Pops Tonight

Boston University Night
(Open to the Public)
Wedding March.....Mendelssohn
Overture to "Le Lac des Fées"..Auber

At the Pops Tonight

French Military March.....Saint-Saëns
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"..Suppé
Waltz, "Il Bacio".....Arditi
Fantasia, "Lucia".....Donizetti
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Sevillana from "Don César de Bazan"
Massenet
Adagio Pathétique.....Godard
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"
Ponchielli
Selection, "Apple Blossoms"
Kreisler-Jacoby
Revery, "Voice of Chimes".....Luigini
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann"
Offenbach
March, "Stars and Stripes Forever,"
Sousa

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

"PRELUDE RELIGIEUX" AT SYMPHONY TONIGHT

The members of the Professional Women's Club have bought up Symphony Hall for this evening and a prominent member of the club, Miss Edith Lang, will have the honor of having her "Prelude Religieux" played by the orchestra. A very exceptional program has been arranged and a varied number of "requests" and encores will be responded to and Mrs. Marie Dewing Faelten, the president, will receive the guests.

POP CONCERT CLOSES NURSES' CONVENTION

Miss Jessie E. Grant Is Elected President of Organization

The two days' convention of the Massachusetts State Nurses' Association, held in the Assembly Hall of the Boston University College of Business Administration, came to a close last night with a pop concert in Symphony Hall, attended by more than 300 of the delegates. Business sessions were held in the morning and afternoon when Carrie M. Hall, R. N., spoke on the importance of teaching chemistry before drugs, solutions and materia medica. Officers elected included: President, Miss Jessie E. Grant; vice-president, Miss Mary Coonahan; secretary, Miss Melissa Cooke. A tea for the delegates was given in Trinity Church parish hall.

EUCLID NIGHT AT THE POP CONCERT

Prominent [illegible] of Greater Boston yesterday attended "Euclid night" at the Pops. Compositions by members of the fraternity were played, and Guilmant's Finale of First Symphony. Ho- [illegible] worshipful master of

TONIGHT'S POP PROGRAM

Agide Jacchia and his Symphony Orchestra will play the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

[illegible] military march.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Waltz, "Il Bacio".....
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor".....Donizetti
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
[illegible] from "Don Cesar de Bazan".Massenet
[illegible] Pathetique.....Godard
[illegible] from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
a Ore, "Apple Blossoms".....Kreisler
[illegible] Voice of Chimes".....Luigini
[illegible] "The Tales of Hoffmann".....
[illegible] Forever.....Offenbach
.....Sousa

DON'T YOU music lovers like to watch Agide Jacchia's left hand when he is conducting at the Pops

Conductor Jacchia is a "hand and finger," more than "baton," leader of musicians.

Haven't you noticed he seems to lead with the finger or wrist motion of that left hand even more than he does with baton? First it's the little finger raised or dropped an inch, or sometimes less. Then the forefinger, ditto. Then the slightest raising, up or down, of the whole hand with an indescribably delicate wrist motion. Yes, Mr. Jacchia is truly a "left-hand-and-finger" conductor," if ever there was one. Incidentally, his wife and daughter, Elsa, are leaving Rimini, on shores of the Adriatic, Italy, latter part of July, to join him here, after being separated since last October. "Bambina" that was, is no longer a "baby." "She's almost up to here," says "Agide," pointing to his shoulder. It will be a "Jacchia family reunion" during August, with no work for the "pater" until the opening of proposed four weeks' season of Pops in

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 192

Commercial Travelers Given City's Greeting

GRAND OFFICERS OF THE UNITED COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS.
They will guide the bagmen's order during the year and are, left to right, first row, Everett B. Stacey, grand junior counselor; Charles P. Dogherty, past grand counselor. Rear row, left to right: George E. Stevens, grand treasurer; Thomas H. Hersey, grand page; D. P. McKenna, executive committee; George A. Daniels, grand sentinel, and Alley R. Knight, grand conductor.

A concert at the Pops, Symphony Hall, furnished entertainment for fully 2000 members, delegates and friends of the United Commercial Travellers last evening at the close of the second day of their convention. Mayor Peters and Grand Counsellor Charles Poole, elected yesterday, made brief remarks.

Mayor Peters was given a hearty ovation when he entered the crowded hall, and was later applauded when Chairman Harry N. Guterman, assistant United States district attorney, announced the Mayor's contribution to

At the conclusion of this, adjournment was taken to the American House where more than 350 of the visiting commercial travelers, their wives and women friends attended the annual banquet of the Bagmen. Great Ruler Everet B. Stacey presided.

In the evening the visitors went in a body to the "Pops" at Symphony Hall. Every number on the program was applauded until the orchestra played encores.

Mayor Peters welcomed the travelers. Gov Coolidge could not attend the concert because of the prorogation of the Legislature.

[illegible] Poole of W[illegible]

[illegible], W. P. [illegible]
B. Seigm[illegible]
ing, Left to Right—R. H. Cross,
', A. Loveland, W. G. George, A. C.

Yesterday noon the wives of the delegates were entertained by Jordan Marsh Company in the exhibition hall on the seventh floor of the Annex Store, about 600 being in attendance. The visitors were greeted by a group of girls dressed in white and ushered into the hall, which was made attractive with cut flowers.

E. A. Finney, head of the personal service, represented the firm and welcomed the guests. He outlined the many activities for the betterment of its fellow-workers.

Miss Mary Hopkins, educational director, gave an entertaining address on the problems confronting the Department of Education in the store. She also staged a one-act drama, assisted by M[illegible]

TRAVELERS GO TO POP CONCERT

Addressed by Mayor Peters —Convention Ends Business Sessions

PARADE AND OUTING PLANNED FOR TODAY

Delegates to the 25th annual convention of the New England council, United Commercial Travelers of America, and their guests, attended the pop concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall last night. Mayor Peters welcomed the gathering to the city, and Charles A. Poole, newly elected grand councilor of the organization, also spoke.

THE BOSTON GLOBE—SATURDAY, JUNE 5,

AGMEN'S FROLIC, BANQUET AND VISIT TO POPS END TRAVELERS' CONVENTION

INFORMATION OBSCURED

REQUEST NIGHT AT POPS

The 85 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who play every night at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, under the inspiring leadership of Mr. Jacchia, give such delight that the present season is the largest that this institution of 35 summers has ever known. Mr. Jacchia has an instinct for the public pulse to guide him in making Pop programs, but applause is not a sufficient test. Primitive peoples demonstrated their approval or disapproval in crowds, controlling their administration by clashing sword against shield, or gnashing their teeth. A civilized democracy, however, must use the ballot, and hence the annual request programs, determined entirely by public vote. Request night this season will come on Monday, June 21. Suggestions must be limited to three pieces, and must have the name and address of the voter. They may be mailed to Agide Jacchia, Symphony Hall, Boston, or dropped in the "Request Night" ballot box at the Massachusetts avenue entrance.

Although sections of Symphony Hall have been engaged by the Professional Women's Club for Monday, June 7, and by the graduate nurses, the Women's City Club and Euclid lodge for the succeeding nights, these Pop concerts are in every sense public. The same applies to Technology night on Friday, June 11. The week's programs follow:

MONDAY

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba"...Gouned
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor"...Nicolai
Waltz, "Les Sirenes"...Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon"...Massenet
Ballet Suite "Sylvia"...Delibes
Prelude Religieux...Lang
Salut d'Amour...Elgar
Ride of the Valkyries...Wagner
Selection, "My Golden Girl"...Herbert
Anitra's Dance...Grieg
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"...Strauss
The Fairest of the Fair...Sousa

TUESDAY

Marche Lorraine...Ganne
Overture to "Light Cavalry"...Suppe
"The Lost Chord"...Sullivan
Selection, "Carmen"...Bizet
"The Star Spangled Banner"
Suite "Peer Gynt"...Grieg
Minuet...Bolzoni
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor"...Donizetti
Overture to "William Tell"...Rossini
Selection, "Chimes of Normandy"...Planquette
Largo (with organ)...Handel
"Rose of No Man's Land"...Caddigan
March, "The Merry Soldiers"...Sabathil

WEDNESDAY

Triumphal March from "Aida"...Verdi
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night"...Suppe
Waltz, "Roses from the South"...Strauss
Fantasia, "La Tosca"...Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin"...Wagner
Hungarian Dance No. 4...Brahms
"Depuis le Jour" from "Louise"...Charpentier
Overture Solennelle, "1812"...Tschaikowsky
Suite from "Carmen"...Bizet
Reve Angelique...Rubinstein
Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream"...Mendelssohn
Pomp and Circumstance No. 2...Elgar

THURSDAY

Prelude to "Carmen"...Bizet
Overture to "The Magic Flute"...Mozart
Waltz, "Dornroeschen"...Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Pagliacci"...Leoncavallo
Second Hungarian Rhapsody...Liszt
Harp solo (Mr. Holy)
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"...Wagner
Finale of First Symphony for Organ and Orchestra...Guilmant
Organ, Mr. Humphrey
Selection, "Yo San"...R. L. Harlow
Tarantelle (with flute solo)...Jacchia
Waltz, "Artist's Life"...Strauss
Rackoczy March...Berlioz

FRIDAY

Technology Night
Entrance of the Bovards...Halvorsen
Overture to "William Tell"...Rossini
Waltz, "Estudiantina"...Waldteufel
Selection, "Patsey" (1920 Tech show)
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"...Wagner
Hungarian Dance No. 1 in G minor...Brahms
Fantasia, "Aida"...Verdi
Songs by the Technology Glee Club
Selection, "My Golden Girl"...Herbert
"The Lost Chord" (with trumpet solo)...Sullivan
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"...Vollstedt
Stein Song...Bullard

SATURDAY

March from "Tannhauser"...Wagner
Overture to "The Bartered Bride"...Smetana
Prelude, "The Deluge"...Saint-Saens
Fantasia, "Carmen"...Bizet
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda"...Ponchielli
Valse Triste...Sibelius
Enfantillage (Children at Play)...Van Westerhout
Ouverture Solennelle "1812"...Tschaikowsky
Rhapsody, "Espana"...Chabrier
Narcissus...Nevin
Dance of the Camorists, from the "Jewels of the Madonna"...Wolf-Ferrari
Invitation to the Dance...Weber-Berlioz

POP CONCERT CLOSES NURSES' CONVENTION

Miss Jessie E. Grant Is Elected President of Organization

The two days' convention of the Massachusetts State Nurses' Association, held in the Assembly Hall of the Boston University College of Business Administration, came to a close last night with a pop concert in Symphony Hall, attended by more than 300 of the delegates. Business sessions were held in the morning and afternoon when Carrie M. Hall, R. N., spoke on the importance of teaching chemistry before drugs, solutions and materia medica. Officers elected included: President, Miss Jessie E. Grant; vice-president, Miss Mary Coonahan; secretary, Miss Melissa Cooke. A tea for the delegates was given in Trinity Church parish hall.

EUCLID NIGHT AT THE POP CONCERT

Prominent Masons of Greater Boston yesterday attended "Euclid night" at the Pops. Compositions by members of the fraternity were played, and Guilmant's Finale of First Symphony. Honorable master of

TONIGHT'S POP PROGRAM

Agide Jacchia and his Symphony Orchestra will play the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

...military march...Saint-Saens
...ture to "Poet and Peasant"...Suppe
...tz, "Il Bacio"...Arditi
...ntasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor"...Donizetti
...erture to "Sakuntala"...Goldmark
...illana from "Don Cesar de Bazan"...Massenet
...Pathetique...Godard
...usic from "La Gioconda"...Ponchielli
...Apple Blossoms"...Kreisler
...of Chimes"...Lugini
...The Tales of Hoffmann"...Offenbach
...Forever...Sousa

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Mr Jacchia as Program Maker

Possibly a few listeners with a speculative turn of mind have wondered from time to time why the programs at the Pop concerts seem to satisfy so great a variety of tastes. If they have looked at the problem of program making from the point of view of the conductor, and realized the difficulties Mr. Jacchia has to face, they are probably inclined, as the writer is to congratulating him on his tact and skill.

Choosing music to be performed at a series of Symphony concerts is a difficult job, but Mr Monteux, whatever his trials in satisfying both the people who turn up their noses at all music earlier than Debussy and those who deride everything written since the death of Beethoven, is at least never obliged to consider people with no knowledge of, and therefore no taste, for great music.

Mr Jacchia, besides pleasing both classicists and modernists, must also consider the large number of people who claim to know nothing about music except what they like. If he gave nothing but pieces from the regular Symphony repertory he would disgruntle many in his audiences. If he gave no such music he would displease as many others. If he never chose anything not familiar to the majority of his audience he would bore all the people who are tired of the "Largo," "Traumerei," the "1812 Overture" and his other old standbys. Yet there are plenty of listeners who would be perfectly satisfied to hear only their favorite compositions on their occasional visits to the Pops.

Then there are all the numerous special nights, with special audiences demanding college songs and what not to be considered. To satisfy every one, in short, the programs must be a hash of everything from Sousa to Mozart. Yet who is there who never tires of hash?

Nights of Russian music, dance music, Wagner, Italian opera and so on are the way out of the monotony of variety. If the miscellany on other occasions contains some pieces you don't care for remember that part of the audience likes them, and that these concerts are for the general public which never agrees on matters of taste.

This week's programs illustrate all the above generalizations. There is no night when the house is reserved as a whole, but various organizations have engaged portions of it for each evening except Saturday. Friday is Tech night. The others are Monday, the Professional Women's Club; Tuesday, the Graduate Nurses'; Wednesday, the Women's City Club, and Thursday, Euclid Lodge. All of these are open to the public.

June 21.

Events and Comments

Request Night this season at the Pops will come on Monday, June 21. Suggestions must be limited to three pieces, and must have the name and address of the voter. They may be mailed to Agide Jacchia, Symphony Hall, Boston, or dropped in the "Request Night" ballot box at the Massachusetts av entrance.

Stage training.

The sketch calls for picturesque costuming. There is a bevy of pretty girls, lots of graceful dancing and tuneful songs.

Record June 7

"PRELUDE RELIGIEUX" AT SYMPHONY TONIGHT

The members of the Professional Women's Club have bought up Symphony Hall for this evening and a prominent member of the club, Miss Edith Lang, will have the honor of having her "Prelude Religieux" played by the orchestra. A very exceptional program has been arranged and a varied number of "requests" and encores will be responded to and Mrs. Marie Dewing Faelten, the president, will receive the guests.

DON'T YOU music lovers like to watch Agide Jacchia's left hand when he is conducting at the Pops

Conductor Jacchia is a "hand and finger," more than "baton," leader of musicians.

Haven't you noticed he seems to lead with the finger or wrist motion of that left hand even more than he does with baton? First it's the little finger raised or dropped an inch, or sometimes less. Then the forefinger, ditto. Then the slightest raising, up or down, of the whole hand with an indescribably delicate wrist motion. Yes, Mr. Jacchia is truly a "left-hand-and-finger" conductor," if ever there was one. Incidentally, his wife and daughter, Elsa, are leaving Rimini, on shores of the Adriatic, Italy, latter part of July, to join him here, after being separated since last October. "Bambina" that was, is no longer a "baby." "She's almost up to here," says "Agide," pointing to his shoulder. It will be a "Jacchia family reunion" during August, with no work for the "pater" until the opening of proposed four weeks' season of Pops in

'POPS' PROGRAM FOR THE WEEK

Music hath such charms at the nightly Pop concerts in Symphony Hall that out of the six weeks traversed in the present season, four have individually exceeded in attendance any previous week in the Pops' history. Conductor Jacchia has wrought further with his superfine orchestra and persuasive powers of music. The outward demands on the audience, which once conversed steadily during their tables from 8 to 11, he has reduced them into silence during each number almost without their knowing it. Next Monday, June 14, the New England Conservatory of Music will have their annual night at the Pops. This night will also be public, and the chorus, with the feature of a female chorus of 50 voices, led by Mr. George W. Chadwick, the Conservatory director, will be of especial general interest. Save for Wednesday, June 16, and Thursday, June 17, for which nights Boston University and the annual convention of the American Institute of Banking, respectively, have engaged the hall entire, every night of the week will be public.

WEDNESDAY

Boston University Night at the Pops. Entire house taken.

THURSDAY

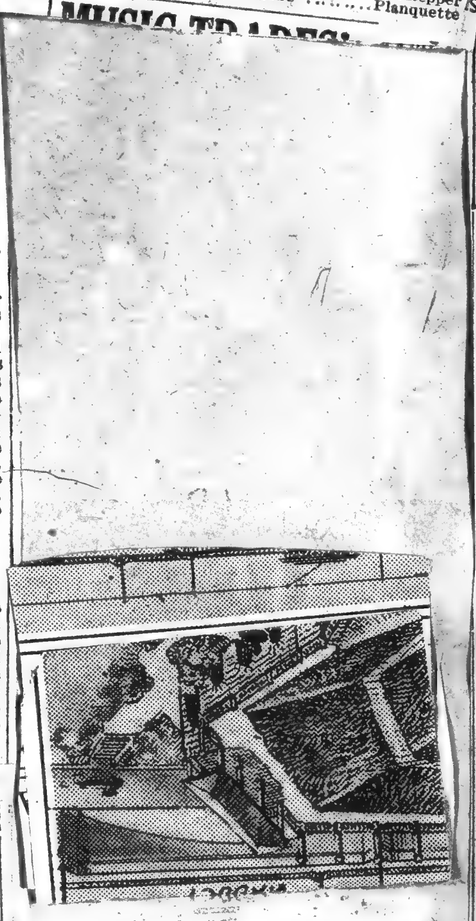
The 18th annual convention of the American Institute of Banking. (Section American Bankers' Association) have taken the entire house for this night.

FRIDAY

Festival March...
Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea"...Borch
Clarinet Solo (Mr. Paul Mimart)...Suppe
(a) Petite Valse...E. B. Hill
(b) Quasi "Fox Trot"...
Fantasia, "Rigoletto"...Verdi
Suite "L'Arlesienne" No. 1...Bizet
(a) Minuet (b) Carillon...
Largo from the "New World" Symphony...Dvorak
Whispering of the Flowers...Blon
First Hungarian Rhapsody...Liszt
Selection, "The Rainbow Girl"...
Prelude...Rachmaninoff
Waltz, "Artist's Life"...Strauss
Overture Solennelle "1812"...Tschaikowsky

SATURDAY

March from "The Prophet"...Meyerbeer
Overture to "Phedre"...Massenet
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"...Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida"...Verdi
Rhapsody, "Carnival in Pestch"...Liszt
Hymn to St. Cecilia" (with organ)...Gounod
Japanese Suite...Koscak Yamada
(a) Sarashi (b) O Edo (c) Kapore
Marche Slave...Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste"...Herbert
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor"...Donizetti
Waltz, "Marigold"...Repper
March, "Sambre et Mense"...Planquette



MUSIC NOTES

THE POPS

Music hath such charms at the nightly Pop concerts in Symphony Hall that out of the six weeks traversed in the present season, four have individually exceeded in attendance any previous week in the Pops' history. Conductor Jacchia has wrought further with his superfine orchestra and persuasive powers of music. The outward demands on the audience, which once conversed steadily during their tables from 8 to 11, he has reduced them into silence during each number almost without their knowing it. Next Monday, June 14, the New England Conservatory of Music will have their annual night at the Pops. This night will also be public, and the chorus, with the feature of a female chorus of 50 voices, led by Mr. George W. Chadwick, the Conservatory director, will be of especial general interest. Save for Wednesday, June 16, and Thursday, June 17, for which nights Boston University and the annual convention of the American Institute of Banking, respectively, have engaged the hall entire, every night of the week will be public.

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

Special Nights for Next Week—Fresh Pieces on Mr. Jacchia's Lists—An Assisting Chorus from the Conservatory

FOR two evenings next week the public must deny itself the pleasure of The Pops at Symphony Hall—on Wednesday, when the students and the alumni of Boston University have taken the whole house, and on Thursday, when the American Institute of Banking has done likewise. On the other hand Tuesday, Friday and Saturday will be nobody's nights, except the public's, Mr. Jacchia's and the orchestra's. For all three, moreover, he has made promising programmes. On Tuesday, he will bring back Goldmark's sensuous and songful overture to the Hindu play, "Sakuntala"; on Friday, Mr. Mimart of the orchestra will be heard as soloist in two pieces for clarinet; while on Saturday three movements of a Japanese suite by a Japanese composer, Yamada, will be heard for the first time in Boston along with a new waltz, "Marigold," by the resident Mr. Repper, and Liszt's rhapsody, "Carnival in Pest."

For the remaining evening of the new week—Monday—Mr. Jacchia has set a programme also out of the ordinary. The night is "New England Conservatory Night," and a chorus of women from that school, with Mr. Chadwick conducting, will sing a fragment from Saint-Saëns's opera, "Samson and Delilah," and a number from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's fantasy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Mr. Chadwick's vivid and vigorous Ballad for Baritone and Orchestra, "Lochinvar," will also be heard with Mr. Wemple for singer. It is music of the composer's prime, deserving more frequent performance than it receives. A "Lyric Overture" written by Paul White of the Conservatory will also be played. With these exceptions, the progress of The Pops through a seventh week will be normal.

Seventh Week of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall

The seventh week of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall will begin tomorrow with the annual night of the New England Conservatory of Music. This occasion will also be public, and the program, with the feature of a female chorus of 50 voices, led by George W. Chadwick, the conservatory director, will be of especial general interest.

Save for Wednesday, June 16, and Thursday, June 17, for which nights Boston University and the annual convention of the American Institute of Banking, respectively, have engaged the hall entire, every night of the week will be public.

In tomorrow's program F. M. Wemple will be soloist in the Chadwick number, "Lochinvar." The selections are as follows: Introduction to act 3, "Lohengrin," Wagner; overture to "Oberon," Weber; waltz, "Estudiantia," Waldteufel; pest scene from "Othello," Verdi; "Ride of "Schehorazeade," Rimsky Korsakoff; Spring chorus from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; chorus of fairies, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," female chorus from the New England Conserv-

At the Pops Tonight

March from "Tannhäuser"...Wagner

At the Pops Tonight

New England Conservatory Night
(Open to the Public)
Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin."

At the Pops Tonight

Boston University Night
(Open to the Public)
Wedding March...Mendelssohn
Overture to "Le Lac des Fées"...Auber

At the Pops Tonight

French Military March...Saint-Saëns
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"...Suppé
Waltz, "Il Bacio"...Arditi
Fantasia, "Lucia"...Donizetti
Overture to "Sakuntala"...Goldmark
Sevillana from "Don César de Bazan"...Massenet
Adagio Pathétique...Godard
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"...Ponchielli
Selection, "Apple Blossoms"...Kreisler-Jacobi
Revery, "Voice of Chimes"...Luigini
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann"...Offenbach
March, "Stars and Stripes Forever,"...Sousa

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

THE BOSTON GLOBE—SATURDAY, JUNE 5,

AGMEN'S FROLIC, BANQUET AND VISIT TO POPS END TRAVELERS' C

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 192

Commercial Travelers Given City's Greeting

GRAND OFFICERS OF THE UNITED COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS. They will guide the bagmen's order during the year and are, left to right, first row: Everett B. Stacey, grand junior counselor; Charles P. Dogherty, past grand counselor. Rear row, left to right: George E. Stevens, grand treasurer; Thomas H. Hersey, grand page; D. P. McKenna, executive committee; George A. Daniels, grand sentinel, and Alley R. Knight, grand conductor.

A concert at the Pops, Symphony Hall, furnished entertainment for fully 2000 members, delegates and friends of the United Commercial Travellers last evening at the close of the second day of their convention. Mayor Peters and Grand Counsellor Charles Poole, elected yesterday, made brief remarks.

Mayor Peters was given a hearty ovation when he entered the crowded hall, and was later applauded when Chairman Harry N. Guterman, assistant United States district attorney, announced the Mayor's contribution to

At the conclusion of this, adjournment was taken to the American House where more than 350 of the visiting commercial travelers, their wives and women friends attended the annual banquet of the Bagmen. Great Ruler Everet B. Stacey presided.

In the evening the visitors went in a body to the "Pops" at Symphony Hall. Every number on the program was applauded until the orchestra played encores.

Mayor Peters welcomed the travelers. Gov Coolidge could not attend the concert because of the prorogation of the Legislature.

WANTED
GRADUATE ENGINEER
ABOUT 35 years of age; a man competent to make himself at home among steam turbines, water wheels, generators, motors and transmission, sanitation, heating and ventilating; society desires N. Y., N. H. & H.
ROOM 446, SOUTH
Apply R. D. FITZMAU

ll, W. P. Webber, C. T. Lawton, G. B. Seigmous Jr, R. S. Beck, E. B. ing, Left to Right—R. H. Cross, . A. Loveland, W. G. George, A. C.

Yesterday noon the wives of the delegates were entertained by Jordan Marsh Company in the exhibition hall on the seventh floor of the Annex Store, about 600 being in attendance. The visitors were greeted by a group of girls dressed in white and ushered into the hall, which was made attractive with cut flowers.

E. A. Finney, head of the personal service, represented the firm and welcomed the guests. He outlined the many activities for the betterment of its fellow-workers.

Miss Mary Hopkins, educational director, gave an entertaining address on the problems confronting the Department of Education in the store. She also staged a one-act drama, assisted by M

the Pop ymphony Hall of the "Pops" at t begin tomorrow
of the New Eng-
Music. This occa-
public, and the proature of a female
led by George W.
onservatory director,
general interest.
day, June 16, and for which nights
and the annual conmerican Institute o
y, have engaged th
ght of the week wi
gram P. M. Wem
e Chadwick numb selections are as o act 3. "Lohengr to "Oberon." W
s." Waldteufel:
Othello." Verdi:
" Rimsky Kors
"Samson an chorus of ght's Dream."
ew England C

Pops Tonight
Tannhäuser".....Wagner

Pops Tonight
nd Conservatory Night to the Public)
to Act III., "Lohengrin."

Pops Tonight
litary March.....Saint-Saëns
"Poet and Peasant"..Suppé
Rajo".....Ardit
"Lucia".....Donizetti
"Sakuntala".....Goldmark
om "Don César de Bazan"
Massenet
étique.....Godard
from "La Gioconda"
Ponchielli
Apple Blossoms"
Kreisler-Jacoby
oice of Chimes".....Luigini om "The Tales of Hoffmann"
Offenbach
rs and Stripes Forever."
Sousa
uctor: A. Jacchia.

NE 5,
TION
ERS GO CONCERT
y Mayor Peters
tion Ends ss Sessions
ND OUTING
D FOR TODAY
he 25th annual con-
ew England council,
rcial Travelers of
eir guests, attended given by the Boston
estra in Symphony
Mayor Peters wel-ring to the city, and ole, newly elected
of the organization,
Cross,
, A. C.
the delean Marsh lt on the re, about visitors
s dressed ll, which flowers.
personal und welthe many r its felal direc-
ress on Departng also
Miss

TWO CENTS.

SYMPHONY MEN ASK MORE PAY

81 Players Demand $1000 Increase —30 Apply for Admission to Union—30 Others to Quit

JUDGE FREDERICK P. CABOT,
President of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A demand for increased wages on the part of 81 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, simultaneously with a revival of the long feud which has been in existence for years between the Musical Union and the Boston Symphony, have brought about new and sensational developments at Symphony Hall.

The claim of these players is that

Continued on Page 12—Fifth Col.

AY, FEBRUARY 18, 1920

SYMPHONY MEN ARE OUT FOR MORE PAY

Continued from First Page

their average wage—the rate does not apply to specially paid leaders of the different sections of the orchestra, men of world-fame as virtuosos on their instruments—equals about $35 a week for the year round. They ask a raise of $1000 a year, or a little less than $20 a week.

This advance has not thus far been granted and the trustees of the Boston Symphony, of whom Judge Frederick P. Cabot is the leader, have refused to treat with the men as a body.

30 APPLY TO UNION

In addition to the wage situation as between the men and Symphony Hall, there is the further circumstance, according to members of the orchestra, that 30 men have signed applications and paid their application fee of $25 for entrance to the union, and that fully 30 more—according to these musicians' statements—have offers to play in other American symphony orchestras, which are unionized, at higher wages than they receive as members of the Boston body.

Judge Cabot is reported as having said in a recent address to members of the orchestra that the existing guarantee fund for the Boston Symphony Orchestra of $2,000,000 could not be drawn upon to pay more wages, and that this was the only source from which wages could be increased, without simply incurring additional deficits at the end of the year.

Operation Costs Increase

The enormous increase in the cost of transportation for the orchestra tours, of which a great many are undertaken in the course of the season, and the equal increase in the cost of all operations connected with this organization are items which have to be considered, as well as possible or impossible increases of wages.

Following Judge Cabot's speech, it is claimed, certain players suggested a raise in the price of tickets. To this Judge Cabot replied that it was a problem impossible of consideration at this time. The obvious reason for this is that by far the greater number of seats for the Symphony concerts are sold at a certain scale of prices for the entire season and that nearly all of the seats in Symphony Hall are now owned by subscribers who have paid the stated price for them for the season of 1919-20.

Invoke Contract Labor Law

It was intimated in a quarter, which came to the knowledge of the players, that if a number of them wished to walk out it would be possible to replace them by at least 50 better players who could be imported from Europe, as has been done so extensively in the past. To this the Musical Union has made a counter intimation that if any such course be attempted the union will invoke the laws now existing in the United States against the importation of contract labor from abroad.

This was not done when the German players were discharged from the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1918, because it was felt that such a course would have been unpatriotic to say the least. It is also a fact that the French band, from which a number of the members of the Boston Symphony, who replaced the Germans, were engaged, was then in the United States, so that the engagement of certain of the French band players as members of the Boston Symphony was technically different from importing these players into this country from Europe.

Provides $200 Penalty

If members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra break their contract by leaving the orchestra before the time specified in the written agreement, they are susceptible to a fine of $200. The Musical Union imposed a similar kind of a fine, and a fine of about the same figure, if members leave it to join a non-union body.

The Symphony players, who are dissatisfied with their wages, claim that they wish very much to stay with the Boston orchestra, but cannot afford to do so at the present wage rate and with the embarrassment of the present high cost of living. Some of these men feel bitter, claiming that they have been with the orchestra for many years, without a change of salary, and that it is impossible for them to be faithful to the distinguished band of which they are members without adequate compensation for their services.

It was always the policy of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, steadily adhered to as long as he lived, that no member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra could belong to it and the Musical Union at the same time. From time to time a member joined, and immediately resigned or was dismissed from the orchestra. Major Higginson believed, and apparently the present board of trustees also believe, that it would be impossible to maintain the standard of performance which has made the Boston Symphony Orchestra the greatest orchestra in the world if union standards, union hours and all the rest of the union conditions had to be followed. This view has been sustained by many well-informed music lovers or musicians.

Unlimited Rehearsals

One reason for the phenomenal capacities of the Boston Symphony is the fact that the men are engaged in a way which makes it possible for the conductor to call as many rehearsals as many days in the week and for as many hours practically as he desires. Neither outside teaching nor other outside business can interfere with the call for rehearsals, and all Boston Symphony conductors have gone ahead on this plan, sparing neither themselves nor their men to attain the results desired. Furthermore, the Boston Symphony conductor is absolute artistic ruler in his sphere. He engages or discharges his men in accordance with his opinion as to their fitness and reliability. He can enforce the most rigid discipline.

The policy of Symphony Hall has always been to engage the best conductor available, give him carte blanche in his rehearsals and his programme making and make him wholly responsible for musical results. The artistic and the business direction of Symphony Hall have been clearly separate though co-operating in an extremely effective and frictionless manner. This is the end still sought by the Boston Symphony management, which with its players now faces one of the many problems of the aftermath of the war.

ament.

STON GLOBE—WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 18,

SYMPHONY PLAYERS DEMAND INCREASE

Trustees Refuse to Treat With Men as a Body —Make No Move to Grant More Wages

That some 80-odd members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have presented a demand for an increased wage amounting to $1000 a year, to the trustees of the Symphony, and that the trustees, of whom Judge Frederick P. Cabot is president, have thus far refused to treat with the men as a body, and have made no move to date to grant the increase, was admitted as being true by Louis H. Mudgett, the manager of Symphony Hall, this morning.

The situation, it is understood, does not affect the specially paid section leaders, but rather the rank and file of the great musical organization, which has long been ranked as second to none in America and one of the finest in the world.

Present rates of pay, the members claim, make their weekly stipend average about $35, throughout the year. The raise asked for would be in the vicinity of $20 a week. Under the existing scale, the musicians point out, they meet with continual embarrassment in the solution of the question of living.

Their loyalty to the famous musical organization is having a bitter tussle with the exigencies of existence and they feel, in many cases, that under present circumstances it would be impossible to stand the strain much longer. Few of them express any desire to break with the Symphony, although some have resigned, from time to time.

On the other hand, the position of the trustees of the Symphony is declared to be compelled by many factors. One of these is the cost of orchestral tours, which has increased enormously of late.

Still another is the fact that the seats at Symphony, in the majority of cases are taken on subscription for the season, and this precludes any increase in this direction, at least for another season. It is declared by trustees that the $2,000,000 guarantee fund for the Boston Symphony cannot be drawn upon for wage increases.

Simultaneous with this question of wage increase demands, there has come to light once more the question of unionizing musicians in the employ of the Symphony.

The whole matter at present is in the air, but that some adjustment will be evolved, such that it may not effect the standards of performance, nor work injustice to the players, is the freely-expressed hope of not a few of the lovers of music in Boston.

Judge Cabot said that since Maj. Henry L. Higginson had relinquished control of the orchestra, those who had been responsible for its maintenance—a number of generous donors who had stepped into the breach—had contributed double the amount Maj. Higginson had put into the orchestra annually.

He said Maj. Higginson at no time put in more than $50,000 a year.

Judge Cabot said he had addressed members of the orchestra in a body, explaining the situation to them thoroughly. He said he did not believe the question of "unionism" entered into the matter. He said the players themselves knew there had been talk of unionizing the orchestra some time ago.

The trustees have no objection to the members belonging to a union, but he contended an orchestra of this sort should not be subject to any outside influences.

NO PAY BOOST FOR PLAYERS OF SYMPHONY

Judge Cabot Says 1919 Deficit Was $100,000

Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will launch a compaign for $2,000,000 for the upkeep of the organization, it was announced today by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, head of the trustees, following the report that the 81 players had demanded an increase of $1000 a year.

Judge Cabot made it plain that in view of the probable deficit of $100,000 this year, the trusteees could not grant the increase. He declared emphatically that the orchestra will continue, at any rate, whether any of the members leave or not.

Denies Controversy

"I hope that the orchestra will go on, and that there will be no deterioration in the quality of its music," said Judge Cabot.

He said that the trustees had no controversy with the players whatsoever. He realized, he said, that living expenses had increased to such an extent that many members of the orchestra with families were unable to get along on their present salaries, which are said to average $35.

His position, and that of the trustees, he said, was a peculiar one, as the trustees were not conducting an industry

(Continued on Page Two, Column 2.)

RAISE FUND FOR SYMPHONY

Continued from First Page

re they must try to show a profit or are dividends.

Neither are we in a position to grant demands that may be made by the ers for more pay," Judge Cabot ased.

dge Cabot explained that the deficit year totalled more than $93,000, and this year it would probably run $100,000.

scussing the campaign for $2,000,000, ge Cabot said the trustees had not nded to make official announcement he drive until May 1. The discord atening to disrupt the organization he orchestra, he said, made it necesfor him to announce his attitude.

Would Double Deficit

he endowment fund would be used to e up the deficit, so the trustees would not be obliged to depend wholly on benefactors who have made liberal donations during the past two years.

Judge Cabot said that the granting of increases of $1000 a year to each of the Symphony players would cause the annual deficit to amount to over $200,000. The endowment fund proposed would have to be doubled if the increases were granted, he said. Judge Cabot was unable to predict what effect the news of the "row" between the players and the Musicians' Union would have on the launching of the campaign. He said plans for raising so large a fund must be well laid before the drive was announced.

NO INCOME FOR ADDITIONAL SALARIES

TRUSTEES AND PLAYERS OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT AN IMPASSE—THE PROJECTED ENDOWMENT FUND

There is no occasion as yet "to view with alarm" the present "unrest" in the Symphony Orchestra, or to harrow up dark forebodings of many changes next season in the personnel of the band. Only a year ago, it is wise to recall, rumor announced many departures from the orchestra, whereas in fact they proved to be few—no more indeed than would befall in ordinary course among a hundred men. These are the days, moreover when arrangements are made for the season next to come in which process all concerned naturally manœuvre for favorable position. Expiring contracts between management and players are under consideration for renewal; proposals for the revision of existing agreements may be made; decisions for the future are generally in order. This year, again, the circumstances are unusual and difficult, because competition for able and practised players is running high among the orchestras of the East. Mr. Bodanzky and the controlling powers of the New Symphony Orchestra in New York are eager to better the personnel of that band; while Mr. Stokowski and the management of the Philadelphia Orchestra neglect no opportunity to improve their forces. In a word, the market for players in symphony orchestras is a rising market and a market by no means over-stocked.

This background sets in clearer light present negotiations between players and trustees in the Symphony Orchestra over the making of new contracts and revision of old. A fifth of the band—the twenty men who lead the several instrumental choirs—are not concerned in them, since they are content with present salaries The remaining four-fifths of the band—the rank and file in the larger sense of the word—have asked as a body for an increase in pay of $1000 a year, alike in contracts about to be renewed and in contracts previously made and now in force. They give the usual reasons for such increase—the higher cost of living, the general rise in salaries, the present demand for orchestral players of the better sort. No question of the orchestra as a unionized or a "non-unionized" body enters into this request; no threats or warnings as to the future accompany it. The players have no more than made known their desires; given the reasons for them and prepared for negotiations concerning them.

Continued on Page Eight

NO INCOME FOR ADDITIONAL SALARIES

Continued from Page One

On the other side, the trustees of the orchestra, speaking through Judge Cabot as president, find themselves in a no less difficult position. They are quite willing to negotiate with the eighty players either collectively or individually as the players may prefer. In fact, Judge Cabot has already discussed the proposals with the men as a body. Furthermore, they are well aware of the conditions that prompt the request for larger salaries and by no means disposed to minimize them. On the other hand, they are virtually without means to grant the desired increases. The present guarantee fund meets the annual deficit between receipts and expenditures as they now are—say $100,000 a year—but makes no provision for additional fixed charges. New sources of income are not easy to discover. It might be possible to raise the price of seats next season for the concerts in Boston and in other cities, but in such decision the willingness of the public to pay them must be considered. Moreover, such an increase would hardly provide the needed $100,000 in annual income for the salaries by and large. An additional month of "The Pops," say in September of each year, would increase fractionally the salaries of the players, but by less than a fifth of what they are now asking. In a word, while the spirit of the trustees, as Judge Cabot spoke for them, was willing the treasury was weak.

Finally, a plan of the trustees, not hitherto disclosed, enters materially into the difficulties of the situation and the negotiations. The board has been laying plans to ask of the public in general a permanent endowment fund of $2,000,000 for the Symphony Concerts, the income of which would regularly meet the annual deficit of $100,000 and place the orchestra on a firm financial footing for the future. Within a few weeks the campaign for such an endowment was to begin and certain contributions to it have already been promised: If, however, eighty-odd men are each to receive $1000 more in annual salary, the fixed charges of the orchestra would increase yearly by approximately $100,000. To provide this sum in income, another $2,000,000 would be necessary as endowment and to ask the public for $4,000,000 seems to the trustees a dubious, if not an altogether impracticable undertaking.

PERILS OF AERIAL FLIGHT

N EVENING RECORD,

ØF THOS

CABOT REFUSES WAGE RAISE OF SYMPHONY MEN

Harmony does not reign in the ranks of the musicians and the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Members of the famous organization want a rasie in wages.

They claim their average wage is $35 a week. This is the sum received by them for orchestra work. It of course does not include the money they are allowed to make through outside performances or through teaching. Neither does this $35 wage apply to the leaders of various sections of the orchestra, who receive additional compensation. The $35 weekly wage is estimated, not on actual weeks of working, but on a yearly basis.

The men now want a flat raise of $1000 a year. This advance, so report in Symphony Hall circles goes, has not been granted. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, the head of the orchestra's trustees, has refused to treat the men in a body.

The demands for increased wages is complicated by another situation. Members of the orchestra state that already some 30 out of the 81 members have signed applications and paid their advance fee of $25 for entrance into the Musical Union. Fully 30 more have offers to play in other symphony orchestras, which are unionized and which pay higher wages than the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Only Fund Available

In denying advances in wages Judge Cabot stated the $2,000,000 guarantees fund of the orchestra could not be drawn on for higher wages and that this was the only source from which wages could be increased without incurring additional deficits at the end of the year. He pointed out that traveling and other necessary expenses had increased immensely. The trustees of the orchestra could, in case of a walkout, import many excellent players from Europe, as they have done before, at a moment's notice. It is understood that if such a plan is pursued the Musical Union may invoke laws against the importation of contract labor from abroad.

Maj. Henry L. Higginson, when in charge of the orchestra, always insisted that no member of the orchestra be a member of the Musical Union. Apparently the new trustees are to hold to the same course. Symphony backers say that in order to maintain the standard of the orchestra there must be unlimited rehearsals and that the conductor was to be the artistic master with full powers to "hire and fire" men at will.

Wed. Feb 18

DISPUTE MAY BE SYMPHONY'S END

Majority of Players Demand Raise in Pay; Some Have American ned Union

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the most famous organization of its kind in the world, is threatened with disruption because of dissatisfaction on the part of a majority of the players, it was learned today.

Wage increase demands, the revival of the feud with the Musical Union, and offers said to have been received to play in other orchestras were named as disputed points.

It is understood that eighty-one members of the orchestra asked for a raise of $1,000 a year, or a little less than $20 a week, claiming that their average wage is about $35.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president, and the trustees of the Symphony refuse to treat with the men as a body, and the advance has not been granted.

Thirty musicians have further signed applications to the Musical Union, it was stated, and paid fees of $25 for entrance, which was a violation of the policy of the late Major Henry L. Higginson. It is said that the trustees hold the same opinion, that no man can be a member of the Symphony and the Musical Union at the same time.

In a recent address Judge Cabot is reported as having told members of the orchestra that the existing guaranteeing fund for the Symphony of $2,000,000 could not be drawn upon to pay more wages. Furthermore, he is reported as saying that this was the only source from which wage increases could come without simply incurring additional deficits.

The suggestion that the price of tickets be increased was met by the statement that the greater number of seats are sold at a certain scale at the beginning of the season.

SYMPHONY PLAYERS' RAISE UP TO PUBLIC

Globe Feb 19

Higher Pay Possible Only With $4,000,000 Fund

It rests with the music-loving public to contribute freely to the endowment fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, if the demands for increase in salaries by 80 percent of the membership are to be met, according to Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees.

The situation at present is somewhat acute owing to the fact that the younger men of the organization feel their demands should be met. They say they are not getting a living wage and that the average weekly salary at present is $35 a week. They ask for an increase of $1000 a year.

Judge Cabot said last night that the annual deficit of the orchestra amounts to about $100,000, and this has been met from year to year by gifts from friends of the orchestra. It was felt that a better plan would be to raise an endowment fund of $2,000,00, the proceeds of which would meet this annual deficiency.

Dr Cabot Explained to Musicians

"I explained the financial situation to the members of the organization as a group," said Dr Cabot, "and showed them that unless the public contributed the money there was little hope of meeting their demands. If the public is sufficiently interested they will give. I hope they will. It would be a public calamity to Boston to lose the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It means so much to our city life.

"The plan for a $2,000,000 endowment fund has been under consideration for some time, but there have been so many demands on the public purse that we have been holding back and felt that no campaign for funds should be launched before May 1. We have asked some well-known people to contribute and they have come forward generously, thereby making a substantial nucleus of the fund.

"But to increase the wages of the players $1000 a year would mean that instead of an endowment fund of $2,00,000 we would have to secure just twice that sum, $4,000,000. The matter is one of vital importance to all the people of the city. We want them to give, and hope they will."

Speaking of the demands of the men, Judge Cabot said that so far as he is aware there is no general desire upon the part of the men to become affiliated with a union organization, although he said he believed the men were using this in a measure to secure ther demands.

"I believe," he added, "that these men should be paid a living wage in keeping with their position in life."

Only 80 Men Seek Increases

Of the 100 men in the orchestra, only 80 are concerned in the demand for increased salaries. The other 20, the men who lead the several instrumental choirs, are content with their present salaries. Of those who ask an increase, many have contracts about to expire, while others ask that despite their present contracts they be included in the list of those to receive increases.

Judge Cabot readily consented to a conference with the men and talked to them as a group, defining clearly the financial situation and explaining that new sources of income were not easy to get. He told them of the plan to raise an endowment fund of $2,000,000 to meet the annual deficit of $100,000, so as to place the orchestra on a firm financial footing in future years. He pointed out to them the difficulty of meeting such demands, which would mean the raising of an endowment fund twice as [illegible]

ASK PUBLIC AID FOR SYMPHONY

Herald Feb 19

Trustees, Unable to Raise Artists' Pay, to Start $2,000,000 Drive

ENDOWMENT TO END A DOUBLED DEFICIT

Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will launch a campaign for $2,000,000 for the upkeep of the organization, it was announced yesterday by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, head of the trustees, following the report that the 81 players had demanded an increase of $1000 a year.

Judge Cabot made it plain that in view of the probable deficit of $100,000 this year, the trustees could not grant the increase. He declared emphatically that the orchestra will continue, at any rate, whether any of the members leave or not.

Denies Controversy

"I hope that the orchestra will go on, and that there will be no deterioration in the quality of its music," said Judge Cabot.

He said that the trustees had no controversy with the players whatsoever. He realized, he said, that living expenses had increased to such an extent that many members of the orchestra with families were unable to get along on their present salaries, which are said to average $35.

His position, and that of the trustees, he said, was a peculiar one, as the trustees were not conducting an industry where they must try to show a profit or declare dividends.

"Neither are we in a position to grant any demands that may be made by the players for more pay," Judge Cabot asserted.

Judge Cabot explained that the deficit last year totalled more than $93,000, and that this year it would probably run over $100,000.

Would Double Deficit

Discussing the campaign for $2,000,000, Judge Cabot said the trustees had not intended to make official announcement of the drive until May 1. The discord threatening to disrupt the organization of the orchestra, he said, made it necessary for him to announce his attitude.

The endowment fund would be used to make up the deficit, so the trustees would not be obliged to depend wholly on benefactors who have made liberal donations during the past two years.

Judge Cabot said that the granting of increases of $1000 a year to each of the Symphony players would cause the annual deficit to amount to over $200,000. The endowment fund proposed would have to be doubled if the increases were granted, he said. Judge Cabot was unable to predict what effect the news of the "row" between the players and the Musicians' Union would have on the launching of the campaign. He said plans for raising so large a fund must be well laid before the drive was announced.

Judge Cabot said that since Maj. Henry L. Higginson had relinquished control of the orchestra, those who had been responsible for its maintenance—a number of generous donors who had stepped into the breach—had contributed double the amount Maj. Higginson had put into the orchestra annually.

He said Maj. Higginson at no time put in more than $50,000 a year.

Judge Cabot said he had addressed members of the orchestra in a body, explaining the situation to them thoroughly. He said he did not believe the question of "unionism" entered into the matter. He said the players themselves knew there had been talk of unionizing the orchestra some time ago.

The trustees have no objection to the members belonging to a union, but he contended an orchestra of this sort should not be subject to any outside influences.

SYMPHONY MEN PAY UP UNION FEE

But 5 Get $35 Scale With Bonus of $250

Post Feb 20

A number of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have filed applications for membership in the Boston Musicians' Union and have deposited $25—one-half of the initiation fee—with the union, according to F. C. Kingman, president of the union, in a statement issued yesterday.

WERE NOT SOLICITED

Mr. Kingman stated that the members of the Symphony Orchestra who have filed applications for the union were not solicited by the union. The president of the union said: "While it would be against our policy to state at this time how many applications have been filed for membership with our union by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I do not think that I am exaggerating when I say that quite a number of applications have been made and $25, half of our entrance fee, has been pledged with the applications as an instance of good faith.

"While we naturally welcome the Symphony players of this city with open arms, I desire to point out that their movement to join us this time is purely voluntary, and I do not blame them for taking it. In fact the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only Symphony in the country that is not affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians.

Other Orchestras Union

"Every other Symphony Orchestra in the United States belongs and as you know there have been several attempts here in the past by these men to come in with us.

"The only trouble in the past has been the failure of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to meet one of the cardinal obligations of the American Federation of Musicians, and that is that every effort must first be made to secure musicians in the United States before the federation will permit any management to go outside for a man.

Can Import Exceptional Men

"The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the past has desired the federation to grant them the privilege to go outside of this country for members for their orchestra at their convenience, which has been denied by the federation and still is.

"By that the federation does not mean that it bars a management from going outside for an exceptional man, but as the International stands first for Americanism it will not permit that to become a practice and will not give permission to anybody in this respect."

A representative of the Post inquired yesterday afternoon concerning the accuracy of the statements of musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the effect that the average salary received by members of the Boston Symphony was $35 a week. It can be authoritatively stated that these figures are not exact.

Five Get $35 for 40 Weeks

There are five men now in the Boston Symphony Orchestra who receive the minimum wage of $35 a week for 40 weeks. This wage is paid for the subscription symphony concerts in the winter and also for 10 weeks of Pop concerts in the spring and early summer, which requires very little rehearsing, but for which the players are paid the same amount that they receive for the winter concerts.

For the remaining 12 weeks of the session all men who receive less than $3000 a year are paid $20 a week for doing nothing for the Boston Symphony during that time in the form of a bonus of $250.

In addition to these emoluments all of the Symphony players teach, most of them organize small ensemble organizations of their own, and are completely at liberty to accept hotel engagements in the summer or earn money through their music in any way that does not conflict with the duties at rehearsals and during concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It may be stated that the average scale of wages is considerably higher than $35 a week.

BOSTON EVENING

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

ENDOWMENT FOR THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Feb

A Way Out of Present Difficulties—The Wisdom of a Test of the Public—More Manœuvring for Position—The Flonzaleys and Three Classic Quartets—Programmes in Prospect

No sympnony orchestra in the United States can maintain itself out of the income its concerts yield. If it is to keep a high standard of repertory and performance, it must not over-tax conductor and players with too frequent journeying from its seat, with too many concerts at home and abroad in the short space of the "musical season" in America. Similarly, if it is to hold its public in the cities in which it is regularly heard, the scale of prices for its concerts must not be set higher than is the custom of the hour. If it is to enjoy a desirable, even a necessary prestige, it must employ a conductor of signal ability and pay him well; it must assemble players of proportionate quality and proportionately compensate them; it must have ample opportunity for rehearsal and ample means to command "assisting artists," occasional choruses and other decorations to concerts of the first order. By the test of years, no orchestra so organized, so remunerated and so working from season to season can pay its way, however numerous, widespread and faithful its public may be.

Under these conditions, a symphony orchestra in the United States must be sustained by an individual benefactor who annually pays the deficit between receipts and expenditures; by a body of guarantors who do likewise; or by an endowment, either permanent or assured through a substantial period. In Mr. Higginson's day the Boston Symphony Orchestra was maintained by a single "patron"; the New York Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Damrosch's—is now so supported by Mr. Flagler. Various guarantors stand ready to provide the New Symphony Orchestra in New York—Mr. Bodanzky's—with necessary funds; most of the symphony orchestras in the Middle West are similarly kept in being; the Boston Orchestra is at present so sustained. In Philadelphia, after no little effort, an endowment fund collected from many subscribers will meet the deficits of Mr. Stokowski's orchestra through a term of years. Beyond these three, no methods for the maintaining of a symphony orchestra in America have borne the test of actual application.

Here in Boston, the Symphony Orchestra flourished when it was sustained by a single "patron." When he withdrew his support, no single man stood ready to succeed him and none is likely to present himself. A board of trustees undertook the control of the orchestra; sundry guarantors, privately pledged, agreed to pay deficits through three seasons. These trustees and these guarantors have met as best they might a rising scale of expenses which keeps annual revenue short of annual expenditure by, approximately, $100,000. Players in the orchestra now ask increases in salary that would add almost another $100,000 to this deficit. As present costs of living go, as present standards of compensation run in their calling, their request is reasonable, even though gradual adjustment, individual case by individual case, might lower the sum total of these increases. The trustees reply that they have not the income wherewith to meet this expenditure, however warranted it may be. The outcome, for the moment is an impasse, which the dictionary defines as a passage open at only one end.

That "open end" may, with reason, be direct request to the community for a permanent endowment for the Symphony Orchestra sufficient to meet present and future vicissitude. The trustees have, for months been meditating such a step; they might as advisedly take it as enter upon fresh solicitation of private subscriptions to meet new needs. Either this community, bye and large, regards the Symphony Orchestra as an institution worth maintaining—or it does not. Either the public of the Symphony Concerts takes enough pleasure in them to sustain them—or it does not. Either a few individuals care enough for symphonic music in Boston to contribute largely to the continuance of it—or they do not. Either all three categories wish the Symphony Orchestra adequately provided with income according to the needs of the time—or they do not. A canvass of the city and the suburbs for an endowment fund, large enough to assure the future of the Symphony Concerts would clear the air of the uncertainties, the cross-purposes, the temporary expedient that now more or less becloud them. If the endowment or a large part of it were subscribed, then the Symphony Orchestra would be supported, as it should be, by so much of the community as takes pride and pleasure in it. If the outcome were a failure, then the temper of the community toward the Symphony Concerts would at last stand clear and private benefaction could decide whether or not it would continue them for its own satisfaction, from its own sense of obligation.

And Now the Union

The reported application of various players in the Symphony Orchestra for membership in the Musicians' Protective Association—otherwise "the union"—seems no more than a tactical manœuvre in the present controversy with the trustees of the band over a general increase of salaries. If the applicants purpose to leave the Symphony Orchestra at the end of the season, unless their requests are granted, and are now tentatively seeking employment elsewhere, membership in the union is an advantage, even a necessity. They know, moreover, that so long as they do their work and fulfill their obligations at Symphony Hall, no one in authority there will molest them because they have joined the union. If the secession should be general among those who ask higher salaries, tactics would still plausibly explain it. In that case, the union might urge for the increases with whatever influence it possesses, might ask the trustees to accept its rules and scales, might raise obstacles to new comers into the orchestra. As a matter of fact, nineteen out of every twenty men in the Symphony Orchestra care not a turn of their hands for the union, except as a means to aid them toward the higher salaries they are now seeking. In turn, the officers of the union amusingly delude themselves if, and when, they profess any other view of the reported "secession." Fluent "bunk" about "Americanism"—familiar cloak to many a selfish interest—as little serves any of the actual merits of the case.

SYMPHONY MUSICIANS MAY SOON JOIN UNION

Conference in Progress Over an Agreement

Globe

While nobody connected with the Boston Musicians' Union or the Boston Symphony Orchestra would talk for publication last night, it is practically certain that the players in the orchestra will soon be members of the union affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. This belief is based on a conference yesterday at the headquarters of the Musicians' Union, St Botolph and Garrison sts, participated in by a delegation from the performers, Thomas F. Gamble, general secretary of the International Musicians' Association, and the officers of the local union.

Another meeting is scheduled for today to further discuss the local situation, and it is expected that a complete understanding will be reached, and possibly an agreement by which the players in the orchestra will affiliate with the union in a body.

LABOR NOTES

Herald Feb 83

SYMPHONY MEN FIRM FOR UNION

Orchestra Members May Soon Enter Labor Ranks as Body

70 P. C. SAID TO HAVE VOTED TO JOIN

As the result of a conference between a delegation representing the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thomas F. Gamble, general secretary of the American Federation of Musicians' and the board of directors of the Boston union of the International at the St. Botolph street headquarters of the local, it is believed that an arrangement will soon be reached by which the Symphony players will come into the union as a body.

Another conference is scheduled for today, at which the local situation will be further discussed.

70 P. C. Vote to Join

It has been stated by representatives of the players that more than 70 per cent. of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have voted to join the local union of musicians and it has been definitely made known by Pres. F. C. Kingman of the local that a large number of applications for membership, accompanied by half of the entrance fee of $50, have been filed by the players.

Mr. Gamble arrived in this city from New Hampshire late Saturday night for today's conference, and expects to remain here for some time.

Globe Feb 84

MOST OF SYMPHONY MEN HEAD FOR UNION

Applications of About 60 Musicians Filed

Following a meeting yesterday afternoon at the headquarters of Boston Musicians' Union on St Botolph st, it was announced that a majority of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had taken out application blanks for membership in the union and had paid their initiation fees; also that a committee of seven members had been appointed for handling all publicity and to interview the trustees of the orchestra, with the intent of settling wage differences.

Present at the meeting were 67 of the total membership of 95 men that compose the orchestra. Thomas F. Gamble, secretary to Pres Weber of the American Federation of Musicians, from New York, went over the entire situation. Also present were F. C. Kingman, president of Boston Musicians' Local 9; H. P. Liehr, secretary of the local; William Dodge of the directors, and Arthur Berenson, who has been retained as counsel for the Symphony men.

Members of the adjustment committee stated that 36 players in the orchestra had applied for union membership several weeks ago which with those who applied for membership yesterday will bring the total up to at least 60 and that additional applications are expected today.

"All we want is justice," said Carl Gardner of the committee, who said Judge F. P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees, had been autocratic in his attitude toward the members of the orchestra. "It is not so much a matter of pay," Mr Gardner continued, "although the Boston Symphony players are the lowest paid by one-half of any orchestra in the country."

Mr Gardner stated that players in all other symphony orchestras in the country are members of the American Federation of Musicians. The average pay of the Boston men is $35 weekly, he said, while in Detroit the minimum is $45 and only two men are paid as low as that. Mr Gardner added that in other cities $70 weekly is being offered for second violinists in symphony orchestras. He said the Boston men wanted a minimum rate, but just what will be asked has not been decided.

The Boston players are now allowed $5 a day for expenses while on trips out of town, whereas in 1914 they were allowed only $4. Owing to the increase in hotel rates and other expenses, Mr Gardner said this additional $1 is not enough.

...ONY MEN ...FOR UNION

... Members May Enter Labor ...ks as Body

...AID TO HAVE ...VOTED TO JOIN

...ult of a conference ...gation representing the ... Boston Symphony ...homas F. Gamble, gen... ...ry of the American ...f Musicians' and the ...rectors of the Boston ...e International at the ...street headquarters of ...is believed that an ar... ...ill soon be reached by ...ymphony players will ... union as a body.

...erence is scheduled for ...n the local situation will ...ussed.

...C. Vote to Join

...stated by representatives ... that more than 70 per ...members of the Boston ...estra have voted to join ...n of musicians and it ...ely made known by Pres. ... of the local that a large ...ications for membership, ...y half of the entrance ...been filed by the players. ...rrived in this city from ... late Saturday night for ...nce and expects to re... ...some time.

...SYMPHONY ...) FOR UNION

... of About 60 ...ns Filed

...ing yesterday after... ...quarters of Boston ...n St Botolph st, it ...t a majority of the ...Orchestra had taken ...nks for membership ... paid their initiation ...committee of seven ... appointed for han... ... and to interview ...orchestra, with the ...age differences. ...ting were 67 of the ... 95 men that com... ...Thomas F. Gamble, ...eber of the Ameri... ...usicians, from New ...e entire situation. ...C. Kingman, presi... ...cians' Local 9; H. ...of the local; Wil... ...rectors, and Arthur ... been retained as ...hony men. ...justment commit... ...ers in the orches... ...union membership ...which with those ...bership yesterday ...p to at least 60 ...plications are ex...

...stice," said Carl ...mittee, who said ...chairman of the ...cratic in his at... ...mbers of the or... ... much a matter ... continued, "al... ...mphony players ... one-half of any ...ry."

...at players in all ...tras in the coun... ... American Fed... ...The average pay ... $35 weekly, he ...the minimum is ...re paid as low ... added that in ...is being offered ... symphony or... ... Boston men ..., but just what ...en decided. ...re now allowed ...ile on trips out ... they were al... ...the increase in ... expenses, Mr ...onal $1 is not

Post Feb 24 BOS

SYMPHONY MEN JOIN HUB UNION

Mojority of Players Make Application for Membership

Sixty-seven of the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, out of the total number of 100, attended the meeting held yesterday afternoon at the headquarters of the Boston Musicians' Union, St. Botolph street, to discuss the question of affiliation with the union.

Thomas F. Gamble, secretary to President Weber of the American Federation of Musicians, from New York, went over the entire situation, and there were also present F. C. Kingman, president of Boston Musicians' Local 9; H. P. Liehr, secretary of the local; William Dodge of the board of directors, and Attorney Arthur Berenson, who has been appointed counsel for the Symphony men.

INITIATION FEES PAID

It was announced after the meeting that a majority of the members of the orchestra have taken out application blanks and paid their initiation fee to become members of the American Federation of Musicians. A committee of seven members of the orchestra was appointed for the purpose of handling all publicity and to interview the management of the orchestra with the intent of settling existing differences.

Members of this committee stated that 36 players in the orchestra applied for membership in the union several weeks ago and yesterday enough additional applied to bring the number up to 60. More applications are expected today.

"All we want is justice," said Carl Gardner, a member of the committee, who alleged that the attitude of Judge F. P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees, was "absolutely autocratic," and he would only deal individually with the players. "It is not so much a matter of pay, although the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are the lowest paid of any orchestra in the country," said Mr. Gardner.

Mr. Gardner stated that "the players in all other symphony orchestras in the country are members of the American Federation of Musicians. The average pay of players in the Boston orchestra is about $35 a week, or less than a Boston Elevated motorman gets, although some of the more noted players g much more. In Detroit the minimum pay of symphony orchestra players i $45 a week," he said, "and only tw men are paid that."

In other cities of the country they are offering $70 a week for second violin players in symphony orchestras, he declared. The players of the Boston orchestra want a minimum rate of pay but just what will be asked for has not yet been decided, he said.

Although the purchasing power of the dollar has shrunk to less than one-half since 1914 the pay of the members of the Boston orchestra remains about the same, Mr. Gardner declared, but they were allowed $5 a day for expenses when they went on out-of-town trips, while in 1914 $4 a day was allowed. Hotel rates, etc., in other cities had gone up, however, so this $1 raise was not enough, he said.

[redacted]

FEBRUARY 24, 1920

...S LEADER

American

Symphony Injured by Cabot, Says Player

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is demoralizing this famous musical organization by his autocratic methods, asserts Carl Gardner, a member of the orchestra, in commenting on their attempts to unionize.

Gardner asserts that the increase of from $4 to $5 per day allotted to the members for travelling expenses is totally inadequate to enable the players to live properly while performing away from this city. He pointed out that it was impossible to even obtain a hotel room for this amount, aside from the other expenses incurred by the men.

It is said, and they were usually

Herald Feb 24

ORCHESTRA IS NOW UNIONIZED

Chairman Gardner Reports 60 of 95 Symphony Players Enrolled

WILL NEGOTIATE FOR HIGHER PAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has become unionized, according to statement last night by Carl Gardner, chairman of a committee of seven Symphony players appointed to conduct negotiations between the union and the trustees.

Chairman Gardner declared that 60 out of the 95 members of the orchestra have already enrolled and paid their initiation fees to the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, and that the remaining members would probably enroll within a day or two.

Has Assurance of Players

The fact that yesterday was a holiday, which brought outside engagements to many of the players, he declared, prevented their attendance at the conference held at union headquarters on St. Botolph street, but he had received assurances from the absentees that warranted his assections that the orchestra had become unionized. While there were but 36 players in the union two weeks ago when the demands were first made for increase in salaries, today there are 60 members.

At the conference yesterday there were present in addition to the Symphony members, Thomas F. Gamble, international secretary of the American Federation of Musicians; Fred C. Kingman, president of the Boston local; Herman P. Liehr, secretary of the Boston local; William Dodge, chairman of the board of directors, and Arthur Berenson, attorney for the Symphony players.

Following the conference Chairman Gardner stated:

"All we want is justice. The attitude of Judge F. E. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is autocratic. He wants to deal with the players only as individuals. It is not merely a question of salary with the players, although the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the lowest paid symphony orchestra in the country. The pay averages less than $35 a week, while the players in Detroit and other orchestras in the country enjoy a minimum of $45. We have joined the union, and we intend to remain in the union and stick by it."

TO CONFER TODAY ON MUSICIANS' DEMANDS

Symphony Players' Counsel to See Judge Cabot

Barring Attorney From Meeting of Men Almost Starts Trouble

A conference has been arranged for 9 o'clock this morning between Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Arthur Berenson, counsel for the members of the orchestra who have recently affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians.

This conference is the result of the demands of the men that a wage increase of $1000 a year be granted each member. The conference will be held at the offices of Judge Cabot in the Exchange Building.

Arrangements for the conference were made shortly after Mr Berenson was refused admittance to a meeting of the union members of the orchestra which was being held at Symphony Hall. The alleged refusal of the management of the orchestra to allow the attorney to attend the meeting aroused so much indignation among the players that immediate trouble was feared by the leaders for a time.

Following the refusal to admit attorney Berenson to the meeting, a conference was held at the office of attorney Berenson by himself and Fredric Fradkin, concert-master of the orchestra, and Carl E. Gardner, publicity manager of the union committee. During this meeting Mr Berenson telephoned to Judge Cabot and arranged the conference for today.

Mr Fradkin, after the talk with attorney Berenson, said: "You can say for me that unless the unionizing of the orchestra is accepted by the trustees after my present contract expires, I will not renew it."

England

TWO CENTS Post Feb 19 Established 1

PLAN MORE PAY TO MEN OF SYMPHONY

Cabot Outlines Scheme for Fall Pop Season at Full Salaries--Band to Be Continued

Omitting any reference to the Musicians' Union, but emphasizing the management's willingness to confer with individuals regarding contracts, Judge Frederick T. Cabot, president of the Symphony trustees, yesterday addressed members of the Symphony Orchestra and made plain to each one that the orchestra, which has been maintained for 39 years, will be continued.

Judge Cabot read the salary list, which showed that the salary expenses

Continued on Page 6—First Column

Plans for More Pay to Boston Symphony Men

Continued from First Page

have been increased 30 per cent since 1914.

The players contend that the 30 per cent has not been distributed proportionately, but that those getting the largest salaries have received the largest increases, greater in proportion to their salary than the raises received by the lesser lights in the company.

SUBMIT SALARY LIST

A committee of players, who are union members, will be allowed to examine the salary list and following this examination their plans for handling the present situation will be discussed.

The president of the trustees in his address yesterday urged the members whose contracts are about to expire to notify the management at once whether or not they intend to renew them.

Meanwhile the unionization of the orchestra is being carried on.

Many of the advantages enjoyed by members of the local organization that are not privileged to those in other orchestras throughout the country were pointed out by Judge Cabot in his address.

Will Be Endowed

His remarks in full follow:

"This orchestra has been maintained for 39 years. It is going to continue to be maintained. This is to be done for the present through the generosity of persons making annual gifts and ultimately through the income of money given as an endowment for the purpose of its continuance. There is no occasion on the ground of such fear for any member of the orchestra to seek a position elsewhere.

"The first point then is that this orchestra is to be continued with its traditional standards of excellence.

Cost of Maintenance Doubled

"The orchestra at present is being supported by annual contributions, the total of which is twice as large as the amount paid by Major Higginson in any one of the first 37 years of its existence. In other words, to support it it is now costing more than double what it ever cost before.

"The total of salaries paid to the musicians is today 30 per cent greater than it was in 1914. In 1918 every musician receiving less than $3000 a year was given an additional payment of $250 a year, regardless of whether he had or did not have a continuous contract at a fixed sum. Furthermore, where contracts expired and new contracts were entered into, so far as possible other increases were given.

Eight Paid Minimum

"Payments to all musicians receiving less than $3000 a year are distributed weekly throughout the year, the rate of payment being higher during the 40 weeks of the Symphony concert season and Pop concert season than in summer when no services are required of the musicians.

"One member of the orchestra whose service is required at only some of the concerts is now being paid $1450 a year. Seven members are now being paid $1650 a year. All other members are paid at least $1850 a year and a large number much more.

40 Weeks of Service

"For the purpose of comparison with other orchestras the length of service should be taken into consideration. In this orchestra, for the men who care to play in the Pop concerts as well as the Symphony concerts, there are 49 weeks of service. In most orchestras the time of employment is only from 28 to 30 weeks, and in only one other orchestra is employment for so long a period as that in Boston.

"On the basis of 30 weeks of service the annual payment of $1650 is equivalent to $55 a week and $1850 is equivalent to $61.68 a week; on the basis of 40 weeks of service, $1650 is equivalent to $41.25 a week and $1850 is equivalent to $46.25 a week.

Plan Fall Pop Season

"Furthermore, the trustees are ready to carry on the Pop concerts for an additional season of four or five weeks beginning at Labor Day and running until the opening of the Symphony concerts, and to pay the musicians during that additional Pop season the full salary paid them during the spring Pop season.

"The second point made clear is, then, that the present minimum salaries apply to only eight men in the orchestra and that the opportunity is given to the members to play for four or five additional weeks in Pop concerts in September and to be paid an additional sum for that service.

"When the orchestra travels, each musician is allowed $5 a day for his living expenses. With one exception this compares with $4 a day allowed in other orchestras.

Pension Fund Membership

"The members of this orchestra have the privilege of membership in a pension fund, the amount of payment to them, or, in the event of death, to their widow or minor children, depending on length of service. A substantial portion of the money available for pensions comes from concerts which the members themselves give for the purpose during each year, a right which is secured to them under their contract.

"The members of the orchestra are entitled, according to length of service, to death benefit and disability payments under group insurance paid for by the trustees.

Long Term Contracts

"In other orchestras contracts are made only from year to year. In this orchestra they may be and usually are made for two to three years at a time. In no orchestra has there been a greater permanence of employment for a man of proved artistic ability than in this orchestra.

"On Feb. 6, 1920, a large proportion of the orchestra united in a written request for an increase in compensation of each member, stating that 'any increase less than $1000 a year would be futile,' and asking for a reply not later than Feb. 20, 1920. February 14, on behalf of the trustees, the president met the entire orchestra as a group and pointed out that the increase which was insisted upon as a minimum would require contributions from the public of $100,000 a year, in addition to the present contributions of $100,000 made for running the orchestra, or that, if a permanent fund was raised to maintain the orchestra, it would require $4,000,000 instead of $2,000,000, and that in the absence of such gifts from generous citizens, either annually or to an endowment fund, it was impossible to grant the request.

Revise Prices of Tickets

"He further stated that some increase in salaries, such as had been given in previous years, would be possible by revising the prices of tickets to the concerts and that that matter had for some time been under consideration by the trustees.

"He stated that in the case of members whose contracts were expiring; in the case of members then receiving the minimum pay, and in the case of the basses, even though they had continuing contracts, the matter of salaries would be gone over. Before closing the meeting he stated he would post definite hours when he would be glad to confer with members as to their salaries. This was done.

Committee of Members

"It is suggested by some members of the orchestra that it might be advisable to have the members select a committee of three—one from the brass section, one from the wood wind and one from the string—to advise with the members of the orchestra and the trustees to promote the general good of the entire orchestra, but not to pass upon the artistic merits of any member, that being properly a matter for the conductor.

"This suggestion is entirely satisfactory to the trustees. Indeed, they will be glad at any time to consider with individual members of a committee of the orchestra any matter affecting the general welfare or individual welfare of its members.

About Renewal of Contracts

"To sum up: Those members whose contracts are about to expire are requested to notify the management at once whether they wish to continue as members of the orchestra. If they do, the details of their new contracts will be taken up forthwith. All others who have any statement which they wish to make are requested to make such statement to the management now.

"It is important for the trustees to know without delay to what extent, if at all, there are any places to be filled in the orchestra so that they may select the best personnel for any such places, because, in any event, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be carried on and its great qualities maintained."

PLAN RAISE FOR SYMPHONY MEN

Trustees Agree to Meet Players' Committee and Permit Examination of Salary List

A truce has been declared in the controversy between the players of the Boston Symphony and the management and as the result of the trustees' offer to permit the members to examine the orchestra's salary list a committee of players will take this subject under consideration and then present whatever demands for salary increases that the situation warrants.

Frederick T. Cabot, president of the orchestra trustees, in addressing the players, said that the organization must be maintained under any circumstances and that plans are now being discussed by the management to grant the men more money. He urged the players whose contracts are about to expire to notify the trustees whether they desire to continue with the band.

NO MENTION OF UNION.

All reference to the members joining the local musicians' union was omitted.

He pointed out the many advantages enjoyed by members of the Boston orchestra denied members of other organizations. He said that if the trustees were to grant their demand for an increase of $1,000 yearly in salary it would entail an expense of $4,000,000, which, he pointed out, was a sum almost impossible to obtain even with larger public subscriptions and by increasing the price of admissions.

TRUSTEES' STATEMENT.

The trustees' statement follows in part:

"This orchestra has been maintained for thirty-nine years. It is going to continue to be maintained. This is to be done for the present through the generosity of persons making annual gifts and ultimately through the income of money given as an endowment for the purpose of its continuance. There is no occasion on the ground of such fear for any member of the orchestra to seek a position elsewhere.

"The orchestra at present is being supported by annual contributions, the total of which is twice as large as the amount paid by Major Higginson in any one of the first thirty-seven years of its existence.

"The total salaries paid to the musicians is today thirty per cent. greater than it was in 1914. In 1918, every musician receiving less than $3,000 a year was given an additional payment of $250 a year, regardless of whether he had or did not have a continuing contract at a fixed sum.

"Payments to all musicians receiving less than $3,000 a year are distributed weekly throughout the year, the rate of payment being higher during the forty weeks of the Symphony concert season and Pop concert season than in Summer when no services are required of the musicians.

NEARLY ALL GET $1,850.

"One member of the orchestra whose service is required at only some of the concerts is now being paid $1,450 a year. Seven members are now being paid $1,650 a year. All other members are paid at least $1,850 a year and a large number much more.

"The present minimum salaries apply to only eight men in the orchestra and that the opportunity is given to the members to play for four or five additional weeks in Pop Concerts in September and to be paid an additonal sum for that service.

"When the orchestra travels, each musician is allowed $5 a day for his living expenses. With one exception, this compares with $4 a day allowed in other orchestras.

"The members of this orchestra have the privilege of membership in a pension fund, the amount of payment to them, or, in the event of death, to their widow or minor children, depending on length of service.

"The members are entitled, according to length of service, to death benefit and disability payments under group insurance paid for by the trustees."

ACCUSED IN THEFT

SYMPHONY TO TABOO UNION

Trustees, in Address to Orchestra, Ask Number of Places to Be Filled

PLAYERS TO GIVE THEIR REPLY SOON

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, read a long paper dealing with the salary list and expenses of the orchestra at the regular rehearsal yesterday afternoon, but made no direct reference to the labor union, which claims 60 of the 95 players.

That the trustees are not disposed to recognize the affiliation of members with the Boston Musicians' Protective Association and the American Federation of Musicians is indicated in one paragraph of the trustees' statement dealing with contracts between the musicians and the trustees.

Hints of Places to Be Filled

"It is important," the statement reads, "for the trustees to know without delay to what extent, if at all, there are any places to be filled in the orchestra, so that they may select the best personnel for any such places, because, in any event, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be carried on and its great qualities maintained."

A meeting of the full committee of the players will be called in the immediate future to consider the trustees' case as stated and to formulate a reply.

The statement of the trustees follows:

"This orchestra has been maintained for 39 years. It is going to continue to be maintained. This is to be done for the present through the generosity of persons making annual gifts and, ultimately, through the income of money given as an endowment for the purpose of its continuance. There is no occasion on the ground of such fear for any member of the orchestra to seek a position elsewhere.

"The first point then is, that this orchestra is to be continued with its traditional standards of excellence.

Cost Has Been Doubled

"The orchestra at present is being supported by annual contributions, the total of which is twice as large as the amount paid by Maj. Higginson in any one of the first 37 years of its existence. In other words, to support it is now costing more than double what it ever cost before. The total salaries paid to the musicians is today 30 per cent. greater than it was in 1914. In 1918 every musician receiving less than $3000 a year was given an additional payment of $250 a year, regardless of whether he had or did not have a continuing contract at a fixed sum. Furthermore, where contracts expired and new contracts were entered into, so far as possible other increases were given.

"Payments to all musicians receiving less than $3000 a year are distributed weekly throughout the year, the rate of payment being higher during the 40 weeks of the Symphony concert season and Pop concert season than in summer, when no services are required of the musicians.

"One member of the orchestra whose service is required at only some of the concerts, is now being paid $1450 a year. Seven members are now being paid $1650 a year. All other members are paid at least $1850 a year and a large number

[illegible] of Service

[illegible] of comparison with [illegible] length of service [illegible] consideration. In [illegible] play in the Pop concerts as well as the Symphony concerts, there are 40 weeks of service. In most orchestras the time of employment is only from 28 to 30 weeks, and in only one other orchestra is employment for so long a period as that in Boston. On the basis of 30 weeks of service, the annual payment of $1650 is equivalent to $55 a week and $1850 is equivalent to $61.68 a week; on the basis of 40 weeks of service, $1650 is equivalent to $41.25 a week and $1850 is equivalent to $46.25 a week. Furthermore, the trustees are ready to carry on the Pop concerts for an additional season of four or five weeks beginning at Labor Day and running until the opening of the Symphony concerts, and to pay the musicians during that additional Pop season the full salary paid them during the spring Pop season. The second point made clear is, then, that the present minimum salaries apply to only eight men in the orchestra, and that the opportunity is given to the members to play for four or five additional weeks in Pop concerts in September and to be paid an additional sum for that service.

"When the orchestra travels, each musician is allowed $5 a day for his living expenses. With one exception, this compares with $4 a day allowed in other orchestras.

Pension Fund Privileges

"The members of this orchestra have the privilege of membership in a pension fund, the amount of payment to them, or, in the event of death, to their widow or minor children, depending on length of service. A substantial portion of the money available for pensions comes from concerts which the members themselves give for the purpose during each year, a right which is secured to them under their contract.

"The members of the orchestra are entitled, according to length of service, to death benefit and disability payments under group insurance paid for by the trustees.

"In other orchestras contracts are made only from year to year. In this orchestra they may be and usually are made for two to three years at a time. In no orchestra has there been a greater permanence of employment for a man of proved artistic ability than in this orchestra.

Refers to Salary Demands

"On Feb. 6, 1920 a large proportion of the orchestra united in a written request for an increase in compensation of each member, stating that 'any increase less than $1000 a year would be futile,' and asking for a reply not later than Feb. 20, 1920. Feb. 14, on behalf of the trustees, the president met the entire orchestra as a group and pointed out that the increase which was insisted upon as a minimum would require contributions from the public of $100,000 a year in addition to the present contributions of $100,000 made for running the orchestra, or that, if a permanent fund was raised to maintain the orchestra, it would require $4,000,000 instead of $2,000,000, and that in the absence of such gifts from generous citizens, either annually or to an endowment fund, it was impossible to grant the request.

"He further stated that some increase in salaries, such as had been given in previous years, would be possible by revising the prices of tickets to the concerts and that that matter had for some time been under consideration by the trustees.

"He stated that in the case of members whose contracts were expiring, and in the case of members then receiving the minimum pay, and in the case of the basses, even though they had continuing contracts, the matter of salaries would be gone [illegible]

closing the meeting he stated he would post definite hours when he would be glad to confer with members as to their salaries. This was done.

Demands a Show-Down

"It is suggested by some members of the orchestra that it might be advisable to have the members select a committee of three, one from the brass section, one from the wood wind, and one from the string, to advise with the members of the orchestra and the trustees to promote the general good of the entire orchestra, but not to pass upon the artistic merits of any member, that being properly a matter for the conductor. This suggestion is entirely satisfactory to the trustees. Indeed, they will be glad at any time to consider with individual members of a committee of the orchestra any matter affecting the general or individual welfare of its members.

"To sum up: Those members whose contracts are about to expire are requested to notify the management at once whether they wish to continue as members of the orchestra. If they do, the details of their new contracts will be taken up forthwith. All others who have any statement which they wish to make are requested to make such statements to the management now. It is important for the trustees to know without delay to what extent, if at all, there are any places to be filled in the orchestra so that they may select the best personnel for any such places, because in any event, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be carried on and its great qualities maintained."

SUGGESTS FALL POPS TO INCREASE PAY

Pres Cabot Asks Symphony Players to Say Now Whether They Wish to Continue—Orchestra to Go On, Anyway

At the close of the rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra, made an address to the musicians in reply to their recent salary demands. He said:

"This orchestra has been maintained for 39 years. It is going to continue to be maintained. This is to be done for the present through the generosity of persons making annual gifts and ultimately through the income of money given as an endowment for the purpose of its continuance. There is no occasion on the ground of such fear for any member of the orchestra to seek a position elsewhere.

"The first point then is, that this orchestra is to be continued with its traditional standards of excellence.

"The orchestra at present is being supported by annual contributions, the total of which is twice as large as the amount paid by Maj Higginson in any one of the first 37 years of its existence. In other words, to support it is now costing more than double what it ever cost before.

Increases Since 1914

"The total of salaries paid to the musicians is today 30 percent greater than it was in 1914.

"In 1918 every musician receiving less than $3000 a year was given an additional payment of $250 a year, regardless of whether he had or did not have a continuing contract at a fixed sum. Furthermore, where contracts expired and new contracts were entered into, so far as possible other increases were given.

"Payments to all musicians receiving less than $3000 a year are distributed weekly throughout the year, the rate of payment being higher during the 40 weeks of the Symphony Concert season and Pop Concert season than in Summer when no services are required of the musicians.

"One member of the orchestra, whose service is required at only some of the concerts, is now being paid $1450 a year. Seven members are now being paid $1650 a year. All other members are paid at least $1850 a year and a large number more.

"For the purpose of comparison with other orchestras the length of service should be taken into consideration. In this orchestra, for the men who care to play in the Pop Concerts as well as the Symphony Concerts, there are 40 weeks of service. In most orchestras the time of employment is only from 28 to 30 weeks and in only one other orchestra is employment for so long a period as that in Boston. On the basis of 30 weeks of service the annual payment of $1650 is equivalent to $55 a week and $1850 is equivalent to $61.68 a week; on the basis of 40 weeks of service, $1650 is equivalent to $41.25 a week and $1850 is equivalent to $46.25 a week.

Offers Full Pop Concerts

"Furthermore, the trustees are ready to carry on the Pop Concerts for an additional season of four or five weeks beginning at Labor Day and running until the opening of the Symphony Concerts, and to pay the musicians during that additional Pop season the full salary paid them during the Spring Pop season.

"The second point made clear is, then, that the present minimum salaries apply to only eight men in the orchestra and that the opportunity is given to the members to play for four or five additional weeks in Pop Concerts in September and to be paid an additional sum for that service.

"When the orchestra travels each musician is allowed $5 a day for his living expenses. With one exception, this compares with $4 a day allowed in other orchestras.

"The members of this orchestra have the privilege of membership in a pension fund, the amount of payment to them, or, in the event of death, to their widow or minor children, depending on length of service. A substantial portion of the money available for pensions comes from concerts which the members themselves give for the purpose during each year, a right which is secured to them under their contract.

"The members of the orchestra are entitled, according to length of service, to death benefit and disability payments under group insurance paid for by the trustees.

"In other orchestras contracts are made only from year to year. In this orchestra they may be and usually are made for two to three years at a time. In no orchestra has there been a greater permanence of employment for a man of proved artistic ability than in this orchestra.

Increase Asked Impossible

"On Feb 6, 1920, a large proportion of the orchestra united in a written request for an increase in compensation of each member, stating that 'any increase less than $1000 a year would be futile,' and asking for a reply not later than Feb 20, 1920.

"Feb 14, on behalf of the trustees, the president met the entire orchestra as a group and pointed out that the increase which was insisted upon as a minimum would require contributions from the public of $100,000 a year in addition to the present contributions of $100,000 made for running the orchestra, or that, if a permanent fund was raised to maintain the orchestra, it would require $4,000,000 instead of $2,000,000, and that in the absence of such gifts from generous citizens, either annually or to an endowment fund, it was impossible to grant the request.

"He further stated that some increase in salaries, such as had been given in previous years, would be possible by revising the prices of tickets to the concerts and that that matter had for some time been under consideration by the trustees.

"He stated that in the case of members whose contracts were expiring, and in the case of members then receiving the minimum pay, and in the case of the basses, even though they had continuing contracts, the matter of salaries would be gone over. Before closing the meeting he stated he would post definite hours when he would be glad to confer with members as to their salaries. This was done.

Glad to Meet Committee

"It is suggested by some members of the orchestra that it might be advisable to have the members select a committee of three, one from the brass section, one from the wood wind and one from the string, to advise with the members of the orchestra and the trustees to promote the general good of the entire orchestra, but not to pass upon the artistic merits of any member, that being properly a matter for the conductor. This suggestion is entirely satisfactory to the trustees. Indeed, they will be glad at any time to consider with individual members of a committee of the orchestra any matter affecting the general or individual welfare of its members.

"To sum up: Those members whose contracts are about to expire are requested to notify the management at once whether they wish to continue as members of the orchestra. If they do, the details of their new contracts will be taken up forthwith. All others who have any statement which they wish to make are requested to make such statements to the management now. It is important for the trustees to know without delay to what extent, if at all, there are any places to be filled in the orchestra so that they may select the best personnel for any such places, because, in any event, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be carried on and its great qualities maintained."

MORE ORCHESTRA MEMBERS SIGN UNION APPLICATIONS

A number of additional members of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday filled out applications for membership in the union of musicians affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, it was announced by Carl E. Gardner, publicity chairman of the committee of players. Mr Gardner said that every member of the orchestra at the rehearsal expressed sympathy with the union affiliation and, while pledges were not received from all of them, it was predicted that the orchestra will be 100 percent organized within a few days.

The committee expects to receive from Judge Frederick P. Cabot a copy of the salary list of the orchestra. It will go over the list and figure out just what increases were granted that brought the total to 30 percent, as stated by Judge Cabot.

It is claimed that many of the higher salaried artists received big increases, some as high as 75 percent, while some of the others received less than 30 percent.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

A SHARP TURN IN THE SYMPHONY STRIKE

Spirited Reply from the Trustees to Public and Players—Band and Concerts to Be Maintained, and Vacancies, If Any, to Be Filled as Heretofore—Salaries Compared and Defended—Possibilities of the Near Future — Seven Harps and Mr. Salzedo's Rare Qualities as Harpist

CANDOR is clearing the air in the present controversy over salaries between the trustees and the players in the Symphony Orchestra. In public and in private the musicians concerned—for the most part the secondary and the minor members of the band—have now made plain that they are seeking more than a necessary or a desirable increase in pay. Their larger purpose is to deprive the orchestra of its independence, to subject it to the exactions of a union, to establish, so far as they may, a régime that will consider above all else their ease and comfort. Hitherto those who have paid the bills of the orchestra have made the decisions in its business, while the conductor has been equally master of its music. Hereafter, if it is "unionized," both will be subject to rules imposed outside of Symphony Hall. The public of the Symphony Concerts, watching these aggressions, has wondered what the outcome would be. It has obviously feared the dissolution of the orchestra, the end of the concerts.

Through Judge Cabot, speaking to the players after a rehearsal yesterday, the trustees have now made clear and firm answer. "In any event the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be carried on and its great qualities maintained." It has existed for thirty-nine years; it will continue to exist. So much for the groundless fears of prospective dissolution. Furthermore, those members whose contracts expire at the end of the present season and who do not care to renew them at the amplest terms the trustees can make, are invited to notify the management at once of their impending departure, so that their places may be filled by the best available musicians. In a word, the men of the orchestra must make decision forthwith—either to stay within the band or to leave it. For as many as choose to go, successors will be found, called as heretofore according to their abilities and not according to their affiliations. By so much the trustees would make an end of the present "unrest." It is the desire of the more designing agitators to continue it. The direct invitation to stay or to go brings them up with a sharp turn. With the players as individuals, with the players as represented by a committee, the trustees and the management are at all times willing to consider any matter concerning the welfare of the orchestra, except the abilities of members, judgment of which is naturally the province of the conductor. The trustees indeed are prepared to welcome a standing committee of three players—one from each choir, string, wood and brass, of the orchestra, chosen by it for such purpose. So much, again, for the mistaken assertion that the trustees of the orchestra would not deal with it collectively. Very collectively, so far, they have treated it in the present controversy.

For the rest, and now speaking to the public rather than to the orchestra itself, Judge Cabot explained the present standards in salaries and the available means by which, in degree, they could be raised. One member of the orchestra, whose services are required at only occasional concerts, receives $1450 a year; seven more are paid $1650 a year. The trustees are prepared to consider the increase of these eight minimum salaries. There are few players upon the double-bass at present obtainable in America; the market-rate for such musicians has increased accordingly: the trustees are ready to discuss larger pay for this division of the orchestra. They are likewise ready to examine each expiring contract with a view to renewal, if the individual player so desires, on the best possible terms. Toward general increase of pay, the trustees lack the means to propose more than the income from four [illegible] receive the orchestra from Mr. Higginson. Had not two or three devoted men exerted themselves to the utmost the band would then and there have ceased to exist. It has been hardly less difficult to secure the guarantees now maintaining the Symphony Concerts. Again the zeal of a few saved the day.

Those who should know are agreed that no one man in Boston is disposed to take over the orchestra and maintain it single-handed as Mr. Higginson did; that no body, large or small, of men, of women, or both, is inclined to replace the present guarantors and substitute a new control. There are grave doubts whether public and private subscription to an endowment fund would be large enough to assure the financial future of the orchestra under present fixed charges—to say nothing of doubling them by a general increase in salaries. The men of the orchestra delude themselves absurdly when they believe that the orchestra, free and independent or unionized, can command patrons and guarantors at will. They are the comic victims of sheer megalomania when they believe that the community is eager to maintain them on any terms that they may propose. Too many of them, especially among the newcomers, are letting such fatalities run away with actualities that must be endured until they can be gradually altered and abated. The older and the wiser heads in the band know more of the conditions under which it actually lives and works—[illegible] are quietly and individually renewing tracts.

BOSTON EVENING TR

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

"Unrest" in the Symphony Orchestra Takes a New Turn—Delusions of the Players About Income and Control—Mme. Hudson-Alexander's Pleasurable Concert

THE trustees of the Symphony Orchestra are unable to raise the salaries of the rank and file of the band because they lack the income wherewith to do so and see no present means to increase their revenue. They have not declared that the request of the players was unwarrantable; they have not refused to bargain with them individually or collectively; they have simply stated an exact truth—that present fixed charges consume the present income of the orchestra and that no way to enlarge that income immediately and promisingly suggests itself. Thereupon more or less members of the orchestra hasten to join the Boston Musicians' Protective Association—otherwise "the union"—and invite the newspapers to make the same clatter about such action as it pleases them to raise. Their vanity is as amusing as their noise—and as futile. If every player in the Symphony Orchestra should join the union such course would not add a penny to the revenues of the orchestra. If the union as it is expected to do, should "demand" the increase of salaries originally "requested," there will not be a dollar more in the treasury of Symphony Hall to meet it. There are players in the orchestra who will not believe that the trustees have no money for larger salaries and little or no prospect of increased income. With men who hug a delusion so far at odds with ascertainable fact it is useless to argue. They are mere tools with which intriguers play at will.

These intriguers, however, are busy with a deeper game. In their belief, as soon as a considerable part of the orchestra is unionized, the union can and will so harry the present trustees with demands, exactions, increased expenses and descent to lower standards of preparation and performance that the board will be glad to retire and to give place to a new control. That control, of course, will be wholly favorable to the union, ready to grant whatever it asks, amply provided with the necessary means to such expenditure. Who will constitute the new board and whence the great and generous subsidy will come, no one can explicitly say. There are rich women; there is this, that, or the other rich man, minded to be a lavish "patron of music"; there are rumors in the air, and so forth and so onward. Again delusion and the fostering of delusion. It was difficult to constitute a board of trustees to

CLOSING STOCKS
LAST EDITION
PRICE TWO CENTS
BOSTON RECORD
EVENING
ESTABLISHED 1864
BOSTON, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1920
47

SYMPHONY CONCERT MASTER JOINS UNION

Fredric Fradkin Says He Took Step as Matter of Principle—Declares Unionization Will Benefit Orchestra

Frederic Fradkin, concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and one of the most distinguished American musicians, is the latest member of the Symphony to affiliate with the American Federation of Musicians.

Mr. Fradkin, who was the first honor graduate during his attendance at the French National Conservatory and has the distinction of being the only American violinist to win the first unanimous prize and receive a purse of 2000 francs from the French government, in a special interview today said:

"I have never asked the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra officially for thing—I have never been refused anything and am antagonistic to no one. I joined the union as a matter of principle. I have no intention of going elsewhere. I have been very happy here and personally have been fairly treated by the trustees.

Unionising Will Benefit Orchestra

"However, I could not sit in my chair and know that the men behind me are not getting enough salary to buy the things they need to live properly. I believe that it is to the benefit, individually and collectively, of the members of the orchestra as well as of the trustees to have the orchestra unionised. It will produce a better comradship and morale.

"Conservative people believe that the unionising of the orchestra will tend to take away from its high artistic standard. But I firmly believe that the existence of union affiliations among the members will in no way interfere with the artistic standards. It is not an antagonistic movement against the trustees. It is simply a movement for existence.

"The best musicians in America exclusive of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are union musicians and it has never been found that their union affiliations interfere with their artistic standards.

"In France every famous conductor belongs to the French Syndicate of Musicians.

Appreciates Higginson's Stand

"It is not possible today to pick up first-class musicians on every corner in Europe. Many of the most famous musicians were killed in the war and the choice is very limited. You can't take 15 men out of the orchestra and not harm it materially.

"I can understand Maj. Higginson 30 years ago going to Europe to obtain musicians, but there is a wealth of material in America now. I am sure that if we looked around seriously we'd get a high standard of choice to fill our vacant places.

"I think that with the orchestra unionized that a larger scope in obtaining material for orchestra will be possible within union circles."

Leader of Orchestra Joins A.F. of L.

Official announcement that F. Fradkin, world-renowned virtuso and concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had joined the American Federation of Musicians caused a sensation today in musical and social circles here.

Fradkin, one of the highest paid artists in the musical world, was haled as "The Idol of the Symphony" by his colleagues folowing his declaration. He paid his $25 initial dues to a director of the union folowing a rehearsal of the Symphony.

He was cheered and congratulated by the artists. The announcement of his decision spread like wild fire in the Back Bay. To say it caused a sensation is putting it mildly.

Fradkin's move was the signal for others to do likewise. As a result the offices of Local No. 9, A. F. of M., were flooded with resuests and, according to Carl Gardner, member of the orchestra, and a member of the publicity committee, there remained but a very few men who were not in the union.

Mr. Gardener wanted it made clear, however, that the talk of the artists quitting was absolutely unjustified and without foundation. He said, "The boys won't quit, that's official."

Veterans Unionize

The report that it was the younger element in the orchestra that was stirring up the union activities was denied by both Mr. Gardner and Mr. Langley of the orchestra. They pointed out that such famous players as Bedetti, 'cello; Kunze, bass; Heim, trumpet; Roth, violin; Theodorowicz, assistant concert master; Traupe, violinist; Schroeder, 'cello, all first-chair men, and men who have been with the organization many years, are now members of the union.

A meeting was held late Wednesday afternoon and it was reported by officials of the union today that all but 10 members of the orchestra have now become affiliated with the union.

To Remain Union Men

It is stated on authority that the men have no intention of severing their connection with the Boston local.

One of the directors today pointed out that members of the orchestra whose contracts are about to expire will notify the orchestra trustees of their intention to remain union members in good standing.

In answer to Judge Cabot's reply it was intimated that the local will soon be ready to act as representative of the men in their demand for the increase in salary.

It was plainly intimated by a number of the musicians that if they were forced against a stone wall that they would reveal some sensational developments within the management of the orchestra.

Will Stand With Men

It was reported unofficially today that Pierre Monteux, the conductor, was going to stand with the men. He is expected to issue a statement later, stating his position. It is awaited with much interest. Many of the conductor's close friends have joined the union. Other members feel that this is very significant.

SYMPHONY PLAYERS UNIONIZE

The Symphony Orchestra

Herald Feb 27

The statement made by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is straightforward and reassurring. It should put an end to gossip about the present condition and the future of the orchestra. Erroneous statements have been published; there has been much idle chatter. Malicious reports have been circulated in other cities by those who, for selfish reasons, would welcome the downfall of our orchestra. Nor is the German propaganda at an end. There are some who cannot endure the thought of anyone but a German as conductor.

The trustees show irrefutably that the stories about the inadequate pay of the members have been extravagant and in some instances false. They have stated their side of the case calmly; they have contented themselves with showing the facts. And facts are stubborn things. The trustees have made no attempt at intimidation: they say to the few restless members: "If you are not satisfied, the door is open. Others, capable musicians, will be knocking for admission."

It is not surprising in these days of general discontent that a few of the younger men in the orchestra should make trouble; men who have served only a short time and are not ranked with the indispensable members. They have found relief in excited talk; they, perhaps, have been taken seriously by some, always ready to entertain gossip; by others, who were wholly unacquainted with the truth of the situation. Members that needlessly stir up strife are not wanted. If they should leave at the expiration of their contracts, their contracts would not be renewed.

The trustees begin by saying: "In any event, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be carried on and its great qualities maintained." That is enough. The character of the trustees is such that these words will not be misunderstood. The orchestra was never musically in a more enviable position than it is today. Its standard and its proficiency were never higher. It has for a conductor a man of great ability as a drill master; a musician of fine and catholic taste; a poetic interpreter of classic, modern and ultra-modern compositions. It is for the people of Boston to support gladly this orchestra, which has for years, is now, and will be, a source of civic pride. Nor will any demands made for this support be unreasonable, or burdensome.

Collapsing Roofs

SYMPHONY MAY REORGANIZE AS NEW ORCHESTRA

Union Members Say That Wealthy Boston Men Will Back Them, if Needed

Herald Feb 27

CLAIM 90 P. C. OF ARTISTS JOINED

A reorganization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under a new management, with at least 90 per cent. of the present players, may follow any attempt by the trustees either to disband the orchestra or to withhold recognition of the union of the players.

This determination upon the part of the players was made clear in a statement issued yesterday for the players' committee of seven by Carl E. Gardner, publicity manager. This committee was appointed by the players and the officers of the local union of musicians to handle all negotiations for the players in the present controversy.

The contracts of a majority of the

(Continued on Page Eighteen, Column 7.)

SYMPHONY MAY BE REORGANIZED

(Continued from Page One)

musicians continue in force until July, although the management and the men have the mutual privilege of breaking the contracts before their expiration on forfeiture of $200. If the trustees refuse to do business with the committee of the players as an organization it is doubtful whether the union players will continue to keep their contracts until they expire. They intimate that they would forfeit the $200 involved and sign up under a new management.

Pierre Monteux, the present conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, according to members of the players' committee, is in sympathy with the present unionization movement. He is said to have expressed his approbation to one of the prominent players.

Frederick Fradkin, concert-master, joined the union yesterday. He is one of the highest paid concert-masters in America. He was first honor graduate during his attendance at the French National Conservatory, and is the only American violinist to win the first unanimous prize and receive a purse of 2000 francs fro mthe French government.

Union affiliation, according to Mr. Fradkin, will not interfere in any way with the artistic standards of the orchestra, and would widen the field from which to select really high-class performers. He characterized the present union movement as one for existence, and declared that he could not sit in his chair and know that the men behind him were not receiving enough salary to buy the things they

INFORMATION OBSCURED

UNION OF SYMPHONY PLAYERS ULTIMATUM TO TRUSTEES SERVED

Apply for Membership

Among other leading artists of the orchestra who have filed applications for membership in the union are Gustave Heim, first trumpet; Julius Theodorowicz, assistant concert-master; Frederick Denayer, first viola; Jean Bedetti, first cellist; Georges Laurent, first flute; Max Kunze, first bass, and Albert Sand, first clarionet.

According to a statement given out by the committee of seven yesterday, all players in the percussion section are in the union and the entire first violin section; also all second violins, except three; all violas, except one; all cellists, except one; all basses, except one, and all trombonists, except one, and virtually all first chairmen are enroled.

Mr. Gardner said unionization means the saving of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its present management. "There is little to hold the men, under present conditions," he explained. "The present wage is insufficient for the players, and the fact of their having been non-union men has been a preventive to their receiving outside work, union men being almost universally demanded.

Changes Injure Team Work

"As a result men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union, and this year there would be a greater number leave. Under such a system it is impossible to maintain the standard to which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been raised. The constant change in the membership of the orchestra, regardless of how artistic the individual player, is a damper to proper team work, with a resultant loss of efficiency.

"Judge Cabot claimed a year ago that his only opposition to the unionization of the orchestra was that the union prohibited the bringing of men from Europe for the orchestra. That objection is void now. For the immigration laws of the country take care of this objection, since they forbid the bringing into this country of contract labor. Thus Mr. Cabot's one objection has been removed and he should now have no objection to the union.

"As to the proposal that present members of the union continue the orchestra under a new management, as a union orchestra, I want to say that there is backing for these men, despite Judge Cabot's denial of this. There are numerous wealthy and prominent citizens of Boston who have offered aid, if it is needed."

union because he believed that only through union affiliation could the present standard of the Boston Symphony Orchestra be maintained, as it would be a benefit to the men and the directors and promote morale among the men. He said that through the union affiliation, the field would be widened from which to secure good musicians, and in France, every big conductor belongs to the French Syndicate of Musicians.

Some Who Have Signed

Among the artists to sign are Gustave Heim, first trumpet; Julius Theodorowicz, assistant concert master; Frederick Denayer, first violin; Jean Redetti, first 'cellist; Georges Laurent, first flute; Max Kunze, first bass; Albert Sand, first clarinet.

Mr Gardner says all players in the percussion section as well as the entire first violin section are now members of the union. The other sections have been unionized with the following exceptions: Three in the second violins, one viola, one 'cellist, one bass and one trombonist.

"The musicians in the Boston Symphony Orchestra affiliating with the union is the only thing that will hold this organization together," said Mr Gardner, "as they have not received a sufficient salary from the orchestra, and, being nonunion men, could get but very little work on the outside, as the universal demand for this work is for union musicians.

Promised Ample Backing

"Men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union, and this year there would be a greater number leave. Under such a system it is impossible to maintain the standard to which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been raised. The constant change in membership of the orchestra, regardless of how artistic the individual player, is a damper to proper team work, with a resultant loss of efficiency.

"At the present time the trustees have assumed a most autocratic attitude towards the men and the men have become practically serfs. If men were to leave the orchestra now, the trustees would be able to substitute only students and mediocre musicians.

"Judge Cabot said a year ago that his only opposition to the unionization of the orchestra was that the union prohibited the bringing of men from Europe. That objection is void now, for the immigration laws of the country take care of this objection. Judge Cabot should now have no objection to the union.

"In regard to getting back for continuing under a new management, as a union orchestra, I want to say that there is ample backing in spite of Judge Cabot's denial. There are numerous wealthy and prominent citizens of Boston who have offered aid in the event it is needed."

The Detroit manager, who has had wide experience in managing famous musical organizations said:—

"I'm not here to solicit Boston's talent. If the men desire to come to the Detroit organization we are only too proud and too glad to have them. Eleven of the Boston players have voluntarily applied for admission to the Detroit orchestra. We can use them. They include some of the best artists in the Boston outfit. They could easily be termed some of Boston's favorites.

"No, Fradkin is not among them. Incidentally, I pay Fradkin a tribute for his action in joining the Musicians' Union. It was splendid. It showed a remarkable spirit.

"Our minimum wage is $50 a week. No member of the organization receives less. Every man is a member of the union. Our orchestra is prosperous, of course. We have little trouble with the men. "Joe" Webber, president of the American Federation of Musicians, has always been a fair-minded and reasonable man to do business with.

"I can't understand why the Boston management has taken such a decided stand. We have no difficulty because of the men's union affiliations. On the other hand, I can truthfully state that they do better work.

"I have talked with the men who desire to join the Detroit orchestra. I have the contracts with me. All I need is their signature. I simply want to await developments and unless some action is taken by Monday I will complete the deal and take the artists with me to Detroit.

"Of course, $35 a week for men in this particular line of work is impossible. I was surprised that any of the men were receiving such a wage."

Boston Record
Feb 27, '20

BOSTON MAY LOSE ARTISTS OF SYMPHONY

Arrival Here of Manager from Detroit Causes Sensation

The arrival of F. Sturm, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, in Boston today, caused a sensation in social and music circles when it was reported he was here to negotiate with some of the famous artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Detroit organization is acknowledged to be the finest Symphony Orchestra in this country. The appearance of Manager Strum has caused no end of comment. He is stopping at the Hotel Westminster. Those acquainted with all angles of the orchestra's affairs declare that it means but one thing—Boston will lose some of its famous artists unless something is done immediately.

Surprised at the disclosures concerning salaries paid to some of the Symphony Orchestra artists, together with other rather sensational features which have developed during the past few hours, in the fight betyeen the players and the management, prominent Back Bay society leaders and many other old-time patrons of the Symphony concerts today pledged themselves to do what they could to bring about better conditions.

May Sever Connections

Carl Gardner, one of the Symphony player and a member of the publicity committee, stated that unless the demands of the artists were met the players would sever their connections with the organization, form a new orchestra under the same name, and continue their concert work.

It was stated that such a move would have the whole-hearted support of the present patrons.

In the meantime the fight continues to grow more interesting every hour. The move of F. Fradkin, the noted virtuoso, in joining the union, has caused much comment in musical and social circles. Many of the patrons feel that if Fradkin, one of the highest-paid artists in the country, took such a step, jeopardizing his own position, something must be radically wrong somewhere.

THREATEN TO FORM NEW SYMPHONY BAND

Orchestra Players Said to Be 90 Percent Unionized

Feb 27 1920

Ample Money Backing Declared Assured to Proposed Venture

The affiliation of the musicians in the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the American Federation of Musicians will be recognized by the directors, or the players will form a new orchestra under a new management, retaining the present name, according to Carl S. Gardner, publicity man of the union members of the orchestra.

The present orchestra is now claimed

Continued on the Sixth Page.

THREATEN TO FORM A NEW SYMPHONY BAND

Continued From the First Page.

to be practically 90 percent organized, with the leaders of sections and soloists members of the union. The musicians say they have assurance of unlimited financial backing and that the present organization, with few minor exceptions, will ocntinue to furnish entertainment to music lovers.

The majority of the contracts under which the players are now working will expire in July, and Mr Gardner said yesterday that the demands of the union men will be granted or renewals of the contracts will be refused and the men will join the proposed new organization. It is possible that wholesale resignations will follow the refusal of the directors to do business with the union. The present contracts provide for breaking the contract on the payment of $200.

Advised by Monteux to Join

Mr Gardner says that Pierre Monteux, director of the orchestra, told the men after being told that Fredric Fradkin, concert master, had joined the union, that he believed the men should affiliate and was in favor of their joining the union. Mr Gardner says that out of a membership of 95 musicians, 20 have not filled out their application blanks, but 10 of these have said they would.

Fredric Fradkin the concert master, signed the membership blank yesterday and paid his initiation fee. It is said he was one of the highest salaried concert masters in the country. He was the first honor graduate from the French National Conservatory and is the only American violinist to win the first prize and receive a purse from the French Gov-

Orchestra Is Now 100 Per Cent. Organized

A climax in the dispute of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who seek salary increases and which have been refused by the trustees, was reached this afternoon when the committee representing the musicians served notice on the trustees that the organization is nearly 100 p.c. unionized.

The committee requested that the trustees at once enter into conference with the officers representing the muscians in an effort to reach an agreement.

The notice was served on the trustees soon after it was learned that Julius Strum, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, was in this city and has offered handsome contracts to all of the leading members of the Boston Orchestra. This fact was first revealed by The Record.

Detroit Leader Here

In its letter to the trustees stating their grievances, the musicians state that while a general increase in salary of $100 p.c. is not expected, "we beg leave to state that any increase less than $1000 would be futile and unjust."

The men ask that every contract held or renewed by the members of the orchestra who have joined the union be increased by $1000, beginning with the season 1920-21.

The manager of the Detroit Orches-

(Continued on Page Four, Column Five)

Traveler Feb 87

DETROIT AFTER ARTISTS FROM HUB ORCHESTRA

Players in the Boston Symphony orchestra are underpaid, in the opinion of F. Sturm, manager of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, one of the finest in this country, who is there negotiating with some of the Boston musicians.

Manager Sturm declared that his orchestra is unionized, and said he had never had any trouble with his players. In fact, he said, unionization had led to a smoother relationship between the management and the players. He said it is the policy of the American Federation of Musicians, with which his players are identified, to do everything in its power to make the orchestra better.

Mr. Sturm said he was not here to take the Boston Symphony players away, but those acquainted with all angles of the orchestra's affairs declare his visit means that the city will lose some of its famous artists unless action is taken immediately.

Mr. Sturm has been in Boston since Wednesday night and planned to return to Detroit late today. His arrival here created a sensation in musical circles and has caused no end of comment.

He told a Traveler reporter who saw him at the Westminster today he believes the attitude of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra is an injustice to the men. "I think the trustees ought to see the men's side of the case," he said.

"They ought not let any personal prejudices stand in the way," he continued. "It is perfectly natural for the men to want to be certain they will be well taken care of.

"I want it understood that I am not here to solicit men, but I am negotiating with hehbers of the Boston Symphony, who wrote to me before this agitation. Gabrilowitch, our director, would not stand for such soliciting. If members of the Boston Symphony now in the union were separated from the orchestra because ofthat fact, the trustees would find it impossible to get together a non-union orchestra of any standing."

Mr. Strum said men cannot be imported now of the calibre of the members of the Boston organization. Members of the Boston orchestra would find it impossible to compete with the present group if they were to leave the orchestra and continue to play under other backing in this city," he said.

"A community like Boston ought not let an organization of the type of the Symphony Orchestra, as now composed, get away," Mr. Sturm stated.

He said public-spirited men today are beginning to feel the necessity of having such an orchestra in their communities.

Mr. Sturm said players in the Detroit Symphony Orchestra are much better paiad than those of the Boston group. He said the lowest paid player in the Detroit Symphony earned $50 a week. The average in Boston is said to be about $35. Mr. Sturm said he could use 20 men in his orchestra at present.

It was learned today that Joseph M. Webber, national president of the American Federation of Musicians, had sent notices to every musicions' local in the country, covering a total membership of 90,000, warning all union musicians to keep away from Boston until the Symphony case is settled.

RHODE ISLAND REDS

Transcript Feb

New Gusts in the Squall

Years ago when high schools stud what was then called "civil governmen the teacher was questioning his class' abo the powers and duties of the Presiden Cabinet. "What," he asked one of t boys, "are the functions of the Secreta of the Interior?" The youth, who h barely glanced at the lesson, answer glibly that they were many and vario "Name one," suggested the teacher gent but the pupil answered not a word. P cisely the same question seems in orc to the unionized players of the Sympho Orchestra when their spokesman asse that "rich and prominent men " are rea to establish and maintain them as a re ganized band to the tune, say, of $200, or more a year. In all probability, ag there would be no answer; for it is not custom of these fiery souls, the chief whom must usually release his arc upon the snare-drum, to descend to a of particulars. Rather they set high heaven of "publicity" beyond their fondest dreams, drafting "statements" about "serfs and serfdom," decreeing the future, as though they held it in the hollow of their hands, exhilarated—to use a mild word—even in these dry days by a sense of importance they have never known and are likely never to know again. Perhaps they are proving the "Americanism" about which they say so much, by their zest for the game of bluff. It is best to leave them to these sports and pastimes. Somehow actualities usually adjust and determine such controversies as that between the trustees and the members of the Symphony Orchestra.

For the hour these actualities are a disposition on the part of the trustees to let the leaven of their recent statement of facts and policies work in the minds of the public and the players, and to await with patience and composure the next step of the aggrieved musicians. The musicians, in their turn, are making speed to join the union. They seem to be doing so for three reasons. If, by any chance, they lose their present jobs, it will be easier for them, unionized, to seek and gain others. If they remain in the Symphony Orchestra, they will have more opportunity, as members of the union, for lucrative work in free hours. Most of them, also, have persuaded themselves that somehow the union can gain them the increase of salary for which they originally asked, and which the trustees lack the means to grant in any considerable measure. Just how the union is to add the necessary income to the revenues of the orchestra does not appear. Rather the players' notion seems to be that the union can goad the trustees into an appeal to the public for additional subsidies or into resignation. Then, in the players' view, will succeed a new régime able and willing to bestow all they ask. Just how it is to be constituted, just where it is to find the money, again fails to appear. At the least, if the trustees should resent a unionized orchestra, there would be more opportunity for public strife, and to continue the controversy—if possible, with new heat—is now the breath of life to those who were eagerest to provoke it and are eagerest to prolong it in blind resentment or frank self-seeking. The mere observer notes with interest that the most zealous in these matters are various musicians brought into the band to save it, in the days of war-time hysteria, from the German influences "sapping its morale."

Mr. Carpenter's Ballet

Trans. Feb 2?

THE SYMPHONY AND THE UNIO

With increasing emphasis, as the day have passed, certain members of the Symphony Orchestra have endeavored to mak unionization appear a chief issue of the present campaign for larger salaries. Th matter was not at first brought forwar in this connection, but since it has bee thus introduced, and coupled with an at tempt, on the part of some agitating lead ers, to picture the trustees to the publi as a group of gentlemen benighted in au tocracy, it may be well that certain cardi nal truths of the case, already set out i other columns of this paper, should b reiterated.

The first point worth full public un derstanding is that affiliation of mem bers of the band with a union, even a national union, of and for their own purposes of organization, has no need to be regarded as the present casus belli. On the contrary, the president of the board of trustees, speaking for his part more than a year ago to national officers of the union, eliminated this from dispute. Upon certain conditions he welcomed the union. The conditions—being simply those of the freedom of the management to secure the best players obtainable, no matter where found, and to maintain the orchestra at the highest possible standard of artistic excellence—appealed at the time to the union's representatives, according to their own professions, no less strongly than they appeal and must always appeal to the public. The national officers returned to Chicago, saying that they would arrange for observance of these conditions. So far so good. But a change was to come. When next the delegates appeared in Boston, the position they took was that preservation of the management's freedom to maintain the best possible orchestra would require alterations in their rules which they did not propose to make.

Then and there the only real grounds of difference developed. They are grounds concerning which, in the high realm of standards where a symphony orchestra must either dwell or suffer material as well as artistic decline, there can be no concession or compromise. And, oddly enough, compromise of them would wreak its heaviest vengeance upon the players themselves. At a time when it is precisely a greater public interest and a further access of professional prestige which the orchestra needs if it is to be able to pay its men such betterments of salary as are within reason, to ask a diminution of standards which could only chill the public's interest and decrease the orchestra's resources, is a counsel of the most evident folly for all concerned.

The band being convinced that "founders and sustainers" of orchestras grow on every bush, the police will now please rope off the crowd of eager donors fighting to give the proposed organization another Symphony Hall, an additional pension fund and a world-wide reputation concocted over night.

The situation reached an acute stage yesterday when several of the organization were said to have been invited to accept better paying positions with musical organizations in other parts of the country. Julius Strum, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, was here yesterday and is said to have offered handsome contracts to some players.

While he said he was not here to solicit men to go to Detroit, he frankly stated that Detroit would gladly welcome the Boston men. It is stated that 11 Boston Symphony men have applied for admission to the Detroit orchestra.

"Our minimum wage is $50 a week," said Mr Strum, "and I don't understand why the Boston management has taken such a decided stand. We have no difficulty because of the men's union affiliations. On the other hand, I can truthfully state that they do better work.

"I have talked with the men who desire to join the Detroit orchestra and all I need is their signatures to the contracts. I simply want to await developments, and unless some action is taken by Monday, I will complete the deal and take the artists with me to Detroit."

Bids for Players Reported

William G. Dodge, delegated to take charge of the Boston situation, stated that directors of symphony orchestras from all sections of the country have either come here or communicated with leaders of the union about getting musicians. It was reported that of the 20 members not in the union, five had joined yesterday, among them being Arthur Brook, flutist, and G. Mager, trumpeter.

Pierre Monteux, conductor, denied last night the statement that he favored the members of the orchestra forming a union, claiming he had never said anything of such a nature.

Statement to the Trustees

In the statement sent yesterday to the trustees by the committee of seven, H. Ringwall, chairman, L. M. Kurkdjie, Gustave Heim, Carl S. Gardner, Otto Roth, W. Traupe and Florian Wittman, it is pointed out that in joining the union the players had adopted the only means of remedying conditions which were no longer tolerable; that they have held aloof, being members of the only important musical organization that had not joined the union, and thus lost many Summer engagements.

The committee says that any increase less than $1000 a year will be futile and unjust, and requests that all contracts held or renewed be increased by that amount beginning with the season of 1920-21. The committee continues:

"As it is not our intention to interfere with the management of this orchesetra, we will quite properly leave to the trustees the devising of methods of augmenting revenue to meet this proposed increase in salaries. But we urge that no additional concerts (over and above the average of the past) be given to defray this added expense for as our request for an increase of $1000 is solely to offset the admitted present depreciation of the value of the dollar, we believe that the expense should be borne by the public."

PRESIDENT NAMES

Globe Feb 29

IF WE WOULD DANCE

MR JULIUS STRUM, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, is in town, and he had with him a number of documents of great interest to Boston music lovers. If signed, these documents will become contracts, and will remove from the "Athens of America" a dozen of the best artists of our own orchestra. Apparently it is not too late for Boston to make its money speak, but there is no time to lose. If Boston is to hold its present position in music Boston must make up its mind to pay the violinist.

In this competitive world a hard-earned reputation for excellence in art is hard to earn, and when earned difficult to keep. There are reasons for the belief that Boston is dangerously dependent on her past.

Painters, like other mortals, sell their pictures to the highest bidder. That is why an increasing number of the most important works of living American artists have gone to Pittsburg, Buffalo, Cleveland or Chicago, instead of finding wall space in a Boston gallery.

There have been times when the custodians of learning at Cambridge have had a chill because some representative of a great fresh-water university, perhaps a State affair, has been seen in the vicinity of Harvard sq. Only recently Michigan—the name is associated with copper mines, inexpensive furniture, and all kinds of motor cars—signed up one of our most eminent medical men.

At this rate the time may come when the pictures by Copley and Stuart which hang in dwellings inhabited by our first families will be shipped West.

The sad truth is that we cannot even keep ball players unless we are willing to keep pace with the bidding.

Gardner predicted that [illegible] of the ninety-five players in the orchestra will quit at the end of the present season if their membership in the union is interfered with or if they do not get higher salaries and better working conditions.

HINT MEN MAY RESIGN.

"This is not a threat," he added. "It is merely a statement of what will happen at the end of the present season if the things we ask are not complied with. The board of trustees has been autocratic. There is much discontent among the players. Between 75 and 84 of the 95 members have already joined the union."

Mr. Gardner declared that "It is ridiculous to say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not give such artistic performances if its members are union players. We will give better performances, because we will be more contented. The argument that we will give inferior concerts because we join a union is ridiculous."

In a letter to the trustees, sent to Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board, the players' committee declares that the majority of the orchestra members have joined the union and insist upon better working conditions and higher wages. The committee requests that "contracts existing between individual members of the Association * * * be so reformed as to enable the members to comply with the duties and obligations fixed by the by-laws of the American Federation of Musicians and the principles for which the latter organization stands."

OPPOSE DISRUPTION.

Touching on the discord in the orchestra the communication reads: "The perfection of any organization depends as much upon the material condition of its members as it does upon their skill and proficiency. There can be no approach to the goal of perfection where there exists discontent and disaffection."

Another section reads: "We wish to assure the trustees and those who are interested in the welfare of the orchestra that our course was prompted as much by a desire to maintain a high standard in the orchestra, to encourage music as an art in the United States, as it was to improve our own condition."

Those who comprised the committee are: Chairman, H. Ringwall, No. 20 Queensbury street; L. H. Kurkdjie, No. 333 Massachusetts avenue; Gustav F. Heim, No. 81 Orchard street, Jamaica Plain; Otto Roth, No. 10 Arlington stret, W. Traupe, No. 47 Paul Gore street, Jamaica Plain; Florian Wittman, No. 11 Tetlow street Roxbury, and Ernest E. Gardned, No. 61 Court street.

ON HERALD

SYMPHONY MAY LOSE PLAYERS

Trustees Hear New York and Detroit Managers Offer More Pay

UNION HEADS ADVISE MEN TO STAY HERE

The presence of musical managers from Detroit and New York, said to be here with higher wage offers to dissatisfied Boston Symphony players, last night caused fears for the integrity of the organization founded by Maj. Higginson and made famous under the baton of noted conductors. F. Sturm, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, is already on the ground.

In consequence of this development, the orchestral committee of seven, chosen by the players, and the executives of the local unions of the American Federation of Musicians, yesterday urged the players to refuse all inducements to sever their relations with the orchestra—which it is hoped to keep a Boston institution—until all possible efforts have been made and have failed.

Other Places Want Them

Other cities are reported to be desirous of securing Boston's Symphony players. These include Syracuse, N. Y., where George Eastman, the "mysterious Mr. Smith" of Technology fame, has donated $1,500,000 for the organization of a new Syracuse symphony orchestra.

The main hope of the players and of the committee of seven is the well known loyalty of the men to the Boston institution, together with the warning sent out by President Joseph N. Webber of the federation, at the instance of the executives of the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, for all union musicians to keep away from Boston and especially from the Symphony management, until the present difference has been adjusted.

The committee of seven yesterday sent a letter, through the local union, to the trustees, asking for a conference. This is in the nature of a reply to the paper recently read to the players by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, to the effect that an average increase of 30 per cent. had been granted to them since 1914. A reiteration of the players' demand for a flat increase of $1000 a year for all members of the orchestra is attached to the letter.

According to Carl S. [illegible] committee of seven, that body has received assurances from a responsible source that there is a bare possibility of city or state taking over the orchestra to maintain it as a Boston institution if an agreement is not reached.

It was recalled yesterday that during the war, when Dr. Karl Muck, then conductor, was under surveillance by United States secret service agents, members of the orchestra were assured by a prominent official at Washington that "the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be kept intact by the United States government itself" rather than permit its disintegration.

Five new applications for membership in the union were filed yesterday by Symphony players, including Arthur Brook, flute, and G. Mager, trumpet.

Sturmn Will Return

Manager Sturmn of the Detroit orchestra expressed surprise yesterday when told of the salaries paid to the Boston men. These he declared to be impossible and far below those paid to symphony players in other cities. He was induced by the local union executives to forebear urging players to leave the Boston Symphony Orchestra at this time, but he served notice that he is likely to return within a couple of weeks if the situation has not cleared, as he feared that managers from other cities might get an advantage over him. It was learned by Mr. Gardner that one member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, not considered equal to the majority of the players, now receiving $40 a week, had been offered $75 by the Detroit manager.

Captain Johnson and his crew

Post Feb 88

DEMAND ON SYMPHONY TRUSTEES

Union Asks Flat Raise of $1000 for Each Player

The committee of seven of Boston Musicians' Union yesterday sent a communication to the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in which it refutes recent statements made by Judge Cabot of the board and demands a conference and a flat increase of $1000 for each player in the orchestra.

The request for a conference with the board of trustees and for the wage increase are reiterations of former demands.

MONTEUX OPPOSES MOVE

Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the orchestra, yesterday said he has never supported the players who have in their agitation for higher wages threatened to break from the orchestra. He says that from the beginning he has had no part in the dispute and that he has personally disapproved the course adopted by the men.

F. Sturm, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, was in Boston yesterday to secure players for Detroit. He said he has places for 20 musicians in his orchestra. None of the members of the Boston orchestra signed with the Detroit, preferring, they said, to await developments in the present situation.

Warning From Weber

Warning was sent out yesterday by Joseph N. Weber, international president of the American Federation of Musicians, urging all musicians to keep away from Boston and not to deal with the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, until the present controversy is adjusted.

Five more members of the local orchestra were said last night to have applied for admission into the local musicians' union. Among them are said to be Arthur Brooke, flutist and G. Mager, trumpet. William G. Dodge of the local union has been delegated by President Weber to assume charge of the union's part in the present controversy.

Trustees Query Fradkin

The trustees have apparently not receded from their attitude as defined in the recent statement by Judge Cabot of the board of trustes.

The determined opposition to unionism on the part of the board may be seen by its having called Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, yesterday afternoon to make clear his attitude on the subject of the musicians' union.

Globe Feb 28

OUTSIDERS AFTER SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Reported by Leader of the Unionized Musicians

Committee Writes to Trustees Asking for a Conference

With a large majority of Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians unionized, a committee of the organization yesterday sent to the trustees a communication stating that they had formed an organization to be known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members Association, had affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians and requested that the trustees appoint a time and place for a conference upon differences.

American Feb 28

SYMPHONY MEN MAY RESIGN

Warn Trustees Disruption of Band Will Follow Failure to Grant Increase

Members of Boston Symphony Orchestra have thrown down the gauntlet to the trustees, threatening disruption of the famous organization if higher wages and better working conditions under union rules are not forthcoming.

"We joined the union," said Ernest E. Gardner, one of the players' committee of seven that served the ultimatum on the trustees, "because we wish to be free men. We intend to be serfs no longer."

In this supplementary statement to a Boston American reporter Mr.

FEBRUARY 28, 1920

From Times 14 [illegible] H

New York City

WITH THE ORCHESTRAS.

Godowsky will play Liszt's A major concerto with the Philharmonic today. The program includes Brahms's Second Symphony, Sibelius's "Pinalndia," and, after the solo number, Grieg's "Peer Gynt."

The Symphony Society will give an all-Wagner program today at Aeol[illegible]

Traveler Feb 8 20

DETROIT AFTER ARTISTS FROM HUB ORCHESTRA

Players in the Boston Symphony orchestra are underpaid, in the opinion of F. Sturm, manager of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, one of the finest in this country, who is here negotiating with some of the Boston musicians.

Manager Sturm declared that his orchestra is unionized, and said he had never had any trouble with his players. In fact, he said, unionization had led to a smoother relationship between the management and the players. He said it is the policy of the American Federation of Musicians, with which his players are identified, to do everything in its power to make the orchestra better.

Mr. Sturm said he was not here to take the Boston Symphony players away, but those acquainted with all angles of the orchestra's affairs declare his visit means that the city will lose some of its famous artists unless action is taken immediately.

Mr. Sturm has been in Boston since Wednesday night and planned to return to Detroit late today. His arrival here created a sensation in musical circles and has caused no end of comment.

He told a Traveler reporter who saw him at the Westminster today he believes the attitude of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra is an injustice to the men. "I think the trustees ought to see the men's side of the case," he said.

"They ought not let any personal prejudices stand in the way," he continued. "It is perfectly natural for the men to want to be certain they will be well taken care of.

"I want it understood that I am not here to solicit men, but I am negotiating with hehbers of the Boston Symphony, who wrote to me before this agitation. Gabrilowitch, our director, would not stand for such soliciting. If members of the Boston Symphony now in the union were separated from the orchestra because ofthat fact, the trustees would find it impossible to get together a non-union orchestra of any standing."

Mr. Strum said men cannot be imported now of the calibre of the members of the Boston organization. Members of the Boston orchestra would find it impossible to compete with the present group if they were to leave the orchestra and continue to play under other backing in this city," he said.

"A community like Boston ought not let an organization of the type of the Symphony Orchestra, as now composed, get away," Mr. Sturm stated.

He said public-spirited men today are beginning to feel the necessity of having such an orchestra in their communities.

Mr. Sturm said players in the Detroit Symphony Orchestra are much better paiad than those of the Boston group. He said the lowest paid player in the Detroit Symphony earned $50 a week. The average in Boston is said to be about $35. Mr. Sturm said he could use 20 men in his orchestra at present.

It was learned today that Joseph M. Webber, national president of the American Federation of Musicians, had sent notices to every musicions' local in the country, covering a total membership of 90,000, warning all union musicians to keep away from Boston until the Symphony case is settled.

RHODE ISLAND REDS

Transcript Feb

New Gusts in the Squall

Years ago when high schools stud what was then called "civil governmen the teacher was questioning his class abo the powers and duties of the Presiden Cabinet. "What," he asked one of t boys, "are the functions of the Secreta of the Interior?" The youth, who h barely glanced at the lesson, answer glibly that they were many and vario "Name one," suggested the teacher gent but the pupil answered not a word. P cisely the same question seems in or to the unionized players of the Sympho orchestra when their spokesman asse that 'rich and prominent men " are rea to establish and maintain them as a re ganized band to the tune, say, of $200, or more a year. In all probability, ag there would be no answer; for it is not custom of these fiery souls, the chief whom must usually release his arc upon the snare-drum, to descend to a of particulars. Rather they set high i heaven of "publicity" beyond their fondest dreams, drafting "statements" about "serfs and serfdom," decreeing the future, as though they held it in the hollow of their hands, exhilarated--to use a mild word--even in these dry days by a sense of importance they have never known and are likely never to know again. Perhaps they are proving the "Americanism" about which they say so much, by their zest for the game of bluff. It is best to leave them to these sports and pastimes. Somehow actualities usually adjust and determine such controversies as that between the trustees and the members of the Symphony Orchestra.

For the hour these actualities are a disposition on the part of the trustees to let the leaven of their recent statement of facts and policies work in the minds of the public and the players, and to await with patience and composure the next step of the aggrieved musicians. The musicians, in their turn, are making speed to join the union. They seem to be doing so for three reasons. If, by any chance, they lose their present jobs, it will be easier for them, unionized, to seek and gain others. If they remain in the Symphony Orchestra, they will have more opportunity, as members of the union, for lucrative work in free hours. Most of them, also, have persuaded themselves that somehow the union can gain them the increase of salary for which they originally asked, and which the trustees lack the means to grant in any considerable measure. Just how the union is to add the necessary income to the revenues of the orchestra does not appear. Rather, the players' notion seems to be that the union can goad the trustees into an appeal to the public for additional subsidies or into resignation. Then, in the players' view, will succeed a new régime able and willing to bestow all they ask. Just how it is to be constituted, just where it is to find the money, again fails to appear. At the least, if the trustees should resent a unionized orchestra, there would be more opportunity for public strife, and to continue the controversy—if possible, with new heat—is now the breath of life to those who were eagerest to provoke it and are eagerest to prolong it in blind resentment or frank self-seeking. The mere observer notes with interest that the most zealous in these matters are various musicians brought into the band to save it, in the days of war-time hysteria, from the German influences "sapping its morale."

Mr. Carpenter's Ballet

Trans. Feb 27

THE SYMPHONY AND THE UNIO

With increasing emphasis, as the day have passed, certain members of the Symphony Orchestra have endeavored to mak unionization appear a chief issue of the present campaign for larger salaries. Th matter was not at first brought forwar in this connection, but since it has bee thus introduced, and coupled with an at tempt, on the part of some agitating lead ers, to picture the trustees to the publi as a group of gentlemen benighted in au tocracy, it may be well that certain cardi nal truths of the case, already set out i other columns of this paper, should b reiterated.

The first point worth full public un derstanding is that affiliation of mem bers of the band with a union, even a national union, of and for their own purposes of organization, has no need to be regarded as the present casus belli. On the contrary, the president of the board of trustees, speaking for his part more than a year ago to national officers of the union, eliminated this from dispute. Upon certain conditions he welcomed the union. The conditions—being simply those of the freedom of the management to secure the best players obtainable, no matter where found, and to maintain the orchestra at the highest possible standard of artistic excellence—appealed at the time to the union's representatives, according to their own professions, no less strongly than they appeal and must always appeal to the public. The national officers returned to Chicago, saying that they would arrange for observance of these conditions. So far so good. But a change was to come. When next the delegates appeared in Boston, the position they took was that preservation of the management's freedom to maintain the best possible orchestra would require alterations in their rules which they did not propose to make.

Then and there the only real grounds of difference developed. They are grounds concerning which, in the high realm of standards where a symphony orchestra must either dwell or suffer material as well as artistic decline, there can be no concession or compromise. And, oddly enough, compromise of them would wreak its heaviest vengeance upon the players themselves. At a time when it is precisely a greater public interest and a further access of professional prestige which the orchestra needs if it is to be able to pay its men such betterments of salary as are within reason, to ask a diminution of standards which could only chill the public's interest and decrease the orchestra's resources, is a counsel of the most evident folly for all concerned.

The band being convinced that "founders and sustainers" of orchestras grow on every bush, the police will now please rope off the crowd of eager donors fighting to give the proposed organization another Symphony Hall, an additional pension fund and a worldwide reputation concocted over night.

Globe Feb 28

OUTSIDERS AFTER SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Reported by Leader of the Unionized Musicians

Committee Writes to Trustees Asking for a Conference

With a large majority of Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians unionized, a committee of the organization yesterday sent to the trustees a communication stating that they had formed an organization to be known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members Association, had affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians and requested that the trustees appoint a time and place for a conference upon differences.

The situation reached an acute stage yesterday when several of the organization were said to have been invited to accept better paying positions with musical organizations in other parts of the country. Julius Strum, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, was here yesterday and is said to have offered handsome contracts to some players.

While he said he was not here to solicit men to go to Detroit, he frankly stated that Detroit would gladly welcome the Boston men. It is stated that 11 Boston Symphony men have applied for admission to the Detroit orchestra.

"Our minimum wage is $50 a week," said Mr Strum, "and I don't understand why the Boston management has taken such a decided stand. We have no difficulty because of the men's union affiliations. On the other hand, I can truthfully state that they do better work.

"I have talked with the men who desire to join the Detroit orchestra and all I need is their signatures to the contracts. I simply want to await developments, and unless some action is taken by Monday, I will complete the deal and take the artists with me to Detroit."

Bids for Players Reported

William G. Dodge, delegated to take charge of the Boston situation, stated that directors of symphony orchestras from all sections of the country have either come here or communicated with leaders of the union about getting musicians. It was reported that of the 29 members not in the union, five had joined yesterday, among them being Arthur Brook, flutist, and G. Mager, trumpeter.

Pierre Monteux, conductor, denied last night the statement that he favored the members of the orchestra forming a union, claiming he had never said anything of such a nature.

Statement to the Trustees

In the statement sent yesterday to the trustees by the committee of seven, H. Ringwall, chairman, L. M. Kurkdjie, Gustave Heim, Carl S. Gardner, Otto Roth, W. Traupe and Florian Wittman, it is pointed out that in joining the union the players had adopted the only means of remedying conditions which were no longer tolerable; that they have held aloof, being members of the only important musical organization that had not joined the union, and thus lost many Summer engagements.

The committee says that any increase less than $1000 a year will be futile and unjust, and requests that all contracts held or renewed be increased by that amount beginning with the season of 1920-21. The committee continues:

"As it is not our intention to interfere with the management of this orchestra, we will quite properly leave to the trustees the devising of methods of augmenting revenue to meet this proposed increase in salaries. But we urge that no additional concerts (over and above the average of the past) be given to defray this added expense for as our request for an increase of $1000 is solely to offset the admitted present depreciation of the value of the dollar, we believe that the expense should be borne by the public."

Gardner predicted that seventy-five of the ninety-five players in the orchestra will quit at the end of the present season if their membership in the union is interfered with or if they do not get higher salaries and better working conditions.

HINT MEN MAY RESIGN.

"This is not a threat," he added. "It is merely a statement of what will happen at the end of the present season if the things we ask are not complied with. The board of trustees has been autocratic. There is much discontent among the players. Between 75 and 84 of the 95 members have already joined the union."

Mr. Gardner declared that "it is ridiculous to say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not give such artistic performances if its members are union players. We will give better performances, because we will be more contented. The argument that we will give inferior concerts because we join a union is ridiculous."

In a letter to the trustees, sent to Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board, the players' committee declares that the majority of the orchestra members have joined the union and insist upon better working conditions and higher wages. The committee requests that "contracts existing between individual members of the Association * * * be so reformed as to enable the members to comply with the duties and obligations fixed by the by-laws of the American Federation of Musicians and the principles for which the latter organiaztion stands."

OPPOSE DISRUPTION.

Touching on the discord in the orchestra the communication reads: "The perfection of any organization depends as much upon the material condition of its members as it does upon their skill and proficiency. There con be no approach to the goal of perfection where there exists discontent and disaffection."

Another section reads: "We wish to assure the trustees and those who are interested in the welfare of the orchestra that our course was prompted as much by a desire to maintain a high standard in the orchestra, to encourage music as an art in the United States, as it was to improve our own condition."

Those who comprised the committee are: Chairman, H. Ringwall, No. 20 Queensbury street; L. H. Kurkdjie, No. 333 Massachusetts avenue; Gustav F. Heim, No. 81 Orchard street, Jamaica Plain; Otto Roth, No. 10 Arlington stret, W. Traupe, No. 47 Paul Gore street, Jamaica Plain; Florian Wittman, No. 11 Tetlow street Roxbury, and Ernest E. Gardned, No. 61 Court street.

According to Carl E. Gardner of the committee of seven, that body has received assurances from a responsible source that there is a bare possibility of city or state taking over the orchestra to maintain it as a Boston institution if an agreement is not reached.

It was recalled yesterday that during the war, when Dr. Karl Muck, then conductor, was under surveillance by United States secret service agents, members of the orchestra were assured by a prominent official at Washington that "the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be kept intact by the United States government itself" rather than permit its disintegration.

Five new applications for membership in the union were filed yesterday by Symphony players, including Arthur Brook, flute, and G. Major, trumpet.

Sturmn Will Return

Manager Sturmn of the Detroit orchestra expressed surprise yesterday when told of the salaries paid to the Boston men. Those he declared to be impossible and far below those paid to symphony players in other cities. He was induced by the local union executives to forebear urging players to leave the Boston Symphony Orchestra at this time, but he served notice that he is likely to return within a couple of weeks if the situation has not cleared, as he feared that managers from other cities might get an advantage over him. It was learned by Mr. Gardner that one member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, not considered equal to the majority of the players, now receiving $40 a week, had been offered $75 by the Detroit manager.

Captain Johnson and his crew ran

Post Feb 28

DEMAND ON SYMPHONY TRUSTEES

Union Asks Flat Raise of $1000 for Each Player

The committee of seven of Boston Musicians' Union yesterday sent a communication to the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in which it refutes recent statements made by Judge Cabot of the board and demands a conference and a flat increase of $1000 for each player in the orchestra.

The request for a conference with the board of trustees and for the wage increase are reiterations of former demands.

MONTEUX OPPOSES MOVE

Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the orchestra, yesterday said he has never supported the players who have in their agitation for higher wages threatened to break from the orchestra. He says that from the beginning he has had no part in the dispute and that he has personally disapproved the course adopted by the men.

F. Sturm, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, was in Boston yesterday to secure players for Detroit. He said he has places for 20 musicians in his orchestra. None of the members of the Boston orchestra signed with the Detroit, preferring, they said, to await developments in the present situation.

Warning From Weber

Warning was sent out yesterday by Joseph N. Weber, international president of the American Federation of Musicians, urging all musicians to keep away from Boston and not to deal with the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, until the present controversy is adjusted.

Five more members of the local orchestra were said last night to have applied for admission into the local musicians' union. Among them are said to be Arthur Brooke, flutist and G. Mager, trumpet. William G. Dodge of the local union has been delegated by President Weber to assume charge of the union's part in the present controversy.

Trustees Query Fradkin

The trustees have apparently not receded from their attitude as defined in the recent statement by Judge Cabot of the board of trustes.

The determined opposition to unionism on the part of the board may be seen by its having called Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, yesterday afternoon to make clear his attitude on the subject of the musicians' union.

IF WE WOULD DANCE

Feb 29

MR JULIUS STRUM, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, is in town, and he had with him a number of documents of great interest to Boston music lovers. If signed, these documents will become contracts, and will remove from the "Athens of America" a dozen of the best artists of our own orchestra. Apparently it is not too late for Boston to make its money speak, but there is no time to lose. If Boston is to hold its present position in music Boston must make up its mind to pay the violinist.

In this competitive world a hard-earned reputation for excellence in art is hard to earn, and when earned difficult to keep. There are reasons for the belief that Boston is dangerously dependent on her past.

Painters, like other mortals, sell their pictures to the highest bidder. That is why an increasing number of the most important works of living American artists have gone to Pittsburg, Buffalo, Cleveland or Chicago, instead of finding wall space in a Boston gallery.

There have been times when the custodians of learning at Cambridge have had a chill because some representative of a great fresh-water university, perhaps a State affair, has been seen in the vicinity of Harvard sq. Only recently Michigan—the name is associated with copper mines, inexpensive furniture, and all kinds of motor cars—signed up one of our most eminent medical men.

At this rate the time may come when the pictures by Copley and Stuart which hang in dwellings inhabited by our first families will be shipped West.

The sad truth is that we cannot even keep ball players unless we are willing to keep pace with the bidding.

merican Feb 28

SYMPHONY MEN MAY RESIGN

Warn Trustees Disruption of Band Will Follow Failure to Grant Increase

Members of Boston Symphony Orchestra have thrown down the gauntlet to the trustees, threatening disruption of the famous organization if higher wages and better working conditions under union rules are not forthcoming.

"We joined the union," said Ernest E. Gardner, one of the players' committee of seven that served the ultimatum on the trustees, "because we wish to be free men. We intend to be serfs no longer."

In this supplementary statement to a Boston American reporter Mr. a letter, through the local union, to the trustees, asking for a conference. This is in the nature of a reply to the paper recently read to the players by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, to the effect that an average increase of 30 per cent. had been granted to them since 1914. A reiteration of the players' demand for a flat increase of $1000 a year for all members of the orchestra is attached to the letter.

ON HERALD

SYMPHONY MAY LOSE PLAYERS

Trustees Hear New York and Detroit Managers Offer More Pay

UNION HEADS ADVISE MEN TO STAY HERE

The presence of musical managers from Detroit and New York, said to be here with higher wage offers to dissatisfied Boston Symphony players, last night caused fears for the integrity of the organization founded by Maj. Higginson and made famous under the baton of noted conductors. F. Sturm, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, is already on the ground.

In consequence of this development, the orchestral committee of seven, chosen by the players, and the executives of the local unions of the American Federation of Musicians, yesterday urged the players to refuse all inducements to sever their relations with the orchestra—which it is hoped to keep a Boston institution—until all possible efforts have been made and have failed.

Other Places Want Them

Other cities are reported to be desirous of securing Boston's Symphony players. These include Syracuse, N. Y., where George Eastman, the "mysterious Mr. Smith" of Technology fame, has donated $1,500,000 for the organization of a new Syracuse symphony orchestra.

The main hope of the players and of the committee of seven is the well known loyalty of the men to the Boston institution, together with the warning sent out by President Joseph N. Webber of the federation, at the instance of the executives of the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, for all union musicians to keep away from Boston and especially from the Symphony management, until the present difference has been adjusted.

The committee of seven yesterday sent

FEBRUARY 28, 1920

From Times New York City

WITH THE ORCHESTRAS.

Godowsky will play Liszt's A major concerto with the Philharmonic today. The program includes Brahms's Second Symphony, Sibelius's "Finlandia," and, after the solo number, Grieg's "Peer Gynt."

The Symphony Society will give an all-Wagner program today at Ace[illegible]

Traveler Feb 8 20

DETROIT AFTER ARTISTS FROM HUB ORCHESTRA

Players in the Boston Symphony orchestra are underpaid, in the opinion of F. Sturm, manager of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, one of the finest in this country, who is here negotiating with some of the Boston musicians.

Manager Sturm declared that his orchestra is unionized, and said he had never had any trouble with his players. In fact, he said, unionization had led to a smoother relationship between the management and the players. He said it is the policy of the American Federation of Musicians, with which his players are identified, to do everything in its power to make the orchestra better.

Mr. Sturm said he was not here to take the Boston Symphony players away, but those acquainted with all angles of the orchestra's affairs declare his visit means that the city will lose some of its famous artists unless action is taken immediately.

Mr. Sturm has been in Boston since Wednesday night and planned to return to Detroit late today. His arrival here created a sensation in musical circles and has caused no end of comment.

He told a Traveler reporter who saw him at the Westminster today he believes the attitude of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra is an injustice to the men. "I think the trustees ought to see the men's side of the case," he said.

"They ought not let any personal prejudices stand in the way," he continued. "It is perfectly natural for the men to want to be certain they will be well taken care of.

"I want it understood that I am not here to solicit men, but I am negotiating with hebbers of the Boston Symphony, who wrote to me before this agitation. Gabrilowitch, our director, would not stand for such soliciting. If members of the Boston Symphony now in the union were separated from the orchestra because ofthat fact, the trustees would find it impossible to get together a non-union orchestra of any standing."

Mr. Strum said men cannot be imported now of the calibre of the members of the Boston organization. Members of the Boston orchestra would find it impossible to compete with the present group if they were to leave the orchestra and continue to play under other backing in this city," he said.

"A community like Boston ought not let an organization of the type of the Symphony Orchestra, as now composed, get away," Mr. Sturm stated.

He said public-spirited men today are beginning to feel the necessity of having such an orchestra in their communities.

Mr. Sturm said players in the Detroit Symphony Orchestra are much better paiad than those of the Boston group. He said the lowest paid player in the Detroit Symphony earned $50 a week. The average in Boston is said to be about $35. Mr. Sturm said he could use 20 men in his orchestra at present.

It was learned today that Joseph M. Webber, national president of the American Federation of Musicians, had sent notices to every musicions' local in the country, covering a total membership of 90,000, warning all union musicians to keep away from Boston until the Symphony case is settled.

RHODE ISLAND REDS

Transcript Feb 7

New Gusts in the Squall

Years ago when high schools stud what was then called "civil governmen the teacher was questioning his class abo the powers and duties of the President Cabinet. "What," he asked one of th boys, "are the functions of the Secretary of the Interior?" The youth, who had barely glanced at the lesson, answered glibly that they were many and various. "Name one," suggested the teacher gently, but the pupil answered not a word. Precisely the same question seems in order to the unionized players of the Symphony Orchestra when their spokesman asserts that "rich and prominent men" are ready to establish and maintain them as a reorganized band to the tune, say, of $200,000 or more a year. In all probability, again there would be no answer; for it is not the custom of these fiery souls, the chief of whom must usually release his ardors upon the snare-drum, to descend to a bill of particulars. Rather they set high in a heaven of "publicity" beyond their fondest dreams, drafting "statements" about "serfs and serfdom," decreeing the future, as though they held it in the hollow of their hands, exhilarated—to use a mild word—even in these dry days by a sense of importance they have never known and are likely never to know again. Perhaps they are proving the "Americanism" about which they say so much, by their zest for the game of bluff. It is best to leave them to these sports and pastimes. Somehow actualities usually adjust and determine such controversies as that between the trustees and the members of the Symphony Orchestra.

For the hour these actualities are a disposition on the part of the trustees to let the leaven of their recent statement of facts and policies work in the minds of the public and the players, and to await with patience and composure the next step of the aggrieved musicians. The musicians, in their turn, are making speed to join the union. They seem to be doing so for three reasons. If, by any chance, they lose their present jobs, it will be easier for them, unionized, to seek and gain others. If they remain in the Symphony Orchestra, they will have more opportunity, as members of the union, for lucrative work in free hours. Most of them, also, have persuaded themselves that somehow the union can gain them the increase of salary for which they originally asked, and which the trustees lack the means to grant in any considerable measure. Just how the union is to add the necessary income to the revenues of the orchestra does not appear. Rather, the players' notion seems to be that the union can goad the trustees into an appeal to the public for additional subsidies or into resignation. Then, in the players' view, will succeed a new régime able and willing to bestow all they ask. Just how it is to be constituted, just where it is to find the money, again fails to appear. At the least, if the trustees should resent a unionized orchestra, there would be more opportunity for public strife, and to continue the controversy—if possible, with new heat—is now the breath of life to those who were eagerest to provoke it and are eagerest to prolong it in blind resentment or frank self-seeking. The mere observer notes with interest that the most zealous in these matters are various musicians brought into the band to save it, in the days of war-time hysteria, from the German influences "sapping its morale."

Mr. Carpenter's Ballet

Trans. Feb 27

THE SYMPHONY AND THE UNION

With increasing emphasis, as the day have passed, certain members of the Symphony Orchestra have endeavored to mak unionization appear a chief issue of the present campaign for larger salaries. Th matter was not at first brought forwar in this connection, but since it has bee thus introduced, and coupled with an at tempt, on the part of some agitating lead ers, to picture the trustees to the publi as a group of gentlemen benighted in au tocracy, it may be well that certain cardi nal truths of the case, already set out i other columns of this paper, should b reiterated.

The first point worth full public un derstanding is that affiliation of mem bers of the band with a union, even a national union, of and for their own purposes of organization, has no need to be regarded as the present casus belli. On the contrary, the president of the board of trustees, speaking for his part more than a year ago to national officers of the union, eliminated this from dispute. Upon certain conditions he welcomed the union. The conditions—being simply those of the freedom of the management to secure the best players obtainable, no matter where found, and to maintain the orchestra at the highest possible standard of artistic excellence—appealed at the time to the union's representatives, according to their own professions, no less strongly than they appeal and must always appeal to the public. The national officers returned to Chicago, saying that they would arrange for observance of these conditions. So far so good. But a change was to come. When next the delegates appeared in Boston, the position they took was that preservation of the management's freedom to maintain the best possible orchestra would require alterations in their rules which they did not propose to make.

Then and there the only real grounds of difference developed. They are grounds concerning which, in the high realm of standards where a symphony orchestra must either dwell or suffer material as well as artistic decline, there can be no concession or compromise. And, oddly enough, compromise of them would wreak its heaviest vengeance upon the players themselves. At a time when it is precisely a greater public interest and a further access of professional prestige which the orchestra needs if it is to be able to pay even such betterments of salary as are just, reason, to ask a diminution of standards which could only chill the public interest and decrease the orchestra's success is a counsel of the most evident folly for all concerned.

[illegible] being convinced that "found- [illegible]sicians" of orchestras grow on [illegible] the police will now please [illegible]rowd of eager donors fighting [illegible]ored organization another [illegible] an additional pension [illegible]-wide reputation con-

The situation reached an acute stage yesterday when several of the organization were said to have been invited to accept better paying positions with musical organizations in other parts of the country. Julius Strum, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, was here yesterday and is said to have offered handsome contracts to some players.

While he said he was not here to solicit men to go to Detroit, he frankly stated that Detroit would gladly welcome the Boston men. It is stated that 11 Boston Symphony men have applied for admission to the Detroit orchestra.

"Our minimum wage is $50 a week," said Mr Strum, "and I don't understand why the Boston management has taken such a decided stand. We have no difficulty because of the men's union affiliations. On the other hand, I can truthfully state that they do better work.

"I have talked with the men who desire to join the Detroit orchestra and all I need is their signatures to the contracts. I simply want to await developments, and unless some action is taken by Monday, I will complete the deal and take the artists with me to Detroit."

Bids for Players Reported

William G. Dodge, delegated to take charge of the Boston situation, stated that directors of symphony orchestras from all sections of the country have either come here or communicated with leaders of the union about getting musicians. It was reported that of the 29 members not in the union, five had joined yesterday, among them being Arthur Brook, flutist, and G. Mager, trumpeter.

Pierre Monteux, conductor, denied last night the statement that he favored the members of the orchestra forming a union, claiming he had never said anything of such a nature.

Statement to the Trustees

In the statement sent yesterday to the trustees by the committee of seven, H. Ringwall, chairman, L. M. Kurkdjie, Gustave Heim, Carl S. Gardner, Otto Roth, W. Traupe and Florian Wittman, it is pointed out that in joining the union the players had adopted the only means of remedying conditions which were no longer tolerable; that they have held aloof, being members of the only important musical organization that had not joined the union, and thus lost many Summer engagements.

The committee says that any increase less than $1000 a year will be futile and unjust, and requests that all contracts held or renewed be increased by that amount beginning with the season of 1920-21. The committee continues:

"As it is not our intention to interfere with the management of this orchesetra, we will quite properly leave to the trustees the devising of methods of augmenting revenue to meet this proposed increase in salaries. But we urge that no additional concerts (over and above the average of the past) be given to defray this added expense for as our request for an increase of $1000 is solely to offset the admitted present depreciation of the value of the dollar, we believe that the expense should be borne by the public."

Gardner predicted that seventy-five of the ninety-five players in the orchestra will quit at the end of the present season if their membership in the union is interfered with or if they do not get higher salaries and better working conditions.

HINT MEN MAY RESIGN.

"This is not a threat," he added. "It is merely a statement of what will happen at the end of the present season if the things we ask are not complied with. The board of trustees has been autocratic. There is much discontent among the players. Between 75 and 84 of the 95 members have already joined the union."

Mr. Gardner declared that "it is ridiculous to say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not give such artistic performances if its members are union players. We will give better performances, because we will be more contented. The argument that we will give inferior concerts because we join a union is ridiculous."

In a letter to the trustees, sent to Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board, the players' committee declares that the majority of the orchestra members have joined the union and insist upon better working conditions and higher wages. The committee requests that "contracts existing between individual members of the Association * * * be so reformed as to enable the members to comply with the duties and obligations fixed by the by-laws of the American Federation of Musicians and the principles for which the latter organiaztion stands."

OPPOSE DISRUPTION.

Touching on the discord in the orchestra the communication reads: "The perfection of any organization depends as much upon the material condition of its members as it does upon their skill and proficiency. There con be no approach to the goal of perfection where there exists discontent and disaffection."

Another section reads: "We wish to assure the trustees and those who are interested in the welfare of the orchestra that our course was prompted as much by a desire to maintain a high standard in the orchestra, to encourage music as an art in the United States, as it was to improve our own condition."

Those who comprised the committee are: Chairman, H. Ringwall, No. 20 Queensbury street; L. H. Kurkdjie, No. 333 Massachusetts avenue; Gustav F. Heim, No. 81 Orchard street, Jamaica Plain; Otto Roth, No. 10 Arlington stret, W. Traupe, No. 47 Paul Gore street, Jamaica Plain; Florian Wittman, No. 11 Tetlow street Roxbury, and Ernest E. Gardned, No. 61 Court street.

According to Carl E. Gardner of the committee of seven, that body has received assurances from a responsible source that there is a bare possibility of city or state taking over the orchestra to maintain it as a Boston institution if an agreement is not reached.

It was recalled yesterday that during the war, when Dr. Karl Muck, then conductor, was under surveillance by United States secret service agents, members of the orchestra were assured by a prominent official at Washington that "the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be kept intact by the United States government itself" rather than permit its disintegration.

Five new applications for membership in the union were filed yesterday by Symphony players, including Arthur Brook, flute, and G. Mager, trumpet.

Sturmn Will Return

Manager Sturmn of the Detroit orchestra expressed surprise yesterday when told of the salaries paid to the Boston men. These he declared to be impossible and far below those paid to symphony players in other cities. He was induced by the local union executives to forebear urging players to leave the Boston Symphony Orchestra at this time, but he served notice that he is likely to return within a couple of weeks if the situation has not cleared, as he feared that managers from other cities might get an advantage over him. It was learned by Mr. Gardner that one member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, not considered equal to the majority of the players, now receiving $40 a week, had been offered $75 by the Detroit manager.

Captain Johnson and his crew [illegible]

Post Feb 28

DEMAND ON SYMPHONY TRUSTEES

Union Asks Flat Raise of $1000 for Each Player

The committee of seven of Boston Musicians' Union yesterday sent a communication to the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in which it refutes recent statements made by Judge Cabot of the board and demands a conference and a flat increase of $1000 for each player in the orchestra.

The request for a conference with the board of trustees and for the wage increase are reiterations of former demands.

MONTEUX OPPOSES MOVE

Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the orchestra, yesterday said he has never supported the players who have in their agitation for higher wages threatened to break from the orchestra. He says that from the beginning he has had no part in the dispute and that he has personally disapproved the course adopted by the men.

F. Sturm, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, was in Boston yesterday to secure players for Detroit. He said he has places for 20 musicians in his orchestra. None of the members of the Boston orchestra signed with the Detroit, preferring, they said, to await developments in the present situation.

Warning From Weber

Warning was sent out yesterday by Joseph N. Weber, international president of the American Federation of Musicians, urging all musicians to keep away from Boston and not to deal with the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, until the present controversy is adjusted.

Five more members of the local orchestra were said last night to have applied for admission into the local musicians' union. Among them are said to be Arthur Brooke, flutist and G. Mager, trumpet. William G. Dodge of the local union has been delegated by President Weber to assume charge of the union's part in the present controversy.

Trustees Query Fradkin

The trustees have apparently not receded from their attitude as defined in the recent statement by Judge Cabot of the board of trustes.

The determined opposition to unionism on the part of the board may be seen by its having called Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, yesterday afternoon to make clear his attitude on the subject of the musicians' union.

IF WE WOULD DANCE Feb 27

MR JULIUS STRUM, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, is in town, and he had with him a number of documents of great interest to Boston music lovers. If signed, these documents will become contracts, and will remove from the "Athens of America" a dozen of the best artists of our own orchestra. Apparently it is not too late for Boston to make its money speak, but there is no time to lose. If Boston is to hold its present position in music Boston must make up its mind to pay the violinist.

In this competitive world a hard-earned reputation for excellence in art is hard to earn, and when earned difficult to keep. There are reasons for the belief that Boston is dangerously dependent on her past.

Painters, like other mortals, sell their pictures to the highest bidder. That is why an increasing number of the most important works of living American artists have gone to Pittsburg, Buffalo, Cleveland or Chicago, instead of finding wall space in a Boston gallery.

There have been times when the custodians of learning at Cambridge have had a chill because some representative of a great fresh-water university, perhaps a State affair, has been seen in the vicinity of Harvard sq. Only recently Michigan—the name is associated with copper mines, inexpensive furniture, and all kinds of motor cars—signed up one of our most eminent medical men.

At this rate the time may come when the pictures by Copley and Stuart which hang in dwellings inhabited by our first families will be shipped West.

The sad truth is that we cannot even keep ball players unless we are willing to keep pace with the bidding.

ON HERALD

SYMPHONY MAY LOSE PLAYERS

Trustees Hear New York and Detroit Managers Offer More Pay

UNION HEADS ADVISE MEN TO STAY HERE

The presence of musical managers from Detroit and New York, said to be here with higher wage offers to dissatisfied Boston Symphony players, last night caused fears for the integrity of the organization founded by Maj. Higginson and made famous under the baton of noted conductors. F. Sturm, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, is already on the ground.

In consequence of this development, the orchestral committee of seven, chosen by the players, and the executives of the local unions of the American Federation of Musicians, yesterday urged the players to refuse all inducements to sever their relations with the orchestra—which it is hoped to keep a Boston institution—until all possible efforts have been made and have failed.

Other Places Want Them

Other cities are reported to be desirous of securing Boston's Symphony players These include Syracuse, N. Y., where George Eastman, the "mysterious Mr. Smith" of Technology fame, has donated $1,000,000 for the organization of a new Syracuse symphony orchestra.

The main hope of the players and of the committee of seven is the well known loyalty of the men to the Boston institution, together with the warning sent out by President Joseph N. Webber of the federation, at the instance of the executives of the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, for all union musicians to keep away from Boston and especially from the Symphony management, until the present difference has been adjusted.

The committee of seven yesterday sent

FEBRUARY 28, 1920

a letter, through the local union, to the trustees, asking for a conference. This is in the nature of a reply to the paper recently read to the players by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, to the effect that an average increase of 30 per cent. had been granted to them since 1914. A reiteration of the players' demand for a flat increase of $1000 a year for all members of the orchestra is attached to the letter.

American Feb 28

SYMPHONY MEN MAY RESIGN

Warn Trustees Disruption of Band Will Follow Failure to Grant Increase

Members of Boston Symphony Orchestra have thrown down the gauntlet to the trustees, threatening disruption of the famous organization if higher wages and better working conditions under union rules are not forthcoming.

"We joined the union," said Ernest E. Gardner, one of the players' committee of seven that served the ultimatum on the trustees, "because we wish to be free men. We intend to be serfs no longer."

In this supplementary statement to a Boston American reporter Mr.

Globe Feb 28

OUTSIDERS AFTER SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Reported by Leader of the Unionized Musicians

Committee Writes to Trustees Asking for a Conference

With a large majority of Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians unionized, a committee of the organization yesterday sent to the trustees a communication stating that they had formed an organization to be known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members Association, had affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians and requested that the trustees appoint a time and place for a conference upon differences.

From Times New York City

WITH THE ORCHESTRAS.

Godowsky will play Liszt's A major concerto with the Philharmonic today. The program includes Brahms's Second Symphony, Sibelius's "Finalndia," and, after the solo number, Grieg's "Peer Gynt."

The Symphony Society will give an all-Wagner program today at Aeolian

JUDGE CABOT QUIZZES HEAD OF ORCHESTRA

Feb 28

Symphony Leader Dodges Questions on Union Situation

The controversy which has existed between members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Judge Frederick Cabot, head of the trustees, reached a climax today when it became known that Concertmaster F. Fradkin had appeared before Judge Cabot, at the latter's summons, and had been questioned at length on his action in joining the Musicians' Union.

Fradkin, world-renowned virtuoso, it was officially announced to the Record today, conferred with Judge Cabot following the afternoon performance Friday. Fradkin and the two Judge to appear before the officials.

Developments show that the interview resulted in a battle of wits—artist against judge, according to Fradkin.

The meeting was most businesslike. There was cordiality but of the "cool" sort, it was stated. Fradkin was courteous in his replies—also firm in the position he took of the joining in the American Federation of Musicians, he said.

He said he made it clear that by joining the union he was in no way aided financially. Fradkin is one of

(Continued on Last Page)

LATEST NEWS BULLETINS!

SATURD

SYMPHO QUESTIONS ON UNION ARE PUT UP TO FRADKIN

Latter Evades Them, but Offers to Answer Written Queries

(Continued from Page One)

the highest paid musicians in the country.

Quizzed on Contract

Judge Cabot, it was learned, sought to quiz the concertmaster on many points. Finally Fradkin made it clear that he wasn't there to be "cross-examined" and insisted that any question the official desired to ask should be given in writing in the form of a list of interrogatories. Judge Cabot then compiled a list of questions and gave them to Fradkin, it was stated.

Fradkin, in turn, passed them over to Arthur Berenson, attorney for the orchestra members, who will legally advise the artist as to his answers.

It is also understood that the question of Fradkin's contract was mentioned. Members of the orchestra declare that Fradkin's move in joining the union has in no way violated the terms of his contract, as the laws of Massachusetts state clearly, according to the members, that no contracts can be made which will deny any man the right to join a union.

Position Strengthened

Following Fradkin's conference with Judge Cabot, many of the union members feel that the officials of the management has a somewhat different view on the whole matter.

Fradkin's presentation of his personal views, his personal attitude and the tribute paid his men, will all have an important bearing on any decision made by the management, the men say.

It developed today that Fradkin has been elected a member of the orchestra committee, which is handling the entire situation for the men.

This committee consists of: Rudolph Ringwall, chairman; Fredric Fradkin Otto Roth, William Traupe, N. Kurkdjie, F. Wittmann, Gustav Herm, Carl E. Gardner, Allan Sangley, secretary and treasurer.

Wind Sets Today

The world do move" as the old negro preacher finally agreed, but nowhere at the moment does it seem to be moving quite so fast as it does in the outgivings of the associated members of the Symphony Orchestra. Yesterday, "rich and prominent men" stood ready to pay the bills of a reorganized band that should be a very paradise of players. Today the city, the state, even the national government have replaced these unnamed liberators. "There is a bare possibility," according to "assurances from a responsible source," that the city or the State will take over the orchestra and maintain it, with becoming consideration for the rank and file. More: "a prominent official at Washington" intimated no longer ago than the years of war, that "the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be kept intact by the United States Government itself." Wide stretch engaging horizons. Across them floats a vision of the Honorable Claud Kitchen of Scotland Neck, N. C., rising in the Congress to propose an increase in the Federal appropriation for the Boston Orchestra, or of the excellent Mr. "Jerry" Watson, representing the City Council as trustee thereof; or yet again, of a committee—say on fisheries—in the Massachusetts Legislature gravely debating "acts and resolves" for Symphony Hall.

Seriously, do the presumably intelligent men composing the Symphony Orchestra believe that such nonsense impresses or alarms the trustees and the public of the concerts? Do they suspect that soon no one but very young reporters will have either an eye or an ear for these comicalities? Can they not see that such absurd stuff weakens and cheapens whatever is just and strong in the very case they would put to the public? Possibly it is easily deceived; but it does know transparent "bunk" when it reads and hears it. As futile to even the half-informed are the threats of departures from Symphony Hall to Detroit, to New York and to other cities. Nearly every symphony orchestra in the United States is nearing the end of the season. As it is constituted at present, so will it remain constituted, under existing contracts, through March and April. The very union to which the Bostonian players have joined themselves would protect those whom they might now displace. Not for this spring, but for next autumn are managers and musicians proposing contracts. The members of the Boston Orchestra are doing so themselves. Yet they fancy that these alarums and excursions vastly perturb the public of the concerts and turn the hearts of the trustees to water. Such self-delusion, tactlessness, silliness are beyond understanding. They are almost maudlin.

Yet somewhere in the background are wiser and more practical heads. They have completed the organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members Association; they have joined it to the Boston Musicians Protective Association, which in turn is affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians. From the members of the orchestra,—and not, be it noted, from the union at large,—a committee of seven has been chosen to confer with the trustees over changes in contracts, "to comply with the obligations fixed by the by-laws of the American Federation of Musicians," and over the original request for a flat increase of $1000 in the salary next season, of each and every member of the Association. There is no reason to doubt that the trustees will welcome such conference and debate. There the real issue will be joined again.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY JOIN THE UNION

Feb 28

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—A strong effort is in evidence to make the Boston Symphony Orchestra a union orchestra. It has been the one orchestra of first importance in the United States the players of which have not been union men. Major Higginson, the founder, and for many years the sustainer of the organization, was unalterably opposed to his men joining the union, basing his objections on the ground that the tendency of the union was to lower artistic standards.

The present discussion arose when certain of the players made a demand on the trustees of the orchestra for an increase in salaries, the minimum to be of $1000 a year. In reply to this the president of the trustees, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, made a statement to the men in which he said that such an increase would mean that subscriptions of $100,000 a year would have to be forthcoming in addition to the $100,000 now contributed to run the orchestra. He also said that an endowment fund of $2,000,000 which it was proposed to raise would have to be made $4,000,000, and unless either the additional annual amount or the increased endowment were in sight, that it would be impossible to grant the request.

Before the men's demand had been made the management had started to increase salaries when new contracts were made. It is reported that many of the players, among them the concert master, Fredric Fradkin, have signified their willingness to join the union. It is understood that the trustees have no objection to the union provided that they are allowed to secure players from whatever source they desire without dictation.

SYMPHONY MEN MAY RESIGN

Warn Trustees Disruption of Band Will Follow Failure to Grant Increase

Members of Boston Symphony Orchestra have thrown down the gauntlet to the trustees, threatening disruption of the famous organization if higher wages and better working conditions under union rules are not forthcoming.

"We joined the union," said Ernest E. Gardner, one of the players' committee of seven that served the ultimatum on the trustees, "because we wish to be free men. We intend to be serfs no longer."

In this supplementary statement to a Boston American reporter Mr. Gardner predicted that seventy-five of the ninety-five players in the orchestra will quit at the end of the present season if their membership in the union is interfered with or if they do not get higher salaries and better working conditions.

HINT MEN MAY RESIGN.

"This is not a threat," he added. "It is merely a statement of what will happen at the end of the present season if the things we ask are not complied with. The board of trustees has been autocratic. There is much discontent among the players. Between 75 and 84 of the 95 members have already joined the union."

Mr. Gardner declared that "it is ridiculous to say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not give such artistic performances if its members are union players. We will give better performances, because we will be more contented. The argument that we will give inferior concerts because we join a union is ridiculous."

In a letter to the trustees, sent to Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board, the players' committee declares that the majority of the orchestra members have joined the union and insist upon better working conditions and higher wages. The committee requests that "contracts existing between individual members of the Association * * * be so reformed as to enable the members to comply with the duties and obligations fixed by the by-laws of the American Federation of Musicians and the principles for which the latter organiaztion stands."

OPPOSE DISRUPTION.

Touching on the discord in the orchestra the communication reads; "The perfection of any organization depends as much upon the material condition of its members as it does upon their skill and proficiency. There can be no approach to the goal of perfection where there exists discontent and disaffection."

Another section reads; "We wish to assure the trustees and those who are interested in the welfare of the orchestra that our course was prompted as much by a desire to maintain a high standard in the orchestra, to encourage music as an art in the United States, as it was to improve our own condition."

Those who comprised the committee are: Chairman, H. Ringwall, No. 20 Queensbury street; L. H. Kurkdjie, No. 333 Massachusetts avenue; Gustav F. Heim, No. 61 Orchard street, Jamaica Plain; Otto Roth, No. 10 Arlington street, W. Traupe, No. 47 Paul Gore street, Jamaica Plain; Florian Wittman, No. 11 Tetlow street Roxbury, and Ernest E. Gardned, No. 61 Court street.

Boston Herald Mch. 2

PLAYERS MAY QUIT SYMPHONY

Representative of Philadelphia Orchestra Pays Visit to Boston

LOCAL COMMITTEE TO DISCUSS WAGES

Developments yesterday in the situation affecting the Boston Symphony Orchestra indicated possibility that several of its leading members might soon be with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, at higher salaries than they receive here.

H. Vanden Beemt, representing the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston yesterday and interviewed many of the members of the Boston organization. When asked at the Copley-Plaza last night if he had made contracts with any of the Boston players, he made denial and further disclaimed any intention of "raiding" the Boston orchestra of its personnel.

"I am here to see if any of the Boston Symphony members intend to leave that orchestra, and at present have no intention to sign contracts," he said. "I merely wish to see if any of the Boston men will be available to join the Philadelphia company.

"We expect that conditions similar to those existing in Boston may arise at Philadelphia in a few weeks, namely, the 'raids' which the western organizations, such as Detroit and Cleveland, have been making on the famous eastern orchestras.

"The contracts of the Philadelphia players expire in about six weeks, or about the middle of April, which will be six weeks before the last concert of the season, and we desire to protect ourselves against the expected 'raiding' which the westerners may carry to our city.

"I have made no definite arrangements yet concerning any Boston Symphony members, though I interviewed many today and many others called me on the telephone and visited me later."

One member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was waiting for an interview with Mr. Vanden Beemt while he was giving his statement to the press.

When asked the difference in the minimum wage paid the Philadelphia players Mr. Vanden Beemt replied it was $50, which was more than the Boston minimum. There was a scarcity of desirable musicians in America, he said. Conditions existing in the United States in musical circles he attributed to lack of imported musicians during the last few years, now causing a tremendous demand which far exceeds the supply.

The players' committee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold a special meeting today at the end of the rehearsal, to consider action to hasten a conference with the trustees on their wage demands. Unless word is received from the management setting a date for the conference, before the meeting is called, it is certain some steps will be taken by the players to continue the proposed meeting.

The committee, in answering Judge Cabot's financial statement a few days ago, in regard to players' salaries, requested the conference with the trustees and renewed their demands for a flat wage increase of $1000 a year for all the 95 members of the orchestra.

The action of Judge Frederick B. Cabot in questioning Concertmaster Frederic Fradkin on his union affiliation, was discussed yesterday at the members' meeting. It was hoped that word from Judge Cabot would be forthcoming yesterday, and when it was not, the call for today's meeting was sent out.

Their position is supported by the American Federation of Musicians.

SYMPHONY MEN AWAIT REPLY

Expect to Hear From Judge Cabot Today

March 1

A special meeting of the committee of eight from the union players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held today after the regular rehearsal to consider what action will be taken by the players, in the event of Judge Cabot failing to make a reply today to the request of the union men for a conference with the board of trustees. The communication had also asked for a flat increase of $1000 for each member of the orchestra.

A meeting was held yesterday to consider the action of Judge Cabot in summoning Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the orchestra, to question him on his action and attitude in joining the union. The list of questions submitted by Judge Cabot to Mr. Fradkin were considered yesterday by the committee and the concertmaster's attorney, and will be returned with answers to the chairman of the board of trustees within a day or two.

Another Symphony manager, Vandeen Beempt of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, arrived in this city yesterday, and it is believed he is here in an effort to secure players for the Philadelphia orchestra. He is the second visiting manager to arrive here in the last week, and it is expected that others will follow.

country be systematized and standardized.

March 1

SYMPHONY UNION PLAYERS' COMMITTEE MEETS TODAY

A special meeting of the committee appointed to handle the affairs of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who have joined the Musicians' Union will be held this afternoon after the rehearsal to consider plans to settle the controversy between the members of the union and the board of directors of the orchestra.

Judge Cabot, chairman of the board of directors, has so far failed to reply to the communication from the committee, sent a few days ago, asking for a conference to discuss a general $1000 wage increase and changes in working conditions.

Before starting for Lawrence, where a concert was held yesterday, the committee discussed the situation as it exists between Judge Cabot and Concert Master Fredric Fradkin, and analyzed the list of questions submitted to Mr Fradkin, as to the reasons why he joined the union.

Vanden Breempt, manager of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, registered at the Copley-Plaza. A member of the committee was assigned to obtain a conference with him today.

March 1

CONCERTS AND OPERA

WITH SUNDRY DIGRESSIONS INTO NOISE

More Tactics in the Dispute Within the Symphony Orchestra — Temperaments, Truth and Other Memoranda of the Controversy — Foretelling and Forboding "Aphrodite" — Miss Church and Modern Piano-Pieces—Dr. Muck Living Quietly at Graz in Austria

As wary tacticians the leaders of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members Association—a clumsy name, if there ever was one—are doing their best to hasten the meeting of the committee from its ranks with the trustees of the band. They profess impatient regret because the trustees have not yet named a time and place for such conference, in reply to a letter that could hardly have been delivered before Saturday. In the committee's view, all sorts of ominous consequences impend unless it is answered at once. Obviously all this is tactics and nothing else. The first essential to the continuance of the present controversy and to the steady embittering of it is to keep the orchestra seething with excitement. In such tumult not a few of the men were drawn into an association toward which they had been lukewarm; while in equal hullabaloo, they agreed to the present "requests" for union rules and generally increased salaries. If, by any mischance this excitement should subside, there is no knowing what reactions might ensue among such "temperaments" as the orchestra contains. Hence the insistence upon immediate answer and action by the trustees; hence also the solemn—and also silly—mummeries about the impending departure of this, that and the other musician into the orchestras of Philadelphia or of Detroit.

Behold the end of all things, the spokesmen of the Association are saying to the public of the Symphony Concerts; very bold outwardly, somewhat uneasy within—not unlike country-lads brandishing their grinning pumpkins at innocent wayfarers on Hallow'een. "Rule or Ruin" is what they are whispering to themselves and not a little of the public happens to overhear these whispers. Meanwhile, it is surely tactless—not to say unbrotherly—for this or that abler member of the orchestra and the Association to be declaring with a loud voice that he has joined the union to protect the "mediocrities" in the band; while it is as certainly impolitic to anticipate the desired days of indiscipline by such talking man to man and during performance as was easily observable at moments in the concert of Saturday evening. Nor are these all the pleasures of the hour to the detached observer. If he is at all informed about orchestral conditions in other cities, he hears with amusement the "scouts" of the Philadelphia and the Detroit Orchestras extolling the peace and happiness in which union, conductor and managers work together in those cities. As it happens, Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Gabrilowitsch have been known in private to hold and to express warmly quite another view.

March 1

CHIEF FLUTIST OF SYMPHONY JOINS A. F. M.

Record

More Orchestras Attempt Negotiations With Boston Artists

Musical circles buzzed with additional excitement today when it was learned that G. Laurent, considered the leading flutist in this country, was the latest member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to join the American Federation of Musicians. He paid his $25 initial fee to the committee today. He ranks among the highest-paid artists of the organization.

It also developed today that the management of the Cincinnati and Seattle Symphony Orchestras were attempting negotiations with many Boston Symphony members. John Pargur, prominent in music circles throughout the country, also has his lines out for some of the Boston favorites, it was learned. H. Vanden Beemt, representing the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, has conferred with many of the Symphony players. He has many alluring contracts ready for signatures and his prices are said to appeal to many of the men.

Arrangements for a conference between the Boston Symphony Orchestra members and Judge Fredrick Cabot, president of the trustees, for the purpose of "ironing out" the wage controversy were expected to be completed late today at the close of today's rehearsal at Symphony Hall.

A special meeting of the players has been called to consider further action. Every effort will be made to hasten the conference between the players and the management.

JUDGE CABOT QUIZZES HEAD OF ORCHESTRA

Feb 28

Symphony Leader Dodges Questions on Union Situation

Record

The controversy which has existed between members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Judge Frederick Cabot, head of the trustees, reached a climax today when it became known that Concertmaster F. Fradkin had appeared before Judge Cabot, at the latter's summons, and had been questioned at length on his action in joining the Musicians' Union.

Fradkin, world-renowned virtuoso, it was officially announced to the Record today, conferred with Judge Cabot following the afternoon performance Friday. Fradkin said he was asked to appear before the official.

Developments show that the interview resulted in a battle of wits—artist against judge, according to Fradkin.

The meeting was most businesslike. There was cordiality but of the "cool" sort, it was stated. Fradkin was courteous in his replies—also firm in the position he took of the joining in the American Federation of Musicians, he said.

He said he made it clear that by joining the union he was in no way aided financially. Fradkin is one of

(Continued on Last Page)

LATEST NEWS BULLETINS!

SATURD

SYMPHO

QUESTIONS ON UNION ARE PUT UP TO FRADKIN

Latter Evades Them, but Offers to Answer Written Queries

(Continued from Page One)

the highest paid musicians in the country.

Quizzed on Contract

Judge Cabot, it was learned, sought to quiz the concertmaster on many points. Finally Fradkin made it clear that he wasn't there to be "cross-examined" and insisted that any question the official desired to ask should be given in writing in the form of a list of interrogatories. Judge Cabot then compiled a list of questions and gave them to Fradkin, it was stated.

Fradkin, in turn, passed them over to Arthur Berenson, attorney for the orchestra members, who will legally advise the artist as to his answers.

It is also understood that the question of Fradkin's contract was mentioned. Members of the orchestra declare that Fradkin's move in joining the union has in no way violated the terms of his contract, as the laws of Massachusetts state clearly, according to the members, that no contracts can be made which will deny any man the right to join a union.

Position Strengthened

Following Fradkin's conference with Judge Cabot, many of the union members feel that the officials of the management has a somewhat different view on the whole matter.

Fradkin's presentation of his personal views, h's personal attitude and the tribute paid his men, will all have an important bearing on any decision made by the management, the men say.

It developed today that Fradkin has been elected a member of the orchestra committee, which is handling the entire situation for the men.

This committee consists of: Rudolph Ringwall, chairman; Fredric Fradkin Otto Roth, William Traupe, N. Kurkdjie, F. Wittmann, Gustav Herm, Carl E. Gardner, Allan Sangley, secretary and treasurer.

As the Wind Sets Today

"The world do move" as the old negro preacher finally agreed, but nowhere at the moment does it seem to be moving quite so fast as it does in the outgiving of the associated members of the Symphony Orchestra. Yesterday, "rich and prominent men" stood ready to pay the bills of a reorganized band that should be a very paradise of players. Today the city, the state, even the national government have replaced these unnamed liberators. "There is a bare possibility," according to "assurances from a responsible source," that the city or the State will take over the orchestra and maintain it, with becoming consideration for the rank and file. More: "a prominent official at Washington" intimated no longer ago than the years of war, that "the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be kept intact by the United States Government itself." Wide stretch engaging horizons. Across them floats a vision of the Honorable Claud Kitchen of Scotland Neck, N. C., rising in the Congress to propose an increase in the Federal appropriation for the Boston Orchestra, or of the excellent Mr. "Jerry" Watson, representing the City Council as trustee thereof; or yet again, of a committee—say on fisheries—in the Massachusetts Legislature gravely debating "acts and resolves", for Symphony Hall.

Seriously, do the presumably intelligent men composing the Symphony Orchestra believe that such nonsense impresses or alarms the trustees and the public of the concerts? Do they suspect that soon no one but very young reporters will have either an eye or an ear for these comicalities? Can they not see that such absurd stuff weakens and cheapens whatever is just and strong in the very case they would put to the public? Possibly it is easily deceived; but it does know transparent "bunk" when it reads and hears it. As futile to even the half-informed are the threats of departures from Symphony Hall to Detroit, to New York and to other cities. Nearly every symphony orchestra in the United States is nearing the end of the season. As it is constituted at present, so will it remain constituted, under existing contracts, through March and April. The very union to which the Bostonian players have joined themselves would protect those whom they might now displace. Not for this spring, but for next autumn are managers and musicians proposing contracts. The members of the Boston Orchestra are doing so themselves. Yet they fancy that these alarums and excursions vastly perturb the public of the concerts and turn the hearts of the trustees to water. Such self-delusion, tactlessness, silliness are beyond understanding. They are almost maudlin.

Yet somewhere in the background are wiser and more practical heads. They have completed the organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members Association; they have joined it to the Boston Musicians Protective Association, which in turn is affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians. From the members of the orchestra,—and not, be it noted, from the union at large,—a committee of seven has been chosen to confer with the trustees over changes in contracts, "to comply with the obligations fixed by the by-laws of the American Federation of Musicians," and over the original request for a flat increase of $1000 in the salary next season, of each and every member of the Association. There is no reason to doubt that the trustees will welcome such conference and debate. There the real issue will be joined again.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY JOIN THE UNION

Feb 28

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—A strong effort is in evidence to make the Boston Symphony Orchestra a union orchestra. It has been the one orchestra of first importance in the United States the players of which have not been union men. Major Higginson, the founder, and for many years the sustainer of the organization, was unalterably opposed to his men joining the union, basing his objections on the ground that the tendency of the union was to lower artistic standards.

The present discussion arose when certain of the players made a demand on the trustees of the orchestra for an increase in salaries, the minimum to be of $1000 a year. In reply to this the president of the trustees, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, made a statement to the men in which he said that such an increase would mean that subscriptions of $100,000 a year would have to be forthcoming in addition to the $100,000 now contributed to run the orchestra. He also said that an endowment fund of $2,000,000 which it was proposed to raise would have to be made $4,000,000, and unless either the additional annual amount or the increased endowment were in sight, that it would be impossible to grant the request.

Before the men's demand had been made the management had started to increase salaries when new contracts were made. It is reported that many of the players, among them the concert master, Fredric Fradkin, have signified their willingness to join the union. It is understood that the trustees have no objection to the union provided that they are allowed to secure players from whatever source they desire without dictation.

Boston Herald Feb 28

SYMPHONY MEN MAY RESIGN

Warn Trustees Disruption of Band Will Follow Failure to Grant Increase

Members of Boston Symphony Orchestra have thrown down the gauntlet to the trustees, threatening disruption of the famous organization if higher wages and better working conditions under union rules are not forthcoming.

"We joined the union," said Ernest E. Gardner, one of the players' committee of seven that served the ultimatum on the trustees, "because we wish to be free men. We intend to be serfs no longer."

In this supplementary statement to a Boston American reporter Mr. Gardner predicted that seventy-five of the ninety-five players in the orchestra will quit at the end of the present season if their membership in the union is interfered with or if they do not get higher salaries and better working conditions.

HINT MEN MAY RESIGN.

"This is not a threat," he added. "It is merely a statement of what will happen at the end of the present season if the things we ask are not complied with. The board of trustees has been autocratic. There is much discontent among the players. Between 75 and 84 of the 95 members have already joined the union."

Mr. Gardner declared that "it is ridiculous to say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not give such artistic performances if its members are union players. We will give better performances, because we will be more contented. The argument that we will give inferior concerts because we join a union is ridiculous."

In a letter to the trustees, sent to Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board, the players' committee declares that the majority of the orchestra members have joined the union and insist upon better working conditions and higher wages. The committee requests that "contracts existing between individual members of the Association * * * be so reformed as to enable the members to comply with the duties and obligations fixed by the by-laws of the American Federation of Musicians and the principles for which the latter organiaztion stands."

OPPOSE DISRUPTION.

Touching on the discord in the orchestra the communication reads: "The perfection of any organization depends as much upon the material condition of its members as it does upon their skill and proficiency. There can be no approach to the goal of perfection where there exists discontent and disaffection."

Another section reads; "We wish to assure the trustees and those who are interested in the welfare of the orchestra that our course was prompted as much by a desire to maintain a high standard in the orchestra, to encourage music as an art in the United States, as it was to improve our own condition."

Those who comprised the committee are: Chairman, H. Ringwall, No. 20 Queensbury street; L. H. Kurkdjie, No. 333 Massachusetts avenue; Gustav F. Heim, No. 81 Orchard street, Jamaica Plain; Otto Roth, No. 10 Arlington stret, W. Traupe, No. 47 Paul Gore street, Jamaica Plain; Florian Wittman, No. 11 Tetlow street Roxbury, and Ernest E. Gardned, No. 61 Court street.

Boston Herald Mon. March 9

PLAYERS MAY QUIT SYMPHONY

Representative of Philadelphia Orchestra Pays Visit to Boston

LOCAL COMMITTEE TO DISCUSS WAGES

Developments yesterday in the situation affecting the Boston Symphony Orchestra indicated possibility that several of its leading members might soon be with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, at higher salaries than they receive here.

H. Vanden Beemt, representing the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston yesterday and interviewed many of the members of the Boston organization. When asked at the Copley-Plaza last night if he had made contracts with any of the Boston players, he made denial and further disclaimed any intention of "raiding" the Boston orchestra of its personnel.

"I am here to see if any of the Boston Symphony members intend to leave that orchestra, and at present have no intention to sign contracts," he said. "I merely wish to see if any of the Boston men will be available to join the Philadelphia company.

"We expect that conditions similar to those existing in Boston may arise at Philadelphia in a few weeks, namely, the 'raids' which the western organizations, such as Detroit and Cleveland, have been making on the famous eastern orchestras.

"The contracts of the Philadelphia players expire in about six weeks, or about the middle of April, which will be six weeks before the last concert of the season, and we desire to protect ourselves against the expected 'raiding' which the westerners may carry to our city.

"I have made no definite arrangements yet concerning any Boston Symphony members, though I interviewed many today and many others called me on the telephone and visited me later."

One member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was waiting for an interview with Mr. Vanden Beemt while he was giving his statement to the press.

When asked the difference in the minimum wage paid the Philadelphia players Mr. Vanden Beemt replied it was $50, which was more than the Boston minimum. There was a scarcity of desirable musicians in America, he said. Conditions existing in the United States in musical circles he attributed to lack of imported musicians during the last few years, now causing a tremendous demand which far exceeds the supply.

The players' committee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold a special meeting today at the end of the rehearsal, to consider action to hasten a conference with the trustees on their wage demands. Unless word is received from the management setting a date for the conference, before the meeting is called, it is certain some steps will be taken by the players to continue the proposed meeting.

The committee, in answering Judge Cabot's financial statement a few days ago, in regard to players' salaries, requested the conference with the trustees and renewed their demands for a flat wage increase of $1000 a year for all the 95 members of the orchestra.

The action of Judge Frederick B. Cabot in questioning Concertmaster Frederic Fradkin on his union affiliation, was discussed yesterday at the members' meeting. It was hoped that word from Judge Cabot would be forthcoming yesterday, and when it was not, the call for today's meeting was sent out.

Their position is supported by the American Federation of Musicians.

for The

SYMPHONY MEN AWAIT REPLY

Expect to Hear From Judge Cabot Today

March 1

A special meeting of the committee of eight from the union players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held today after the regular rehearsal to consider what action will be taken by the players, in the event of Judge Cabot failing to make a reply today to the request of the union men for a conference with the board of trustees. The communication had also asked for a flat increase of $1000 for each member of the orchestra.

A meeting was held yesterday to consider the action of Judge Cabot in summoning Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the orchestra, to question him on his action and attitude in joining the union. The list of questions submitted by Judge Cabot to Mr. Fradkin were considered yesterday by the committee and the concertmaster's attorney, and will be returned with answers to the chairman of the board of trustees within a day or two.

Another Symphony manager, Vandeen Beempt of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, arrived in this city yesterday, and it is believed he is here in an effort to secure players for the Philadelphia orchestra. He is the second visiting manager to arrive here in the last week, and it is expected that others will follow.

[illegible] the country be systematized and standardized

Globe March 1

SYMPHONY UNION PLAYERS' COMMITTEE MEETS TODAY

A special meeting of the committee appointed to handle the affairs of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who have joined the Musicians' Union will be held this afternoon after the rehearsal to consider plans to settle the controversy between the members of the union and the board of directors of the orchestra.

Judge Cabot, chairman of the board of directors, has so far failed to reply to the communication from the committee, sent a few days ago, asking for a conference to discuss a general $1000 wage increase and changes in working conditions.

Before starting for Lawrence, where a concert was held yesterday, the committee discussed the situation as it exists between Judge Cabot and Concert Master Fredric Fradkin, and analyzed the list of questions submitted to Mr Fradkin, as to the reasons why he joined the union.

Vanden Breempt, manager of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, registered at the Copley-Plaza. A member of the committee was assigned to obtain a conference with him today.

March 1

CONCERTS AND OPERA

WITH SUNDRY DIGRESSIONS INTO NOISE

More Tactics in the Dispute Within the Symphony Orchestra — Temperaments, Truth and Other Memoranda of the Controversy — Foretelling and Forboding "Aphrodite" — Miss Church and Modern Piano-Pieces—Dr. Muck Living Quietly at Graz in Austria

As wary tacticians the leaders of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members Association—a clumsy name, if there ever was one—are doing their best to hasten the meeting of the committee from its ranks with the trustees of the band. They profess impatient regret because the trustees have not yet named a time and place for such conference, in reply to a letter that could hardly have been delivered before Saturday. In the committee's view, all sorts of ominous consequences impend unless it is answered at once. Obviously all this is tactics and nothing else. The first essential to the continuance of the present controversy and to the steady embittering of it is to keep the orchestra seething with excitement. In such tumult not a few of the men were drawn into an association toward which they had been lukewarm; while in equal hullabaloo, they agreed to the present "requests" for union rules and generally increased salaries. If, by any mischance this excitement should subside, there is no knowing what reactions might ensue among such "temperaments" as the orchestra contains. Hence the insistence upon immediate answer and action by the trustees; hence also the solemn—and also silly—mummeries about the impending departure of this, that and the other musician into the orchestras of Philadelphia or of Detroit.

Behold the end of all things, the spokesmen of the Association are saying to the public of the Symphony Concerts; very bold outwardly, somewhat uneasy within—not unlike country-lads brandishing their grinning pumpkins at innocent wayfarers on Hallow'een. "Rule or Ruin" is what they are whispering to themselves and not a little of the public happens to overhear these whispers. Meanwhile, it is surely tactless—not to say unbrotherly—for this or that abler member of the orchestra and the Association to be declaring with a loud voice that he has joined the union to protect the "mediocrities" in the band; while it is as certainly impolitic to anticipate the desired days of indiscipline by such talking man to man and during performance as was easily observable at moments in the concert of Saturday evening. Nor are these all the pleasures of the hour to the detached observer. If he is at all informed about orchestral conditions in other cities, he hears with amusement the "scouts" of the Philadelphia and the Detroit Orchestras extolling the peace and happiness in which union, conductor and managers work together in those cities. As it happens, Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Gabrilowitsch have been known in private to hold and to express warmly quite another view.

March 1

CHIEF FLUTIST OF SYMPHONY JOINS A. F. M.

Record

More Orchestras Attempt Negotiations With Boston Artists

Musical circles buzzed with additional excitement today when it was learned that G. Laurent, considered the leading flutist in this country, was the latest member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to join the American Federation of Musicians. He paid his $25 initial fee to the committee today. He ranks among the highest-paid artists of the organization.

It also developed today that the management of the Cincinnati and Seattle Symphony Orchestras were attempting negotiations with many Boston Symphony members. John Pargur, prominent in music circles throughout the country, also has his lines out for some of the Boston favorites, it was learned. H. Vanden Beemt, representing the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, has conferred with many of the Symphony players. He has many alluring contracts ready for signatures and his prices are said to appeal to many of the men.

Arrangements for a conference between the Boston Symphony Orchestra members and Judge Fredrick Cabot, president of the trustees, for the purpose of 'ironing out" the wage controversy were expected to be completed late today at the close of today's rehearsal at Symphony Hall.

A special meeting of the players has been called to consider further action. Every effort will be made to hasten the conference between the players and the management.

OUR MAIL BAG

THE MUSICIANS' SIDE

To the Editor of the Herald

The spirit of unrest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra (wholly because the members are estranged from all professional colleagues), is not a new thing. It has been brewing for years. This year the conditions forced the men to concerted action. It was not German propaganda; it was need—financial and gregarious.

The movement of affiliation with the American Federation of Musicians was not started by the younger men in the orchestra, and they can pride themselves that they can heartily refute the statement that they have given way to excitable talk. There have been no threats or slander. They quietly made up their minds when they saw that affiliation with the A. F. of M. was inevitable. The movement was backed by the oldest members of the orchestra, who elected the younger men to do much of the work for them.

As to the Boston Symphony Orchestra being carried on and its qualities maintained, it would perhaps be apropos here to quote Mr. F. Sturm, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, who has been in Boston for the past few days: "The ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra can never be filled with capable musicians if the present members leave that organization and it retains its non-union policy, since there are not in the United States today enough experienced professional musicians to take their places outside of the members of the A. F. of M. It means the absolute end of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as an organization of high standing if the trustees maintain their present stand."

Every other symphony orchestra in the United States is affiliated with the A. F. of M. They are one and all existing happily and paying far larger salaries than the Boston orchestra.

Seventy-one men have already paid their initiation dues and many more have filed their applications. The first chair men, almost without exception, are already members of the A. F. of M. There can be no retracting; the step has been taken.

The monetary gain is not their chief aim; the increase in salaries would not be, after all, a large consideration, since the union scale of wages would not affect the salaries of other than the lower paid men. By becoming affiliated with the A. F. of M. these men have made the organization at last 100 per cent. American, since no man can belong to the federation who has not at least taken out his first papers to become a citizen of this country; it has put them in touch with other organizations, and it has given them access to summer engagements; lastly, it will protect them from loss of position for other than proven incapability.

To assure the public that this orchestra will be carried on and its great qualities maintained, is a statement which unfortunately Judge Cabot will find himself unable to substantiate unless he changes his present short-sighted policy.

The orchestra is already more than two-thirds members of the A. F. of M. To continue this orchestra as non-union means that it will be compelled to fill its ranks with students and mediocre musicians. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is rated today no higher musically than many other of the symphony orchestras in the United States. If these are affiliated with the A. F. of M. and are holding their enviable positions, it seems incongruous that the Boston orchestra could not do likewise.

The die is cast; the movement is concerted; bids are coming in from other orchestras; the men are firm in their stand because it is just, and, most important of all, because it is a 100 per cent. American movement.

CARL E. GARDNER.

Boston, Feb. 27.

Trans. Mar 1

MUSICIANS OF SYMPHONY MAY LEAVE BOSTON

Several prominent musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it seems probable today, will soon sever their connections in the Hub, and leave for Philadelphia, where they will enter the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra at higher salaries than they are now receiving.

H. Vanden Beemt, representing the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston yesterday and interviewed many of the members of the Boston organization. When asked at the Copley-Plaza last night if he had made contracts with any of the Boston players, he made denial and further disclaimed any intention of "raiding" the Boston orchestra of its personnel.

"I am here to see if any of the Boston Symphony members intend to leave that orchestra, and at present have no intention to sign contracts," he said. "I merely wish to see if any of the Boston men will be available to join the Philadelphia company.

"We expect that conditions similar to those existing in Boston may arise at Philadelphia in a few weeks, namely, the 'raids' which the western organizations, such as Detroit and Cleveland, have been making on the famous eastern orchestras.

"The contracts of the Philadelphia players expire in about six weeks, or about the middle of April, which will be six weeks before the last concert of the season, and we desire to protect ourselves against the expected 'raiding' which the westerners may carry to our city.

"I have made no definite arrangements yet concerning any Boston Symphony members, though I interviewed many today and many others called me on the telephone and visited me later."

One member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was waiting for an interview with Mr. Vanden Beemt while he was giving his statement to the press.

When asked the difference in the minimum wage paid the Philadelphia players Mr. Vanden Beemt replied it was $50, which was more than the Boston minimum. There was a scarcity of desirable musicians in America, he said. Conditions existing in the United States in musical circles he attributed to lack of imported musicians during the last few years, now causing a tremendous demand which far exceeds the supply.

The players' committee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold a special meeting today at the end of the rehearsal, to consider action to hasten a conference with the trustees on their wage demands. Unless word is received from the management setting a date for the conference, before the meeting is called, it is certain some steps will be taken by the players to continue the proposed meeting.

The committee, in answering Judge Cabot's financial statement a few days ago, in regard to players' salaries, requested the conference with the trustees and renewed their demands for a flat wage increase of $1000 a year for all the 86 members of the orchestra.

Globe March 5 TH

CLASH IMPERILS SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Players Threaten Not to Go On in Cambridge

Truce Effected—Conductor Said to Have Barred Room to Fradkin

As a result of a tiff between Conductor Pierre Monteux of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Concert Master Frederick Fradkin the players of the Symphony Orchestra threatened not to go on with their concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last night unless the conductor apologized.

Although no apology was made the players were finally persuaded to go on through the combined efforts of a committee of several of the players and of the committee of arrangements. It was pointed out that the public only was discommoded by the delay.

As a result of the clash the players were so incensed, it is reported, that for a while it loked like a stampede in the dressing room.

The audience did not know what was taking place.

According to the musicians, the concert master and the conductor have in the past used a joint dressing room. Last night, when Fradkin went into the room Monteux is reported to have said that the room was for the management and that Fradkin should use the dressing room used by the musicians. To this Fradkin is alleged to have taken exception and demanded an apology.

One of the members of a committee of seven, who accompanied Fradkin home last night, when asked about the incident, said the tiff had taken place, but asked to be excused from commenting on it. He said the committee would handle it today.

The member further stated that Monteux had not made a statement for or against the union, but that he was trying to steer a neutral course between the trustees and the musicians.

Today a committee, consisting of Arthur Berenson, counsel for the union, and Rudolph Ringwall will call upon Judge Cabot in an effort to secure a conference.

SETTLEMENT EXPECTED BY UNION MUSICIANS

Although neither the union musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, nor the trustees of this organization, would make any statement last night as to the situation created by the men joining the American Federation of Musicians and demanding a flat increase of $1000 a year in salaries, a feeling that a satisfactory adjustment can be reached prevailed among the leaders of the Musicians' Union.

This feeling was based on a conference held yesterday between Judge Frederick Cabot, chairman of the trustees, and Arthur Berenson, attorney for the union musicians. It was stated afterward that the conference was marked with friendly spirit.

The union leaders believe Judge Cabot will grant the request of the men for a conference with representatives of the trustees.

After yesterday's conference held in Judge Cabot's office, Exchange Building, Mr Berenson gave out a brief statement. He said he put before Judge Cabot the advantages that would come both to the men and to the orchestra from the men joining the union; that it would increase the earning capacity of the men and relieve the trustees to some extent of the pressure for increased salaries.

Mr Berenson gave his opinion that there was nothing in the contract between the men and the trustees that would prevent them from joining the union, but he did not know if there were inconsistencies between the bylaws of the union and the contracts with the orchestra.

He stated that he hoped the trustees would not make it impossible for the men to carry out their contracts and he asked that it be made clear that they have never threatened to break any contracts or obligations. All they ask is a reformation of any inconsistencies between their contracts and the union obligations, he said.

Mr Berenson stated that Judge Cabot could not make any reply to that until he found out what the duties and obligations of the men to the union were.

Judge Cabot's reply to the men's letter of Feb 27 was made public yesterday by the men's committee. After saying that the trustees were unwilling to believe that the men would enter into new relations which would violate the terms of their contracts, he stated that the trustees appreciated the desire of many members of the orchestra for increased salaries and the reasons prompting it.

He then summarized the purpose of the trustees to seek an increase in the endowment of the Symphony Orchestra and to increase its income in every possible way. These efforts, he said, were principally in order to enable the trustees to obtain the best artists for the orchestra and to properly compensate men of such qualifications.

NURSES INVITED TO

RCH 5, 1920—TWENTY

Herald

BARELY AVERT WALKOUT BY SYMPHONY MEN

Unionists Persuade Them to Play After Fradkin and Monteux Quarrel

LEADERS IN ROW OVER DRESSING ROOM

Trustees Are Expected to Meet Committee of Players Soon

Few persons in the big audience at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, realized how near they came to being disappointed in hearing last night's performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A "tiff" between the conductor and the concert-master so incensed the players that, for a time, they threatened not to go on with the concert.

It appears, from the men's version of the contretemps, that Pierre Monteux, the conductor, questioned the right of Fredric Fradkin, concert-master and virtuoso, to use the dressing room that in the past has been jointly used by them and a few of the most prominent soloists during the one concert a month played in the season at Sanders Theatre.

Players Incensed

Mr. Fradkin, thinking the conductor was jesting, made him repeat his statement to that effect three or four times to make sure that he was in earnest. Then Fradkin, who is next in position to the conductor, repaired to the general dressing room used by a majority of the members. This act of his led to speculation and finally the story came out, and the men became so incensed that they threatened not to begin the concert unless an apology was made by the conductor.

The combined persuasion of Mr. Fradkin and members of the committee of seven, all members of the union, was needed to appease the men and induce them to play. The one argument that appealed to the men was that the public should not be made to suffer because of the alleged pettiness of any one person.

The fact that this incident comes on the heels of a refusal of the management to permit Atty. Berenson to enter the stage door of Symphony Hall on Wednesday to meet the men's committee has so aroused the players that a demand may be made on the trustees today that Conductor Monteux apologize to Mr. Fradkin without further delay.

Although Mr. Fradkin refused to discuss last night's affair a prominent member of the committee of seven, who accompanied him to his home, confirmed the story, but asked that Mr. Fradkin be excused from discussing a matter that is so distressing to him.

(Continued on Page Six, Column 2.)

AVERT WALKOUT OF SYMPHONY MEN

(Continued from Page One)

From this member of the committee it appears that Mr. Fradkin, went, as usual, to leave his street clothes in the dressing room used in the past jointly by him and Conductor Monteux. The latter, according to this member, told Mr. Fradkin that the room was for the management, and now that he, Fradkin, was with the musicians and on their side he had better use their room. When told by the conductor that "he was very private dressing room" is used in general room where the players leave their street clothes.

Members of the players' committee later recalled that in a recent interview with them Conductor Monteux stated that he had never denied that he was for or against the unionization of the orchestra, but was trying to maintain a neutral attitude in the present controversy between the trustees and the men.

A conference between the trustees and the players' committee of seven within the next few days is looked for as a result of yesterday's meeting between Judge Frederick P. Cabot and Atty. Arthur Berenson, counsel for the union members.

Today Atty. Berenson and Rudolph Ringwall, chairman of the committee of seven, will call on Judge Cabot in an effort to hasten this conference, in view of their fear that if the controversy is not spedily adjusted the orchestra may become disintegrated, as a number of the players have been offered alluring inducements to join other orchestras.

Messrs. Berenson and Ringwall hope to be in a position at today's conference with Judge Cabot to show him that the by-laws of the local union of the American Federation of Musicians do not conflict with the contracts now in existence between the individual players and the management.

The decision to call upon Judge Cabot today was reached at a meeting of the full committee with Atty. Berenson, at which the latter's meeting earlier in the day with Judge Cabot was discussed. It was at this meeting that the chairman of the board of trustees inquired as to whether the by-laws of the union conflicted in any way with the contracts now held by the players with the management.

PHILADELPHIA MEN WIN

Orchestra Players Receive Increase of $5

[Special Dispatch to the Herald]

PHILADELPHIA, March 4—Grave difficulties between the management and members of the Philadelphia orchestra over a demand for increased wages which threatened to end disastrously for the famous organization were averted today at a conference between Manager Arthur Judson and a committee representing the players. The agreement reached is said to have the approval of 75 of the 94 musicians who constitute the orchestra.

Recently a committee presented a demand for an increase of $10 per week for the 39 orchestra members who at present receive the minimum of $45 weekly, and a sliding scale of increases for those receiving in excess of this sum now.

A deadlock resulted until today when an offer of $5 a week was accepted.

a

Music

CONCERTS AND OPERA

DISCIPLINE AND THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Episode at Cambridge and Several Clear Morals—Pieces, Performance and a Singer Disabled—"Aida" by the Chicago Company — The New Public to Which It Ministers and That It Meets More Than Half Way — Verdi's Music with More Vigor Than Finesse

THE whiff of open quarrel that blew over the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening, was certainly trivial and probably tactless. Yet it is clear sign of the decline of discipline in the orchestra, of the disposition of the players to use a high hand, of the tension that now strains the relations of conductor, band, management and trustees. It is an exceedingly minor matter whether the concert-master lays off his overcoat and straightens his tie in a room with the conductor or in a room with the rank and file. Such "questions of personal privilege" are familiar vexations in opera companies; now it appears they may also disturb the peace of orchestras. Usually managers adjust them with patience, even when there is loud talk about "apologies"; while bystanders observe these pastimes of temperament with amused smiles. It is, however, another and graver thing when the men of an orchestra are so eager to pick a quarrel over a trifle as they seemed to be last evening and when they threaten to make a waiting audience the victim of their irritation. There goes indiscipline, and without discipline no such body as the Symphony Orchestra can exist, much less flourish. There also goes disregard of obligation to the public and without its good will there can be no Symphony Concerts in Cambridge, in Boston, or anywhere else.

Not a few of the players fly into angry furies if they are told that their clear purpose with the orchestra is to rule or ruin it. Yet what plainer evidence could they give of such intention than the threat to compel the dismissal of the audience at Cambridge? They are as wrathful at any hint that their courses are not well and calmly considered; yet there they were last evening making a mountain of an "apology" and frantically seeking the "publicity" which to some of them has become the breath of present life. Before the representatives of the players and the representatives of the trustees sit down to negotiations over the questions in issue, discipline in the fullest sense of the word should be sharply and firmly restored in the Symphony Orchestra. For, without discipline, such a body cannot fulfill its first obligation, which is to give the public the concerts announced, at the stand-

Symphony Concerts are at ... hundred men, who may or may not be receiving the salaries they deserve, will then be jobless. It is quite true that other orchestras would eagerly absorb a few notable virtuosi in the Boston band. It is by no means so demonstrable that they are at all eager to annex the rank and file. By all accounts, the delegates of the players and the spokesmen of the trustees are about to sit down to thorough-going negotiation. Therein they will consider and perhaps determine how far the obligations of the men toward their union are consistent with their obligations to the orchestra, and how far the rules of the union are in harmony with the declared policies and standards of the Symphony Concerts. Such incidents as that in Cambridge do not smooth the way—to say nothing of tempers—in such debates and decisions.

The Concert Itself

Stricken with a cold at the eleventh hour, Mrs. Laura Littlefield was unable to sing with the Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last evening. Instead of adding another orchestral number to the programme Mr. Monteux abandoned his intention of playing Wagner's Overture to the "Flying Dutchman" and substituted for it Charpentier's orchestral suite, "Impressions of Italy," which he had played in Boston last week. The two other numbers on his original list, the First Symphony of Brahms and Borodin's orchestral sketch "On the Steppes of Central Asia," remained. The qualities which distinguished Mr. Monteux's reading of the Brahms Symphony were even more marked than they were last December when he played it here for the first time. In his hands the first movement is gripping and dramatic; it might well stand alone as a Tragic Overture, and might better deserve that title than the piece which the composer so designated. The second movement has often seemed no more than a complex development of a somewhat academic theme; but Mr. Monteux makes it eloquent and moving instrumental song. Only in the last movement does he disappoint, the incisiveness and vigor which he gives it are in keeping with his conception, but one misses the note of uplift and exaltation which certain other conductors have found in the music.

The years have robbed Borodin's piece of its pictorial quality. There is far more suggestion of waste and desolate places in the piano accompaniment of Gretchaninov's song "The Steppe." His music charms because of its stinking melodies and instrumental coloring, but it is now hardly more than a pleasing Intermezzo à la Ruse. Nor is Charpentier's Suite immune from the ravages of Time; the musically discriminating have become distrustful of it. But there is no gainsaying its verve and vividness, its melodic appeal. And if it has its taints of theatricalism, especially in the last movement, it has its moments of fancy. Certain details of picturesque description linger in the memory; the serenading mandolins, the marching girls with their water pitchers, the tinkling bells of the mules; and there is genuine poetry in the fourth movement, "On the Summits." It is easy to predict that for a long time to come audiences will delight in this music, and, after all, there are few pieces so frankly entertaining in the repertory of the orchestra.

Lei March 5 [illegible]

SYMPHONY'S TROUBLE AT OPEN BREAK

Post

Monteux Ejects Fradkin From Dressing Room

Orchestra Near Revolt at Cambridge Concert

Players Demand The Conductor Make Apology

An open breach between Pierre B. Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the same body and member of the union, was created last night, when the conductor ordered Mr. Fradkin to dress with the players.

The custom has been for the conductor and concertmaster to use the same dressing room.

DEMAND APOLOGY

The trouble came at the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last night, where the orchestra was to play.

Continued on

OUR MAIL BAG

THE MUSICIANS' SIDE

To the Editor of the Herald

The spirit of unrest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra (wholly because the members are estranged from all professional colleagues), is not a new thing. It has been brewing for years. This year the conditions forced the men to concerted action. It was not German propaganda; it was need—financial and gregarious.

The movement of affiliation with the American Federation of Musicians was not started by the younger men in the orchestra, and they can pride themselves that they can heartily refute the statement that they have given way to excitable talk. There have been no threats or slander. They quietly made up their minds when they saw that affiliation with the A. F. of M. was inevitable. The movement was backed by the oldest members of the orchestra, who elected the younger men to do much of the work for them.

As to the Boston Symphony Orchestra being carried on and its qualities maintained, it would perhaps be apropos here to quote Mr. F. Sturm, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, who has been in Boston for the past few days: "The ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra can never be filled with capable musicians if the present members leave that organization and it retains its non-union policy, since there are not in the United States today enough experienced professional musicians to take their places outside of the members of the A. F. of M. It means the absolute end of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as an organization of high standing if the trustees maintain their present stand."

Every other symphony orchestra in the United States is affiliated with the A. F. of M. They are one and all existing happily and paying far larger salaries than the Boston orchestra.

Seventy-one men have already paid their initiation dues and many more have filed their applications. The first chair men, almost without exception, are already members of the A. F. of M. There can be no retracting; the step has been taken.

The monetary gain is not their chief aim; the increase in salaries would not be, after all, a large consideration, since the union scale of wages would not affect the salaries of other than the lower paid men. By becoming affiliated with the A. F. of M. these men have made the organization at last 100 per cent. American, since no man can belong to the federation who has not at least taken out his first papers to become a citizen of this country; it has put them in touch with other organizations, and it has given them access to summer engagements; lastly, it will protect them from loss of position for other than proven incapability.

To assure the public that this orchestra will be carried on and its great qualities maintained, is a statement which unfortunately Judge Cabot will find himself unable to substantiate unless he changes his present short-sighted policy.

The orchestra is already more than two-thirds members of the A. F. of M. To continue this orchestra as non-union means that it will be compelled to fill its ranks with students and mediocre musicians. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is rated today no higher musically than many other of the symphony orchestras in the United States. If these are affiliated with the A. F. of M. and are holding their enviable positions, it seems incongruous that the Boston orchestra could not do likewise.

The die is cast; the movement is concerted; bids are coming in from other orchestras; the men are firm in their stand because it is just, and, most important of all, because it is a 100 per cent. American movement.

CARL E. GARDNER.

Boston, Feb. 27.

MUSICIANS OF SYMPHONY MAY LEAVE BOSTON

Several prominent musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it seems probable today, will soon sever their connections in the Hub, and leave for Philadelphia, where they will enter the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra at higher salaries than they are now receiving.

H. Vanden Beemt, representing the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston yesterday and interviewed many of the members of the Boston organization. When asked at the Copley-Plaza last night if he had made contracts with any of the Boston players, he made denial and further disclaimed any intention of "raiding" the Boston orchestra of its personnel.

"I am here to see if any of the Boston Symphony members intend to leave that orchestra, and at present have no intention to sign contracts," he said. "I merely wish to see if any of the Boston men will be available to join the Philadelphia company.

"We expect that conditions similar to those existing in Boston may arise at Philadelphia in a few weeks, namely, the 'raids' which the western organizations, such as Detroit and Cleveland, have been making on the famous eastern orchestras.

"The contracts of the Philadelphia players expire in about six weeks, or about the middle of April, which will be six weeks before the last concert of the season, and we desire to protect ourselves against the expected 'raiding' which the westerners may carry to our city.

"I have made no definite arrangements yet concerning any Boston Symphony members, though I interviewed many today and many others called me on the telephone and visited me later."

One member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was waiting for an interview with Mr. Vanden Beemt while he was giving his statement to the press.

When asked the difference in the minimum wage paid the Philadelphia players Mr. Vanden Beemt replied it was $50, which was more than the Boston minimum. There was a scarcity of desirable musicians in America, he said. Conditions existing in the United States in musical circles he attributed to lack of imported musicians during the last few years, now causing a tremendous demand which far exceeds the supply.

The players' committee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold a special meeting today at the end of the rehearsal, to consider action to hasten a conference with the trustees on their wage demands. Unless word is received from the management setting a date for the conference, before the meeting is called, it is certain some steps will be taken by the players to continue the proposed meeting.

The committee, in answering Judge Cabot's financial statement a few days ago, in regard to players' salaries, requested the conference with the trustees and renewed their demands for a flat wage increase of $1000 a year for all the 95 members of the orchestra.

CLASH IMPERILS SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Players Threaten Not to Go On in Cambridge

Truce Effected—Conductor Said to Have Barred Room to Fradkin

As a result of a tiff between Conductor Pierre Monteux of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Concert Master Frederick Fradkin the players of the Symphony Orchestra threatened not to go on with their concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last night unless the conductor apologized.

Although no apology was made the players were finally persuaded to go on through the combined efforts of a committee of several of the players and of the committee of arrangements. It was pointed out that the public only was discommoded by the delay.

As a result of the clash the players were so incensed, it is reported, that for a while it loked like a stampede in the dressing room.

The audience did not know what was taking place.

According to the musicians, the concert master and the conductor have in the past used a joint dressing room. Last night, when Fradkin went into the room Monteux is reported to have said that the room was for the management and that Fradkin should use the dressing room used by the musicians. To this Fradkin is alleged to have taken exception and demanded an apology.

One of the members of a committee of seven, who accompanied Fradkin home last night, when asked about the incident, said the tiff had taken place, but asked to be excused from commenting on it. He said the committee would handle it today.

The member further stated that Monteux had not made a statement for or against the union, but that he was trying to steer a neutral course between the trustees and the musicians.

Today a committee, consisting of Arthur Berenson, counsel for the union, and Rudolph Ringwall will call upon Judge Cabot in an effort to secure a conference.

SETTLEMENT EXPECTED BY UNION MUSICIANS

Although neither the union musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, nor the trustees of this organization, would make any statement last night as to the situation created by the men joining the American Federation of Musicians and demanding a flat increase of $1000 a year in salaries, a feeling that a satisfactory adjustment can be reached prevailed among the leaders of the Musicians' Union.

This feeling was based on a conference held yesterday between Judge Frederick Cabot, chairman of the trustees, and Arthur Berenson, attorney for the union musicians. It was stated afterward that the conference was marked with friendly spirit.

The union leaders believe Judge Cabot will grant the request of the men for a conference with representatives of the trustees.

After yesterday's conference held in Judge Cabot's office, Exchange Building, Mr Berenson gave out a brief statement. He said he put before Judge Cabot the advantages that would come both to the men and to the orchestra from the men joining the union; that it would increase the earning capacity of the men and relieve the trustees to some extent of the pressure for increased salaries.

Mr Berenson gave his opinion that there was nothing in the contract between the men and the trustees that would prevent them from joining the union, but he did not know if there were inconsistencies between the bylaws of the union and the contracts with the orchestra.

He stated that he hoped the trustees would not make it impossible for the men to carry out their contracts and he asked that it be made clear that they have never threatened to break any contracts or obligations. All they ask is a reformation of any inconsistencies between their contracts and the union obligations, he said.

Mr Berenson stated that Judge Cabot could not make any reply to that until he found out what the duties and obligations of the men to the union were.

Judge Cabot's reply to the men's letter of Feb 27 was made public yesterday by the men's committee. After saying that the trustees were unwilling to believe that the men would enter into new relations which would violate the terms of their contracts, he stated that the trustees appreciated the desire of many members of the orchestra for increased salaries and the reasons prompting it.

He then summarized the purpose of the trustees to seek an increase in the endowment of the Symphony Orchestra and to increase its income in every possible way. These efforts, he said, were principally in order to enable the trustees to obtain the best artists for the orchestra and to properly compensate men of such qualifications.

NURSES INVITED TO

BARELY AVERT WALKOUT BY SYMPHONY MEN

Unionists Persuade Them to Play After Fradkin and Monteux Quarrel

LEADERS IN ROW OVER DRESSING ROOM

Trustees Are Expected to Meet Committee of Players Soon

Few persons in the big audience at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, realized how near they came to being disappointed in hearing last night's performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A "tiff" between the conductor and the concert-master so incensed the players that, for a time, they threatened not to go on with the concert.

It appears, from the men's version of the contretemps, that Pierre Monteux, the conductor, questioned the right of Fredric Fradkin, concert-master and virtuoso, to use the dressing room that in the past has been jointly used by them and a few of the most prominent soloists during the one concert a month played in the season at Sanders Theatre.

Players Incensed

Mr. Fradkin, thinking the conductor was jesting, made him repeat his statement to that effect three or four times to make sure that he was in earnest. Then Fradkin, who is next in position to the conductor, repaired to the general dressing room used by a majority of the members. This act of his led to speculation and finally the story came out, and the men became so incensed that they threatened not to begin the concert unless an apology was made by the conductor.

The combined persuasion of Mr. Fradkin and members of the committee of seven, all members of the union, was needed to appease the men and induce them to play. The one argument that appealed to the men was that the public should not be made to suffer because of the alleged pettiness of any one person.

The fact that this incident comes on the heels of a refusal of the management to permit Atty. Berenson to enter the stage door of Symphony Hall on Wednesday to meet the men's committee has so aroused the players that a demand may be made on the trustees today that Conductor Monteux apologize to Mr. Fradkin without further delay.

Although Mr. Fradkin refused to dis-

(Continued on Page Six, Column 3.)

AVERT WALKOUT OF SYMPHONY MEN

(Continued from Page One)

cuss last night's affair a prominent member of the committee of seven, who accompanied him to his home, confirmed the story, but asked that Mr. Fradkin be excused from discussing a matter that is so distressing to him.

From this member of the committee it appears that Mr. Fradkin, went, as usual, to leave his street clothes in the dressing room used in the past jointly by him and Conductor Monteux. The latter, according to this member, told Mr. Fradkin that the room was for the management, and now that he, Fradkin, was with the musicians and on their side he had better use their room. When told by the conductor that "he was very much private dressing room and used the general room where the players leave their street clothes.

Members of the players' committee later recalled that in a recent interview with them Conductor Monteux stated that he had never denied that he was for or against the unionization of the orchestra, but was trying to maintain a neutral attitude in the present controversy between the trustees and the men.

A conference between the trustees and the players' committee of seven within the next few days is looked for as a result of yesterday's meeting between Judge Frederick P. Cabot and Atty. Arthur Berenson, counsel for the union members.

Today Atty. Berenson and Rudolph Ringwall, chairman of the committee of seven, will call on Judge Cabot in an effort to hasten this conference, in view of their fear that if the controversy is not spedily adjusted the orchestra may become disintegrated, as a number of the players have been offered alluring inducements to join other orchestras.

Messrs. Berenson and Ringwall hope to be in a position at today's conference with Judge Cabot to show him that the by-laws of the local union of the American Federation of Musicians do not conflict with the contracts now in existence between the individual players and the management.

The decision to call upon Judge Cabot today was reached at a meeting of the full committee with Atty. Berenson, at which the latter's meeting earlier in the day with Judge Cabot was discussed. It was at this meeting that the chairman of the board of trustees inquired as to whether the by-laws of the union conflicted in any way with the contracts now held by the players with the management.

PHILADELPHIA MEN WIN

Orchestra Players Receive Increase of $5

[Special Dispatch to the Herald]

PHILADELPHIA, March 4—Grave difficulties between the management and members of the Philadelphia orchestra over a demand for increased wages which threatened to end disastrously for the famous organization were averted today at a conference between Manager Arthur Judson and a committee representing the players. The agreement reached is said to have the approval of 75 of the 94 musicians who constitute the orchestra.

Recently a committee presented a demand for an increase of $10 per week for the 39 orchestra members who at present receive the minimum of $45 weekly, and a sliding scale of increases for those receiving in excess of this sum now.

A deadlock resulted until today when an offer of $5 a week was accepted.

a

Music

CONCERTS AND OPERA

DISCIPLINE AND THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Episode at Cambridge and Several Clear Morals—Pieces, Performance and a Singer Disabled—"Aida" by the Chicago Company — The New Public to Which It Ministers and That It Meets More Than Half Way — Verdi's Music with More Vigor Than Finesse

THE whiff of open quarrel that blew over the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening, was certainly trivial and probably tactless. Yet it is clear sign of the decline of discipline in the orchestra, of the disposition of the players to use a high hand, of the tension that now strains the relations of conductor, band, management and trustees. It is an exceedingly minor matter whether the concert-master lays off his overcoat and straightens his tie in a room with the conductor or in a room with the rank and file. Such "questions of personal privilege" are familiar vexations in opera companies; now it appears they may also disturb the peace of orchestras. Usually managers adjust them with patience, even when there is loud talk about "apologies"; while bystanders observe these pastimes of temperament with amused smiles. It is, however, another and graver thing when the men of an orchestra are so eager to pick a quarrel over a trifle as they seemed to be last evening and when they threaten to make a waiting audience the victim of their irritation. There goes indiscipline, and without discipline no such body as the Symphony Orchestra can exist, much less flourish. There also goes disregard of obligation to the public and without its good will there can be no Symphony Concerts in Cambridge, in Boston, or anywhere else.

Not a few of the players fly into angry furies if they are told that their clear purpose with the orchestra is to rule or ruin it. Yet what plainer evidence could they give of such intention than the threat to compel the dismissal of the audience at Cambridge? They are as wrathful at any hint that their courses are not well and calmly considered; yet there they were last evening making a mountain of an "apology" and frantically seeking the "publicity" which to some of them has become the breath of present life. Before the representatives of the players and the representatives of the trustees sit down to negotiations over the questions in issue, discipline in the fullest sense of the word should be sharply and firmly restored in the Symphony Orchestra. For, without discipline, such a body cannot fulfill its first obligation, which is to give the public the concerts announced, at the stand- Symphony Concerts are at end, and a hundred men, who may or may not be receiving the salaries they deserve, will then be jobless. It is quite true that other orchestras would eagerly absorb a few notable virtuosi in the Boston band. It is by no means so demonstrable that they are at all eager to annex the rank and file. By all accounts, the delegates of the players and the spokesmen of the trustees are about to sit down to thorough-going negotiation. Therein they will consider and perhaps determine how far the obligations of the men toward their union are consistent with their obligations to the orchestra, and how far the rules of the union are in harmony with the declared policies and standards of the Symphony Concerts. Such incidents as that in Cambridge do not smooth the way—to say nothing of tempers—in such debates and decisions.

The Concert Itself

Stricken with a cold at the eleventh hour, Mrs. Laura Littlefield was unable to sing with the Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last evening. Instead of adding another orchestral number to the programme Mr. Monteux abandoned his intention of playing Wagner's Overture to the "Flying Dutchman" and substituted for it Charpentier's orchestral suite, "Impressions of Italy," which he had played in Boston last week. The two other numbers on his original list, the First Symphony of Brahms and Borodin's orchestral sketch "On the Steppes of Central Asia," remained. The qualities which distinguished Mr. Monteux's reading of the Brahms Symphony were even more marked than they were last December when he played it here for the first time. In his hands the first movement is gripping and dramatic; it might well stand alone as a Tragic Overture, and might better deserve that title than the piece which the composer so designated. The second movement has often seemed no more than a complex development of a somewhat academic theme; but Mr. Monteux makes it eloquent and moving instrumental song. Only in the last movement does he disappoint, the incisiveness and vigor which he gives it are in keeping with his conception, but one misses the note of uplift and exaltation which certain other conductors have found in the music.

The years have robbed Borodin's piece of its pictorial quality. There is far more suggestion of waste and desolate places in the piano accompaniment of Gretchaninov's song "The Steppe." His music charms because of its strinking melodies and instrumental coloring, but it is now hardly more than a pleasing Intermezzo à la Ruse. Nor is Charpentier's Suite immune from the ravages of Time; the musically discriminating have become distrustful of it. But there is no gainsaying its verve and vividness, its melodic appeal. And if it has its taints of theatricalism, especially in the last movement, it has its moments of fancy. Certain details of picturesque description linger in the memory; the serenading mandolins, the marching girls with their water pitchers, the tinkling bells of the mules; and there is genuine poetry in the fourth movement, "On the Summits." It is easy to predict that for a long time to come audiences will delight in this music, and, after all, there are few pieces so frankly entertaining in the repertory of the orchestra.

SYMPHONY'S TROUBLE AT OPEN BREAK

Monteux Ejects Fradkin From Dressing Room

Orchestra Near Revolt at Cambridge Concert

Players Demand The Conductor Make Apology

An open breach between Pierre B. Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the same body and member of the union, was created last night, when the conductor ordered Mr. Fradkin to dress with the players.

The custom has been for the conductor and concertmaster to use the same dressing room.

DEMAND APOLOGY

The trouble came at the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last night, where orchestra was to play.

Continued on

The Boston Traveler

ESTABLISHED 1825—95TH YEAR—NO. 257, BOSTON, FRIDAY, MARCH 5, 1920. EIGHTEEN PAGES PRICE TWO CENTS

CITY

REPARE ULTIMATUM FOR TRUSTEES' HEAD

Call Special Meeting for Tomorrow and Will Demand Prompt Decision on Unionization and Salary Issues

Moon rises 6:52 P. M.
High tide 11:40 A. M.
All vehicles must be lighted by 6:09 P. M.

EN BREAK IN SYMPHONY DISPUTE

Continued from First Page

caused a strike of the players, who feared the concert only after pressure had been brought to bear on them by members of the union players' committee of seven and by Mr. Fradkin himself. The players, however, will demand that an apology be made to Mr. Fradkin. It was stated last night, Mr. Fradkin could not be reached last night, but the story was verified by a member of the players' committee, who accompanied the concertmaster to his home.

Told to Dress With Men

The trouble started when Mr. Fradkin entered the dressing room of Conductor Monteux last night. The custom has been for both men to use the same room. Mr. Monteux, however, immediately informed Mr. Fradkin that the room was for the musicians and since he now was one of the musicians he might as well dress with them. The concertmaster was dumfounded, hardly believing his ears, at first and questioned the conductor three or four times, each time receiving the same reply.

Here the news of the break spread quickly, and the players became incensed said they would refuse to appear. Then they demanded that the conductor apologize to Mr. Fradkin. Finally, however, the matter was dropped temporarily by the players, after much urging by members of the union committee and especially by Mr. Fradkin himself, and the concert was given.

The players, however, will demand of the board of trustees that Conductor Monteux apologize to the concertmaster for his action last night.

Last night's episode is believed to be the result of the present controversy over the unionization of the orchestra. Early in the movement, Mr. Fradkin surprised players and management alike by voluntarily applying for admission to the union. Since that time he has been extremely active in the movement to organize the orchestra and has acted with the committee of seven, which is conducting the union players' affairs.

DAY, MARCH 5, 19

FRADKIN-MONTEUX CLASH STIRS SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Open hostilities between Concert Master Frederic Fradkin and Conductor Pierre Monteux of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the dressing rooms at Sanders Theatre last night developed when Monteux gave Fradkin to understand that as he had thrown his lot with the men he was not wanted in the dressing rooms which have hitherto been used by him and some of the soloists. Fradkin thought at first that Monteux was jesting, and had him repeat the remarks several times. He then went out to the general dresing room of the men. In some way they learned of the incident and refused to play for the concert unless an apology was made to Fradkin by Monteux.

Continued persuasion of Mr. Fradkin and the committee of seven finally turned the trick, and the concert was given under the conductorship as usual. Coming on the heels of the refusal to allow their attorney, Arthur Berenson, into the members' rooms in the Symphony Hall building, the feeling is running at fever heat among the musicians.

Today Atty. Berenson and Rudolph Ellingwall will visit Judge Cabot to Masten the conference for it is feared that they can no longer hold the players back from drastic action.

Preparing Ultimatum

"Insensed at what they describe as 'stalling tactics' of Judge Cabot, union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Association will meet Sunday to decide on a scale of prices and working conditions which are to be presented to the trustees of the orchestra for their acceptance or rejection. Convinced that the delay of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra in meeting their committee and adjusting the matter is merely a subterfuge to wear down their resistance, the committee, acting for more than 90 per cent. of the musicians, will some time early next week present Judge Frederick P. Cabot with an ultimatum.

Some of the members go so far as to say that the treatment of Concert Master Frederic Fradkin at Sanders Theatre last night by Conductor Pierre Monteux is but a reflection of the attitude of the trustees since the matter of unionization became public.

Fight to Finish

"Judge Cabot has had plenty of time to make a decision one way or the other, and we do not intend to wait any longer," a prominent member of the orchestra said last night.

"We shall not attempt longer to dissuade members from obtaining remunerative contracts elsewhere. The time has come for a show-down, and coercion and propaganda will now be met with the determined resistance that they deserve at our hands," he concluded.

Mrs. Timmons

REPARE ULTIMATUM
FOR TRUSTEES' HEA

have made arrangements for its rental. The American Federation of for him in the Academy of Arts and Woman's Clubs will hold a reception sciences on the afternoon of his arrival.

...tonight, snow Saturday; much colder; south to nor'west winds. Sunrise 6:13; sunset 5:39.
Moon rises 6:52 P. M.
High tide 11:40 A. M.
All vehicles must be lighted by 6:09 P. M.

The Boston Traveler

ESTABLISHED 1825—95TH YEAR—NO. 257, BOSTON, FRIDAY, MARCH 5, 1920. EIGHTEEN PAGES PRICE TWO CENTS

CITY

...ing incensed said they would refuse to appear. Then they demanded that the conductor apologize to Fradkin. Finally, however, the matter was dropped temporarily by the players after much urging by members of the union committee and especially by Mr. Fradkin himself, and the concert was given.

The players, however, will demand of the board of trustees that Conductor Monteux apologize to the concertmaster for his action last night.

Last night's episode is believed to be the result of the present controversy over the unionization of the orchestra. Early in the movement, Mr. Fradkin surprised players and management alike by voluntarily applying for admission to the union. Since that time he has been extremely active in the movement to organize the orchestra and has acted with the committee of seven, which is conducting the union players' affairs.

...DAY, MARCH 5, 19...

...EN BREAK IN SYMPHONY DISPUTE

Continued from First Page

...caused a strike of the players, who staged the concert only after pressure had been brought to bear on them by members of the union players' committee of seven and by Mr. Fradkin himself. The players, however, will demand that an apology be made to Mr. Fradkin, it was stated last night.

Mr. Fradkin could not be reached last night, but the story was verified by a member of the players' committee, who accompanied the concertmaster to his home.

Told to Dress With Men

The trouble started when Mr. Fradkin entered the dressing room of Conductor Monteux last night. The custom has been for both men to use the same room. Mr. Monteux, however, immediately informed Mr. Fradkin that the room was for the management and since he now was one of the musicians he might as well dress with them. The concertmaster was dumfounded, hardly believing his ears, at first and questioned the conductor three or four times, each time receiving the same reply.

Mr. Fradkin then went to the players' room. Here the news of the break spread quickly, and the players becom-

FRADKIN-MONTEUX CLASH STIRS SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Open hostilities between Concert Master Frederic Fradkin and Conductor Pierre Monteux of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the dressing rooms at Sanders Theatre last night developed when Monteux gave Fradkin to understand that as he had thrown his lot with the men he was not wanted in the dressing rooms which have hitherto been used by him and some of the soloists. Fradkin thought at first that Monteux was jesting, and had him repeat the remarks several times. He then went out to the general dressing room of the men. In some way they learned of the incident and refused to play for the concert unless an apology was made to Fradkin by Monteux.

Combined persuasion of Mr. Fradkin and the committee of seven finally turned the sentiment and the concert was conducted as usual. Coming on the heels of the refusal to allow their attorney, Arthur Berenson, into the members' rooms in the Symphony Hall building, the feeling is running at fever heat among the musicians.

Today Atty. Berenson and Rudolph Edgewall will visit Judge Cabot to Masten did the conference for it is feared that they can no longer hold the players back from drastic action.

Preparing Ultimatum

Incensed at what they describe as "stalling tactics" of Judge Cabot, union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Association will meet Sunday to decide on a scale of prices and working conditions which are to be presented to the trustees of the orchestra for their acceptance or rejection. Coming after the delay of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra in meeting their committee and adjusting the matter is merely a subterfuge to wear down their resistance, the committee, acting for more than 90 per cent. of the musicians, will come three easily next week present Judge Frederick P. Cabot with an ultimatum.

Some of the members go so far as to say that the treatment of Concert Master Frederic Fradkin at Sanders Theatre last night by Conductor Pierre Monteux is but a reflection of the attitude of the trustees since the matter of unionization became public.

Fight to Finish

"Judge Cabot has had plenty of time to make a decision one way or the other, and we do not intend to wait any longer," a prominent member of the orchestra said last night.

"We shall not attempt longer to disguise members from obtaining remunerative contracts elsewhere. The time has come for a show-down, and coercion and propaganda will now be met with the determined resistance that they deserve at our hands," he concluded.

Mrs. Timmons
Di...

March 4 Herald

WILL CONFER ON SYMPHONY CASE

Chairman Cabot Agrees to Meet Union Members' Attorney This Morning

REMINDS PLAYERS OF OBLIGATIONS

Definite advance toward an adjustment of the controversy involving the Boston Symphony Orchestra may follow a conference at 9 o'clock this morning between Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, and Atty. Arthur Berenson, representing the union members of the orchestra.

Arrangements for this conference, to be held at Judge Cabot's office in the Exchange Building, were made yesterday afternoon, at a moment when the situation had assumed a much more acute crisis through events of the earlier day.

Announcement that the head of the trustees had finally agreed to meet one of their representatives appeased somewhat the indignation of the union players at what they regarded as unjustified tactics on the part of the orchestra management. A telephone message sent from an indignation meeting of the executive committee of the union, held in the offices of Atty. Berenson in Pemberton Building, brought about the arrangements for the conference.

At this indignation meeting were Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster of the orchestra, who has joined the union, and Carl E. Gardner, the committee's publicity manager. The discussion revolved chiefly about the exclusion of Atty. Berenson from the rehearsal rooms of the orchestra at Symphony Hall when he called there during the early afternoon, and the letters of reply by Judge Cabot to the union request for a conference upon the question of the demands for a $1000 salary increase for all members of the orchestra.

The reply of Judge Cabot to the union request for a wage conference was sent not to the committee which had submitted the request, but in letters addressed severally to the members of the committee. Members of the committee indicated that it ignored the conference request and was further indefinite and unsatisfactory.

The only part of Judge Cabot's letter made public is an excerpt in which he expresses the hope that "the members will still realize that they are men of honor and are thus morally and legally obliged to live up to their contracts."

Concertmaster Fradkin, in comment last night upon the developments of the day, delivered the ultimatum that unless the unionization of the orchestra is accepted by the trustee he will not renew his contract. "I don't care to be connected with an orchestra that does not work in harmony," he said, "and certainly will not be concertmaster over a group of players who, I must feel, are not being paid enough to warrant demanding the best results of them and who are suffering for lack of the actual necessities which make life worth living."

He has offered to accept a $1000 decrease in salary for himself as a means of gaining $1000 increases for the others, and has offered to cash a $1000 Liberty bond to finance members of the orchestra in meeting the union initiation fee of $50. And, in making this offer, he has assured those who might wish to accept it that "they needn't worry about returning the money."

SYMPHONY MEN NOW CONFIDENT OF SETTLEMENT

March 4 Traveler

Amicable settlement of the differences between union members and the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra is a hope expressed by Atty. Arthur Berenson, representing the committee of seven of the players who conferred with Judge Frederick P. Cabot today.

"Judge Cabot and I had a friendly discussion," he said, "in which I endeavored to point out to him the advantages which would come to both the men and the orchestra from the union; that it would have at least the effect of increasing the earning capacity of the men and relieving the pressure on the trustees to some extent for increases in salaries. Of course, the men ought to have increases in salaries anyway, but through the union they would be enabled to get additional opportunities for employment, which would help the situation very much.

"In my opinion, there is nothing in the contract between the men and the trustees which presents their joining the union, and as to whether there are any inconsistencies between the contract and the bylaws, I cannot at this time state. I personally feel hopeful of the outlook, and, so far as I am personally concerned, everything will be done to keep in existence the orchestra and its high standard."

STON POST, THUR

CABOT WILL SEE UNION'S ATTORNEY

Agrees to Discuss Demands of Symphony Musicians

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will today meet Arthur Berenson, attorney for the union players of the orchestra, to discuss the demands of the men for increased wages and recognition of the union.

The meeting will be held at 9 o'clock this morning at the office of Judge Cabot in the Exchange building, and the conference will be solely between Judge Cabot and Mr. Berenson.

HAD BEEN BARRED

The attorney for the union men succeeded in arranging for the conference yesterday after he had previously been refused admission to the rehearsal rooms of the orchestra at Symphony Hall. The refusal to admit Mr. Berenson to the rooms caused considerable adverse feeling among the players against the management and unless today's conference is productive of favorable results the players, it is reported, are ready to take more drastic steps to bring recognition from Judge Cabot. The principal aim of today's conference is to endeavor to arrange for a meeting between the players' committee and the trustees.

Mr. Cabot, according to report of the union men, apparently is continuing in his stand to deal with the men individually. For yesterday a notice was posted in the rehearsal room notifying the players that the chairman of the board of trustees will be at his office between 2 p. m. and 4 p. m. today, as he was yesterday, to meet individual members who care to see him or make any complaint. As far as could be learned none of the members have thus far taken advantage of the opportunity.

DISCUSS DUTIES OF MUSICIANS

Judge Cabot and Labor Leader Confer on Players' Contracts With Symphony

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today conferred with Arthur Berenson, legal representative of the union members of the orchestra, seeking information on the purposes of unionization. He was anxious to ascertain the duties and obligations of the musicians to the union.

The question of inconsistencies between the union's by-laws and the individual contracts of the members was discussed. The attorney held to the belief that there was nothing in the contracts that would prevent men joining the union.

Mr. Cabot recently asked Frederick Fradkin, concert master, for information as to his duties with the union and Mr. Fradkin declined to state, requesting that Mr. Cabot make his wishes known in a letter.

Thereupon Mr. Cabot sent a letter to the committee representing the organized musicians, in which he said:

"The trustees are unwilling to believe that any one of you will enter into new relations, while your contract is still in force, which would involve a violation of its terms.

"The trustees appreciate the desire of many members of the orchestra for an increase in their salaries, and realize the reasons prompting it. It is the purpose of the trustees to continue the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to seek and increase of its permanent resources through an endowment and to increase its current income in every available way.

"Such increase will be undertaken chiefly for the purpose of enabling the trustees to secure and retain the services of the very best artists as members of the orchestra, and to provide the trustees with means properly to compensate men of such qualifications."

MOVE TO ADJUST DIFFERENCES WITH SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Eve Globe March 4

Judge Cabot Confers With Counsel For 74 Members in the Union

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Arthur Berenson, counsel for 74 of the 90 members of that organization who are now members of the union, conferred nearly an hour this morning in Judge Cabot's office, Exchange Building, and seemingly progressed toward an adjustment of the existing situation. As they parted Judge Cabot remarked to Mr Berenson that he would be glad to confer with him at any time when the occasion required.

Judge Cabot was unable to talk with the newspaper reporters, as he was late in opening his court, but Mr Berenson gave out a statement. The men's committee, through their lawyer, made public a letter received from Judge Cabot in answer to one stating their position and requests. They also announced that three more of the orchestra joined the union yesterday, increasing the membership from the Symphony to 74.

From the Men's Standpoint

Mr Berenson said:

"Mr Cabot and I had a friendly discussion in which I endeavored to point out to him the advantages which would come to both the men and the orchestra from the men having joined the union; that it would have at least the effect of increasing the earning capacity of the men, and relieve the pressure on the trustees to some extent for increases in salaries. Of course, the men ought to have increases in salaries anyway, but through their having joined the union they would thereby be enabled to get additional opportunities for employment, which would help the situation very much.

"In the letter of Feb 27 the committee stated for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Association that they had joined the American Federation of Musicians and that their joining of that organization entailed upon them certain duties and obligations; they asked the trustee to consent to a reformation of their contracts so as to enable them to perform those duties and obligations to the federation. Mr Cabot replied that before he could make any statement with reference to that he wanted to know what the duties and obligations were, that he had had no information about that, and accordingly I left him a copy of the bylaws.

Union Best for All, Says Counsel

"In my opinion there is nothing in the contract between the men and the trustees which prevent their joining the union, and as to whether there are any inconsistencies between the contract and the bylaws or not I cannot at this time state, as this requires a little further examination.

"I personally feel hopeful of the outlook, and so far as the committee is concerned and so far as I am personally concerned, everything will be done to keep in existence the orchestra and keep up its high standard."

In answer to questions Mr Berenson added that he believed the trustees will recognize the union situation. To his mind it is the best for all.

In this connection he stated that he hoped that the trustees of the orchestra would not make it impossible for the men to carry out their contracts. He asked that it be made clear that the union men have never threatened to break any contracts or obligations. All they ask for is a reformation of any inconsistencies.

He also said, and Judge Cabot has announced, that at no time has he taken the attitude of not talking to the members or their representatives.

Judge Cabot Quotes Contracts

Judge Cabot's answer to the men's committee is:

"Messrs Eudolph Ringwall, L. N. Kurkdjie, W. Traupe, Allan Langley, Frederick Fradkin, Gustav F. Heim, Otto Roth, Carl E. Gardner, Florian Whitman:

"Dear Sirs—As president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc, I have received the letter dated Feb 27, 1920, and signed by you. Each of you heretofore has enterad into a written contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc. Mr Ringwall's contract runs through season of 1920; Mr Kurkdjie, 1922; Mr Traupe, 1922; Mr Langley 1921; Mr Fradkin, 1921; Mr Heim, 1921; Mr Roth, 1920; Mr Gardner, 1922; Mr Wittmann, 1922.

"The trustees are unwilling to believe that any one of you will enter into new relations, while your contract is still in force, which would involve a violation of its terms. Experience with the members of the orchestra justifies the opinion we hold of them as men of honor, having a most sensitive regard for the written undertakings, and we feel sure that no one of you can intend to do anything to change this opinion entertained both by the trustees and the public.

Trustees Hope to Increase Income

"The trustees appreciate the desire of many members of the orchestra for an increase in their salaries and realize the reasons prompting it. In this connection I wish to refer you to the statement on behalf of the trustees which I made to you Feb 25 setting forth the intention and the present resources of the trustees. Briefly summarized, it is the purpose of the trustees to continue the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to seek an increase of its permanent resources through an endowment and to increase its current income in every available way.

"Such increase in resources will be undertaken chiefly for the purpose of enabling the trustees to secure and retain the services of the very best artists as members of the orchestra, and to provide the trustees with means properly to compensate men of such qualifications.

"In no other way does it seem to the trustees possible to maintain the enviable reputation of the orchestra which the excellence of its past and present membership has established.

"I desire to repeat my previous statement to the orchestra that I shall be at Symphony Hall at hours announced on the bulletin board when I shall be glad to take up with any member or members any question of his or their particular situation and circumstances, with respect to the orchestra which he or they feel ought to have special consideration."

PHILADELPHIA SYMPHONY PLAYERS OUT FOR MORE PAY

PHILADELPHIA, March 4—Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra players have quit for higher wages offered elsewhere.

Herald [HORS]

HEAD O

JUDGE CABOT AND SYMPHONY COUNSEL MEET

Fradkin Would Accept $1000 Salary Cut to Help Players

A conference between Judge Frederick Cabot, president of the Symphony trustees, and Arthur Berenson, attorney for the Symphony orchestra union members; an ultimatum served by Fradkin, noted virtuoso, and concert-master of the orchestra, to the effect that unless the trustees accepted the unionization of the orchestra he would not renew his contract; and his announcement that he would be willing to have his salary cut $1000 if it would help in getting an increase for his artists, were the chief features of today's developments in the Symphony orchestra union wage controversy.

The first conference between Judge Cabot and a representative of the artists was held today. Arthur Berenson, attorney for the men, appeared at Judge Cabot's office in the Exchange Building shortly after 9 o'clock.

The orchestra members are speculating as to the outcome.

Must Have Harmony

Fradkin, in speaking of the matter, said:—

"I don't care to be conected with an orchestra that does not work in harmony. I certainly will not be concert-master over a group of players who, I must feel, are not being paid enough to warrant demanding the best of results and who are suffering from the loss of the actual necessities of life."

The famous concert-master then announced that if it would help the players any he would agree to have his own lary cut $1000.

He further stated he was ready and willing to cash a $1000 Liberty Bond to "help the cause along." He explained this by declaring that some of the players found it a little difficult in getting the initiation fee together. He has assured those who want to take advantage of the offer that they needn't be in a hurry to pay back.

Friendly Conference

Arthur Berenson, attorney for the Symphony players, issued the following statement following his conference today with Judge Cabot:—

"Mr. Cabot and I had a friendly discussion in which I endeavored to point out to him the advantages which would come to both the men and the orchestra from the men having joined the union; that it would have at least the effect of increasing the earning capacity of the men, and relieving the pressure on the trustees to some extent for increases in salaries. Of course the men ought to have increases in salaries anyway, but through their having joined the union they would thereby be enabled to get additional opportunities for employment, which would help the situation very much.

"The subject matter of the letter of Feb. 27 in which the committee stated for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Assn. that they had joined the American Federation of Musicians and that their joining of that organization entailed upon them certain duties and obligations; that they asked the trustees to consent to a reformation of their contracts so as to enable them to perform those duties and obligations to the Federation. Mr. Cabot replied that before he could make any statement with reference to that he wanted to know what the duties and obligations were, that he had had no information about that, and accordingly I left him a copy of the bylaws.

"In my opinion there is nothing in the contract between the men and the trustees which prevent their joining the union, and as to whether there are any inconsistencies between the contract and the by-laws or not I cannot at this time state, as this requires a little further examination.

"I personally feel hopeful of the outlook, and so far as the committee is concerned, and so far as I am personally concerned, everything will be done to keep in existence the orchestra and keep up its high stand

BLANK PAGE

BOSTON HERALD EXTRA

SATURDAY MORNING, MARCH 6, 1920—FOURTEEN PAGES

TWO CENTS

TRUSTEES OUST FRADKIN FOR INSULT TO SYMPHONY PATRONS; AMERICANS 22 DAYS UNDER FIRE

FREDERIC FRADKIN,
Symphony Concert Master, Dismissed by Trustees Following Scene at Rehearsal Yesterday.

ACT AT CONCERT CAUSES CRISIS IN RELATIONS

Concert Master Brings Down Hisses from Big Audience

ALONE HELD SEAT DURING APPLAUSE

Fradkin, Through Counsel, Says He May Sue for Rights in Case

The gathering bitterness of feeling in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, aggravated by a verbal clash at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday night, between Pierre Monteux, conductor, and Fredric Fradkin, concert master, reached its climax in a dramatic demonstration at the Symphony Hall concert yesterday afternoon and the summary discharge of the concert master last night.

The crisis in the controversy was acted out on the stage of Symphony Hall in the view of a great audience. It came as a sudden and startling diversion for the rapture induced throughout the assembly by a musical performance declared to be the most brilliant and masterly heard in this city for years.

Monteux Shares Applause

The appearance of Conductor Monteux at the opening of the concert had been a signal for applause of unusual fervor. Whether a consideration of the Sanders Theatre episode influenced the warmth of this reception is problematical.

Then, after a marvelous rendition of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, the applause broke out in torrents never equalled at any previous concert. Mr. Monteux retired, but re-appeared to acknowledge the continued applause. Again he was recalled and this time he waved to the members of the orchestra to rise and share the applause with him.

(Continued on Page Five, Column 4.)

Dismiss Fradkin for Insult at Symphony

(Continued from Page One)

All rose save Concertmaster Fradkin. The significance of his attitude was sensed immediately by the audience. An embarrassed hush intruded upon the plaudits, to give way in a moment to a mightier roar of applause for the conductor and the others, and an intermingling of hisses for the concertmaster.

There was hissing again when Mr. Fradkin retired at the intermission, but when he returned there was a ripple of applause for him, this coming chiefly from the second balcony. Mr. Fradkin stood and bowed in acknowledgement of this greeting.

The trustees' letter of discharge, sent by Judge Frederick P. Cabot to Mr. Fradkin last night, was as follows:

"I hereby notify you that the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., have passed the following votes in reference to you.

Failed in Agreement

"'Voted that in the judgment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., acting by its trustees in a meeting held on the evening of March 5, 1920, Fredric Fradkin has failed to keep his written agreements entered into between him and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal at Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon, March 5, 1920, and that therefor he be dismissed from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., and in further accordance with the terms of his agreement he be paid his agreed compensation to the time of his dismissal.

"'Voted that the president of the trustees be directed to give Fredric Fradkin notice forthwith of the foregoing action.'

"In pursuance of this action of the trustees you are hereby notified that you are dismissed from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc.

"I enclose check for $234.38 in payment of your agreed compensation to the time of dismissal. Yours truly,

"(Signed) FREDERICK P. CABOT,
"President of the trustees, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc."

May Break Up Orchestra

The controversy has now reached a point which threatens the disruption of the orchestra. A meeting of those members of the orchestra who have joined the musicians' union since the inception of the trouble may be held today and will develop some sort of ultimatum to the trustees as a result of the concertmaster's discharge.

The dissension began with a demand by the players for $1000 salary increases. It progressed through a unionization of the greater number of the players as the trustees deferred definite action on the salary demand. The concertmaster cast his influence into the players' side, even to the extent of joining the union, although his salary is several times greater than that of the men, and of serving on the union executive committee of seven. The feeling reached the acute point in the Sanders Theatre incident, with the denouement yesterday.

Fradkin May Bring Suit

Shortly after midnight, last night, Fradkin, through his counsel, in discussing his dismissal, declared that he had been improperly discharged. He maintained that he holds himself in readiness to perform his contract, and this attitude his lawyer asserted, means a civil suit, unless the trustees rescind the discharge.

A member of the players' committee of seven, and one of the prominent players, who was still in Fradkin's apartments, where the committee had been meeting prior to the news of the discharge, stated that it was his impression that the trustees were evidently bent on disrupting the orchestra, and if that was their intention they could not have adopted a better means than by discharging Fradkin.

As the committee meeting in Fradkin's apartments had broken up before the news of the discharge was received by the concertmaster no arrangements to act on the unexpected situation that has arisen could be taken, but members still present expect the action of the trustees will precipitate an expression of violent indignation today from the more than 75 union members of the orchestra.

APOLOGIZES TO PUBLIC

Fradkin Felt Applause Not for Him —Mother's Illness Upset Him

Mr. Fradkin, in explaining his reasons for not rising, declared last night, before the notice of his discharge had reached him, that he felt none of the applause had been for him. He asserted that he had felt the demonstration marked the springing of a "plant" to humiliate him, and he noted that he was under severe mental stress, as he had just come from a visit to the bedside of his mother, who had been taken to a hospital to undergo an operation for appendicitis.

"I humbly apologize to the audience and to the public, if they feel I have offended them in any way by not rising and joining in the tribute to Mr. Monteux," he said, in supplementary comment to a formal statement which he issued from a gathering of union players with the counsel of the union at his apartments in the Fenway.

His formal statement follows:

"When I came on the stage this afternoon I realized that a good deal had been said in the newspapers of the Monteux-Fradkin clash, so to speak. After attending to my duties of tuning up the orchestra I took my post and sat down.

"Conductor Monteux then came on the stage and received a demonstration that continued and was prolonged to such an extent that he was obliged to turn round twice and bow his acknowledgment, and again for a third time. There was never a time in my memory that he ever received such an ovation, not even when he made his first appearance as conductor of the orchestra.

"When the conductor turned around to bow his acknowledgments for the third time he signalled to the rest of the orchestra to rise, but I remained seated. From the unexpected ovation I strongly felt that something or other had been planted to uphold him in his tiff with me and to get the audience to show its disapproval of my action in joining the union, and their approval of Conductor Monteux's action in showing his disapproval of the same.

"I felt deeply hurt, as it appeared to me as if the audience was trying to impress upon me, by the cajolery of something that failed to show on the surface, that I was agitating a movement of some kind that was distasteful, or spelled propaganda, although I am a naturalized American citizen and have been for years.

"This tremendous demonstration to Mr. Monteux came after the first Berlioz symphony, and it was so pronounced that I didn't rise because I felt the applause offered was not intended for me. It was with no intention to offend the audience nor to antagonize anyone. I took it for granted, then and there, that the audience had no [illegible] for me, under these particular circumstances.

"When I returned to the stage after the intermission and came on the stage alone, the audience applauded me and I rose and bowed my acknowledgments, realizing then that the applause was for me. Up to then I didn't think I was included in the appreciation bestowed.

"Up to the present time I never asked any member of the orchestra to support me in any stand I have taken, and there has never been any danger of a stampede of the men in any of the performances thus far given. A majority of the members have sympathized with me for the slight shown me in Cambridge Thursday night, and I believe that I have the good feeling and support of the majority of the players in the situation, that I find myself in, because I have joined the union and thrown my lot with the men for a principle, although I will not benefit any financially as an enrolled member of the union.

"I trust that if the audience feels offended by my not rising at yesterday afternoon's performance that they will accept my most humble apology. It was not intended as an affront to the audience or to anyone else. In the action of the men in the movement to unionize we all desire the good will of the public and there was no attempt on my part to give offence to the public, as I think was demonstrated by the fact that the orchestra never in its 38 years gave a better and more brilliant performance than it did yesterday.

A member of the committee of seven, who was present during the Fradkin statement that Mr. Monteux was a viola player and a member of the French Federation of Musicians' an organization similar to the American Federation of Musicians', with which a majority of the men are now affiliated. He pointed out from the bylaws of the French federation that any member going to a strange country is instructed to promote, uphold and extend the work of the federation, or similar bodies, and that a penalty for not carrying out the mandates of the French federation is usually a boycott against him in all musical circles of France, in the event that he returns.

BOSTON HERALD EXTRA

SATURDAY MORNING, MARCH 6, 1920—FOURTEEN PAGES

TWO CENTS

RUSTEES OUST FRADKIN FOR INSULT TO SYMPHONY PATRONS; AMERICANS 22 DAYS UNDER FIRE

FREDERIC FRADKIN,
ymphony Concert Master, Dismissed
Trustees Following Scene at Rehearsal Yesterday.

ACT AT CONCERT CAUSES CRISIS IN RELATIONS

Concert Master Brings Down Hisses from Big Audience

ALONE HELD SEAT DURING APPLAUSE

Fradkin, Through Counsel, Says He May Sue for Rights in Case

The gathering bitterness of feeling in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, aggravated by a verbal clash at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday night, between Pierre Monteux, conductor, and Fredric Fradkin, concert master, reached its climax in a dramatic demonstration at the Symphony Hall concert yesterday afternoon and the summary discharge of the concert master last night.

The crisis in the controversy was acted out on the stage of Symphony Hall in the view of a great audience. It came as a sudden and startling diversion for the rapture induced throughout the assembly by a musical performance declared to be the most brilliant and masterly heard in this city for years.

Monteux Shares Applause

The appearance of Conductor Monteux at the opening of the concert had been a signal for applause of unusual fervor. Whether a consideration of the Sanders Theatre episode influenced the warmth of this reception is problematical.

Then, after a marvelous rendition of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, the applause broke out in torrents never equalled at any previous concert. Mr. Monteux retired, but re-appeared to acknowledge the continued applause. Again he was recalled and this time he waved to the members of the orchestra to rise and share the applause with him.

(Continued on Page Five, Column 4.)

Dismiss Fradkin for Insult at Symphony

(Continued from Page One)

All rose save Concertmaster Fradkin. The significance of his attitude was sensed immediately by the audience. An embarrassed hush intruded upon the plaudits, to give way in a moment to a mightier roar of applause for the conductor and the others, and an intermingling of hisses for the concert master.

There was hissing again when Mr. Fradkin retired at the intermission, but when he returned there was a ripple of applause for him, this coming chiefly from the second balcony. Mr. Fradkin stood and bowed in acknowledgement of this greeting.

The trustees' letter of discharge, sent by Judge Frederick P. Cabot to Mr. Fradkin last night, was as follows:

"I hereby notify you that the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., have passed the following votes in reference to you.

Failed in Agreement

"'Voted that in the judgment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., acting by its trustees in a meeting held on the evening of March 5, 1920, Fredric Fradkin has failed to keep his written agreements entered into between him and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal at Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon, March 5, 1920, and that therefor he be dismissed from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., and in further accordance with the terms of his agreement he be paid his agreed compensation to the time of his dismissal.

"'Voted that the president of the trustees be directed to give Fredric Fradkin notice forthwith of the foregoing action.'

"In pursuance of this action of the trustees you are hereby notified that you are dismissed from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc.

"I enclose check for $234.38 in payment of your agreed compensation to the time of dismissal. Yours truly,

"(Signed) FREDERICK P. CABOT,
"President of the trustees, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc."

May Break Up Orchestra

The controversy has now reached a point which threatens the disruption of the orchestra. A meeting of those members of the orchestra who have joined the musicians' union since the inception of the trouble may be held today and will develop some sort of ultimatum to the trustees as a result of the concertmaster's discharge.

The dissension began with a demand by the players for $1000 salary increases. It progressed through a unionization of the greater number of the players as the trustees deferred definite action on the salary demand. The concertmaster cast his influence into the players' side, even to the extent of joining the union, although his salary is several times greater than that of the men, and of serving on the union executive committee of seven. The feeling reached the acute point in the Sanders Theatre incident, with the denouement yesterday.

Fradkin May Bring Suit

Shortly after midnight, last night, Fradkin, through his counsel, in discussing his dismissal, declared that he had been improperly discharged. He maintained that he holds himself in readiness to perform his contract, and this attitude his lawyer asserted, means a civil suit, unless the trustees rescind the discharge.

A member of the players' committee of seven, and one of the prominent players, who was still in Fradkin's apartments, where the committee had been meeting prior to the news of the discharge, stated that it was his impression that the trustees were evidently bent on disrupting the orchestra, and if that was their intention they could not have adopted a better means than by discharging Fradkin.

As the committee meeting in Fradkin's apartments had broken up before the news of the discharge was received by the concertmaster no arrangements to act on the unexpected situation that has arisen could be taken, but members still present expect the action of the trustees will precipitate an expression of violent indignation today from the more than 75 union members of the orchestra.

APOLOGIZES TO PUBLIC

Fradkin Felt Applause Not for Him —Mother's Illness Upset Him

Mr. Fradkin, in explaining his reasons for not rising, declared last night, before the notice of his discharge had reached him, that he felt none of the applause had been for him. He asserted that he had felt the demonstration marked the springing of a "plant" to humiliate him, and he noted that he was under severe mental stress, as he had just come from a visit to the bedside of his mother, who had been taken to a hospital to undergo an operation for appendicitis.

"I humbly apologize to the audience and to the public, if they feel I have offended them in any way by not rising and joining in the tribute to Mr. Monteux," he said, in supplementary comment to a formal statement which he issued from a gathering of union players with the counsel of the union at his apartments in the Fenway.

His formal statement follows:

"When I came on the stage this afternoon I realized that a good deal had been said in the newspapers of the Monteux-Fradkin clash, so to speak. After attending to my duties of tuning up the orchestra I took my post and sat down.

"Conductor Monteux then came on the stage and received a demonstration that continued and was prolonged to such an extent that he was obliged to turn round twice and bow his acknowledgment, and again for a third time. There was never a time in my memory that he ever received such an ovation, not even when he made his first appearance as conductor of the orchestra.

"When the conductor turned around to bow his acknowledgments for the third time he signalled to the rest of the orchestra to rise, but I remained seated. From the unexpected ovation I strongly felt that something or other had been planted to uphold him in his tiff with me and to get the audience to show its disapproval of my action in joining the union, and their approval of Conductor Monteux's action in showing his disapproval of the same.

"I felt deeply hurt, as it appeared to me as if the audience was trying to impress upon me, by the cajolery of something that failed to show on the surface, that I was agitating a movement of some kind that was distasteful, or spelled propaganda, although I am a naturalized American citizen and have been for years.

"This tremendous demonstration to Mr. Monteux came after the first Berlioz symphony, and it was so pronounced that I didn't rise because I felt the applause offered was not intended for me. It was with no intention to offend the audience nor to antagonize anyone. I took it for granted, then and there, that the audience had no[illegible] for me, under these particular circumstances.

"When I returned to the stage after the intermission and came on the stage alone, the audience applauded me and I rose and bowed my acknowledgments, realizing then that the applause was for me. Up to then I didn't think I was included in the appreciation bestowed.

"Up to the present time I never asked any member of the orchestra to support me in any stand I have taken, and there has never been any danger of a stampede of the men in any of the performances thus far given. A majority of the members have sympathized with me for the slight shown me in Cambridge Thursday night, and I believe that I have the good feeling and support of the majority of the players in the situation that I find myself in, because I have joined the union and thrown my lot with the men for a principle, although I will not benefit any financially as an enrolled member of the union.

"I trust that if the audience feels offended by my not rising at yesterday afternoon's performance that they will accept my most humble apology. It was not intended as an affront to the audience or to anyone else. In the action of the men in the movement to unionize we all desire the good will of the public and there was no attempt on my part to give offence to the public, as I think was demonstrated by the fact that the orchestra never in its 38 years gave a better and more brilliant performance than it did yesterday.

A member of the committee of seven, who was present during the Fradkin statement that Mr. Monteux was a viola player and a member of the French Federation of Musicians' an organization similar to the American Federation of Musicians', with which a majority of the men are now affiliated. He pointed out from the bylaws of the French federation that any member going to a strange country is instructed to promote, uphold and extend the work of the federation, or similar bodies, and that a penalty for not carrying out the mandates of the French federation is usually a boycott against him in all musical circles of France, in the event that he returns.

Post EXTRA

Copyright, 1920, by Post Publishing Co. TWO CENTS

HISSING AT SYMPHONY

Concert Master Fradkin Publicly Snubs Conductor Monteux and Audience Resents Action—Directors "Fire" Fradkin

RDAY, MARCH 6, 1920

FREDERIC FRADKIN,
Concert master, who was discharged from the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night.

Declare His Contract Broken and Order Him Out

SOME OF ORCHESTRA CHEER FOR FRADKIN

Audience Answers With Cheers for Conductor

A public defiance of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the concertmaster, Frederic Fradkin, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, resulted in hisses from all parts of the hall, in applause and counter applause from different factions in the audience, in a cheer from certain members of the orchestra, and in general a scene of such excitement, partisanship and bitterness of feeling as has never been known in the entire history career of the world-famous organization.

One result was the discharge of Mr. Fradkin from the orchestra by the board of trustees.

Continued on Page 2—Fifth Column

Hisses for Fradkin at Symphony Concert

Continued from First Page

The trouble came after a very brilliant performance of the last movement of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." The audience applauded long and loudly. Mr. Monteux made a gesture to the members of the orchestra who, at his signalled request, all rose, with the exception of Fradkin, to acknowledge and appropriate with the smiling conductor, the approval of the audience.

Only Fradkin, who had had a disagreement with Mr. Monteux the previous evening at the Symphony concert given in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, remained in his seat, and even turned a shoulder in a manner that appeared rather contemptuous, away from the audience.

HISS CONCERTMASTER

Then those who have always claimed that Back Bay people either have no feelings or are unable to show them got the surprise of their lives. For there sounded from all quarters of the hall indignant hisses of the concertmaster.

These were answered from one principal locality at the back and on the right hand of the auditorium, facing the stage, by applause in support of Fradkin.

By this time Mr. Monteux had bowed and left the stage. While the minority at the right and rear applauded for Fradkin, the majority, who were first hissing him, began to applaud for Mr. Monteux to return.

Applause for Monteux

He did so and the instant he came in sight salvos of applause broke from all parts of the hall.

To say there was a sensation is putting it mildly. No such incident had ever occurred in the whole career of Boston's historic orchestra, which is probably the greatest art product America has ever given the world. The highest ideals, the quietest accomplishment of artistic production, have been the rule with that organization. Over the proscenium arch of the hall is the name of Beethoven, and in niches high up on the walls noble figures of classic antiquity seem to symbolize the greatness and the ennobling power of music.

It was evident that the great majority of the audience supported Monteux and not Fradkin. This was not a question of musical unionism or the reverse. It seemed rather indignation at what the audience regarded as the high-handed and unnecessary obtrusion of a personal quarrel or grievance into a Symphony concert.

A number of the members of the orchestra, however, appeared to support Fradkin. They were seen, either applauding him, or leaning excitedly over their desks and talking with their fellow musicians, which is not decorum for a Symphony concert. There had yet to be heard certain representative members of the orchestra who obviously stood with Mr. Monteux. That came later.

Fradkin Bows to Audience

All through the 10 minutes of the intermission the hall buzzed with excited comment, and it was not until Fradkin and later Mr. Monteux came into the back of the stage that the matter reached its climax.

As Fradkin went back to his desk the hissing recommenced, and was answered in turn by the applause from the Fradkin contingent, which seemed a small but solid and determined body in the section of the hall already described.

Suddenly Fradkin looked up, rose, turned ostentatiously in the direction of the applause, and bowed several times. Meanwhile the hissing continued and as Fradkin bowed a cheer broke from the back ranks of the orchestra.

Rise in Tribute to Monteux

At this there was more indignation than ever on the part of the great number of the patrons. A word was hastily passed round and whispered from seat to seat. The audience was seen clearly to be preparing for something. When Mr. Monteux appeared this gathering rose, looking, as one glanced back around the hall and at the floor and the two balconies, like one solid mass, and applauded Mr. Monteux, who repeatedly bowed his acknowledgments.

If anyone, either members of the orchestra or those outside of it, was in any doubt as to the feelings of the overwhelming majority of the audience, he was left in no further uncertainty. It was not only an eloquent support of the leader, it was as dignified and impressive a rebuke as could have been given to any and all who thought a Boston Symphony concert a place for personal issues of a petty kind.

Applause From Orchestra

At this moment, also, Georges Longy, the first oboist; Clement Lenom, and other members of the woodwind section, which includes a number of the greatest artists in the orchestra, rose to their feet and applauded Mr. Monteux by way of showing him their personal allegiance and support.

The rest of the concert went on without other unusual incident. Mr. Monteux, so far as appearance or as the quality of the performances went, did not appear in the slightest degree upset by the incidents of the afternoon, and the men responded ably to the promptings of his baton, showing again what a superior body, as artists, this orchestra is today. But this was surface. Underneath there was fierce excitement, and the players' room after the concert was the scene of arguments, recriminations, angry discussions, from which only a few of the oldest men kept away, quietly packing up their instruments and departing homeward.

Fradkin Is Discharged

Mr. Fradkin was dismissed at his home, 30 Fenway, last night. Notification of his discharge was in the following letter:

"Mr. Frederic Fradkin.

"Dear Sir—I hereby notify you that the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., have passed the following votes in reference to you:

"Voted that in the judgment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., acting by its trustees in a meeting held on the evening of March 5, 1920, Frederic Fradkin has failed to keep his written agreements entered into between him and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal at Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon, March 5, 1920, and that therefore he be dismissed from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., and in further accordance with the terms of his agreement, he be paid his agreed compensation to the time of his dismissal.

"Voted that the president of the trustees be directed to give Frederic Fradkin notice forthwith of the foregoing action.

"Pursuance of this action of the trustees you are hereby notified that you are dismissed from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc.

"I enclose check for $234.38 in payment of your agreed compensation to the time of dismissal.

"Yours truly,
(Signed) "FREDERICK P. CABOT.
"President of the trustees,
"Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc.'

Fradkin's Statement

When informed of the action of the trustees Mr. Fradkin made the following statement:

"My discharge is as unwarranted as it is illegal. There was no warrant whatever for the action.

"I shall offer my services to the orchestra at the concert tomorrow and if my services are refused I shall take any necessary action against the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"There are certain men here who say that if the trustees wanted to disrupt the orchestra they could have taken no more effective measures toward that end.

"They evidently regard themselves as masters over slaves and feel that they have the privilege of doing with them as they like.

"The men of the orchestra resent any such action as that taken by the trustees under the circumstances.

"Evidently they proceeded without any investigation, not talking with me or any of the members of the orchestra before taking action, and their action is perfectly characteristic of the conduct of the trustees."

In defending himself last night, Concertmaster Fradkin stated that he did not rise at the signal from Conductor Monteux to acknowledge the applause of the audience yesterday because he felt that none of that applause was intended for him. The unusual applause given the conductor at his appearance before the concert began, he said, was proof that the audience wished to demonstrate that they were in sympathy with the conductor and adverse to the union movement.

In fact, the players claim, the unusual demonstration was predicted by an attache of the Symphony Hall, who stated to players before the concert that they would see by the applause if the public was with them or against them.

The "plant" was for the purpose of discouraging union activities among the members of the orchestra, now nearly 100 per cent unionized, the players contend.

THE SYMPHONY
BY OLIN DOWNES

A programme which bore testimony again to Mr. Monteux's catholicity of taste and appreciation of many different kinds of music was given at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. It commenced with Berlioz's symphony, so audacious, so poetic, so prophetic of modern developments, the "Symphonie Fatastique," a work, bear in mind, of the 1830's. There followed Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence," a work by a modern composer of remarkable talent, heard once before at this concert, and gaining by repetition; Borodin's oriental "Steppe-Sketch from Middle Asia," and Richard Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

BERLIOZ'S SYMPHONY

Mr. Monteux's performance of the Berlioz Symphony was one which made the music rarely coherent and significant in its thematic developments and inter-relations, and the last movement was extremely brilliant. Not in many seasons had it been so effective. Elsewhere one wished at times for greater extremes a la Berlioz, between very soft and madly loud, for a treatment a little more temperamental. Taken all in all the music made a deep impression—one not wholly effaced by even the gross and uncalled-for discourtesy to conductor and audience on the part of the concert master.

Most surprising of all was the music of Malipiero, introduced here for the first time, if we remember rightly, by Mr. Rabaud. This music is ultra-modern in texture, harmonically very original and very new, and mystifying in its title and even mood. "The Pauses of Silence"! What does this mean? The singular thing is that one does not care particularly what it means, and that the music is curiously satisfying. Most music seems, after all, to be artificially made. It comes somewhere near what the listener wants, but really it seems only a partial or approximate expression of beauty.

If you have ever seen a sunset and then tried to reproduce the harmony on the walls of your room, you have had an experience something like the experience of the sensibilities, even when quite great music is heard. Now this music of Malipiero seems to be the exact equivalent, or tonal embodiment, of sounds heard by the soul of the ear, and greatly desired by that soul. It is music of a new subtlety, a new psychology, but at the same time it is naive and spontaneous. By virtue of supreme craftsmanship, ease and finish of expression, and an introvertible originality of the part of the composer, it has succeeded in being true and natural. Its best claim to recognition lies possibly in the very fact that it cannot be explained, or clearly described, or understood in any terms but the terms of music itself. It is very pure and absolute music.

HONY DISCHARGES FRADKIN

SYMPH

DISMISSED FOR SNUB AT LEADER

Symphony Trustees Act Following Fradkin's Refusal to Rise at Concert

As the result of Concert Master Frederic Fradkin's refusal to rise with the other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and acknowledge the applause of the audience at the Friday concert at the request of Conductor Pierre Monteux, the trustees have summarily dismissed the celebrated concert master from the organization.

Mr. Fradkin's dismissal is the climax of a bitter controversy between him and Conductor Monteux, brought about by the latter's ejection of Mr. Fradkin from a dressing room at Sander's Theatre, Cambridge, and further intensified by the concert master's active interest in the unionization of the orchestra.

HISSES FOR FRADKIN.

Overshadowing the musical significance of the concert, patrons of the orchestra were shocked when, in response to Mr. Monteux's suggestion that the men stand up and accept their share of the applause, Fradkin remained in his seat and at the further request of the conductor, failed to rise.

Hisses were directed at Fradkin as he was leaving the stage during the intermission, in sharp contrast to

Continued on Page 2, Column 5.

FRADKIN FIRED FROM SYMPHONY

Globe — Mar 6

Concert Master Hissed at Afternoon Concert

Kept Seated When Orchestra Responded to Plaudits

A storm of hisses from the audience in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon—without doubt the most conservative assemblage to be found anywhere in this city—greeted the affront which Concert Master Fredric Fradkin put upon Conductor Pierre Monteux and the entire audience by refusing to rise and bow with the other musicians when motioned to do so by the conductor.

At a meeting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra corporation last night action was taken dismissing Concert Master Fradkin from the orchestra forthwith.

Notice of the trustees' action was given in a letter signed by Chairman Cabot of the trustees. The vote of the trustees cites that "Fredric Fradkin has failed to keep his written agreements entered into between him and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc, in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, March 5, 1920, and that therefor he be dismissed from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc, and in further accordance with the terms of his agreement he be paid his agreed compensation to the time of his dismissal." The chairman adds that he incloses a check for $234.38 in payment to the time of dismissal.

Mr Fradkin's refusal to rise was apparently a sequel to the disagreement between him and Mr Monteux at the concert given by the orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, when, it is understood, Mr Monteux refused to allow Mr Fradkin to share a dressing room with him, as has been the custom in the past, telling him to use the big dressing room in common with the other musicians.

Audience's Comments Caustic

When Mr Monteux appeared upon the stage of Symphony Hall at yesterday afternoon's concert there was an unusual volume of applause. At the end of the symphony, directly before the long intermission, the conductor, upon his third recall to the platform, turned, in accordance with his invariable custom, to the concert master and the musicians, motioning for them to rise and bow in acknowledgement of the applause.

The musicians all arose in obedience to the conductor's gesture except Mr Fradkin, who sat perfectly still, paying not the slightest attention either to Mr Monteux or to the audience. As soon as the significance of the concert master's action became clear to the audience, loud hisses came from the entire orchestra floor and from the first balcony.

There was no mistaking the sound—the ultra-conservative Friday afternoon Symphony concert audience—composed almost entirely of Boston's most prominent women, hissed and hissed, long and loud. As Mr Fradkin rose to leave the stage a few scattered handclaps greeted him, apparently coming from the rear of the second balcony.

Excitement ran high during the entire intermission and the comments upon Mr Fradkin's action were caustic in the extreme. Many feared that the untoward incident might stop the further progress of the concert, a fear that was accentuated by the fact that the musicians were later than usual in returning to their places upon the platform.

Monteux Applauded

After the musicians were seated in their accustomed places, Mr Fradkin reappeared upon the platform, to be greeted by another storm of hisses, long continued this time. Again came a few hand-claps and some of the orchestra applauded Fradkin. There was another considerable pause and then Mr Monteux returned to the platform.

At the sight of him there came a tremendous burst of applause and a large part of the audience rose to its feet, a demonstration quite as unusual in Symphony Hall as were the hisses with which Mr Fradkin's action was greeted. The orchestra also applauded the conductor and there was no hostile demonstration from any part of the hall.

Mr Monteux behaved throughout as if there was nothing out of the ordinary, carrying off the decidedly awkward situation with the utmost dignity and ease. At the conclusion of the concert program there was the usual applause and no further incident of any kind interrupted the accustomed routine of the concert.

Believes It Was a "Plant"

Referring last night at his apartments at 80 The Fenway to the incident yesterday afternoon, Mr Fradkin said that when he came on the platform he realized how much publicity had been given to the incident of the previous evening. "When Mr Monteux appeared upon the platform," he said, "he received an unprecedented ovation, much greater than he had ever received before, even at his first appearance here. It was so insistent that the conductor, after bowing to the orchestra, was obliged to turn again to the audience in acknowledgement of the prolonged applause.

"I am absolutely convinced that this demonstration had been arranged by the management; that it was started by a regular claque and that it was all a 'plant' to create sentiment against me. I felt deeply hurt, because I felt that the audience believed all my movements in regard to the union have been with a desire to agitate.

"When, at the close of the Berloiz Symphony, Mr Monteux had bowed for the third time and turned, according to his custom, motioning the orchestra to rise and bow, I did not do so simply because I felt the applause was not for me.

"My action was with no intention of giving offense. In this movement of the orchestra, they are anxious for the public good will and want to prevent any action to offend the public. My only interest in this action by the orchestra is to benefit the players, who are greatly underpaid and who are working under adverse conditions. I am looking for no increase in salary, nor am I seeking any personal advantage."

Mr Fradkin added that it was significant of the attitude of the orchestra toward him that only six members of it applauded Mr Monteux when he returned to the stage after the intermission.

Discussed by Union Members

Arthur Berenson, attorney for the union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in conference yesterday afternoon for more than an hour with Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees and Bentley W. Warren of the board, but refused to make any statement. A special meeting of the union committee was held last night at the residence of Frederic Fradkin, at 80 Fenway, and there was a general discussion and particularly the incident at the concert during the afternoon.

The committee voted unanimously to stand behind Mr Fradkin, issuing a short statement declaring that Mr Fradkin was right and they were behind him to a man.

One of the chief topics for discussion was the action of five or six of the orchestra, who stood up and applauded Conductor Pierre Monteux, while the others remained in their seats.

It was also brought out that conductor Monteaux is a member of the French Federation of Musicians, and two sections of its bylaws binds him to do all in his power to expand the work of any musicians' union, wherever he may be.

It was said by members of the committee who also belong to the French Federation that if a complaint is filed against conductor Monteux, and he should be found culpable, it might mean his expulsion and prevent him from ever leading another musical organization in France.

FRADKIN PUT OUT OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Continued From the First Page.

stage of Symphony Hall at yesterday afternoon's concert there was an unusual volume of applause. At the end of the symphony, directly before the long intermission, the conductor, upon his third recall to the platform, turned, in accordance with his invariable custom, to the concert master and the musicians, motioning for them to rise and bow in acknowledgement of the applause.

The musicians all arose in obedience to the conductor's gesture except Mr Fradkin, who sat perfectly still, paying not the slightest attention either to Mr Monteux or to the audience. As soon as the significance of the concert master's action became clear to the audience, loud hisses came from the entire orchestra floor and from the first balcony.

There was no mistaking the sound—the ultra-conservative Friday afternoon Symphony concert audience—composed almost entirely of Boston's most prominent women, hissed and hissed, long and loud. As Mr Fradkin rose to leave the stage a few scattered handclaps greeted him, apparently coming from the rear of the second balcony.

Excitement ran high during the entire intermission and the comments upon Mr Fradkin's action were caustic in the extreme. Many feared that the untoward incident might stop the further progress of the concert, a fear that was accentuated by the fact that the musicians were later than usual in returning to their places upon the platform.

Monteux Applauded

After the musicians were seated in their accustomed places, Mr Fradkin reappeared upon the platform, to be greeted by another storm of hisses, long continued this time. Again came a few hand-claps and some of the orchestra applauded Fradkin. There was another considerable pause and then Mr Monteux returned to the platform.

At the sight of him there came a tremendous burst of applause and a large part of the audience rose to its feet, a demonstration quite as unusual in Symphony Hall as were the hisses with which Mr Fradkin's action was greeted. The orchestra also applauded the conductor and there was no hostile demonstration from any part of the hall.

Mr Monteux behaved throughout as if there was nothing out of the ordinary, carrying off the decidedly awkward situation with the utmost dignity and ease. At the conclusion of the concert program there was the usual applause and no further incident of any kind interrupted the accustomed routine of the concert.

Believes It Was a "Plant"

Referring last night at his apartments at 80 The Fenway to the incident yesterday afternoon, Mr Fradkin said that when he came on the platform he realized how much publicity had been given to the incident of the previous evening. "When Mr Monteux appeared upon the platform," he said, "he received an unprecedented ovation, much greater than he had ever received before, even at his first appearance here. It was so insistent that the conductor, after bowing to the orchestra, was obliged to turn again to the audience in acknowledgement of the prolonged applause.

"I am absolutely convinced that this demonstration had been arranged by the management; that it was started by a regular claque and that it was all a 'plant' to create sentiment against me. I felt deeply hurt, because I felt that the audience believed all my movements in regard to the union have been with a desire to agitate.

"When, at the close of the Berloiz Symphony, Mr Monteux had bowed for the third time and turned, according to his custom, motioning the orchestra to rise and bow, I did not do so simply because I felt the applause was not for me.

"My action was with no intention of giving offense. In this movement of the orchestra, they are anxious for the public good will and want to prevent any action to offend the public. My only interest in this action by the orchestra is to benefit the players, who are greatly underpaid and who are working under adverse conditions. I am looking for no increase in salary, nor am I seeking any personal advantage."

Mr Fradkin added that it was significant of the attitude of the orchestra toward him that only six members of it applauded Mr Monteux when he returned to the stage after the intermission.

Discussed by Union Members

Arthur Berenson, attorney for the union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in conference yesterday afternoon for more than an hour with Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees and Bentley W. Warren of the board, but refused to make any statement. A special meeting of the union committee was held last night at the residence of Frederic Fradkin, at 80 Fenway, and there was a general discussion and particularly the incident at the concert during the afternoon.

The committee voted unanimously to stand behind Mr Fradkin, issuing a short statement declaring that Mr Fradkin was right and they were behind him to a man.

One of the chief topics for discussion was the action of five or six of the orchestra, who stood up and applauded Conductor Pierre Monteux, while the others remained in their seats.

It was also brought out that conductor Monteaux is a member of the French Federation of Musicians, and two sections of its bylaws binds him to do all in his power to expand the work of any musicians' union, wherever he may be.

It was said by members of the committee who also belong to the French Federation that if a complaint is filed against conductor Monteux, and he should be found culpable, it might mean his expulsion and prevent him from ever leading another musical organization in France.

BERLIOZ LEADS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Malipiero, Borodin and Wagner Also Presented

From a musical point of viw the most significant feature of the Symphony concert yesterday was an excellent performance of Berloiz' "Fantastic Symphony," which revivified the familiar music. Mr Monteux, with the intelligent cooperation of the orchestra, gave a dramatic intensity to the score which made one forget its occasional bombast and crudity.

The ball, the march to the scaffold, and the other episodes in the life of the artist whose musical biography Berlioz is trying to convey, seemed for once both plausible and interesting. Program music demands that the audience know the plot beforehand. One wonders what a listener who failed to read the narrative printed in the score would make of this work.

Doubtless it would suggest specific emotions and it might make him see pictures, but they would certainly not be the ones Berlioz intended and would be peculiar to the individual listener. The strongest argument against program music is the fact that such a piece as the "Fantastic" symphony can not appeal to a listener who is ignorant of the very name of piece and composer. If music were really dependent upon a literary program that could not happen.

Malipiero, whose "Pauses of Silence" were revived because of curiosity stimulated by a single hearing last season, was wiser than Berlioz in calling his work "Symphonic Expressions," thus leaving the question of what they signify for each listener to settle in his own way.

The remainder of the concert brought routine performances of two familiar works with neither unfamiliarity nor great imaginative power to commend them—Borodin's "Steppes" and Wagner's overture to "[illegible] man."

STRIKE

VOTE ON

PLAYERS

SYMPHONY

MAY BLOCK CONCERT TONIGHT

Union Musicians to Insist on Reinstatement of Master Fradkin

Union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra met today to act on the dismissal of Concertmaster Frederic Fradkin.

Previous to the meeting members declared they would take a strike vote.

If the vote is in the affirmative, there will be no concert tonight. The strike will last until Fradkin is reinstated, the musicians say.

The players met in Room 7, No. 61 Court street. While the meeting was called by the union members of the orchestra, all members of the organization were invited.

Sentiment among the musicians was apparently strongly in favor of the discharged concertmaster. There was bitter criticism of Conductor Pierre Monteux and the trustees.

The union men today declared that the trustees simply used yesterday's incident, when Fradkin refused to rise in answer to the order of Monteux, as a "blind."

CHARGE UNION OPPOSITION.

They said that the real reason for the discharge of Fradkin was that he was active in organizing the players into a union.

In this connection, it was pointed out that Monteux himself is a member of the French Federation of Musicians, and as such is liable to expulsion for his activity in discouraging the organization of musicians here.

Another possibility today was that Fradkin would bring legal action against the trustees. He has declared that the dismissal was illegal, and that the demonstration by which it was brought about was a "plant."

His attorney, Arthur Berenson, declares that the clause in Fradkin's contract by which he was discharged was illegal. He said the trustees were attempting to disrupt the organization by dictatorial tactics towards men who had to live by their art.

"My discharge is as unwarranted as it is illegal," said Fradkin today. "I shall offer my services to the orchestra. If they are refused I shall take whatever action is necessary.

Concertmaster Fradkin, in a further statement, was bitter in his comment on Friday's incident, which resulted in his dismissal. He said:

"I am, for the purposes of pub

SYMPHONY MEN VOTE ON STRIKE

Concert by Orchestra May Be Blocked by Action of Players

Continued From First Page.

licity, dismissed because I refused to stand during applause for Mr. Monteux. I am convinced that the demonstration for Mr. Monteux was arranged by the management. I am satisfied that it was a 'plant' to create sentiment against me. Those who aplauded were members of the management clique."

Concertmaster Fradkin declared that he was misrepresented when the management tried to make him out a labor union agitator.

"My activity in union matters is not based on any idea of getting better pay for myself," he said.

"I seek no personal advantage. I want only the good of the players, who are greatly underpaid, and are working under adverse conditions."

Mr. Monteux has been against the union. Concertmaster Fradkin concluded his statement by saying that a measure of the conductor's popularity could be gained by the number of players who stood up during the applause. He declared that only six stood.

SYMPHONY UNION PLAYERS IN SYMPATHY WITH FRADKIN

MAN KILLED BY FALL OF AMERICAN HOUSE ROOF

A portion of the roof of the American House, Hanover st, fell in at 2:35 this afternoon, killing Jack Kuntis, a Spanish musician, a guest of the house.

Five rooms were buried in the debris, but so far as known there was only one fatality.

The fire department responded promptly and began digging the rooms out to make sure that no one was under the debris.

FREDERIC FRA

HOLD MEETING THIS AFTERNOON

Question of Playing at Concert Tonight

PIERRE MONTEAUX,
Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Symphony Orchestra union players, which includes 74 of the 90 members, are to hold a special meetting at 4 this afternoon at room 7, Shillaber Building, 61 Court st, to decide whether they will play at tonight's concert.

The men's special committee went into session at 2:30, and attorney Arthur Berenson, counsel for them, advised the committee regarding the men's legal rights and what they can do under their contracts with the management; and he also agreed to address and advise the meeting of the members later on.

Want Fradkin Reinstated

The sentiment of the members who reported at the Shillaber Building rooms today was unanimously in favor of not playing unless Mr Fradrt master, was reinstated ed on the Second Page.

SYMPHONY UNION PLAYERS IN SYMPATHY WITH FRADKIN

Continued From the First Page.

and their demands for recognition of union membership agreed to. What will develop at the meeting, however, no one could say, and none in authority would hazard a guess.

Plans have been made with National Pres Joseph Weber of the American Federation of Musicians, whose headquarters is in New York, to be in touch with the members during their deliberations. No doubt his suggestions will be followed.

Some of the men who were at the meeting place early stated that musicians in local "movie" houses are getting $45 and $50 a week; yet they had been content with $35 or a little more a week, and that there had been no wage adjustment since the orchestra started, 30 years ago.

Attorney Berenson's Statement

Concert Master Frederic Fradkin, whose action at yesterday's public rehearsal caused his dismissal, conferred with attorney Berenson at 1 today. He was advised, in substance, that his contract was not one that would legally hold.

Attorney Berenson made the following statement, much of which he told the men's committee:

SYMPHONY PLAYERS MAY STRIKE TONIGHT

MEN WILL DEMAND REINSTATEMENT OF CONCERT MASTER FRADKIN AND RECOGNITION OF THEIR UNION

Union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will meet at 4 o'clock this afternoon to vote on the question of not appearing at Symphony Hall tonight as a means of forcing the reinstatement of Concert Master Frederic Fradkin, who was summarily discharged last night, and recognition of the men as an organized body.

It is understood that if the men vote to strike they will give Judge Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, ample opportunity either to accept or reject their demands before the concert time.

It is understood also that if they vote to strike they will go to Symphony Hall, prepared to take part in the concert, but if their demands are rejected they will leave the building.

The men say that musicians playing twice a day in motion-picture houses receive a minimum of $48 a week as against the lesser sums received by them for their services in rendering a higher class of music.

Arthur Berenson, attorney for the players, gave out a statement today relative to a letter sent out by the trustees, in which he said: "I assume that the corporation acting through its trustees, in writing the letter which it caused to be published in the papers this morning, acted under a clause in the contract it had with Mr. Fradkin, which provides as follows:

The corporation shall be the sole and final judge of the behavior and the quality of performance of the said musician, and if in the judgment of the said corporation the said musician has failed to keep his agreement, the said corporation, acting by its trustees, may treat this agreement as having been broken by the fault of the said musician and may thereupon dismiss the said musician from its orchestra, paying him his agreed compensation to the time of dismissal.

It is the contention of the players that this clause is an arbitrary one.

It was learned today that Conductor Monteux is a member of the Federation of Musicians in France, and that as such he is obliged to stand by the musicians affiliated with musicians anywhere in the world. It is said that if he fails to stand by the musicians in this instance that he will be barred from playing again in France as a member of the Federation.

Joseph Webber, international president of the American Federation of Musicians, was communicated with today by a member of the local players for the purpose of getting instructions as to what course to pursue tonight.

BOSTON EVENING

SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN AFTERNOON THAT CLEARED THE AIR

Fradkin Affronts Audience and Conductor and, Within a Few Hours, Pays Just Penalty—The Trustees and Mr. Monteux Learn the Temper of Their Public —"Manifestations" New and Strange in the Records of the Orchestra—Incidental Music and Eloquent Performance

THE only possible answer to the untoward episodes yesterday afternoon at the Symphony Concert is written in the letter of the trustees of the orchestra, summarily and sharply dismissing Frederic Fradkin as concert-master for gross breach of discipline and grosser affront to the audience. Wisely, the letter was despatched within a few hours after those incidents had put to shame the present and the past of the Symphony Concerts and made known as promptly to a public clearly resenting them. Better still, it contains not a hesitation or reservation. At last the trustees seem ready to make an end of the mounting indiscipline within the orchestra and to face whatever consequences the restoration of order and obligation may bring. It was high time. There has been much and reasonable mistrust of their seeming dalliance, however necessitated by undisclosed circumstance, with a situation needing to be gripped and broken; while by every discoverable sign, in and out of Symphony Hall, the public of the Symphony Concerts applauds and sustains their present resolution, will join with them in the meeting of the consequences. Tame submission to such things as befell yesterday would be far worse in continuing and sapping outcome than even a temporary suspension of the Symphony Concerts (though no such event impends) and a clearance of the disaffected from the orchestra itself.

For Mr. Fradkin, now plainly uneasy under the consequences of his follies, there is hardly an extenuating circumstance, however apologetic he now feigns to be. For days past, as his outgivings to the press have proved, he has been as a man beside himself with the vanities and the insolences of a fictitious self-importance. Long since he lost all sense of the actualities of his place in the orchestra, of the decencies of his conduct toward the public. His following in the orchestra, in equal heat and blindness of folly, a few foolish partisans in the audience of Friday afternoon have done the rest. Whatever may next befall at Symphony Hall, the air is at last cleared and decision has timely replaced indecision. Unless many a sign fails and not a few reports are mistaken, more than one member of the Symphony Orchestra has yesterday and today seen a light. However they are minded in the present quarrel, they have discovered that discipline and decency are still to prevail in the conduct of the band toward the public.

There is little need to recall in detail the incidents of the afternoon, which will make a strange page in the records of the Symphony Concerts. They befell before and after the intermission; in that quarter hour hundreds of tongues rang with them; and for the rest of the day they quite overclouded music and performance. At the Opera House last evening, they were repeated bye and large. Today the town spurts with them. Briefly they ran in this wise. Mr. Monteux, coming to his place at the beginning of the concert, was received with significantly long and loud applause as though the audience would approve his poise and procedure through the present controversy. He and the orchestra with him recalled Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" to such musical, pictorial and romantic life as it has not known in years in Bostonian ears. Sincere, hearty and insistent applause rewarded the conductor once and twice. At the second recall he bade the orchestra, according to custom, rise in its place to share and acknowledge the plaudits it had helped to win. Fradkin remained obstinately and ostentatiously in his chair. There were sharp hisses; there were renewed clappings for Mr. Monteux and the rest of the band. Then the intermission and the usual departure of conductor and men.

When the players returned, Fradkin, lingering until most of them had resumed their places, obviously courted the attention of the audience. A few hands in the second balcony clapped; more hands in the orchestra itself, especially among the minor strings, joined with them. In measure, deliberate indiscipline prompted this applause; in measure, it sprang from childish irritation at the mood of an audience altogether in sympathy with Mr. Monteux. With elaborate vanity, Fradkin bowed to his partisans on the stage and to his partisans in the auditorium. He was scarcely in his seat before Mr. Monteux returned, lifted, almost, to his platform by a flood of applause that swept from one end of Symphony Hall to the other. Many stood; cries and cheers rose above the din of hands. For once an American audience, a Bostonian audience "manifested" and beyond mistake of purpose or doubt of sincerity. The rebellious in the orchestra had their answer; the trustees received their spur. Within a few hours the salutary consequences began to be written—for beginning.

There was no reflection of these disturbances in the playing of the orchestra; indeed, from first to last, the concert was one of unusual brilliance. Mr. Monteux's reading of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" surpassed any that has been heard here, except perhaps, Mr. Weingartner's. The dramatic nature of the music tempted his better qualities, and he rose to it as he has to perhaps nothing during his stay among us. Despite its occasional ineptness and the absurdly romantic programme which inspired it, this Symphony remains one of the miracles of the art; both because of its amazing eloquence after ninety years and by reason of its entire independence of all previous and contemporary music. It is easier to imagine that it was written yesterday than it is to believe that it was composed but three years after the death of Beethoven. Except for the picturesque piping of the shepherds, the "Scene in the Meadows" now seems somewhat futile, tenuous and over long, and it is hard to take the clap-trap of the last movement seriously. But in the "March to the Scaffold" and at the end, the usually reticent Mr. Monteux was as one possessed, and it is easy to understand the applause which led to such disastrous consequences.

Malipiero's Seven Symphonic Expressions, "Pauses of Silence," were played here for the first time by Mr. Rabaud. On a second hearing the music seems less strange, and also less remarkable. Some writer on music once remarked, quite unjustly, that Sgambati was an Italian who had sold his birthright, melody. It is interesting to speculate on what he would have thought of Malipiero. The music rivets the attention, but there is little that can be carried away in recollection save biting and acid harmonies, bizarre instrumental effects and tortured melodic phrases. Between Malipiero and Wagner's Overture to the Flying Dutchman, which ended the concert, stood Borodin's Orchestral Sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia." To read the composer's explanatory preface before hearing the piece is to experience disappointment, as the music gives but faint suggestion of its programme. The two melodies are striking in themselves; the Oriental song, which typifies the advancing caravan, is fascinatingly exotic, but in company with Berlioz and Wagner, and even Malipiero, Borodin's music was no more than a pleasing interlude.

It was good to hear again the Flying Dutchman Overture, which served as a fitting conclusion to the concert. The performance was effective, although other conductors have better suggested the music's wildness and elemental breadth. Its compelling eloquence again prompted the reflection that Wagner at his best stands apart from all other composers in the beauty, vitality and validity of his ideas, and in their perfect expression.

Musicians Demand Return of Leader

There will be no concert tonight by the Boston Symphony Orchestra unless Concert-Master Fradkin, discharged by the trustees today, is reinstated before the time the concert is scheduled to begin.

This critical turn in the affairs of the orchestra was forecasted today by the action of three of its leading soloists, who declared they would refuse to play unless Fradkin is taken back.

The sentinent expressed by these three men was reiterated by other members of the orchestra as fast as they learned of Fradkin's discharge. It was thought that by afternoon every union musician would join the three soloists in their stand.

Meet This Afternoon

An ultimatum to the effect that the musicians will refuse to play tonight will probably be sent to Judge Cabot, head of the orchestra trustees, after the special meeting this afternoon.

The meeting was called for at 4 p.m. in Room 7, 61 Court st. All members of the orchestra were notified that their presence was urgently desired.

Fradkin's discharge followed his refusal to stand with the rest of the orchestra to receive applause at a concert Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The large audience present met his action with prolonged hisses and cat-calls. All other members of the orchestra stood up, at the request of Director Monteux.

The appearance of Conductor Monteux at the opening of the concert had been a signal for applause of unusual fervor. Whether a consideration of the Sanders Theatre episode influenced the warmth of this reception is problematical.

Unprecedented Applause

Then, after a marvelous rendition of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, the applause broke out in torrents never equalled at any previous concert. Mr. Monteux retired, but reappeared to acknowledge the continued applause. Again he was recalled and this time he waved to the members of the orchestra to rise and share the applause with him.

All rose save Concertmaster Fradkin. The significance of his attitude was sensed immediately by the audience. An embarrassed hush intruded upon the plaudits, to give way in

(Continued on Page Two, Column One)

BOSTON EVENING RECORD, SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1920

SYMPHONY PLAYERS WANT FRADKIN

Symphony Men May Strike

SYMPHONY MEN NOW THREATEN TO CALL STRIKE

Demand Reinstatement of Concert-Master Fradkin

(Continued from Page One)

a moment to a mightier roar of applause for the conductor and the others, and an intermingling of hisses for the concertmaster.

There was hissing again when Mr. Fradkin retired at the intermission, but when he returned there was a ripple of applause for him, this coming chiefly from the second balcony. Mr. Fradkin stood and bowed in acknowledgement of this greeting.

In connection with the present situation, Atty. Berenson, counsel for the union players, issued the following statement:—

Berenson's Statement

"I assume that the corporation, acting through its trustees, in writing the letter which it caused to have published in the papers this morning, acted under a clause in the contract it has with Mr. Fradkin, which provides as follows:—

"'The corporation shall be the sole and final judge of the behavior and the quality of performance of the said musician, and if in the judgment of the said corporation the said musician has failed to keep his agreement, the said corporation, acting by its trustees, may treat this agreement as having been broken by the fault of the said musician and may thereupon dismiss the said musician from its orchestra, paying him his agreed compensation to the time of the dismissal.'

"Mr. Fradkin has consulted me about his rights and I have advised him that this clause in the contract which makes the trustees of the orchestra the sole judges of whether or not he has performed the contract, is a void provision, being against public policy in the law of contracts, since it is an attempt to oust the courts of jurisdiction, and since it is an attempt to make the interested parties, the sole arbiters in the cause.

"Mr. Fradkin was not asked to attend any hearing or any meeting of the trustees, was never given an opportunity to explain the reason for his conduct, and it is difficult to see how men who purport to exercise judgment can do so without a full and fair hearing to the parties interested.

Unusual Provision

"This provision in the contract is a most unusual one. If given the right it affords an opportunity to those who have the power to act in the most arbitrary way, and if the courts are to be ousted of their jurisdiction and cannot be made the final arbiters of controversies between parties, there is no use of our maintaining the judicial system at great expense to the public.

"I regret exceedingly the step which the trustees have taken because it makes it more difficult for me to smooth the path to a final agreement. Mr. Fradkin's motives were entirely altruistic in his having joined with the men. He had nothing whatsoever to gain from his having joined with the men. He sought for and looked for nothing from the trustees.

"Yesterday he was in a sensitive condition, in view of his mother having been taken to the hospital and placed under a serious operation, which, by the way, did not prevent his going to the orchestra yesterday and performing just after she came off the operating table and was placed on the dangerous list in the hospital.

"Fradkin felt at the time and from what had been said to him before he went upon the stage that a demonstration had been arranged for in favor of Monteux. He himself, has done nothing to disrupt the orchestra, but has done everything he could, do to keep it together, and I personally hope that the apology which Mr. Fradkin made to those who attended the concert through the press will be accepted in the spirit in which it was offered.

Regrets Hasty Action

"I am willing to extend myself in every way that I can to see the Boston Symphony Orchestra isn't disrupted. While I have a very strong feeling that if the trustees wanted a disruption of the orchestra they could not have adopted any better method than the one they did adopt, I hope it was not done in what they believed was any anticipation of what was likely to come if they did not concede to the reasonable demands the orchestra was asking upon them.

"It is regrettable that the trustees so hastily and thoughtlessly took the action which they did. It showed the danger of men assuming arbitrary powers to themselves."

SYMPHONY TROUBLES NEAR CRISIS

"Firing" of Fradkin for "Snub" to Monteux Stirs Players

PATRONS TAKE SIDES ON ISSUE

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was discharged last night by trustees of the organization on account of what they claim was his public "snub" of Pierre Monteux, the conductor, during the concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

The trouble between Fradkin and Monteux began Thursday evening at Sanders Theatre, in Memorial Hall, Cambridge, when, it is charged, Monteux refused Fradkin permission to use a dressing room which always has been shared by the director, concert master and virtuosos.

The crisis in the controversy was acted out on the stage of Symphony Hall in the view of a great audience. It came as a sudden and startling diversion for the rapture induced throughout the assembly by a musical performance declared to be the most brilliant and masterly heard in this city for years.

Monteux Shares Applause

The appearance of Conductor Monteux at the opening of the concert had been a signal for applause of unusual fervor. Whether a consideration of the Sanders Theatre episode influenced the warmth of this reception is problematical.

Then, after a marvelous rendition of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, the applause broke out in torrents never equalled at any previous concert. Mr. Monteux retired, but re-appeared to acknowledge the continued applause. Again he was recalled and this time he waved to the members of the orchestra to rise and share the applause with him.

All rose save Concertmaster Fradkin. The significance of his attitude was sensed immediately by the audience. An embarrassed hush intruded upon the plaudits, to give way in a moment to a mightier roar of applause for the conductor and the others, and an intermingling of hisses for the concertmaster.

There was hissing again when Mr. Fradkin retired at the intermission, but when he returned there was a ripple of applause for him, this coming chiefly from the second balcony. Mr. Fradkin stood and bowed in acknowledgement of this greeting.

The trustees' letter of discharge, sent by Judge Frederick P. Cabot to Mr. Fradkin last night, was as follows:

"I hereby notify you that the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., have passed the following votes in reference to you.

Failed in Agreement

"'Voted that in the judgment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., acting by its trustees in a meeting held on the evening of March 5, 1920, Fredric Fradkin has failed to keep his written agreements entered into between him and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal at Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon, March 5, 1920, and that therefor he be dismissed from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., and in further accordance with the terms of his agreement he be paid his agreed compensation to the time of his dismissal.

"'Voted that the president of the trustees be directed to give Fredric Fradkin notice forthwith of the foregoing action.'

"In pursuance of this action of the trustees you are hereby notified that you are dismissed from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc.

"I enclose check for $234.38 in payment of your agreed compensation to the time of dismissal. Yours truly,

"(Signed) FREDERICK P. CABOT,
President of the trustees, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc."

May Break Up Orchestra

The controversy has now reached a point which threatens the disruption of the orchestra. A meeting of those mem-

(Continued on Page Two, Column 3.)

MONTEUX GIVES FINE READING OF BERLOIZ NUMBER

Mr. Monteux's exceptionally brilliant reading of the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony and the surprising display by Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster, of his feeling toward Mr. Monteux, by not rising, when bidden, in recognition of the applause of the audience following the symphony, were the features of yesterday afternoon's concert.

The presentation of the Berlioz number rivalled the best in the history of the orchestra. Fortunately, it was enjoyed before "the scene," for that rather spoiled the rest of the concert for the audience. The concert will be repeated tonight.

SYMPHONY ROW NEARS CRISIS

Continued from First Page

bers of the orchestra who have joined the musicians' union since the inception of the trouble may be held today and will develop some sort of ultimatum to the trustees as a result of the concertmaster's discharge.

The dissension began with a demand by the players for $1000 salary increases. It progressed through a unionization of the greater number of the players as the trustees deferred definite action on the salary demand. The concertmaster cast his influence into the players' side, even to the extent of joining the union, although his salary is several times greater than that of the men, and of serving on the union executive committee of seven. The feeling reached the acute point in the Sanders Theatre incident, with the denouement yesterday.

Fradkin May Bring Suit

Shortly after midnight, last night, Fradkin, through his counsel, in discussing his dismissal, declared that he had been improperly discharged. He maintained that he holds himself in readiness to perform his contract, and this attitude his lawyer asserted, means a civil suit, unless the trustees rescind the discharge.

A member of the players' committee of seven, and one of the prominent players, who was still in Fradkin's apartments, where the committee had been meeting prior to the news of the discharge, stated that it was his impression that the trustees were evidently bent on disrupting the orchestra, and if that was their intention they could not have adopted a better means than by discharging Fradkin.

As the committee meeting in Fradkin's apartments had broked up before the news of the discharge was received by the concertmaster no arrangements to act on the unexpected situation that has arisen could be taken, but members still present expect the action of the trustees will precipitate an expression of violent indignation today from the more than 75 union members of the orchestra.

[illegible] the greatest insults that could be imposed on any self-respecting man.

"Yesterday had been a trying day for me as my mother was taken seriously ill to a hospital and I was very much upset. When Mr. Monteux received an unprecedented ovation, which seemed to me to come from an inspired claque, I did not arise to acknowledge it, especially since one of the employes at Symphony Hall said to me before the performance, 'We are going to see by the applause which side the audience will take.'

"I would not make any such statement under any circumstance unless I had thus previously been convinced that an organized attempt was afoot to discredit our union. I wish to reiterate that I did not get up with Mr. Monteux and the orchestra because of the previous demonstration to Mr. Monteux, which I believed was inspired.

"It appeared to me that this applause was for Mr. Monteux and the orchestra and not for me. In the published accounts no emphasis was brought on the fact that I did arise later and very gratefully acknowledge the applause when I believed that my humble part was approved.

"I wish to state that if any one took offence there was no intention on my part to inflict a slight of any kind on the audience.

"We Are Human Beings"

"One thing the public may not know is that the personnel of the Symphony orchestra is composed of human beings who wish to live a normal life like anyone else. While the appreciation of their art from the patrons is gratifying, yet it does not pay household bills and those living expenses which are pressing so hard on the meanly paid musicians. I am quite sure the music-loving public will agree with me that the members of the Symphony orchestra ought to get a living wage. It is easy to prove that many of them are not getting it.

"On the advice of my attorney and because of the duty I owe my comrades in the orchestra, I intend to report as usual at the next concert.

"The best evidence that neither myself or the members of the orchestra intended any offence to the public is that, according to Philip Hale, the critic, Berlioz's symphony was rendered the best in 30 years.

"I am not legally discharged. The trustees cannot as yet assume powers that properly belong to the courts. Passing judgment upon me without ever having me appear before them, or any hearing whatsoever, is a piece of arbitrary conduct which wage-earners the world over rebel against.

"The courts in Massachusetts are still functioning. I, at least, purpose to have a hearing before a jury since the trustees have denied me one.

"Hohenzollerism and arbitrary power, I understand, were ended by the war. We fought for the right to govern ourselves and take away arbitrary power. Probably the trustees have not come to realization as to why the war was fought."

Traveler Mar 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DISRUPTION COMPLETE

Dismissal of Fradkin Creates Crisis

Record Mar 6

Complete disruption of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was predicted today by persons in close touch with the institution's affairs, following Concert-Master Fradkin's discharge by the trustees because he refused to acknowledge the applause of yesterday's Symphony patrons when requested to do so by Director Pierre Monteux.

Union members of the orchestra today took steps, in conjunction with Fradkin, to map out a program of defense which, if put into operation, will give music and society circles throughout the country something to talk about for many months.

It was clearly intimated, from various sources, that unless the Fradkin and wage matters are immediately adjusted Boston will have no more Symphony. Some even declared that Fradkin's discharge meant that yesterday's performance was the last.

There is a concert scheduled for tonight. Whether it will be held is a matter of much speculation. Fradkin told The Record that he would be there.

To Serve Ultimatum

The special meeting of all the union members called for Monday for the purpose of drawing up their proposed wage schedule and working conditions has now been called for an earlier date, and unless some drastic action is taken today Judge Cabot will be served with the members' ultimatum not later than Monday.

The crisis in the controversy between Director Monteux and Concertmaster Fradkin was acted out on the stage of Symphony Hall in the view of a great audience. It came as a sudden and startling diversion for the rapture induced throughout the assembly by a musical performance declared to be the most brilliant and masterly heard in this city for years.

The appearance of Conductor Monteux at the opening of the concert had been a signal for applause of unusual fervor. Whether a consideration of the Sanders Theatre episode influenced the warmth of this reception is problematical.

Unprecedented Applause

Then, after a marvelous rendition of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, the applause broke out in torrents never equalled at any previous concert. Mr. Monteux retired, but re-appeared to acknowledge the continued applause

(Continued on Page Four, Column Four)

The concert-[illegible] fluence into the players' side, even to the extent of joining the union, although his salary is several times greater than that of the men, and of serving on the union executive committee of seven. The feeling reached the acute point in the Sanders Theatre incident with the denouement yesterday.

Shortly after midnight last night Fradkin, through his counsel, in discussing his dismissal, declared that he had been improperly discharged. He maintained that he holds himself in readiness to perform his contract, and this attitude his lawyer asserted, means a civil suit, unless the trustees rescind the discharge.

See Trustees' Scheme

A member of the players' committee of seven, and one of the prominent players, who was still in Fradkin's apartments, where the committee had been meeting prior to the news of the discharge, stated that it was his impression that the trustees were evidently bent on disrupting the orchestra, and if that was their intention they could not have adopted a better means than by discharging Fradkin.

As the committee meeting in Fradkin's apartments had broken up before the news of the discharge was received by the concert-master no arrangements to act on the unexpected situation that has arisen could be taken, but members still present expect the action of the trustees will precipitate an expression of violent indignation today from the more than 75 union members of the orchestra.

Dispute May Hold up Concert by Symphony; Players Take Sides

Fradkin Insists He Will Appear at Tonight's Performance—May Take His Dismissal to Court

The outstanding feature today in the clash of Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Frederic Fradkin, "deposed" concert master, was the uncertainty of members of the orchestra and patrons that tonight's scheduled concert at Symphony Hall would be given.

This uncertainty was due to the fact that union members of the orchestra, incensed at the summary dismissal of Fradkin, following, what the trustees claim, was his public "snub" of Monteux at last night's concert, evaded answering the direct question as to whether or not they would play.

None of the musicians would make any comment today as to what action they would take, but there were strong indications of an open breach if Fradkin were not permitted to be in his accustomed place this evening.

Developments in the controversy between the players and the management came fast today. The salient features were:

Announcement by Fradkin that, in spite of his dismissal by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees, he would report at the Symphony Hall concert this evening.

The threat of the concert master to take his case to court for a hearing before a jury. Fradkin contends he was not legally discharged and that the trustees assumed powers properly belonging to the courts.

Everything today pointed to the controversy reaching an acute stage tonight, when Fradkin will make an attempt to take his seat with the players. Seats for the concert have practically all been sold.

Just how the management and tht conductor would offset Fradkin's plans to be in his accustomed place was the cause of much comment among patrons of the orchestra. Tht probable attitude of the players, if the conductor refused to per-

(Continued on Page Two, Column 6.)

DISRUPTION OF SYMPHONY IS FORECAST NOW

Record Mar 6

Members May Not Play Again on Account of Fradkin Discharge

(Continued from Page One)

Again he was recalled and this time he waved to the members of the orchestra to rise and share the applause with him.

All rose save Concertmaster Fradkin. The significance of his attitude was sensed immediately by the audience. An embarrassed hush intruded upon the plaudits, to give way in a moment to a mightier roar of applause for the conductor and the others, and an intermingling of hisses for the concertmaster.

There was hissing again when Mr. Fradkin retired at the intermission, but when he returned there was a ripple of applause for him, this coming chiefly from the second balcony. Mr. Fradkin stood and bowed in acknowledgement of this greeting.

May Bring Suit

The dissention began with a demand by the players for $1000 salary increases. It progressed through a unionization of the greater number of the players as the trustees deferred definite action on the salary demand. [illegible] master cast his in-

36 STRIKE, BUT SYMPHONY PLAYS

Walkout Follows Refusal to Take Fradkin Back

Cabot Says Orchestra Will Go On —Modified Program Given

In spite of the refusal of 36 players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to appear upon the platform at Symphony Hall last evening, unless the management reinstated Concertmaster Fredric Fradkin, a concert with a changed program was given by an orchestra reduced to 53 players, under the direction of Conductor Pierre Monteux.

The refusal on the part of the Fradkin supporters to participate in the concert unless he was reinstated was decided upon at a meeting held late yesterday afternoon at 61 Court st.

The first word that the trustees received of this attitude was a telephone message received about 7:15 p m by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees.

Judge Cabot informed the players that Mr Fradkin was no longer a member of the orchestra, and stated that the concert would go on.

The men who refused to play were:

O. Roth, A. Bak, A. Ribarsch, W. Traupe, H. Sauvlet, H. Goldstein, J. Di Natale, R. Henkle, S. Diamond, C. Deane, R. Ringwall, A. Langley, N. Kurkjie, A. Fiedler and A. Blackman, violins.

V. Berlin, H. Van Veen, W. Kay, H. Grover, F. Wittman, C. Van Wynbergen, P. Shirley and W. Blumenau, violas.

R. Nagel, J. Warnke, C. Stockbridge, cellos.

A. Jaeger, bass.

A. Sand, clarinet.

M. Fuhrmann, contra-bassoon.

M. Hess, horn.

G. Heim, trumpet.

F. Sordillo, trombone.

P. Mattersteig, tuba.

T. Cella, harp.

S. Neumann and C. Gardner, tympani.

Big Audience on Hand

Great excitement prevailed among the large audience which gathered in the hall shortly before 8 o'clock.

Mr Fradkin was seen in the lobby for a short time about 10 minutes before the advertised hour for the beginning of the concert. He stated that he should go to the stage door as usual and offer his services to the management in his usual capacity.

Continued on the Fourteenth Page.

36 STRIKE, BUT SYMPHONY PLAYS

Continued From the First Page.

Although the concerts usually begin very promptly at 8 o'clock, only about half of the players were in their accustomed seats last evening at that hour. Gradually a few more straggled in, and at exactly 8:15 Conductor Monteux made his appearance upon the platform ,accompanied by Judge Cabot. The sight of the conductor was the signal for an outburst of applause, and by the time the conductor reached the front of the platform the entire audience was on its feet, applauding vociferously.

As soon as the applause subsided Judge Cabot addressed the gathering as follows:

"Ladies and gentlemen, this orchestra was founded for a great ideal, to increase America's ideals of beauty, of honor and of nobleness. The members of this orchestra have written contracts providing that each member shall do his full duty during each concert and that he shall obey the rules of the organization.

"Tonight certain of these gentlemen have declined to come upon the stage because of the action of the trustees in dismissing one of their members for refusing to obey the rules of the organization. This will necessitate a change of program tonight.

"These men whom you see upon the platform have come forward, loyally and courageously" (Here Judge Cabot was interrupted by a tremendous outburst of applause which lasted for almost a minute), "to live up to their obligations and duties, realizing that the action of the trustees has nothing to do with them.

"A great principle is at stake. As a result of the war we have thought that honor and nobleness walked among us once more. When those others who have refused to appear upon the platform tonight have had time to think over their action, I hope that they will come out. I ask your indulgence."

Changed Program Given

Judge Cabot and Mr Monteux then retired from the platform, and after another short wait the conductor reappeared, again greeted by prolonged applause, and the concert began at a few moments after 8:30.

Instead of Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony No. 1 in C Major," the opening number upon the original program, last night's concert began with "Fingel's Cave," by Mendelssohn. This was followed by a Haydn symphony.

Upon his third recall to the platform by the applause which followed this symphony, Mr Monteux turned to the orchestra and motioned the players to rise and bow their acknowledgments, at which the volume of the applause swelled noticeably. It was a similar incident on Friday afternoon, which brought about the incident resulting in Mr Fradkin's dismissal, since he alone remained seated when the conductor motioned to the players to rise and bow.

After the intermission Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," the only number on the original program, was given, while the final number was a brilliant concerto for the violincello by Saint-Saens, in which Bedetti, 'cellist, was warmly applauded for his solo work.

After this number—the final one on the program as rearranged by Mr Monteux—the audience recalled the conductor so many times that he finally granted an encore, a proceeding very unusual at Symphony concerts.

Says Orchestra Will Go On

During the intermission the sole topic of conversation was the strike and the manner in which it had been met by the management. Judge Cabot, when seen in the lobby at this time, declared that, in any event, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will go on.

"I can only say," the judge remarked, "that I am very sorry for what has occurred. But when a man refuses to go on the platform directly before a concert it is a plain violation of contract."

Asked whether the trustees would pursue the same course in regard to the players who refused to appear last night as they did toward Concertmaster Fradkin, Judge Cabot replied that he was in no position to make any statement for the trustees as yet, but reiterated that, no matter what happens, the orchestra will go on.

During the general buzz of excited conversation which filled the interval between Judge Cabot's announcement that the concert would be given with an altered program and the reappearance of Conductor Monteux, one woman caused no little amusement among those in her immediate vicinity by remarking that with Judge Cabot and Corporation Counsel Arthur D. Hill—who was sitting in the front row of the first balcony—both present in the hall, it seemed remarkable that some speedy manner of issuing an injunction to restrain the players from striking could not be devised.

47 VOTED NOT TO PLAY, BUT 11 CHANGED THEIR MINDS

Members of the Symphony Orchestra gathered in the tuning room prior to the concert last night, where the vote of the afternoon meeting not to play unless Concertmaster Fradkin was reinstated in the orchestra was placed before them.

There were 91 men in the tuning room at the time, of whom 74 were members of the union, and 47 voted not to play, it is said.

Judge Cabot and Conductor Monteux made two visits to the tuning room to ask the men to go on. Judge Cabot told the men they would violate their contracts if they did not proceed. In reply, the musicians declared:

"Give us Fradkin!"

"Fradkin is no longer a member of the orchestra," Judge Cabot replied. "He was discharged for misconduct. You men should give me more notice of the action you propose to take."

To this one of the musicians replied, "How much notice did you give Fradkin?"

When the final call came for the men to go on the stage, 11 of the 47 men who had voted not to play went on the stage.

William G Dodge, chairman of the board of directors of the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, said the musicians were not divided at all on the question of a final walkout, but merely on the question of the walkout last night.

The 36 musicians went to union headquarters, but after the concert a number went back to Symphony Hall to meet the other musicians when they came out. On their return they brought back to the union headquarters nine more men who had played. They were:

J. Hoffmann, B. Fiedler, P. Leveen, violins; I. Frankel, M. Kunze, basses; B. Piller, bassoon; L. Speyer, English horn; W. Gebhardt, horn; F. Zahn, percussion.

At a meeting which lasted until after midnight, the union musicians reiterated their determination not to take part in the rehearsal Monday or to do other Symphony work until the concert master is reinstated.

MEN ISSUE STATEMENT OUTLINING POSITION

The meeting of Symphony Orchestra members in the Shillaber Building, 61 Court st, yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock, was called by a committee of union members, but those not members of the union were invited. Just how many attended was not stated. The committee gave out the following statement to the press:

"That at the meeting held here this evening all those that could be reached came in response to the summons of the meeting; that the storm prevented some members from coming; that everyone there voted that unless Mr Fradkin was reinstated that they would not go upon the stage tonight; that they were perfectly willing to go on; that they viewed Mr Fradkin's dismissal as entirely uncalled for and as an affront to them, and since the trustees were the aggressors in this controversy and didn't hesitate to give any affront to members of the association they feel that they could not be blamed for any action that they had taken; that they are perfectly willing to go on and play tonight so as not to disappoint the audience, if Mr Fradkin is reinstated; that if the public feels any disappointment that the trustees knew or ought to have known as reasonable men, and many of them lawyers, the result and they didn't hesitate to take the action, knowing as they should have known that it was likely to disrupt the orchestra and that the concert would probably not go on under the circumstances; that the men haven't sought this thing; that they would have liked to avoid it; that they are anxious to keep the orchestra together until the differences could be settled between themselves and the trustees, but if the trustees insist on taking the action that they did take, that they feel there was nothing else for them to do under the circumstances.

"The committee had previously considered the matter and had come to the same conclusion."

Attached to the statement was the following by their counsel, Arthur Berenson:

"That the men called me in to advise them as to what their rights were under their several contracts and I gave them as best I could my legal opinion as to what their rights were under the contract."

FRADKIN ADVISED HIS DISCHARGE IS ILLEGAL

Attorney Berenson advised Concertmaster Fradkin yesterday that his contract provision under which he was discharged is void.

Attorney Berenson made the following statement, much of which he told the men's committee:

"I assume that the corporation, acting through its trustees, in writing the letter which it caused to have published in the papers this morning, acted under a clause in the contract it has with with Mr Fradkin, which provides as follows:

"'The corporation shall be the sole and final judge of the behavior and the quality of performance of the said musician, and if in the judgment of the said corporation the said musician has failed to keep his agreement, the said corporation, acting by its trustees, may treat this agreement as having been broken by the fault of the said musician and may thereupon dismiss the said musician from its orchestra, paying him his agreed compensation to the time of dismissal.'

"Mr Fradkin has consulted me about his rights and I have advised him that this clause in the contract which makes the trustees of the orchestra the sole judges of whether or not he has performed the contract, is a void provision, being against public policy in the law of contracts, since it is an attempt to oust the courts of jurisdiction, and since it is an attempt to make the interested parties the sole arbiters in the cause.

"Provision an Unusual One"

"Mr Fradkin was not asked to attend any hearing or any meeting of the trustees, was never given an opportunity to explain the reason for his conduct, and it is difficult to see how men who purport to exercise judgment can do so without a full and fair hearing to the parties interested.

"This provision in the contract is a most unusual one. If given the trustees affords an opportunity to those who have the power to act in the most arbitrary way, and if the courts are to be ousted of their jurisdiction and cannot be made the final arbiters of controversies between parties there is no use of our maintaining the judicial system, at great expense to the public.

"The provision above quoted, so far as I know, exists only in Mr Fradkin's contract. In the other contracts the conductor is made the sole arbiter of whether or not each musician in the orchestra has performed his contract, and if the contract has any legal validity then the conductor may discharge a man for any arbitrary reason; for instance, if he doesn't like the color of his necktie or the way he parts his hair. That might be sufficient reason under the contract, on the part of the conductor, to discharge the man.

"In my conference yesterday afternoon with Mr Warren and Judge Cabot, I may state that both gentlemen accorded me very courteous treatment, and I expressed to them my earnest desire, in behalf of those whom I represented, to keep the orchestra together.

"Fradkin's Motives Altruistic"

"I regret exceedingly the step which the trustees have taken because it makes it more difficult for me to smooth the path to a final agreement. Mr Fradkin's motives were entirely altruistic in his having joined with the men.

"He had nothing whatsoever to gain from his having joined with the men. He sought for, and looked for, nothing from the trustees. He felt that what he did was absolutely necessary in order to maintain the high standard in the orchestra and to see that the men worked under living conditions. He felt that they were not obtaining those conditions.

"There is no question but that Mr Fradkin's services have been always of a very highly satisfactory order, and there was no complaint made yesterday by anybody relative to his performance on the violin.

"I talked with Mr Fradkin and I am very sure from what he has stated to me he intended no offense to the public, that he felt that the applause was not intended for him, in view of his activities, and possibly what occurred before.

"He was in a sensitive condition, in view of his mother having been taken to the hospital and placed under a serious operation, which, by the way, did not prevent his going to the orchestra yesterday and performing just after she came off the operating table and was placed on the dangerous list in the hospital.

"The demonstration in favor of Mr Monteux apparently was construed by him as a demonstration in favor of Monteux and as being a disapproval of his conduct. He felt at the time and from what had been said to him before he went upon the stage that a demonstration had been arranged for in favor of Monteux.

Hopes Public Will Stand by Men

"He, himself, has done nothing to disrupt the orchestra, but has done everything he could to keep it together, and I, personally, hope that the apology which Mr Fradkin made to those who attended the concert, through the press, will be accepted in the spirit in which it was offered.

"I am willing to extend myself in every way that I can to see the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not disrupted.

"While I have a very strong feeling that if the trustees wanted a disruption of the orchestra they could not have adopted any better method than the one they did adopt, I hope it was not done in what they believed was any anticipation of what was likely to come if they did not concede to the reasonable demands the orchestra was making upon them.

"It is regrettable that the trustees so hastily and thoughtlessly took the action which they did. It showed the danger of men assuming arbitrary powers to themselves.

"It is hoped that the public will stand by the men who have endeavored so earnestly to give them the very highest grade music and who have given the Boston Symphony Orchestra its great reputation.

"It will be difficult, if not impossible, to replace such men in the orchestra. At best the men have had an up-hill fight on account of the difficult working conditions and the utterly unfair clauses in the contract which in the past muffled individual members, and they feel the only way to combat the injustice was for them to join with the 90,000 members of the American Federation of Musicians.

"To be a member of that a man must be a citizen of the United States or applied to be one."

STRIKE OF SYMPHONY PLAYERS

REFUSAL TO RESTORE FRADKIN RESULTS IN EVENING WALKOUT

Judge Cabot Tells Orchestra That Concert-master Is No Longer with Organization

SYMPATHIZERS CHEER AND EMBRACE DEPOSED PLAYER

The strike that has been threatening for several days among the recently unionized members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began last night, when 35 of the 91 members of the orchestra refused to take part in the scheduled performance in Symphony Hall. Their action was based on the refusal of the trustees to reinstate Frederic Fradkin, concert master and one of the leaders in the movement among the union players, who was dismissed because of alleged breach of contract.

In spite of the strike, the performance was given before an enthusiastic audience that filled the hall, though the program was changed from Berlioz's symphony, which had been scheduled. The substitute program was played by 53 members of the regular orchestra.

Nine other players joined the strikers later.

Fradkin Is Barred

Fradkin went to Symphony Hall last night before the opening of the performance, but was refused admittance to the players' quarters. The musicians assembled in the tuning room at 7:30 P. M., and when they were informed that the trustees would not reinstate Fradkin, much less permit him into the rooms reserved for the players, the 88 musicians present began to discuss the situation.

After considering the action of the 35 of the 74 union members who had held a meeting at 61 Court street in the afternoon, when it was unanimously voted that those then present would not go upon the stage last evening unless Fradkin was reinstated, the question of what action should be taken was put to a vote.

At the first count 47 of the players favored going on strike at once. Of the contrary-minded several union members expressed themselves as desiring to participate in last night's performance. These argued that the trustees should have been given more notice of a strike than was given by the men at the meeting yesterday afternoon.

Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees, and Conductor Monteux made two visits to the tuning room while the question of strike was being discussed. They appealed to the players, saying that as men of honor they should live up to their contracts.

Srikers Embrace Fradkin

Judge Cabot was interrupted by cries of "Give us Fradkin," uttered by members of the union. To this Mr. Cabot replied that Fradkin was no longer a member of the orchestra; he had been discharged for misconduct. He also expressed the sentiment of the trustees regarding the short notive given by the men who had met yesterday afternoon.

"How much notice did the trustees give Fradkin?" was the reply made to the chairman's statement.

Finally, just before the last call for the curtain was being made, the 35 players packed up their instruments and left the building. They went to the St. Botolph street headquarters of the Boston Mutual Protective Union, an A. F. of L. organization which is a part of the American Federation of Musicians, the union to which leaders of the strikers assert that 74 of the Symphony players belong.

There they were joined by Concert Master Fradkin, who after being notified that he would not be reinstated,

(Continued on Page Two, Column 1.)

(Photograph by Bachrach.)
PIERRE MONTEUX
Hero of Last Evening's Audience at the Symphony Concert

35 Symphony Players Go on Strike and Leave Hall

(Continued from Page One)

had gone to the house of a friend near Symphony Hall. While at the friend's residence he was notified of the beginning of the strike. The strikers received Fradkin with cheers; several of them embraced him and reiterated their sentiments of affection. He seemed much moved by the demonstration.

Says Strike Will Grow

Fradkin made a short speech, telling of his pleasure at the evidence of regard for him, but adding that most of his satisfaction was because the strikers had acted in support of a great and worthy movement. He pleaded with the strikers not to pass hasty judgment on the more than 30 other union members who had remained at the hall. Most of them would join the strikers before Monday, he thought. He declared that his dismissal was aimed at the union, rather than attributable to any misconduct by him.

After Fradkin had addressed them, the strikers went into conference with William G. Dodge, chairman of the board of directors of the Boston Musicians' Protective Union.

According to the union members, the list of strikers includes the following:

Violins—O. Roth, A. Ribarsch, A. Bak, W. Traupe, H. Sauvieth, H. Goldstein, J. Di Natale, R. Ringwall, A. Fiedler, R. Henkle, S. Diamond, C. Dean, A. Langley, N. Kurkdjie and A. Blackman.

Violas—F. Whittmann, V. Berlin, C. Van Wymbergen, H. Van Veemh, W. Kay, W. Blumenau and H. Grover.

Violoncellos—R. Magee, J. Warnke and C. Stockbridge.

A. Jaeger, bass; A. Sand, clarinet; M. Fuhrmann, contrabassoon; M. Hess, horn; G. Heim, trumpet; F. Sordillo, trombone; P. Mattersteig, tuba; T. Cela, harp, and S. Neumann and C. Gardner, timpanies.

After the performance was over a Symphony Hall nine more of the union players joined the strikers at the St. Botolph street meeting. They explained that they would have quit with their comrades were it not that they had scruples about leaving after the audience had assembled. These nine increased the total number of strikers to 44.

The nine were J. Hoffmann, B. Fielder and P. Leveen, violins; M. Kunze and I. Frankel, basses; B. Piller, bassoon; L. Speyer, English horn; W. Gebhardt, horn, and F. Zahn, percussion. They participated in the conference, which lasted until midnight. The meeting voted not to return to work until Fradkin is reinstated and the trustees give recognition to the union. The strikers will hold no meeting today, but will meet Monday at 2 P. M., the place to be decided upon.

At the conference last night point was made that Judge Cabot has said the trustees will take back the strikers, thereby disregarding what might be termed an open breach of contract, but will not reinstate Fradkin, who was discharged for alleged misconduct.

Several days ago the union members of the orchestra presented a demand for a yearly salary increase of $1000 each, maintaining that their salaries are far less than those given players in Symphony orchestras in other cities of the United States and where these players are union men.

The trustees of the Boston orchestra refused to negotiate with the union, and subsequent developments pointed toward a strike. Recently the union members voted that if any of the union men were discharged all should quit. Fradkin was discharged.

APPLAUD THE FAITHFUL

Audience Demonstrative During the Playing of Revised Program

A large sized audience awaited the beginning of the evening concert at Symphony Hall. As the players filed in a few at a time and took their seats there was much uncertainty in front as to what was in progress. When no more came forth it was noted that there were empty seats in almost a half of the orchestra circle. About the time the concert was scheduled to begin Frederick P. Cabot, president of the corporation, walked on the stage in front of the orchestra, accompanied by Pierre Monteux, the conductor. There were 53 members of the orchestra assembled and in their places. They began to applaud simultaneously with the audience. The applause grew in volume and the members of the orchestra rose to their feet, followed by the audience.

Judge Cabot and Conductor Monteux bowed acknowledgment of the applause and as soon as it became quiet again, Judge Cabot made his announcement that a strike of some members of the orchestra had taken place because the trustees had refused to reinstate Concertmaster Fradkin, and that the remaining members would present a concert with a changed program. When Judge Cabot referred to the loyal members of the orchestra who refused to join the strikers the audience interrupted with their applause, which continued for a full minute.

In his announcement he said. "Ladies and gentlemen. This orchestra was founded for a great ideal. This was to increase America's ideals of honor beauty and nobleness. The members of the orchestra are held with contracts that provide that each member shall do his full duty during the concert and observe the rules. Tonight certain of the gentlemen have declined to come on the stage. They declined because of the action of the trustees in dismissing one of the members who broke the rules at yesterday's concert.

"Certain of these gentlemen, those you see here on the stage, have loyally, courageously"—here he was interrupted and, resuming, continued—"come forward to live up their obligations and duty. They realize their obligations and duty and that what has taken place has nothing to do with their fulfilling their duties. We have just gone through a great war in which great principles were at stake, and as a result of this war we thought that truth and honor and nobleness walked in our ways again. Those who remained away will realize their mistake later. In the meanwhile it is necessary to change the program to conform with the orchestra."

More applause was given and Judge Cabot and Conductor Monteux left the stage. When the conductor returned to take the baton he summoned a white-haired flute player to the conductor's stand, who announced the program, including "Fingal's Cave," by Mendelssohn; Haydn's Symphony and "On the Steppes of Central Asia," an orchestral sketch by Borodin, the latter being one of the numbers on the regular program. J. Bedetti, violoncello soloist, was the only member of the orchestra to be featured during the program. He played a Saint-Saens concerto.

During an intermission Judge Cabot and other members of the board of trustees were in the corridors of the hall and were frequently called on to receive expressions of regret for the "strike" and congratulations that so large a proportion of the orchestra had remained loyal. So far as the complaints of the orchestra members touched on the rate of their compensation, several among the audience were heard to declare that the difference between what they had been receiving and what they would be satisfied with could be secured by subscription, and that measures to accomplish this had already been instituted.

Orchestra to Be Continued

Judge Cabot was asked what attitude the trustees assumed with regard to the strike. "We have not conferred as yet," he said, "and I am not prepared to speak for them. I first received word that members would not play before I left my home at 7:15. I do not know which members played and who did not. Those who refused to play violated their contract. We have no other busines relations with them than as contained in the contracts. No third party, union or otherwise, enters into our relationship with the individual orchestra member.

"What our course may be is perfectly obvious and yet I can only speak for myself. The Symphony Orchestra will go on and the concerts will continue. Of that I can give assurance."

Three times Conductor Monteux walked off the stage, to be recalled by the insistent applause. On the last appearance he motioned for the musicians to stand and receive the tribute which the applause was obviously intended to convey for their loyalty.

At the end of the concert the audience stood and applauded. While many started to leave, the great majority remained and continued to applaud, with the result that an encore was given. This, it was said, was unique in the orchestra's concerts.

ATTITUDE OF THE UNION

Its Counsel Notifies Trustees That Fradkin's Dismissal Was "Illegal"

Arthur Berenson, counsel for the union members of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday sent a letter to Mr. Cabot, chairman of the trustees, notifying the trustees that their dismissal of Fradkin was "illegal" and that he would be on hand for the evening performance.

"The demonstration in favor of Mr. Monteux," said Atty. Berenson, "was construed by Mr. Fradkin as being an expression of the audience's approval of Monteux's conduct. Fradkin felt at the time, and from what had been said to him before he went upon the stage, that a demonstration had been arranged in favor of Monteux. He has done nothing to disrupt the orchestra, but has done everything to keep it intact; and I hope that the apology he made through the press to those who attended the concert will be accepted in the spirit in which it was offered.

"I am willing to extend myself in every way that I can to see that the orchestra is not disrupted. While I have a strong feeling that if the trustees wanted a disruption they could not have adopted any better method than they did adopt, I hope it was not done in what they believed was anticipation of what was likely to come if they did not concede to the reasonable demands the orchestra was making upon them.

"It is regrettable that the trustees so hastily and thoughtlessly took the action which they did. It showed the danger of men assuming arbitrary powers to themselves."

The union members' committee of seven yesterday received the report that W. H. Brennan, business manager of the orchestra, had just returned from New York and that he had been there seeking musicians. In this connection, committee members stated that National President Webber of the American Federation of Musicians had sent a communication from New York stating that his organization would block attempts to get players from New York or any other city.

Committeemen also asserted that Manager Brennan and the trustees yesterday offered increased salaries to several of the players on condition that they break away from the union. They asserted that Herman Goldstein, violinist, was one of the players interviewed and that he refused the offer, saying that he would not play unless Fradkin were reinstated.

Symphony Players Strike, 35 Quit

FRADKIN IS BARRED FROM HALL

Advertiser May 4

Union Musicians Decide to Stand by Concert Master

CABOT IN SPEECH SAYS 'WE WILL GO ON'

Fifty-Three Men Who Stick Play An Altered Bill

Thirty-five union members, or about one-third of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, struck last night and the concert program was changed to allow the remaining fifty-three members of the organization to give the bill. About a dozen were unable to get to the hall because of the storm.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the board of trustees late last night declared: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra will go on in any event."

The strike followed an afternoon meeting of the union members held at No. 61 Court street, at which it was determined that the men would not play unless Concert Master Frederic Fradkin, dismissed from the orchestra by the trustees, was reinstated.

Fradkin, as a union man, has been in a controversy with Conductor Pierre Monteux and was dismissed because at Friday's rehearsal of the orchestra he refused to join the players' recognition of public applause

Fradkin, who has threatened to test the legality of his dismissal in the courts, appeared at the stage entrance of Symphony Hall at 8 o'clock last night and was refused admittance. He was told that, as he was no longer a member of the orchestra, he could be admitted only by ticket. Upon hearing of this about thirty-five of the orchestra donned their street clothes and left the hall.

WILL FIGHT IT OUT.

The men held a meeting immediately afterwards and declared themselves determined to fight it out to the end. They said that they will call out 75 per cent. of the orchestra. They said that some union men were unwilling to disappoint the public and played last night. President Joseph Weber of the American Federation of Musicians, in a telegram from New York, pledged the support of the national organization "to the limit."

As soon as the striking players had left Symphony Hall Judge Cabot addressed the audience. He said:

This orchestra was founded for a great ideal. It was founded to increase American ideas of beauty, honor and nobility. The members have signed written contracts providing that each member is to do his full duty during each concert and observe the rules and instructions of the conductor.

Tonight certain gentlemen declined to come on the stage because the trustees found it necessary to dismiss a member who refused to obey orders yesterday afternoon. Those on the stage have loyally and courageously come forward to live up to their obligations and duties.

SPEAKS OF AGREEMENTS.

A great principle is involved. We have just waged a great war because written agreements were not lived up to, and we thought that nobility and loyalty walked in our ways. I am sure that when those

Continued on Page 7, Column 3.

PRINCIPALS IN SYMPHONY WAR

PHOTO BY GARO.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Frederic Fradkin, concert master who was discharged.

35 MEMBERS OF SYMPHONY STRIKE

Continued From First Page.

other men reflect upon the meaning of their act, they will come forward, too. For the present a change of program is necessary.

When Judge Cabot finished there was vigorous and long continued applause from the audience and many exclamations of sympathy from women. The altered programme was then given.

The position of the union musicians was set forth in the following statement, given out last night by Carl E. Gardner, as spokesman for the committee of nine, appointed to decide upon the measures to be taken as a consequence of Mr. Fradkin's dismissal:

UNION STATEMENTS.

At the meeting held by us this evening, all those that could be reached came in response to the summons. The storm prevented some members from being present. It was unanimously voted that unless Mr. Fradkin was reinstated they would not go on the stage to play. They viewed the treatment of Mr. Fradkin as entirely uncalled for and as an affront to them, and that since the trustees were the aggressors in this controversy, and did not hesitate to affront the members of the association, they felt that they were not responsible for any necessary action. They were perfectly willing to go on and play, so as not to disappoint the audience, in the event of Mr. Fradkin's reinstatement.

If the public feels any disappointment, they must know as reasonable men that the action of the trustees was likely to disrupt the orchestra, and that the concert would probably not go on under the circumstances.

SEEK TO AVOID IT.

The members of the association have not sought this thing; they would have liked to avoid it; and they are anxious to keep the orchestra together until a settlement of the difference could be effected between themselves and the trustees. But if the trustees persist in their attitude, there can be no other action possible on the part of the association.

Prior to the meeting of the members, the committee considered the matter and came to the same conclusions.

Attorney Berenson, counsel for the association, issued a statement last night in connection with the difficulty. It follows:

"The men called me in to advise them as to what their rights were under their several contracts and I gave them as best I could my legal opinion as to what their rights were under the contract."

After the concert it was commented on that Judge Cabot in his address did not severely criticise the striking musicians but left the way open for them to return.

"I know nothing of Fradkin's alleged assertion that his dismissal was a violation of contract," said Judge Cabot, in discussing the legal phase of the "strike" after the concert. He declined to render a decision in the matter of a possible reinstatement of the musicians who "walked out," in the event of their willingness to abide by the judgment of the trustees. "I have not passed on the question, and in fact cannot. There would have to be a meeting of the trustees." He denied that, in his speech from the stage, in which he said that he was "sure that these men will come forward after consideration of their act," he intended to lead to the inference that the men would be taken back if they surrendered their contentions. "You can take any inference you want," he said, "but I have nothing to say in the matter. The orchestra will go on, in accordance with the traditions and ideals it has always possessed.

"These men," he said of the "strikers," "were invited to go on the stage. They refused to go on, unless Fradkin was also permitted to do so. I informed them that Fradkin was no longer a member of the orchastra and consequentl could not go on. They then declined to play."

'The first knowledge I had of the intention of these men came at 7:15, or less than an hour before the performance. They then telephoned me and stated their demands, which, I explained, could not be granted. They came to the hall, but would not go on the stage."

'The trustees, it was stated last night, are determined not to reinstate Fradkin.

It was also said that the trustees would endeavor to obtain players in New York if the trouble was not settled by Tuesday.

Symphony Players Who Went on Strike

The following thirty-five members refused to take part in last night's performance:

O. Roth, violin; A. Bak, violin; A. Ribarsch, violin; W. Traupe, violin; H. Cauvlet, violin.

H. Goldstein, violin; J. Di Natale, violin; R. Ringwall, violin; R. Henkle, violin; S. Diamond, violin; C. Deane, violin.

A. Langley, violin; N. Kurkdjie, violin; A. Blackman, violin; F. Wittman, viola; V. Berlin, viola; C. Van Wynbergent, viola.

H. Van Veen, viola; W. Kay, viola; W. Blumenau, viola; H. Grover, viola; R. Nagel, violoncello; J. Warnke, violoncello; C. Stockbridge, violoncello; A. Jaeger, bass; A. Sand, clarinet; M. Fuhrmann, contra-bassoon; M. Hess, horn; G. Heim, trumpet; F. Sordillo, trombone; P. Mattersteig, tuba; T. Cella, harp; S. Neumann, tympanus; C. Gardner, tympanus.

Players Strike, 35 Quit Symphony

FRADKIN IS BARRED FROM HALL

Advertise May 7

Union Musicians Decide to Stand by Concert Master

CABOT IN SPEECH SAYS 'WE WILL GO ON'

Fifty-Three Men Who Stick Play An Altered Bill

Thirty-five union members, or about one-third of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, struck last night and the concert program was changed to allow the remaining fifty-three members of the organization to give the bill. About a dozen were unable to get to the hall because of the storm.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the board of trustees late last night declared: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra will go on in any event."

The strike followed an afternoon meeting of the union members held at No. 61 Court street, at which it was determined that the men would not play unless Concert Master Frederic Fradkin, dismissed from the orchestra by the trustees, was reinstated.

Fradkin, as a union man, has been in a controversy with Conductor Pierre Monteux and was dismissed because at Friday's rehearsal of the orchestra he refused to join the players' recognition of public applause

Fradkin, who has threatened to test the legality of his dismissal in the courts, appeared at the stage entrance of Symphony Hall at 8 o'clock last night and was refused admittance. He was told that, as he was no longer a member of the orchestra, he could be admitted only by ticket. Upon hearing of this about thirty-five of the orchestra donned their street clothes and left the hall.

WILL FIGHT IT OUT.

The men held a meeting immediately afterwards and declared themselves determined to fight it out to the end. They said that they will call out 75 per cent. of the orchestra. They said that some union men were unwilling to disappoint the public and played last night. President Joseph Weber of the American Federation of Musicians, in a telegram from New York, pledged the support of the national organization "to the limit."

As soon as the striking players had left Symphony Hall Judge Cabot addressed the audience. He said:

This orchestra was founded for a great ideal. It was founded to increase American ideas of beauty, honor and nobility. The members have signed written contracts providing that each member is to do his full duty during each concert and observe the rules and instructions of the conductor.

Tonight certain gentlemen declined to come on the stage because the trustees found it necessary to dismiss a member who refused to obey orders yesterday afternoon. Those on the stage have loyally and courageously come forward to live up to their obligations and duties.

SPEAKS OF AGREEMENTS.

A great principle is involved. We have just waged a great war because written agreements were not lived up to, and we thought that nobility and loyalty walked in our ways. I am sure that when those

Continued on Page 7, Column 3.

PRINCIPALS IN SYMPHONY WAR

PHOTO BY GARO.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Frederic Fradkin, concert master who was discharged.

35 MEMBERS OF SYMPHONY STRIKE

Continued From First Page.

other men reflect upon the meaning of their act, they will come forward, too. For the present a change of program is necessary.

When Judge Cabot finished there was vigorous and long continued applause from the audience and many exclamations of sympathy from women. The altered programme was then given.

The position of the union musicians was set forth in the following statement, given out last night by Carl E. Gardner, as spokesman for the committee of nine, appointed to decide upon the measures to be taken as a consequence of Mr. Fradkin's dismissal:

UNION STATEMENTS.

At the meeting held by us this evening, all those that could be reached came in response to the summons. The storm prevented some members from being present. It was unanimously voted that unless Mr. Fradkin was reinstated they would not go on the stage to play. They viewed the treatment of Mr. Fradkin as entirely uncalled for and as an affront to them, and that since the trustees were the aggressors in this controversy, and did not hesitate to affront the members of the association, they felt that they were not responsible for any necessary action. They were perfectly willing to go on and play, so as not to disappoint the audience, in the event of Mr. Fradkin's reinstatement.

If the public feels any disappointment, they must know as reasonable men that the action of the trustees was likely to disrupt the orchestra, and that the concert would probably not go on under the circumstances.

SEEK TO AVOID IT.

The members of the association have not sought this thing; they would have liked to avoid it; and they are anxious to keep the orchestra together until a settlement of the difference could be effected between themselves and the trustees. But if the trustees persist in their attitude, there can be no other action possible on the part of the association.

Prior to the meeting of the members, the committee considered the matter and came to the same conclusions.

Attorney Berenson, counsel for the association, issued a statement last night in connection with the difficulty. It follows:

"The men called me in to advise them as to what their rights were under their several contracts and I gave them as best I could my legal opinion as to what their rights were under the contract."

After the concert it was commented on that Judge Cabot in his address did not severely criticise the striking musicians but left the way open for them to return.

"I know nothing of Fradkin's alleged assertion that his dismissal was a violation of contract," said Judge Cabot, in discussing the legal phase of the "strike" after the concert. He declined to render a decision in the matter of a possible reinstatement of the musicians who "walked out," in the event of their willingness to abide by the judgment of the trustees. "I have not passed on the question, and in fact cannot. There would have to be a meeting of the trustees." He denied that, in his speech from the stage, in which he said that he was "sure that these men will come forward after consideration of their act," he intended to lead to the inference that the men would be taken back if they surrendered their contentions. "You can take any inference you want," he said, "but I have nothing to say in the matter. The orchestra will go on, in accordance with the traditions and ideals it has always possessed.

"These men," he said of the "strikers," "were invited to go on the stage. They refused to go on, unless Fradkin was also permitted to do so. I informed them that Fradkin was no longer a member of the orchestra and consequently could not go on. They then declined to play."

"The first knowledge I had of the intention of these men came at 7:15, or less than an hour before the performance. They then telephoned me and stated their demands, which, I explained, could not be granted. They came to the hall, but would not go on the stage."

The trustees, it was stated last night, are determined not to reinstate Fradkin.

It was also said that the trustees would endeavor to obtain players in New York if the trouble was not settled by Tuesday.

Symphony Players Who Went on Strike

The following thirty-five members refused to take part in last night's performance:

O. Roth, violin; A. Bak, violin; A. Ribarsch, violin; W. Traupe, violin; H. Cauvlet, violin.

H. Goldstein, violin; J. Di Natale, violin; R. Ringwall, violin; R. Henkle, violin; S. Diamond, violin; C. Deane, violin.

A. Langley, violin; N. Kurkdjie, violin; A. Blackman, violin; F. Wittman, viola; V. Berlin, viola; C. Van Wynbergent, viola.

H. Van Veen, viola; W. Kay, viola; W. Blumenau, viola; H. Grover, viola; R. Nagel, violoncello; J. Warnke, violoncello; C. Stockbridge, violoncello; A. Jaeger, bass; A. Sand, clarinet; M. Fuhrmann, contra-bassoon; M. Hess, horn; G. Heim, trumpet; F. Sordillo, trombone; P. Mattersteig, tuba; T. Cella, harp; S. Neumann, tympanus; C. Gardner, tympanus.

ORCHESTRA AND UNION

To the Editor of the Boston Herald:

For 20 years prior to 1911 the writer, as the most active trustee of the Chicago (Theodore Thomas) orchestra, was confronted with the problem of art vs. trades-unionism that now presents itself in acute form to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Carl E. Gardner—one of the recently unionized musicians of the latter—in a letter printed in last Sunday's Herald—so frankly voices the perfectly selfish motive underlying what is euphemistically called "collective bargaining," as to deserve more than passing notice. May I review the situation in the light of past experience, in your valued columns?

The Boston Orchestra, as every one knows, is a great art institution, supported at heavy cost for many years by Maj. Higginson and his successors, not for profit but for the sake of better music than is consistent with profit. They have privately and unostentatiously made up from year to year the heavy deficits created by paying salaries high enough and for a season long enough to secure the best musicians in the world, using most of their time in rehearsals that bring perfection but no money. The very limited Boston public, say 10,000 persons, that appreciate such music—a number exceeded nowhere in the world, save perhaps in New York—has slowly been educated upwards, at the expense of the generous gentlemen referred to, to a scale of box-office prices still moderate in comparison with those of so-called high-grade "amusements" conducted for profit—that is, whose personnel give most of their time to pay performance, and little to preparation. Neither Boston nor any other city anywhere, to my knowledge, has yet developed an audience of connoisseurs that value symphonic concerts, large enough, rich enough and devoted enough to pay, rather than lose them, such box-office prices as to make them self-supporting.

Without knowing details, I conjecture that, after the strain of war conditions and antagonism to Dr. Muck, and consequent reorganization, the trustees hesitate to raise box-office prices to well-to-do patrons; and are still more reluctant to raise them to those poorer but not less ardent music lovers, who wait patiently in line on Huntington avenue for the low-priced gallery seats. I cannot doubt that the trustees have well understood that rising cost of living would force the musicians to ask higher salaries; and have looked forward with a sigh, but with unshaken determination to "carry on," to an increasing defict—to be borne by themselves and their associates, or in part distributed over box-office prices, to such extent as the public would bear. Substantially the same situation exists in all other cities that support Symphony Orchestras.

Turning now to the musicians, those of the great American orchestras, especially of Boston and Chicago, are the aristocrats of their profession; drawing the highest pay, for the most congenial work, under the most dignified and agreeable conditions. The Boston Orchestra, alone among the great orchestras, has been for many years strictly "non-union." That fact practically shuts its members out of playing other engagements; since union musicians (who fill most theatres and other orchestras) may not play with non-union men. The other symphony orchestras, all of whose men are unionized, give six or seven months' engagements; after which the men pick up summer and other jobs where they can, to make out a year's income—the bulk of which must come from the concert season. Most of them earn something also teaching, in off hours. The Boston Orchestra, to make up for summer jobs not open to non-union men, pays its men the whole year round; playing Pop and other engagements for that purpose. This steady work during the year, and the pleasure and prestige of membership in so famous an organization, makes it highly attractive to ambitious young artists at home and abroad.

It is and long will be necessary to seek abroad as well as at home for players of the attainments required by the Boston and one ore two other of the great American Orchestras. Even the world supply of such men is limited; and the United States are particularly handicapped by one of organized-labors ingenious procurements—the United States contract-labor law—which forbids an immigrant who contracts to come over the practice of his vocation until six months after his arrival in this country. This constitutes the little joker in Mr. Carl Gardner's letter in Sunday's Herald, where he camouflages "a 100 per cent. American movement"—which is that American art, like American industry, must put up with such talent, good, bad or indifferent, as American organized-labor chooses to permit amongst us. Though able and willing to pay for the best, America must go without, for the benefit of the second, or third, or tenth best; just as it has of late gone without sugar, bought away from us by countries far less able to pay for it, because Congress for somebody's benefit blocked the course of trade.

Very naturally, organized labor, just as it was bound to unionize the Steel Corporation, has long been determined to unionize the Boston Orchestra, which had quietly gone its own free way to perhaps the greatest perfection in its chosen field attained anywhere. Recent rise in costs of living, recent changes in direction and control, recent difficulty in adjusting income to outgo, have at last given the union organizers an opening. I imagine that the musicians have yielded to the standard argument of the organizers, which is always the same: "Here is a great business in full swing, with money taken in advance for concerts yet to be given. All you boys have to do is to join the union, stand together, and be ready to quit, all at once, and you have these trustees where you want them. You can rely on experienced leaders, backed by all the musicians in the United States to keep everybody away from this job. It is sure; and no one has any right to take it away from you. You can fix your own salaries, and if you don't like the conductor, or anybody or anything else you can fix that to suit yourselves also. The guarantors and most of the season subscribers are rich people, who have been exploiting you right along. It is all right to hold them up for a thousand a year for each man. You owe nobody any gratitude or loyalty except yourselves. This talk of art is all bunk; what you want is money. Be men; and have something to say about your own job."

Well—"Labor" can lead the Boston horse to water, as the proverb says; but can it make her drink? Mr. Carl Gardner thinks it can, and some Boston policemen thought so—once; but the writer sincerely hopes and believes that that able animal will refuse a beverage containing even so little as one-half per cent. of the wood-alcohol of coercion and monopoly. Speaking of beverages, a sort of Boston (Symphony) Tea Party seems to him in order.

The trustees—like Major Higginson before them—are doing a great and purely altruistic thing, in maintaining an orchestra and musical standards of extraordinary perfection. They could not do so without offering the highest salaries and best conditions to the best men, in competition with other employers. That they did; and that both pay and conditions have been satisfactory to first rank men, their presence and work in the orchestra abundantly prove. It may further be taken for granted that, as men of heart and judgment, and constancy of purpose, the trustees will continue to offer such pay and conditions as will hereafter secure competent musicians, in competition with all other engagements. There need be no fear that they cannot get them! Though fine musicians are few, and first rank conductors still fewer, great orchestras, and such engagements as Boston offers—which are absolutely unique—are fewest of all. The trustees need be governed only by the law of supply and demand.

That law is also the best friend of the musicians. Already, says Mr. Carl Gardner, the scouts for other orchestras are bidding for the Boston players. The famous orchestras were always gateways for young musicians to preferment in the minor ones—mere stepping stones in their careers; and so it should be. It is distinctly against their true interest that the unions should warn all union men away from the Boston job. Every good musician should be free to go after every good job, in his own good time. As a matter of fact, good musicians have nothing to gain, while good art and orchestras have everything to lose, by establishing the "closed shop." Nothing is so deadly to art and ideality as the frank and brutal selfishness of trades unionism. Nothing so quickly kills that individual vitality, that elastic and instantly responsive ensemble, that are of the essence of perfection in orchestral work, as the union gospel that a man's job depends on his readiness to strike—not work; upon obedience to the whistle of the walking delegate—not the baton of the conductor.

I speak by the card; for during all my time with the Chicago Orchestra, it was constantly pulling against the drag of the local union; also Mr. Fradkin bears public witness today to the discord that has entered the Boston Orchestra, with the union, after years of harmony without it. Theodore Thomas originally unionized his orchestra—which we took over bodily—for the sole reason that it was a point of honor with him always to play music exactly as it was scored: never substituting one instrument in default of another. Travelling as he so often did in the South and West, far from where good musicians then grew, it was vital to him to be able in case of sickness or accident to pick up the best local musician to be found—union or not—who could take an empty chair on short notice. Thomas himself joined the union, and made his men do so; but he had a distinct understanding with its leaders that he would quit, and take his men with him en-masse, and never again employ a union man, the moment that the union should meddle with wages, discipline or personnel of his organization, or should attempt to prevent his sending abroad for a competent man, if unable to find one here at home. On one occasion he actually enjoined the union in the New York courts from ordering his men to break their contracts; after which they wisely let him alone.

Thomas had been a working musician. No man better loved and understood musicians than he did, or did more for his men; and when he died they knelt and prayed by his coffin with tears streaming down their faces. But he often said to me of them: "Musicians are not reasoning men; they are rather emotional children. Personal consideration, absolute justice, no favoritism, firm discipline, are vital for maintaining their morale; indulgence spoils them." How often has experience proved his words!

It does not appear from the newspapers whether the Symphony men propose to strike at once, or to finish the season according to their contracts. If the latter, they are entirely within their right in quitting individually or collectively, if in their judgment it will further their several interests. Collective action, however, either immediate or at the end of the season, will be nothing more or less than the stereotyped "hold-up game" played by every trades-union, intended to force the trustees to add a flat $1000 to every man's annual salary, or else begin all over again to build a great orchestra. If undertaken, it will be a particularly stupid and condemnable attempt at such a hold-up: first, because undeserved, and second, because unnecessary. Not only have the men always enjoyed large pay and high consideration at the expense of a few devoted workers for that art which every good musician really loves; but they have always been protected, and still are, in their fortunate positions by that same law of supply and demand which alone created them. Trades unions found no orchestras! If the musicians were "reasoning men" instead of "emotional children," they would recognize that fact, respond to the generosity of the Bostonians who have through long years and at great cost made life pleasant for them, and stand by the famous institution which Mr. Carl Gardner says their selfish union is sure so gaily to destroy.

Well—destructive coercion must be squarely met, in art as in industry, by constructive resistance. The writer, as a subscriber to the Symphony concerts, would respectfully urge the trustees to offer the musicians only such salary and conditions, free from all compulsion, as they see their way to provide. Should the men strike, he would likewise urge all season subscribers to back up the trustees, by accepting immediate termination of the present season, waiving reimbursement for concerts not given, and after that by supporting the orchestra during two or three years of reconstruction of its personnel, should it take that long. As Gov. Coolidge might say: "Have faith in Boston—and the law of supply and demand."

Other cities would be likely to follow Boston in thus freeing, as in originally establishing, their Symphony Orchestras. They must recognize also that art and trades unionism have nothing in common, as the unions are now constituted. CHARLES NORMAN FAY

Cambridge, March 3.

CHICAGO

JUDGE FREDERICK P. CABOT
Chairman of Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra

Herald Mar 8

STRIKERS WILL PLACE PICKETS AT SYMPHONY

Hope to Induce the Other Players to Desert at Rehearsal Today

BOSTON C. L. U. INDORSES WALKOUT

Symphony Hall will be picketed at this morning's rehearsal by a group of the players who struck Saturday night when the management refused to reinstate the discharged concert master, Fredric Fradkin. The men hope to induce members of the union who failed to come out with them originally on the Fradkin issue to remain away from today's rehearsal and enroll at the headquarters of the Boston local of the American Federation of Musicians on St. Botolph street.

At a meeting Saturday night of the striking 35 players, re-enforced after the concert by nine other players, who have since thrown their lot with the strikers, it was voted "to withhold judgment" on the other 34 union members who, although members of the A.

(Continued on Page Five, Column 5.)

ONDAY, MARCH 8, 19

STRIKERS TO PICKET SYMPHONY HALL

(Continued from Page One)

F. of M., thus far have failed to signify where they stand in the present strike.

Plan to Extend Strike

It is understood that unless these men become enrolled members of the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, a local of the federation, by tonight, the international may be called upon to request them to relinquish their membership, on the ground that a strike of the players is now in progress and that the entire membership of 74 union players at a previous meeting had voted to support one another in the event that one of their number was discharged directly or indirectly for being identified with the unionization of the orchestra.

The committee of the players was in conference with Atty. Arthur Berenson, counsel for the members, at his home up to a late hour last night, but no statement came from the meeting. It is understood that plans for extending the scope of the strike were discussed.

A meeting is scheduled for this afternoon.

C. L. U. Indorses Strike

The following resolution on the strike was adopted by the Boston Central Labor Union yesterday:

"Whereas, 74 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have recently attempted to organize a union in accordance with the well-recognized practice of labor and the principles of the American Federation of Labor; and

"Whereas, the conductor of the orchestra, M. Pierre Monteux, himself a member of the French Federation of Musicians, insulted Concert-Master Frederic Fradkin on account of his joining the union; wherefore Mr. Fradkin was induced to commit a technical breach of discipline in disobeying the conductor, with the result that his action served as a pretext for his hasty and summary dismissal by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Society, Inc.; and

"Whereas, 35 or more members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of the well-recognized principles of labor organization, have shown their approval of Mr. Fradkin's conduct and declined to return to work until he is reinstated; and consequently refused to play at the concert Saturday evening; and

"Whereas, thereupon Judge Frederic P. Cabot publicly and mistakenly accused the striking musicians of violating the principles of truth, honor and nobleness, which this country upheld in the great war; therefore

Text of Resolution

"Be it resolved: 1. That the trustees of the Boston Symphony Society, by their hasty and arbitrary action, have not only threatened the dissolution of a world famous orchestra, but have violated the principle of free organization which lies at the basis of Americanism and all true democracy, and have offered an insult to organized labor in Boston and throughout the country;

"2. That the Boston Central Labor Union extends its hearty support to the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their attempt to unionize, and welcomes them wholeheartedly into the brotherhood of labor; and

"3. That Frederic Fradkin should be immediately reinstated and the union of Symphony players recognized; and

"Be it further resolved: That copies of this resolution be sent to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Society, Inc., and to the Musicians' Union, with a message to the said union to the effect that the Boston Central Labor Union is glad to offer them all moral courage in their struggle for the right-eous cause."

NOT TO RETAIN FRADKIN

Symphony Trustees Firm in Refusal to Accept Apology

Fredric Fradkin, former concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra, will not be taken back. The incident is closed. The regular concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week will be given as usual, and probably with the program as announced. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees, stands sponsor for this statement.

The trustees held a conference yesterday afternoon which continued for some hours, and will be resumed today, when it will assume the status of a regular business meeting dealing with definite plans for the future of the orchestra, especially ways and means.

Need of Endowment

If sufficient additions can be obtained to the endowment fund, it is believed that a way out of all the troubles will be found. It is recognized that the high cost of living has borne hard on the players, and if only new or larger sources of revenue can be found, there is no disposition to be other than liberal in the matter of compensation. The salary list constitutes, of course, by far the biggest item of expense in carrying on the concerts.

As for Mr. Fradkin, the trustees do not regard his apology as anything but belated and inadequate endeavor to retrace a step which once taken was final. In reaching this conclusion, the trustees feel assured that they are upheld by public sentiment, as evidenced by the extraordinary demonstrations at the Friday concert, and repeated Saturday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees are: Judge Frederick P. Cabot (chairman), Ernest B. Dane, M. A. De Wolfe Howe, John E. Lodge, Frederick E. Lowell, Arthur Lyman, Henry B. Sawyer, Galen L. Stone and Bentley W. Warren. Both Mr. Sawyer and Mr. Stone are traveling in the Orient, the former being at present in Japan, and the latter at Canton, China.

as Punch at the opportunity to aid The ill set a new amusement mark here.

MAJ. HIGGINSON DIES SUDDENLY

Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, Boston philanthropist, and one of the most prominent figures on State st., died last night, it became known today. Maj. Higginson was a national figure in the banking world. Maj. Higginson was 85 years old.

Admit B. U. Student to Supreme Court Bar

MORE OF SYMPHONY PLAYERS CALLED OUT

Herald Mar 8

Directed Not to Attend Today's Rehearsal

C. L. U. Indorses Action of Those Absent at Concert

The committee of the union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is handling the affairs of these men, held a meeting at the home of Arthur Berenson, attorney for the union, at Brookline last night to discuss the situation which has arisen as a result of the refusal of 35 men to participated in the concert last Saturday night.

The matter was gone over in detail and arrangements made for having the remaining 39 union members told to stay away from the rehearsal this morning. The address of Judge Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, in which he stated that the men who refused to participate in the concert would be received back in the orchestra created considerable discussion.

The committee members said they could not understand why Fredric Fradkin was discharged from the orchestra for a "simple breach of order" while men who disregarded their contracts by refusing to play were not discharged.

Indorse Musicians' Action

The meeting of the Boston Central Labor Union yesterday afternoon, by a unanimous vote, adopted the following resolutions:

"Whereas, 74 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have recently attempted to organize a union in accordance with the well-recognized practice of labor and the principles of the American Federation of Labor;

"Whereas, the conductor of the orchestra, M Pierre Monteux, himself a member of the French Federation of Musicians, insulted Concert Master Frederic Fradkin on account of his joining the union; wherefore Mr Fradkin was induced to commit a technical breach of discipline in disobeying the conductor, with the result that his action served as a pretext for his hasty and summary dismissal by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Society, Inc;

"Whereas, 35 or more members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of the well-recognized principles of labor organizations, have shown their approval of Mr Fradkin's conduct and declined to return to work until he is reinstated, and consequently refused to play at the concert on Saturday evening; and

Promise Support

"Whereas, thereupon Judge Frederic P. Cabot publicly and mistakenly accused the striking musicians of violating the principles of truth, honor and nobleness which this country upheld in the great war; therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the trustees of the Boston Symphony Society by their hasty and arbitrary action have not only threatened the dissolution of a world-famous orchestra, but have violated the principles of free organization which lie at the basis of Americanism and all true democracy, and have offered an insult to organized labor in Boston and throughout the country;

"That the Boston Central Labor Union extends its hearty support to the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their attempt to unionize and welcomes them whole-heartedly into the brotherhood of labor;

"That Frederic Fradkin should be immediately reinstated and the union of Symphony players recognized;

"That copies of this resolution be sent to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Society, Inc, and to the Musicians' Union, with a message to the said union to the effect that the Boston Central Labor Union is glad to offer them all moral courage in their struggle for the righteous cause."

PAUL SHIRLEY NOT ONE OF SYMPHONY STRIKERS

Paul Shirley, one of the violas of the Boston Symphony Orchestra whose name was included in the list given out of players that refused to participate in the Saturday night Symphoney concert, denied last night that he was among the strikers, and stated that he took part in the concert and intends to play at the concerts during the remainder of the season.

He further stated that he does not belong to the union and is at a loss to understand how his name was included in the list of artists who did not appear.

MAJOR HIGGINSON

The death of Major Higginson takes from his earthly tasks the first citizen of Boston. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have received the felicitations of his fellow-citizens upon his eighty-fifth birthday. Neither his advancing years, however, nor the warning of a long illness have served to prepare the community that he loved so dearly, worked for so indefatigably, and served so wisely and so devotedly in many fields of human endeavor, for the loss of his leadership and the energizing influence of his example.

What he was, that he tried to appear. What he believed, that he dared to expound to all comers and defend against all comers. In war he was a brave soldier, in peace a brave citizen, in his chosen calling a rugged force for right, in his avocations a fostering influence and a generous patron, and in his benevolence far-sighted and selfless.

The simplicity of a life splendidly spent is the memory that shines behind the shadow cast by the departure of his undaunted spirit to join the company of those "whose works do follow them."

Now that the Finns, too, are going t

SYMPHONY HALL STRIKERS PICKET TO-DAY; SUMMONS CABOT SUIT

BOSTON EVENING RECORD, MONDAY, MARCH 8, 1920

SYMPHONY "STRIKE" ENDS; PLAYERS REPORT FOR REHEARSAL

MAY CALL OUT MORE PLAYERS

Union Musicians Seek to Win Recruits in Fight to Reinstate Fradkin

The unusual spectacle of strike pickets invading the classic precincts of Symphony Hall to keep players from the regular Symphony rehearsal today shocked Back Bay music lovers into the realization that a labor struggle raged at their very doors.

The pickets hoped to induce members of the union to refuse to play today and enroll with the union as a protest against the trustee's removal of Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster.

The trustees are unanimous in their refusal to accept any apology from Mr. Fradkin. Mr. Fradkin and his supporters are as unanimous in refusing to proffer any apology.

At a meeting of the trustees held today, ways and means for meeting the present emergency created by the "Fradkin incident" and for granting the demands of the players, were discussed in detail. It was announced that the concerts Friday and Saturday will be held as usual and that nothing would be permitted to interfere with the regular schedule of the organization.

The trustees assert that if a larger means of revenue is obtained they will immediately make such adjustments in the salary list as will meet the approval of the players, and at the same time express the hope that their action in relation to Mr. Fradkin will be upheld by public sentiment as it was at the concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday night.

At a meeting of the Boston Central Labor Union it was unanimously voted that the organization extend its support to the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their attempt to unionize. Resolutions were adopted condemning the action of the trustees for discharging Fradkin, and extending a welcome to the musicians into the brotherhood of labor.

NEW CRISIS IN AFFAIRS OF SYMPHONY

Cabot Demands Explanation from Strikers; Latter Balk

PLAYERS HAD ENDED STRIKE

The 44 musicians of the Boston Symphony orchestra who called off their strike today and returned to their seats at the rehearsal in Symphony Hall were summoned this afternoon to appear before Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees, and explain their refusal to play at Saturday night's concert.

Judge Cabot warned that failure to answer the call would be taken as breach of contract. The men said they would refuse. It was understood that only acceptable excuses could make the absences Saturday night other than breaches of contract.

Fradkin, the storm centre in the controversy that threatened to disrupt the organization, was not permitted to rejoin his comrades. Although Fradkin has apologized for his "snub" of Monteux, the trustees maintain his discharge is final.

The return of the strikers had the approval of Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees. He issued orders today that the players be taken back if they showed up at rehearsal.

The strikers had planned to picket Symphony Hall during the rehearsal. Fradkin's plea to the players to return, made in person at the entrance to the hall, was heeded by all. There are 75 union players; 35 quit Saturday night; 9 joined the strikers yesterday.

Symphony Players Called on Cabot

Declaring that their refusal to appear for Saturday night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was clearly a breach of contract, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, today sent a letter to each of the 35 players who walked out, in which he excused them from attendance at today's rehearsal pending a conference called for late this afternoon.

The letter sent by Judge Cabot to the 35 players reads:—

"According to report, you are one of those who refused to play at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last Saturday. Such refusal clearly constituted a breach of contract. There was a good deal of excitement at the time and doubtless some men were influenced by views or feelings which others did not have.

May Defy Cabot

"I shall be at Symphony Hall between 2 and 5 p.m. Monday, March 8, and request you to see me there at that time if there is anything you wish to say prior to action by the trustees."

It was stated on good authority at the union headquarters on St. Botolph st. this afternoon that the men would refuse to meet Judge Cabot.

Prior to the receipt of Judge Cabot's letter the 35 striking players had decided to attend today's rehearsal, as a result of a letter sent them by

(Continued on Page Three, Column One)

MEN RESPOND TO APPEAL BY THEIR LEADER

"Principles Greater Than Fradkin," Declares Concert-Master

(Continued from Page One)

Frederick Fradkin, deposed concert-master.

They were allowed to rehearse.

In his own letter Fradkin told the men that the "principles for which they fouhtg were bigger than Fradkin."

The men who refused to play Saturday night did so in their desire to stand by their concert-master, who was removed by the trustees.

Just as the picket lines were about to be established Fradkin's message reached the men at Symphony Hall. They decided to comply with the request and commenced rehearsing shortly after 10 o'clock.

An important meeting of the union, at which the orchestra trouble will be taken up in detail, was scheduled for 2 o'clock this afternoon.

Fradkin's Message

Fradkin's message is addressed to Rudolph Ringwall, chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members' Assn. It reads:—

"Dear Mr. Ringwall:—

"Your association now numbering 75 joined the American Federation of Musicians because of the deplorable conditions existing among a large number of the members of the orchestra. You will recall that I had nothing to do with the movement at its inception, that I was urged to join it when it was well under way. It was urged upon me that many of the members were undergoing great hardships because of the small salaries they were receiving, that the salaries paid in other Symphony Orchestras were largely in excess of those which were being paid in the Boston Symphony and that in order to give strength to the movement which you had inaugurated, it would be desirable to have me join with you.

"You will recall that I told you and the other members who called on me that I had no selfish interest to serve, that I was not seeking and would not accept an increase in salary as the result of my joining your organization, that if the members felt that my joining with them would be helpful. I would gladly do so and aid them with all my might and main.

Could Not Do Less

"No man in the orchestra, because he happens to be more fortunate than his associates, could do less. Any man who can stand aside from such a movement when he told, among other things, that there is a man in the orchestra with a wife and three children receiving a wage which nets him less than $40 per week, that the artists of the greatest Symphony Orchestra in the country were earning less than players in moving picture houses and dance halls, that their earning capacity was for the most part practically limited to what they received from the management, that because of the onerous conditions in the contracts with the management and because of the fact that they were not members of the union they could not increase their earnings, that they could not work summers and could not employ their time playing in other orchestras when they were not playing in the Symphony, that due to those conditions, a large number of the members could not make both ends meet—they weren't able to lay by a penny to take care of the stormy days, and that if they left the orchestra many of them would be penniless, that the trustees had taken no step to remedy these conditions although they were well aware of them—would, I regret to say, be a poor human specimen. These reasons alone prompted me to join your movement. After I joined it, I threw myself body and soul into the work, believing, as I did, that any half-hearted action is as futile as none.

"The events which led to my dismissal from the orchestra, I am convinced, are attributable to my activities in behalf of the men.

Bigger Than Fradkin

"I do not wish that my dismissal shall be the cause of having disrupted an orchestra which has been in existence for 38 years. When I joined you I was prompted by the desire to continue the orchestra and not to destroy it. The principle for which you are fighting is bigger than Fradkin and I feel it my duty to you not to stand in the way of what you are fighting for. Accordingly I wish to urge upon you to return to your places in the orchestra at the rehearsal which takes place today and to urge upon you further that you take no action which has any relation to my dismissal.

"But I also urge upon you all, especially those of you who are in a position to get along on your wages not to abandon the cause for which 75 of you are now pledged to stand. If you fail in the purpose you have set out to accomplish, it would be to me a bitter disappointment. I understand that Mr. Cabot stated to you that my dismissal had nothing to do with your movement to organize, to join the Federation of Musicians and to better your conditions. His sincerity can only be tested by his at once agreeing to the proposal you made to him in the communication of Feb. 27, 1920.

"If you succeed I shall feel that what little I have done for you has not been in vain and that my dismissal, however unjust I feel it was, has accomplished what I so earnestly desire.

"It was a great honor to have been the concert-master of so noble a band of musicians. I deeply regret that I cannot be with you longer. God bless you, every one of you. If I can be of service to you individually or collectively any time, anywhere, don't hesitate to come to me—I hope you will not find me wanting."

Striking Union Men of Symphony Orchestra Go on Duty as Pickets

Attempt to Induce Men Who Failed to Walk Out Saturday to Join Them

Determined to win their fight, union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now on strike, today stationed pickets about Symphony Hall for the purpose of inducing the men who failed to come out with them on Saturday night, to join their ranks.

The pickets include some of the country's most noted artists. This new line of duty for the musicians was accomplished quietly and without disorder. A number of people gathered at the stage entrance on t. Stephen st., to catch a glimpse at their "favorites" doing duty.

Many of the spectators were young music students, with homes nearly, and regular attendants at the Symphony concerts.

At a meeting yesterday of the striking 35 players, reinforced after the concert by nine other players, who have since thrown their lot with the strikers, it was voted "to withhold judgment" on the other 34 union members who, although members of the A. F. of M., thus far have failed to signify where they stand in the present strike.

It is understood that unless these men become enrolled members of the Boston Musicians' Protectice Assn., a local of the federation, by tonight, the international may be called upon to request them to relinquish their membership, on the ground that a strike of the players is now in progress and that the entire membership of 74 union players at a previous meeting had voted to support one another in the event that one of their number was discharged directly, or indirectly for being identified with the unionization of the orchestra.

The committee of the players was in conference with Atty. Arthur Berenson, counsel for the members, at his home up to a late hour last night, but no statement came from the meeting. t is understood that plans for extending the scope of the strike were discussed.

A meeting is scheduled for this afternoon.

UNION SYMPHONY MEN AT REHEARSAL TODAY

Obeyed Request of ex-Concert Master — Will Draw Up Ultimatum to Trustees

All the union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were at the rehearsal in Symphony Hall this morning. They attended, many against their own wishes, at the urgent request of Frederic Fradkin, whose dismissal as concert master by the trustees precipitated the refusal of 36 members to play at Saturday night's concert.

After a meeting of the union members of the orchestra last night, the men's committee met this morning to carry out the decisions made.

Mr Fradkin, who is a member of the committee, requested that the men attend the rehearsal, and later issued a letter of appeal to that effect, a copy of which was given each member.

"The Boston Symphony Orchastra is bigger than Fradkin," said Mr Fradkin in his letter, adding that the men are fighting for a principle and for better conditions through unionism, and it would be best, in his opinion, if all attended the rehearsal.

It was decided, however, that the 74 union men would hold a special meeting at 2 this afternoon at the offices of Boston Musicians' Protective Association, St Botolph st.

At it the men's formal demands will be drawn up. They will include, the committee says, recognition of union rights, more pay, the reinstatement [illegible] to get back and

Mr Fradkin and an ultimatum that, unless the requests are granted, all will quit and not appear at Friday's public rehearsal.

Mr Fradkin's Advice Effective

The letter of Mr Fradkin was read to members of the orchestra in the "tuning room," where they assembled previous to being called to the stage, and while a number protested against returning without gaining their demands, it was finally voted to accept the advice and play.

The letter was read by Rudolph Ringwall, as follows:

Boston Symphony Orchestra Members' Association, Attention of Mr Rudolph Ringwall, President, Boston:

"Dear Mr Ringwall—Your associaton, now numbering 75, joined the American Federation of Musicians because of the deplorable conditions existing among a large number of the members of the orchestra. You will recall that I had nothing to do with the movement at its inception, that I was urged to join it when it was well under way. It was urged upon me that many of the members were undergoing great hardships because of the small salaries they were receiving, that the salaries paid in other symphony orchestras were largely in excess of those which were being paid in the Boston Symphony and that in order to give strength to the movement which [illegible] and large sale and not much damaged.

BACK TO REHEARSAL

GAIN THE SYMPHONY PLAYERS VEER

Whole Orchestra at Work This orning—More Letters Sent and More nferences Impending—Events of Sat- rday as They Were Construed on Sun- ay—Signs for the Future on Both ides

HE events of today have belied the events of Saturday at Symphony Hall. On Saturday evening when the orchestra had assembled in the g-room for the appointed concert, half players declined to proceed with it. wood-wind choir—flute, oboe, clarinets bassoons—remained at their posts. horns, with one exception, were like ied. Among the brass, drums and the some went to the stage and some left hall. The string-choir—first and second ins, violas, violoncellos and basses—ered most. An ill-balanced band re- ned, thinly provided with strings, too furnished for working proportions in other divisions. For it Mr. Monteux rovised a programme that ran through delssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave"; an's little sympnony, "The Queen of hice," Borodin's tone-picture of an steppe for one of the pieces origi- proposed; Mozart's overture to his , "The Magic Flute," and Saint- 's concerto for violoncello, with Mr. ti in the solo-part. Before this con- began, Judge Cabot spoke for the es to the audience, declaring their ion to maintain the orchestra and to ld its independence and standards. response from a company that filled what more than half the hall showed approval and warm sympathy.

is morning, as usual, the orchestra called for rehearsal of the music to ayed on Friday and Saturday of next to. It assembled in full numbers, less two necessary absences from illness e cause. In the tuning-room the men counsel among themselves, especially a letter from Mr. Fradkin in which ged them to take no further action s behalf. Then the whole or- a went upon the stage and the rsal proceeded as usual. At the end, layers dispersed and this afternoon m who have joined the union to consider future action.

ay, however, the players who take part in the concert of ening received the following Judge Cabot writing for the

g to report, you are one of refused to play at the Bos- nphony Orchestra concert last y. Such refusal clearly con- a breach of contract. There ood deal of excitement at the nd doubtless some men were d by views or feelings which d not have. I shall be at Hall between two and five ternoon, Monday, March 8, st you to see me there at f there is anything you wish r to action by the Trustees. hile, if the report is correct as ou, you are excused from attend- at the rehearsal, Monday, h 8.

theless, the players in receipt of ter came to the tuning room and rt in the rehearsal. They, how- nd the whole orchestra, were told y did so of their own motion and pending the conferences with bot this afternoon.

anized members of the orchestra r over Mr. Fradkin's letter this As it was made known to them e other players this morning he 's dismissal as a finality and who threaten to leave the or- s he is reinstated, to recon- vention. It is a long letter, ded for publication. For it asserts his devotion and their cause. For ment possible to them as members of a non-union orchestra. Once more he sets down his interpretation of the applause for Mr. Monteux at the concert of last Friday and renews apology for his own conduct. He is "deeply grateful" to the players who out of regard for him declined to take part in the concert of Saturday and otherwise testified to what he is pleased to call their "splendid loyalty." Next, two sentences contain the gist of the letter:

> Your unselfishness and loyalty commend me to a similar course. . . . Accordingly I wish to urge upon you to return to your places in the orchestra at the rehearsal which takes place today and to urge upon you further that you take no action which has any relation to my dismissal.

In a few more paragraphs, Mr. Fradkin exhorts the players to persist in their present efforts for higher wages and takes "fraternal," expansive, and seemingly final leave of them.

Meanwhile there is nearly endless speculation about the course that the Trustees and the players who quit work on Saturday will follow. By every evidence that an audience could give, no less on Saturday evening than on Friday afternoon, the public of Symphony Hall is at one with the Trustees in desire to sustain the concerts and maintain the orchestra in the independence and at the standards now threatened. It is not probable that the Trustees will restore Mr. Fradkin to his place; for no longer time than is considerate and conciliatory are they likely to leave the door ajar for the return of the deserting men; if necessary they will proceed forthwith to reconstitute and restore the orchestra by every means at their command, at whatever expenditure may be necessary. They have reason to believe that the events of the past fortnight will bring them financial support that they might not easily have gained when the Symphony Concerts were running in tranquil and prosperous course. There is even a possibility that taking advantage of the present temper of the public, they will speedily ask for an endowment sufficient to secure the future of the orchestra and enable it to pursue liberal policies alike toward the players and the public. Judge Cabot's speech to the audience at the concert of Saturday evening spoke in general terms the mind of the Trustees. The response of the audience there and elsewhere has indicated yet more clearly the temper of the public. Far from letting the orchestra fail, it is likely to support it more vigorously than ever before.

What course the rebellious players will follow is more difficult to say. The number of defections on Saturday, when the moment for decision came, manifestly disappointed them. By this time, it seems clear that the French players in the orchestra will remain at work; that many of the Germans who have been with it for years are like-minded; that most of the rebellious among the older and the younger players, have already been counted. Even to keep the ranks of the restless intact may not prove easy. The revolt lacks able and astute leadership; while it is now plain that it has stirred little sympathy among the public most interested. In the conditions of the hour comically solemn pronunciamentos from the Central Labor Union go for little beside the rally of the audiences of the Symphony Concerts to the support of the trustees. If the concerts go forward, as there is every reason to expect, it will be hard to keep the excitement of changeable, child-like and unreasoning men at the necessary boiling-point.

Still more are present fervors likely to subside if and when the quest for new jobs begins. Much has been said about the desire of other orchestras to absorb the malcontents; actual contracts are another thing; while as a matter of fact, most of the rebellious are less minded to leave the Boston Orchestra than to try to get their way with it. The last thing for which they are prepared is a long contest in which they might be gradually replaced and through which the concerts would continue. They are slow to see that there is no occasion now to debate the expediency of a union; that, instead, the security of the orchestra is at stake. When, moreover, they are not speaking for their precious "publicity."

UNION SYMPHONY MEN AT REHEARSAL TODAY

Continued From the First Page.

you had inaugurated it would be desirable to have me join with you.

"You will recall that I told you and the other members who called on me that I had no selfish interest to serve, that I was not seeking and would not accept an increase in salary as the result of my joining your organization; that if the members felt that my joining with them would be helpful, I would gladly do so and aid them with all my might and main.

"No man in the orchestra because he happened to be more fortunate than his associates could do less. Any man who can stand aside from such a movement when he is told, among other things, that there is a man in the orchestra with a wife and three children receiving a wage which nets him less than $40 per week; that the artists of the greatest symphony orchestra in the country were earning less than players in moving-picture houses and dance halls; that their earning capacity was for the most part practically limited to what they received from the management; that because of the onerous conditions in the contracts with the management and because of the fact that they were not members of the union they could not increase their earnings; that they could not work Summers and could not employ their time playing in other orchestras when they were not playing in the Symphony; that due to these conditions a large number of the members could not make both ends meet—they weren't able to lay by a penny to take care of the stormy days—and that if they left the orchestra many of them would be penniless; that the trustees had taken no step to remedy these conditions; although they were well aware of them, would, I regret to say, be a poor human specimen. These reasons alone prompted me to join your movement. After I joined it, I threw myself body and soul into the work, believing as I did that any half-hearted action is as futile as none.

Events Leading to Dismissal

"The events which led to my dismissal from the orchestra, I am convinced are attributable to my activities in behalf of the men. I need hardly repeat what I have heretofore stated, that it had seemed to me that the audience which gave the ovation to Mr Monteux showed their disapproval of your action for having joined the union, and as it seemed to me their ingratitude for the sacrifices the members of the orchestra were making and their approval of Mr Monteux' conduct for having ordered me from the management's room in Sanders Theatre where I had been accustomed to dress before the concert. I may have mistaken the meaning of the audience on account of my supersensitive condition; but I repeat that I intended no offense to anyone and I have already made as you know full apology through the press.

"I should be ungrateful indeed if I were not sensible of the splendid loyalty shown me by my associates in the orchestra. I appreciate more than I can tell you the sacrifice the men are willing to make in my behalf. To the members who stayed away from the concert on Saturday, and to those who, disapproving the action of the trustees, felt that they did not wish to disappoint the audience, and who, out of regard for them, played at the concert, I am deeply grateful.

"A resolution was passed by the association condemning the action of the trustees for my dismissal, and notifying them that until I was restored to my position that they would decline to perform in the orchestra. This is further testimony of your splendid loyalty, and I appreciate it more than I can tell you.

Tells Orchestra to Stand Firm

"Your unselfishness and loyalty [illegible] which has been in existence for 38 years. When I joined you I was prompted by the desire to continue the orchestra and not to destroy it. The principle for which you are fighting is bigger than Fradkin and I feel it my duty to you not to stand in the way of what you are fighting for. Accordingly I wish to urge upon you to return to your places in the orchestra at the rehearsal which takes place today and to urge upon you further that you take no action which has any relation to my dismissal.

"But I also urge upon you all, especially those of you who are in a position to get along on your yages, not to abandon the cause for which 75 of you are now pledged to stand. If you fail in the purpose you have set out to accomplish, it would be to me a bitter disappointment. I understand that Mr Cabot stated to you that my dismissal had nothing to do with your movement to organize, to join the Federation of Musicians and to better your conditions. His sincerity can only be tested by his at once agreeing to the proposal you made to him in the communication of Feb 27, 1920.

"If you succeed, I shall feel that what little I have done for you has not been in vain and that my dismissal, however unjust I feel it was, has accomplished what I so earnestly desire.

"It was a great honor to have been the concert-master of so noble a band of musicians. I deeply regret that I cannot be with you longer. God bless you, every one of you. If I can be of service to you individually or collectively any time, anywhere, don't hesitate to come to me. I hope you will not find me wanting."

Gives Chance for Men to Explain

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc, sent the following letter today to those men who did not go on the stage for the Boston Symphony concert in Symphony Hall Saturday evening.

"According to report, you are one of those who refused to play at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last Saturday. Such refusal clearly constituted a breach of contract. There was a good deal of excitement at the time and doubtless some men were influenced by views or feelings which others did not have. I shall be at Symphony Hall between 2 and 5 p m Monday, March 8, and request you to see me there at that time if there is anything you wish to say prior to action by the trustees. Meanwhile, if the report is correct as to you, you are excused from attendance at the rehearsal Monday, March 8."

Men who received this letter, however, came to the regular rehearsal this morning at 10 and asked if the letter they had received prevented them from going on the stage. They and the other members of the orchestra were told that the men who remained away from the concert Saturday evening had been excused from this morning's rehearsal and had not been urged to attend it but were voluntarily going on the stage pending the hearing arranged for them in Judge Cabot's letter as quoted.

Striking Union Men of Symphony Orchestra Go on Duty as Pickets

Attempt to Induce Men Who Failed to Walk Out Saturday to Join Them

Determined to win their fight, union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now on strike, today stationed pickets about Symphony Hall for the purpose of inducing the men who failed to come out with them on Saturday night, to join their ranks.

The pickets include some of the country's most noted artists. This new line of duty for the musicians was accomplished quietly and without disorder. A number of people gathered at the stage entrance on t. Stephen st., to catch a glimpse at their "favorites" doing duty.

Many of the spectators were young music students, with homes nearly, and regular attendants at the Symphony concerts.

At a meeting yesterday of the striking 35 players, reinforced after the concert by nine other players, who have since thrown their lot with the strikers, it was voted "to withhold judgment" on the other 34 union members who, although members of the A. F. of M., thus far have failed to signify where they stand in the present strike.

It is understood that unless these men become enrolled members of the Boston Musicians', Protectice Assn., a local of the federation, by tonight, the international may be called upon to request them to relinquish their membership, on the ground that a strike of the players is now in progress and that the entire membership of 74 union players at a previous meeting had voted to support one another in the event that one of their number was discharged directly, or indirectly for being identified with the unionization of the orchestra.

The committee of the players was in conference with Atty. Arthur Berenson, counsel for the members, at his home up to a late hour last night, but no statement came from the meeting. t is understood that plans for extending the scope of the strike were discussed.

A meeting is scheduled for this afternoon.

UNION SYMPHONY MEN AT REHEARSAL TODAY

Obeyed Request of ex-Concert Master — Will Draw Up Ultimatum to Trustees

All the union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were at the rehearsal in Symphony Hall this morning. They attended, many against their own wishes, at the urgent request of Frederic Fradkin, whose dismissal as concert master by the trustees precipitated the refusal of 36 members to play at Saturday night's concert.

After a meeting of the union members of the orchestra last night, the men's committee met this morning to carry out the decisions made.

Mr Fradkin, who is a member of the committee, requested that the men attend the rehearsal, and later issued a letter of appeal to that effect, a copy of which was given each member.

"The Boston Symphony Orchastra is bigger than Fradkin," said Mr Fradkin in his letter, adding that the men are fighting for a principle and for better conditions through unionism, and it would be best, in his opinion, if all attended the rehearsal.

It was decided, however, that the 74 union men would hold a special meeting at 2 this afternoon at the offices of Boston Musicians' Protective Association, St Botolph st.

At it the men's formal demands will be drawn up. They will include, the committee says, recognition of union rights, more pay, the reinstatement of Mr Fradkin and an ultimatum that, unless the requests are granted, all will quit and not appear at Friday's public rehearsal.

Mr Fradkin's Advice Effective

The letter of Mr Fradkin was read to members of the orchestra in the "tuning room," where they assembled previous to being called to the stage, and while a number protested against returning without gaining their demands, it was finally voted to accept the advice and play.

The letter was read by Rudolph Ringwall, as follows:

Boston Symphony Orchestra Members' Association, Attention of Mr Rudolph Ringwall, President, Boston:

"Dear Mr Ringwall—Your associaton, now numbering 75, joined the American Federation of Musicians because of the deplorable conditions existing among a large number of the members of the orchestra. You will recall that I had nothing to do with the movement at its inception, that I was urged to join it when it was well under way. It was urged upon me that many of the members were undergoing great hardships because of the small salaries they were receiving, that the salaries paid in other symphony orchestras were largely in excess of those which were being paid in the Boston Symphony and that in order to give strength to the movement which

...and large sale and not much damaged.

BACK TO REHEARSAL

AGAIN THE SYMPHONY PLAYERS VEER

Whole Orchestra at Work This ...orning—More Letters Sent and More ...ferences Impending—Events of Sat...day as They Were Construed on Sun...ay—Signs for the Future on Both ...ides

THE events of today have belied the events of Saturday at Symphony Hall. On Saturday evening when the orchestra had assembled in the ...ng-room for the appointed concert, half ...players declined to proceed with it. ...wood-wind choir—flute, oboe, clarinets ...bassoons—remained at their posts. ...horns, with one exception, were like ...ied. Among the brass, drums and the ...some went to the stage and some left ...hall. The string-choir—first and second ...ins, violas, violoncellos and basses—...ered most. An ill-balanced band re...ned, thinly provided with strings, too ...furnished for working proportions in ...other divisions. For it Mr. Monteux ...rovised a programme that ran through ...delssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave"; ...dn's little symphony, "The Queen of ...ance," Borodin's tone-picture of an ...steppe for one of the pieces origi...proposed; Mozart's overture to his ..., "The Magic Flute," and Saint...'s concerto for violoncello, with Mr. ...tti in the solo-part. Before this con... began, Judge Cabot spoke for the ...tees to the audience, declaring their ...tion to maintain the orchestra and to ...old its independence and standards. ...response from a company that filled ...what more than half the hall showed ...approval and warm sympathy.

...is morning, as usual, the orchestra ...called for rehearsal of the music to ...ayed on Friday and Saturday of next ... It assembled in full numbers, less ...two necessary absences from illness ...cause. In the tuning-room the men ...counsel among themselves, especially ...a letter from Mr. Fradkin in which ...ged them to take no further action ...behalf. Then the whole or...a went upon the stage and the ...rsal proceeded as usual. At the end, ...layers dispersed and this afternoon ...of them who have joined the union ... to consider future action.

...ay, however, the players who ... take part in the concert of ...ening received the following ... Judge Cabot, writing for the

...g to report, you are one of ... refused to play at the Bos...mphony Orchestra concert last ...y. Such refusal clearly con... a breach of contract. There ...ood deal of excitement at the ...nd doubtless some men were ...d by views or feelings which ...d not have. I shall be at ... Hall between two and five ...ternoon, Monday, March 8, ...st you to see me there at ...f there is anything you wish ...r to action by the Trustees. ...ile, if the report is correct as ..., you are excused from attend... at the rehearsal, Monday, ...h 8.

...theless, the players in receipt of ...ter came to the tuning room and ...art in the rehearsal. They, how...nd the whole orchestra, were told ...y did so of their own motion and ... pending the conferences with ...abot this afternoon.

...orized members of the orchestra ...er over Mr. Fradkin's letter this ... As it was made known to them ...e other players this morning he ...'s dismissal as a finality and ... who threaten to leave the or... he is reinstated, to recon... attention. It is a long letter, ...ure...nded for publication. For ...me, it asserts his devotion ... and their cause. For ...ate their complaints

...ment possible to them as members of a non-union orchestra. Once more he sets down his interpretation of the applause for Mr. Monteux at the concert of last Friday and renews apology for his own conduct. He is "deeply grateful" to the players who out of regard for him declined to take part in the concert of Saturday and otherwise testified to what he is pleased to call their "splendid loyalty." Next, two sentences contain the gist of the letter:

> Your unselfishness and loyalty commend me to a similar course. . . . Accordingly I wish to urge upon you to return to your places in the orchestra at the rehearsal which takes place today and to urge upon you further that you take no action which has any relation to my dismissal.

In a few more paragraphs, Mr. Fradkin exhorts the players to persist in their present efforts for higher wages and takes "fraternal," expansive, and seemingly final leave of them.

Meanwhile there is nearly endless speculation about the course that the Trustees and the players who quit work on Saturday will follow. By every evidence that an audience could give, no less on Saturday evening than on Friday afternoon, the public of Symphony Hall is at one with the Trustees in desire to sustain the concerts and maintain the orchestra in the independence and at the standards now threatened. It is not probable that the Trustees will restore Mr. Fradkin to his place; for no longer time than is considerate and conciliatory are they likely to leave the door ajar for the return of the deserting men; if necessary they will proceed forthwith to reconstitute and restore the orchestra by every means at their command, at whatever expenditure may be necessary. They have reason to believe that the events of the past fortnight will bring them financial support that they might not easily have gained when the Symphony Concerts were running in tranquil and prosperous course. There is even a possibility that taking advantage of the present temper of the public, they will speedily ask for an endowment sufficient to secure the future of the orchestra and enable it to pursue liberal policies alike toward the players and the public. Judge Cabot's speech to the audience at the concert of Saturday evening spoke in general terms the mind of the Trustees. The response of the audience there and elsewhere has indicated yet more clearly the temper of the public. Far from letting the orchestra fail, it is likely to support it more vigorously than ever before.

What course the rebellious players will follow is more difficult to say. The number of defections on Saturday, when the moment for decision came, manifestly disappointed them. By this time, it seems clear that the French players in the orchestra will remain at work; that many of the Germans who have been with it for years are like-minded; that most of the rebellious among the older and the younger players, have already been counted. Even to keep the ranks of the restless intact may not prove easy. The revolt lacks able and astute leadership; while it is now plain that it has stirred little sympathy among the public most interested. In the conditions of the hour comically solemn pronunciamentos from the Central Labor Union go for little beside the rally of the audiences of the Symphony Concerts to the support of the trustees. If the concerts go forward, as there is every reason to expect, it will be hard to keep the excitement of changeable, child-like and unreasoning men at the necessary boiling-point.

Still more are present fervors likely to subside if and when the quest for new jobs begins. Much has been said about the desire of other orches ras to absorb the malcontents; actual contracts are another thing; while as a matter of fact, most of the rebellious are less minded to leave the Boston Orchestra than to try to get their way with it. The last thing for which they are prepared is a long contest in which they might be gradually replaced and through which the concerts would continue. They are slow to see that there is no occasion now to debate the expediency of a union; that, instead, the security of the orchestra is at stake. When, moreover, they are not speaking for their precious "publicity."

UNION SYMPHONY MEN AT REHEARSAL TODAY

Continued From the First Page.

you had inaugurated it would be desirable to have me join with you.

"You will recall that I told you and the other members who called on me that I had no selfish interest to serve, that I was not seeking and would not accept an increase in salary as the result of my joining your organization; that if the members felt that my joining with them would be helpful, I would gladly do so and aid them with all my might and main.

"No man in the orchestra because he happened to be more fortunate than his associates could do less. Any man who can stand aside from such a movement when he is told, among other things, that there is a man in the orchestra with a wife and three children receiving a wage which nets him less than $40 per week; that the artists of the greatest symphony orchestra in the country were earning less than players in moving-picture houses and dance halls; that their earning capacity was for the most part practically limited to what they received from the management; that because of the onerous conditions in the contracts with the management and because of the fact that they were not members of the union they could not increase their earnings; that they could not work Summers and could not employ their time playing in other orchestras when they were not playing in the Symphony; that due to these conditions a large number of the members could not make both ends meet—they weren't able to lay by a penny to take care of the stormy days—and that if they left the orchestra many of them would be penniless; that the trustees had taken no step to remedy these conditions; although they were well aware of them, would, I regret to say, be a poor human specimen. These reasons alone prompted me to join your movement. After I joined it, I threw myself body and soul into the work, believing as I did that any half-hearted action is as futile as none.

Events Leading to Dismissal

"The events which led to my dismissal from the orchestra, I am convinced are attributable to my activities in behalf of the men. I need hardly repeat what I have heretofore stated, that it had seemed to me that the audience which gave the ovation to Mr Monteux showed their disapproval of your action for having joined the union, and as it seemed to me their ingratitude for the sacrifices the members of the orchestra were making and their approval of Mr Monteux' conduct for having ordered me from the management's room in Sanders Theatre where I had been accustomed to dress before the concert. I may have mistaken the meaning of the audience on account of my supersensitive condition, but I repeat that I intended no offense to anyone and I have already made as you know full apology through the press.

"I should be ungrateful indeed if I were not sensible of the splendid loyalty shown me by my associates in the orchestra. I appreciate more than I can tell you the sacrifice the men are willing to make in my behalf. To the members who stayed away from the concert on Saturday, and to those who, disapproving the action of the trustees, felt that they did not wish to disappoint the audience, and who, out of regard for them, played at the concert, I am deeply grateful.

"A resolution was passed by the association condemning the action of the trustees for my dismissal, and notifying them that until I was restored to my position that they would decline to perform in the orchestra. This is further testimony of your splendid loyalty, and I appreciate it more than I can tell you.

Tells Orchestra to Stand Firm

"Your unselfishness and [illegible] which has been in existence for 38 years. When I joined you I was prompted by the desire to continue the orchestra and not to destroy it. The principle for which you are fighting is bigger than Fradkin and I feel it my duty to you not to stand in the way of what you are fighting for. Accordingly I wish to urge upon you to return to your places in the orchestra at the rehearsal which takes place today and to urge upon you further that you take no action which has any relation to my dismissal.

"But I also urge upon you all, especially those of you who are in a position to get along on your yages, not to abandon the cause for which 75 of you are now pledged to stand. If you fail in the purpose you have set out to accomplish, it would be to me a bitter disappointment. I understand that Mr Cabot stated to you that my dismissal had nothing to do with your movement to organize, to join the Federation of Musicians and to better your conditions. His sincerity can only be tested by his at once agreeing to the proposal you made to him in the communication of Feb 27, 1920.

"If you succeed, I shall feel that what little I have done for you has not been in vain and that my dismissal, however unjust I feel it was, has accomplished what I so earnestly desire.

"It was a great honor to have been the concert-master of so noble a band of musicians. I deeply regret that I cannot be with you longer. God bless you, every one of you. If I can be of service to you individually or collectively any time, anywhere, don't hesitate to come to me. I hope you will not find me wanting."

Gives Chance for Men to Explain

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc, sent the following letter today to those men who did not go on the stage for the Boston Symphony concert in Symphony Hall Saturday evening.

"According to report, you are one of those who refused to play at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last Saturday. Such refusal clearly constituted a breach of contract. There was a good deal of excitement at the time and doubtless some men were influenced by views or feelings which others did not have. I shall be at Symphony Hall between 2 and 5 p m Monday, March 8, and request you to see me there at that time if there is anything you wish to say prior to action by the trustees. Meanwhile, if the report is correct as to you, you are excused from attendance at the rehearsal, Monday, March 8."

Men who received this letter, however, came to the regular rehearsal this morning at 10 and asked if the letter they had received prevented them from going on the stage. They and the other members of the orchestra were told that the men who remained away from the concert Saturday evening had been excused from this morning's rehearsal and had not been urged to attend it but were voluntarily going on the stage pending the hearing arranged for them in Judge Cabot's letter as quoted.

SYMPHONY STRIKE ENDS

Musicians Report for Rehearsal After Fradkin Requests Them to Resume Playing

The strike of the thirty or more musicians in the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended today, when the men resumed their places at the rehearsal.

It was stated by some of those who went into the hall that Concertmaster Frederick Fradkin, whose dismissal caused the strike, was responsible for their return to the hall.

They said Fradkin appealed to them to forget him as an issue and to continue their work for art and music.

It is understood that the union leaders plan to make their fight for recognition and for Fradkin from within rather than by direct action. They have been advised that the ends may be better attained by working continuously than by precipitating a crisis.

Many followers of music were assembled at Symphony Hall at rehearsal time today. It had been stated that striking members of the orchestra would do picket duty in an effort to bring out more members of the great band.

As the hour for rehearsal approached these people, together with newspaper men assembled, were more or less surprised at seeing a great

Continued on Page 2, Column 5.

PLAYERS RETURN TO SYMPHONY

Urged to Go Back by Fradkin; Will Continue Fight for Higher Wages

Continued From First Page.

many of the players who struck Saturday night entering the hall.

When one of them was pressed for an explanation he stated that the men still belonged to the union and were still loyal to Fradkin. They had, however, decided to return to their duties pending an adjustment of the difficulties.

LETTER FROM FRADKIN.

Concertmaster Fradkin, in a letter to the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members' Association, through their president, Rudolph Ringwall, made the plea that the men remain at their duties. Fradkin made clear his reasons for joining the union and also his reasons for asking the men to remain on duty. The letter follows:

"Dear Mr. Ringwall:

"Your association, now numbering seventy-five, joined the American Federation of Musicians because of the deplorable conditions existing among a large number of the members of the orchestra. You will recall that I had nothing to do with the movement at its inception; that I was urged to join it when it was well under way. It was urged upon me that many of the members were undergoing great hardships because of the small salaries they were receiving; that the salaries paid in other Symphony Orchestras were largely in excess of those which were being paid in the Boston Symphony, and that in order to give strength to the movement which you had inaugurated that it would be desirable to join with you.

"You will recall that I told you and the other members who called on me that I had no selfish interest to serve, that I was not seeking and would not accept an increase as the result of my joining your organization; that if the members felt that my joining with them would be helpful, that I would gladly do so and aid them with all my might and main.

"SUPERSENSITIVE."

"I need hardly repeat what I have heretofore stated, that it seemed to me that the audience that gave the ovation to Mr. Monteux showed their disapproval of your action for having joined the union, and as it seemed to me their ingratitude for the sacrifices the members of the orchestra were making and their approval of Mr. Monteux' conduct for having ordered me from the management's room in Sanders Theatre, where I had been accustomed to dress before the concert. I may have mistaken the meaning of the audience on account of my supersensitive condition, but I repeat that I intended no offence to anyone and I have already made, as you know, full apology through the press.

"I should be ungrateful, indeed, if I were not sensible of the splendid loyalty shown me by my associates in the orchestra. I appreciate more than I can tell you the sacrifice the men were willing to make in my behalf. To the members who stayed away from the concert on Saturday, and to those who, disapproving the action of the trustees, felt that they did not wish to disappoint the audience and who out of regard for them played at the concert, I am deeply grateful.

"A resolution was passed by the association condemning the action of the trustees for my dismissal and notifying them that until I was restored to my position that they would decline to perform in the orchestra. This is further testimony of your splendid loyalty, and I appreciate it more than I can tell you.

APPEALS TO HIS FRIENDS.

"I understand that Mr. Cabot stated to you that my dismissal had nothing to do with your movement to organize, to join the Federation of Musicians and to better your conditions. His sincerity can only be tested by his at once agreeing to the proposal you made to him in the communication of February 27, 1920.

"If you succeed I shall feel that what little I have done for you has not been in vain and that my dismissal, however unjust I feel it was, has accomplished what I so earnestly desire.

"It was a great honor to have been the concertmaster of so noble a band of musicians. I deeply regret that I cannot be with you longer. God bless, you, every one of you. If I can be of service to you individually or collectively any time, any where, do not hesitate to come to me—I hope you will not find me wanting."

Judge Cabot sent the following letter to those men who did not go on the stage for the concert Saturday evening:

"According to report, you are one of those who refused to play at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last Saturday. Such refusal clearly constituted a breach of contract. There was a good deal of excitement at the time and doubtless some men were influenced by views or feelings which others did not have.

"I shall be at Symphony Hall between two and five p. m. Monday, March 8, and request you to see me there at that time if there is anything you wish to say prior to action by the trustees. Meanwhile, if the report is correct as to you, you are excused from attendance at rehearsal Monday, March 8."

EDITORIAL PAGE OF THE Amer. Mar 9

Measures That Would Cu

(1) To nominate for the Presidency by direct

(2) To elect the Cabinet officers and make the

(3) To deprive the President of the power of p

The Symphony Orchestra Must Be Preserved Unimpaired

Everybody in Boston, including the trustees, the musicians and the public, desires that the Boston Symphony Orchestra be preserved.

By the Boston Symphony we mean this orchestra that we have now, the one hundred superb musicians, the conductor and the management.

If the trustees permit twenty or thirty or fifty or seventy of the present players to depart, and replace them with others, the result will not be the Boston Symphony that we love and admire. It will be another orchestra and if it continues under the present name it will be travelling under false pretenses.

It will not take the music-loving public very long to discover that there is little left of the world's greatest orchestra besides the name, and they will not patronize it.

On the other hand, the players, if they should secede in a body and endeavor to perpetuate their organization, would discover that without the guiding direction of the regular management they could not possibly secure patronage.

Men who can play musical instruments so skillfully as to perform symphonic music well are exceedingly scarce. Such talent is the result of many years' arduous labor. If a violinist in the Boston Symphony finds that he is earning less than that which will support his family properly he cannot be blamed if he ceases to admire the dignity of his position.

Times have changed, and the Symphony trustees have got to change with them or admit to the shade of Major Higginson that they are incapable of carrying on the great orchestra they so cheerfully took off his hands.

Boston can afford to pay her musicians as well as Detroit, Philadelphia or New York. The trustees can go confidently before the public next season and obtain the money with which to give the players a proper living wage.

Let the orchestra and the trustees remember that the public supports this Symphony Orchestra and wants its personnel preserved, unimpaired.

BOSTON AMERICAN —A Paper for People Who Think— TUESDAY, MARCH 9, 1920

SYMPHONY PEACE MOVE; UNION INSISTS ON DEMANDS

DEADLOCK IN SYMPHONY TALKS; TAKE UP CABOT DEFI

Union Committeemen Discuss Letter Insisting on 'Open Shop' Idea

"Negotiations in the Boston Symphony Orchestra controversy have apparently reached a deadlock," declared Arthur Berenson, representing the organized players, today. He added that the men are as determined as ever to secure union recognition and that the dispute must soon come to an issue.

The usual rehearsal was held today, with those necessary on hand. The program, as outlnied by W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, calls for daily rehearsals and the usual Saturday night concert. Sunday night the orchestra, barring untoward events, is to leave for Washington for a nine-day tour. The itinerary calls for Washington on Monday, Baltimore on Tuesday, Philadelphia Wednesday, New York Thursday, Brooklyn Friday, New York Saturday afternoon and Newark Monday night.

A meeting of the union's committee was held today at headquarters on St. Botolph street, at which the letter sent last night by Judge Frederic P. Cabot, president of the trustees, to each of the members of the orchestra, was considered.

Judge Cabot declared in his letter that the trustees would not recede from the "open shop" principle. He told where the bylaws of the union conflict with the existing rules governing the orchestra, in that the union would take from the trustees the power to decide upon the desirability of a musician. He ended the statement with the following significant paragraphs:

"The trustees have duties and obligations to the present subscribers and sustainers and to the ever-widening group of subscribers and sustainers who are ready and eager to maintain the orchestra according to its great traditions.

"The trustees are going to live up to their obligations and duties and to carry on the concerts, and they cannot consent to the men assuming obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts."

CONDEMNED MAN ADMITS

SYMPHONY TO KEEP THE OPEN SHOP PRINCIPLE

Trustees in Letter to Players Oppose Union Control

MEN REHEARSE FOR NEXT CONCERT

Management Reserves the Right to Choose Players Abroad

In a letter, signed by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, as president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and sent last night to every member of the orchestra, the trustees refuse permission to join the American Federation of Musicians, in essence because "the union requires the closed shop."

The rehearsal for the week-end concerts was held as usual yesterday morning, all attempts at "picketing" on the part of those players who went on strike Saturday being given up on receipt of a request from Fredric Fradkin, the former concert master, urging them to go back and to take no action which has any relation to his dismissal.

Concerts Not Interrupted

Judge Cabot stated last night that the trustees have not yet considered the breach of contract on the part of the strikers and, therefore, he had no authority to say whether it is likely that it will be overlooked or not. The regular meeting of the trustees comes tomorrow. He was confident, however, that the week-end concerts will be given and probably without change in program. When asked whether it would be possible to perform the announced program if the strikers were disciplined by being shut out, he replied in the affirmative.

Although the striking union players of

(Continued on Page Four, Column 3)

SYMPHONY WILL KEEP OPEN SHOP

(Continued from Page One)

the orchestra returned and played with the other members at yesterday's rehearsal, which action was generally viewed as ending the walkout, later developments and the enrolment of between 45 and 50 of the players into the Boston local of the American Federation of Musicians gives rise to the belief that "only a truce has been reached in the controversy."

Following the rehearsal 61 of the 74 union members of the orchestra attended a special meeting at the headquarters of the Boston Musicians' Protective Association on St. Botolph street.

From this meeting, in consequence of expressions by certain of the members, a committee of three consisting of Otto Roth, Arthur Brooke and Franz Hain called upon Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees.

Consults with Strikers

Judge Cabot was at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon between the hours of 2 and 5 to meet any of the strikers who wished to see him, having sent to each of them the following letter:

According to report, you are one of those who refused to play at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last Saturday. Such refusal clearly constituted a breach of contract. There was a good deal of excitement at the time, and doubtless some men were influenced by views or feelings which others did not have. I shall be at Symphony Hall between 2 and 5 in the afternoon, Monday, March 8, and request you to see me there at that time if there is anything you wish to say prior to action by the trustees. Meanwhile, if the report is correct as to you, you are excused from attendance at the rehearsal Monday, March 8.

While Judge Cabot was unwilling to discuss last night the results of his conference with the union representatives, not having had the opportunity of placing his report before the trustees, according to Atty. Arthur Berenson, counsel for the men, Judge Cabot and the trustees "are standing pat" on the position they originally assumed towards the union. Judge Cabot was reported by the committee to have stated "no objections will be made by the trustees against the men joining the union, if the American Federation of Musicians will make a special rule for the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to permit them to go outside this country or anywhere at will to secure musicians, which right is denied to the managers of the 16 other symphony orchestras in this country, and all others, except they have exhausted local efforts to obtain this

Letter Reviews Contest

The letter of the trustees opens with the announcement: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra is going to carry on the purposes, standards and ideals for which it was founded, and for which it has been sustained. Those of the members who took part in the concert of Saturday night have helped to further those standards and ideals. They have honorably recognized that the duties under their contracts come ahead of subsequent undertakings, and the trustees thank them for their loyalty to these prior, continued and fundamental obligations."

The letter continues by reviewing the form of contract, which is substantially the same as during the years under Maj. Higginson, and which binds the musician to "support to the best of his ability all rehearsals and performances, to play to the best of his ability as a musician . . . . not to leave the orchestra during a performance or rehearsal, and willingly to comply with all instructions of the conductor in reference to music, deportment and order." The conductor is constituted the "sole and final judge of the behavior and quality of performance of the musician," and the latter may not only be summarily dismissed, but fined $200.

Maj. Higginson's opposition to unionization is explained by its inconsistency with "the fundamental aims and purposes for which he was sustaining the orchestra." The letter rehearses conferences with the trustees on the part of the officials of local 9, and later with Mr. Webber of the American Federation. "It was found that unless changed, the union obligations became supreme, and required that instead of the musical qualifications being judged by the conductor, they were to be decided by the union; that men, although belonging to the American Federation, could not be engaged outside the local union without its written consent, that no one could be brought from Europe without the written consent of the American Federation; that contracts could not be made for more than a year, and as a result no assurance could be given to those coming from a distance of continuing employment; and that the principles of the closed shop were to be carried out.

Objects to Union Control

"The officials of the local, and the president of the federation, after conference, believed that these requirements might be modified," but "subsequently information was sent that they could not be."

The letter comments upon the communication of Feb. 27 from a committee of the members, requesting a modification of the contracts so as to permit joining the federation. On March 4 the trustees "for the first time were given the present bylaws and constitution of the federation, and throughout the afternoon of Friday, March 5, were in conference with the attorney for the members. The examination showed the same fundamental requirements by the union as before." They prohibit contracts making the employer sole judge of reasons for cancellation, set up the obligations of the federation as paramount, authorize the local to forbid the employment of players outside the union and prohibit membership in the local of any musician imported without the sanction of the executive board of the federation.

In summing up, the trustees declare that the union requires the "closed shop," and concludes: "As the committee of seven stated, the advantages of membership in the union necessarily entail certain duties and obligations, and the committee are right in pointing out that they are necessarily inconsistent with other duties and obligations to carry on the Boston Symphony Orchestra, where musical qualifications are to be judged by the conductor. The trustees have duties and obligations to the present subscribers and sustainers, and to the ever-widening group of subscribers and sustainers who are ready and eager to maintain the orchestra according to its great traditions.

"The trustees are going to live up to their obligations and duties and carry on the concerts, and they cannot consent to the men assuming obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their

WON'T AGREE TO UNION RULES

Symphony Trustees to Stick to Old Contract Form

Cabot Issues Statement—All the Men Attend Rehearsal

"The trustees are going to live up to their obligations and duties and to carry on the concerts, and they cannot consent to the men assuming obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts."

This was the closing paragraph of a statement sent out yesterday by Judge Frederick P. Cabot to every member of the Symphony Orchestra, reviewing the long controversy over union affiliation.

The standard form of contract, used for many years under Maj Higgerson, the statement says, made the conductor the sole judge of "the behavior and the quality of performance" of the musicians and provided for dismissal if the conductor's standards in these matters were not met.

Union obligations, which take precedence over those of contracts, it is pointed out, are in direct conflict with the above provisions. Moreover, the union rules would prevent importation of musicians from Europe except with the sanction of the federation's executive board and require the "closed shop."

Continued on the Second Page.

WON'T AGREE TO UNION RULES

Continued From the First Page.

Maj Higginson, Judge Cabot says, was clear that the rules and obligations of the union were inconsistent with the fundamental aims and purposes for which he was sustaining the orchestra and the present trustees have found these rules and obligations substantially unchanged.

Union members of the orchestra who refused to play last Saturday night unless concert master Fradkin was reinstated, failed to appear at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, as instructed by Judge Cabot, to explain their action. Instead some of the older members sent a committee of three to discuss an amicable adjustment with the trustees.

This committee reported to a special meeting of the union members in substance, that "no objection will be made by the trustees to the men joining the Musicians' Union, if the American Federation of Musicians will make special rules for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, granting this organization privileges neither granted to or asked for by any one of the other 16 organizations of this kind in this country."

The men who conferred with Judge Cabot were Otto Roth, Arthur Brooke and Franz Hain.

The meeting was attended by 61 of the 74 union members of the orchestra. Nine of the others were excused, owing to engagements and four were sick.

All the union members attended the rehearsal in the morning as the result of an appeal by Mr Fradkin to ignore his own case and act only in the interests of "the principle for which you are fighting." Those who refused to go on the platform Saturday night were admitted to the rehearsal pending the hearing set for the afternoon.

Mr Fradkin's letter, which was in the nature of a farewell, reviewed his connection with the union and his efforts in its behalf and declared he was prompted by a desire to continue the orchestra and not destroy it.

Late yesterday afternoon a member of the committee announced that a sympathizer with the men, who wished his name withheld, had sent a sum of money to be used for the payment of dues for those who could not afford to pay the initiation fee of $50 required to become a member.

During the afternoon between 45 and 50 of the 74 men who joined the American Federation of Musicians last month, joined the Boston local.

50 MEN OF SYMPHONY PAY DUES

Half of Orchestra in Union—Trouble Not Over

TRUSTEES OPPOSE DIVIDED ALLEGIANCE

Fradkin Urges Men to Eliminate Him as Issue

While all the union players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who went on strike last Saturday, turned up at yesterday's rehearsal in Symphony Hall and participated with the others, and this fact led to a general belief that the trouble was over, later occurrences dispelled this view.

A special meeting of the union members, held at the headquarters of the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, St. Botolph and Garrison streets, yesterday afternoon, after the rehearsal, was attended by 61 of the players of the orchestra. About 50 of the players were enrolled as full-fledged members of the Boston local of the American Federation of Musicians.

Continued on Page 6—Fifth Column

50 SYMPHONY MEN PAY DUES TO UNION

Continued from First Page

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, was waited upon by a committee of three of the oldest and best known players in the orchestra, appointed at the meeting, and after an hour's conference with him at Symphony Hall they returned and reported that Judge Cabot had not changed his attitude towards the members of the orchestra joining a labor union.

Their report in brief was that "no objections will be made by the trustees to the men joining the musicians' union if the American Federation of Musicians will make special rules for the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Returned at Fradkin's Urging

It was made very plain by most of the 35 players who quit Saturday night and the nine others who later joined them that they returned and took part in yesterday's rehearsal only because of the letter written by Frederic Fradkin, the deposed concert master, to President Rudolph Ringwell of the Association of Union Players strongly urging them to do so.

It was the dismissal of Mr. Fradkin by the trustees that caused the walkout at Saturday night's concert.

Mr. Fradkin in his letter requested the men who struck to eliminate him as an issue in the controversy. He wrote: "I do not wish that my dismissal shall be the cause of having disrupted an orchestra which has been in existence for 38 years." Another sentence was: "It was a great honor to have been the concertmaster of so noble a band of musicians," which he termed the finest musical organization in the world.

Called Before Cabot

The union players' meeting held at the headquarters of the Boston Musicians' Protective Association on the afternoon had hardly begun when practically all the men who struck Saturday night placed upon the desk of the presiding officer envelopes containing special delivery letters from Judge Cabot notifying them to appear before the trustees, who would be at Symphony Hall from 2 to 5 p. m., where the men could explain their actions or make any statements they wished prior to action by the trustees.

After a discussion it was decided to notify Judge Cabot that they were attending a meeting of the union and could not see him during the hours specified. A committee was appointed to inform Judge Cabot of the decision.

Committee Sees Cabot

The general situation was then debated in lively fashion. Some of the older players of the orchestra declared that in their opinion the trouble could be adjusted amicably, and that the trustees were in the mood for this. A committee of three was appointed to interview Judge Cabot. They were Otto Roth, Arthur Brooke and Franz Hein.

Last night the situation was practically unchanged from what it was yesterday noon after the rehearsal in Symphony Hall.

Judge Cabot last night mailed a long statement to every member of the orchestra showing where the union rules conflicted with the orchestra contracts and organization. He pointed out that the rules took from the conductor all authority concerning judging as to musical qualifications of the performers. He ended the statement with the following significant paragraphs:

"Cannot Consent"

"The trustees have duties and obligations to the present subscribers and sustainers and to the ever-widening group of subscribers and sustainers who are ready and eager to maintain the orchestra according to its great traditions.

"The trustees are going to live up to their obligations and duties and to carry on the concerts, and they cannot consent to the men assuming obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts."

50 Join Union

All of the 50 players out of the 74 who joined the American Federation of Musicians last month who were yesterday enrolled as members of the Boston local paid their initiation fee of $50. They were obligated by Secretaries William G. Dodge and Herman P. Liehr. Mr. Dodge announced that the others will have until tonight to complete their enrolment.

"There is no change in the situation," said Attorney Arthur Berenson last night. "Judge Cabot says he has no objection to the men joining the union; still he isn't ready to have them amenable to the rules of the union. If the union rules conflict with their contracts, then he does object to their joining the union, and his attitude has not changed at all."

NITOR, BOSTON, U.S.

ORCHESTRA ISSUES UNION ULTIMATUM

Trustees of Boston Organization in Letter to Members Ave They Cannot Allow Anyon but the Conductor to Dictat

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have issued an ultimatum to the members of the orchestra in regard to membership in the Boston Musicians' Protective Association—the union. Briefly it is to the effect that the management cannot countenance membership in an organization whose present policy is to dictate the musical qualifications of players or to say what players shall or shall not be employed in the orchestra. The trustees insist that the rule laid down by Major Higginson, the founder and for many years the sustainer of the orchestra, namely, that the conductor alone shall be the judge of the musical qualifications of the members, must be preserved.

Strikers Return

At the rehearsal yesterday morning the 35 men who had walked out before the concert last Saturday night were in their places, notwithstanding that they had been notified in a letter from Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, that they were excused from rehearsal but that he would meet them personally yesterday afternoon if they wished to say anything prior to action by the trustees. W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, announced to the members that those who had struck were back in their places voluntarily without urging from the management. Fredric Fradkin, the concert master who was dismissed for breach of discipline in refusing to rise when the conductor summoned the men to their feet to receive the applause of the audience at the concert on last Friday afternoon, had addressed a letter to these men thanking them for their support of him and advising them to return to their places. The strikers had used his dismissal as an excuse to walk out.

Organized Labor's Support

On Sunday the Boston Central Labor Union passed resolutions welcoming the 74 members of the orchestra who had affiliated with the union "wholeheartedly into the brotherhood of Labor," demanding the reinstatement of Mr. Fradkin and the recognition of the union and offering "all moral courage in their struggle for the righteous cause."

The trustees of the orchestra are firm in their intention of carrying on the orchestra, even if all those players who have affiliated with the union should walk out. They point to the high standard which the orchestra has maintained under the existing order, and the last paragraph of the communication to the members reads:

The trustees are going to live up to their obligations and duties, and to carry on the concerts, and they cannot consent to the men assuming obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts.

There is every evidence that the public of the symphony concerts is favorable to the trustees and their

TUESDAY, MARCH 9,

stand, and that this support is due to the belief that the unionization of the orchestra would work for mediocrity.

Major Higginson's Views

Founder of Orchestra Saw No Good in Union Organization

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Major Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, May 22, 1916, at a time when the union question was under discussion, gave his views as to unions as follows:

"I do not wish to give any opinion about union and non-union orchestras beyond this: that I see no gain for the musicians in a union, and I see much interference from people who do not understand the matter. I cannot claim much understanding myself, but have lived with musicians in Europe, and know something about how an orchestra is made and trained. One cardinal point is this: that the conductor, and he alone, shall decide whether the men have practiced enough and whether they are playing as they should. If I am not wrong, the unions object beyond a certain number of rehearsals. That is a point about which they cannot know, for each man hears his own part, and does not know the rest. May I say that the success of our orchestra has arisen from this: that the musical part,— that is, the selection of the musicians, the making of the programs and the studying of the programs, has been solely in the hands of the conductor for the time. I have had to choose a conductor as well as was in my power and, having lived in Vienna three years with the musicians, was able to make a good beginning. The rules of the orchestra have been: work until the conductor was satisfied, and work under him alone, and each man minding his own business. My rule was to choose the conductor, and then support the orchestra. I never meddle with the musical side.

"By the way, in old days we used to be able to get extra men when we needed them, as is required by some of the modern scores. When the head of the musical union came to see me and presented his case, I did not think it good. He said: 'If you do not do that, you will not get any of our men to help you out,' to which I re-

SYMPHONY TO KEEP THE OPEN SHOP PRINCIPLE

Trustees in Letter to Players Oppose Union Control

MEN REHEARSE FOR NEXT CONCERT

Management Reserves the Right to Choose Players Abroad

In a letter, signed by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, as president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and sent last night to every member of the orchestra, the trustees refuse permission to join the American Federation of Musicians, in essence because "the union requires the closed shop."

The rehearsal for the week-end concerts was held as usual yesterday morning, all attempts at "picketing" on the part of those players who went on strike Saturday being given up on receipt of a request from Fredric Fradkin, the former concert master, urging them to go back and to take no action which has any relation to his dismissal.

Concerts Not Interrupted

Judge Cabot stated last night that the trustees have not yet considered the breach of contract on the part of the strikers and, therefore, he had no authority to say whether it is likely that it will be overlooked or not. The regular meeting of the trustees comes tomorrow. He was confident, however, that the week-end concerts will be given and probably without change in program. When asked whether it would be possible to perform the announced program if the strikers were disciplined by being shut out, he replied in the affirmative.

Although the striking union players of

(Continued on Page Four, Column 3)

SYMPHONY WILL KEEP OPEN SHOP

(Continued from Page One)

the orchestra returned and played with the other members at yesterday's rehearsal, which action was generally viewed as ending the walkout, later developments and the enrolment of between 45 and 50 of the players into the Boston local of the American Federation of Musicians gives rise to the belief that "only a truce has been reached in the controversy."

Following the rehearsal 61 of the 74 union members of the orchestra attended a special meeting at the headquarters of the Boston Musicians' Protective Association on St. Botolph street.

From this meeting, in consequence of expressions by certain of the members, a committee of three consisting of Otto Roth, Arthur Brooke and Franz Hain called upon Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees.

Consults with Strikers

Judge Cabot was at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon between the hours of 2 and 5 to meet any of the strikers who wished to see him, having sent to each of them the following letter:

According to report, you are one of those who refused to play at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last Saturday. Such refusal clearly constituted a breach of contract. There was a good deal of excitement at the time, and doubtless some men were influenced by views or feelings which others did not have. I shall be at Symphony Hall between 2 and 5 in the afternoon, Monday, March 8, and request you to see me there at that time if there is anything you wish to say prior to action by the trustees. Meanwhile, if the report is correct as to you, you are excused from attendance at the rehearsal Monday, March 8.

While Judge Cabot was unwilling to discuss last night the results of his conference with the union representatives, not having had the opportunity of placing his report before the trustees, according to Atty. Arthur Berenson, counsel for the men, Judge Cabot and the trustees "are standing pat" on the position they originally assumed towards the union. Judge Cabot was reported by the committee to have stated "no objections will be made by the trustees against the men joining the union, if the American Federation of Musicians will make a special rule for the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to permit them to go outside this country or anywhere at will to secure musicians, which right is denied to the managers of the 16 other symphony orchestras in this country, and all others, except they have exhausted local efforts to obtain this

Letter Reviews Contract

The letter of the trustees opens with the announcement: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra is going to carry on the purposes, standards and ideals for which it was founded, and for which it has been sustained. Those of the members who took part in the concert of Saturday night have helped to further those standards and ideals. They have honorably recognized that the duties under their contracts come ahead of subsequent undertakings, and the trustees thank them for their loyalty to these prior, continued and fundamental obligations."

The letter continues by reviewing the form of contract, which is substantially the same as during the years under Maj. Higginson, and which binds the musician to "support to the best of his ability all rehearsals and performances, to play to the best of his ability as a musician .... not to leave the orchestra during a performance or rehearsal, and willingly to comply with all instructions of the conductor in reference to music, deportment and order." The conductor is constituted the "sole and final judge of the behavior and quality of performance of the musician," and the latter may not only be summarily dismissed, but fined $200.

Maj. Higginson's opposition to unionization is explained by its inconsistency with "the fundamental aims and purposes for which he was sustaining the orchestra." The letter rehearses conferences with the trustees on the part of the officials of local 9, and later with Mr. Webber of the American Federation. "It was found that unless changed, the union obligations became supreme, and required that instead of the musical qualifications being judged by the conductor, they were to be decided by the union; that men, although belonging to the American Federation, could not be engaged outside the local union without its written consent, that no one could be brought from Europe without the written consent of the American Federation; that contracts could not be made for more than a year, and as a result no assurance could be given to those coming from a distance of continuing employment; and that the principles of the closed shop were to be carried out.

Objects to Union Control

"The officials of the local, and the president of the federation, after conference, believed that these requirements might be modified," but "subsequently information was sent that they could not be."

The letter comments upon the communication of Feb. 27 from a committee of the members, requesting a modification of the contracts so as to permit joining the federation. On March 4 the trustees "for the first time were given the present bylaws and constitution of the federation, and throughout the afternoon of Friday, March 5, were in conference with the attorney for the members. The examination showed the same fundamental requirements by the union as before." They prohibit contracts making the employer sole judge of reasons for cancellation, set up the obligations of the federation as paramount, authorize the local to forbid the employment of players outside the union and prohibit membership in the local of any musician imported without the sanction of the executive board of the federation.

In summing up, the trustees declare that the union requires the "closed shop," and concludes: "As the committee of seven stated, the advantages of membership in the union necessarily entail certain duties and obligations, and the committee are right in pointing out that they are necessarily inconsistent with other duties and obligations to carry on the Boston Symphony Orchestra, where musical qualifications are to be judged by the conductor. The trustees have duties and obligations to the present subscribers and sustainers, and to the ever-widening group of subscribers and sustainers who are ready and eager to maintain the orchestra according to its great traditions.

"The trustees are going to live up to their obligations and duties and carry on the concerts, and they cannot consent to the men assuming obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their

WON'T AGREE TO UNION RULES

Symphony Trustees to Stick to Old Contract Form

Cabot Issues Statement—All the Men Attend Rehearsal

"The trustees are going to live up to their obligations and duties and to carry on the concerts, and they cannot consent to the men assuming obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts."

This was the closing paragraph of a statement sent out yesterday by Judge Frederick P. Cabot to every member of the Symphony Orchestra, reviewing the long controversy over union affiliation.

The standard form of contract, used for many years under Maj Higgerson, the statement says, made the conductor the sole judge of "the behavior and the quality of performance" of the musicians and provided for dismissal if the conductor's standards in these matters were not met.

Union obligations, which take precedence over those of contracts, it is pointed out, are in direct conflict with the above provisions. Moreover, the union rules would prevent importation of musicians from Europe except with the sanction of the federation's executive board and require the "closed shop."

Continued on the Second Page.

WON'T AGREE TO UNION RULES

Continued From the First Page.

Maj Higginson, Judge Cabot says, was clear that the rules and obligations of the union were inconsistent with the fundamental aims and purposes for which he was sustaining the orchestra and the present trustees have found these rules and obligations substantially unchanged.

Union members of the orchestra who refused to play last Saturday night unless concert master Fradkin was reinstated, failed to appear at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, as instructed by Judge Cabot, to explain their action. Instead some of the older members sent a committee of three to discuss an amicable adjustment with the trustees.

This committee reported to a special meeting of the union members in substance, that "no objection will be made by the trustees to the men joining the Musicians' Union, if the American Federation of Musicians will make special rules for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, granting this organization privileges neither granted to or asked for by any one of the other 16 organizations of this kind in this country."

The men who conferred with Judge Cabot were Otto Roth, Arthur Brooke and Franz Hain.

The meeting was attended by 61 of the 74 union members of the orchestra. Nine of the others were excused, owing to engagements and four were sick.

All the union members attended the rehearsal in the morning as the result of an appeal by Mr Fradkin to ignore his own case and act only in the interests of "the principle for which you are fighting." Those who refused to go on the platform Saturday night were admitted to the rehearsal pending the hearing set for the afternoon.

Mr Fradkin's letter, which was in the nature of a farewell, reviewed his connection with the union and his efforts in its behalf and declared he was prompted by a desire to continue the orchestra and not destroy it.

Late yesterday afternoon a member of the committee announced that a sympathizer with the men, who wished his name withheld, had sent a sum of money to be used for the payment of dues for those who could not afford to pay the initiation fee of $50 required to become a member.

During the afternoon between 45 and 50 of the 74 men who joined the American Federation of Musicians last month, joined the Boston local.

50 MEN OF SYMPHONY PAY DUES

Half of Orchestra in Union—Trouble Not Over

TRUSTEES OPPOSE DIVIDED ALLEGIANCE

Fradkin Urges Men to Eliminate Him as Issue

While all the union players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who went on strike last Saturday, turned up at yesterday's rehearsal in Symphony Hall and participated with the others, and this fact led to a general belief that the trouble was over, later occurrences dispelled this view.

A special meeting of the union members, held at the headquarters of the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, St. Botolph and Garrison streets, yesterday afternoon, after the rehearsal, was attended by 61 of the players of the orchestra. About 50 of the players were enrolled as full-fledged members of the Boston local of the American Federation of Musicians.

Continued on Page 6—Fifth Column

50 SYMPHONY MEN PAY DUES TO UNION

Continued from First Page

TRUST

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, was waited upon by a committee of three of the oldest and best known players in the orchestra, appointed at the meeting, and after an hour's conference with him at Symphony Hall they returned and reported that Judge Cabot had not changed his attitude towards the members of the orchestra joining a labor union.

Their report in brief was that "no objections will be made by the trustees to the men joining the musicians' union if the American Federation of Musicians will make special rules for the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Returned at Fradkin's Urging

It was made very plain by most of the 35 players who quit Saturday night and the nine others who later joined them that they returned and took part in yesterday's rehearsal only because of the letter written by Frederic Fradkin, the deposed concert master, to President Rudolph Ringwell of the Association of Union Players strongly urging them to do so.

It was the dismissal of Mr. Fradkin by the trustees that caused the walkout at Saturday night's concert.

Mr. Fradkin in his letter requested the men who struck to eliminate him as an issue in the controversy. He wrote: "I do not wish that my dismissal shall be the cause of having disrupted an orchestra which has been in existence for 38 years." Another sentence was: "It was a great honor to have been the concertmaster of so noble a band of musicians," which he termed the finest musical organization in the world.

Called Before Cabot

The union players' meeting held at the headquarters of the Boston Musicians' Protective Association in the afternoon had hardly begun when practically all the men who struck Saturday night placed upon the desk of the presiding officer envelopes containing special delivery letters from Judge Cabot notifying them to appear before the trustees, who would be at Symphony Hall from 2 to 5 p. m., where the men could explain their actions or make any statements they wished prior to action by the trustees.

After a discussion it was decided to notify Judge Cabot that they were attending a meeting of the union and could not see him during the hours specified. A committee was appointed to inform Judge Cabot of the decision.

Committee Sees Cabot

The general situation was then debated in lively fashion. Some of the older players of the orchestra declared that in their opinion the trouble could be adjusted amicably, and that the trustees were in the mood for this. A committee of three was appointed to interview Judge Cabot. They were Otto Roth, Arthur Brooke and Franz Hein.

Last night the situation was practically unchanged from what it was yesterday noon after the rehearsal in Symphony Hall.

Judge Cabot last night mailed a long statement to every member of the orchestra showing where the union rules conflicted with the orchestra contracts and organization. He pointed out that the rules took from the conductor all authority concerning judging as to musical qualifications of the performers. He ended the statement with the following significant paragraphs:

"Cannot Consent"

"The trustees have duties and obligations to the present subscribers and sustainers and to the ever-widening group of subscribers and sustainers who are ready and eager to maintain the orchestra according to its great traditions.

"The trustees are going to live up to their obligations and duties and to carry on the concerts, and they cannot consent to the men assuming obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts."

50 Join Union

All of the 50 players out of the 74 who joined the American Federation of Musicians last month who were yesterday enrolled as members of the Boston local paid their initiation fee of $50. They were obligated by Secretaries William G. Dodge and Herman P. Liehr. Mr. Dodge announced that the others will have until tonight to complete their enrolment.

"There is no change in the situation," said Attorney Arthur Berenson last night. "Judge Cabot says he has no objection to the men joining the union; still he isn't ready to have them amenable to the rules of the union. If the union rules conflict with their contracts, then he does object to their joining the union, and his attitude has not changed at all."

NITOR, BOSTON, U.S.

ORCHESTRA ISSUES UNION ULTIMATUM

Trustees of Boston Organizatio in Letter to Members Ave They Cannot Allow Anyon but the Conductor to Dictat

Specially for The Christian Science Monito

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have issued an ultimatum to the members of the orchestra in regard to membership in the Boston Musicians Protective Association—the union. Briefly it is to the effect that the management cannot countenance membership in an organization whose present policy is to undertake ... tate the musical qualifications of the players or to say what players shall or shall not be employed by the orchestra. The trustees insist that the rule laid down by Major Higginson, the founder and for many years the sustainer of the orchestra, namely, that the conductor alone shall be the judge of the musical qualifications of the members, must be preserved.

Strikers Return

At the rehearsal yesterday morning the 35 men who had walked out before the concert last Saturday night were in their places, notwithstanding that they had been notified in a letter from Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, that they were excused from rehearsal but that he would meet them personally yesterday afternoon if they wished to say anything prior to action by the trustees. W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, announced to the members that those who had struck were back in their places voluntarily without urging from the management. Fredric Fradkin, the concert master who was dismissed for breach of discipline in refusing to rise when the conductor summoned the men to their feet to receive the applause of the audience at the concert on last Friday afternoon, had addressed a letter to these men thanking them for their support of him and advising them to return to their places. The strikers had used his dismissal as an excuse to walk out.

Organized Labor's Support

On Sunday the Boston Central Labor Union passed resolutions welcoming the 74 members of the orchestra who had affiliated with the union "wholeheartedly into the brotherhood of Labor," demanding the reinstatement of Mr. Fradkin and the recognition of the union and offering "all moral courage in their struggle for the righteous cause."

The trustees of the orchestra are firm in their intention of carrying on the orchestra, even if all those players who have affiliated with the union should walk out. They point to the high standard which the orchestra has maintained under the existing order, and the last paragraph of the communication to the members reads:

The trustees are going to live up to their obligations and duties, and to carry on the concerts, and they cannot consent to the men assuming obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts.

There is every evidence that the public of the symphony concerts is favorable to the trustees and their

TUESDAY, MARCH 9,

stand, and that this support is due to the belief that the unionization of the orchestra would work for mediocrity.

Major Higginson's Views

Founder of Orchestra Saw No Good in Union Organization

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Major Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, May 22, 1916, at a time when the union question was under discussion, gave his views as to unions as follows:

"I do not wish to give any opinion about union and non-union orchestras beyond this: that I see no gain for the musicians in a union, and I see much interference from people who do not understand the matter. I cannot claim much understanding myself, but have lived with musicians in Europe, and know something about how an orchestra is made and trained. One cardinal point is this: that the conductor, and he alone, shall decide whether the men have practiced enough and whether they are playing as they should. If I am not wrong, the unions object beyond a certain number of rehearsals. That is a point about which they cannot know, for each man hears his own part, and does not know the rest. May I say that the success of our orchestra has arisen from this: that the musical part,— that is, the selection of the musicians, the making of the programs, and the studying of the programs, has been solely in the hands of the conductor for the time. I have had to choose a conductor as well as was in my power and, having lived in Vienna three years with the musicians, was able to make a good beginning. The rules of the orchestra have been: work until the conductor was satisfied, and work under him alone, and each man minding his own business. My rule was to choose the conductor, and then support the orchestra. I never meddle with the musical side.

"By the way, in old days we used to be able to get extra men when we needed them, as is required by some of the modern scores. When the head of the musical union came to see me and presented his case, I did not think it good. He said: 'If you do not do that, you will not get any of our men to help you out,' to which I replied: 'Very well, I shall hire so many more men, and I shall get better men than you have, and it will be just so much more competition in your market.' It has proved of great advantage to the orchestra, and has cost me $10,000 or $12,000 a year more, without any pecuniary results; but inasmuch as I have tried to make the orchestra very good, it is all in the day's work. I know that we are ostracized, but I also know that, in my judgment, we cannot work as a union organization, and, further than that, that I should not try to do so. I recognize the good of the unions in many ways, but I do not recognize the good of them among the orchestras. Perhaps some of the musicians who play here and there need them. . . ."

ACT TOMORROW ON STRIKE OF SYMPHONY MEN

Trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra will meet tomorrow to consider the cases of the 35 members of that organization who went out on strike Saturday. In view of the statement sent out by Judge Cabot that he considered these men had committed a breach of contract, it is believed disciplinary measures may be taken against them.

In addition to previous affiliation with the American Federation of Musicians, 41 of the 76 union members have joined the Boston Musicians' Union, despite Judge Cabot's refusal to allow them to do so.

A conference was held Monday afternoon with Judge Cabot by a committee of the striking members, and the results of that conference will be laid before the trustees tomorrow. Judge Cabot is reported to have said that the trustees stand pat on their position originally assumed toward the union, and that no objection will be made against the men joining the union if the American Federation of Musicians will make a special rule for the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to permit them to go outside the country or anywhere at will to obtain musicians. This right is denied to the other 16 symphony orchestras in this country and all others until they have first exhausted local efforts to obtain this talent.

Crisis Near in Life of Famous Orchestra

Complete disruption of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, unless the 35 "striking" members immediately renounce their affiliation with organized labor, was predicted today by one of the city's most prominent musicians.

"Judge Cabot's defiance of the union men, and the known sympathy of the board of directors with his opinions, will result in an ultimatum tomorrow," said the musician. "It will be another case of the police strike—get out of the union or the orchestra."

The Symphony players, on the other hand, scout this report, pointing out that the annual Southern trip of the orchestra commences next Sunday. They declare that if the trustees take any such action, which of course would disrupt the orchestra, the trip would have to be abandoned. This

(Continued on Last Page)

FULLER BENES

LAST EDITION

PRICE TWO CENTS

BOSTON EVENING RECORD

ESTABLISHED 1884

BOSTON, TUESDAY, MARCH 9, 1920 ******

MARCH 9, 1920

Boston Musicians Must Quit Union

Symphony Men Defy Cabot

TRUSTEES ARE FIRM AGAINST 'CLOSED SHOP'

Will Demand That Players Live Up to Contracts and Obey Rules

(Continued from Page One)

annual trip, according to the men, always has been a financial success.

"Only a Truce"

The enrollment of between 40 and 50 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra players in the local of the American Federation of Musicians, with the temporary return of the men to their posts, was interpreted today by a labor official as "only a truce" in the controversy between the Symphony management and the artists.

The news that the men had reported for rehearsal created an impression that the players' troubles were over. Developments early today, coupled with those of yesterday's important meeting, showed that the players had just started a concentrated movement in an attempt to win their fight.

A special meeting of the union members held at the headquarters of the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, St. Botolph and Garrison sts., yesterday afternoon, after the rehearsal, was attended by 61 of the players of the orchestra.

Judge Cabot Firm

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, was waited upon by a committee of three of the oldest and best known players in the orchestra, appointed at the meeting, and after an hour's conference with him at Symphony Hall they returned and reported that Judge Cabot had not changed his attitude towards the members of the orchestra joining a labor union.

Their report in brief was that "no objections will be made by the trustees to the men joining the musicians' union if the American Federation of Musicians will make special rule for the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

It was made very plain by most of the 35 players who quit Saturday night and the nine others who later joined them that they returned and took part in yesterday's rehearsal only because of the letter written by Frederic Fradkin, the deposed concert master, to President Rudolph Ringwell of the Association of Union Players strongly urging them to do so.

It was the dismissal of Mr. Fradkin by the trustees that caused the walkout at Saturday night's concert.

SYMPHONY PLAYERS IN THE UNION

CABOT DEFIES UNION

BOSTON EVENING RECORD

BOSTON, TUESDAY, MARCH 9, 1920

VOL. LXXII. NO. 57

ALL THE NEWS OF THE DAY AT A GLANCE

...NG TRANSCRIPT, TUESDAY, MARCH 9, 1920

Symphony Troubles

FLAT REFUSAL

Passing Over Recent "Incidents," the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra Decline to Accept the By-Laws of the Union as Contrary to Past and Present Practice and Obligation—Clear Statement of a Firm Position

BYGONES apparently are to be bygones in the controversy between the trustees and the unionized members of the Symphony Orchestra. On Saturday evening last, thirty or forty of the musicians refused to bear their part in the appointed concert at Symphony Hall. On Monday morning, the whole band, taking counsel anew, reported for rehearsal as usual. Let all this pass—everyone concerned seems now agreed—as mere explosion of "temperament," mere ferment of excited minds. For less grave affront on Friday to the public of the concerts Mr. Fradkin was promptly dismissed. He, it seemed, had broken his contract. As clearly did the musicians who absented themselves on Saturday break theirs. He, however, was one; while they were thirty or forty. A new concert-master can sooner or later be found; a third and more of the orchestra would be far less easy to replace. Hence the overlooking, the seeming compromise, which it is the custom to call practical wisdom. Naturally how many more times "temperaments" may explode and be pardoned is another question. Possibly Mr. Monteux's good counsels are about to prevail and either side will be wary of extremes.

For the time both did fair to be occupied less with "incidents" than with debates and possible adjustments of the questions in issue—with the consequences of "unionization," with salaries as players and trustees variously view them. The trustees have now examined the constitution, by-laws and rules generally of the American Federation of Musicians. They find them inconsistent with the standards and the methods of the Symphon Orchestra and at variance with the contracts into which they and the players have entered. Judge Cabot's letter to the individual members of the band, sent yesterday and made public today, recites these conclusions. It recalls the negotiations between the trustees and the officers of the Federation in 1918, and their inability to reach agreement. The officers declined to make an exception of the Symphony Orchestra in the operation of their by-laws. The trustees insisted that these rules should be modified to accord with its ways, standards and contracts. There was impasse and the impasse continues.

The practice and the contracts of the trustees, like those of Mr. Higginson before them, provide that the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra shall be the role use of the abilities and the service of the members, engaging and dismissing them accordingly. The by-laws of the Federation deny him these powers unless the local union sanction such dismissals and engagements. The conductor and the trustees have sought musicians wherever they were obtainable. The by-laws aforesaid restrict their choice to the local union and to such "outsiders" in America or in Europe as it may approve. The by-laws further limit contracts to one year, whereas the trustees prefer to make longer agreements with the players to assure the stability of the orchestra. The by-laws require that a unionized orchestra be administered as a "closed shop." The trustees stand firm for an "open shop" in the fullest sense of the words. So forth and so onward with the minutest relations between players, conductor and proprietors to this complete conclusion: "No contract shall ever be construed to interfere with any obligations which the members of an orchestra may owe to the American Federation of Musicians as members thereof."

To such exactions, if the Federation insist upon them, there can be but one answer. The trustees make it in the final paragraphs of Judge Cabot's letter:

> As the committee of seven [from the players] stated, the advantages of membership in the union necessarily entail upon members certain duties and obligations, and those are, among others, the very ones just recited. The committee of seven are right in pointing out that they are necessarily inconsistent with other duties and obligations to carry on the Boston Symphony Orchestra, where musical qualifications are to be judged by the conductor.
>
> The trustees have duties and obligations to the present subscribers and sustainers and to the ever-widening group of subscribers and sustainers who are ready and eager to maintain the orchestra according to its great traditions. The trustees are going to live up to their obligations and duties, and to carry on the concerts, and they cannot consent to the men assuming obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts.

There is not a reason to doubt that th... politic of the Symphony Concerts—th... sustaining public—is now at one with th... trustees in this resolution. Meanwhi... also those concerts continue.

...this support is due to ... the unionization of the ... work for mediocrity.

...gginson's Views

...Orchestra Saw No Good ... Organization

...Massachusetts — Major ...gginson, the founder of ...mphony Orchestra, May ... time when the union ... under discussion, gave ... unions as follows:

...ish to give any opinion ...nd non-union orchestras ... that I see no gain for the ... a union, and I see much ... from people who do not ... matter. I cannot claim ...tanding myself, but have ...usicians in Europe, and ...ing about how an or... ...ade and trained. One ... is this: that the con... ... alone, shall decide ... men have practiced ...whether they are playing ... If I am not wrong, ... object beyond a certain ...earsals. That is a point ... they cannot know, for ...ers his own part, and ... the rest. May I say ... of our orchestra has ... that the musical ... the selection of the ...sking of the programs ... of the programs, has ... the hands of the con... ... time. I have had to ...uctor as well as was in ...having lived in Vienna ... the musicians, was ... the beginning. The ...estra have been ... conductor was satisfied, ... alone, and each ... own business. My ... the conductor, and ...estra. I never ...ical side. ... days we used to ... men when we ...required by some ... When the head ... came to see me ... I did not think ...r you do not do ...get any of our ... to which I re...

...DAY, MARCH 9, ...

ALL THE NEWS OF THE DAY AT A GLANCE

BOSTON EVENING RECORD

LAST EDITION

VOL. LXXII. NO. 57 BOSTON, TUESDAY, MARCH 9, 1920 PRICE TWO CENTS

Symphony Musicians Must Quit Union

BOSTON EVENING RECORD MARCH 9, 1920

CABOT DEFIES UNION PLAYERS IN THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TRUSTEES ARE FIRM AGAINST 'CLOSED SHOP'

Will Demand That Players Live Up to Contracts and Obey Rules

(Continued from Page One)

annual trip, according to the men, always has been a financial success.

"Only a Truce"

The enrollment of between 40 and 50 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra players in the local of the American Federation of Musicians, with the temporary return of the men to their posts, was interpreted today by a labor official as "only a truce" in the controversy between the Symphony management and the artists.

The news that the men had reported for rehearsal created an impression that the players' troubles were over. Developments early today, coupled with those of yesterday's important meeting, showed that the players had just started a concentrated movement in an attempt to win their fight.

A special meeting of the union members held at the headquarters of the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, St. Botolph and Garrison sts., yesterday afternoon, after the rehearsal, was attended by 61 of the players of the orchestra.

Judge Cabot Firm

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, was waited upon by a committee of three of the oldest and best known players in the orchestra, appointed at the meeting, and after an hour's conference with him at Symphony Hall they returned and reported that Judge Cabot had not changed his attitude towards the members of the orchestra joining a labor union.

Their report in brief was that "no objections will be made by the trustees to the men joining the musicians' union if the American Federation of Musicians will make special rule for the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

It was made very plain by most of the 55 players who quit Saturday night and the nine others who later joined them that they returned and took part in yesterday's rehearsal only because of the letter written by Frederic Fradkin, the deposed concert master, to President Rudolph Ringwell of the Association of Union Players strongly urging them to do so.

It was the dismissal of Mr. Fradkin by the trustees that caused the walkout at Saturday night's concert.

Crisis Near in Life of Famous Orchestra

Complete disruption of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, unless the 35 "striking" members immediately renounce their affiliation with organized labor, was predicted today by one of the city's most prominent musicians.

"Judge Cabot's defiance of the union men, and the known sympathy of the board of directors with his opinions, will result in an ultimatum tomorrow," said the musician. "It will be another case of the police strike—get out of the union or the orchestra."

The Symphony players, on the other hand, scout this report, pointing out that the annual Southern trip of the orchestra commences next Sunday.

"They declare that if the trustees take any such action, which of course would disrupt the orchestra, the trip would have to be abandoned. This

(Continued on Last Page)

ACT TOMORROW ON STRIKE OF SYMPHONY MEN

...ttee of the Boston Symphony Or... ...ra will meet tomorrow to consider ... the cases of the 35 members of their or... ...ganization who went out on strike Sat... ...urday. In view of the statement sent ... ...out by Judge Cabot that he considered ... ...that men had committed a breach of ... ...contract, it is believed disciplinary meas... ...ures may be taken against them.

In addition to previous affiliation with the American Federation of Musicians all of the 35 union members have joined the Boston Musicians' Union, despite Judge Cabot's refusal to allow them to do so.

A conference was held Monday afternoon with Judge Cabot by a committee representing the men, and the results of the conference will be laid before the ... tomorrow. Judge Cabot is re... ...said not to have changed the position originally assumed by him, and that no ... ...toward the trouble made against the men ... ...joining the union by a committee ... ...tion of Musicians will make a special ... ...rule for the management of the Boston ... ...Symphony Orchestra to permit them to ... ...accept engagements anywhere at ... ...concerts tomorrow. This right is ... ...denied other symphony orches... ...tras in this country and all others until ... ...they have first exhausted local efforts ... ...to obtain engagements.

Symphony Troubles

FLAT REFUSAL

Passing Over Recent "Incidents," the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra Decline to Accept the By-Laws of the Union as Contrary to Past and Present Practice and Obligation—Clear Statement of a Firm Position

BYGONES apparently are to be bygones between the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra and the musicians' union, for the trustees have unofficially declined to accept the by-laws of the union as presented by a committee of the musicians, and have so informed Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees. The by-laws, as presented, are said to be more explosive than the original demands, which were flatly refused by the trustees. The by-laws, it is said, would make it impossible for the trustees to engage any musicians who are not members of the union, and would also make it impossible for the trustees to engage any conductor who is not a member of the union.

The by-laws, it is said,

STATEMENT BY TRUSTEES OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Supporters Given History of the Recent Troubles—Stand Against Union

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Frederick P. Cabot is president, are today sending to the supporters of the orchestra a statement in detail, dealing with the history of the recent events which have produced a condition of affairs that has brought the orchestra into conspicuous notice. The trustees state in their circular letter that the condition "calls for a frank statement," and, among other things, say:

"The desire of some of the Symphony players to join the Federation has been placed upon the ground that their material welfare would thus be promoted. Independently of such affiliation they asked that the salary of each member of the orchestra should be increased by $1000. This would involve a total addition of approximately $100,000 a year to the expense of maintaining the orchestra.

"The trustees were obliged to point out the fact that such an increase was beyond any resources now at their command; that since 1914 the salary account, exclusive of the conductor's salary, had grown from $172,351.01 to $224,169.36 a year; that they proposed to increase their resources available for salaries by an extension of the pop concert season, by such advance in the price of season tickets as they believed the subscribers would be willing to accept, and by an organized effort, at the most favorable time, to secure a large permanent endowment for the orchestra.

Provision for Summer Salary

"It must be obvious that membership or non-membership in any musicians' association cannot increase the resources of the trustees or their ability to pay larger salaries to the orchestra. It has, however, been suggested that membership in the federation would permit members of the orchestra, now debarred from Summer hotel and similar orchestras as 'non-union' players, to enlarge their earnings. At best this suggestion is applicable to a comparatively small number of our musicians. Frequently a hotel orchestra is made up entirely of Boston Symphony players.

"When the proposed extension of the pop concert season, moreover, is accomplished, the possible period for such Summer engagements will be reduced to about eight weeks, and most of the players feel, with reason, that this is no more than they need as a vacation from the exacting artistic rquirmnts of successive seasons. To lessen the need for such Summer engagements, the trustees, in 1918, made a provision for an annual payment of a Summer salary of $250 to all continuing members of the orchestra whose salary during the concerts is less than $3000 a year. It was pointed out that for union members there would also be opportunities for additional earnings during the Symphony season.

"Yet in connection with such suggestions of increased opportunity for Summer and other work, it is significant to note that the players who requested an increase of $1000 a year for every member of the orchestra expressly urged that no additional concerts be given to defray this increase of salary, on the ground that the additional expense should be borne by the public.

Against Any Divided Rule

"The trustees of the orchestra yield to nobody in their desire to see members treated with all possible generosity. But the question of their joining the American Federation of Musicians is precisely the same as it was two years ago. Last week the rules of the association were again shown to the trustees. The rules are the same now as they were in 1918. They present the same conflict of authority. For the judgment and discretion of a board of trustees, who have accepted the obligation to maintain at the highest possible level of artistic excellence, a distinguished local and National institution, these rules, unchanged, would substitute the judgment of the executive board of the American Federation of Musicians, a body with whom the musical supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be, and probably ought to be, of an importance quite secondary to the welfare of the federation.

"The trustees have for their chief concern its continuance and development as the splendid instrument of art and civilization into which it has grown through its nearly 40 years og existence. Their concern is for the exceptional, the best; the concern of the federation is, of necessity, for the general, the average. The trustees believe that in a conflict between the rules representing these two ideals, they cannot accept the second, and that the upholding of the first will make in the long run not only for the higher standards of art, but for the better interests of the members of the orchestra."

STOP STRIKING PLAYERS' PAY

Herald — Mar 10

Symphony Trustees Withhold Checks of 35 Pending Final Action

MEET TO DISCUSS DISMISSAL TODAY

Yesterday was the regular pay day for the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but when the salary checks were distributed, after the rehearsal in Symphony Hall, none was given to the 35 musicians who went on strike last Saturday evening, though all the others received their pay.

The 35 who had been on strike immediately held a meeting and appointed a committee to confer with Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees, regarding their back pay. Judge Cabot met this committee and after a 30-minute discussion its members reported back to their fellow-musicians, stating that he had told them that the pay checks for the men who had refused to perform on Saturday night would not be given them until after the meeting of the trustees, to be held today.

Determine Status Today

It was stated that at today's meeting the trustees will decide which of the 35 men who are alleged to have violated their contracts by their action Saturday evening are to be dismissed from the orchestra or whether all are to be retained under certain conditions.

Several of the "strikers" declared they had no apprehensions as to the action the trustees might take with reference to the alleged breach of contracts, as they had been told by their attorney, Arthur Berenson, that if there had been a breach it had been made void by the action of the management in permitting the men to take part in the rehearsals on Monday and yesterday and allowing them to go to Providence last evening to give a performance in that city. The orchestra had a special car on a train that left the Back Bay station in the late afternoon.

Before they boarded the train the "strikers'" committee was asked what action would be taken if at today's meeting the trustees decide to dismiss leaders in the union movement, or all of the 35 who declined to play last Saturday. The committeemen stated they had not yet considered that possibility, but other players expressed their belief that the American Federation of Musicians would support them in court proceedings. The union members of the orchestra will hold a special meeting today.

SYMPHONY MEN READY TO QUIT

Salaries of 35 "Strikers" Held Up; Trustees Determine Their Status Today

On whatever action is taken today by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the case of the 35 players who refused to take part in the concert last Saturday night rests the fate of the organization, according to the musicians, who plan to fight any attempt to discharge them.

Salary checks, which were distributed among the players who did not join in the walkout, were withheld from the "strikers," and during a visit by a committee of the payless players to Judge Frederick Cabot, president of the trustees, they were told that their cases would be disposed of today at a meeting of the trustees. The union members of the orchestra also met today.

Several of the "strikers" declared they had no apprehensions as to the action the trustees might take with reference to the alleged breach of contracts, as they had been told by their attorney, Arthur Berenson, that if there had been a breach it had been made void by the action of the management in permitting the men to take part in two rehearsals and allowing them to go to Providence to give a performance in that city.

Items and Announcements

A public that is awaiting with some impatience decisive action in the quarrel between the trustees and the unionized members of the Symphony Orchestra must again content itself with bulletins of new bickerings. The trustees yesterday withheld from the "strikers" of last Saturday the weekly salaries then due and payable. They did so in order to consider at a meeting this afternoon the status of these members of the band—members, it may be noted, who have been working in it as usual, alike in concert and rehearsal, for three days past. The unionized players, in turn, will hold a meeting in the course of the day to debate this "new situation." And so it goes. Blessed be publicity!

ce Dealers Association said ... the lead to reduce the cost of living.

SYMPHONY STRIKERS' PAY STOPS

Entire Orchestra Given the Providence

Post Concert Mar 10

Salary checks for last week were withheld from the 35 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who went on "strike" last Saturday night when the other members received their checks yesterday morning after the rehearsal. Investigation following this action by the board of trustees brought out the probability of the dissal of some of the players who re- ed to play at the Saturday night ye rt.

DECIDE ON PENALTIES

Following the failure of the men who quit to receive their checks yesterday a hasty conference was held and a committee was appointed to visit Judge Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, for an explanation of the situation. The answer of the chairman, according to members of the orchestra' last night, was that the checks would not be given to the men until after a meeting of the trustees at which it would be decided which of the men who violated their contracts" were to be discharged and which were to be retained.

The entire orchestra went to Providence last night.

Next Sunday the orchestra is scheduled to leave on a nine days' trip. The tour will include concerts at Washington on Monday, Baltimore on Tuesday, Philadelphia on Wednesday, New York, Thursday; Brooklyn, Friday; New York, Saturday afternoon, and Newark, Saturday night.

35 SYMPHONY MEN ABSENT

Americ... Mar 10

Striking Players Who Wer Not Paid Tuesday Refuse to Attend Rehearsal

Thirty-five members of the Bosto Symphony Orchestra, who failed t receive pay on Tuesday for the previous week, refused to attend rehearsal today, claiming the trustees had committed a breach of contract.

According to Arthur Berenson, counsel for the Musicians' Union, this action was voted at a meeting in union headquarters, St. Botolph street, on his advice.

Mr. Berenson pointed out that the failure of the musicians to attend rehearsal was not a strike, but simply a manifestation of the fact that they were no longer bound. Their contract, he stated, called for weekly payment, and failure to pay them by the trustees constituted breach of contract.

The trustees of the orchestra went into session at the Union Club to consider the action of the men in failing to attend the rehearsal.

the main burst, but vast quantities had poured into the tunnel before action could be taken. The tunnel steps and approaches were converted into waterfalls.

Evening Mail

ACTING MAYOR WITH STRIKING MUSICIANS

Union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were urged today by Acting Mayor Moriarty, former president of the Central Labor Union, to continue their fight to organize to the bitter end.

Moriarty, who is president of the city council, addressed the union members at their headquarters on St. Botolph street. He recited the benefits to be obtained by affiliation with organized labor. He urged the players to get into the union and "stick to the bitter end" for increased pay and better working conditions. The players appeared greatly encouraged by Moriarty's advice.

Fifty players were given working cards in the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, the newly organized players' union.

The trustees were expected today to announce whether any of the 35 players who struck Saturday night would be discharged or all of them retained under certain conditions.

PICK BLUE AND WHITE

WASHINGTON, March 10.

...ssaus Wilson

Globe Mar 10

NO CHECKS FOR 35 SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Trustees to Pass on Cases Before They Are Paid

Will Decide Which Will Be Kept in Orchestra, Says Judge Cabot

When the salary checks were passed out to the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall after the rehearsal yesterday morning, the 35 musicians who declared themselves on strike last Saturday night, discovered that no checks had been made out for them. The weekly checks were given to the other players.

The absence of the checks was discussed by these 35 men and it was decided to send the committee to Judge Frederick Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees for an explanation. A conference was arranged and held at Symphony Hall during the afternoon lasting about half an hour.

Members of the committee, when seen at the Back Bay Station, where they boarded a special train for Providence, said that Judge Cabot informed them that the checks for the "strikers" would not be given them until after a meeting of the trustees, at which it would be decided which of the men, who were accused of violating their contracts Saturday night, would be retained in the orchestra and which were to be discharged.

Members of the committee stated that they did not worry over this answer of Judge Cabot, owing to the fact that according to their attorney, the alleged "breach of contract" was voided by the action of the management of the orchestra in allowing the men to take part in the rehearsals of Monday and yesterday mornings and in taking them to Providence last night.

What action will be taken by the union in the event that any of the men who went on "strike" are discharged could not be told by the committee last night, but the opinion was expressed that the union would back the discharged men to the limit in fighting their grievances in the courts.

A special meeting of the union members will be held today.

TODAY'S GLOBE CONTENTS

STATEMENT BY TRUSTEES OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Supporters Given History of the Recent Troubles—Stand Against Union

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Frederick P. Cabot is president, are today sending to the supporters of the orchestra a statement in detail, dealing with the history of the recent events which have produced a condition of affairs that has brought the orchestra into conspicuous notice. The trustees state in their circular letter that the condition "calls for a frank statement," and, among other things, say:

"The desire of some of the Symphony players to join the Federation has been placed upon the ground that their material welfare would thus be promoted. Independently of such affiliation they asked that the salary of each member of the orchestra should be increased by $1000. This would involve a total addition of approximately $100,000 a year to the expense of maintaining the orchestra.

"The trustees were obliged to point out the fact that such an increase was beyond any resources now at their command; that since 1914 the salary account, exclusive of the conductor's salary, had grown from $172,351.01 to $224,169.36 a year; that they proposed to increase their resources available for salaries by an extension of the pop concert season, by such advance in the price of season tickets as they believed the subscribers would be willing to accept, and by an organized effort, at the most favorable time, to secure a large permanent endowment for the orchestra.

Provision for Summer Salary

"It must be obvious that membership or non-membership in any musicians' association cannot increase the resources of the trustees or their ability to pay larger salaries to the orchestra. It has, however, been suggested that membership in the federation would permit members of the orchestra, now debarred from Summer hotel and similar orchestras as 'non-union' players, to enlarge their earnings. At best this suggestion is applicable to a comparatively small number of our musicians. Frequently a hotel orchestra is made up entirely of Boston Symphony players.

"When the proposed extension of the pop concert season, moreover, is accomplished, the possible period for such Summer engagements will be reduced to about eight weeks, and most of the players feel, with reason, that this is no more than they need as a vacation from the exacting artistic rquirmnts of succssive seasons. To lessen the need for such Summer engagements, the trustees, in 1918, made a provision for an annual payment of a Summer salary of $250 to all continuing members of the orchestra whose salary during the concerts is less than $3000 a year. It was pointed out that for union members there would also be opportunities for additional earnings during the Symphony season.

"Yet in connection with such suggestions of increased opportunity for Summer and other work, it is significant to note that the players who requested an increase of $1000 a year for every member of the orchestra expressly urged that no additional concerts be given to defray this increase of salary, on the ground that the additional expense should be borne by the public.

Against Any Divided Rule

"The trustees of the orchestra yield to nobody in their desire to see members treated with all possible generosity. But the question of their joining the American Federation of Musicians is precisely the same as it was two years ago. Last week the rules of the association were again shown to the trustees. The rules are the same now as they were in 1918. They present the same conflict of authority. For the judgment and discretion of a board of trustees, who have accepted the obligation to maintain at the highest possible level of artistic excellence, a distinguished local and National institution, these rules, unchanged, would substitute the judgment of the executive board of the American Federation of Musicians, a body with whom the musical supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be, and probably ought to be, of an importance quite secondary to the welfare of the federation.

"The trustees have for their chief concern its continuance and development as the splendid instrument of art and civilization into which it has grown through its nearly 40 years og existence. Their concern is for the exceptional, the best; the concern of the federation is, of necessity, for the general, the average. The trustees believe that in a conflict between the rules representing these two ideals, they cannot accept the second, and that the upholding of the first will make in the long run not only for the higher standards of art, but for the better interests of the members of the orchestra."

STOP STRIKING PLAYERS' PAY

Herald — May 10

Symphony Trustees Withhold Checks of 35 Pending Final Action

MEET TO DISCUSS DISMISSAL TODAY

Yesterday was the regular pay day for the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but when the salary checks were distributed, after the rehearsal in Symphony Hall, none was given to the 35 musicians who went on strike last Saturday evening, though all the others received their pay.

The 35 who had been on strike immediately held a meeting and appointed a committee to confer with Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees, regarding their back pay. Judge Cabot met this committee and after a 30-minute discussion its members reported back to their fellow-musicians, stating that he had told them that the pay checks for the men who had refused to perform on Saturday night would not be given them until after the meeting of the trustees, to be held today.

Determine Status Today

It was stated that at today's meeting the trustees will decide which of the 35 men who are alleged to have violated their contracts by their action Saturday evening are to be dismissed from the orchestra or whether all are to be retained under certain conditions.

Several of the "strikers" declared they had no apprehensions as to the action the trustees might take with reference to the alleged breach of contracts, as they had been told by their attorney, Arthur Berenson, that if there had been a breach it had been made void by the action of the management in permitting the men to take part in the rehearsals on Monday and yesterday and allowing them to go to Providence last evening to give a performance in that city. The orchestra had a special car on a train that left the Back Bay station in the late afternoon.

Before they boarded the train the "strikers'" committee was asked what action would be taken if at today's meeting the trustees decide to dismiss leaders in the union movement, or all of the 35 who declined to play last Saturday. The committeemen stated they had not yet considered that possibility, but other players expressed their belief that the American Federation of Musicians would support them in court proceedings. The union members of the orchestra will hold a special meeting today.

SYMPHONY MEN READY TO QUIT

American — Mar 10

Salaries of 35 "Strikers" Held Up; Trustees Determine Their Status Today

On whatever action is taken today by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the case of the 35 players who refused to take part in the concert last Saturday night rests the fate of the organization, according to the musicians, who plan to fight any attempt to discharge them.

Salary checks, which were distributed among the players who did not join in the walkout, were withheld from the "strikers," and during a visit by a committee of the payless players to Judge Frederick Cabot, president of the trustees, they were told that their cases would be disposed of today at a meeting of the trustees. The union members of the orchestra also met today.

Several of the "strikers" declared they had no apprehensions as to the action the trustees might take with reference to the alleged breach of contracts, as they had been told by their attorney, Arthur Berenson, that if there had been a breach it had been made void by the action of the management in permitting the men to take part in two rehearsals and allowing them to go to Providence to give a performance in that city.

Items and Announcements

A public that is awaiting with some impatience decisive action in the quarrel between the trustees and the unionized members of the Symphony Orchestra must again content itself with bulletins of new bickerings. The trustees yesterday withheld from the "strikers" of last Saturday the weekly salaries then due and payable. They did so in order to consider at a meeting this afternoon the status of these members of the band—members, it may be noted, who have been working in it as usual, alike in concert and rehearsal, for three days past. The unionized players, in turn, will hold a meeting in the course of the day to debate this "new situation." And so it goes. Blessed be publicity!

ce Dealers Association said ... the lead to reduce the cost of living.

SYMPHONY STRIKERS' PAY STOPS

Entire Orchestra Gives the Providence

Post Concert Mar 10

Salary checks for last week were withheld from the 35 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who went on "strike" last Saturday night when the other members received their checks yesterday morning after the rehearsal. Investigation following this action by the board of trustees brought out the probability of the dis-ssal of some of the players who re-ed to play at the Saturday night ye-rt.

of wh-

DECIDE ON PENALTIES

Following the failure of the men who quit to receive their checks yesterday a hasty conference was held and a committee was appointed to visit Judge Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, for an explanation of the situation. The answer of the chairman, according to members of the orchestra last night, was that the checks would not be given to the men until after a meeting of the trustees at which it would be decided which of the men who "violated their contracts" were to be discharged and which were to be retained.

The entire orchestra went to Providence last night.

Next Sunday the orchestra is scheduled to leave on a nine days' trip. The tour will include concerts at Washington on Monday, Baltimore on Tuesday, Philadelphia on Wednesday, New York Thursday; Brooklyn, Friday; New York, Saturday afternoon, and Newark, Saturday night.

35 SYMPHONY MEN ABSENT

Amer — Mar 10

Striking Players Who Were Not Paid Tuesday Refuse to Attend Rehearsal

Thirty-five members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who failed to receive pay on Tuesday for the previous week, refused to attend rehearsal today, claiming the trustees had committed a breach of contract.

According to Arthur Berenson, counsel for the Musicians' Union, this action was voted at a meeting in union headquarters, St. Botolph street, on his advice.

Mr. Berenson pointed out that the failure of the musicians to attend rehearsal was not a strike, but simply a manifestation of the fact that they were no longer bound. Their contract, he stated, called for weekly payment, and failure to pay them by the trustees constituted breach of contract.

The trustees of the orchestra went into session at the Union Club to consider the action of the men in failing to attend the rehearsal.

the main burst, but vast quantities had poured into the tunnel before action could be taken. The tunnel steps and approaches were converted into waterfalls.

Herald Mar

ACTING MAYOR WITH STRIKING MUSICIANS

Union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were urged today by Acting Mayor Moriarty, former president of the Central Labor Union, to continue their fight to organize to the bitter end.

Moriarty, who is president of the city council, addressed the union members at their headquarters on St. Botolph street. He recited the benefits to be obtained by affiliation with organized labor. He urged the players to get into the union and "stick to the bitter end" for increased pay and better working conditions. The players appeared greatly encouraged by Moriarty's advice.

Fifty players were given working cards in the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, the newly organized players' union.

The trustees were expected today to announce whether any of the 35 players who struck Saturday night would be discharged or all of them retained under certain conditions.

PICK BLUE AND WHITE

WASHINGTON, March ...

...ssaus Wilson

Globe Mar 10

NO CHECKS FOR 35 SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Trustees to Pass on Cases Before They Are Paid

Will Decide Which Will Be Kept in Orchestra, Says Judge Cabot

When the salary checks were passed out to the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall after the rehearsal yesterday morning, the 35 musicians who declared themselves on strike last Saturday night, discovered that no checks had been made out for them. The weekly checks were given to the other players.

The absence of the checks was discussed by these 35 men and it was decided to send the committee to Judge Frederick Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees for an explanation. A conference was arranged and held at Symphony Hall during the afternoon lasting about half an hour.

Members of the committee, when seen at the Back Bay Station, where they boarded a special train for Providence, said that Judge Cabot informed them that the checks for the "strikers" would not be given them until after a meeting of the trustees, at which it would be decided which of the men, who were accused of violating their contracts Saturday night, would be retained in the orchestra and which were to be discharged.

Members of the committee stated that they did not worry over this answer of Judge Cabot, owing to the fact that according to their attorney, the alleged "breach of contract" was voided by the action of the management of the orchestra in allowing the men to take part in the rehearsals of Monday and yesterday mornings and in taking them to Providence last night.

What action will be taken by the union in the event that any of the men who went on "strike" are discharged could not be told by the committee last night, but the opinion was expressed that the union would back the discharged men to the limit in fighting their grievances in the courts.

A special meeting of the union members will be held today.

TODAY'S GLOBE CONTENTS

Symphony Troubles

TO THE SYMPHONY PUBLIC

A CIRCULAR LETTER FROM THE TRUSTEES

Their Position in the Present Controversy Defined and Explained—The Difficulties and Disadvantages of Unionization—Salaries, Income and Opportunity—Old Standards to Be Upheld

THIS afternoon, the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra are sending to the subscribers to the Symphony Concerts and to other supporters of them a circular letter which they will receive tomorrow. The letter defines the stand of the Trustees against the unionization of the orchestra, discusses its financial resources, comments on recent "incidents." It is the first complete and authoritative declaration of the position of the trustees in the whole controversy; it is also clear explanation to those upon whose aid and comfort they must rely. With a few insignificant omissions, the letter follows hereunder:

"It should be said at the outset that the termination of Mr. Fradkin's connection with the orchestra bore no relation to his activities on behalf of the musicians' union. Mr. Fradkin was concert-master, and as such had the special duty of maintaining the standards and discipline of the orchestra. Under such circumstances his conduct was a breach of discipline and a discourtesy to the Orchestra's audience, which, in the light of his contracted obligations, would have required prompt and decisive action by the trustees at any time.

Union or Non-Union

The question of the affiliation of members of the orchestra with the American Federation of Musicians, through the "local" known as the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, is not of recent origin. This general problem confronted Major Higginron early in the thirty-seven years of his maintenance of the orchestra. He took and resolutely held the position that the artistic ideals of the orchestra he had established required absolute liberty in its management, unhampered from without, to select its members when, where, and for such length of service as the management deemed best, and to be the sole judge of the artistic qualifications of the artists selected. He considered no less essential the untrammelled power to terminate the engagement of any member in case his conduct or musical performance might no longer justify his connection with the orchestra.

"Shortly after the present trustees assumed the conduct of the orchestra, this question was raised again. The trustees made no objection to the amliation of members of the orchestra with the Federation of Musicians, provided it could be brought about consistently with those ideals of the orchestra which had become its most cherished traditions. The rules of the association, as then shown and explained to the trustees, were not consistent with such ideals. Substantially they provided for the 'closed shop'—that is, only members of the association could play in the orchestra; no musician could be engaged outside the jurisdiction of the Boston Local without its consent; only citizens of the United States or Canada, and those who had taken out their first naturalization papers, could acquire membership in the association, and therefore in the orchestra; no artist could be engaged in Europe; contracts could be made only for one year; all obligations must be expressly subordinate to the obligations of membership in the association. Any exceptions or modifications to these rules, which unmodified the trustees regarded as fatal to the conduct of the orchestra in accordance with its past standards, were to depend not upon the judgment of the trustees and conductor, but upon the consent of the executive board of the American Federation of Musicians, a board entirely without intimate knowledge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra or special interest in its welfare. Under the operation of these rules, a large part of the men who have contributed to the success of the orchestra, men like J. Adamowski, Bedetti, E. Fiedler, Ferir, Grisez, Jacquet, Kneisel, Krasselt, Laurent, Longy, Neumann, Pourtau, Sautet, Schroeder, Svecenski, Theodorowicz, Wendler, Zach, and many other preëminent artists could not have been engaged without the consent of that committee.

"The transfer of authority and responsibility could hardly be more complete. When the radical inconsistencies between the rules of the Association and the standards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were pointed out to representatives of the Boston Local and of the Federation they expressed confidence that the rules could be modified to meet the exceptional situation of this orchestra. They subsequently reported their inability to secure the Federation's consent to the necessary exceptions. Thus the amtter ended in 1918.

Salaries and Prospects

"Within the past few weeks, this whole question has again been raised. The desire of some of the Symphony players to join the Federation has been placed upon the ground that their material welfare would thus be promoted. Independently of such affiliation they asked that the salary of each member of the orchestra should be increased by $1000. This would involve a total addition of approximately $100,000 a year to the expense of maintaining the orchestra. The trustees were obliged to point out the fact that such an increase was beyond any resources now at their command; that since 1914 the salary account, exclusive of the conductor's salary, had grown from $172,351.01 to $224,169.36 a year; that they proposed to increase their resources available for salaries by an extension of the "Pop Concert" season, by such advance in the price of season tickets as they believed the subscribers would be willing to accept, and by an organized effort, at the most favorable time, to secure a large permanent endowment for the orchestra.

"It must be obvious that membership or non-membership in any musicians' association cannot increase the resources of the Trustees or their ability to pay larger salaries to the Orchestra. It has, however, been suggested that membership in the Federation would permit members of the Orchestra, now debarred from summer hotel and similar orchestras as "non-union" players, to enlarge their earnings. At best this suggestion is applicable to a comparatively small number of our musicians. Frequently a hotel orchestra is made up entirely of Boston Symphony players. When the proposed extension of the Pop Concert season, moreover, is accomplished, the possible period for such summer engagements will be reduced to about eight weeks, and most of the players feel, with reason, that this is no more than they need as a vacation from the exacting artistic requirements of successive seasons. To lessen the need for such summer engagements, the Trustees, in 1918, made a provision for an annual payment of a summer salary of $250 to all continuing members of the Orchestra whose salary during the concerts is less than $3000 a year. It was pointed out that for union members there would also be opportunities for additional earnings during the Symphony season. Yet in connection with such suggestions of increased opportunity for summer and other work, it is significant to note that the players who requested an increase of $1000 a year for every member of the Orchestra expressly urged that no additional concerts be given to defray this increase of salary, on the ground that the additional expense should be borne by the public.

Present Decisions

"The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yield to nobody in their desire to see the members of the orchestra treated with all possible generosity. But the question of their joining the American Federation of Musicians is precisely the same as it was two years ago. Last week the rules of the association were again shown to the trustees. The rules are the same now as they were in 1918. They present the same conflict of authority. For the judgment and discretion of a board of trustees, who have accepted the obligation to maintain at the highest possible level of artistic excellence a distinguished local and national institution, these rules, unchanged, would substitute the judgment of the executive board of the American Federation of Musicians, a body with whom the musical supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be, and probably ought to be, of an importance quite secondary to the welfare of the Federation. The concern of the Trustees is for the exceptional, the best, the concern of the Federation is, of necessity, for the general, the average. The Trustees believe that in a conflict between the rules representing these two ideals, they cannot accept the second, and that the upholding of the first will make in the long run not only for the higher standards of art, but for the better interests of the members of the orchestra."

AMERICANS AND FREN...

Fragments from Brief... About Their...

BOSTON EVENING RECORD
LAST EDITION
PRICE TWO CENTS

Fire in Fire

UNION REFUSE GIVEN PAY

SYMPHONY MEN TO REHEARSE UNTIL

Seek Women

to Play in Orchestra, Report

Thirty-five members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the same men who struck a few days ago and went back again, refused to attend a rehearsal of the orchestra this afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The action brings about another another serious crisis in the affairs of the orchestra. The news caused a sensation among the other members of the orchestra at the rehearsal.

The 35 musicians decided on their action at a meeting in Convention Hall. More than 200 persons who were outside the rooms in which the men were in executive session cheered when the decision was announced. The hall is the headquarters of the Boston Musicians' Protestive Assn.

Demand Their Pay

The musicians are stirred up because the orchestra trustees refused to pay them their regular installments yesterday.

"No pay; no work," the musicians put it.

Judge Cabot, acting for the orchestra trustees, ruled yesterday that the men should not get their regular installments of pay because of their recent walk-out. He held that they broke their contracts.

The musicians, on the other hand, say that in refusing to pay them the trustees are the ones who are breaking the contracts. Their counsel, Arthur Berenson, they say, insists that their viewpoint is correct.

Seek Women Players

This, in addition to the report that the trustees are negotiating with women musicians to fill the places of the striking players, were the latest developments in the controversy.

Following the lead of the authorities at the time of the police strike, the Symphony officials are in communication, it is declared, with the McDowell Club, the Musicians' Assn. and other musical organizations, seeking the enlistment of musicians to fill the ranks of the Symphony "in case of need."

This, musicians declare, is an indication that the Symphony directors will stand back of Pres. Cabot, and that the ultimatum of "quit the union or the orchestra" will be enforced.

Judge Cabot and other Symphony officials at 1 p.m. today declined to discuss their plans.

Another sensation was sprung today in the controversy between the players and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Acting Mayor James T. Moriarty, prominent labor leader and member of the Boston Central Labor Union, appeared unannounced in Convention Hall, St. Botolph st., shortly before noon.

Immediately upon his arrival he went into conference with officials of the musicians' union. Later he addressed the players, who received him with enthusiasm.

Faces Dismissal

Removal of several of the Boston Symphony players by the board of trustees at their meeting today was predicted by officials in close touch with the organization's affairs. These men, it is said, will be removed on the grounds of alleged violation of their contracts. Only the men who walked out of Symphony Hall Saturday night will be included in the list.

The status of these men will be determined at the meeting of the trustees today. A report has it that some of the board are for retaining the men, under certain conditions, while

(Continued on Page Two, Column One)

ALL THE NEWS OF THE DAY

INFORMATION OBSCURED

BOSTON EVENING RECORD
ESTABLISHED 1884
LAST EDITION
TUESDAY, MARCH 10, 1920 ..... PRICE TWO CENTS

UNION SYMPHONY MEN REFUSE TO REHEARSE UNTIL GIVEN PAY

Seek Women

an Perishes in Fire

TNT FAILS TO BR

ALL THE NEWS OF THE DAY

mphony Troubles

to point out the fact that such an increase was beyond any resources now at their command: that since 1914 the salary account, exclusive of the conductor's salary, had grown from $172,851.01 to $224,160.36; that they proposed to increase their resources available for salaries by an extension of the "Pop Concert" season by such advance in the subscribers' rates as they believed the subscribers would be willing to accept, and by an organized effort, at the most favorable time, to secure a large permanent endowment for the orchestra.

"It must be obvious that membership or non-membership in any musicians' association cannot increase the resources of the Trustees or their ability to pay larger salaries to the Orchestra. It has, however, been suggested that members of the Federation would permit members of the Symphony Orchestra, now debarred from summer engagements, to enlarge their earnings. At the Boston Symphony Hall and similar hotel and similar concerts as 'non-union' players, to enlarge their earnings. At players, to this suggestion is applicable to a best this suggestion is applicable to a comparatively small number of our musicians. Frequently a hotel orchestra is made up entirely of Boston Symphony players. When the proposed extension of the Pop Concert season is completed, the possible period for such summer engagements will be reduced to about eight weeks, and most of the players feel, with reason, that this is no more than they need as a vacation from the exacting artistic requirements of successive seasons. To lessen the need for such summer engagements, the Trustees, in 1918 made a provision for an annual payment of a summer salary of $2.00 to all continuing members of the Orchestra whose salary during the concerts is less than $3000 a year. It was pointed out that for union members there would also be opportunities for additional earnings during the Symphony season. Yet in connection with such suggestions of increased opportunity for summer and other work, it is significant to note that the players who requested an increase of $1000 a year for every member of the Orchestra expressly urged that no additional concerts be given to defray this increase of salary, on the ground that the additional expense should be borne by the public.

Present Decisions

"The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yield to nobody in their desire to see the members of the orchestra treated with all possible generosity. But the question of their joining the American Federation of Musicians is precisely the same as it was two years ago. Last week the rules of the association were changed in 1918. The same conflict of authority, who have accepted all board of trustees, who have accepted the obligation to maintain at the highest possible level of artistic excellence a distinguished local and national institution, these rules, unchanged, would substitute the judgment of the executive board of the American Federation of Musicians, a body with whom the musical supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be, and probably ought to be, of an importance quite secondary to the welfare of the Federation. The concern of the Trustees is for the exceptional, the best; the concern of the Federation is, of necessity, for the general, the average. The Trustees believe that in a conflict between the rules representing these two ideals, they cannot accept the second, and that the upholding of the first will make in the long run not only for the higher standards of art, but for the better interests of the members of the orchestra."

AMERICANS AND FRENCH

Fragments from Brief ... About Their ...

Union Symphony Men Refuse to Rehearse Until Given Pay

Continued on Page Two, Column One)

Faces Dismissal

of several of the Boston players by the board of their meeting today was by officials in close touch organization's affairs. These said, will be removed on ds of alleged violation of racts. Only the men who t of Symphony Hall Satur- will be included in the list. us of these men will be de- at the meeting of the trus- A report has it that some board are for retaining the r certain conditions, while

Faces Dismissal

of several of the Boston players by the board of their meeting today was by officials in close touch organization's affairs. These said, will be removed on ds of alleged violation of racts. Only the men who t of Symphony Hall Satur- will be included in the list. us of these men will be de- at the meeting of the trus- A report has it that some board are for retaining the r certain conditions, while

(Continued on Page Two, Column One)

Faces Dismissal

Removal of seve Symphony players trustees at their predicted by offic with the organizat men, it is said, w the grounds of a their contracts. day night will be The status of th termined at the m tees today. A rep of the board are men, under certa

(Continued on Page Two, Column One)

Orchestra Troubles

Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra are sending to the subscribers to other sup- Symphony Concerts and letter which of them a circular letter. The let- ll receive tomorrow. Trustees des the explanation of the ir financial resources, com- its finances." It is the first t "incidents." It is the first com- authoritative declaration con- d the trustees in the whole upon whose few insignificant ly. With a letter follows hereunder: letter follows hereunder: at the outset that ould be said at the outset that mination of the Boston Symphony with the orchestra bore no rela- his activities on behalf of the union. Mr. Fradkin was con- ager, and as such had the special of the orchestra. Under such ances his conduct was a breach pline and a discourtesy to the e of the orchestra. Under such contracted obligations, which, in the light quired prompt and decisive ac- the trustees at any time.

Union and Non-Union

question of the affiliation of mem- the orchestra with the American n of Musicians, through the Association, is not of recent origin. eneral problem confronted Major rly after the present trustees as- on resources of the orchestra. He maintenance of the orchestra. He d resolutely hold the position that le heads of the orchestra he had hard-required absolute liberty in its ement, unhampered from without t its members when, where, and for ength of service as the management best, and be the sole judge of istic qualifications of the artists committee. He considered no less essential the right to terminate the ment of any member in case his or musical performance might no justify his connection with the rly after the present trustees as- the conduct of the orchestra, this n was raised again. The trustees no objection to the affiliation of rds of the orchestra with the Federa- s of Musicians, provided it could be spend not upon the judgment of the ees and conductor, but upon the con- of the executive board of the Ameri- Federation of Musicians, a board without intimate knowledge of the n Symphony Orchestra or special in- in its welfare. Under the opera- of these rules, a large part of the who have contributed to the success e orchestra, men like J. Adamowski, ti, E. Fiedler, Fer, Grisez, Jacquet sel, Krasselt, Laurent, Longy, Nea- n, Pourtau, Sautet, Schroeder, Steck- Theodorowicz, Wendler, Zach, and y other preeminent artists could not been engaged without the consent of committee.

Present Trustees

Rules and Prospects

"Within the past few weeks, this whole question has again been raised. The decision of the Symphony players to ground that their welfare could thus be promoted. Independently such affiliation they asked that the sal- of each member of the orchestra should be increased by $1000. This would involve total addition of approximately $100,000 a year to the expense of maintaining the orchestra. The trustees were obliged to point out the fact that such an increase was beyond any resources now at their command: that since 1914 the salary account, exclusive of the conductor's salary, had grown from $172,851.01 to $224,160.36; that they proposed to increase their resources available for salaries by an extension of the "Pop Concert" season by such advance in the subscribers' rates as they believed the subscribers would be willing to accept, and by an organized effort, at the most favorable time, to secure a large permanent endowment for the orchestra.

"It must be obvious that membership or non-membership in any musicians' association cannot increase the resources of the Trustees or their ability to pay larger salaries to the Orchestra. It has, however, been suggested that members of the Symphony Orchestra, now debarred from summer engagements at the Boston Symphony Hall and similar hotel and similar concerts as 'non-union' players, to enlarge their earnings. At players, to this suggestion is applicable to a best this suggestion is applicable to our musicians. Frequently a hotel orchestra is made up entirely of Boston Symphony players. When the proposed extension of the Pop Concert season is completed, the possible period for such summer engagements will be reduced to about eight weeks, and most of the players feel, with reason, that this is no more than they need as a vacation from the exacting artistic requirements of successive seasons. To lessen the need for such summer engagements, the Trustees, in 1918 made a provision for an annual payment of a summer salary of $2.00 to all continuing members of the Orchestra whose salary during the concerts is less than $3000 a year. It was pointed out that for union members there would also be opportunities for additional earnings during the Symphony season. Yet in connection with such suggestions of increased opportunity for summer and other work, it is significant to note that the players who requested an increase of $1000 a year for every member of the Orchestra expressly urged that no additional concerts be given to defray this increase of salary, on the ground that the additional expense should be borne by the public.

Present Decisions

"The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yield to nobody in their desire to see the members of the orchestra treated with all possible generosity. But the question of their joining the American Federation of Musicians is precisely the same as it was two years ago. Last week the rules of the association were changed in 1918. The same conflict of authority, who have accepted all board of trustees, who have accepted the obligation to maintain at the highest possible level of artistic excellence a distinguished local and national institution, these rules, unchanged, would substitute the judgment of the executive board of the American Federation of Musicians, a body with whom the musical supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be, and probably ought to be, of an importance quite secondary to the welfare of the Federation. The concern of the Trustees is for the exceptional, the best; the concern of the Federation is, of necessity, for the general, the average. The Trustees believe that in a conflict between the rules representing these two ideals, they cannot accept the second, and that the upholding of the first will make in the long run not only for the higher standards of art, but for the better interests of the members of the orchestra."

AMERICANS AND FRENCH

Fragments from Brief ... About Their ...

Daily Globe EXTRA

, MARCH 11, 1920—SIXTEEN PAGES
COPYRIGHT, 1920, BY THE GLOBE NEWSPAPER CO.
TWO CENTS

32 "STRIKERS" DISMISSED BY SYMPHONY TRUSTEES

Men Refuse Chance to Make Peace by Accepting Judge Cabot's Statement of Principles--- Ultimatum Read at Yesterday's Rehearsal

Vote to Reject Offer Taken at Union Meeting While Rehearsal Was On

Statement Explaining Attitude of Trustees Sent to Every Subscriber

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who did not participate in Saturday night's concert, and who failed yesterday to subscribe to the principles contained in the letter of Judge Cabot sent them on Monday and signify their intention of performing their contracts, are dismissed from the orchestra, according to a vote of the trustees taken yesterday afternoon.

This decision was read by Judge Cabot to the assembled orchestra at the conclusion of the rehearsal in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

At about the same time 32 of the striking musicians met and voted unanimously not to subscribe to the principles in Judge Cabot's letter.

Then a second "strike" was declared because these 32 of the 35 who refused to play last Saturday night have not received their pay checks.

The "strikers" have called another meeting for 10 o'clock this morning, the time set for a rehearsal.

Text of Trustees' Vote

While the orchestra was at rehearsal yesterday afternoon, there was a conference of the trustees. Judge Cabot went directly from the conference room to meet the members of the orchestra. To them he read the following statement:

"At a meeting of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc, held on March 10, 1920, the following votes were passed:

"Voted, that the breach of this contract by any member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc, by refusal to play at the concert on Saturday evening, March 6, will, upon payment of the sum of $10, as provided in Article

Continued on the Fifth Page.

STRIKERS DISMISSED FROM THE SYMPHONY

Continued From the First Page.

7 of his contract, be waived if such member subscribes today, on a copy of the letter of the president of March 8, his acceptance of the principle therein stated upon which the trustees are going to carry on the concerts, and his intention to perform his contract without any further breach or violation thereof; and

"Voted, Further that all other members who refused to play at said concert be dismissed.

"Acceptance written upon the copy of the president's letter of March 8, 1920 should be delivered or mailed today March 10.

"The check for the money due the member who writes and delivers or mails such acceptance is ready for him."

A copy of this decision was also sent by mail (special delivery) to each musician who failed to play Saturday.

Statement by Trustees

A statement of the attitude of the trustees was issued yesterday afternoon and sent to each subscriber to the concerts. It reviews the recent events, points out that since 1914 the salary list has steadily grown in amount, and speaks of the plan for a large permanent endowment for the orchestra. The trustees say it is significant that the players who requested an increase of $1000 a year for every member expressly urged that no additional concerts be given to defray expenses and that the public should be called upon to bear the expense.

"The trustees of the orchestra yield to nobody in their desire to see the members treated with all generosity," the statement says. "But the question of their joining the American Federation of Musicians is precisely the same as it was two years ago. The rules are the same now as in 1918. They present the same conflict of authority.

"For the judgment and discretion of a board of trustees, who have accepted the obligation to maintain at the highest possible level of artistic excellence a distinguished local and National institution, these rules, unchanged, would substitute the judgment of the executive board of the American Federation of Musicians, a body with whom the musical supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be, and probably ought to be, of an importance quite secondary to the welfare of the federation.

"The trustees have for their chief concern its continuance and development as the splendid instrument of art and civilization into which it has grown through its nearly 40 years of existence. Their concern is for the exceptional, the best; the concern of the federation is, of necessity, for the general, the average. The trustees believe that in a conflict between the rules representing these two ideals, they cannot accept the second, and that the upholding of the first will make in the long run not only for the higher standards of art, but for the better interests of the members of the orchestra."

Say Trustees Broke Contract

The latest "strike," according to union leaders, is legal. The trustees violated the contracts, they say, when they failed to pay the men, as the contracts call for weekly salary checks.

At 2 o'clock this afternoon a meeting for the 55 men who have been obligated as members of the Boston Musicians' Protective Association will be held. It is expected that the remaining 19 men who joined the American Federation of Musicians will be obligated as members of the local branch at that time.

For the purpose of taking care of men "on strike" whose financial situation is not of the best, it was voted yesterday to hold a concert at the Colonial Theatre next Sunday night, at which the "strikers" will play, as well as Fredric Fradkin, the concert-master, whose dismissal caused the strike Saturday.

A committee from the "strikers'" ranks visited Mr Marinuzzi, the conductor of the Chicago Opera Company, with the request that he lead the concert. He stated that he was due to leave Boston Sunday morning, but if he could obtain permission to remain over he would do so.

It was said that if Mr Marinuzzi is unable to lead the concert a conductor from New York will be obtained.

The meeting yesterday began at 11 a m and did not adjourn until after 5:30 p m. The "strikers" were addressed by Acting Mayor James T. Moriarty, who offered his services in any manner in which he could assist them and prevent the famous organization being disrupted.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT END UNLESS TRUSTEES CHANGE

Statement of Leaders of 35 "Free Agents," As to Attitude Displayed Toward Players

Unless Judge Frederic Cabot and the other trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra change their attitude toward the players who have affiliated with the Musician's Union, the present orchestra has reached its end, according to statements of the leaders of the 35 men who have declared themselves "free agents," as a result of the failure of the management to give them their weekly salary checks last Tuesday.

The 35 men whose salary was held up as a result of their refusal to play at the concert last Saturday night, folowing the dismissal of Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who joined the union, refused to attend a rehearsal yesterday and also this morning, instead attending a meeting at the headquarters of the union, St Botolph and Garrison sts.

At these meetings plans were discussed for a benefit concert in aid of the men on strike, who are experiencing financial difficulties. At the meeting yesterday it was planned to give a concert in the Colonial Theatre next Sunday night, with the conductor and a number of stars from the Chicago Opera Company taking part. The fact that the arhists have to appear in Pittsburg Monday night prevented them from staying over for the concert.

Elsie Janis and Theda Bara also offered their sercices, but they leave town Sunday. The committee appointed to arrange for the concert is sending to New York to the Lambs' Club, a number of whom are members, for the purpose of getting together one of the most popular "all-star" casts that has ever appeared on a stage in this city. The musicians assisted the Actors' Equity Association during the strike last August and September, and the members of this union have signified their intention of doing all in their power to assist the musicians.

The question of salaries was discussed at the meeting this morning and the 35 men who did not receive checks, voted that ts the contracts were voided by the management, they will refuse to return to the orchestra until they can do so under union conditions. It also was voted to allow any members not members of the union to finish out their contracts, but to refuse to allow them to play after the contracts expire, unless they join the union.

During the meeting this morning, a message was received from a leader of musical circles, whose fame is Nation-wide, offering any help in his power to the strikers. This man asked permission to consider plans for taking 7[illegible] union men on a tour of concerts. This offer is under consideration.

DAY, MARCH 11, 1920

TO MAI

SYMPHONY MEN IN NEW STRIKE

Union Players to Hold Concert at Colonial Theatre Sunday Night

Preparations are near completio for the concert by the union membe of the Boston Symphony Orchest to be held Sunday night at the Colo ial Theatre, as the first step of th thirty-two players whose salarie were held up by the trustees and wh voted to go on a second "strike," i defiance of the alleged "autocratic rule of the orchestra management.

Three of the thirty-five players wh failed to appear at the concert las Saturday night have received thei checks. The remaining thirty-tw failed to report for rehearsal yester day, claiming that the action of the trustees in withholding their salaries made their contracts with the management agreement void.

DISMISSED BY TRUSTEES.

Following the action of the 32 players in not reporting for rehearsal, the trustees held a meeting, and it was voted that if the "strikers" did not report for rehearsal in the future and failed to subscribe to the principles contained in Judge Frederick Cabot's letter of Monday, to the effect that they would not be permitted to become active union members, they would be dismissed forthwith.

The trustees also voted that as a result of the failure of the 32 players to appear for rehearsal, under the by-laws of the organization, they would forfeit $10 each. They agreed, however, to waive this fine if the "strikers" would send a letter to Judge Cabot signifying their intention of living up to the rules laid down by the management. This offer has been rejected by the players.

GALLI-CURCI MAY AID.

A "strikers'" committee visited the Chicago conductor at the Copley-Plaza, and he told them that his schedule called for his departure from Boston on Sunday morning, but that he would ask permission to remain here for the "strikers'" concert. He thought he might persuade Galli-Curci to sing. Fradkin, former concert-master, will play a violin solo, and the other soloists will include Trumpeter Heim.

Report was made at the meeting held at the headquarters on St. Botolph street that the management of the orchestra was arranging to have the places of the "strikers" filled by women musicians.

...LD EXTRA

.... Herald Mar 11 TWO CENTS

...MBERS ...TRUSTEES ...M TO EACH

Trustees Propose to Waive Breach of Contract

At the meeting held yesterday by the trustees the following vote was taken:

"That the breach of this contract by any member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., by refusal to play at the concert on Saturday evening, March 6, will, upon payment of the sum of $10, as provided in article 7 of his contract, be waived if such member subscribes today on a copy of the letter of the president, of March 8, his acceptance of the principle therein stated, upon which the trustees are going to carry on the concerts, and his intention to perform his contract without any further breach or violation thereof.

"That all other members who refused to play at said concert be dismissed.

"Acceptance written upon the copy of the president's letter of March 8 should be delivered or mailed today, March 10.

"The check for the money due the member who writes and delivers or mails such acceptance is ready for him."

Dismissal of Fradkin

At the outset, the letters to subscribers state that the dismissal of Concert Master Fradkin "bore no relation to his activities on behalf of the union. As concert master he had the special duty of maintaining the standards and discipline of the orchestra. Under such circumstances his conduct was a breach

PLAYERS VOTE TO ACCEPT ONLY UNION TERMS

Board Imposes Fines and Calls for Repudiation of Unionism

"STRIKERS" TO GIVE CONCERT ON SUNDAY

Galli-Curci May Sing and Marinuzzi Conduct — Orchestra May Hire Women

The 35 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who went on strike last Saturday, and two days later were accepted back, yesterday afternoon again went on strike and voted not to rejoin the orchestra unless under union contracts and conditions.

Coincidentally with the new strike, the trustees of the orchestra sent special delivery letters to each of the 35 musicians, containing the ultimatum that they must subscribe to the declaration against unionism made by Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees, and each pay a $10 fine for being absent from rehearsal last Saturday, or be disk missed. In any event, the $10 fines will be deducted from last week's pay.

At a meeting held yesterday afternoon the 35 "strikers" voted not to subscribe to Judge Cabot's declaration,

(Continued on Page Two, Column 3.)

tograph by Victor Georg)
MME. GALLI-CURCI
inger, Who May Sing at Sun
ert in Colonial Theatre fo
lking" Symphony Players

35 Symphony Members Go Out on Fresh Strike

(Continued from Page One)

and made arrangements for a concert to be given by the union members Sunday night in the Colonial Theatre.

They arranged for a concert at which the union members of the orchestra would play, and said that possibly Marinuzzi, conductor of the Chicago Opera Company, would conduct for them and that Galli-Curci would sing.

A "strikers'" committee visited the Chicago conductor at the Copley-Plaza, and he told them that his schedule called for his departure from Boston on Sunday morning, but that he would ask permission to remain here for the "strikers'" concert. He thought he might persuade Galli-Curci to sing. Fradkin, former concert-master, whose dismissal resulted in the strike last Saturday, and at whose request the strikers returned on Monday, will play a violin solo, and the other soloists will include Trumpeter Heim. The committee is considering sending to New York for musicians to take part in the concert and may get a conductor from that city if Marinuzzi is unable to participate.

To Engage Women Musicians

Report was made at the meeting held at the headquarters on St. Botolph street that the management of the orchestra was arranging to have the places of the "strikers" filled by women musicians, and that already a proposition had been made to Georges Longy, oboe player for the Symphony, who instructs the MacDowell Club, comprised of student musicians, most of whom are women.

President Kingman of the Boston union presided at the meeting and introduced Acting Mayor James T. Moriarty, former president of the Central Labor Union, who told the "strikers" that the Boston labor unions, convinced that the 35 musicians were acting in accordance with a worthy principle, were prepared to give them whatever assistance was possible.

The 35 "strikers" will meet at 10 o'clock this morning and at 2 this afternoon. They expect that at the afternoon meeting the members of the orchestra who are members of the American Federation of Musicians but who are not yet members of the Boston local will be present.

Effect on Southern Tour

It is not yet known whether the new strike will prevent the orchestra's nine-day's southern tour, scheduled to begin next Sunday.

When the trustees ended their meeting yesterday they mailed a letter to each of the subscribers to the orchestra, defining the musicians' salaries and announcing "such advance in the price of season tickets as it is believed the subscribers would be willing to accept," an extension of the "Pop Concert" season and "an organized effort, at the most favorable time, to obtain a large permanent endowment for the orchestra"—all in anticipation of increasing salaries.

That letter also contained the declaration that it was impossible now to grant the flat increase of $1000 annually, which the players asked, and explained the trustees' attitude in refusing the petition of the players who wished to join the union.

The 35 "strikers" explained that they had not reported for rehearsal yesterday afternoon "because the management had made void the contracts by withholding their salary checks on Tuesday, the regular weekly pay day, though all the other members were paid. The 35 stated that they were "strikers," but the fact that they were taken back and their contracts voided now leaves them merely in the "ex-members" classification.

of discipline, and a discourtesy to the audience, which in the light of his contracted obligations would have required prompt and decisive action by the trustees at any time."

After rehearsing how Maj. Higginson "early in the 37 years of his maintenance of the orchestra took and resolutely held the position" against unionization, the letter reviews recent history of the latest attempt to form a union, as well as that of 1918.

The trustees say that to grant the $1000 increase in salary to each player would add $100,000 to the annual cost of maintenance, that it is beyond any resources now at command, and that since 1914 the salary account, exclusive of the conductor's salary, has increased from $172,351.01 to $224,169.36.

As for union membership permitting the musicians to earn more money by outside engagements, the trustees say opportunities to play at summer hotels would not be largely increased to unionized Symphony players; that frequently a hotel orchestra is made up entirely of Boston Symphony players, and when the extension of the Pop concert season goes into effect, the possible period for such summer engagements will be reduced to about eight weeks and that most of the players feel, with reason, that this is no more than they need as a vacation from the exacting artistic requirements of successive seasons.

Annual Summer Salary

Moreover, since 1918, an annual summer salary of $250 has been paid to every continuing player whose salary for the regular concert season has been less than $3000. The trustees call attention to the unwillingness of the musicians to increase the number of concerts, and their argument that the additional expense should be borne by the public.

Must Renew Refusal

Summing up opposition to the unionization of the orchestra, the trustees declare they yield to nobody in their desire to see the members of the orchestra treated with all possible generosity, but must renew refusal of permission to join the union, because for the judgment and discretion of a board of trustees, who have accepted the obligation to maintain at the highest possible level of artistic excellence a distinguished local and national institution, the union rules would substitute the judgment of the executive board of the American Federation of Musicians, a body with whom the musical supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be, and probably ought to be of an importance quite secondary to the welfare of the federation. The statement goes on:

"The concern of the trustees is for the exceptional, the best, the concern of the federation is, of necessity, for the general, the average. The trustees believe that in a conflict between the rules representing these two ideals, they cannot accept the second, and that the upholding of the first will make in the long run not only for the higher standards of art, but for the better interests of the members of the orchestra."

Judge Cabot explained to a Herald reporter last night, that the delay in paying the 35 strikers their last week's salaries had been occasioned, in part, by request of some of the members of the committee of the orchestra, in order that the trustees, at their regular meeting, might pass upon the whole matter at once, and the strikers themselves have opportunity for consideration. Word had been sent out, earlier in the week, by the president of the trustees, requesting information as to whether any player would be inconvenienced by the delay, and none had been named.

He had no idea as to whether all the 35 would subscribe to the declaration against unionization, but from his talks with various players, he had become convinced that much confusion existed among them as to the union requirements, and some, at least, believed that they would be exempted by the union from requirements which might conflict with their present contracts; also some believed they had signed no membership roll, but only a request for membership next year.

monitor Mar 11

STRIKING PLAYERS MUST QUIT UNION

Otherwise Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Dismiss Those Who Refused to Appear in Concert—Endowment Sought

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their meeting yesterday afternoon passed on the cases of those members of the orchestra who struck before the concert of last Saturday evening and sent to each a letter stating that upon the payment of a fine of $10, as provided in an article of his contract, the breach of contract occasioned by the strike would be waived, provided each member subscribed on the letter sent him on March 8 "his acceptance of the principle therein stated upon which the trustees are going to carry on the concerts," namely, adherence to the orchestra rather than to the union.

All those members who struck who are not willing to give up their union affiliations are to be dismissed.

There are still certain members who have joined the union but who did not strike, and their renunciation of the union will not be required until the time comes to renew contracts. Then the management of the orchestra will insist that they be loyal to the standards of the orchestra rather than to those of the union.

The trustees are confident that most if not all of the strikers will stay with the orchestra. Even if they should elect to go with the union, their departure would not seriously embarrass the management, because other players are available to take their places.

James T. Moriarty, acting Mayor of Boston, addressed the strikers yesterday and offered them encouragement.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, said that a campaign would be started immediately to provide an endowment fund of $3,000,000 to $4,000,000 for the orchestra, so that an income sufficient to provide for salary increases would be available. The trustees issued a lengthy statement to the supporters of the orchestra yesterday, giving in detail their attitude on the union question and reviewing the measures that they had contemplated in order to increase the revenues. These consist in a supplementary "Pop Concert" season in the fall, such increase in the price of tickets as they think the subscribers would be willing to accept, and an organized effort to raise an endowment fund.

The communication closes with the emphatic statement that "the trustees' concern is for the exceptional, the best; the concern of the federation is, of necessity, for the general, the average. The trustees believe that in a conflict between the rules representing these two ideals, they cannot accept the second, and that the upholding of the first will make in the long run not only for the higher standards of art but for the better interests of the members of the orchestra."

American Mar 11

WILL SUPPORT NEW ORCHESTRA

"Strikers" See Signs of Sp... in Patronage of Boston Symphony

Signs of a "split" in the patrona... of the Boston Symphony Orches... were evident today, according to c... tain of the thirty-two seceding me... bers, who declared that they had ... ceived letters from wealthy Bro... line and Back Bay patrons signify... sympathy with the "strikers" a... promising to support a new orches... founded by them. Former Conce... master Fradkin declared that he h... received a number of letters fr... patrons commending his stand.

Following a meeting this aft... noon, Attorney Arthur Beren... counsel for the union players, ... that the latter were desirous of ... curing a copy of the list of patr... to whom Judge Cabot had sent lett... explaining the situation from ... standpoint of the trustees.

"Judge Cabot takes the positi... that he wants to keep the orches... intact and maintain its high sta... ard," said Attorney Berenson. "I... evident that he cannot kepe it int... He cannot replace the 'striking' ... ists unless he secures women or n... union men who are far inferior to ... artists that have withdrawn. In ... first place, every one of the lead... symphony orchestras in the cou... is organized, and he could not d... upon any of their 90,000 memb... The immigration laws prevent ... from getting them from abroad.

"He takes the position of 'rule ... ruin.' It will be impossible for ... American Federation of Musicians ... permit the wide powers that ... trustees want to hold, for the exe... tive committee has certain ... which govern all over the co... and they are elastic enough to ... the trustees sufficient power to ... criminate in the choice of artist...

Another meeting of the execu... committee of the "strikers" was ... later in the day. The concert sc... uled for Sunday evening at the C... nial Theatre has been postpone... week. It will probably be give... that theatre, leaders said, and ... name of Emil Mollenhauer has ... mentioned as conductor. Mem... the players stated today that ... had received offers of engage... from other cities, and plans ... discussed for organizing a ... orchestra to tour New E...

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

DISMISSED SYMPHONY PLAYERS PLAN OWN ORCHESTRA

England to Tour as Strikers Plan Symphony

ARRANGING FOR SERIES OF CONCERTS

Also Preparing for a Monster Benefit at Colonial

FRADKIN GETS MANY LETTERS

Announcement of a concert tour of New England and a benefit concert at the Colonial Theatre Sunday evening, March 21, by the 32 dismissed players, and a report that a number of wealthy Bostonians are willing to finance a new unionized symphony orchestra, were the developments today in the symphony controversy.

Plans for activities to bring them in income during their controversy with the symphony trustees were discussed at a meeting of the deposed musicians at Musicians' Union headquarters, St. Botolph and Garrison streets.

Atty. Berenson, counsel for the union men, said that not all of the subscribers or donors who have supported the orchestra are in accord with the trustees in their attitude toward the unionized players. Concert Master Fradkin, dismissed, is said to have received letters commending him for his courage and stand in behalf of the union players.

The concert scheduled for Sunday night, for the benefit of the dismissed musicians, was postponed a week. An array of musical and theatrical talent such as has been rarely seen in Boston will be presented. The concert will be conducted by Emil Mollenhauer.

Atty. Berenson declared today the trustees had assumed a "rule or ruin" policy. He said under the present United States immigration laws and European emigration laws, it would not be possible to get musicians who are not union men to take the places of the 32 dismissed. He said the men can be replaced only by girls or other men, un-

(Continued on Page Two, Column 4.)

[illegible] young people are anticipating the affair with interest.

PLAN SYMPHONY STRIKERS' TOUR

Continued from First Page

able to maintain the high standard desired by the trustees.

The trustees might employ a certain number of musicians, regardless of standard, and call them the "Boston Symphony Orchestra," but this would not assure patrons of the high standard formerly maintained, Atty. Berenson said.

Atty. Berenson said if the trustees recognized the union, they could have the pick of 90,000 musicians in this country for their organization. "They wish to have the executive board of the American Federation of Musicians give them privileges which no other symphony orchestra in the country enjoys," Atty. Berenson said.

He declared Judge Cabot and the trustees have been assured by the executive board of the federation that they would be permitted the widest discretion in securing the highest type of musicians.

A count of the dismissed members of the orchestra early today showed the number to be 32. Before the meeting was well under way another member of the orchestra arrived at the hall and declared that he would cast his lot with the dismissed men. Predictions were made that within a few days many more members of the Symphony orchestra would join the dismissed men.

There are more than 150 vacancies in symphony orchestras throughout the country, and several Boston players have received offers from other cities, it was learned shortly after the meeting began. But the Boston players declare their determination to stick together and form an organization of their own to cater to New England music lovers.

Late Wednesday afternoon, with the slogan, "No pay, no work," the 33 men who went on strike Saturday and two days later were accepted back, voted not to return to work with the Symphony orchestra. Considering that Judge Cabot and the trustees, in holding up their pay checks Tuesday, were guilty of a breach of their contracts, they have quit, but intend to carry on the fight for the right to organize.

Coincident yesterday with the ending of the meeting at which the musicians voted not to continue work, each man received a special delivery letter from Judge Cabot in which he was told that he must pay a fine of $10 for being absent from the rehearsal last Saturday or be dismissed, as well as subscribe to the declaration against unionism made by Judge Cabot.

Reports that the trustees of the orchestra are arranging to have the MacDowell Club, an organization of student women musicians, to fill the places of the strikers were characterized as "pure propaganda" spread by several members of the Symphony orchestra who have at all times been close to Judge Cabot and the trustees.

WILL SELL COAL IN SMALL LOTS

Report Rich Patrons to Finance Move

Today's developments in the controversy between the Boston Symphony players and the management were:

Judge Frederic Cabot, president of the board of trustees, was accused of maintaining a "rule or ruin" attitude in a statement issued by Arthur Berenson, attorney for the union players.

Reported offers of several wealthy Back Bay and Brookline patrons of the orchestra, to give financial backing to the men now out, if they desire to establish a new orchestra.

Plans formed for a concert to be held in the Colonial Theatre, a week from Sunday night.

All-Day Session

The 32 men, who have quit the orchestra, met today at union headquarters, where they held an all-day session. Fradkin, the deposed concert-master, was cheered as he entered the big hall. He is refered to by the men as their "idol."

Most of the day was devoted to completing plans for the big concert. Many of the famous artists, who have quit the orchestra as a result of the union controversy are to appear as soloists.

Attorney Berenson in his statement declared that the attitude of Judge Cabot was one of "Rule or Ruin" and the under present conditions the present orchestra would not be kept at a high standard.

Word reached union headquarters today that one booking agency had agreed to send the players on a concert tour of New England.

It was reported also that Fradkin Fradkin, deposed concert master, has received numerous letters from friends and admirers offering support and suggesting that he eliminate himself from the controversy and proceed to organize the men.

None of the men will have difficulty in placing themselves, according to their leaders. There are more than 150 vacancies in American symphony orchestras at the present time, it was said. Twenty of the 32 musicians have already secured engagements with symphony orchestras for next year.

The men refused to attend today's rehearsal at 10 a.m. Instead, they met at union headquarters to complete their plans for the big concert Sunday night.

The dismissal of the men was the result of a vote taken at a meeting of the trustees late yesterday. The men were also fined $10 for being absent from Saturday's performance.

Galli-Curci May Sing

The men arranged for a concert at which the union members of the orchestra would play, and said that possibly Marinuzzi, conductor of the Chicago Opera Co., would conduct for them and that Galli-Curci would sing.

A "strikers" committee visited the Chicago conductor at the Copley-Plaza, and he told them that his schedule called for his departure from Boston on Sunday morning, but that he would ask permission to remain here for the "strikers'" concert.

He thought he might persuade Galli-Curci to sing. Fradkin, former concert-master, whose dismissal resulted in the strike last Saturday, and at whose request the strikers returned on Monday, will play a violin solo, and the other soloists will include Trumpeter Heim. The committee is considering sending to New York for musicians to take part in the concert and may get a conductor from that city if Marinuzzi is unable to participate.

NEW STRIKE IN SYMPHONY

32 Claim Pay Holdup Voided Contracts

A second "strike" of the union players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was begun yesterday afternoon when 32 of the 35 orchestra members who "struck" last Saturday night refused to report for the regular rehearsal yesterday afternoon, on the grounds that their contracts had been "voided" by the action of the management in withholding their salary checks on Tuesday, the regular pay day. Each man has been fined $10.

Of the remaining three, two were given their checks when they appeared at the hall yesterday, according to report from union headquarters, while the other member received his check on Tuesday. Under the conditions their contracts are not "voided," the union believe.

The new "strike" marks the beginning of a battle to a finish between the management and the union players, it is believed. An exchange of ultimata and preparations for a benefit concert for the "strikers" at the Colonial Theatre Sunday night featured the opening of hostilities yesterday.

Symphony "Strike"

CONCERTS AS USUAL

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA KEEPS TO SCHEDULE

With Forces Diminished by a Third, Mr. Monteux Rehearses a New Programme—No Engagements in Other Cities to Be Cancelled—A Clear Issue Now Joined and, Probably to Be Fought to a Finish—The Boston Quintet Heard at Harvard

POSSIBLY the issue has at last been joined between the members of the Symphony Orchestra who wish to enforce union-rules upon it and the trustees of the band who decline to accept them. If events so prove, it is highly desirable that the quarrel be fought to a finish. More than either side is disposed to believe the events of last Saturday, Sunday and Monday came near to turning the whole controversy into farce. Thirty or forty players refuse to take part in an appointed concert and shout to the heavens that they are done with the orchestra unless the trustees follow their bidding. At the same concert, the spokesman of the trustees addressing the audience, says too much about ideals and too little about the will of the board to withstand pending exactions. So much for Saturday. Through Sunday, bystanders believe the management of the orchestra making ready to adjust it to these new conditions and, so far as possible, to mitigate them; while the "strikers" disport themselves as triumphant rebels. And lo! on Monday morning, every one is rehearsing again as though nothing, or next to nothing, had happened. The net result was more amusement than edification; received impression that the ways of musicians and the employers of musicians are inscrutable; a general disposition to put the whole "fuss" out of mind and out of sympathy.

Now, after an interval of rehearsals and concerts as usual, the "strikers" have "struck" again and fill the air with a passionate "publicity." The ostensible cause of the new "strike" is the fine belatedly levied by the trustees upon the deserters of last Saturday and the requirement that they subscribe to a pledge against a unionized orchestra. Loud also is gabble about "breach of contracts"—incidental but also inevitable pastime in such disputes. Exactly why the malcontents do not quietly leave the orchestra, shut their lips and depart to new jobs (or in quest of them) none may say. For a fortnight they have declared with a loud voice that such jobs were swarming around them. Why not, then, go to them and leave the orchestra in peace? The underlying truth is that these very malcontents, fervid as they are in complaint and recrimination, prefer the Symphony Orchestra to any other—if only they can get their way with it. In the pursuit of that way, no discoverable "rule of reason" governs either their courses or their decisions. They are having their fling—such a fling as in all their lives they have never known before—in the fond delusion that a sympathetic public is interested and impressed. Much more probably it is amused and bored—persuaded for the twentieth time that "temperamental" musicians are beyond human reckoning.

By the same token and in homely word, if, at last, the trustees "mean business," they should do business. If, as their circular letter of yesterday seems to imply, they have set their faces against a unionized orchestra, they should do the best they can with a "non-union" orchestra. If they are resolved to dismiss the "strikers," unless the "strikers" accede thereto, dismiss them and make all possible effort to reconstitute the band. By many a test, the public of the concerts in Boston approves the course of the trustees as seems likely to bear the consequences patiently and sympathetically. Seven pairs of concerts remain to complete the season at home. If only a relatively small orchestra is available for them, Mr. Monteux is surely able to frame his programmes accordingly; while audiences, mindful of imperative conditions, will hardly resent, for the time, such limitations of repertory. Sundry concerts remain also in other cities than Boston. Acquaint the subscribers to them with the circumstances that have diminished the orchestra and restricted the programmes, and in degree, they might be as lenient. Then, with the regular season so carried through, five months of spring and summer would stretch before trustees, management and conductor for the restoration of the orchestra. As it is, it more than suffices for annual "Pops."

Count the malcontents, who may finally depart or may finally be dismissed, as high as they themselves number them. Even so, the abler men in the orchestra are, with few exceptions, still in their places. As yet, no choir but the strings is likely to be gravely depleted, and departures there are easy set to repair. No one may say whether the Symphony Orchestra can be maintained as a non-union orchestra at accustomed standards and with restored prestige, until the effort so to maintain it has been definitely made. No one may say whether malcontents can be replaced until successors have been sought, found or proved unobtainable. If the trustees are as disposed as they now seem to undertake these brave ventures, financial and moral support bids fair to encourage and sustain them—the support that a clear issue, cleanly fought, is almost sure to awaken. If the difficulties are many, resolution and wisdom may well rise accordingly. The subscribers and sustainers of the Symphony Concerts will not willingly see the Symphony Orchestra wrecked. If that untoward fate awaits it, they prefer to see it go down fighting.

Work of the Day

When the orchestra assembled for rehearsal this morning, there were some thirty absentees, in largest part from the string choir. With a band between fifty and sixty strong, at least one item in the programme announced for tomorrow and Saturday became impossible—Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," scored, as it is, for full modern orchestra. Glazunov's sixth symphony, likewise in preparation for the pending concerts, also requires many voices. Accordingly, Mr. Monteux put by both pieces and set to the rehearsal of others, suitable to the number of his forces. Out of these he will make a new programme to be announced later in the day. He will also revise the programmes for the concerts of the orchestra next week in New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and other cities which the orchestra regularly or occasionally visits. Whatever its numbers, it will keep to the letter all these engagements. As for the "strikers," they are less voluble today than they have been of late. The concert with which they were so busy last evening and at which the public was to show its sympathy has receded from Sunday, March 14, to Sunday, March 21. The report that retired members of the orchestra are ready to rejoin it perturbs them. They are not pleased to hear of rehearsals and other preparations for concerts and trips at Symphony Hall. Even their distinguished counsel in various argument against the position of the trustees does not much soothe them. They expected many things to stop. Nothing has, except their jobs and pay.

Americans Who Think—— FRIDAY, MARCH 12, 1920

MORE PLAYERS MAY STRIKE

Symphony Trustees Not to Enlarge Orchestra for Southern Trip

More players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are ready to join the thirty-two "dismissed" members of the organization as a protest against the action of the trustees in withholding salaries and for their opposition to unionism, according to the strikers.

The attendance of more than a dozen of the present players of the orchestra, known as sympathizers with the "dismissed" players, but not members of the musicians' union, at a meeting of the strikers, lends credence to this belief.

All regularly scheduled concerts of the orchestra, including the public rehearsal today, the concert tomorrow night and the Southern tour of the orchestra to begin Sunday night, will be given by the orchestra, according to a statement issued by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees.

The programs in some instances, however, were changed. Today Henrich Gebhard, pianist, played the Greig concerto. A minor instead of Loeffler's pagan poem and Beethoven's Fourth was substituted for the other advertised number.

If women are added to the orchestra they probably will be used to augment the string choir, which the strike has left the weakest department. The trustees, prefer, however, to leave most of the vacancies until the end of the season, May 1, rather than to accept any but first-class musicians, and it is probable that the remaining six pairs of concerts in this city and those to be given on the Southern trip will be performed by a reduced orchestra.

Globe New Jersey

CONCERTS WILL BE GIVEN AS ARRANGED

Some Programs Changed, Judge Cabot Says

Symphony Orchestra "Strikers" Get Proposals for "Pops" Tour

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc, last night issued this statement:

"Because of some inquiries, I wish again to state that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its concerts in Boston and elsewhere as previously arranged. In some instances the program announced will be changed. The Boston program for this Friday and Saturday is as follows:

"Mendelssohn—Selections from the Incidental Music to Shakspere's 'A Midsummer Night's Dream.'

"Greig—Concerto in A minor for pianoforte, op. 16.

"Beethoven—Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, op. 60.

"Soloist—Heinrich Gebhard.

"If I may judge by replies already received to the statement addressed to the supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and by voluntary expressions of interest and indorsement from subscribers to our concerts in New York and Southern cities, also from private individuals, the action taken by the trustees toward those who violated their contracts has met with general approval.

"I greatly regret the recent events, but in view of the conviction of the trustees that the orchestra can best be carried on by members free from obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts, the trustees were not able to take any other position in the matter."

It was charged at the meeting of the striking members of Symphony Orchestra, held at the headquarters of the Boston Musicians' Union, St Botolph and Garrison sts, yesterday afternoon, that players inferior to the men who are on strike are being placed in the vacant chairs. Arthur Berenson, attorney for the strikers, made the assertion, following the reports of men who have been investigating the situation.

The names of the men who have been given new positions were furnished the committee, which was told that a number of the men who did not quit have registered protests. These men, it was said, told strikers that they would not renew their contracts unless the standard of music furnished by this orchestra in the past is maintained.

Up to yesterday afternoon there had been obligated as members of the Boston Musicians' Union 56 players out of the 74 affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians, the international body, there are 32 on strike.

The orchestra is scheduled to appear in Washington Monday night; Baltimore, Tuesday; Philadelphia, Wednesday; New York, Thursday; Brooklyn, Friday; New York, Saturday, and Newark, N J, Sunday.

Proposals have been made to the strikers to travel as an orchestra through New England to give Pop concerts, but no decision has been reached. It was announced that a patron of the orchestra has placed at the disposal of the committee $10,000 for the benefit of the strikers.

The committee, which is arranging for the "All-Star" concert to be staged at the Colonial Theatre a week from next Sunday night for the benefit of the strikers, stated last night that Joseph M. Webber, president of the American Federation of Musicians, has accepted an invitation to attend.

125 Coal Operators and Miners

SYMPHONY LETS ALL STRIKING MUSICIANS GO

Refusal to Quit Union Causes Dismissal of 32 Players

ALL CONCERT DATES WILL BE FILLED

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its concerts in Boston and elsewhere as previously arranged, although 32 of the 90 members of the organization "went on strike" and have been dismissed from further service, according to an announcement made last night by Judge F. P. Cabot, president of the corporation. In some instances, however, the scheduled program will be changed.

...already received," said Judge Cabot, "to the statement addressed to the supporters of the orchestra and by voluntary expressions of interest and endorsement from subscribers to our concerts in New York and southern cities, also from private individuals, the action taken by the trustees toward those who violated their contracts has met with general approval.

"I greatly regret the recent events, but in view of the conviction of the trustees that the orchestra can best be carried on by members free from obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts, the trustees were not able to take any other position in the matter."

(Continued on Page Six, Column 3.)

SYMPHONY LETS STRIKERS GO

(Continued from Page One)

Asked regarding the status of the strikers who refused to sign his declaration against unionization, Judge Cabot replied, tersely, "they are dismissed."

When questioned regarding the possibility of women players being engaged to fill places vacated by the "strikers," he said:

"Undoubtedly there are women musicians in Boston as well qualified as some of the players who were members of the Symphony a week ago. I can see no objection to the engagement of women, provided they have the requisite qualifications. The Cologne Orchestra has had women musicians among its membership for some time. The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a woman harpist for years."

If women are added to the Boston orchestra they probably will be used to augment the string choir, which the strike has left the weakest department. The trustees, prefer, however, to leave most of the vacancies until the end of the season, May 1, rather than to accept any but first-class musicians, and it is probable that the remaining six pairs of concerts in this city and those to be given on the southern trip, beginning next week, will be performed by a reduced orchestra.

Changes in Concerts

Changes in this week's concerts have been made necessary by the fact that with a company of only 50 or 60 it became impossible to render Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," scored for full, modern orchestra, and Glazunov's sixth symphony, which also requires many instruments.

Conductor Monteux's revised program for this afternoon and tomorrow night is as follows:

Mendelssohn—Selections from the incidental music to Shakespeare's "A Mid-summer Night's Dream."
Grieg—Concerto in A minor for Pianoforte, Op. 16.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, Op. 60.
Soloist, Heinrich Gebhard.

Mr. Monteux is revising the program for the concerts of the next fortnight in New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and the other cities to be visited on the spring trip.

While the orchestra management was revising its concert programs, the "strikers" were arranging for a concert to be given by themselves and union sympathizers in the Colonial Theatre a week from next Sunday night, and in various other enterprises in connection with the continuance of their "strike."

It was reported last night that a sympathizer with the "strikers" has made an offer of $10,000 to be used either in support of the players now out or to finance a Pop concert season of their own.

William G. Dodge, chairman of the board of directors of the Boston Musicians' Union, who is handling the controversy for union Symphony players, announced yesterday that Joseph N. Webber, president of the American Federation of Musicians, has accepted an invitation to attend the all-star concert and benefit to be conducted by the "strikers."

In Touch with Actors

The concert is being arranged by Mr. Dodge, who is the originator of the 10-band concerts that are conducted annually in Mechanics building. He has been in touch with the Lambs Club and the Actors' Equity Association, and through these associations a number of prominent stars are to appear at the concert, which will be conducted by Emil Mollenhauer, Boston's noted orchestral conductor.

In addition to the concert by the strikers the program provides for a violin solo by Fredric Fradkin, the dismissed concert master, and a special number by Gustave Hiem, celebrated trumpeter. The "strikers" hope later to develop an organization equal to the Boston Symphony, with several weeks' season in Boston and several on the road.

The Symphony Orchestra will leave Boston at 7:30 Sunday night for its southern tour and will play in Washington, Monday; Baltimore, Tuesday; Philadelphia, Wednesday; New York, Thursday; Brooklyn, Friday; New York, Saturday; Newark, N. J., Sunday, returning to Boston on the following Monday for a rehearsal here March 23.

THE WEATHER

Symphony "Strike"

CONCERTS AS USUAL

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA KEEPS TO SCHEDULE

With Forces Diminished by a Third, Mr. Monteux Rehearses a New Programme—No Engagements in Other Cities to Be Cancelled—A Clear Issue Now Joined and, Probably to Be Fought to a Finish—The Boston Quintet Heard at Harvard

POSSIBLY the issue has at last been joined between the members of the Symphony Orchestra who wish to enforce union-rules upon it and the trustees of the band who decline to accept them. If events so prove, it is highly desirable that the quarrel be fought to a finish. More than either side is disposed to believe the events of last Saturday, Sunday and Monday came near to turning the whole controversy into farce. Thirty or forty players refuse to take part in an unappointed concert and shout to the heavens that they are done with the orchestra unless the trustees follow their bidding. At the same concert, the spokesman of the trustees addressing the audience, says too much about ideals and too little about the will of the board to withstand pending exactions. So much for Saturday. Through Sunday, bystanders believe the management of the orchestra making ready to adjust it to these new conditions and, so far as possible, to mitigate them; while the "strikers" disport themselves as triumphant rebels. And lo! on Monday morning, every one is rehearsing again as though nothing, or next to nothing, had happened. The net result was more amusement than edification; renewed impression that the ways of musicians and the employers of musicians are inscrutable; a general disposition to put the whole "fuss" out of mind and out of sympathy.

Now, after an interval of rehearsals and concerts as usual, the "strikers" have "struck" again and fill the air with a passionate "publicity." The ostensible cause of the new "strike" is the fine belatedly levied by the trustees upon the deserters of last Saturday and the requirement that they subscribe to a pledge against a unionized orchestra. Loud also is gabble about "breach of contracts"—incidental but also inevitable pastime in such disputes. Exactly why the malcontents do not quietly leave the orchestra, shut their lips and depart to new jobs (or in quest of them) none may say. For a fortnight they have declared with a loud voice that such jobs were swarming around them. Why not, then, go to them and leave the orchestra in peace? The underlying truth is that these very malcontents, fervid as they are in complaint and recrimination, prefer the Symphony Orchestra to any other—if only they can get their way with it. In the pursuit of that way, no discoverable "rule of reason" governs either their courses or their decisions. They are having their fling—such a fling as in all their lives they have never known before—in the fond delusion that a sympathetic public is interested and impressed. Much more probably it is amused and bored—persuaded for the twentieth time that "temperamental" musicians are beyond human reckoning.

By the same token and in homely word, if, at last, the trustees "mean business," they should do business. If, as their circular letter of yesterday seems to imply, they have set their faces against a union-ized orchestra, they should do the best they can with a "non-union" orchestra. If they are resolved to dismiss the "strikers," unless the "strikers" accede thereto, dismiss them and make all possible effort to reconstitute the band. By many a test, the public of the concerts in Boston approves the course of the trustees and seems likely to bear the consequences patiently and sympathetically. Seven pairs of concerts remain to complete the season at home. If only a relatively small orchestra is available for them, Mr. Monteux is surely able to frame his programmes accordingly; while audiences, mindful of imperative conditions, will hardly resent, for the time, such limitations of repertory. Sundry concerts remain also in other cities than Boston. Acquaint the subscribers to them with the circumstances that have diminished the orchestra and restricted the programmes, and in degree, they might be as lenient. Then, with the regular season so carried through, five months of spring and summer would stretch before trustees, management and conductor for the restoration of the orchestra. As it is, it more than suffices for annual "Pops."

Count the malcontents, who may finally depart or may finally be dismissed, as high as they themselves number them. Even so, the abler men in the orchestra are, with few exceptions, still in their places. As yet, no choir but the strings is likely to be gravely depleted, and departures there are easy est to repair. No one may say whether the Symphony Orchestra can be maintained as a non-union orchestra at accustomed standards and with restored prestige, until the effort so to maintain it has been definitely made. No one may say whether malcontents can be replaced until successors have been sought, found or proved unobtainable. If the trustees are as disposed as they now seem to undertake these brave ventures, financial and moral support bids fair to encourage and sustain them—the support that a clear issue, cleanly fought, is almost sure to awaken. If the difficulties are many, resolution and wisdom may well rise accordingly. The subscribers and sustainers of the Symphony Concerts will not willingly see the Symphony Orchestra wrecked If that untoward fate awaits it, they prefer to see it go down fighting.

Work of the Day

When the orchestra assembled for rehearsal this morning, there were some thirty absentees, in largest part from the string choir. With a band between fifty and sixty strong, at least one item in the programme announced for tomorrow and Saturday became impossible—Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," scored, as it is, for full modern orchestra. Glazunov's sixth symphony, likewise in preparation for the pending concerts, also requires many voices. Accordingly, Mr. Monteux put by both pieces and set to the rehearsal of others, suitable to the number of his forces. Out of these he will make a new programme to be announced later in the day. He will also revise the programmes for the concerts of the orchestra next week in New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and other cities which the orchestra regularly or occasionally visits. Whatever its numbers, it will keep to the letter all these engagements. As for the "strikers," they are less voluble today than they have been of late. The concert with which they were so busy last evening and at which the public was to show its sympathy has receded from Sunday, March 14, to Sunday, March 21. The report that retired members of the orchestra are ready to rejoin it perturbs them. They are not pleased to hear of rehearsals and other preparations for concerts and trips at Symphony Hall. Even their distinguished counsel in various argument against the position of the trustees does not much soothe them. They expected many things to stop. Nothing has, except their jobs and pay.

Who Think—FRIDAY,

MORE PLAYERS MAY STRIKE

Symphony Trustees Not to Enlarge Orchestra for Southern Trip

More players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are ready to join the thirty-two "dismissed" members of the organization as a protest against the action of the trustees in withholding salaries and for their opposition to unionism, according to the strikers.

The attendance of more than a dozen of the present players of the orchestra, known as sympathizers with the "dismissed" players, but not members of the musicians' union, at a meeting of the strikers, lends credence to this belief.

All regularly scheduled concerts of the orchestra, including the public rehearsal today, the concert tomorrow night and the Southern tour of the orchestra to begin Sunday night, will be given by the orchestra, according to a statement issued by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees.

The programs in some instances, however, were changed. Today Henrich Gebhard, pianist, played the Greig concerto. A minor instead of Loeffler's pagan poem and Beethoven's Fourth was substituted for the other advertised number.

If women are added to the orchestra they probably will be used to augment the string choir, which the strike has left the weakest department. The trustees, prefer, however, to leave most of the vacancies until the end of the season, May 1, rather than to accept any but first-class musicians, and it is probable that the remaining six pairs of concerts in this city and those to be given on the Southern trip will be performed by a reduced orchestra.

MARCH 12, 1920

New Jers

CONCERTS WILL BE GIVEN AS ARRANGED

Some Programs Changed, Judge Cabot Says

Symphony Orchestra "Strikers" Get Proposals for "Pops" Tour

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc, last night issued this statement:

"Because of some inquiries, I wish again to state that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its concerts in Boston and elsewhere as previously arranged. In some instances the program announced will be changed. The Boston program for this Friday and Saturday is as follows:

"Mendelssohn—Selections from the Incidental Music to Shakspere's 'A Midsummer Night's Dream.'

"Greig—Concerto in A minor for pianoforte, op. 16.

"Beethoven—Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, op. 60.

"Soloist—Heinrich Gebhard.

"If I may judge by replies already received to the statement addressed to the supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and by voluntary expressions of interest and indorsement from subscribers to our concerts in New York and Southern cities, also from private individuals, the action taken by the trustees toward those who violated their contracts has met with general approval.

"I greatly regret the recent events, but in view of the conviction of the trustees that the orchestra can best be carried on by members free from obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts, the trustees were not able to take any other position in the matter."

It was charged at the meeting of the striking members of Symphony Orchestra, held at the headquarters of the Boston Musicians' Union, St Botolph and Garrison sts, yesterday afternoon, that players inferior to the men who are on strike are being placed in the vacant chairs. Arthur Berenson, attorney for the strikers, made the assertion, following the reports of men who have been investigating the situation.

The names of the men who have been given new positions were furnished the committee, which was told that a number of the men who did not quit have registered protests. These men, it was said, told strikers that they would not renew their contracts unless the standard of music furnished by this orchestra in the past is maintained.

Up to yesterday afternoon there had been obligated as members of the Boston Musicians' Union 56 players out of the 74 affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians, the international body, there are 32 on strike.

The orchestra is scheduled to appear in Washington Monday night; Baltimore, Tuesday; Philadelphia, Wednesday; New York, Thursday; Brooklyn, Friday; New York, Saturday, and Newark, N J, Sunday.

Proposals have been made to the strikers to travel as an orchestra through New England to give Pop concerts, but no decision has been reached. It was announced that a patron of the orchestra has placed at the disposal of the committee $10,000 for the benefit of the strikers.

The committee, which is arranging for the "All-Star" concert to be staged at the Colonial Theatre a week from next Sunday night for the benefit of the strikers, stated last night that Joseph M. Webber, president of the American Federation of Musicians, has accepted an invitation to attend.

125 Coal Operators and Miners

SYMPHONY LETS ALL STRIKING MUSICIANS GO

Refusal to Quit Union Causes Dismissal of 32 Players

ALL CONCERT DATES WILL BE FILLED

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its concerts in Boston and elsewhere as previously arranged, although 32 of the 90 members of the organization "went on strike" and have been dismissed from further service, according to an announcement made last night by Judge F. P. Cabot, president of the corporation. In some instances, however, the scheduled program will be changed.

...by the replies already received," said Judge Cabot, "to the statement addressed to the supporters of the orchestra and by voluntary expressions of interest and endorsement from subscribers to our concerts in New York and southern cities, also from private individuals, the action taken by the trustees toward those who violated their contracts has met with general approval.

"I greatly regret the recent events, but in view of the conviction of the trustees that the orchestra can best be carried on by members free from obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts, the trustees were not able to take any other position in the matter."

(Continued on Page Six, Column 3.)

SYMPHONY LETS STRIKERS GO

(Continued from Page One)

Asked regarding the status of the strikers who refused to sign his declaration against unionization, Judge Cabot replied, tersely, "they are dismissed."

When questioned regarding the possibility of women players being engaged to fill places vacated by the "strikers," he said:

"Undoubtedly there are women musicians in Boston as well qualified as some of the players who were members of the Symphony a week ago. I can see no objection to the engagement of women, provided they have the requisite qualifications. The Cologne Orchestra has had women musicians among its membership for some time. The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a woman harpist for years."

If women are added to the Boston orchestra they probably will be used to augment the string choir, which the strike has left the weakest department. The trustees, prefer, however, to leave most of the vacancies until the end of the season, May 1, rather than to accept any but first-class musicians, and it is probable that the remaining six pairs of concerts in this city and those to be given on the southern trip, beginning next week, will be performed by a reduced orchestra.

Changes in Concerts

Changes in this week's concerts have been made necessary by the fact that with a company of only 50 or 60 it became impossible to render Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," scored for full, modern orchestra, and Glazunov's sixth symphony, which also requires many instruments.

Conductor Monteux's revised program for this afternoon and tomorrow night is as follows:

Mendelssohn—Selections from the incidental music to Shakespeare's "A Mid-summer Night's Dream."
Grieg—Concerto in A minor for Pianoforte, Op. 16.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, Op. 60.
Soloist, Heinrich Gebhard.

Mr. Monteux is revising the program for the concerts of the next fortnight in New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and the other cities to be visited on the spring trip.

While the orchestra management was revising its concert programs, the "strikers" were arranging for a concert to be given by themselves and union sympathizers in the Colonial Theatre a week from next Sunday night, and in various other enterprises in connection with the continuance of their "strike."

It was reported last night that a sympathizer with the "strikers" has made an offer of $10,000 to be used either in support of the players now out or to finance a Pop concert season of their own.

William G. Dodge, chairman of the board of directors of the Boston Musicians' Union, who is handling the controversy for union Symphony players, announced yesterday that Joseph N. Webber, president of the American Federation of Musicians, has accepted an invitation to attend the all-star concert and benefit to be conducted by the "strikers."

In Touch with Actors

The concert is being arranged by Mr. Dodge, who is the originator of the 10-band concerts that are conducted annually in Mechanics building. He has been in touch with the Lambs Club and the Actors' Equity Association, and through these associations a number of prominent stars are to appear at the concert, which will be conducted by Emil Mollenhauer, Boston's noted orchestral conductor.

In addition to the concert by the strikers the program provides for a violin solo by Fredric Fradkin, the dismissed concert master, and a special number by Gustave Hiem, celebrated trumpeter. The "strikers" hope later to develop an organization equal to the Boston Symphony, with several weeks' season in Boston and several on the road.

The Symphony Orchestra will leave Boston at 7:30 Sunday night for its southern tour and will play in Washington, Monday; Baltimore, Tuesday; Philadelphia, Wednesday; New York, Thursday; Brooklyn, Friday; New York, Saturday; Newark, N. J., Sunday, returning to Boston on the following Monday for a rehearsal here March 23.

THE WEATHER

THE POLICE BAR SYMPHONY STRIKERS

The Boston Globe

NIGHT LATEST STOCKS

BOSTON, FRIDAY, MARCH 12, 1920.

ESTABLISHED 1825—95TH YEAR—NO. 263.

SATURDAY CLOUDY
Rain tonight, cloudy, colder; west winds.
Sunrise 6:01; sunset 5:48.
High tide 4:30 A. M., 5:01 P. M.
All vehicles must be lighted by 6:18 P. M.

PICKETS AT STAGE DOOR "MOVED ON"

Discharged Symphony Men Dispersed by Police at Hall

CONTINUE PLEAS AT A DISTANCE

Dismissed players of the Boston Symphony orchestra were barred by the police from picketing the stage entrance to Symphony Hall at rehearsal this afternoon. Six pickets gathered, but were unceremoniously moved on by half a dozen patrolmen.

The pickets then divided into groups of twos, and met the musicians as they approached the hall.

The pickets were selected from the 32 players who refused to play when their pay checks were held up by the Symphony Orchestra trustees.

More Union Men May Quit Boston Symphony

Financial Assistance Offered Strikers by Woman

Eight policemen tsationed at the main entrances to Symphony Hall this afternoon stopped the striking players from doing picket duty. When the discharged players sought to induce their former associates to join them in the walkout, they were told to "move on."

That a wealthy Back Bay woman has offered $10,000 to be used either in support of the Symphony players who quit the orchestra or to finance a Pop concert season of their own became known today. The announcement was made at a meeting of the men.

The woman has been a patron of Symphony concerts for many years and has declared herself a "sympathizer with the men." Her name was not made public.

Personal interviews with the men who have left the orchestra are being sought by the management. Already several of the artists have been visited at their homes and urged to reconsider their action. The men absolutely refuse to listen to the trustees' representatives.

Receive Good Offers

One of the players who was visited by the management's envoy not only refused to go back to the orchestra, but flashed two telegrams. One was an offer of $100 a week, the other an offer of $125 a week, both in Symphony Orchestras. This particular musician was receiving $55 a week here when he walked out.

Union officials declared that more of the union men, still in the orchestra, were to quit today, including some of the "first chair" men. Committees have seen these men personally and "worked on them" for hours.

(Continued on Page Two, Column Two)

Woman Offers $10,000 To Aid Symphony Players

(Continued from Page One)

The union men who have left the orchestra are speculating as to this afternoon's public rehearsal. With 32 of the best men out of the orchestra, they are inclined to believe that the patrons will object. As one musician put it: "I can't see but what it will be a concert of 'hash' music."

This player stated that the cymbal player of the percussion section was now playing the viola. The librarian of the orchestra has also been put in the viola section, while the contrabassoons were playing the tubas.

To Tour South

According to an announcement made last night by Judge Cabot, president of the trustees, the Southern trip will be taken and today's public rehearsal held. In speaking of the entire situation he said:—

ready received to the statement addressed to the supporters of the orchestra and by voluntary expressions of interest and endorsement from subscribers to our concerts in New York and Southern cities, also from private individuals, the action taken by the trustees toward those who violated their contracts has met with general approval."

May Have Women

When questioned regarding the possibility of women players being engaged to fill places vacated by the "strikers," he said:—

"Undoubtedly there are women musicians in Boston as well qualified as some of the players who were members of the Symphony a week ago. I can see no objection to the engagement of women, provided they have the requisite qualifications. The Cologne Orchestra has had women musicians among its membership for some time. The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a woman harpist for years."

If women are added to the Boston orchestra they probably will be used to augment the string choir, which the strike has left the weakest department. The trustees prefer, however, to leave most of the vacancies until the end of the season, May 1, rather than to accept any but first-class musicians, and it is probable that the remaining six pairs of concerts in this city and those to be given on the Southern trip, beginning next week, will be performed by a reduced orchestra.

Changes Necessary

Changes in this week's concerts have been made necessary by the fact that with a company of only 50 or 60 it became impossible to render Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," scored for full, modern orchestra, and Glazunov's sixth symphony, which also requires many instruments.

Conductor Monteux's revised program for this afternoon and tomorrow night is as follows:—

Mendelssohn—Selection from the incidental music to Shakespeare's "A Mid-summer Night's Dream."
Grieg—Concerto in A minor for Pianoforte, Op. 16.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, Op. 60.
Soloist, Heinrich Gebhard.

Mr. Monteux is revising the program for the concerts of the next fortnight in New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and the other cities to be visited on the spring trip.

While the orchestra management was revising its concert programs, the "strikers" were arranging for a concert to be given by themselves and union sympathizers in the Colonial Theatre a week from next Sunday night, and in various other enterprises in connection with the continuance of their "strike."

Noted Stars to Aid

The concert is being arranged by Mr. Dodge, who is the originator of the 10-band concerts that are conducted annually in Mechanics Building. He has been in touch with the Lambs Club and the Actors' Equity Assn., and through these associations a number of prominent stars are to appear at the concert, which will be conducted by Emil Mollenhauer, Boston's noted orchestral conductor.

In addition to the concert by the strikers the program provides for a violin solo by Frederic Fradkin, the dismissed concert master, and a special number by Gustave Hiem, celebrated trumpeter. The "strikers" hope later to develop an organization equal to the Boston Symphony, with several weeks' season in Boston and several on the road.

The Symphony Orchestra will leave Boston at 7.30 Sunday night for its Southern tour and will play in Washington, Monday; Baltimore, Tuesday; Philadelphia, Wednesday; New York, Thursday; Brooklyn, Friday; New York, Saturday; Newark, N. J., Sunday, returning to Boston on the following Monday for a rehearsal here March 23.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

The Symphony Orchestra Works—The "Strikers" Talk—Concerts Next Week—Miss Novaes in Recital of Her Own—Programmes in Prospect—Yvette Guilbert to Return—The Duncan Dancers Come

THERE is nothing material to record today about the "strike" of thirty-two members of the Symphony Orchestra. Late members they may be more truly called since the formalities dismissing them have now been completed. At Symphony Hall the work of the orchestra goes forward and the schedule of concerts will be fulfilled to the letter. A band of sixty-odd men is at Mr. Monteux's disposal, and he readily adapts his programmes to such forces. As opportunity offers with men of sufficient ability, the vacant chairs will be filled; but not until next autumn is the orchestra likely to be wholly reconstituted. For the concerts of today and tomorrow Mr. Monteux has set a programme that at any other time would seem quite normal—excerpts from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Grieg's concerto for piano and orchestra with Mr. Gebhard playing the solo part and Beethoven's fourth symphony. For the next pair of concerts in Boston on March 26 and 27, he proposes Dvorák's symphony, "From the New World," Debussy's "Little Suite," the prelude to Wagner's opera, "Lohengrin," and the familiar fragment from the "Forest Scene" in Wagner's "Siegfried." As for the "strikers," they are busy with the usual voluble defence of their own position, the usual attacks upon the position of the trustees, threats to win more players from the orchestra and plans for concerts of their own to which they believe sympathizers will flock. As yet they have taken no steps toward the litigation they loudly proposed nor are they seeking the new jobs which they declared were in waiting for them. So the contest—if contest it can now be called—rests.

Concerts Next Week

ceased" son is very much alive and at present living in California.

GUSTAV HEIM TO LEAVE HUB FOR DETROIT BERTH

Gustav Heim, reputed to be the world's best trumpeter, and since 1906 a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today telegraphed his acceptance of a union contract next season with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Heim came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the same time Dr. Karl Muck took his place as its conductor. He will receive a considerable increase in salary under his contract with the Detroit organization.

Mr. Heim will, however, play on a contemplated New England tour with the other 31 members of the orchestra who in common with him quit work because the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra held up their pay checks.

LECTURE ON IRELAND

American Mar. 12

BIG OVATION GREETS "LOYAL" SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Lively action, both within and without Symphony Hall, with pickets at the stage entrance, and stately Back Bay patrons splitting their gloves in wild applause for every player as he appeared upon the stage, today marked the eighteenth public rehearsal of the orchestra.

About half a dozen "strikers," members of the Boston Musicians' Union, were at the stage entrance, moving about, according to orders of the police.

As each loyal member took his place upon the stage, he was given a personal salvo of applause. When Conductor Pierre Monteux appeared the entire audience arose, and the applause broke all bounds.

The concert was given with about sixty-five players, instead of the 100 usually employed. The weakest spots were in the strings.

APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Slips inserted in the program contained an appeal from the management to patrons for immediate subscriptions to the endowment fund of the orchestra. This is construed as evidence that the trustees intend to raise the salaries of the loyal players.

From an authoritative source it was learned that no animus existed against the "striking" players. It was stated that any good player who applied for re-entrance on the management's terms would be taken back.

The personnel of the orchestra today contained about half a dozen former members, who had temporarily severed their connection with the organization. Immediately after the concert a rehearsal was held, with additional newly-recruited members, in preparation for the forthcoming Southern tour. The orchestra will make this tour with about eighty players.

TO REMAIN SMALLER.

In reply to charges by the "strikers" that the trustees were "approaching" former members who had been discharged for inefficiency, a representative of the management said today that this was not the case. He said that while certain former members were being recruited, the trustees preferred to maintain a smaller orchestra rather than admit any players not capable of maintaining the high standard which has made the fame of the Boston organization worldwide.

Two meetings were held by the thirty-two union members who have withdrawn from the orchestra to discuss plans for a tour.

Today Mar 12

ORCHESTRA LETS ITS STRIKERS GO

Monitor

Boston Symphony Dismisses 32 Men Who Do Not Subscribe to Non-Union Position—Endowment to Raise Salaries

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—Thirty-two of the 35 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who struck and refused to play at the concert of last Saturday evening have been dismissed from the orchestra as the result of their refusal to subscribe to the non-union position taken by the trustees of the orchestra. The trustees consider that they have won their fight to maintain the organization on a basis of artistic standards, which they consider the unionization of the body would not allow.

They announce that the concerts will go on as scheduled and they are starting immediately to gather an endowment fund of at least $3,000,000 so that the salaries of the players may be raised as soon as possible. In the program books at the concert today will be slips with a subscription blank offering opportunity to the subscribers to attest in tangible form their support of the trustees in meeting the present crisis of the orchestra.

Most of the men dismissed are from the string section and while their going will necessitate some rearranging of programs the management announces that their places are already being filled and that in a few weeks the ranks will be intact again. Some of the former members of the orchestra are coming back and there have been applications from other players who are having their trials as rapidly as can be arranged. The management states that it will not be necessary to call on women players to fill the ranks, a possibility which had been rumored.

The plans of the dismissed musicians are indefinite. They are members of the Boston local of the American Federation of Musicians, the Musical Protective Association, and a benefit concert is to be arranged for them Sunday, March 21. There is talk of a tour of New England by these musicians, headed by Frederic Fradkin, the concert master who was dismissed for a breach of discipline and in sympathy with whom they struck. Arthur Berenson, the attorney for the men, states that their absence from the ranks will put the orchestra in an embarrassing position, because it cannot hire men from any other orchestra in the country, for all are unionized, and that it cannot recruit players from Europe because the Secretary of Labor has ruled that musician immigrants come under the head of contract Labor and thus are barred from the country.

Joseph N. Weber's Views

President of American Federation of Musicians Interviewed

Special to The Christian Science Monitor from its Eastern News Office

NEW YORK, New York—"In former years," said Joseph N. Weber, president of the American Federation of Musicians, "we tried to unionize the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and although we failed, we did succeed in compelling the management of the organization to give the members better pay. The management, I am sure, would have been glad to put an end to our activities and to us, too. But we survived; and more than that, we indirectly brought about improved economic conditions for the men."

Mr. Weber was talking to a representative of The Christian Science Monitor who called at his office to inquire whether the federation was likely to grant different terms to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in case it should unionize now, than it permits to other orchestras.

"We never would agree to different terms," said he, "in the days when we ourselves were trying to unionize that group. And certainly we shall not agree to different terms when that group is asking us to let it enter the union fold. We are 95,000 musicians and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is about 100. I do not believe we are going to alter the basis upon which we stand for the sake of that number of recruits.

"That basis, as I remember having told you before, is this:

"Every union orchestra in the United States must be an American orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has always been a foreign orchestra, bringing in new members, whenever there were places to be filled, from Europe, and ignoring the trained American musicians who were at hand waiting for a chance. Allow me, please, to recall what used to happen when all the orchestras in the United States were recruited freely from across the water. The conductor, himself invariably a European, would go home in the summertime, taking a trip at the expense of his institution, gather up as many men as he wanted, and bring them to America. After a while, a large number of these men were found unsatisfactory, and they were thrown upon us to look out for. Then the conductor would go to Europe and bring in another batch.

"In the last 16 years we have put a stop to all that. And we do not intend to do anything to permit such conditions to return. But bear in mind that we are perfectly willing for any European musician who desires to come to the United States and make his living, provided he is willing to become an American citizen. What we object to is the man who is engaged to come from Europe at the request of an orchestra manager and who is allowed to compete against American musicians while retaining his foreign citizenship.

"I do not mean by saying this that we are hostile to musicians in other countries. On the contrary, we are friendly with them and cooperate with them. To illustrate my point, there was an American opera company some years ago that went to Paris to give a season of performances. The plan at first was that this company should take along an American orchestra. But the musicians of Paris objected, saying that they were competent to play in any productions of opera that were staged in Paris, and that they, rather than musicians from America, should be employed. We immediately assented, and the American orchestral players stayed at home."

Mr. Weber stated that early last season about 25 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra resigned, and that their places were taken in considerable measure by players who came to the United States with a French band. He said that in the course of the present movement of the Boston Symphony men toward the federation, 50 had taken out union memberships. Finally he spoke of artistic standards; for the argument has been made that union standards are inferior to non-union ones. "The time has gone by," he remarked, "when the Boston Symphony Orchestra is looked up to as the leading organization of its kind in the United States. And answer this question, if you please: What has done more in this country for the cause of music, the American Federation of Musicians or the Boston Symphony Orchestra?"

STAGE HANDS BACK SYMPHONY STRIKERS

Eve Globe

EFFORT TO BLOCK PROPOSED CONCERTS

Appeal Sent Out to the Theatrical Unions

Mar 12

The strike of the 32 union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was unanimously indorsed at a special meeting of the executive board of Local 11, International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employes, at its headquarters, Tremont and Hollis sts, at noon today.

The indorsement followed a visit of a deputation from the strikers seeking assistance for the concert in the Colonial Theatre a week from next Sunday night. The request of the committee was granted and it was voted to give all assistance possible to the strikers.

While no official action was taken by the I. A. T. S. E. Union, it is understood that William G. Dodge, personal representative of Pres Webber of the American Federation of Musicians, in charge of the strike, will take action this afternoon to block the plans of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in regard to the Southern tour to open in Washington next Monday night.

Nobody connected with the strike committee would make a statement for publication, but it has been learned that an appeal will be sent to Pres Webber this afternoon, requesting him to take up the situation with the affiliated theatrical unions, which control the theatres in which the Symphony concerts are scheduled, for the purpose of having no assistance given nonunion musicians during such concerts.

What will be the outcome of this request is not known, but the aim is to disarrange the plans of Judge Cabot and the management of the orchestra.

During the morning a number of interviews were held by representatives of the strikers with members of the union still playing in the orchestra, to whom it was pointed out that "better positions" are awaiting every member of the orchestra who is in the union.

When the regular concert began this afternoon, the strikers started their meeting at the headquarters of the union, St Botolph and Garrison sts.

SYMPHONY SEEKING $3,000,000 FUND

Globe Mar 13

Endowment Is Needed to Meet Expenditures

Deficit Faced Annually, That for 1919 Being $100,000

The programs at yesterday's Symphony concert made the first definite announcement of a campaign to raise a permanent endowment fund for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The amount set as a goal by the trustees is "at least three millions," although $2,000,000 is the largest sum previously mentioned tentatively by them as possible.

If this great fund can be raised it should prove possible in future to pay members of the Boston Symphony higher salaries than those given anywhere else in the world. On the success or failure of the endeavor depends the future standing of the orchestra.

There has always been a deficit at the end of each season. According to the official "Historical Sketch of the Symphony Orchestra," published in 1914, the annual deficits from the beginning to that time had totaled about $900,000 and averaged $20,000 per season. Until Maj Higginson relinquished control in May, 1918, he paid the bill out of his own pocket.

Since that time the present board of trustees, with the aid, it is said, of a few others, have had to meet deficits larger than ever before. The total deficit for last season, according to Judge Cabot, the chairman, was nearly $100,000. Unless a permanent fund is raised there will always be danger of private generosity finding the burden too great to bear.

The appeal from trustees to subscribers follows:

"Symphony Hall, March 12, 1920.

"To the Subscribers to the Boston Symphony Concerts—Many friends of the Symphony Orchestra have requested an immediate opportunity to testify to their interest in securing its future through a permanently endowed foundation. This attitude means only one thing, that these great audiences realize all that this orchestra has signified. From its inception under Maj Higginson it has brought beauty into the lives of our citizens and distinction to our city. The spontaneous desire to help should not be held back to perfect the detailed plan for raising an endowment fund of at least $3,000,000; and accordingly the trustees will gladly receive at once subscriptions and pledges from all those who believe in the vital importance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to our community and country.

"There is annexed a subscription blank which may be signed and left at the box office or mailed to the treasurer at Symphony Hall.

"Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc."

$3,000,000 IS GOAL OF DRIVE BY SYMPHONY

Globe Mar 13

40 More Union Players May Be Ordered to Quit Today

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today launched a campaign to raise a $3,000,000 endowment fund.

Announcement of their decision became known yesterday when patrons attending the concert found a slip in the program containing plans for the drive.

Officials announced that if the drive proved successful it would be possible for the trustees to pay the artists higher than any other [illegible] players in the world.

On the success or failure of this plan depends the future of the Boston organization, they claim.

In view of the present controversy between the management and the artists, the announcement caused much comment.

40 More May Quit Today

Orders, calling out 40 more of the Symphony players were expected to be issued today with the arrival in Boston of Joseph Webber, president of the American Federation of Musicians.

Such action will be taken on the ground that the management is now employing strikebreakers, it is said. The 40 men are union members. They did not walk out with the 32 men on Saturday.

William G. Dodge, chairman of the Boston Musicians' Union, has taken the matter up with the executive head of the federation, which represents more than 90,000 union musicians in this country and Canada.

Leaders of the strikers will claim that conditions have changed since the strike began, when it was agreed that all federation members would be allowed to complete present contracts undisturbed, and that the 40 members are now working with strikebreakers. An effort will also be made to have Mr. Webber exert his influence with the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employes and the Equity Association in this and other cities, to withdraw their members from any theatre or hall booking the present Boston Symphony Orchestra, which starts this week on its southern tour.

Mar 19

Request

MUSIC DEALERS OFFER TO AID NEW ORCHESTRA

A number of Boston music merchants, fearful lest the disruption of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will place this city behind others in the musical field, have come forward with a new offer to support an orchestra with the present strikers as the nucleus, according to union members.

MUSICIANS' UNION HEAD TO ACT IN BOSTON STRIKE

Joseph N. Webber, international president of the American Federation of Musicians, is expected to arrive in Boston this morning to take charge of the strike of the 32 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and to consider the status of the members of the union who are still playing in the orchestra.

Pres Webber will be asked to order the union men out on the ground that the management of the orchestra is filling the places of the 32 men on strike. Pressure brought on William G. Dodge, representative of the international union, by the strikers, resulted in a call for Pres Webber.

Considerable doubt exists as to the attitude of Pres Webber because he is on record as opposed to ordering out these men, on the ground that when they joined the union, it was on the promise that they would fulfill their contracts while the conditions remained unchanged.

Pres Webber will also be asked to request Pres Shea of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employes, to pull his men from the theatres at which the Symphony concerts are booked on the Southern tour, so as to prevent the concerts being given.

After the concert and rehearsal which followed, yesterday afternoon, 10 of the men who played appeared at the meeting of the strikers at the union headquarters.

During the meeting, it was said that a Back Bay woman, who has been a subscriber to the Symphony Concerts for many years, addressed the men, praised their stand and said she had notified the management to cancel her subscription. The name of the woman was not made public.

Fredric Fradkin, the dismissed concert-master, has received a letter from the Harvard Musical Association, notifying him that the engagement he had to play with that organization, has been canceled. In the letter was a check for the amount that he was to be paid for his services.

Mr Fradkin and Arthur Berenson, attorney for the union players, accepted an invitation to address an open forum meeting at the Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Wednesday night, on the situation now existing in the orchestra.

Globe Mar 13

SIX NEW MEN FOR SYMPHONY

Double Basses Refuse to Post Strike

It developed last night that six additional members have been added to the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 24 applicants who have thus far applied for positions in that body and been examined by Mr. Monteux. These men will go with the orchestra on tour. Last night, though the Musical Union had prophesied that the double bass of the orchestra would be absent, the same number of men who had played on Friday afternoon appeared on the stage, and again, as on Friday afternoon, these men were applauded by the audience as they appeared to take their accustomed seats in the orchestra.

At a meeting of the union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra following last night's concert Pres[ident] Joseph M. Webber of the American Federation of Musicians announced that he will not order any of the 40 other men of the orchestra to go on strike. He explained that it was definitely agreed that the union would in no manner interfere with the contract of any individual to play in the orchestra.

STAGE HANDS BACK SYMPHONY STRIKERS

BIG OVATION GREETS "LOYAL" SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Lively action, both within and without Symphony Hall, with pickets at the stage entrance, and stately Back Bay patrons splitting their gloves in wild applause for every player as he appeared upon the stage, today marked the eighteenth public rehearsal of the orchestra.

About half a dozen "strikers," members of the Boston Musicians' Union, were at the stage entrance, marching about, according to orders of the police.

As each loyal member took his place upon the stage, he was given a generous salvo of applause. When conductor Pierre Monteux appeared the audience arose, and the applause broke all bounds.

The concert was given with about sixty-five players, instead of the 100 usually employed. The weakest spots were in the strings.

APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

[illegible] to the program contained [illegible] from the manager[illegible] for immediate subscriptions to the endowment fund of [illegible]. This is construed as evidence that the trustees intend to [illegible] of the loyal players. [illegible] source it was [illegible] animus existed [illegible] "striking" players. It [illegible] any good player who [illegible] entrance on the man[illegible] would be taken back.

The personnel of the orchestra today contained about half a dozen former members, who had temporarily severed their connection with the organization. Immediately after the concert a rehearsal was held, with additional newly-recruited members, in preparation for the forthcoming Southern tour. The orchestra will make this tour with about eighty players.

TO REMAIN SMALLER.

In reply to charges by the "strikers" that the trustees were "approaching" former members who had been discharged for inefficiency, a representative of the management said today that this was not the case. He said that while certain former members were being recruited, the trustees preferred to maintain a smaller orchestra rather than admit any players not capable of maintaining the high standard which has made the fame of the Boston organization worldwide.

Two meetings were held by the thirty-two union members who have withdrawn from the orchestra to discuss plans for a tour.

ORCHESTRA LETS ITS STRIKERS GO

Boston Symphony Dismisses 32 Men Who Do Not Subscribe to Non-Union Position—Endowment to Raise Salaries

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—Thirty-two of the 35 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who struck and refused to play at the concert of last Saturday evening have been dismissed from the orchestra as the result of their refusal to subscribe to the non-union position taken by the trustees of the orchestra. The trustees consider that they have won their fight to maintain the organization on a basis of artistic standards, which they consider the unionization of the body would not allow.

They announce that the concerts will go on as scheduled and they are starting immediately to gather an endowment fund of at least $3,000,000 so that the salaries of the players may be raised as soon as possible. In the program books at the concert today will be slips with a subscription blank offering opportunity to the subscribers to attest in tangible form their support of the trustees in meeting the present crisis of the orchestra.

Most of the men dismissed are from the string section and while their going will necessitate some rearranging of programs the management announces that their places are already being filled and that in a few weeks the ranks will be intact again. Some of the former members of the orchestra are coming back and there have been applications from other players who are having their trials as rapidly as can be arranged. The management states that it will not be necessary to call on women players to fill the ranks, a possibility which had been rumored.

The plans of the dismissed musicians are indefinite. They are members of the Boston local of the American Federation of Musicians, the Musical Protective Association, and a benefit concert is to be arranged for them Sunday, March 21. There is talk of a tour of New England by these musicians, headed by Frederic Fradkin, the concert master who was dismissed for a breach of discipline and in sympathy with whom they struck. Arthur Berenson, the attorney for the men, states that their absence from the ranks will put the orchestra in an embarrassing position, because it cannot hire men from any other orchestra in the country, for all are unionized, and that it cannot recruit players from Europe because the Secretary of Labor has ruled that musician immigrants come under the head of contract Labor and thus are barred from the country.

Joseph N. Weber's Views

President of American Federation of Musicians Interviewed

Special to The Christian Science Monitor from its Eastern News Office

NEW YORK, New York—"In former years," said Joseph N. Weber, president of the American Federation of Musicians, "we tried to unionize the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and although we failed, we did succeed in compelling the management of the organization to give the members better pay. The management, I am sure, would have been glad to put an end to our activities and to us, too. But we survived; and more than that, we indirectly brought about improved economic conditions for the men."

Mr. Weber was talking to a representative of The Christian Science Monitor who called at his office to inquire whether the federation was likely to grant different terms to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in case it should unionize now, than it permits to other orchestras.

"We never would agree to different terms," said he, "in the days when we ourselves were trying to unionize that group. And certainly we shall not agree to different terms when that group is asking us to let it enter the union fold. We are 95,000 musicians and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is about 100. I do not believe we are going to alter the basis upon which we stand for the sake of that number of recruits.

"That basis, as I remember having told you before, is this:

"Every union orchestra in the United States must be an American orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has always been a foreign orchestra, bringing in new members, whenever there were places to be filled, from Europe, and ignoring the trained American musicians who were at hand waiting for a chance. Allow me, please, to recall what used to happen when all the orchestras in the United States were recruited freely from across the water. The conductor, himself invariably a European, would go home in the summertime, taking a trip at the expense of his institution, gather up as many men as he wanted, and bring them to America. After a while, a large number of these men were found unsatisfactory, and they were thrown upon us to look out for. Then the conductor would go to Europe and bring in another batch.

"In the last 16 years we have put a stop to all that. And we do not intend to do anything to permit such conditions to return. But bear in mind that we are perfectly willing for any European musician who desires to come to the United States and make his living, provided he is willing to become an American citizen. What we object to is the man who is engaged to come from Europe at the request of an orchestra manager and who is allowed to compete against American musicians while retaining his foreign citizenship.

"I do not mean by saying this that we are hostile to musicians in other countries. On the contrary, we are friendly with them and cooperate with them. To illustrate my point, there was an American opera company some years ago that went to Paris to give a season of performances. The plan at first was that this company should take along an American orchestra. But the musicians of Paris objected, saying that they were competent to play in any productions of opera that were staged in Paris, and that they, rather than musicians from America, should be employed. We immediately assented, and the American orchestral players stayed at home."

Mr. Weber stated that early last season about 25 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra resigned, and that their places were taken in considerable measure by players who came to the United States with a French band. He said that in the course of the present movement of the Boston Symphony men toward the federation, 50 had taken out union memberships. Finally he spoke of artistic standards; for the argument has been made that union standards are inferior to non-union ones. "The time has gone by," he remarked, "when the Boston Symphony Orchestra is looked up to as the leading organization of its kind in the United States. And answer this question, if you please: What has done more in this country for the cause of music, the American Federation of Musicians or the Boston Symphony Orchestra?"

EFFORT TO BLOCK PROPOSED CONCERTS

Appeal Sent Out to the Theatrical Unions

The strike of the 32 union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was unanimously indorsed at a special meeting of the executive board of Local 11, International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employes, at its headquarters, Tremont and Hollis sts, at noon today.

The indorsement followed a visit of a deputation from the strikers seeking assistance for the concert in the Colonial Theatre a week from next Sunday night. The request of the committee was granted and it was voted to give all assistance possible to the strikers.

While no official action was taken by the I. A. T. S. E. Union, it is understood that William G. Dodge, personal representative of Pres Webber of the American Federation of Musicians, in charge of the strike, will take action this afternoon to block the plans of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in regard to the Southern tour to open in Washington next Monday night.

Nobody connected with the strike committee would make a statement for publication, but it has been learned that an appeal will be sent to Pres Webber this afternoon, requesting him to take up the situation with the affiliated theatrical unions, which control the theatres in which the Symphony concerts are scheduled, for the purpose of having no assistance given nonunion musicians during such concerts.

What will be the outcome of this request is not known, but the aim is to disarrange the plans of Judge Cabot and the management of the orchestra.

During the morning a number of interviews were held by representatives of the strikers with members of the union still playing in the orchestra, to whom it was pointed out that "better positions" are awaiting every member of the orchestra who is in the union.

When the regular concert began this afternoon, the strikers started their meeting at the headquarters of the union, St Botolph and Garrison sts.

MUSIC DEALERS OFFER TO AID NEW ORCHESTRA

A number of Boston music merchants, fearful lest the disruption of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will place this city behind others in the musical field, have come forward with a new offer to support an orchestra with the present strikers as the nucleus, according to union members.

SYMPHONY SEEKING $3,000,000 FUND

Endowment Is Needed to Meet Expenditures

Deficit Faced Annually, That for 1919 Being $100,000

The programs at yesterday's Symphony concert made the first definite announcement of a campaign to raise a permanent endowment fund for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The amount set as a goal by the trustees is "at least three millions," although $2,000,000 is the largest sum previously mentioned tentatively by them as possible.

If this great fund can be raised it should prove possible in future to pay members of the Boston Symphony higher salaries than those given anywhere else in the world. On the success or failure of the endeavor depends the future standing of the orchestra.

There has always been a deficit at the end of each season. According to the official "Historical Sketch of the Symphony Orchestra," published in 1914, the annual deficits from the beginning to that time had totaled about $900,000 and averaged $20,000 per season. Until Maj Higginson relinquished control in May, 1918, he paid the bill out of his own pocket.

Since that time the present board of trustees, with the aid, it is said, of a few others, have had to meet deficits larger than ever before. The total deficit for last season, according to Judge Cabot, the chairman, was nearly $100,000. Unless a permanent fund is raised there will always be danger of private generosity finding the burden too great to bear.

The appeal from trustees to subscribers follows:

"Symphony Hall, March 12, 1920.

"To the Subscribers to the Boston Symphony Concerts—Many friends of the Symphony Orchestra have requested an immediate opportunity to testify to their interest in securing its future through a permanently endowed foundation. This attitude means only one thing, that these great audiences realize all that this orchestra has signified. From its inception under Maj Higginson it has brought beauty into the lives of our citizens and distinction to our city. The spontaneous desire to help should not be held back to perfect the detailed plan for raising an endowment fund of at least $3,000,000; and accordingly the trustees will gladly receive at once subscriptions and pledges from all those who believe in the vital importance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to our community and country.

"There is annexed a subscription blank which may be signed and left at the box office or mailed to the treasurer at Symphony Hall.

"Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc."

MUSICIANS' UNION HEAD TO ACT IN BOSTON STRIKE

Joseph N. Webber, international president of the American Federation of Musicians, is expected to arrive in Boston this morning to take charge of the strike of the 32 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and to consider the status of the members of the union who are still playing in the orchestra.

Pres Webber will be asked to order the union men out on the ground that the management of the orchestra is filling the places of the 32 men on strike. Pressure brought on William G. Dodge, representative of the international union, by the strikers, resulted in a call for Pres Webber.

Considerable doubt exists as to the attitude of Pres Webber because he is on record as opposed to ordering out these men, on the ground that when they joined the union, it was on the promise that they would fulfill their contracts while the conditions remained unchanged.

Pres Webber will also be asked to request Pres Shea of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employes, to pull his men from the theatres at which the Symphony concerts are booked on the Southern tour, so as to prevent the concerts being given.

After the concert and rehearsal which followed, yesterday afternoon, 10 of the men who played appeared at the meeting of the strikers at the union headquarters.

During the meeting, it was said that a Back Bay woman, who has been a subscriber to the Symphony Concerts for many years, addressed the men, praised their stand and said she had notified the management to cancel her subscription. The name of the woman was not made public.

Fredric Fradkin, the dismissed concert-master, has received a letter from the Harvard Musical Association, notifying him that the engagement he had to play with that organization, has been canceled. In the letter was a check for the amount that he was to be paid for his services.

Mr Fradkin and Arthur Berenson, attorney for the union players, accepted an invitation to address an open forum meeting at the Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Wednesday night, on the situation now existing in the orchestra.

$3,000,000 IS GOAL OF DRIVE BY SYMPHONY

40 More Union Players May Be Ordered to Quit Today

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today launched a campaign to raise a $3,000,000 endowment fund.

Announcement of their decision became known yesterday when patrons attending the concert found a slip in the program containing plans for the drive.

Officials announced that if the drive proved successful it would be possible for the trustees to pay the artists higher than any other Symphony players in the world.

On the success or failure of this plan depends the future of the Boston organization, they claim.

In view of the present controversy between the management and the artists, the announcement caused much comment.

40 More May Quit Today

Orders, calling out 40 more of the Symphony players were expected to be issued today with the arrival in Boston of Joseph Webber, president of the American Federation of Musicians.

Such action will be taken on the ground that the management is now employing strikebreakers, it is said. The 40 men are union members. They did not walk out with the 32 men on Saturday.

William G. Dodge, chairman of the Boston Musicians' Union, has taken the matter up with the executive head of the federation, which represents more than 90,000 union musicians in this country and Canada.

Leaders of the strikers will claim that conditions have changed since the strike began, when it was agreed that all federation members would be allowed to complete present contract undisturbed, and that the 40 members are now working with strikebreakers. An effort will also be made to have Mr Webber exert his influence with the International Alliance of Theatric Stage Employes and the Equity Ass. in this and other cities, to withdraw their members from any theatre or hall booking the present Boston Symphony Orchestra, which starts this week on its southern tour.

SIX NEW MEN FOR SYMPHONY

Double Basses Refuse to Strike

It developed last night that six additional members have been added to the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 24 applicants who have thus far applied for positions in that body and been examined by Mr. Monteux. These men will go with the orchestra on tour. Last night, though the Musical Union had prophesied that the double bass of the orchestra would be absent, the same number of men who had played on Friday afternoon appeared on the stage, and again, as on Friday afternoon, these men were applauded by the audience as they appeared to take their accustomed seats in the orchestra.

At a meeting of the union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra following last night's concert President Joseph M. Webber of the American Federation of Musicians announced that he will not order any of the 40 union men of the orchestra to go on strike. He explained that it was definitely agreed that the union would in no manner interfere with the contract of any individual to play in the orchestra.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

VOLUNTEERS AID IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe Mar 16

Eight New Members to Go on Tour With Orchestra

Management Says Some of Strikers Have Made Move to Get Back

With five ex-members of the Symphony Orchestra, who volunteered, helping to fill vacant places, in the concert last night in Symphony Hall, the last before the orchestra leaves Boston for its Spring tour, passed without incident. The audience filled practically every seat and its applause was more spirited than usual when the orchestra entered. Mr Monteux was received with enthusiasm.

Asst Manager Judd said last night that eight new players had been hired from 20 who formerly played under Mr Monteux and applied for vacant positions. These eight will depart with the orchestra today for Washington.

Mr Judd also stated that several of the striking members had approached the trustees in regard to reengagements, their former contracts having been terminated. Whatever action may be taken in their cases, they will not go with the orchestra today.

WEBER NOT TO CALL OUT UNION MEN STILL PLAYING

Joseph N. Weber, president of the American Federation of Musicians, addressed the Symphony Orchestra musicians on strike, as well as 20 union members who are still playing, at a special meeting at 10:30 last night at the headquarters on 8t Botolph st. Mr Weber said the 34 union members still playing would not be ordered out. A consideration of their joining, he said, was that they be allowed to work out their contracts.

The union musicians still playing with the orchestra at a session, which lasted until 1:30 this morning, voted to go South with the orchestra tonight.

think this is the origin of much fault-finding."

PROMISE RAISE FOR SYMPHONY

Herald Mar 3

General Increase for Musicians When $3,000,000 Endowment Fund Is Secured

A general increase in the minimum wages paid musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be put into effect as soon as the $3,000,000 endowment fund is raised.

Judge Frederic P. Cabot, president of the trustees, made this announcement.

He said that the players have been informed repeatedly that the trustees desire to be as liberal as possible in wages, but that further increases could not be made until greater income was secured.

Hence the appeal for funds made in Friday's program. The price of seats is also likely to be increased, he said.

The union men claim that seventy-four of the ninety-four members of the orchestra are now in the American Federation of Musicians. Fifty-four of them have joined the Boston local. As soon as existing contracts of some of the union men still with the orchestra expire, they will not be allowed by the union to continue playing with a non-union orchestra. The union men still playing can have their contracts annulled by paying $200.

Arthur Berenson, counsel for the union members, has been invited to give his version of the controversy next Thursday before the Women's League for Democratic Freedom, in Pilgrim Hall, and before the forum of the Clarendon Street Baptist Church Wednesday evening.

Announcement was made that a leading conductor and composer had volunteered his services in a series of concerts planned by the striking players. A telegram was received from the manager of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra stating that he is prepared to absorb the men now out and a number of others. A representative of a booking agency also offered to engage the men for a series of Sunday night concerts.

It was stated that Frederic Fradkin, deposed concert master, has been ostracized by the Harvard Musical Association, which cancelled an engagement made with him. The cancellation was accompanied by a forfeiture check.

WASHINGTON WIDOW KILLED BY ROBBERS

Herald Mar 15

UNION MEN TOUR WITH SYMPHONY

23 Players Go South with "Loyalists" After Meeting the Strikers

RENEW CLOSED SHOP FIGHT AFTER RETURN

With the departure of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a week's concert tour to New York and southern cities, from the South station last night, there came a lull in the fight to unionize the players. The struggle between the trustees and the 33 strikers who were dismissed from the organization doubtless will be resumed upon the return of the orchestra.

Joseph N. Webber, president of the American Federation of Musicians, who came here Saturday evening from New York, left Boston yesterday noon. His final word was that he was satisfied with the recent developments and said it would be only a short time before the orchestra is entirely unionized.

Hold Midnight Conference

Mr. Webber was in conference until 2 A. M. with the strikers, who, including Fredric Fradkin, concert master, total 33 men, and with the 23 union players who have remained with the orchestra. At this conference, held in the St. Botolph street headquarters of the musicians' union, many of the 56 men present urged Mr. Webber to obtain from the directors of the national union revokation of the pledge the national officers made to the union members of the orchestra.

The national union, in the previous movement to unionize the Symphony orchestra here, had promised the players that they would not be asked to break any contracts or engagements already arranged, in the event that they joined the union. It is because of this condition that the 32 who went on strike, joining the dismissed concertmaster, March 6, have not had their forces increased by the 23 other union members in the orchestra. The 23, however, are in full sympathy with the strikers and were present at the midnight meeting last night, though they went on the southern tour.

Several of the 23 pointed out that their expenses for the trip have been paid and their baggage shipped, while others felt that they were in duty bound to complete their contracts.

"I told them point blank," said Webber yesterday, "that while I would not tell them to break their contracts, neither would I advise them to keep them. They are the worst contracts I ever examined. They permit the conductor or management to dismiss a player if he looks 'cross-eyed,' or if the player wears a tie that doesn't suit their taste.

Raises Americanization Idea

"Judging from the earnestness of the 56 men who were at the meeting, I feel assured that the orchestra will be completely unionized. It seems most peculiar to me that the management should be so strongly fighting the union, an organization that does so much for Americanization, an getting the players from Europe, while they have such a wonderful institution as the New England Conservatory of Music right here in Boston. European orchestras do not import American conductors."

The 33 strikers will meet at 10 A. M. today to make further arrangements for the concert they are to give in the Colonial Theatre next Sunday. There probably will be rehearsals next Saturday and Sunday for the 70 players who will comprise the orchestra for that concert.

The Rev. Dr. Isaiah W. Sneath, pastor of the Wollaston Congregational Church, last night stated that two of the union members of the orchestra who had been scheduled to participate in the special lenten vesper service which was held at his church yesterday refused to play because the church organist was not a member of the musicians' union.

The two, he stated, were Percy Leveen, violin, and C. Stockbridge, violoncello, and they had been advertised to play at the service. He received word yesterday that the men would not play for the reason stated. The musical program was given by William E. Weston, the church organist, and two substitute musicians. Louis Bennett, baritone, also took part.

William Dodge, chairman of the directors of the Boston Musicians' Union, stated last night that there must have been a misunderstanding regarding Leveen and Stockbridge, as union musicians are permitted to play with non-union musicians under certain conditions and church music comprises one of these cases. Leveen and Stockbridge are union members and have gone on the southern tour with the orchestra.

Traveler Mar 16

WOMEN TO BACK RIVAL ORCHESTRA

Offer $100,000 to Give Striking Symphony Players Start

FRADKIN MAKES ANNOUNCEMENT

A fund of $100,000 has been offered by four wealthy Boston women to start a new symphony orchestra in Boston, according to an announcement made by Fredric Kradkin, deposed concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today at a meeting of 33 former members of that organization who recently quit when the trustees held up their pay checks.

"We have the finest string section in the world among our 33 who left the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as a viola section of equal excellence, and that is one of the chief reasons why each of four Boston women have offered to subscribe $25,000 to start the new symphony orchestra," Mr. Fradkin said.

The former orchestra members were in a state of jubilation when Mr. Fradkin made the announcement which was added to by the cheers of several hundred members of the Boston Musicians' Union at the meeting in the building at St. Botolph and Garrison streets.

Meantime preparations are being hurried through for the concert that will be given Sunday night in the Colonial Theatre and, assording to the committee in charge, Boston will be given a program which has rareely been equalled. It is beelieved when the contracts of others of the orchestra expire at the close of the present season they will sign up with the new orchestra, which will be in shape by that time to acquire its personnel for next season.

AGAIN MOVE FOR

Post Grad BOS

SYMPHONY ON SOUTHERN TOUR

23 Union Members Included in Personnel

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra left the South station at 7:30 last night on their Southern tour. Included in the membership of the party were the 23 union members, who have remained with the orchestra since internal trouble arose.

The first concert will be at Washington. The striking union members will hold a meeting today at the headquarters of the Musicians' Union, St. Botolph street.

NEWSIE INVITES

Mar 16

NING RECORD

GUARD

PLAN ORCHESTRA

Meeting Held Today to Aid Move for New Symphony

First legal steps in forming Boston's proposed All-American Symphony Orchestra were taken today when a special committee, representing the 32 dismissed Boston Symphony players, met with their attorney at union headquarters.

Upon announcement by Frederic Fradkin, deposed concert master of Boston Symphony, that he had secured pledges of $100,000 from four wealthy women for the foundation of a new orchestra, plans for the immediate incorporation were made.

One of the chief features proposed for the new organization will be the awarding of scholarships to needy [illegible] pupils.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Undisturbed and Well Received, the Symphony Orchestra Gives Its Usual Concerts Abroad—Appearances and Actualities Among the Dismissed Players—Singer's and a Pianist's Recital

THE present concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in the city southward that it regularly visits began auspiciously in Washington on Monday afternoon; continued as fortunately in Baltimore last evening and promise to move as smoothly in Philadelphia today. No unionized stage-hands have refused to set chairs for the band; the audiences have been as numerous as usual and quite as warmly disposed; Mr. Monteux has put together a pleasurable programme; and in it he and his seventy men have acquitted themselves well. The orchestra is the orchestra heard at Symphony Hall last Friday and Saturday, with sundry additions to the string choir from applicants long since tested and approved for it, should vacancies arise. Late last week Mr. Monteux heard them anew, accepted a few for immediate service and has since rehearsed them in the current pieces. For Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia and Brooklyn, these numbers are Beethoven's fourth symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll"; the introduction, dance of the apprentices and other fragments from the third act of his opera, "The Mastersingers." Between whiles, Miss Destinn, long since engaged for the four concerts, sings an air from Mozart's opera, "Don Juan" and three Bohemian songs from Smetana and Dvorak. At the two concerts in New York, without Miss Destinn, Mr. Monteux will repeat the orchestral pieces aforesaid and add to them Mozart's symphony in G minor, Wagner's prelude to his opera, "Lohengrin," the "Forest-Music" from his "Siegfried," Beethoven's overture, "Fidelio," Borodin's "Asian Sketch" and Debussy's "Little Suite." Thus, in spite of difficulties at home, the Symphony Orchestra is keeping its engagements abroad and keeping them in becoming fashion everywhere, moreover, its audiences have cheerfully accepted the limitations of the moment. When they have applauded conductor and band, they could hardly have been altogether unmindful of recent events, decisions and resolutions in Boston.

Here at home the rebellious remnant, dismissed from the orchestra last week, are cultivating an admirable talent for publicity." Each day, after the manner of "strikers," they meet for the mutual encouragement of talk and speech-making. Each day they become "the nucleus" of a new orchestra—on Monday to be organized and endowed by "prominent Back Bay women"; on Tuesday by the publishers and sellers of music in this town; today, possibly, by their "comrades" of the pavers' and longshoremen's unions. Each day, furthermore, they announce new meetings that their spokesman will address—"forums" and the like, where the affairs of the Symphony Orchestra have never been discussed before and, in all probability, never will be again. So much for the pretty and playful game of appearances. Actually, the more far-sighted "strikers" are warily seeking work in other orchestras; while one, two or three are not unwilling, could they go their own way, to return to their chairs in Symphony Hall. They have missed sorely the present journey of the orchestra to New York and other cities; they are uneasy away from the work and the associations of years; they are anxious over the future. They even decline to be cheered by the prospect of a concert on Sunday evening at the Colonial Theatre, in which they will be the nucleus of a "scratch" orchestra. A few, of course, believe that they can now ruin the orchestra they have failed to rule, have forgotten, indeed, every grievance over salary and unionization in single-hearted desire to "get even" with the trustees and the management who dismissed them. But for these implacables the whole secession might speedily simmer away.

despite the fact that it will involve a considerable deficit in the immediate future.

DEALERS MAY BACK A NEW ORCHESTRA

Herald Mar 17

Offer of Music Merchants Appeals to Striking Players

Boston music merchants, fearing the possible disruption of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would have a depressing effect on their business and would dim the reputation of "Boston as the music centre of the world," have expressed a willingness to back a new symphony orchestra here with the present striking players as a nucleus.

In consequence of this offer the project of incorporating an orchestra of their own by the striking players and their backers will be deferred for a few days to give the men and their committee time to consider carefully the latest development, which especially appeals to a large number of the men.

The program of the benefit concert to be presented by the striking players in the Colonial Theatre Sunday night, Emil Mollenhauer conducting, will include a solo by Fredric Fradkin, the deposed concert master. Joseph N. Webber, president of the American Federation of Musicians, will attend and will deliver an address to the audience in relation to the present controversy.

Atty. Arthur Berenson, counsel for the union players; Mr. Fradkin and Carl E. Gardner, the timpani player, will address a meeting to be held under the auspices of the League for Democratic Control in Pilgrim Hall Friday night. Mr. Berenson and Mr. Fradkin will speak tonight at the Clarendon Street Baptist Church open forum.

[illegible] winter.

WILL TELL ABOUT SYMPHONY STRIKE

Fredric Fradkin, [illegible] concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Atty. Arthur Berenson will be the chief speakers at an open forum meeting tonight at 7:30 o'clock in the Clarendon Street Baptist Church. Mr. Fradkin and Atty. Berenson will relate the details of the strike of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and [illegible] separation of 32 players from the organization. A questionnaire will follow and Mr. Fradkin and Atty. Berenson will answer pertinent inquiries from the audience. The public is invited.

MONDAY MORN

CONCERT BY FEDERATION ORCHESTRA

Large and Enthusiastic Audience Pleased at Colonial

BY OLIN DOWNES

A concert announced on the cover of the programme as "a symphony concert by the union musicians formerly members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," was given last night at the Colonial Theatre. These former members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who were present to the number of 32, were found principally in the string division.

The entire orchestra numbered 66. The violins were headed by Fredric Fradkin, the concertmaster discharged from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and leader of the men who played on this occasion.

FRADKIN AND HEIM SOLOISTS

In addition to the former Symphony men in the string section some half dozen others were found, including a 'cellist, a bassoonist, the tuba player, one of the harps, two tympanists and the former trumpeter of the Boston Symphony, Mr. Heim, who played Sullivan's "Lost Chord" as a solo. Mr. Fradkin's solo was the "Meditation" from "Thais." The orchestral pieces were Beethovens third "Leonore" overture, a suite of music from Bizet's "Carmen," Strauss's waltz "In the Mountains" and Wagner's "Tannhauser Overture."

There was a large and very enthusiastic audience, the balconies being sold out. There were ovations for Emil Mollenhauer, the conductor; for the orchestra and for the soloists. The programme evidently pleased. It was on the lines of popular rather than symphonic music, if one excepts the two familiar works by German masters.

There were capable performances, by experienced musicians. Mr. Mollenhauer as a conductor needs no introduction to Boston music lovers today. His firm beat, his complete authority, the routine that he has long since mastered, make him an extremely capable leader, if not an over-imaginative interpreter. That the performances should be of a Boston Symphony quality was of course out of the question. It would be unfair to judge this concert by any such standards. Nor is it surprising that the string division, with a predominance of Symphony players, played with a special brilliancy.

It was, indeed, a Fradkin rather than a "symphony" concert. Mr. Fradkin, after playing the sentimental melody from "Thais," had to play two encores, and could very easily have played five, the enthusiasm of the audience, apparently, not cooling as he proceeded. Mr. Heim was likewise encored after his solo.

In the middle of the programme Harry Brenton, international officer of the American Federation of Musicians, spoke as the representative of President Joseph N. Webber, who could not be present, characterized the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a "foreign institution on American soil."

"The Symphony Orchestras in every other city in this country are unionized," the speaker said, "and the unionization has in no way affected the orchestras, nor would it affect the Boston orchestra."

Before the organization of the American Federation of Musicians, Mr. Brenton argued, there was little chance for American musicians in this country, but since its organization the American has received his opportunity and made good.

CANADA TO ABOL

INFORMATION OBSCURED

VOLUNTEERS AID IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe Tues Mar 14

Eight New Members to Go on Tour With Orchestra

Management Says Some of Strikers Have Made Move to Get Back

With five ex-members of the Symphony Orchestra, who volunteered, helping to fill vacant places, in the concert last night in Symphony Hall, the last before the orchestra leaves Boston for its Spring tour, passed without incident. The audience filled practically every seat and its applause was more spirited than usual when the orchestra entered. Mr Monteux was received with enthusiasm.

Asst Manager Judd said last night that eight new players had been hired from 20 who formerly played under Mr Monteux and applied for vacant positions. These eight will depart with the orchestra today for Washington.

Mr Judd also stated that several of the striking members had approached the trustees in regard to reengagements, their former contracts having been terminated. Whatever action may be taken in their cases, they will not go with the orchestra today.

WEBER NOT TO CALL OUT UNION MEN STILL PLAYING

Joseph N. Weber, president of the American Federation of Musicians, addressed the Symphony Orchestra musicians on strike, as well as 20 union members who are still playing, at a special meeting at 10:30 last night at the headquarters on St Botolph st. Mr Weber said the 34 union members still playing would not be ordered out. A consideration of their joining, he said, was that they be allowed to work out their contracts.

The union musicians still playing with the orchestra at a session, which lasted until 1:30 this morning, voted to go South with the orchestra tonight.

I think this is the origin of much fault-finding."

PROMISE RAISE FOR SYMPHONY

American Mar 13

General Increase for Musicians When $3,000,000 Endowment Fund Is Secured

A general increase in the minimum wages paid musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be put into effect as soon as the $3,000,000 endowment fund is raised.

Judge Frederic P. Cabot, president of the trustees, made this announcement.

He said that the players have been informed repeatedly that the trustees desire to be as liberal as possible in wages, but that further increases could not be made until greater income was secured.

Hence the appeal for funds made in Friday's program. The price of seats is also likely to be increased, he said.

The union men claim that seventy-four of the ninety-four members of the orchestra are now in the American Federation of Musicians. Fifty-four of them have joined the Boston local. As soon as existing contracts of some of the union men still with the orchestra expire, they will not be allowed by the union to continue playing with a non-union orchestra. The union men still playing can have their contracts annulled by paying $200.

Arthur Berenson, counsel for the union members, has been invited to give his version of the controversy next Thursday before the Women's League for Democratic Freedom, in Pilgrim Hall, and before the forum of the Clarendon Street Baptist Church Wednesday evening.

Announcement was made that a leading conductor and composer had volunteered his services in a series of concerts planned by the striking players. A telegram was received from the manager of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra stating that he is prepared to absorb the men now out and a number of others. A representative of a booking agency also offered to engage the men for a series of Sunday night concerts.

It was stated that Frederic Fradkin, deposed concert master, has been ostracized by the Harvard Musical Association, which cancelled an engagement made with him. The cancellation was accompanied by a forfeiture check.

WASHINGTON WIDOW KILLED BY ROBBERS

Herald Mar 15

UNION MEN TOUR WITH SYMPHONY

23 Players Go South with "Loyalists" After Meeting the Strikers

RENEW CLOSED SHOP FIGHT AFTER RETURN

With the departure of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a week's concert tour to New York and southern cities, from the South station last night, there came a lull in the fight to unionize the players. The struggle between the trustees and the 33 strikers who were dismissed from the organization doubtless will be resumed upon the return of the orchestra.

Joseph N. Webber, president of the American Federation of Musicians, who came here Saturday evening from New York, left Boston yesterday noon. His final word was that he was satisfied with the recent developments and said it would be only a short time before the orchestra is entirely unionized.

Hold Midnight Conference

Mr. Webber was in conference until 2 A. M. with the strikers, who, including Fredric Fradkin, concert master, total 33 men, and with the 23 union players who have remained with the orchestra. At this conference, held in the St. Botolph street headquarters of the musicians' union, many of the 56 men present urged Mr. Webber to obtain from the directors of the national union revokation of the pledge the national officers made to the union members of the orchestra.

The national union, in the previous movement to unionize the Symphony orchestra here, had promised the players that they would not be asked to break any contracts or engagements already arranged, in the event that they joined the union. It is because of this condition that the 32 who went on strike, joining the dismissed concert-master, March 6, have not had their forces increased by the 23 other union members in the orchestra. The 23, however, are in full sympathy with the strikers and were present at the midnight meeting last night, though they went on the southern tour.

Several of the 23 pointed out that their expenses for the trip have been paid and their baggage shipped, while others felt that they were in duty bound to complete their contracts.

"I told them point blank," said Webber yesterday, "that while I would not tell them to break their contracts, neither would I advise them to keep them. They are the worst contracts I ever examined. They permit the conductor or management to dismiss a player if he looks 'cross-eyed,' or if the player wears a tie that doesn't suit their taste.

Raises Americanization Idea

"Judging from the earnestness of the 56 men who were at the meeting, I feel assured that the orchestra will be completely unionized. It seems most peculiar to me that the management should be so strongly fighting the union, an organization that does so much for Americanization, and getting the players from Europe, while they have such a wonderful institution as the New England Conservatory of Music right here in Boston. European orchestras do not import American conductors."

The 33 strikers will meet at 10 A. M. today to make further arrangements for the concert they are to give in the Colonial Theatre next Sunday. There probably will be rehearsals next Saturday and Sunday for the 70 players who will comprise the orchestra for that concert.

The Rev. Dr. Isaiah W. Sneath, pastor of the Wollaston Congregational Church, last night stated that two of the union members of the orchestra who had been scheduled to participate in the special lenten vesper service which was held at his church yesterday refused to play because the church organist was not a member of the musicians' union.

The two, he stated, were Percy Leveen, violin, and C. Stockbridge, violoncello, and they had been advertised to play at the service. He received word yesterday that the men would not play for the reason stated. The musical program was given by William E. Weston, the church organist, and two substitute musicians. Louis Bernett, baritone, also took part.

William Dodge, chairman of the directors of the Boston Musicians' Union, stated last night that there must have been a misunderstanding regarding Leveen and Stockbridge, as union musicians are permitted to play with non-union musicians under certain conditions and church music comprises one of these cases. Leveen and Stockbridge are union members and have gone on the southern tour with the orchestra.

Traveler Mar 14

WOMEN TO BACK RIVAL ORCHESTRA

Offer $100,000 to Give Striking Symphony Players Start

FRADKIN MAKES ANNOUNCEMENT

A fund of $100,000 has been offered by four wealthy Boston women to start a new symphony orchestra in Boston, according to an announcement made by Fredric Kradkin, deposed concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today at a meeting of 33 former members of that organization who recently quit when the trustees held up their pay checks.

"We have the finest string section in the world among our 33 who left the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as a viola section of equal excellence, and that is one of the chief reasons why each of four Boston women have offered to subscribe $25,000 to start the new symphony orchestra," Mr. Fradkin said.

The former orchestra members were in a state of jubilation when Mr. Fradkin made the announcement which was added to by the cheers of several hundred members of the Boston Musicians' Union at the meeting in the building at St. Botolph and Garrison streets.

Meantime preparations are being hurried through for the concert that will be given Sunday night in the Colonial Theatre and, assording to the committee in charge, Boston will be given a program which has rareely been equalled. It is beelieved when the contracts of others of the orchestra expire at the close of the present season they will sign up with the new orchestra, which will be in shape by that time to acquire its personnel for next season.

AGAIN MOVE FOR

Post Mar 15 BOS

SYMPHONY ON SOUTHERN TOUR

23 Union Members Included in Personnel

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra left the South station at 7:30 last night on their Southern tour. Included in the membership of the party were the 23 union members, who have remained with the orchestra since internal trouble arose.

The first concert will be at Washington. The striking union members will hold a meeting today at the headquarters of the Musicians' Union, St. Botolph street.

Mar 15

NING RECORD

GUARD

PLAN ORCHESTRA

Meeting Held Today to Aid Move for New Symphony

First legal steps in forming Boston's proposed All-American Symphony Orchestra were taken today when a special committee, representing the 32 dismissed Boston Symphony players, met with their attorney at union headquarters.

Upon announcement by Frederic Fradkin, deposed concert master of Boston Symphony, that he had secured pledges of $100,000 from four wealthy women for the foundation of a new orchestra, plans for the immediate incorporation were made.

One of the chief features proposed for the new organization will be the awarding of scholarships to needy talented pupils

Trans Mar 17

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Undisturbed and Well Received, the Symphony Orchestra Gives Its Usual Concerts Abroad—Appearances and Actualities Among the Dismissed Players—Singer's and a Pianist's Recital

THE present concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in the city southward that it regularly visits began auspiciously in Washington on Monday afternoon; continued as fortunately in Baltimore last evening and promise to move as smoothly in Philadelphia today. No unionized stage-hands have refused to set chairs for the band; the audiences have been as numerous as usual and quite as warmly disposed; Mr. Monteux has put together a pleasurable programme; and in it he and his seventy men have acquitted themselves well. The orchestra is the orchestra heard at Symphony Hall last Friday and Saturday, with sundry additions to the string choir from applicants long since tested and approved for it, should vacancies arise. Late last week Mr. Monteux heard them anew, accepted a few for immediate service and has since rehearsed them in the current pieces. For Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia and Brooklyn, these numbers are Beethoven's fourth symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll"; the introduction, dance of the apprentices and other fragments from the third act of his opera, "The Mastersingers." Between whiles, Miss Destinn, long since engaged for the four concerts, sings an air from Mozart's opera, "Don Juan" and three Bohemian songs from Smetana and Dvorak. At the two concerts in New York, without Miss Destinn, Mr. Monteux will repeat the orchestral pieces aforesaid and add to them Mozart's symphony in G minor, Wagner's prelude to his opera, "Lohengrin," the "Forest-Music" from his "Siegfried," Beethoven's overture, "Fidelio," Borodin's "Asian Sketch" and Debussy's "Little Suite." Thus, in spite of difficulties at home, the Symphony Orchestra is keeping its engagements abroad and keeping them in becoming fashion everywhere, moreover, its audiences have cheerfully accepted the limitations of the moment. When they have applauded conductor and band, they could hardly have been altogether unmindful of recent events, decisions and resolutions in Boston.

Here at home the rebellious remnant, dismissed from the orchestra last week, are cultivating an admirable talent for publicity." Each day, after the manner of "strikers," they meet for the mutual encouragement of talk and speech-making. Each day they become "the nucleus" of a new orchestra—on Monday to be organized and endowed by "prominent Back Bay women"; on Tuesday by the publishers and sellers of music in this town; today, possibly, by their "comrades" of the pavers' and longshoremen's unions. Each day, furthermore, they announce new meetings that their spokesman will address—"forums" and the like, where the affairs of the Symphony Orchestra have never been discussed before and, in all probability, never will be again. So much for the pretty and playful game of appearances. Actually, the more far-sighted "strikers" are warily seeking work in other orchestras; while one, two or three are not unwilling, could they go their own way, to return to their chairs in Symphony Hall. They have missed sorely the present journey of the orchestra to New York and other cities; they are uneasy away from the work and the associations of years; they are anxious over the future. They even decline to be cheered by the prospect of a concert on Sunday evening at the Colonial Theatre, in which they will be the nucleus of a "scratch" orchestra. A few, of course, believe that they can now ruin the orchestra they have failed to rule, have forgotten, indeed, every grievance over salary and unionization in single-hearted desire to "get even" with the trustees and the management who dismissed them. But for these implacables the whole secession might speedily simmer away.

[illegible] despite the fact that it will involve a considerable deficit in the immediate future.

DEALERS MAY BACK A NEW ORCHESTRA

Herald Mar 17

Offer of Music Merchants Appeals to Striking Players

Boston music merchants, fearing the possible disruption of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would have a depressing effect on their business and would dim the reputation of "Boston as the music centre of the world," have expressed a willingness to back a new symphony orchestra here with the present striking players as a nucleus.

In consequence of this offer the project of incorporating an orchestra of their own by the striking players and their backers will be deferred for a few days to give the men and their committee time to consider carefully the latest development, which especially appeals to a large number of the men.

The program of the benefit concert to be presented by the striking players in the Colonial Theatre Sunday night, Emil Mollenhauer conducting, will include a solo by Fredric Fradkin, the deposed concert master. Joseph N. Webber, president of the American Federation of Musicians, will attend and will deliver an address to the audience in relation to the present controversy.

Atty. Arthur Berenson, counsel for the union players; Mr. Fradkin and Carl E. Gardner, the timpani player, will address a meeting to be held under the auspices of the League for Democratic Control in Pilgrim Hall Friday night. Mr. Berenson and Mr. Fradkin will speak tonight at the Clarendon Street Baptist Church open forum.

[illegible] winter. The[illegible]

Trans Mar 17

WILL TELL ABOUT SYMPHONY STRIKE

Fredric Fradkin, deposed concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Atty. Arthur Berenson will be the chief speakers at an open forum meeting tonight at 7:30 o'clock in the Clarendon Street Baptist Church. Mr. Fradkin and Atty. Berenson will relate the details of the strike of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and subsequent separation of 33 players from the organization. A questionnaire will follow and Mr. Fradkin and Atty. Berenson will answer pertinent inquiries from the audience. The public is invited.

MONDAY MOR[illegible]

CONCERT BY FEDERATION ORCHESTRA

Large and Enthusiastic Audience Pleased at Colonial

BY OLIN DOWNES

A concert announced on the cover of the programme as "a symphony concert by the union musicians formerly members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," was given last night at the Colonial Theatre. These former members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who were present to the number of 32, were found principally in the string division.

The entire orchestra numbered 66. The violins were headed by Fredric Fradkin, the concertmaster discharged from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and leader of the men who played on this occasion.

FRADKIN AND HEIM SOLOISTS

In addition to the former Symphony men in the string section some half dozen others were found, including a 'cellist, a bassoonist, the tuba player, one of the harps, two tympanists and the former trumpeter of the Boston Symphony, Mr. Heim, who played Sullivan's "Lost Chord" as a solo. Mr. Fradkin's solo was the "Meditation" from "Thais." The orchestral pieces were Beethovens third "Leonore" overture, a suite of music from Bizet's "Carmen," Strauss's waltz "In the Mountains" and Wagner's "Tannhauser Overture."

There was a large and very enthusiastic audience, the balconies being sold out. There were ovations for Emil Mollenhauer, the conductor; for the orchestra and for the soloists. The programme evidently pleased. It was on the lines of popular rather than symphonic music, if one excepts the two familiar works by German masters.

There were capable performances by experienced musicians. Mr. Mollenhauer as a conductor needs no introduction to Boston music lovers today. His firm beat, his complete authority, the routine that he has long since mastered, make him an extremely capable leader, if not an over-imaginative interpreter. That the performances should be of a Boston Symphony quality was of course out of the question. It would be unfair to judge this concert by any such standards. Nor is it surprising that the string division, with a predominance of Symphony players, played with a special brilliancy.

It was, indeed, a Fradkin rather than a "symphony" concert. Mr. Fradkin, after playing the sentimental melody from "Thais," had to play two encores, and could very easily have played five, the enthusiasm of the audience, apparently, not cooling as he proceeded. Mr. Heim was likewise encored after his solo.

In the middle of the programme Harry Brenton, international officer of the American Federation of Musicians, speaking as the representative of President Joseph N. Webber, who could not be present, characterized the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a "foreign institution on American soil."

"The Symphony Orchestras in every other city in this country are unionized," the speaker said, "and the unionization has in no way affected the orchestras, nor would it affect the Boston orchestra."

Before the organization of the American Federation of Musicians, Mr. Brenton argued, there was little chance for American musicians in this country, but since its organization the American has received his opportunity and made good.

CANADA TO ADOPT

TELL ABOUT
PHONY STRIKE

Fradkin, deposed concert-mas-
Boston Symphony Orchestra,
Arthur Berenson will be the akers at an open forum meeting at 7:30 o'clock in the Clarendon
Baptist Church. Mr. Fradkin and Berenson will relate the details of strike of members of the Boston Orchestra and subsequent tion of 32 players from the organi-
A questionnaire will follow when Fradkin and Atty. Berenson will er pertinent inquiries from the au-
The public is invited.

MONDAY MORN

ONCERT BY EDERATION ORCHESTRA

Large and Enthusiastic Audience Pleased at Colonial

BY OLIN DOWNES

A concert announced on the cover
the programme as "a symphony cert by the union musicians for-ly members of the Boston Symny Orchestra," was given last night
the Colonial Theatre. These for-members of the Boston Symphony
hestra, who were present to the ber of 32, were found principally e string division.
e entire orchestra numbered 64.
violins were headed by Fredric
lkin, the concertmaster discharged
the Boston Symphony Orchestra, leader of the men who played on occasion.

DKIN AND HEIM SOLOISTS

addition to the former Symphony
in the string section some half others were found, including a t, a bassoonist, the tuba player, of the harps, two tympanists and former trumpeter of the Boston
hony, Mr. Heim, who played Sul-
's "Lost Chord" as a solo. Mr.
in's solo was the "Meditation"
Thais." The orchestral pieces
Beethovens third "Leonore" over-
a suite of music from Bizet's men," Strauss's waltz "In the ains" and Wagner's "Tannhauser
ure."
e was a large and very enthusi-udience, the balconies being sold
There were ovations for Emil auer, the conductor, for the ra and for the soloists. The pro-evidently pleased. It was on es of popular rather than symmusic, if one excepts the two
r works by German masters.
were capable performances by nced musicians. Mr. Mollen-a conductor needs no intro-
to Boston music lovers today.
beat, his complete authority,
ine that he has long since mas-make him an extremely capable not an over-imaginative inter-
That the performances should
Boston Symphony quality was out of the question. It would e to judge this concert by any ndards. Nor is it surprising string division, with a pre-ce of Symphony players, played pecial brilliancy.
indeed, a Fradkin rather than
hony" concert. Mr. Fradkin, ying the sentimental melody
hais," had to play two encores,
d very easily have played five,
usiasm of the audience, ap-
not cooling as he proceeded.
was likewise encored after middle of the programme enton, international officer of ican Federation of Musicians,
the representative of Presion M. Webber, who could not characterized the Boston Orchestra as a "foreign inn American soil."
mphony Orchestras in every
in this country are union-speaker said, "and the unions in no way affected the nor would it affect the Bos-ra."
e organization of the Amer-tion of Musicians, Mr. Bren-there was little chance for musicians in this country, organization the American his opportunity and made

TO ADOPT

a reader.

Record 17 Mch

What Record Readers Say

The Record assumes no responsibility for opinions expressed by contributors to this department. Letters to be printed should be signed with writer's name and address. Name will not be printed if the contributor requests its omission. Short letters are preferred and are likely to secure more prompt printing than long ones.—Editor.

FROM A VETERAN SYMPHONY PLAYER

To the Editor:—

Will you kindly publish this letter in justice to one of the oldest members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

To the music loving public: Being the oldest member among those who refused to play at Symphony Hall Saturday, March 6, I wish to explain leagues and myself to proceed in that manner.

"When this new era of democracy dawned upon us, we were told by President Wilson that the governed had some right in deciding the form of government they wished, all of which makes beautiful reading, but in practice this is distasteful to a certain set of people.

"When a committee of the orchestra, I being one of them, called upon Mr. Monteux, himself a member of the Federation of Musicians of France, in regard to the union question, he assured us of his absolute neutrality. At the same time through his attitude toward Mr. Fradkin, a strong and altruistic promoter of our cause, Mr. Monteux showed plainly that his statement to us was not sincere and thus the situation grew more and more acute and finally led to the most unfortunate occurrence on Friday afternoon. I want to state that I deplore Mr. Fradkin's refusal to rise when bidden to do so by Mr. Monteux, but it is apparent that the treatment meted out to him by Mr. Monteux was irritating beyond human endance. We felt obliged to uphold him since Mr. Fradkin made his sacrifice for us.

"Judge Cabot had stated that the Fradkin incident had nothing to do whatsoever with the union movement. He is quite correct if he refers to it directly, but indirectly it is only too evident that this agition was the sole cause of all the trouble. Probably the most important factor in our move is that this is a great opportunity to open the eyes of the public to the fact that a great crisis in regard to the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was at hand.

"Altogether 74 members have pledged themselves to stand together in this movement, which means that every one of these men must quit at the expiration of his contract if the union is not recognized by the trustees. In that way within one year more than three-quarters of the entire personnel of the orchestra must necessarily be replaced. Judge Cabot evidently is not at all concerned about this fact—I myself think it to be entirely impossible. He stated that he would willingly continue the concerts under these adverse conditions and gradually build it up to its former standard. This will take a great many years, if it can be accomplished at all, and for the public there will be ample opportunity to do some watchful waiting. All other orchestras in the country are organized and it seems that this fact does not interfere with their artistic development. I need only mention the Chicago and Philadelphia Orchestras, which, in the musical world, are considered our superior, which proves that the old notion of art and organization not belonging together to be an exploded theory.

"All of this coming after 33 years of service in this orchestra causes me the greatest mental agony I ever suffered. It is but natural that it would pain me beyond measure to witness this splendid organization, in which I have spent the best part of my life, broken beyond repair. There is yet time to save it, and I hope the trustees will relent."

Otto Roth.

Boston.

---

have fought a war for democracy." The speaker was again applauded when he said: "Judge Cabot would not talk to one of his waiters in his club as he talked to the orchestra, because he knows the waiters would not stand it, while for a Symphony player to throw up his job means disrupting home ties, and traveling 200 miles or more. All the trustees are men of money and

THURSDAY, MARCH 18

FRADKIN GETS PUBLIC HEARING

With Atty. Berenson Airs Symphony Discords at Church Forum

AUDIENCE SHOWS STRONG SYMPATHY

Fredric Fradkin, deposed concert-master of Symphony Orchestra, and Arthur Berenson, attorney for the striking players, discussed before an audience which proved to be entirely sympathetic, in the Clarendon Street Baptist Church last evening, the strike of 32 players, and the future of the orchestra. George W. Coleman presided. The two chief speakers predicted that Judge Cabot will find it impossible to fill the vacancies, although quoting him as asserting: "I'll replace every man if it takes ten years."

Mr. Fradkin described how, at the Cambridge concert, he had been ejected from the dressing room by Conductor Monteux, the latter, although a member of a union in France, declaring "This is the management's side," and the scene at the following concert in Symphony Hall, when Fradkin failed to rise with the remainder of the orchestra after the demonstration of applause.

"Treated Like a Beggar"

He offered new evidence of his allegation that the demonstration had been planned for Monteux by quoting the librarian as saying, just prior to the concert: "Fradkin, we're going to see this afternoon who's going to get ahead, you or Monteux." The speaker asked his audience "whether, in view of the insult to the orchestra by Mr. Monteux, and the evident intent to applaud him, I ought to have got up?" (Cries of "No.")

Mr. Fradkin continued: "I might not have been able to rise. Only a few weeks before, after the children's concert, I found myself stuck to my chair, by gum. And, I might have been sick that afternoon. Yet the audience hissed me. They who hissed were discourteous (Cries of "Yes" and "Amen"); and at midnight that night, although I had apologized for any mistaken views, the management sent me a dismissal by special delivery, treating me like a beggar, not as a man.

"Judge Cabot is trying conscientiously to follow Maj. Higginson, but forgets that times have changed, and that we power and are utterly unable to understand the point of view of a man who has to work for his living."

In reply to questions as to whether "Mr. Monteux is only a third rate conductor, as alleged in Chicago papers," Mr. Fradkin said: "The rules of the union forbid slurring remarks upon any fellow-musician."

Atty. Berenson said the action of the trustees in holding back the pay of the 32 men now out was illegal and that he intends to take the matter into court, believing the trustees will have to pay the entire compensation to the end of the season. He reviewed the attempts of 18 years to unionize the "only non-union symphony orchestra in the entire United States."

---

NEW OFFER TO UNION PLAYERS

Broker May Back a New Symphony Orchestra

Post Mch 18

A new offer by a State street broker to back a Symphony orchestra to be known as the Union Boston Symphony Orchestra has been recived by the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra now out on strike. The offer has been made through Gustav Heim, trumpeter of the Boston Symphony, soloist and one of the striking players.

The offer of the broker is conditional, however, on the outcome of the benefit concert to be given by the strikers at the Colonial Theatre next Sunday night. If the concert proves a success from a musical standpoint the broker who has made the offer, promises to engage the Boston Opera House for a series of four Sunday concerts to be held by the union players. With the money raised from these concerts he promises to start a fund with which to organize the new orchestra.

It was announced yesterday that Carl Hampe, noted as a trombone player, would play with the union men at their concert next Sunday night and will also join the proposed new orchestra. He was originally a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but left the organization a few years ago.

---

ganization on its tour of New York and southern cities. It is said that he is going to pay his own expenses of making the trip to Boston for the strikers' concert, rejoining the orchestra in time for the concert in Newark on Monday.

The assertion was made last evening by strike leaders that Georges Longy and other members of the orchestra are disgruntled at having to play with pupils from the Conservatory of Music and pensioners, who have been called back to service in place of the strikers. The strikers will meet again today at 10 A. M.

Globe Mch 18

SYMPHONY STRIKERS PLAN NEW ORCHESTRA

$100,000 Pledged by Four Women for Purpose

As a result of the pledges of four women to give $25,000 each to start a new Symphony Orchestra in this city, Arthur Berenson, attorney for the striking musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will begin legal steps today to form the new organization. At a meeting yesterday Frederic Fradkin announced the pledges of the money. A committee was appointed to act with attorney Berenson in putting the project into effect.

Last night, leaders of the strikers stated that among the chief features of the new organization will be free scholarships for students in need: the entire organization, including conductor, to be American citizens, and the assurance that the new organization will have the services of one of the most famous musicians in this country as conductor. This man is also one of the most gifted composers in the country.

DISTEEL WHEELS ON 1920.

Herald Mch 18

NEW SYMPHONY TO INCORPORATE

Strikers Say They Have $100,000 Pledged for an All-American Orchestra

"GIFTED COMPOSER" TO BE CONDUCTOR

Preliminary legal action toward the formation of a new orchestra by the strikers and other union members of the present Boston Symphony Orchestra will be made today by Atty. Arthur Berenson, counsel for the 33 musicians dismissed.

Fredric Fradkin, the discharged concertmaster, announced at a meeting of the strikers in the St. Botolph street headquarters that four Boston women had offered to subscribe $25,000 each to start a new orchestra.

Plan All-American Orchestra

The meeting appointed a committee to act with Atty. Berenson in any steps that may be necessary to a realization of the project.

Among the chief features in connection with the projected incorporation, as pointed out last night by members of the committee, are that free scholarships will be given to talented students who need assistance, and composers, the conductor and all players will be Americans. The new organization, it was said, is assured of the services as a permanent leader of "the most gifted composer and conductor in America today."

The strikers who attended the meeting stated that A. Laus, member of the American Federation of Musicians, but who did not go on strike because of his personal regard for Conductor Monteux, has said that he will play at the concert the strikers are to give in the Colonial Theatre Sunday evening.

Laus is a French army veteran of the world-war. He played first bassoon in the orchestra and is now with the or-

Thurs Mch 18 THE

SYMPHONY ROW SPLITS BACK BAY SOCIETY CIRCLES

Back Bay society cricles have split over the recent troubles in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one faction taking the part of 33 former members who have taken steps to start a second symphony orchestra in this city, and the other espousing the action of the trustees headed by Judge Cabot.

Argument over the respective merits of the players' side of the controversy, as compared with that of the trustees reached such heat that at a recent society luncheon a well known Boston society leader left in anger.

Announcement was made today from the executive committee of the former members of the orchestra that officers

---

BOSTON TRAVELER,

have been made through various sources to take them back into the orchestra organization on their own terms.

THE SECEDERS' SIDE

Trans Mch 18

A Letter from Otto Roth About the Present Strife in the Symphony Orchestra—Timely Explanation and Temperate Prediction with Sincere Feeling Behind

OTTO ROTH, for years one of the first violinists of the Symphony Orchestra, and for long a familiar figure in Boston in and out of Symphony Hall, has sent to the New York Tribune a letter about the present secession from the band. He intends it apparently for the information of subscribers to the concerts of the orchestra in New York. It deserves to be reprinted here as well, since at home the seceders have not been fortunate in their spokesmen. Unlike Fradkin of the wounded vanities, Mr. Roth has no personal grievance to air; unlike the exuberant "counsellor" to the strikers, he eschews rhetorical fluff. He even writes as a man who feels deeply and sincerely his present separation from cherished work and associations. Possibly he exaggerates the importance of the omnipresent and insistent Fradkin in the current strife, but his letter explains the puzzling loyalty of the seceders to a man and a musician whom of old they neither liked nor respected. Whatever the reader's judgment, Mr. Roth deserves to be read. He writes:

When a committee of the orchestra—I being one of them—called upon Mr. Monteux, himself a member of the Federation of Musicians of France, in regard to the union question, he assured us of his absolute neutrality. At the same time, through his attitude toward Mr. Fradkin, a strong and altruistic promoter of our cause, Mr. Monteux showed plainly that his statement to us was not sincere and thus the situation grew more and more acute and finally led to the most unfortunate occurrence on Friday afternoon. I want to state right here that I deplore Mr. Fradkin's refusal to rise when bidden to do so by Mr. Monteux, but it is apparent that the treatment meted out to him by Mr. Monteux was irritating beyond human endurance. We felt obliged to uphold him since Mr. Fradkin made his sacrifice for us.

Judge Cabot had stated that the Fradkin incident had nothing whatsoever to do with the union movement. He is quite correct if he refers to it directly, but indirectly it is only too evident that this agitation was the sole cause of all the trouble. Probably the most important factor in our move is that this is a great opportunity to open the eyes of the public to the fact that a great crisis in regard to the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is at hand.

Altogether seventy-four have pledged themselves to stand together in the movement, which means that every one of these men will quit at the expiration of his contract if the union is not recognized by the trustees. In that way, within one year, more than three-quarters of the entire personnel of the orchestra must necessarily be replaced. Judge Cabot evidently is not at all concerned about this fact. I myself think it to be entirely impossible. He stated he would willingly continue the concerts under these adverse conditions and gradually build the orchestra up to its former standard. This will take a great many years, if it can be accomplished at all, and for the public there will be ample opportunity to do some watchful waiting. All other orchestras in the country are organized, and it seems that this fact does not interfere with their artistic development. I need mention only the Chicago and Philadelphia orchestras, which in the musical world are considered superior to ours, which proves the old notion of art and organization not belonging together to be an exploded theory.

All of this, coming after thirty-eight years of service in this orchestra, causes me the greatest mental agony I have ever suffered. It is but natural it should pain me beyond measure to witness this splendid organization, in which I have spent the best part of my life, broken beyond repair. There is yet time to save it, and I hope the trustees will relent.

FRADKIN VOICES STRIKERS' IDEAS

Eve Globe Mch 18

Ousted Concert Master Speaks in Church

Frederic Fradkin, dismissed concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told the community gathering of the Clarendon Street Baptist Church last night what the ideas of the 32 so-called strikers are and what part he had played in the unionization of the orchestra.

After describing the circumstances which brought about his refusal to arise, in response to the beckon of M Monteux, the conductor, at the concert in Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon two weeks ago, Mr Fradkin said:

"I was called discourteous for not rising. Granting that my conduct could have been considered discourteous, nevertheless I did leave something to the imagination of the audience. They could have considered that, perhaps, I had some reason for not leaving my chair.

"Now, no lady or gentleman will hiss a performer under any circumstances in any public hall. They left nothing to the imagination. By hissing, they were certainly discourteous and unmannerly. The demonstration was not unanimous, for the next day I received many notes and telephone calls from those in the audience deploring what had happened the night before."

Mr Fradkin stated that the orchestra was retrograding from the high standard it had set in the past because the trustees have refused to allow union musicians to play in it.

"In Maj Higginson's time there were no unions, and there was not so much musical talent in America, but in the last 35 years affairs have changed. Judge Cabot is conscientiously attempting to follow in Maj Higginson's footsteps, but he forgets, or is trying to forget, what we fought the war for, democracy.

"The judge wants to get European musicians. Musicians are as scarce in Europe as they are here. And if they were not we have immigration laws that forbid their entry to this country, besides which many of the European countries have emigration laws that forbid them leaving Europe.

"I told Judge Cabot that he would lose the men if he did not allow the union. He said he would replace them if it took 10 years. It will take longer than that."

Stating that Judge Cabot claimed he must have an unrestricted field in which to choose the members of the orchestra, Mr Fradkin declared the unrestricted field is far more limited than the restricted, for there are 100,000 members of the American Federation of Musicians.

Mr Fradkin said that the men who went out were the ones who wanted to hold the orchestra together and that the union men who were still in the orchestra were simply completing the season and next Fall would begin engagements with other orchestras to which they were already under contract.

Arthur Berenson, attorney for the dismissed members of the orchestra, reviewed the situation. Many questions were asked. George W. Coleman presided.

morn Globe
18, 1920 Mar 18

BANKER TO BACK UNION ORCHESTRA

Support for Symphony Men If Concert Succeeds

Opera House to Be Hired for Series, Strikers Are Told

On the result of the concert to be given by the striking Symphony Orchestra musicians at the Colonial Theatre next Sunday night will rest whether a prominent State-st banker will back an organization to be known as the Union Boston Symphony Orchestra. This fact was made known at a meeting of the strikers yesterday by Gustav Hein, the trumpeter.

The offer, it is said, is conditional on the concert being a financial and artistic success, and, according to the members of the committee yesterday, the financial end is now assured, owing to the advance sale of tickets, while they say that the makeup of the orchestra assures the other feature of it.

If the concert Sunday night proves a success the proposed backer of the new organization, it is announced, will engage the Boston Opera House for a series of four Sunday night concerts by the union musicians. The receipts to be [illegible] concerts, with [illegible] mouth, Barnstable, Dukes and [illegible] Counties—Brockton, Hingham, Middleboro, Plymouth, Barnstable, Chatham, Provincetown and all adjacent territory not mentioned in Plymouth and Barnstable Counties.

Harry E. Anderson, Brockton	20,000
Joseph M. Braff, Brockton	35,000
Sumner Keith, Bridgewater	12,500
Oscar J. Rockwell, Brockton	18,500

DISTRICT 14

Franklin, Hampden, Berkshire and Hampshire Counties.

(Entrants desired.)

DISTRICT 15

Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut and all other territory not included in any other district.

Wm. F. Chambers, Newmarket, N. H.	74,5
Alphonse Lagrange, Greenwich, Me.	12,5
Samuel B. Currier, Jr., East Andover, N. H.

L TELL ABOUT SYMPHONY STRIKE

rederic Fradkin, deposed concert-mas-r of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, nd Atty. Arthur Berenson will be the hief speakers at an open forum meeting onight at 7:30 o'clock in the Clarendon treet Baptist Church. Mr. Fradkin and
tty. Berenson will relate the details of he strike of members of the Boston ymphony Orchestra and subsequent eparation of 32 players from the organiation. A questionnaire will follow when Mr. Fradkin and Atty. Berenson will nswer pertinent inquiries from the auience. The public is invited.

MONDAY MORNI

CONCERT BY FEDERATION ORCHESTRA

Large and Enthusiastic Audience Pleased at Colonial

BY OLIN DOWNES

A concert announced on the cover
the programme as "a symphony ncert by the union musicians forrly members of the Boston Sym-
ny Orchestra," was given last night
the Colonial Theatre. These for-members of the Boston Symphony
hestra, who were present to the mber of 32, were found principally he string division.

he entire orchestra numbered 64.
violins were headed by Fredric dkin, the concertmaster discharged
the Boston Symphony Orchestra, leader of the men who played on occasion.

DKIN AND HEIM SOLOISTS

addition to the former Symphony
in the string section some half others were found, including a st, a bassoonist, the tuba player,
of the harps, two tympanists and
former trumpeter of the Boston
hony, Mr. Heim, who played Sul-
's "Lost Chord" as a solo. Mr.
kin's solo was the "Meditation"
"Thais." The orchestral pieces
Beethovens third "Leonore" over-
a suite of music from Bizet's nen," Strauss's waltz "In the ains" and Wagner's "Tannhauser
ure."

e was a large and very enthusi-audience, the balconies being sold
There were ovations for Emil hauer, the conductor; for the tra and for the soloists. The pro-e evidently pleased. It was on es of popular rather than sym-
music, if one excepts the two
r works by German masters.
were capable performances by nced musicians. Mr. Mollen-
s a conductor needs no intro-
to Boston music lovers today.
n beat, his complete authority, tine that he has long since mas-
make him an extremely capable
not an over-imaginative inter-
That the performances should
Boston Symphony quality was out of the question. It would ir to judge this concert by any ndards. Nor is it surprising string division, wth a pre-ce of Symphony players, played special brilliancy.
indeed, a Fradkin rather than
hony" concert. Mr. Fradkin, aying the sentimental melody
ais," had to play two encores,
d very easily have played five,
usiasm of the audience, ap-
not cooling as he proceeded.
n was likewise encored after

middle of the programme
renton, international officer of ican Federation of Musicians,
as the representative of Presi-ph N. Webber, who could not t, characterized the Boston
Orchestra as a "foreign inon American soil."
mphony Orchestras in every
in this country are union-speaker said, "and the union-as in no way affected the nor would it affect the Bostra."
he organization of the Ameration of Musicians, Mr. Bren-
there was little chance for
musicians in this country,
s organization the American
d his opportunity and made

A TO ABOPT

What Record Readers Say

The Record assumes no responsibility for opinions expressed by contributors to this department. Letters to be printed should be signed with writer's name and address. Name will not be printed if the contributor requests its omission. Short letters are preferred and are likely to secure more prompt printing than long ones.—Editor.

FROM A VETERAN SYMPHONY PLAYER

To the Editor:—

Will you kindly publish this letter in justice to one of the oldest members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

To the music loving public: Being the oldes member among those who refused to play at Symphony Hall Saturday, March 6, I wish to explain leagues and myself to proceed in that manner.

"When tis new era of democracy dawned upo us, we were told by President Wilso that the governed had some right in deciding the form of government he wished, all of which makes helpful reading, but in practice this is resseful to a certain set of people.

"When a committee of the orchestra, I being one of them, called upon Mr. Monteux, himself a member of the Federation of Musicians of France, in regard to the union question, he assured us of his absolute neutrality. At the same time through his attitude toward Mr. Fradkin, a strong and altruistic promoter of our cause, Mr. Monteux showed plainly that his statement to us was not sincere and thus the situation grew more and more acute and finally led to the most unfortunate occurrence on Friday afternoon. I want to state right here that I deplore Mr. Fradkin's refusal to rise when bidden to do so by MrMonteux, but it is apparent that the tatment meted out to him by Mr. Monux was irritating beyond human endance. We felt obliged to uphold hi since Mr. Fradkin made his sacrifice for us.

Judge Cabot hadstated that the Fradkin incident hanothing to do whatsoever with the ion movement. He is quite correct he refers to it directly, but indirectly is only too evident that this action was the sole cause of all the title. Prob ably the most important factor in our move is that this is a great opportunity to open the eyes of the public to the fact that a great crisis in regard to the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was at hand.

THURSDAY, MARCH 18

"Altogether 74 members have pledged themselves to stand together in this movement, which means that every one of these men must quit at the expiration of his contract if the union is not recognized by the trustees. In that way within one year more than three-quarters of the entire personnel of the orchestra must necessarily be replaced. Judge Cabot evidently is not at all concerned about this fact—I myself think it to be entirely impossible. He stated that he would willingly continue the concerts under these adverse conditions and gradually build it up to its former standard. This will take a great many years, if it can be accomplished at all, and for the public there will be ample opportunity to do some watchful waiting. All other orchestras in the country are organized and it seems that this fact does not interfere with their artistic development. I need only mention the Chicago and Philadelphia Orchestras, which, in the musical world, are considered our superior, which proves that the old notion of art and organization not belonging together to be an exploded theory.

"All of this coming after 33 years of service in this orchestra causes me the greatest mental agony I ever suffered. It is but natural that it would pain me beyond measure to witness this splendid organization, in which I have spent the best part of my life, broken beyond repair. There is yet time to save it, and I hope the trustees will relent."

Otto Roth.

Boston.

have fought a war for democracy." The speaker was again applauded when he said: "Judge Cabot would not talk to one of his waiters in his club as he talked to the orchestra, because he knows the waiters would not stand it, while for a Symphony player to throw up his job means disrupting home ties, and traveling 200 miles or more. All the trustees are men of money and

FRADKIN GETS PUBLIC HEARING

With Atty. Berenson Airs Symphony Discords at Church Forum

AUDIENCE SHOWS STRONG SYMPATHY

Fredric Fradkin, deposed concert-master of Symphony Orchestra, and Arthur Berenson, attorney for the striking players, discussed before an audience which proved to be entirely sympathetic, in the Clarendon Street Baptist Church last evening, the strike of 32 players, and the future of the orchestra. George W. Coleman presided. The two chief speakers predicted that Judge Cabot will find it impossible to fill the vacancies, although quoting him as asserting: "I'll replace every man if it takes ten years."

Mr. Fradkin described how, at the Cambridge concert, he had been ejected from the dressing room by Conductor Monteux, the latter, although a member of a union in France, declaring "This is the management's side," and the scene at the following concert in Symphony Hall, when Fradkin failed to rise with the remainder of the orchestra after the demonstration of applause.

"Treated Like a Beggar"

He offered new evidence of his allegation that the demonstration had been planned for Monteux by quoting the librarian as saying, just prior to the concert: "Fradkin, we're going to see this afternoon who's going to get ahead, you or Monteux." The speaker asked his audience "whether, in view of the insult to the orchestra by Mr. Monteux, and the evident intent to applaud him, I ought to have got up?" (Cries of "No.")

Mr. Fradkin continued: "I might not have been able to rise. Only a few weeks before, after the children's concert, I found myself stuck to my chair, by gum. And, I might have been sick that afternoon. Yet the audience hissed me. They who hissed were discourteous (Cries of "Yes" and "Amen"); and at midnight that night, although I had apologized for any mistaken views, the management sent me a dismissal by special delivery, treating me like a beggar, not as a man.

"Judge Cabot is trying conscientiously to follow Maj. Higginson, but forgets that times have changed, and that we power and are utterly unable to understand the point of view of a man who has to work for his living."

In reply to questions as to whether "Mr. Monteux is only a third rate conductor, as alleged in Chicago papers," Mr. Fradkin said: "The rules of the union forbid slurring remarks upon any fellow-musician."

Atty. Berenson said the action of the trustees in holding back the pay of the 32 men now out was illegal and that he intends to take the matter into court, believing the trustees will have to pay the entire compensation to the end of the season. He reviewed the attempts of 18 years to unionize the "only non-union symphony orchestra in the entire United States."

NEW OFFER TO UNION PLAYERS

Broker May Back a New Symphony Orchestra

Post Mar 18

A new offer by a State street broker to back a Symphony orchestra to be known as the Union Boston Symphony Orchestra has been recived by the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra now out on strike. The offer has been made through Gustav Heim, trumpeter of the Boston Symphony, soloist and one of the striking players.

The offer of the broker is conditional, however, on the outcome of the benefit concert to be given by the strikers at the Colonial Theatre next Sunday night. If the concert proves a success from a musical standpoint the broker who has made the offer, promises to engage the Boston Opera House for a series of four Sunday concerts to be held by the union players. With the money raised from these concerts he promises to start a fund with which to organize the new orchestra.

It was announced yesterday that Carl Hampe, noted as a trombone player, would play with the union men at their concert next Sunday night and will also join the proposed new orchestra. He was originally a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but left the organization a few years ago.

ganization on its tour of New York and southern cities. It is said that he is going to pay his own expenses of making the trip to Boston for the strikers' concert, rejoining the orchestra in time for the concert in Newark on Monday.

The assertion was made last evening by strike leaders that Georges Longy and other members of the orchestra are disgruntled at having to play with pupils from the Conservatory of Music and pensioners, who have been called back to service in place of the strikers. The strikers will meet again today at 10 A. M.

YMPHONY STRIKERS PLAN NEW ORCHESTRA

$100,000 Pledged by Four Women for Purpose

As a result of the pledges of four women to give $25,000 each to start a new Symphony Orchestra in this city, Arthur Berenson, attorney for the striking musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will begin legal steps today to form the new organization. At a meeting yesterday Frederic Fradkin announced the pledges of the money. A committee was appointed to act with attorney Berenson in putting the project into effect.

Last night, leaders of the strikers stated that among the chief features of the new organization will be free scholarships for students in need: the entire organization, including conductor, to be American citizens, and the assurance that the new organization will have the services of one of the most famous musicians in this country as conductor. This man is also one of the most gifted composers in the country.

DISTEEL WHEELS ON 1920.

Herald Mar 18

NEW SYMPHONY TO INCORPORATE

Strikers Say They Have $100,000 Pledged for an All-American Orchestra

"GIFTED COMPOSER" TO BE CONDUCTOR

Preliminary legal action toward the formation of a new orchestra by the strikers and other union members of the present Boston Symphony Orchestra will be made today by Atty. Arthur Berenson, counsel for the 33 musicians dismissed.

Fredric Fradkin, the discharged concertmaster, announced at a meeting of the strikers in the St. Botolph street headquarters that four Boston women had offered to subscribe $25,000 each to start a new orchestra.

Plan All-American Orchestra

The meeting appointed a committee to act with Atty. Berenson in any steps that may be necessary to a realization of the project.

Among the chief features in connection with the projected incorporation, as pointed out last night by members of the committee, are that free scholarships will be given to talented students who need assistance, and composers, the conductor and all players will be Americans. The new organization, it was said, is assured of the services as a permanent leader of "the most gifted composer and conductor in America today."

The strikers who attended the meeting stated that A. Laus, member of the American Federation of Musicians, but who did not go on strike because of his personal regard for Conductor Monteux, has said that he will play at the concert the strikers are to give in the Colonial Theatre Sunday evening.

Laus is a French army veteran of the world-war. He played first bassoon in the orchestra and is now with the or-

Thurs Mar 18 THE

SYMPHONY ROW SPLITS BACK BAY SOCIETY CIRCLES

Back Bay society cricles have split over the recent troubles in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one faction taking the part of 33 former members who have taken steps to start a second symphony orchestra in this city, and the other espousing the action of the trustees headed by Judge Cabot.

Argument over the respective merits of the players' silde of the controversy as compared with that of the trustees reached such heat that at a recent society luncheon a well known Boston society leader left in anger.

Announcement was made today from the executive committee of the former members of the orchestra that officers

BOSTON TRAVELER,

have been made through various sources to take them back into the orchestra organization on their own terms.

THE SECEDERS' SIDE

Trans Mar 18

A Letter from Otto Roth About the Present Strife in the Symphony Orchestra—Timely Explanation and Temperate Prediction with Sincere Feeling Behind

OTTO ROTH, for years one of the first violinists of the Symphony Orchestra, and for long a familiar figure in Boston in and out of Symphony Hall, has sent to the New York Tribune a letter about the present secession from the band. He intends it apparently for the information of subscribers to the concerts of the orchestra in New York. It deserves to be reprinted here as well, since at home the seceders have not been fortunate in their spokesmen. Unlike Fradkin of the wounded vanities, Mr. Roth has no personal grievance to air; unlike the exuberant "counsellor" to the strikers, he eschews rhetorical fluff. He even writes as a man who feels deeply and sincerely his present separation from cherished work and associations. Possibly he exaggerates the importance of the omnipresent and insistent Fradkin in the current strife, but his letter explains the puzzling loyalty of the seceders to a man and a musician whom of old they neither liked nor respected. Whatever the reader's judgment, Mr. Roth deserves to be read. He writes:

When a committee of the orchestra—I being one of them—called upon Mr. Monteux, himself a member of the Federation of Musicians of France, in regard to the union question, he assured us of his absolute neutrality. At the same time, through his attitude toward Mr. Fradkin, a strong and altruistic promoter of our cause, Mr. Monteux showed plainly that his statement to us was not sincere and thus the situation grew more and more acute and finally led to the most unfortunate occurrence on Friday afternoon. I want to state right here that I deplore Mr. Fradkin's refusal to rise when bidden to do so by Mr. Monteux, but it is apparent that the treatment meted out to him by Mr. Monteux was irritating beyond human endurance. We felt obliged to uphold him since Mr. Fradkin made his sacrifice for us.

Judge Cabot had stated that the Fradkin incident had nothing whatsoever to do with the union movement. He is quite correct if he refers to it directly, but indirectly it is only too evident that this agitation was the sole cause of all the trouble. Probably the most important factor in our move is that this is a great opportunity to open the eyes of the public to the fact that a great crisis in regard to the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is at hand.

Altogether seventy-four have pledged themselves to stand together in the movement, which means that every one of these men will quit at the expiration of his contract if the union is not recognized by the trustees. In that way, within one year, more than three-quarters of the entire personnel of the orchestra must necessarily be replaced. Judge Cabot evidently is not at all concerned about this fact. I myself think it to be entirely impossible. He stated he would willingly continue the concerts under these adverse conditions and gradually build the orchestra up to its former standard. This will take a great many years, if it can be accomplished at all, and for the public there will be ample opportunity to do some watchful waiting. All other orchestras in the country are organized, and it seems that this fact does not interfere with their artistic development. I need mention only the Chicago and Philadelphia orchestras, which in the musical world are considered superior to ours, which prove the old notion of art and organization not belonging together to be an exploded theory.

All of this, coming after thirty-eight years of service in this orchestra, causes me the greatest mental agony I have ever suffered. It is but natural it should pain me beyond measure to witness this splendid organization, in which I have spent the best part of my life, broken beyond repair. There is yet time to save it, and I hope the trustees will relent.

FRADKIN VOICES STRIKERS' IDEAS

Eve Globe Mar 18

Ousted Concert Master Speaks in Church

Frederic Fradkin, dismissed concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told the community gathering of the Clarendon Street Baptist Church last night what the ideas of the 32 so-called strikers are and what part he had played in the unionization of the orchestra.

After describing the circumstances which brought about his refusal to arise, in response to the beckon of M Monteux, the conductor, at the concert in Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon two weeks ago, Mr Fradkin said:

"I was called discourteous for not rising. Granting that my conduct could have been considered discourteous, nevertheless I did leave something to the imagination of the audience. They could have considered that, perhaps, I had some reason for not leaving my chair.

"Now, no lady or gentleman will hiss a performer under any circumstances in any public hall. They left nothing to the imagination. By hissing, they were certainly discourteous and unmannerly. The demonstration was not unanimous, for the next day I received many notes and telephone calls from those in the audience deploring what had happened the night before."

Mr Fradkin stated that the orchestra was retrograding from the high standard it had set in the past because the trustees have refused to allow union musicians to play in it.

"In Maj Higginson's time there were no unions, and there was not so much musical talent in America, but in the last 35 years affairs have changed. Judge Cabot is conscientiously attempting to follow in Maj Higginson's footsteps, but he forgets, or is trying to forget, what we fought the war for, democracy.

"The judge wants to get European musicians. Musicians are as scarce in Europe as they are here. And if they were not we have immigration laws that forbid their entry to this country, besides which many of the European countries have emigration laws that forbid them leaving Europe.

"I told Judge Cabot that he would lose the men if he did not allow the union. He said he would replace them if it took 10 years. It will take longer than that."

Stating that Judge Cabot claimed he must have an unrestricted field in which to choose the members of the orchestra, Mr Fradkin declared the unrestricted field is far more limited than the restricted, for there are 100,000 members of the American Federation of Musicians.

Mr Fradkin said that the men who went out were the ones who wanted to hold the orchestra together and that the union men who were still in the orchestra were simply completing the season and next Fall would begin engagements with other orchestras to which they were already under contract.

Arthur Berenson, attorney for the dismissed members of the orchestra, reviewed the situation. Many questions were asked. George W. Coleman presided.

morn Globe
18, 1920 Mar 15

BANKER TO BACK UNION ORCHESTRA

Support for Symphony Men If Concert Succeeds

Opera House to Be Hired for Series, Strikers Are Told

On the result of the concert to be given by the striking Symphony Orchestra musicians at the Colonial Theatre next Sunday night will rest whether a prominent State-st banker will back an organization to be known as the Union Boston Symphony Orchestra. This fact was made known at a meeting of the strikers yesterday by Gustav Hein, the trumpeter.

The offer, it is said, is conditional on the concert being a financial and artistic success, and, according to the members of the committee yesterday, the financial end is now assured, owing to the advance sale of tickets, while they say that the makeup of the orchestra assures the other feature of it.

If the concert Sunday night proves a success the proposed backer of the new organization, it is announced, will engage the Boston Opera House for a series of four Sunday night concerts by the union musicians. The receipts to be [illegible] concerts, with mouth, Barnstable, Dukes and [illegible] Counties—Brockton, Hingham, Middleboro, Plymouth, Barnstable, Chatham, Provincetown and all adjacent territory not mentioned in Plymouth and Barnstable Counties.

Harry E. Anderson, Brockton	20,000
Joseph M. Braff, Brockton	35,000
Sumner Keith, Bridgewater	12,500
Oscar J. Rockwell, Brockton	18,500

DISTRICT 14

Franklin, Hampden, Berkshire and Hampshire Counties.

(Entrants desired.)

DISTRICT 15

Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut and all other territory not included in any other district.

Wm. F. Chambers, Newmarket, N. H.	74,5
Alphonse Lagrange, Greenwich, Me.	12,5
Samuel B. Currier, Jr., East Andover, N. H.

SYMPHONY WINS OVATION IN N. Y.

Boston Orchestra, Decimated but Undaunted, Gives Fine Concert

PERFORMANCE IS A MONTEUX TRIUMPH

[Special Dispatch to the Herald]

NEW YORK, March 18—Out of its recent welter of internal dissensions, labor troubles and threatened disorganization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight emerged upon the stage of Carnegie Hall decimated but undaunted, scarred with battle, but triumphant in the result.

The best are left of "the old guard" and enough of them to play a splendid concert, even though the onset of their thinned ranks seemed at times wavering and almost futile in the mighty tonal massifs of Wagnerian music.

Less Than 60 Musicians

Of the regiment that once responded to the batons of Muck, Rabaud and Monteux, less than 60 musicians last evening responded to the summons of their conductor's baton, but that 60 was made up of artists, every man of them, and in some passages of the onerous program, notably in the Beethoven symphony and in "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried," the deathless spirit and the unsurpassed artistry of the famous orchestra spoke in unforgettable music.

Conductor Monteux was able to deliver the Fourth symphony with amazing power, roundness and volume, except perhaps in the majestic and overtopping finale, in which there was evidence of diminished strength in the brasses, the great strings and the percussion. But it was a lovely performance, for all that, played with impeccable sympathy, clarity and unison in the second movement and in the trio and allegro of the third.

The prelude to "Lohengrin," which began the second half of the program, led the gradual way into mightier excerpts from Wagner, and never was there better reading of a "Siegfried Idyll" or of the third act of "The Meistersingers" than M. Monteux gave to them this evening. His men played with the zealous fervor of the splendid musicians they are, and derived many glorious passages from "The Dance of the Apprentices" and "Homage to Hand Sachs." The fine audience was generous in its applause and the orchestra responded with splendid sincerity and spirit.

WARNS OF PLAN OF

er of pictures on hand. Pictures er used or not.

Herald Mar 19

CLEVELAND BIDS FOR SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MEN

An offer to the former members of the Symphony orchestra of a contract for a 30 weeks' season at double the yearly salary they received with the Boston orchestra has been made by a representative of the Cleveland Symphony orchestra.

Places for 10 violins, six violas, four 'cellos, one bass viol and from 10 to 12 wind instruments, including oboe, bassoon, horn and trumpet, are open in the Cleveland orchestra to the former Symphony players. The Cleveland orchestra, which has a membership of 75, intends to bring up its strength to 100.

Mr. Moor, representing the Cleveland management, will return to Boston shortly to negotiate with union Boston Symphony players now on tour whose contracts expire this year.

Rehearsals for the concert Sunday night will take puace tomorrow morning in the headquarters of the Boston Musicians' Union, St. Botolph street. Emil Mollenhauer will conduct, and Fredric Fradkin, violin, and Gustav Heim, trumpet, will be the soloists.

The program for the concert follows:

Overture, "Leonore" No. 3.....Beethoven
Trumpet solo, "The Lost Chord".....Sullivan
Gustav Heim
Carmen Suite No. 1.....Bizet
Address, Joseph N. Weber, president of the American Federation of Musicians.
Remarks, Charles Purcell of the "Magic Melody" company; Louis Bennison of the "Dere Mable" company.
Violin solo, Meditation from "Thais".Massenet
Frederic Fradkin
Waltz, "In the Mountains".....Strauss
Overture, "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

DUMP ASHES ON TRACKS

New York "Anxious" at the Boston Symphony Concert, But Nothing Unusual Happened

"Boston papers please copy" is the request at the end of James Gibbons Huneker's criticism in the New York World of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall last night, so here goes:

"Orchestras, like Nations, are happiest when they don't wash their doubtful linen in public. Through no fault of Conductor Pierre Monteux, who conducted the fifth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, he finds himself in the center of an unmusical whirlwind, what he would call a "tourbillon," while the menacing clash of "Die Wacht am Rhein" drowns the martial measures of the "Marseillaise."

"The ostensible reason given for the recent row in Boston is the musical union; but the fundamental cause is, unhappily, racial dissonance. So the famous band from Boston, robbed of more than a third of its players, limped to New York yesterday determined to play if the organization had only 20 members, as Manager Brennan put it.

"After the defection in Boston some old members came forward, and among them were Charles Martin Loeffler, our leading composer, and Timothee Adamowski, who offered their services. Both these artists were first violins in the orchestra when Franz Kneisel was concertmaster and Gericke conductor. Arcadian days indeed.

"As Mr Fradkin is now playing the role of the insurgent Lucifer, his seat was occupied by Mr Theodorowicz, and we also noted the veteran violoncellist, Alwyn Schroeder, at his accustomed seat desk; M Longy, oboist extraordinary, whose tone resembles the etched line of a graphic composition, was like thin fire as it ringed the woodwind choir.

"There were only 10 first fiddlers, as against the usual 16; the contrabassi were reduced to six. But the demon drummer, huddled over his kettledrums, punctuated the sinister atmosphere with his subtle tapping.

"Ah! if Vance Thompson had only been with us to pen a prose-poem on the vastitude of silence; also to give Don the Marquis (and his patents of nobility date from the stars) a chance to write a new version of 'How to hear and grow anxious.'

"There, the cat's out of the bag, a calica cat, full grown. The word 'anxious' liberates out pent-up nervousness. Everybody in the audience was nervous. Bomb outrages, false tempi, stopped horns—stopped by His Honor—what catastrophe was not predicted? And nothing happened. The orchestra ran on half-steam, though not at half-speed. Maitre Monteux stood on the pilot box and cheered his valiant crew.

"It would be idle to deny that dynamic contrasts were missing. The foundational tone of the orchestra seemed to drop out at times. But the strings were plangent, tonal enlanca excellent, considering circumstances, and much of the playing not only charmbut of a finesse.

"The original program scheme was changed. The conductor tempered the wind to the shorn strings. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and a group of Wagner excerpts made up an interesting evening. The last matinee of the season here occurs tomorrow afternoon at the same hall.

"Cheer up, Monteux! The musical world will not allow such an orchestra to perish because of rebellion in the ranks. There is always as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it, even if the finny tribe in this case happens to be 'sacred codfish.'"

Record Mar 19

Former Symphony Men Offered Double Pay by Cleveland Management

Thirty-Week Contracts Offered to Boston Players Who Went on Strike

An offer made by the management of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra to take practically every player, recently connected with the Boston Symphony orchestra, at about double the salary which they received here, became known today.

Mr. Moore, of the managerial staff of the Cleveland orchestra, left Boston today after conferring with most of the men now out of the orchestra. He offered them a 30-week contract at very attractive wages, and a possibility of an additional 10 weeks work during the summer season, it was stated.

He intends, he said, to return to Boston next week to negotiate with union members who are now in the Boston orchestra, but at present on the Southern trip.

The Cleveland orchestra, which ranks high among the orchestras of the country, is planning to increase its membership from 75 to more than 100 anxious for the orchestra to hold together and not as men who were working for its dissolution, as has been charged.

"Last year," he said, "21 men left the orchestra; the year before 22 were discharged as Germans, there are 32 of us out now and there are 20 men who will leave the orchestra at the end of the season as they are under contract for next year elsewhere."

Twenty-odd men who are now playing in the orchestra are in the union. They have only the permission of the union to finish the season. They can remain next year if the orchestra is unionized, if it is not they will have the choice of accepting a life sentence in the Symphony or of seeking union work."

"It's been said that the orchestra did not lose much when it lost us; it lost a solid block of nine first violins, nine violas, a first trumpeter and a first tympani. They say that the union was seeking to disrupt the orchestra. Let me say that when it looked as if the orchestra would break up and the managers of other symphonies came to Boston to get our men the union absolutely forbade the managers to deal with the musicians. That is how the union sought to break up the Boston Symphony."

LEGAL

UNION MAY START A NEW ORCHESTRA

Globe Mar 20

Committee Authorized to Make Investigation

A resolve to empower a committee to investigate the possibility of starting a new symphony orchestra in Boston with the dismissed members of the present orchestra as a nucleus was passed last night at a meeting in Pilgrim Hall, 14 Beacon st, held under the auspices of the League for Democratic Control to discuss the recent troubles of the Symphony.

The resolution was offered by John Rothchild, one of the speakers, the orchestra to be one with a wider public appeal than the present one and also to act as a school to develop musicians. The committee will be appointed by W. C. Gerrish, chairman of the executive committee of the League for Democratic Control.

Speakers at the meeting besides Mr Rothschild included Arthur Berenson, attorney for the dismissed players; Frderic Fradkin, ex-concert master, and Allan L. Langley, secretary of the union players' committee. Mr Fradkin reviewed the incidents leading to his refusal to stand at the concert two weeks ago, for which he was dismissed, and said that he was not the only one who did not stand, that there were 10 others who kept their seats.

"Judge Cabot must realize," declared Mr Fradkin, "that if he wants to keep the orchestra, not merely the name of the orchestra, he must go to the unrestricted field for players, and he has the wrong idea of what is the unrestricted field."

Mr Langley defended the action of the men who were "locked out" by the trustees, as the men who were most come up in Holyoke police court March 31.

$250,000 OFFERED RIVAL SYMPHONY

sdv Mar

Joseph N. Weber, president of the A. F. of M., will today confer with the Committee of Six, representing the striking musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was announced last night. The meeting will follow a rehearsal for tonight's concert at the Colonial Theatre.

Frederic Fradkin, whose dismissal from the orchestra led to the strike, stated last night that approximately $250,000 has been offered in support of the proposed rival symphony organization of union players. "We have received offers for tremendous amounts of money," he declared, "but can take no action in the matter until after we have been incorporated."

Tonight's concert, if successful may lead to the organization of a new symphony orchestra in Boston with all union members.

Emil Mollenhauer will conduct the concert, and Mr. Fradkin and Gustav Heim, for many years trumpet soloist of the Symphony Hall band, will be the principal soloists. Charles Purcell and Louis Bennison, two stage stars, will assist.

BOSTON GIRLS WIN

DEFIES CABOT

Fradkin Challenges Symphony Head to Public Debate

Frederic Fradkin, former concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today challenged Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, to a public debate on the merits of the Symphony controversy.

Fradkin, storm-centre of the trouble between the players and the management, today declared that this would be the only fair way to let the public know the truth of the matter.

"Judge Cabot has the privilege of naming the place and date of the debate," said Fradkin to The Record. Continuing, he said, "I'm not a lawyer but I'm willing to go before the public with this question and debate it with Judge Cabot."

Judge Cabot had not received the invitation at this writing. Fradkin stated that the challenge would be in the mail before night.

NATIONAL CONVENTI

ADA FORM

Amer. Mar 22

FRADKIN GETS OVATION

New Orchestra of ex-Symphony Musicians Play to Large and Enthusiastic Crowd

Former members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra received an ovation at their concert in the Colonial Theatre that lasted fully two minutes when they made their appearance. The theatre was filled to standing room by an audience that applauded noisily and long at every opportunity.

The program included addresses by Harold E. Brenton of the international executive board of the American Federation of Musicians, and by representatives of the "Magic Melody" and "Dere Mable" theatrical companies, now playing in Boston. Word was brought that the entire casts of these two companies were a unit behind the new members of the A. F. of M.

Brenton commended the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for aligning themselves with the federation. He said: "Practically every one of the Symphony orchestras in the country have recognized the union, Boston being the exception. It has always been the custom of the Boston trustees to seek their talent abroad and the orchestra has been a foreign one 'transplanted in America.'

"The first requisite of the American Federation of Musicians is that its members be American citizens, and our aim is to give American musicians an opportunity under fair conditions."

The concert was given by the thirty-three Symphony players who severed their relations recently, augmented by thirty-three more members of the local union. Emil Mollenhauer conducted.

That Concertmaster Frederic Fradkin was still "in favor" was clearly indicated by his reception. Not satisfied with only his rendition of "Meditation" from "Thais" by Massenet, the audience applauded for more and he gave two pleasing extras.

POLICE SEIZE SIX AT

EX-SYMPHONY MEN GIVE FINE CONCERT

Players Get Ovations From Big Audience

Globe Mar 22

Representative of the Musicians' Federation Makes Address

The Symphony concert in the Colonial Theatre last evening by the former musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who lost their positions owing to striking from sympathy with Fredric Fradkin, concert master, after he had been discharged, proved a great success, and they should benefit substantially from the proceeds.

The theatre was practically filled, the two balconies being taken to the limit of their capacity. The musicians, including Concert Master Fradkin, received veritable ovations on every possible occasion during the evening, as did Emil Mollenhauer, the veteran conductor, who wielded the baton for the evening, and Gustave Heim, trumpet soloist.

The program proved particularly popular, and the audience was so insistent that four different encores were accorded, two of them by Mr Fradkin after he had set the audience wild with an exquisite rendering of the Meditation from "Thais." Another was taken by Mr Heim.

The program began with "The Star Spangled Banner," invested with a grandeur seldom heard by the average person. It included a suite of five selections from "Carmen" and ended with the overture from "Tannhauser."

The orchestra consisted of 33 former members of the Symphony Orchestra with the addition of about as many musicians from union ranks.

At the end of the first part of the program, Henry D. Brenton, representing the American Federation of Musicians, addressed the audience, speaking very appreciatively of the late Maj Henry L. Higginson and of the fine orchestra he had built up here and maintained for so many years.

Mr Brenton said that the union has not the slightest desire to hamper the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its service to the public, but that it wants to see American musicians given an opportunity before Europeans when recruits are wanted in the orchestra.

The speaker declared that all the Symphony orchestras of other large American cities are unionized, but that "The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a foreign institution on American soil."

Charles Purcell and Louis Bennison, connected with two dramatic productions now playing here, both sent word that they were unable to appear as promised on the program. Comedian Woolsey of the "Dere Mable" company spoke a few fraternal words, acknowledging the obligations of the Actor's Equity to the Federation of Musicians.

1920. Herald Mar 22

STRIKERS GIVE FIRST CONCERT

Audience Cheers Former Symphony Players in Colonial Theatre

FRADKIN GETS MANY RECALLS

An audience responsive to the program in all its phases greeted the striking players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their concert at the Colonial Theatre last night. The greatest demonstration centred about Fredric Fradkin, deposed concertmaster of the Symphony Orchestra.

There was also vigorous response for Harry D. Brenton of the American Federation of Musicians and the sentiments he expressed in a speech as representative of President Joseph N. Webber of the association, who was unable to be present.

Recalled Four Times

Mr. Fradkin was recalled four times after he had rendered the Meditation from "Thais" as a violin solo and was compelled to give two encores, Kreisler's "Tambourine Chinois" and "The Beautiful Little Rosemarin." Gustav Heim drew hearty applause with a trumpet solo, "The Lord Chord."

Emil Mollenhauer conducted the concert, which opened with "The Star Spangled Banner." Then followed "Lenore" No. 3 and Bizet's "Les Toreadors."

Both balconies were filled solidly when the concert opened and the orchestra floor was crowded almost to capacity. The ranks of the strikers were re-enforced for the concert by other union musicians of the city.

Mr. Brenton made his address during intermission, first reading a telegram from President Webber noting that he was unable to appear because of a nervous breakdown. He called the Boston Symphony Orchestra "a foreign institution on American soil" and proceeded:

"I am out of my element here tonight, as I easily sense that I am facing a friendly audience. I am more at home when there is trouble to face, although I don't usually look for it, but generally get it."

Praises Federation

After stressing the fact that all symphonic orchestras all over the United States and Canada belong to the American Federation of Musicians, except the Boston Symphony, he declared that there was very little chance for the American boy or musician until the federation was established.

"This institution (referring to the Boston Symphony Orchestra) was founded by a remarkable man, against whom none of us have anything to say. These men asked the federation for assistance last February and they are here tonight as members of that organization. They have their own reasons for joining us. I asked one of their number for a reason and he replied 'that he wished to be a man and own his own soul for once.' They appealed to us and we gladly welcomed them as professional men and extended the hand of fellowship to them and we proffer it also to the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, if they will let us.

"There is only one thing the federation asks of any management—and that is that it first give America an opportunity to furnish its artists before scouring the whole of Europe. These gentlemen are full-fledged members of the union. 24 additional men still playing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra have completed their unionization and 13 others of that orchestra have applied for membership in the federation. We believe they will come in when they complete their present contracts.

SYMPHONY WINS OVATION IN N. Y.

Boston Orchestra, Decimated but Undaunted, Gives Fine Concert

PERFORMANCE IS A MONTEUX TRIUMPH

[Special Dispatch to the Herald]

NEW YORK, March 18—Out of its recent welter of internal dissensions, labor troubles and threatened disorganization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight emerged upon the stage of Carnegie Hall decimated but undaunted, scarred with battle, but triumphant in the result.

The best are left of "the old guard" and enough of them to play a splendid concert, even though the onset of their thinned ranks seemed at times wavering and almost futile in the mighty tonal massifs of Wagnerian music.

Less Than 60 Musicians

Of the regiment that once responded to the batons of Muck, Rabaud and Monteux, less than 60 musicians last evening responded to the summons of their conductor's baton, but that 60 was made up of artists, every man of them, and in some passages of the onerous program, notably in the Beethoven symphony and in "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried," the deathless spirit and the unsurpassed artistry of the famous orchestra spoke in unforgettable music.

Conductor Monteux was able to deliver the Fourth symphony with amazing power, roundness and volume, except perhaps in the majestic and overtopping finale, in which there was evidence of diminished strength in the brasses, the great strings and the percussion. But it was a lovely performance, for all that, played with impeccable sympathy, clarity and unison in the second movement and in the trio and allegro of the third.

The prelude to "Lohengrin," which began the second half of the program, led the gradual way into mightier excerpts from Wagner, and never was there better reading of a "Siegfried Idyll" or of the third act of "The Meistersingers" than M. Monteux gave to them this evening. His men played with the zealous fervor of the splendid musicians they are, and derived many glorious passages from "The Dance of the Apprentices" and "Homage to Hand Sachs." The fine audience was generous in its applause and the orchestra responded with splendid sincerity and spirit.

WARNS OF PLAN OF

...er of pictures on hand. Pictures ...er used or not.

CLEVELAND BIDS FOR SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MEN

An offer to the former members of the Symphony orchestra of a contract for a 30 weeks' season at double the yearly salary they received with the Boston orchestra has been made by a representative of the Cleveland Symphony orchestra.

Places for 10 violins, six violas, four 'cellos, one bass viol and from 10 to 12 wind instruments, including oboe, bassoon, horn and trumpet, are open in the Cleveland orchestra to the former Symphony players. The Cleveland orchestra, which has a membership of 75, intends to bring up its strength to 100.

Mr. Moor, representing the Cleveland management, will return to Boston shortly to negotiate with union Boston Symphony players now on tour whose contracts expire this year.

Rehearsals for the concert Sunday night will take puace tomorrow morning in the headquarters of the Boston Musicians' Union, St. Botolph street. Emil Mollenhauer will conduct, and Fredric Fradkin, violin, and Gustav Heim, trumpet, will be the soloists.

The program for the concert follows:

Overture, "Leonore" No. 3.....Beethoven
Trumpet solo, "The Lost Chord".....Sullivan
Gustav Heim
Carmen Suite No. 1.....Bizet
Address, Joseph N. Weber, president of the American Federation of Musicians.
Remarks, Charles Purcell of the "Magic Melody" company; Louis Bennison of the "Dere Mable" company.
Violin solo, Meditation from "Thais".Massenet
Frederic Fradkin
Waltz, "In the Mountains".....Strauss
Overture, "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

DUMP ASHES ON TRACKS

New York "Anxious" at the Boston Symphony Concert, But Nothing Unusual Happened

"Boston papers please copy" is the request at the end of James Gibbons Huneker's criticism in the New York World of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall last night, so here goes:

"Orchestras, like Nations, are happiest when they don't wash their doubtful linen in public. Through no fault of Conductor Pierre Monteux, who conducted the fifth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, he finds himself in the center of an unmusical whirlwind, what he would call a "tourbillon," while the menacing clash of "Die Wacht am Rhein" drowns the martial measures of the "Marseillaise."

"The ostensible reason given for the recent row in Boston is the musical union; but the fundamental cause is, unhappily, racial dissonance. So the famous band from Boston, robbed of more than a third of its players, limped to New York yesterday determined to play if the organization had only 20 members, as Manager Brennan put it.

"After the defection in Boston some old members came forward, and among them were Charles Martin Loeffler, our leading composer, and Timothee Adamowski, who offered their services. Both these artists were first violins in the orchestra when Franz Kneisel was concertmaster and Gericke conductor. Arcadian days indeed.

"As Mr Fradkin is now playing the role of the insurgent Lucifer, his seat was occupied by Mr Theodorowicz, and we also noted the veteran violoncellist, Alwyn Schroeder, at his accustomed seat desk; M Longy, oboist extraordinary, whose tone resembles the etched line of a graphic composition, was like thin fire as it ringed the woodwind choir.

"There were only 10 first fiddlers, as against the usual 16; the contrabassi were reduced to six. But the demon drummer, huddled over his kettledrums, punctuated the sinister atmosphere with his subtle tapping.

"Ah! if Vance Thompson had only been with us to pen a prose-poem on the vastitude of silence; also to give Don the Marquis (and his patents of nobility date from the stars) a chance to write a new version of 'How to hear and grow anxious.'

"There, the cat's out of the bag, a calica cat, full grown. The word 'anxious' liberates out pent-up nervousness. Everybody in the audience was nervous. Bomb outrages, false tempi, stopped horns—stopped by His Honor—what catastrophe was not predicted? And nothing happened. The orchestra ran on half-steam, though not at half-speed. Maitre Monteux stood on the pilot box and cheered his valiant crew.

"It would be idle to deny that dynamic contrasts were missing. The foundational tone of the orchestra seemed to drop out at times. But the strings were plangent, tonal enlanca excellent, considering circumstances, and much of the playing not only charmbut of a finesse.

"The original program scheme was changed. The conductor tempered the wind to the shorn strings. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and a group of Wagner excerpts made up an interesting evening. The last matinee of the season here occurs tomorrow afternoon at the same hall.

"Cheer up, Monteux! The musical world will not allow such an orchestra to perish because of rebellion in the ranks. There is always as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it, even if the finny tribe in this case happens to be 'sacred codfish.'"

Former Symphony Men Offered Double Pay by Cleveland Management

Thirty-Week Contracts Offered to Boston Players Who Went on Strike

An offer made by the management of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra to take practically every player, recently connected with the Boston Symphony orchestra, at about double the salary which they received here, became known today.

Mr. Moore, of the managerial staff of the Cleveland orchestra, left Boston today after conferring with most of the men now out of the orchestra. He offered them a 30-week contract at very attractive wages, and a possibility of an additional 10 weeks work during the summer season, it was stated.

He intends, he said, to return to Boston next week to negotiate with union members who are now in the Boston orchestra, but at present on the Southern trip.

The Cleveland orchestra, which ranks high among the orchestras of the country, is planning to increase its membership from 75 to more than 100

...anxious for the orchestra to hold ... gether and not as men who were working for its dissolution, as has been charged.

"Last year," he said, "21 men left the orchestra; the year before 22 were discharged as Germans, there are 32 of us out now and there are 20 men who will leave the orchestra at the end of the season as they are under contract for next year elsewhere."

Twenty-odd men who are now playing in the orchestra are in the union. They have only the permission of the union to finish the season. They can remain next year if the orchestra is unionized, if it is not they will have the choice of accepting a life sentence in the Symphony or of seeking union work."

"It's been said that the orchestra did not lose much when it lost us; it lost a solid block of nine first violins, nine violas, a first trumpeter and a first tympani. They say that the union was seeking to disrupt the orchestra. Let me say that when it looked as if the orchestra would break up and the managers of other symphonies came to Boston to get our men the union absolutely forbade the managers to deal with the musicians. That is how the union sought to break up the Boston Symphony."

LEGAL

UNION MAY START A NEW ORCHESTRA

Committee Authorized to Make Investigation

A resolve to empower a committee to investigate the possibility of starting a new symphony orchestra in Boston with the dismissed members of the present orchestra as a nucleus was passed last night at a meeting in Pilgrim Hall, 14 Beacon st, held under the auspices of the League for Democratic Control to discuss the recent troubles of the Symphony.

The resolution was offered by John Rothchild, one of the speakers, the orchestra to be one with a wider public appeal than the present one and also to act as a school to develop musicians. The committee will be appointed by W. C. Gerrish, chairman of the executive committee of the League for Democratic Control.

Speakers at the meeting besides Mr Rothschild included Arthur Berenson, attorney for the dismissed players; Frderic Fradkin, ex-concert master, and Allan L. Langley, secretary of the union players' committee. Mr Fradkin reviewed the incidents leading to his refusal to stand at the concert two weeks ago, for which he was dismissed, and said that he was not the only one who did not stand, that there were 10 others who kept their seats.

"Judge Cabot must realize," declared Mr Fradkin, "that if he wants to keep the orchestra, not merely the name of the orchestra, he must go to the unrestricted field for players, and he has the wrong idea of what is the unrestricted field."

Mr Langley defended the action of the men who were "locked out" by the trustees, as the men who were most ... to hold to-

...come up in Holyoke police court March 31.

$250,000 OFFERED RIVAL SYMPHONY

Joseph N. Weber, president of the A. F. of M., will today confer with the Committee of Six, representing the striking musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was announced last night. The meeting will follow a rehearsal for tonight's concert at the Colonial Theatre.

Frederic Fradkin, whose dismissal from the orchestra led to the strike, stated last night that approximately $250,000 has been offered in support of the proposed rival symphony organization of union players. "We have received offers for tremendous amounts of money," he declared, "but can take no action in the matter until after we have been incorporated."

Tonight's concert, if successful, may lead to the organization of a new symphony orchestra in Boston with all union members.

Emil Mollenhauer will conduct the concert, and Mr. Fradkin and Gustav Heim, for many years trumpet soloist of the Symphony Hall band, will be the principal soloists. Charles Purcell and Louis Bennison, two stage stars, will assist.

BOSTON GIRLS WIN

DEFIES CABOT

Fradkin Challenges Symphony Head to Public Debate

Frederic Fradkin, former concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today challenged Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, to a public debate on the merits of the Symphony controversy.

Fradkin, storm-centre of the trouble between the players and the management, today declared that this would be the only fair way to let the public know the truth of the matter.

"Judge Cabot has the privilege of naming the place and date of the debate," said Fradkin to The Record. Continuing, he said, "I'm not a lawyer but I'm willing to go before the public with this question and debate it with Judge Cabot."

Judge Cabot had not received the invitation at this writing. Fradkin stated that the challenge would be in the mail before night.

NATIONAL CONVENTI...

...ADA FORM...

FRADKIN GETS OVATION

New Orchestra of ex-Symphony Musicians Play to Large and Enthusiastic Crowd

Former members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra received an ovation at their concert in the Colonial Theatre that lasted fully two minutes when they made their appearance. The theatre was filled to standing room by an audience that applauded noisily and long at every opportunity.

The program included addresses by Harold E. Brenton of the international executive board of the American Federation of Musicians, and by representatives of the "Magic Melody" and "Dere Mable" theatrical companies, now playing in Boston. Word was brought that the entire casts of these two companies were a unit behind the new members of the A. F. of M.

Brenton commended the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for aligning themselves with the federation. He said: "Practically every one of the Symphony orchestras in the country have recognized the union, Boston being the exception. It has always been the custom of the Boston trustees to seek their talent abroad and the orchestra has been a foreign one 'transplanted in America.'

"The first requisite of the American Federation of Musicians is that its members be American citizens, and our aim is to give American musicians an opportunity under fair conditions."

The concert was given by the thirty-three Symphony players who severed their relations recently, augmented by thirty-three more members of the local union. Emil Mollenhauer conducted.

That Concertmaster Frederic Fradkin was still "in favor" was clearly indicated by his reception. Not satisfied with only his rendition of "Meditation" from "Thais" by Massenet, the audience applauded for more and he gave two pleasing extras.

POLICE SEIZE SIX AT ...AMBRIDGE ORAT...

EX-SYMPHONY MEN GIVE FINE CONCERT

Players Get Ovations From Big Audience

Representative of the Musicians' Federation Makes Address

The Symphony concert in the Colonial Theatre last evening by the former musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who lost their positions owing to striking from sympathy with Fredric Fradkin, concert master, after he had been discharged, proved a great success, and they should benefit substantially from the proceeds.

The theatre was practically filled, the two balconies being taken to the limit of their capacity. The musicians, including Concert Master Fradkin, received veritable ovations on every possible occasion during the evening, as did Emil Mollenhauer, the veteran conductor, who wielded the baton for the evening, and Gustave Heim, trumpet soloist.

The program proved particularly popular, and the audience was so insistent that four different encores were accorded, two of them by Mr Fradkin after he had set the audience wild with an exquisite rendering of the Meditation from "Thais." Another was taken by Mr Heim.

The program began with "The Star Spangled Banner," invested with a grandeur seldom heard by the average person. It included a suite of five selections from "Carmen" and ended with the overture from "Tannhauser."

The orchestra consisted of 35 former members of the Symphony Orchestra with the addition of about as many musicians from union ranks.

At the end of the first part of the program, Henry D. Brenton, representing the American Federation of Musicians, addressed the audience, speaking very appreciatively of the late Maj Henry L. Higginson and of the fine orchestra he had built up here and maintained for so many years.

Mr Brenton said that the union has not the slightest desire to hamper the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its service to the public, but that it wants to see American musicians given an opportunity before Europeans when recruits are wanted in the orchestra.

The speaker declared that all the Symphony orchestras of other large American cities are unionized, but that "The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a foreign institution on American soil."

Charles Purcell and Louis Bennison, connected with two dramatic productions now playing here, both sent word that they were unable to appear as promised on the program. Comedian Woolsey of the "Dere Mable" company spoke a few fraternal words, acknowledging the obligations of the Actor's Equity to the Federation of Musicians.

1920.

STRIKERS GIVE FIRST CONCERT

Audience Cheers Former Symphony Players in Colonial Theatre

FRADKIN GETS MANY RECALLS

An audience responsive to the program in all its phases greeted the striking players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their concert at the Colonial Theatre last night. The greatest demonstration centred about Fredric Fradkin, deposed concertmaster of the Symphony Orchestra.

There was also vigorous response for Harry D. Brenton of the American Federation of Musicians and the sentiments he expressed in a speech as representative of President Joseph N. Webber of the association, who was unable to be present.

Recalled Four Times

Mr. Fradkin was recalled four times after he had rendered the Meditation from "Thais" as a violin solo and was compelled to give two encores, Kreisler's "Tambourine Chinois" and "The Beautiful Little Rosemarin." Gustav Heim drew hearty applause with a trumpet solo, "The Lord Chord."

Emil Mollenhauer conducted the concert, which opened with "The Star Spangled Banner." Then followed "Lenore" No. 3 and Bizet's "Les Toreadors."

Both balconies were filled solidly when the concert opened and the orchestra floor was crowded almost to capacity. The ranks of the strikers were re-enforced for the concert by other union musicians of the city.

Mr. Brenton made his address during intermission, first reading a telegram from President Webber noting that he was unable to appear because of a nervous breakdown. He called the Boston Symphony Orchestra "a foreign institution on American soil" and proceeded:

"I am out of my element here tonight, as I easily sense that I am facing a friendly audience. I am more at home when there is trouble to face, although I don't usually look for it, but generally get it."

Praises Federation

After stressing the fact that all symphonic orchestras all over the United States and Canada belong to the American Federation of Musicians, except the Boston Symphony, he declared that there was very little chance for the American boy or musician until the federation was established.

"This institution (referring to the Boston Symphony Orchestra) was founded by a remarkable man, against whom none of us have anything to say. These men asked the federation for assistance last February and they are here tonight as members of that organization. They have their own reasons for joining us. I asked one of their number for a reason and he replied 'that he wished to be a man and own his own soul for once.' They appealed to us and we gladly welcome them as professional men and extended the hand of fellowship to them and we proffer it also to the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, if they will let us.

"There is only one thing the federation asks of any management—and that is that it first give America an opportunity to furnish its artists before scouring the whole of Europe. These gentlemen are full-fledged members of the union, 24 additional men still playing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra have completed their unionization and 15 others of that orchestra have applied for membership in the federation. We believe they will come in when they complete their present contracts.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Automatically Barred

"Some of the present members of that orchestra are not Americans and will not become citizens so they are automatically barred, as that is one of the first requirements for membership. Those men have been members of the orchestra, which for years has been 'a foreign institution on American soil.' I hope these men will live up to the tradition of the federation and I extend the hand of fellowship to men of our profession whether they be union or non-union members."

William G. Dodge, who was in charge of the arrangements for the concert, announced that he had received word from Charles Purcell of the "Magic Melody" company and Louis Bennison of the "Dere Mable' company that they would be unable to appear. Mr. Woolsey of the latter company appeared and pledged the suport of the Actors' Equity Association to the striking players.

Transcript
MARCH 19, 1920

Chronicle

AND NOTHING HAPPENED

THE DEPLETED BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN NEW YORK

Warm Applause for the Reduced Band and Hearty Sympathy for the Conductor — A Changed Programme Excellently Played — The Reviewers' Reflections, and Also Discoveries, About Present Tribulations

ORCHESTRAS, like nations, are happiest when they don't wash their doubtful linen in public. Through no fault of Conductor Pierre Monteux, who conducted the fifth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening, he finds himself in the centre of an unmusical whirlwind, what he would call a "tourbillon," while the menacing clash of "Die Wacht am Rhein" drowns the martial measures of the "Marsellaise." The ostensible reason given for the recent row in Boston is the Musical Union; but the fundamental cause is, unhappily, racial dissonance. So the famous band from Boston, robbed of more than a third of its players, limped to New York yesterday determined to play if the organization had only twenty members, as Manager Brennan put it.

After the defection in Boston some old members came forward and among them were Charles Martin Loeffler, our leading composer, and Timothée Adamowski, who offered their services. Both these artists were first violins in the orchestra when Franz Kneisel was concert master and Gericke conductor. Arcadian days, indeed. As Mr. Fradkin is now playing the part of the insurgent Lucifer, his seat was occupied by Mr. Theodorowicz, and we also noted the veteran violoncellist, Alwyn Schroeder at his accustomed desk; Mr. Longy, oboist extraordinary, whose tone resembles the etched line of a graphic composition, was like thin fire as it ringed the woodwind choir. There were only ten first fiddlers as against the usual sixteen: the contrabassi were reduced to six. But the demon drummer, huddled over his kettledrums, punctuated the sinister atmosphere with his subtle tapping. . . . Everybody in the audience was nervous. Bomb outrages, false tempi, stopped horns—stopped by his honor—what catastrophe was not predicted? And nothing happened. The orchestra ran on half-steam, though not at half-speed. Maitre Monteux stood on the pilot box and cheered his valient crew.

It would be idle to deny that dynamic contrasts were missing. The foundational tone of the orchestra seemed to drop out at times. But the strings were plangent, excellent, considering circumstances, and much of the playing not only charming but of finesse. The original programme scheme was changed. The conductor tempered the wind to the shorn strings. Beethoven's fourth symphony and a group of Wagner's excerpts made up an interesting evening. Cheer up, Monteux! The musical world will not allow such an orchestra to perish because of rebellion in the ranks. There is always as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it, even if the finny tribe in this case happened to be "sacred codfish." [James Huneker in The World

Present and Future

What became of the "Symphonie Fantastique" of Hector Berlioz? That question must have ruffled the equable temperaments of many subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts as they sat in their seats at the final Thursday evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall. The very types had melted into glowing streams of glorification when the work was lately performed in Boston, and despite the fact that a somewhat weighty concert master had remained sitting when Pierre Monteux, conductor, commanded the orchestra to rise and accept the laudations of cultivated Boston, the piece had been announced for repetition before the mercenary children of New York.

But without explanation it vanished into thin air, almost as thin as some of its own, and in its place the astonished auditors beheld on the programme the unfamiliar B flat symphony No. 4 of Beethoven . . . Many fine things have been written about this symphony, but one feels certain that Boston would not have been shaken to its centre by last evening's performance, as it was by the Fradkinized interpretation of the "Fantastique." After Beethoven namely, the prelude to "Lohengrin," "Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" and bits of the third act of "The Mastersingers." The audience was very demonstrative.

Thirty-one members of the orchestra were absent last evening. The number of players was seventy-two, on a basis of ten first violins and six double basses, but some of these were substitutes. The missing members left the orchestra because of the discharge of Frederick Fradkin, the concert master, for insubordination. At the recent performance of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" in Boston he refused to rise when Mr. Monteux directed the orchestra to stand in acknowledgement of applause. Several of the seceders have already asked for reinstatement, and W. H. Brennan, the manager, said last night that all would surely do so. Mr. Fradkin will not be reinstated. [W. J. Henderson in The Sun

Notable Applause

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its last visit to New York in the midst of tribulation. Some of the results were apparent last evening in the appearance of the orchestra considerably reduced in numbers. There were also a number of unfamiliar faces. Some of them were said to be of players formerly members of the orchestra, recruited now for the emergency. The audience was ready to show its sympathy with the conductor, and when Mr. Monteux appeared he was greeted with an extra round of applause. At the close of the symphony there was an enthusiastic demonstration, which Mr. Monteux desired to share with the players—and none failed to rise to acknowledge it.

Under the circumstances, it was not to be expected that all the remembered qualities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be shown in the performance. But it was evident that both conductor and players were on their mettle. The performance had many admirable qualities and showed the fine musicianship that was centred in that reduced aggregation of players. Of course the volume of the string tone was not there. The playing of the symphony, however, had great spirit, elastic rhythm, delicacy and finesse; an engrossing performance. And if the balance of tone was different from that familiar to concertgoers of these days, some may have consoled themselves by thinking that it was nearer to that of the orchestras that played it for Beethoven in 1906. In the prelude to "Lohengrin" the division of the strings in the scoring and the reduced numbers available for the several parts emphasized somewhat the loss in volume. But the "Siegfried Idyll" was originally conceived for a small orchestra and loses little in a performance by one. If Mr. Monteux's beat in certain passages was a little rigid the delicacy and poetic coloring of the orchestra were delightful. The audience was cordial in its manifestation of enjoyment. [Richard Aldrich in The Times

— George Cohan's daughter, who pleased in London as an actress at her beginnings, has now returned to the paternal arms in New York. They will also find or write a play for her.

— Mr. Bram Stoker, long known in America as Sir Henry Irving's manager, lately sold

MAY LEAD BAND

Record Mar 22

Approach Hadley to Head New Symphony Orchestra

NEW YORK.—Henry Hadley, composer and conductor, has been approached concerning acceptance of the post of conductor of a new symphony orchestra in Boston, musical gossip in this city reports today. The new orchestra would be made up in part of the striking members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Hadley says: "I do not care to make a formal statement about this matter at the present time. If such an organization is formed some of the members may want one man for conductor while others may want another man. One hears all sorts of reports."

OUSTED SYMPHONY MEN TO BRING SUIT

Trans Mar 22

Suit against the institution's trustees, Frederick R. Cabot and other trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra by Atty. Arthur Berenson, counsel for 33 former members of that organization, who contend that when the trustees held up their pay checks their contracts were violated.

Stimulated by the success of the Sunday night concert at the Colonial Theatre, the new Symphony orchestra, which takes in these 33 former Symphony players, is contemplating a series of Sunday night concerts at the Boston Opera House. Famous conductors like Emil Mollenhauer, Victor Herbert, Van der Stucken, for 20 years conductor of the Cincinnati orchestra, and Marinuzzi of the Chicago Opera company, will direct.

Fredric Fradkin, former concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Gustav Heim, solo trumpeter, have consented to play at the concerts.

PLAN CONCERTS

Record Mar 23

Union Symphony Players to Continue Sunday Programs

Enthused over the success of Sunday night's concert the union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, recently dismissed, have decided to continue their Sunday night concerts indefinitely.

With the return today of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from its Southern tour it was stated that the Sunday night orchestra would be augmented by the union players who remained in the orchestra.

A meeting was held today at union headquarters. Many of the union men who remained in the orchestra were present and pledged their support to the Sunday concerts.

STRIKERS FROM SYMPHONY PLAN MORE CONCERTS

Trans. Mar 23

Victor Herbert, Emil Mollenhauer and Henry Hadley, with other famed composers, may be the conductors for a series of Hub concerts planned by the striking players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

So pronounced was the success of their initial concert that other similar concerts and possibly pop-concerts will be held by the strikers. This was decided yesterday at a meeting of the 33 players who walked out of the Symphony organization. Mr. Mollenhauer was the conductor at last Sunday night's concert.

A second concert will be given Sunday night in the Colonial Theatre. The remainder of the series will be at the Colonial or some other major Boston theatre.

It was voted yesterday by the strikers to place in the hands of their counsel, Atty. Arthur Berenson, all financial affairs in connection with the collection of money which they claim the Symphony management owes them under their contracts.

The depleted Boston Symphony Orchestra returned today from its southern tour.

Trans Mar 23

As the Subscribers Feel

From a score of notes sent to this department by subscribers to the Symphony Concerts who resent Mr. Roth's recent letter on the part of the seceders from the orchestra, here follows one that well represents them all:

Otto Roth and the seceding Symphony players do not seem to give a thought to the fact that they broke faith with a large audience of many old subscribers to the concerts on one of the most inclement nights of the winter. Many like myself made an effort to go to Symphony Hall because the original programme was played so well Friday afternoon. To allow a peevish violinist who has been with the orchestra as concert master but two seasons to influence the seceders to the extent of their not only breaking their contracts with the trustees but with this audience of subscribers who have assisted in the financing of the orchestra, makes it still more evident that unionism is the last thing desirable for a good orchestra. My feeling is that tickets should not be bought for a concert where any one of them take part until they have shown that they have overcome their present lack of responsibility to the public who support them.

...Y, MARCH 22, 1920

Players

THE SYMPHONY STRIFE

A Second Concert by the Diminished Orchestra in New York—Foreboding Comment from Metropolitan Reviewers—Fresh Evidence of the Overshadowing Fradkin

THE final concert for this season of the Boston Orchestra in New York took place on Saturday afternoon last and the Tribune on Sunday made record of it as follows:

The troubles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra do not seem to have affected the number of people who in New York wish to hear the famous band. The concert yesterday afternoon found Carnegie Hall crowded and Mr. Monteux greeted with more than ordinary heartiness. Mr. Monteux has naturally tempered the programme to his shorn orchestra, yet despite a certain loss in tonal resonance its playing yesterday was admirable, and notably so in Debussy's Petite Suite. Mr. Monteux is entirely at home in the music of Debussy, and he gave the suite a graceful and atmospheric performance. The other numbers were the overture to Beethoven's "Fidelio," Mozart's Symphony in G-minor, Borodin's orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia" and the overture to Goldmark's "Sakuntala."

The reviewer for The Sun was less pleased with the concert but he soon puts it by for pessimistic reflections upon the present and the future of the disrupted band. He writes:

There was some good playing in Debussy's suite, but in general the orchestra sounded rough. There was

...little or nothing of the delicacy and transparency of tone for which the Bostonians have been noted. However, in the circumstances no finished performance could be expected. It was evident that the sympathies of the audience were with Pierre Monteux, the conductor; for the applause with which he was received when he first appeared and which followed the symphony was plainly meant as a special demonstration.

The future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in the lap of the gods who protect union labor. It remains for unionism to perpetuate or destroy this institution. If it proves to be true that seventy-four members are pledged to leave the orchestra if it is not unionized then the organization is doomed, for great concert orchestras cannot be improvised. For the sake of its splendid history and of musical art in this country it is to be hoped that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will survive the deadly blow it has received and will continue to bring its delightful contributions to New York's musical season.

On another page of The Sunday Sun, Mr. Henderson, reprinting Mr. Roth's letter already published in these columns, renews his forebodings:

Mr. Roth's letter proves conclusively that the present state of the Boston Orchestra is precarious. If its men are pledged to unionism and the trustees remain firm in their determination not to recognize a union the present orchestra will cease to exist and a new one will have to be formed. If the trustees believe that they can go out and buy a new Boston Symphony Orchestra just as they would buy a new bass drum they are lamentably mistaken. To the disinterested outsider it looks as if the famous old orchestra was approaching dissolution. Such an outcome of the matter would be a calamity to the musical world and all music lovers will fervently hope that differences may be adjusted.

The Times likewise prints a summary of Mr. Roth's letter and then, with the pen of Mr. Aldrich, comments as follows on the conditions it discloses:

The New York public will join in the general lamentation if the Boston Symhony Orchestra is damaged beyond repair. It is unsafe at this distance and without a knowledge of all the facts to venture on prediction; but most admirers of the orchestra will think that if three-quarters of the present personnel leave it, and the management tries to build it up to former standard with new men—or women—in their place, the outlook will not be promising. It took some of the rarest ability a good many years to bring the Boston Orchestra up to its preeminent position. It will not be done again immediately, even if an equal amount of ability in the direction and in the personnel is at once available.

The merits of the unionizing scheme are not for outsiders, imperfectly acquainted with the circumstances, to discuss. It is natural, probably inevitable, that the trustees of the orchestra should carry out strictly the policy they inherited from Mr. Higginson against it. They no doubt consider it a part of the many-sided wisdom that marked his control of the orchestra for so many years and that brought such unique results. Whether they will "relent" or whether they can withstand the pressure, greater now than at any time in Mr. Higginson's day, and whether, if they do, they can successfully make up the loss of three-quarters of the orchestra and restore it to what it has been so very recently, these are all questions that cannot fail to interest deeply the New York musical public, and the possibilities of the situation are such as to cause pain and anxiety.

Being two hundred miles away and engrossed in nearer matters, Mr. Henderson and Mr. Aldrich overlook the fact that here in Boston the strife within and without the band is fast degenerating into a personal issue: Shall the trustees and the conductor control the orchestra or shall it be controlled by Fredric Fradkin, the concert-master, dismissed for gross breach of discipline and general effrontery? Outwardly at least, the seceders are now neither more nor less than an obsequious following awaiting his daily bidding. In their eyes increase of salaries and unionization—the issues with which the controversy began—are fast becoming incidental beside the omnipotent and omnipresent Fradkin. So also among the sympathizers with the seceders. Their concert last evening, at the Colonial Theatre ran merely perfunctory course until it was the turn of Fradkin to play the sickly sweet "Méditation" from Massenet's opera, "Thais." Then ovations for "the idol," ovations for "the hero" and all that sort of thing. No wonder that Mr. Webber, the president of the American Federation of Musicians—an astute and far-seeing man withal—found himself unable to address the company; while two actors, also announced to grace the occasion, discovered engagements elsewhere. Until Fradkin's brief day passes, as it is sure to pass with the fickle temperaments he now sways, the dispute and the merits of the dispute are likely to get "no forrarder."

Here in Boston

There has been quick response to the request, recently inserted in the programme-

Trans Mar 24

book of the Symphony Concerts, for contributions to an endowment fund for the orchestra. Subscriptions have ranged from $5 to $5000 and they have been many. Whether the Trustees will enter this spring upon a widespread and energetic canvass for two or three millions remains to be decided. Among the public at large signs favor such an enterprise; among the very rich, they are said to be more dubious.

Mr. C. A. Ellis will withdraw next month

...of Ireland...

TO INCORPORATE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Globe Mar 23

A committee was appointed at an executive meeting of the striking Symphony Orchestra musicians yesterday to prepare plans for the incorporation of a union Boston Symphony Orchestra. The committee announced, after a conference with attorney Arthur Berenson, that the incorporation work will be completed within a few days.

While the strikers' committee refused to discuss details, it was learned that the orchestra will be under the control of 24 trustees, made up of strikers and business men. The new trustees, it was announced, have assumed the responsibility for the concert to be given at the Colonial Theatre on Easter Sunday night, and plans are now being made for a series of "Pop" concerts to run through the Summer months.

Pledges have been given by all the striking musicians to sign no contracts for the remainder of this season or next, unless released by the trustees. Mr Fradkin stated that he will remain.

1920 Post Mar 2

STRIKERS TO SUE FOR PA...

Plan to Incorporate 'Union Symphony Orchestra'

Backed by a board of trustees of ... members, including many prominent men of the city and State, the incorporation of the "Union Boston Symphony Orchestra" will be consummated by the early part of next week, according to an announcement from the executive committee of the striking players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, following a secret meeting of the committee held yesterday morning at the union headquarters, St. Botolph street.

The present plans call for a series of concerts to be given between the present date and the summer season, when a series of Pop concerts will be given during the summer months. In the future more elaborate plans will be made for the symphony season of the orchestra.

Arthur W. Berenson, attorney for the strikers, is now making preparations to bring legal action against the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for alleged breach of contract. Mr. Berenson is collecting the contracts of the strikers and is to present these to the management with a demand for payment for the rest of the season. In the event of refusal, legal action will be taken.

take up the subject again.

STRIKING PLAYE... TO HAVE ORCHES...

Herald Mar 8

Board of 24 Trustees to Co... "Union Symphony"

Leaders of the striking Boston Symphony Orchestra players an... yesterday afternoon, after an ... tive meeting at the union mu... headquarters on St. Botolph ... that a "Union Boston Symphony Orchestra" will be incorporated ... the next few days, with the s... as a nucleus.

The new symphony, it was sai... be conducted by a board of 24 tr... whose names will be announced ... a day or two, and will inc... nent New England fin... trustees are prepared ... financial responsibilit... concert on Easter Sun... Colonial Theatre. A serie... certs and a season of "Pops" ... consideration.

It is understood that the 24 t... have received the pledge fro... strikers that the latter will no... summate any new contracts for t... mainder of this season and next s... or until released by the trustees ... the obligation. In mentioning the ... the strikers stated that Frederic... kin, discharged concertmaster, r... a $40,000 contract to conduct a ... tour of this country for the rem... of this season and next season.

Questioned regarding his actio... said it was his desire to remain ... the men who stood with him ... "fight for the union principle." ... added that 13 of the 24 players wh... remained with the Boston Symp... Orchestra have contracted to pla... other symphony orchestras next s... but that the strikers had declin... make new contracts before or sin... controversy began.

Yesterday several of the strike... instructed Atty. Arthur W. Berens... take the necessary legal action ... over money which they allege i... because of the management's "... of contract" in withholding the... checks.

...select artists to ... to ... to the

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Automatically Barred

"Some of the present members of that orchestra are not Americans and will not become citizens so they are automatically barred, as that is one of the first requirements for membership. Those men have been members of the orchestra, which for years has been 'a foreign institution on American soil.' I hope these men will live up to the tradition of the federation and I extend the hand of fellowship to men of our profession whether they be union or non-union members."

William G. Dodge, who was in charge of the arrangements for the concert, announced that he had received word from Charles Purcell of the "Magic Melody" company and Louis Bennison of the "Dere Mable' company that they would be unable to appear. Mr. Woolsey of the latter company appeared and pledged the suport of the Actors' Equity Association to the striking players.

Transcript
MARCH 19, 1920

Chronicle

AND NOTHING HAPPENED

THE DEPLETED BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN NEW YORK

Warm Applause for the Reduced Band and Hearty Sympathy for the Conductor — A Changed Programme Excellently Played — The Reviewers' Reflections, and Also Discoveries, About Present Tribulations

ORCHESTRAS, like nations, are happiest when they don't wash their doubtful linen in public. Through no fault of Conductor Pierre Monteux, who conducted the fifth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening, he finds himself in the centre of an unmusical whirlwind, what he would call a "tourbillion," while the menacing clash of "Die Wacht am Rhein" drowns the martial measures of the "Marsellaise." The ostensible reason given for the recent row in Boston is the Musical Union; but the fundamental cause is, unhappily, racial dissonance. So the famous band from Boston, robbed of more than a third of its players, limped to New York yesterday determined to play if the organization had only twenty members, as Manager Brennan put it.

After the defection in Boston some old members came forward and among them were Charles Martin Loeffler, our leading composer, and Timothée Adamowski, who offered their services. Both these artists were first violins in the orchestra when Franz Kneisel was concert master and Gericke conductor. Arcadian days, indeed. As Mr. Fradkin is now playing the part of the insurgent Lucifer, his seat was occupied by Mr. Theodorowicz, and we also noted the veteran violoncellist, Alwyn Schroeder at his accustomed desk; Mr. Longy, oboist extraordinary, whose tone resembles the etched line of a graphic composition, was like thin fire as it ringed the woodwind choir. There were only ten first fiddlers as against the usual sixteen: the contrabassi were reduced to six. But the demon drummer, huddled over his kettledrums, punctuated the sinister atmosphere with his subtle tapping. . . . Everybody in the audience was nervous. Bomb outrages, false tempi, stopped horns —stopped by his honor—what catastrophe was not predicted? And nothing happened. The orchestra ran on half-steam, though not at half-speed. Maitre Monteux stood on the pilot box and cheered his valient crew.

It would be idle to deny that dynamic contrasts were missing. The foundational tone of the orchestra seemed to drop out at times. But the strings were plangent, excellent, considering circumstances, and much of the playing not only charming, but of finesse. The original programme scheme was changed. The conductor tempered the wind to the shorn strings. Beethoven's fourth symphony and a group of Wagner's excerpts made up an interesting evening. Cheer up, Monteux! The musical world will not allow such an orchestra to perish because of rebellion in the ranks. There is always as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it, even if the finny tribe in this case happened to be "sacred codfish." [James Huneker in The World

Present and Future

What became of the "Symphonie Fantastique" of Hector Berlioz? That question must have ruffled the equable temperaments of many subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts as they sat in their seats at the final Thursday evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall. The very types had melted into glowing streams of glorification when the work was lately performed in Boston, and despite the fact that a somewhat weighty concert master had remained sitting when Pierre Monteux, conductor, commanded the orchestra to rise and accept the laudations of cultivated Boston, the piece had been announced for repetition before the mercenary children of New York.

But without explanation it vanished into thin air, almost as thin as some of its own, and in its place the astonished auditors beheld on the programme the unfamiliar B flat symphony No. 4 of Beethoven . . . Many fine things have been written about this symphony, but one feels certain that Boston would not have been shaken to its centre by last evening's performance, as it was by the Fradkinized interpretation of the "Fantastique." After Beethoven [illegible] a row of specimens of Wa[illegible] namely, the prelude to "Lohengrin," Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" and bits of the third act of "The Mastersingers." The audience was very demonstrative.

Thirty-one members of the orchestra were absent last evening. The number of players was seventy-two, on a basis of ten first violins and six double basses, but some of these were substitutes. The missing members left the orchestra because of the discharge of Frederick Fradkin, the concert master, for insubordination. At the recent performance of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" in Boston he refused to rise when Mr. Monteux directed the orchestra to stand in acknowledgement of applause. Several of the seceders have already asked for reinstatement, and W. H. Brennan, the manager, said last night that all would surely do so. Mr. Fradkin will not be reinstated. [W. J. Henderson in The Sun

Notable Applause

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its last visit to New York in the midst of tribulation. Some of the results were apparent last evening in the appearance of the orchestra considerably reduced in numbers. There were also a number of unfamiliar faces. Some of them were said to be of players formerly members of the orchestra, recruited now for the emergency. The audience was ready to show its sympathy with the conductor, and when Mr. Monteux appeared he was greeted with an extra round of applause. At the close of the symphony there was an enthusiastic demonstration, which Mr. Monteux desired to share with the players—and none failed to rise to acknowledge it.

Under the circumstances, it was not to be expected that all the remembered qualities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be shown in the performance. But it was evident that both conductor and players were on their mettle. The performance had many admirable qualities and showed the fine musicianship that was centred in that reduced aggregation of players. Of course the volume of the string tone was not there. The playing of the symphony, however, had great spirit, elastic rhythm, delicacy and finesse; an engrossing performance. And if the balance of tone was different from that familiar to concertgoers of these days, some may have consoled themselves by thinking that it was nearer to that of the orchestras that played it for Beethoven in 1906. In the prelude to "Lohengrin" the division of the strings in the scoring and the reduced numbers available for the several parts emphasized somewhat the loss in volume. But the "Siegfried Idyll" was originally conceived for a small orchestra and loses little in a performance by one. If Mr. Monteux's beat in certain passages was a little rigid the delicacy and poetic coloring of the orchestra were delightful. The audience was cordial in its manifestation of enjoyment. [Richard Aldrich in The Times

— George Cohan's daughter, who pleased in London as an actress at her beginnings, has now returned to the paternal arms in New York. They will also find or write a play for her.

— Mr Bram Stoker, long known in America as Sir Henry Irving's manager, lately sold

MAY LEAD BAND

Record Mar 22

Approach Hadley to Head New Symphony Orchestra

NEW YORK.—Henry Hadley, composer and conductor, has been approached concerning acceptance of the post of conductor of a new symphony orchestra in Boston, musical gossip in this city reports today. The new orchestra would be made up in part of the striking members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Hadley says: "I do not care to make a formal statement about this matter at the present time. If such an organization is formed some of the members may want one man for conductor while others may want another man. One hears all sorts of reports."

OUSTED SYMPHONY MEN TO BRING SUIT

Trib Mar 22

Suit against the institution against Judge Frederick R. Cabot and other trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra by Atty. Arthur Berenson, counsel for 33 former members of that organization, who contend that when the trustees held up their pay checks their contracts were violated.

Stimulated by the success of the Sunday night concert at the Colonial Theatre, the new Symphony orchestra, which takes in these 33 former Symphony players, is contemplating a series of Sunday night concerts at the Boston Opera House. Famous conductors like Emil Mollenhauer, Victor Herbert, Van der Stucken, for 20 years conductor of the Cincinnati orchestra, and Marinuzzi of the Chicago Opera company, will direct.

Fredric Fradkin, former concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Gustav Heim, solo trumpeter, have consented to play at the concerts.

PLAN CONCERTS

Record Mar 23

Union Symphony Players to Continue Sunday Programs

Enthused over the success of Sunday night's concert the union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, recently dismissed, have decided to continue their Sunday night concerts indefinitely.

With the return today of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from its Southern tour it was stated that the Sunday night orchestra would be augmented by the union players who remained in the orchestra.

A meeting was held today at union headquarters. Many of the union men who remained in the orchestra were present and pledged their support to the Sunday concerts.

STRIKERS FROM SYMPHONY PLAN MORE CONCERTS

Trav Mar 23

Victor Herbert, Emil Mollenhauer and Henry Hadley, with other famed composers, may be the conductors for a series of Hub concerts planned by the striking players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

So pronounced was the success of their initial concert that other similar concerts and possibly pop-concerts will be held by the strikers. This was decided yesterday at a meeting of the 33 players who walked out of the Symphony organization. Mr. Mollenhauer was the conductor at last Sunday night's concert.

A second concert will be given Sunday night in the Colonial Theatre. The remainder of the series will be at the Colonial or some other major Boston theatre.

It was voted yesterday by the strikers to place in the hands of their counsel, Atty. Arthur Berenson, all financial affairs in connection with the collection of money which they claim the Symphony management owes them under their contracts.

The depleted Boston Symphony Orchestra returned today from its southern tour.

Trans Mar 23

As the Subscribers Feel

From a score of notes sent to this department by subscribers to the Symphony Concerts who resent Mr. Roth's recent letter on the part of the seceders from the orchestra, here follows one that well represents them all:

Otto Roth and the seceding Symphony players do not seem to give a thought to the fact that they broke faith with a large audience of many old subscribers to the concerts on one of the most inclement nights of the winter. Many like myself made an effort to go to Symphony Hall because the original programme was played so well Friday afternoon. To allow a peevish violinist who has been with the orchestra as concert master but two seasons to influence the seceders to the extent of their not only breaking their contracts with the trustees but with this audience of subscribers who have assisted in the financing of the orchestra, makes it still more evident that unionism is the last thing desirable for a good orchestra. My feeling is that tickets should not be bought for a concert where any one of them take part until they have shown that they have overcome their present lack of responsibility to the public who support them.

[illegible]Y, MARCH 22, 1920

Players

THE SYMPHONY STRIFE

A Second Concert by the Diminished Orchestra in New York—Foreboding Comment from Metropolitan Reviewers—Fresh Evidence of the Overshadowing of Fradkin

THE final concert for this season of t[illegible] Boston Orchestra in New York bef[illegible] on Saturday afternoon last and T[illegible] Tribune on Sunday made record of it[illegible] follows:

The troubles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra do not seem to have affected the number of people who in New York wish to hear the famous band. The concert yesterday afternoon found Carnegie Hall crowded and Mr. Monteux greeted with more than ordinary heartiness. Mr. Monteux has naturally tempered the programme to his shorn orchestra, yet despite a certain loss in tonal resonance its playing yesterday was admirable, and notably so in Debussy's Petite Suite. Mr. Monteux is entirely at home in the music of Debussy, and he gave the suite a graceful and atmospheric performance. The other numbers were the overture to Beethoven's "Fidelio," Mozart's Symphony in G-minor, Borodin's orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia" and the overture to Goldmark's "Sakuntala."

The reviewer for The Sun was less pleased with the concert but he soon puts it by for pessimistic reflections upon the present and the future of the disrupted band. He writes:

There was some good playing in Debussy's suite, but in general the orchestra sounded rough. There was [illegible] of the delicious mellowness and transparency of tone for which the Bostonians have been noted. However, in the circumstances no finished performance could be expected. It was evident that the sympathies of the audience were with Pierre Monteux, the conductor; for the applause with which he was received when he first appeared and which followed the symphony was plainly meant as a special demonstration.

The future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in the lap of the gods who protect union labor. It remains for unionism to perpetuate or destroy this institution. If it proves to be true that seventy-four members are pledged to leave the orchestra if it is not unionized then the organization is doomed, for great concert orchestras cannot be improvised. For the sake of its splendid history and of musical art in this country it is to be hoped that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will survive the deadly blow it has received and will continue to bring its delightful contributions to New York's musical season.

On another page of The Sunday Sun, Mr. Henderson, reprinting Mr. Roth's letter already published in these columns, renews his forebodings:

Mr. Roth's letter proves conclusively that the present state of the Boston Orchestra is precarious. If its men are pledged to unionism and the trustees remain firm in their determination not to recognize a union the present orchestra will cease to exist and a new one will have to be formed. If the trustees believe that they can go out and buy a new Boston Symphony Orchestra just as they would buy a new bass drum they are lamentably mistaken. To the disinterested outsider it looks as if the famous old orchestra was approaching dissolution. Such an outcome of the matter would be a calamity to the musical world and all music lovers will fervently hope that differences may be adjusted.

The Times likewise prints a summary of Mr. Roth's letter and then, with the pen of Mr. Aldrich, comments as follows on the conditions it discloses:

The New York public will join in the general lamentation if the Boston Symhony Orchestra is damaged beyond repair. It is unsafe at this distance and without a knowledge of all the facts to venture on prediction; but most admirers of the orchestra will think that if three-quarters of the present personnel leave it, and the management tries to build it up to former standard with new men—or women—in their place, the outlook will not be promising. It took some of the rarest ability a good many years to bring the Boston Orchestra up to its preëminent position. It will not be done again immediately, even if an equal amount of ability in the direction and in the personnel is at once available.

The merits of the unionizing scheme are not for outsiders, imperfectly acquainted with the circumstances, to discuss. It is natural, probably inevitable, that the trustees of the orchestra should carry out strictly the policy they inherited from Mr. Higginson against it. They no doubt consider it a part of the many-sided wisdom that marked his control of the orchestra for so many years and that brought such unique results. Whether they will "relent" or whether they can withstand the pressure, greater now than at any time in Mr. Higginson's day, and whether, if they do, they can successfully make up the loss of three-quarters of the orchestra and restore it to what it has been so very recently, these are all questions that cannot fail to interest deeply the New York musical public, and the possibilities of the situation are such as to cause pain and anxiety.

Being two hundred miles away and engrossed in nearer matters, Mr. Henderson and Mr. Aldrich overlook the fact that here in Boston the strife within and without the band is fast degenerating into a personal issue; Shall the trustees and the conductor control the orchestra or shall it be controlled by Fredric Fradkin, the concert-master, dismissed for gross breach of discipline and general effrontery? Outwardly at least, the seceders are now neither more nor less than an obsequious following awaiting his daily bidding. In their eyes increase of salaries and unionization—the issues with which the controversy began—are fast becoming incidental beside the omnipotent and omnipresent Fradkin. So also among the sympathizers with the seceders. Their concert last evening, at the Colonial Theatre can merely perfunctory course until it was the turn of Fradkin to play the sickly sweet "Méditation" from Massenet's opera, "Thais." Then ovations for "the hero" and all that sort of thing. No wonder that Mr. Webber, the president of the American Federation of Musicians—an astute and far-seeing man withal—found himself unable to address the company while two actors, also announced to grace the occasion, discovered engagements elsewhere. Until Fradkin's brief day passes, as it is sure to pass with the fickle temperaments he now sways, the dispute and the merits of the dispute are likely to get "no forrarder."

Here in Boston

There has been quick response to the request, recently inserted in the programme-book of the Symphony Concerts, for contributions to an endowment fund for the orchestra. Subscriptions have ranged from $5 to $5000 and they have been many. Whether the Trustees will enter this spring upon a widespread and energetic canvass for two or three millions remains to be decided. Among the public at large signs favor such an enterprise; among the very rich, they are said to be more dubious. Mr. C. A. Ellis will withdraw next month

TO INCORPORATE [illegible] SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Globe Mar 23

A committee was appointed at an executive meeting of the striking Symphony Orchestra musicians yesterday, to prepare plans for the incorporation of a union Boston Symphony Orchestra. The committee announced, after a conference with attorney Arthur Berenson, that the incorporation work will be completed within a few days.

While the strikers' committee refused to discuss details, it was learned that the orchestra will be under the control of 24 trustees, made up of strikers and business men. The new trustees, it was announced, have assumed the responsibility for the concert to be given at the Colonial Theatre on Easter Sunday night, and plans are now being made for a series of "Pop" concerts to run through the Summer months.

Pledges have been given by all the striking musicians to sign no contracts for the remainder of this season or next, unless released by the trustees. Mr Fradkin stated that he will remain.

1920 Post Mar 2[illegible]

STRIKERS TO [illegible] SUE FOR PA[illegible]

Plan to Incorporate 'Union Symphony Orchestra'

Backed by a board of trustees of [illegible] members, including many prominent men of the city and State, the incorporation of the "Union Boston Symphony Orchestra" will be consummated by the early part of next week, according to an announcement from the executive committee of the striking players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, following a secret meeting of the committee held yesterday morning at the union headquarters, St. Botolph street.

The present plans call for a series of concerts to be given between the present date and the summer season, when a series of Pop concerts will be given during the summer months. In the future more elaborate plans will be made for the symphony season of the orchestra.

Arthur W. Berenson, attorney for the strikers, is now making preparations to bring legal action against the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for alleged breach of contract. Mr. Berenson is collecting the contracts of the strikers and is to present these to the management with a demand for payment for the rest of the season. In the event of refusal, legal action will be taken.

take up the subject again.

STRIKING PLAYE[illegible] TO HAVE ORCHES[illegible]

Herald Mar 2[illegible]

Board of 24 Trustees to Co[illegible] "Union Symphony"

Leaders of the striking Bosto[illegible] phony Orchestra players an[illegible] yesterday afternoon, after an [illegible] tive meeting at the union mu[illegible] headquarters on St. Botolph [illegible] that a "Union Boston Sympho[illegible] chestra" will be incorporated [illegible] the next few days, with the s[illegible] as a nucleus.

The new symphony, it was sai[illegible] be conducted by a board of 24 tr[illegible] whose names will be announced [illegible] a day or two, and will inc[illegible] nent New England fin[illegible] trustees are prepared [illegible] financial responsibilit[illegible] concert on Easter Sun[illegible] Colonial Theatre. A serie[illegible] certs and a season of "Pops" [illegible] consideration.

It is understood that the 24 t[illegible] have received the pledge fro[illegible] strikers that the latter will no[illegible] summate any new contracts for t[illegible] mainder of this season and next s[illegible] or until released by the trustees[illegible] the obligation. In mentioning the [illegible] the strikers stated that Frederic[illegible] kin, discharged concertmaster, r[illegible] a $40,000 contract to conduct a [illegible] tour of this country for the rem[illegible] of this season and next season.

Questioned regarding his action[illegible] said it was his desire to remain [illegible] the men who stood with him [illegible] "fight for the union principle." [illegible] added that 18 of the 24 players wh[illegible] remained with the Boston Sym[illegible] Orchestra have contracted to pla[illegible] other symphony orchestras next s[illegible] but that the strikers had declin[illegible] al[illegible]make new contracts before or sin[illegible] controversy began.

Yesterday several of the strike[illegible] instructed Atty. Arthur W. Berens[illegible] at[illegible]ake the necessary legal action [illegible] L[illegible]over money which they allege [illegible] W[illegible]ecause of the management's "[illegible] Rl[illegible]f contract" in withholding the[illegible] checks.

[illegible] select artists for [illegible] to add to the

Record 18

EDNESDAY, MARCH 24,

I IN ORD

EX-MEMBERS OF SYMPHONY SEEK BACK PAY

Take First Legal Steps to Collect Money from Trustees

First legal action against the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the dismissed players was taken today, when the men placed their individual contracts in the hands of their attorney, Arthur L. Berenson.

Attorney Berenson explained that when all the contracts were in his possession he would take the matter up with Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees, in an effort to get the dismissed players' salaries, which, he alleges, have not been paid for two weeks.

If no adjustment is made, according to Mr. Berenson, he will sue the trustees for the money. Mr. Berenson claims that the trustees committed a breach of contract by not paying the men their money when it was due them.

In the meantime plans are being made for a benefit concert to be given Easter Sunday night. Every effort is being made to secure Enrico Caruso as soloist. The committee, representing the players, announced at their meeting today that last Sunday night's concert at the Colonial Theatre was a success financially as well as a great musical achievement.

Trans Mar 24

Items and Incidents

As it was easy to suspect and as Musical America blurts out "the American conductor and composer," eager to mess into the quarrel in the Symphony Orchestra, is Henry Hadley, who, perchance, sees himself as leader of a second Boston band. A kinder fate would have given Mr. Hadley less talent for "publicity" and more for music-making.

...of the Chicago Orchestra

1920. Travelers

$500,000 FUND AS BACKING FOR NEW SYMPHONY

A guarantee of $500,000 for the support of the new Symphony Orchestra in Boston during the next five years after its incorporation and the construction of a theatre or auditorium for its concerts are assured, according to announcement from the executive committee of 33 former players of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The names of the board of 24 trustees and management of the new Symphony Orchestra as well as the identity of the prominent financier who is to back them will be given out after the Easter Sunday night concert at the Colonial Theatre. Rehearsals will begin early next week and continue up to the day of the concert, at which it is expected Enrico Caruso and other operatic stars will be a part of the program.

3

ET OUT

Record Mar

EW SYMPHONY

Mar 26

new Union Boston Symphony ...stra is to be supported by a ...ntee of $100,000 a year for five ... according to an announcement ...e strikers' committee.

...additional guarantee that a new ...e will be built for their accom... ...tion has been given the striking ...hony players by the men who ...o be the directors in the new ...tra following its incorporation.

Herald Mar. 30

3 QUIT UNION TO REJOIN SYMPHONY

Will Receive Higher Salaries for Desertion

Atty. Arthur Berenson, counsel for the striking members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening admitted that three of the strikers had deserted and returend to their employment with the orchestra, "though at salaries very largelwy in excess of those paid to the men prior to their having joined the union."

"I regret," said Mr. Berenson? "that these men have used the union as a stepping-stone to accomplish their ends, and then deserted the union and their colleagues. That they were taken back is conclusive indication that the Boston Symphony Orchestra can never be what it was before, and, as the New York critics put it, must musically be an inferior institution.

"If the people of Boston want to support a new symphony orchestra, it is up to them. Several business men are ready to support such a movement."

He added that yesterday he sent a letter to Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees, informing him that he had begun legal proceedings to obtain money due Fradkin and other former members of the orchestra withheld by the maaagement because of alleged violations of their contracts.

CITY COUNCIL FAVORS

Record Mar 30

...tion address.

THREE STRIKERS GO BACK TO SYMPHONY

Alluring salaries proved too much for three of the striking Symphony Orchestra players, who have deserted the ranks of the union men and taken their old places in the present Symphony Orchestra, it became known today.

The step taken by these men, however, has in no way affected the fast-forming plans for a new Symphony Orchestra to be comprised of union men, it was stated. Plans for the Easter Sunday night concert, to be held in the Colonial Theatre, will be announced shortly.

FOUR WOMEN ON

NEW ORCHESTRA MAY LEAVE CITY

Former Symphony Players Discouraged by Lack of Patronage

FINE PERFORMANCE AT THE COLONIAL

Because of the lack of interest shown in last night's concert of former members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who have been giving Sunday evening performances at the Colonial Theatre under the name of the American Federation Symphony Orchestra, a meeting will be held today or tomorrow to decide upon the advisability of continuing the series.

The players were unable to determine whether the small attendance of last night was due to the weather and counter entertainments throughout the city or whether their friends and supporters had abandoned them, but whatever the cause, they expressed themselves as being discouraged.

May Go Elsewhere

The feeling is general among the players that they are not receiving the patronage of the music lovers of the city and they feel that they could do better by establishing themselves in some nearby city.

While last night's audience was small it was none the less appreciative, being generous with applause for both solo and orchestra pieces. The soloists, Gustav Heim, trumpeter; Fredric Fradkin, violinist, and Theodore Cella, harpist, were obliged to respond to the outbursts of enthusiasm.

The program was: Overture, "Mignon," Thomas; trumpet solo from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens, Mr. Heim; Andante Cantabile for string quartet, op. 11, Tschaikowski; Minuet, Bolzoni; violin solo, Gypsy Airs, Sarasate, Mr. Fradkin; Poeme Symphonique, "Le Rouet d'Omphale, Saint-Saens; harp solo, "Mazurka," Schuecker, Mr. Cella; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

Emil Mollenhauer was conductor and James Ecker accompanist.

FORMER SYMPHONY PLAYERS APPLAUDED AT CONCERT

The former members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted an audience of about 1000 to the Colonial Theatre last evening. Although there was room for many more, the enthusiasm could hardly have been greater. Fredric Fradkin was made a veritable lion of, his return after each absence from the stage being the occasion of long-continued applause, while a solo for which he was scheduled was made merely a prelude to half a dozen more.

Gustave Heim created a furore by his masterly rendering on the trumpet of a solo from "Samson and Delilah" and Theodore Cella's solo was followed by two importunate encores. Emil Mollenhauer, the conductor, received lavish applause whenever there was excuse for a demonstration of good will and admiration.

The organization was billed last evening as the American Federation Symphony Orchestra. It included about 60 musicians.

Items and Incidents

The seceders from the Symphony Orchestra drew only a few hundred listeners to their concert in the Colonial Theatre last evening—for the most part, as the applause seemed to indicate, the "personal following" of Mr. Fradkin. The seceders were variously reinforced into a workable orchestra; Mr. Mollenhauer led it; the violinist played several numbers. There was every effort to keep up appearances, but the atmosphere of the occasion was cheerless. Scarcely one of the anticipations of the seceders has been fulfilled. The Symphony Concerts go their way better supported than they have been for several years; the orchestra has been already restored to sufficient numbers, with every sign that by autumn the ranks will be full again. Nobody has come or is likely to come to the rescue of the seceders. Even their fellow-unionists show little interest in them. Their only recourse now seems either return to the orchestra, for as many as it may receive again, or search for jobs elsewhere. Even these, the seceders are discovering, are not too many.

The new Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Bodanzky and Mr. Mengelberg as conductors, will undertake no less than thirty pairs of concerts in New York next season—more than any other band in America has ventured hitherto in a single city. They will be divided into two series of fifteen each. Whether the same programme will serve four times has yet to be decided.

UNION BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BE ORGANIZED

Record Mar 25

New Orchestra Said to Be Backed by a Prominent Financier

Plans for a "Union Boston Symphony Orchestra," with a board of 24 trustees, headed by a prominent New England financier, are nearly completed, according to a statement given out by a committee member of the former players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today.

The names of the trustees will be announced within a day or two, it is said. The trustees will assume all financial responsibility for the Easter Sunday night concert at the Colonial Theatre and will then take steps to commence a Pop season, to be followed by a regular Symphony season.

It became known also that Fradkin, the deposed concert-master, has turned down a $40,000 contract for a concert tour of America, in order that he might remain "with the boys."

Items and Incidents

Herald Mar 23

Mr. Fradkin and his following of seceders from the Symphony Orchestra now announce the impending incorporation of "The Union Boston Symphony Orchestra" to fill the ears of this town with all sorts of concerts. As usual "prominent financiers" are implicated. But it is the way of Mr. Fradkin to announce so many things!

Record 18

EDNESDAY, MARCH 24,

I IN ORD

EX-MEMBERS OF SYMPHONY SEEK BACK PAY

Take First Legal Steps to Collect Money from Trustees

First legal action against the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the dismissed players was taken today, when the men placed their individual contracts in the hands of their attorney, Arthur L. Berenson.

Attorney Berenson explained that when all the contracts were in his possession he would take the matter up with Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees, in an effort to get the dismissed players' salaries, which, he alleges, have not been paid for two weeks.

If no adjustment is made, according to Mr. Berenson, he will sue the trustees for the money. Mr. Berenson claims that the trustees committed a breach of contract by not paying the men their money when it was due them.

In the meantime plans are being made for a benefit concert to be given Easter Sunday night. Every effort is being made to secure Enrico Caruso as soloist. The committee, representing the players, announced at their meeting today that last Sunday night's concert at the Colonial Theatre was a success financially as well as a great musical achievement.

Trans Mar 24

Items and Incidents

As it was easy to suspect and as Musical America blurts out "the American conductor and composer," eager to mess into the quarrel in the Symphony Orchestra, is Henry Hadley, who, perchance, sees himself as leader of a second Boston band. A kinder fate would have given Mr. Hadley less talent for "publicity" and more for music-making.

...of the Chicago Orchestra...

UNION BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BE ORGANIZED

Record Mar 25

New Orchestra Said to Be Backed by a Prominent Financier

Plans for a "Union Boston Symphony Orchestra," with a board of 24 trustees, headed by a prominent New England financier, are nearly completed, according to a statement given out by a committee member of the former players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today.

The names of the trustees will be announced within a day or two, it is said. The trustees will assume all financial responsibility for the Easter Sunday night concert at the Colonial Theatre and will then take steps to commence a Pop season, to be followed by a regular Symphony season.

It became known also that Fradkin, the deposed concert-master, has turned down a $40,000 contract for a concert tour of America, in order that he might remain "with the boys."

Items and Incidents

Mr. Fradkin and his following of seceders from the Symphony Orchestra now announce the impending incorporation of "The Union Boston Symphony Orchestra" to fill the ears of this town with all sorts of concerts. As usual "prominent financiers" are implicated. But it is the way of Mr. Fradkin to announce so many things!

1920. Travelers

$500,000 FUND AS BACKING FOR NEW SYMPHONY

A guarantee of $500,000 for the support of the new Symphony Orchestra in Boston during the next five years after its incorporation and the construction of a theatre or auditorium for its concerts are assured, according to announcement from the executive committee of 33 former players of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The names of the board of 24 trustees and management of the new Symphony Orchestra as well as the identity of the prominent financier who is to back them will be given out after the Easter Sunday night concert at the Colonial Theatre. Rehearsals will begin early next week and continue up to the day of the concert, at which it is expected Enrico Caruso and other operatic stars will be a part of the program.

3

ET OUT

Record-Tr

EW SYMPHONY

Mar 26

new Union Boston Symphony
stra is to be supported by a ntee of $100,000 a year for five according to an announcement
e strikers' committee.
additional guarantee that a new e will be built for their accomion has been given the striking hony players by the men who o be the directors in the new tra following its incorporation.

Herald Mar. 30

3 QUIT UNION TO REJOIN SYMPHONY

Will Receive Higher Salaries for Desertion

Atty. Arthur Berenson, counsel for the striking members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening admitted that three of the strikers had deserted and returend to their employment with the orchestra, "though at salaries very largelwy in excess of those paid to the men prior to their having joined the union."

"I regret," said Mr. Berenson, "that these men have used the union as a stepping-stone to accomplish their ends, and then deserted the union and their colleagues. That they were taken back is conclusive indication that the Boston Symphony Orchestra can never be what it was before, and, as the New York critics put it, must musically be an inferior institution.

"If the people of Boston want to support a new symphony orchestra, it is up to them. Several business men are ready to support such a movement."

He added that yesterday he sent a letter to Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees, informing him that he had begun legal proceedings to obtain money due Fradkin and other former members of the orchestra withheld by the maaagement because of alleged violations of their contracts.

CITY COUNCIL FAVORS

Record Mar 30

...tion address.

THREE STRIKERS GO BACK TO SYMPHONY

Alluring salaries proved too much for three of the striking Symphony Orchestra players, who have deserted the ranks of the union men and taken their old places in the present Symphony Orchestra, it became known today.

The step taken by these men, however, has in no way affected the fast-forming plans for a new Symphony Orchestra to be comprised of union men, it was stated. Plans for the Easter Sunday night concert, to be held in the Colonial Theatre, will be announced shortly.

FOUR WOMEN ON...

NEW ORCHESTRA MAY LEAVE CITY

Former Symphony Players Discouraged by Lack of Patronage

FINE PERFORMANCE AT THE COLONIAL

Because of the lack of interest shown in last night's concert of former members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who have been giving Sunday evening performances at the Colonial Theatre under the name of the American Federation Symphony Orchestra, a meeting will be held today or tomorrow to decide upon the advisability of continuing the series.

The players were unable to determine whether the small attendance of last night was due to the weather and counter entertainments throughout the city or whether their friends and supporters had abandoned them, but whatever the cause, they expressed themselves as being discouraged.

May Go Elsewhere

The feeling is general among the players that they are not receiving the patronage of the music lovers of the city and they feel that they could do better by establishing themselves in some nearby city.

While last night's audience was small it was none the less appreciative, being generous with applause for both solo and orchestra pieces. The soloists, Gustav Heim, trumpeter; Fredric Fradkin, violinist, and Theodore Cella, harpist, were obliged to respond to the outbursts of enthusiasm.

The program was: Overture, "Mignon," Thomas; trumpet solo from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens, Mr. Heim; Andante Cantabile for string quartet, op. 11, Tschaikowski; Minuet, Bolzoni; violin solo, Gypsy Airs, Sarasate, Mr. Fradkin; Poeme Symphonique, "Le Rouet d'Omphale, Saint-Saens; harp solo, "Mazurka," Schuecker, Mr. Cella; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

Emil Mollenhauer was conductor and James Ecker accompanist.

FORMER SYMPHONY PLAYERS APPLAUDED AT CONCERT

The former members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted an audience of about 1000 to the Colonial Theatre last evening. Although there was room for many more, the enthusiasm could hardly have been greater. Fredric Fradkin was made a veritable lion of, his return after each absence from the stage being the occasion of long-continued applause, while a solo for which he was scheduled was made merely a prelude to half a dozen more.

Gustave Heim created a furore by his masterly rendering on the trumpet of a solo from "Samson and Delilah" and Theodore Cella's solo was followed by two importunate encores. Emil Mollenhauer, the conductor, received lavish applause whenever there was excuse for a demonstration of good will and admiration.

The organization was billed last evening as the American Federation Symphony Orchestra. It included about 60 musicians.

Items and Incidents

The seceders from the Symphony Orchestra drew only a few hundred listeners to their concert in the Colonial Theatre last evening—for the most part, as the applause seemed to indicate, the "personal following" of Mr. Fradkin. The seceders were variously reinforced into a workable orchestra; Mr. Mollenhauer led it; the violinist played several numbers. There was every effort to keep up appearances, but the atmosphere of the occasion was cheerless. Scarcely one of the anticipations of the seceders has been fulfilled. The Symphony Concerts go their way better supported than they have been for several years; the orchestra has been already restored to sufficient numbers, with every sign that by autumn the ranks will be full again. Nobody has come or is likely to come to the rescue of the seceders. Even their fellow-unionists show little interest in them. Their only recourse now seems either return to the orchestra, for as many as it may receive again, or search for jobs elsewhere. Even these, the seceders are discovering, are not too many.

The new Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Bodanzky and Mr. Mengelberg as conductors, will undertake no less than thirty pairs of concerts in New York next season—more than any other band in America has ventured hitherto in a single city. They will be divided into two series of fifteen each. Whether the same programme will serve four times has yet to be decided.

BLANK PAGE

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ESTABLISHED 1881

From MAR 8 1920 E
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

UNION PLEA FOR FRADKIN

Boston Labor Body Urges Reinstatement of Concertmaster

Boston, March 8.—The Central Labor Union passed resolutions yesterday asking the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to reinstate Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster, who was dismissed for failure to acknowledge applause. The resolutions also ask for the recognition of the Union of Symphony Players.

They assert the trustees "by their hasty and arbitrary action have not only threatened the dissolution of a world-famous orchestra but have violated the principle of free organization, which lies at the basis of Americanism and all true democracy, and have offered an insult to organized labor in Boston and throughout the country."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From North America
Philadelphia, P

BOSTON SYMPHONY ASKED TO RECOGNIZE LABOR UNION

BOSTON, March 7.—The Central Labor Union passed resolution today asking the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to reinstate Frederic Fradkin, concert master. He was dismissed for failure to acknowledge applause.

The resolutions also ask for the recognition of the union of symphony players. They assert that the trustees "by their hasty and arbitrary action have not only threatened the dissolution of a world-famous orchestra, but have violated the principle of free organization."

From MAR 1 1920
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOT 'LURING' MUSICIANS

hila. Orchestra Denies Offers to Boston Symphony Players

Statements from Boston asserting Heda van den Beemt, violinist of the Philadelphia Orchestra, is endeavoring to obtain Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians, were answered today by Arthur Judson, manager of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

"The Philadelphia Orchestra Association," said Mr. Judson, "has not at any time in its history attempted to persuade musicians, by the offer of higher salaries, to leave other organizations.

"The Boston Orchestra, employing only non-union men, has been peculiarly exempt from this sort of persuasion because the Philadelphia Orchestra employs only union men.

"If, however, Boston Orchestra players join the union the Philadelphia Orchestra will, of course, feel free to employ any of these men it may need."

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 12 1920

Famous Orchestra Disrupted.

Boston, March 11.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, depleted by a strike of one-third of its players, will be recruited to full strength within a day or two, according to a statement by the management today. The men struck first on Saturday because of the discharge of Concertmaster Fradkin and again yesterday because their pay was withheld pending disciplinary action. They are forming an independent orchestra, with Fradkin as leader, for a tour of New England.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 10 1920

The trouble which recently disturbed the Philadelphia Orchestra finds an echo in the Hub. The concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been discharged. The president of the board of trustees says the dismissal came because the concert master did not rise at a concert on Friday when the conductor motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause. What's so terrible about that? Wait a minute! The concert master himself explains that he has actively interested himself in unionizing "the players, who are greatly underpaid and who are working under adverse conditions." Then, it appears that the concert master really wasn't fired because he neglected to rise, but because he was trying to get a raise for his fellow-players.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From INQUIRER,
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR -7 1920

Boston Orchestra Members Strike

BOSTON, March 6—About thirt members of the Boston Symphony O chestra, in pursuance of their decisi to refuse to play unless the manag ment reinstate Frederick Fradkin, t concert master who was dismissed las night for failure to respond to a signa from Conductor Pierre Monteux, di not take their seats for tonight's con cert.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 28 1920

DISCORD IN ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Players Threate Bolt Unless Union Is Recognized.

Boston, Feb. 27.—Unless the Bosto Symphony Orchestra players are reco ized as a union by the trustees, the will form an orchestra themselves unde union affiliation, according to a stat ment made by a committee of the playe today. Ninety per cent. of the membe have joined the union, and financia lacking for the proposed new orchestra as been offered.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR -7 1920

CONCERTMASTER HISSED

Boston Symphony's Audience Shows Disapproval and He Is Dismissed

Boston, March 6.—Further trouble piled up yesterday in the famous Boston Symphony organization, and it is said that for the first time in the history of the orchestra, covering a third of a century, the audience hissed during a performance. The hissing was for Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster, and therefore second in command of the orchestra, who has been the leader in the movement for the musicians' union. Quite by contrast, one of the greatest ovations ever shown to a director was given to Pierre Monteux, the French director. Late last night the orchestra corporation voted to dismiss Mr. Fradkin forthwith. Notice was served upon Mr. Fradkin just before midnight in his home.

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR -7 1920 E

FIRE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT MASTER FRADKIN

BOSTON, March 6.—Frederi Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the board of trustees late tonight.

In a letter to Fradkin, Frederic P. Cabot, president of the trustees, said the dismissal came because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instruction of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

From MAR 5
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

Special Telegram to Public Ledger

Boston, March 4.—The first formal conference between Judge Frederic P. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., and Arthur Berenson, counsel for the members of the orchestra, who have joined the American Musicians' Union, took place today in Judge Cabot's office and was private.

Today's conference followed the rather sensational act of yesterday when Mr. Berenson was refused admission to Symphony Hall, where the members of the orchestra were about to have a meeting, and his presence at the conference was the first indication that Judge Cabot might recede from his announced policy dealing with the orchestra members only individually.

The Musicians' Union announced today that three more members of the orchestra had joined the union, bringing the total now to seventy-four, of a total orchestra enrollment of ninety.

After the conference today, Mr. Berenson said: "Mr. Cabot and I had a friendly discussion in which I endeavored to point out to him the advantages that would come to both the men and the orchestra from the men's having joined the union. In my opinion, there is nothing in the contract between the men and the trustees that prevent the men's joining the union."

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY DIVIDED

One-third on Strike Join Discharged Master; Orchestra Being Recruited

Boston, March 11. — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, depleted by a strike of one-third of its players, will be recruited to full strength within a day or two, according to a statement by the management today. The men struck first on Saturday because of the discharge of Concert Master Frederick Fradkin and again yesterday because their pay was withheld pending disciplinary action. They are forming an independent orchestra with Fradkin as leader, for a tour of New England.

From
Bulletin MAR 11 1920
Philadelphia, Pa.

MAY GET WOMEN MUSICIANS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Trustees to Fill Strikers' Places

Boston, March 11.—Yesterday's developments in the trouble between the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the thirty-five members who struck on the eve of last Saturday night's concert included the refusal of the thirty-five to have anything more to do with the orchestra save as full-fledged union members under full union conditions; the likelihood of the trustees being compelled to recruit players to fill the vacancies from the ranks of women musicians, owing to the union's hostility preventing available men from accepting positions with the orchestra, and a statement by the trustees to symphony concert patrons setting forth their side in the controversy.

The trustees in their statement say that for the judgment and discretion of a Board of Trustees the rules of the American Federation of Musicians would substitute the judgment of the Executive Board of the federation, a body with whom the musical supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be, and probably ought to be, of an importance quite secondary to the welfare of the federation.

EAGLE
ess Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR -7 1920 D

MUSICIANS REFUSE TO PLA

Boston, March 6—About 30 men ers of the Boston Symphony Orche ra, in pursuance of their decision efuse to play unless the manageme einstated Frederic Fradkin, the co ertmaster, who was dismissed la ight for failure to respond to a sig al from Conductor Pierre Monteu d not take their seats for tonight oncert. Frederick P. Cabot, Preside the Board of Trustees of the o estra, told a committee of the mu cians before the concert that Frad n would not be reinstated.

s: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Mar 1920 A

STRIKERS TO INCORPORATE.

Boston Musicians to Form New Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, March 16.—With a $100,000 subscription for the formation of a new symphony orchestra by strikers and union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the thirty-three union musicians, including their conductor, Frederick Fradkin, dismissed concert master, to-day met to draw up the articles of incorporation.

At a meeting of the committee acting with Arthur Berenson, attorney for the musicians, the necessary legal steps were taken preliminary to the formation of the new orchestra. At to-day's meeting the project will be completed, it was announced.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.
A

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA FIRED

BOSTON, March 11.—Thirty-two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were dismissed to-day because they refused to sign an agreement that specified "intention to perform their contracts without further breach." A strike wa simmediately called by the musiicans.

Trustees yesterday voted to reinstate those members who signed the agreement which called for payment of a fine or $10 for violatio nof their contracts. Three members signed, the

ESTABLISHED 1881

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON CONCERT MASTER DISMISSED BY TRUSTEES

BOSTON, March 6.—Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was to-day dismissed by the Board of Trustees. In a letter to Fradkin, Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, said the dismissal came because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions to the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

Fradkin did not rise at the concert when Pierre Monteux motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause after the playing of a symphony. A few persons in the audience hissed when Fradkin ro

ESTABLISHED 1881

From
NEWS
Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY STRIKERS TAKE PART IN REHEARSA

Boston, March 8.—The Bosto Symphony Orchestra, which was a most disrupted by a strike of 35 pla ers at its regular concert Saturda night, held a rehearsal to-day wit full ranks. The strike was aban doned at the request of Freder Fradkin, the former concert master, whose discharge for publicly snubbing Conductor Pierre Monteux was resented by some of the players.

After the rehearsal, the players who are members of a newly organized union, held a meeting at which it was said demands upon the management would be formulated. An advance of $1000 a year for all players has been requested and refused. Recognition of the union, which was asked recently, has not been granted as yet.

The striking players were allowed to join in the rehearsal to-day, although President Cabot of the orchestra had sent to each a letter saying they were excused from attendance. In the letters he announced that action against the strikers for violation of contract was contemplated, and requested the men to see him to-day prior to action by the trustees.

Mr. Fradkin's letter to the strikers said the cause for which they organized was bigger than the issue involved in his case.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled to give a concert in Infantry Hall in this city to-morrow evening.

The accompanying artiste on tomorrow evening's programme is to be Jean Bedetti, the famous French 'cellist. An unusually fine programme has been planned by M. Monteux.

NEW TABLISHED 1881
MAR
rom

CONDUCTOR OF SYMPHONY AND PLAYERS CLASH

Boston, March 5.—An open breach between Pierre B. Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the same body and member of the union, was created last night, when the conductor ordered Mr. Fradkin to dress with the players.

The custom has been for the conductor and the concertmaster to use the same dressing room.

The trouble came at the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last night, when the orchestra was to play, and nearly caused a strike of the players, who staged the concert only after pressure had ben brought to bear on them by members of the union players' committee of seven and by Mr.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
Providence, R. I.
From MAR -6 1920 A

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT MASTER IS DISMISSED

Directors Declare He Failed to Keep Contract Agreement.

Boston, March 5.—Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the board of trustees late to-night.

In a letter to Fradkin, Frederick P. Cabot, President of the trustees, said the dismissal came because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

Fradkin did not rise at the concert when Conductor Pierre Monteux motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause after the playing of a symphony. A few persons in the audience hissed when Fradkin ro

TRIBUNE
ess: Providence, R. I.
MAR -7 1920 A

PART OF SYMPHONY OR

Thirty Members Refused to Play Because One Wasn't Reinstated.

Boston, March 6.—About 30 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for to-night's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one quarter of the orchestra membership would not join in the evening's program, Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall before the concert, but was told that he would not be allowed to take part.

m TRIBUNE
dress: Providence, R. I. te FEB 20

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(From the Boston Herald.)

The statement made by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is straightforward and reassurring. It should put an end to gossip about the present condition and the future of the orchestra. Erroneous statements have been published; there has been much idle chatter. Malicious reports have been circulated in other cities by those who, for selfish reasons, would welcome the downfall of our orchestra. Nor is the German propaganda at an end. There are some who cannot endure the thought of anyone but a German as a conductor.

The trustees show irrefutably that the stories about the inadequate pay of the members have been extravagant and in some instances false. They have stated their side of the case calmly; they have contented themselves with showing the facts. And facts are stubborn things. The trustees have made no attempt at intimidation; they say to the few restless members: "If you are not satisfied, the door is open. Others, capable musicians, will be knocking for admission."

It is not surprising in these days of general discontent that a few of the younger men in the orchestra should make trouble; men who have served only a short time who have not ranked with the indispensable members. They have found relief in excited talk; they, perhaps, have been taken seriously by some, always ready to entertain gossip; by others, who were wholly unacquainted with the truth of the situation. Members that needlessly stir up strife are not wanted. If they should leave at the expiration of their contracts, their contracts would not be renewed.

The trustees begin my saying: "In any ent, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is be carried on and its great qualities aintained." That is enough. The charter of the trustees is such that these rds will not be misunderstood. The hestra was never musically in a more viable position than it is to-day. Its ndard and its proficiency were never her. It has for a conductor a man great ability as a drill master; a muan of fine and catholic taste; a poetic rpreter of classic, modern and ultra dern compositions. It is for the peop Boston to support gladly this orche , which has for years, is now, and w a source of civic pride. Nor will a nands made for this support be un able, or burdensome.

From Provid
MAR

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BE HERE TO-MORROW EVENING

Complete Programme to Be Given at Infantry Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, despite the threatened disruption of its membership over the discharge of Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster, will appear at Infantry Hall, in this city, to-morrow evening in the fourth of its series of concerts and will provide the complete scheduled programme. This announcement was made from Symphony Hall, Boston, this forenoon.

Endeavors to have other union members of the orchestra in those who remained away from Saturday night's concert over the Fradkin issu were unsuccessful, it was stated. String members appeared at this morning's rehearsal at 10 o'clock and voluntarily joined in the rehearsal, it was announced.

In personal lers to striking members, Judge Frerick P. Cabot, chairman of the trusts of Symphony Orchestra, pointed out that their refusal to appear Saturday night had constituted a breach of t terms of their contract. He said would meet them at Symphony Hall his afternoon, between 2 and 5, if th cared to call. When the striking m bers appeared at this morning's rehea l, and asked if they could join in rehearsal, they were told that they d join voluntarily.

According to announcement from Boston this fore on, not only will the scheduled progr me be given in this city to-morrow nigh t the requisite number of players be on hand.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ESTABLISHED 1881

From MAR 8 1920 E
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

UNION PLEA FOR FRADKIN

Boston Labor Body Urges Reinstatement of Concertmaster

Boston, March 8.—The Central Labor Union passed resolutions yesterday asking the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to reinstate Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster, who was dismissed for failure to acknowledge applause. The resolutions also ask for the recognition of the Union of Symphony Players.

They assert the trustees "by their hasty and arbitrary action have not only threatened the dissolution of a world-famous orchestra but have violated the principle of free organization, which lies at the basis of Americanism and all true democracy, and have offered an insult to organized labor in Boston and throughout the country."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From North America
Philadelphia, P

BOSTON SYMPHONY ASKED TO RECOGNIZE LABOR UNION

BOSTON, March 7.—The Central Labor Union passed resolution today asking the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to reinstate Frederic Fradkin, concert master. He was dismissed for failure to acknowledge applause.

The resolutions also ask for the recognition of the union of symphony players. They assert that the trustees "by their hasty and arbitrary action have not only threatened the dissolution of a world-famous orchestra, but have violated the principle of free organization."

From MAR 1 1920
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOT 'LURING' MUSICIANS

hila. Orchestra Denies Offers to Boston Symphony Players

Statements from Boston asserting Hedley van den Beemt, violinist of the Philadelphia Orchestra, is endeavoring to obtain Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians, were answered today by Arthur Judson, manager of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

"The Philadelphia Orchestra Association," said Mr. Judson, "has not at any time in its history attempted to persuade musicians, by the offer of higher salaries, to leave other organizations.

"The Boston Orchestra, employing only non-union men, has been peculiarly exempt from this sort of persuasion because the Philadelphia Orchestra employs only union men.

"If, however, Boston Orchestra players join the union the Philadelphia Orchestra will, of course, feel free to employ any of these men it may need."

n RECORD
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 12 1920

Famous Orchestra Disrupted.

Boston, March 11.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, depleted by a strike of one-third of its players, will be recruited to full strength within a day or two, according to a statement by the management today. The men struck first on Saturday because of the discharge of Concertmaster Fradkin and again yesterday because their pay was withheld pending disciplinary action. They are forming an independent orchestra, with Fradkin as leader, for a tour of New England.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 6 1920

The trouble which recently disturbed the Philadelphia Orchestra finds an echo in the Hub. The concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been discharged. The president of the board of trustees says the dismissal came because the concert master did not rise at a concert on Friday when the conductor motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause. What's so terrible about that? Wait a minute! The concert master himself explains that he has actively interested himself in unionizing "the players, who are greatly underpaid and who are working under adverse conditions." Then, it appears that the concert master really wasn't fired because he neglected to rise, but because he was trying to get a raise for his fellow-players.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From INQUIRER,
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR -7 1920

Boston Orchestra Members Strike

BOSTON, March 6—About thirt members of the Boston Symphony O chestra, in pursuance of their decisi to refuse to play unless the manag ment reinstate Frederick Fradkin, t concert master who was dismissed las night for failure to respond to a signa from Conductor Pierre Monteux, di not take their seats for tonight's con cert.

n RECORD
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 27 1920

DISCORD IN ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Players Threate Bolt Unless Union Is Recognized.

Boston, Feb. 27.—Unless the Bosto Symphony Orchestra players are reco ized as a union by the trustees, the will form an orchestra themselves unde union affiliation, according to a stat ment made by a committee of the playe today. Ninety per cent. of the membe have joined the union, and financial lacking for the proposed new orchestra has been offered.

From Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

CONCERTMASTER HISSED

Boston Symphony's Audience Shows Disapproval and He Is Dismissed

Boston, March 6.—Further trouble piled up yesterday in the famous Boston Symphony organization, and it is said that for the first time in the history of the orchestra, covering a third of a century, the audience hissed during a performance. The hissing was for Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster, and therefore second in command of the orchestra, who has been the leader in the movement for the musicians' union. Quite by contrast, one of the greatest ovations ever shown to a director was given to Pierre Monteux, the French director. Late last night the orchestra corporation voted to dismiss Mr. Fradkin forthwith. Notice was served upon Mr. Fradkin just before midnight in his home.

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.

FIRE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT MASTER FRADKIN

BOSTON, March 6.—Frederi Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the board of trustees late tonight.

In a letter to Fradkin, Frederic P. Cabot, president of the trustees, said the dismissal came because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instruction of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

From Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

Special Telegram to Public Ledger

Boston, March 4.—The first formal conference between Judge Frederic P. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., and Arthur Berenson, counsel for the members of the orchestra, who have joined the American Musicians' Union, took place today in Judge Cabot's office and was private.

Today's conference followed the rather sensational act of yesterday when Mr. Berenson was refused admission to Symphony Hall, where the members of the orchestra were about to have a meeting, and his presence at the conference was the first indication that Judge Cabot might recede from his announced policy dealing with the orchestra members only individually.

The Musicians' Union announced today that three more members of the orchestra had joined the union, bringing the total now to seventy-four, of a total orchestra enrollment of ninety.

After the conference today, Mr. Berenson said: "Mr. Cabot and I had a friendly discussion in which I endeavored to point out to him the advantages that would come to both the men and the orchestra from the men's having joined the union. In my opinion, there is nothing in the contract between the men and the trustees that prevent the men's joining the union."

From Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY DIVIDED

One-third on Strike Join Discharged Master; Orchestra Being Recruited

Boston, March 11. — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, depleted by a strike of one-third of its players, will be recruited to full strength within a day or two, according to a statement by the management today. The men struck first on Saturday because of the discharge of Concert Master Frederick Fradkin and again yesterday because their pay was withheld pending disciplinary action. They are forming an independent orchestra with Frad-

From Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 11 1920

MAY GET WOMEN MUSICIANS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Trustees to Fill Strikers' Places

Boston, March 11.—Yesterday's developments in the trouble between the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the thirty-five members who struck on the eve of last Saturday night's concert included the refusal of the thirty-five to have anything more to do with the orchestra save as full-fledged union members under full union conditions; the likelihood of the trustees being compelled to recruit players to fill the vacancies from the ranks of women musicians, owing to the union's hostility preventing available men from accepting positions with the orchestra, and a statement by the trustees to symphony concert patrons setting forth their side in the controversy.

The trustees in their statement say that for the judgment and discretion of a Board of Trustees the rules of the American Federation of Musicians would substitute the judgment of the Executive Board of the federation, a body with whom the musical supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be, and probably ought to be, of an importance quite secondary to the welfare of the federation.

ess EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 7 1920

MUSICIANS REFUSE TO PLA

Boston, March 6—About 30 mem bers of the Boston Symphony Orche tra, in pursuance of their decision refuse to play unless the manageme reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the co certmaster, who was dismissed la night for failure to respond to a sig al from Conductor Pierre Monteu id not take their seats for tonight ncert. Frederick P. Cabot, Presider the Board of Trustees of the or hestra, told a committee of the mu cians before the concert that Frad n would not be reinstated.

s: Brooklyn, N. Y.

STRIKERS TO INCORPORATE.

Boston Musicians to Form New Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, March 16.—With a $100,000 subscription for the formation of a new symphony orchestra by strikers and union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the thirty-three union musicians, including their conductor, Frederick Fradkin, dismissed concert master, to-day met to draw up the articles of incorporation.

At a meeting of the committee acting with Arthur Berenson, attorney for the musicians, the necessary legal steps were taken preliminary to the formation of the new orchestra. At to-day's meeting the project will be completed, it was announced.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA FIRED

BOSTON, March 11.—Thirty-two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were dismissed to-day because they refused to sign an agreement that specified "intention to perform their contracts without further breach." A strike wa simmediately called by the musiicans.

Trustees yesterday voted to reinstate those members who signed the agreement which called for payment of a fine or $10 for violatio nof their contracts. Three members signed, the

ESTABLISHED 1881

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON CONCERT MASTER DISMISSED BY TRUSTEES

BOSTON, March 6.—Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was to-day dismissed by the Board of Trustees. In a letter to Fradkin, Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, said the dismissal came because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions to the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

Fradkin did not rise at the concert when Pierre Monteux motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause after the playing of a symphony. A few persons in the audience hissed when Fradkin

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

BOSTON SYMPHONY STRIKERS TAKE PART IN REHEARSA

Boston, March 8.—The Bosto Symphony Orchestra, which was a most disrupted by a strike of 35 pla ers at its regular concert Saturda night, held a rehearsal to-day wit full ranks. The strike was aban doned at the request of Freder Fradkin, the former concert master, whose discharge for publicly snubbing Conductor Pierre Monteux was resented by some of the players.

After the rehearsal, the players who are members of a newly organized union, held a meeting at which it was said demands upon the management would be formulated. An advance of $1000 a year for all players has been requested and refused. Recognition of the union, which was asked recently, has not been granted as yet.

The striking players were allowed to join in the rehearsal to-day, although President Cabot of the orchestra had sent to each a letter saying they were excused from attendance. In the letters he announced that action against the strikers for violation of contract was contemplated, and requested the men to see him to-day prior to action by the trustees.

Mr. Fradkin's letter to the strikers said the cause for which they organized was bigger than the issue involved in his case.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled to give a concert in Infantry Hall in this city to-morrow evening.

The accompanying artiste on tomorrow evening's programme is to be Jean Bedetti, the famous French 'cellist. An unusually fine programme has been planned by M. Monteux.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From

CONDUCTOR OF SYMPHONY AND PLAYERS CLASH

Boston, March 5.—An open breach between Pierre B. Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the same body and member of the union, was created last night, when the conductor ordered Mr. Fradkin to dress with the players.

The custom has been for the conductor and the concertmaster to use the same dressing room.

The trouble came at the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last night, when the orchestra was to play, and nearly caused a strike of the players, who staged the concert only after pressure had ben brought to bear on them by members of the union players' committee of seven and by Mr.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
Providence, R. I.

From

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT MASTER IS DISMISSED

Directors Declare He Failed to Keep Contract Agreement.

Boston, March 5.—Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the board of trustees late to-night.

In a letter to Fradkin, Frederick P. Cabot, President of the trustees, said the dismissal came because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

Fradkin did not rise at the concert when Conductor Pierre Monteux motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause after the playing of a symphony. A few persons in the audience hissed when Fradkin

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

BOSTON SYMPHONY STRIKERS TAKE PART IN REHEARSA

Boston, March 8.—The Bosto Symphony Orchestra, which was a most disrupted by a strike of 35 pla ers at its regular concert Saturda night, held a rehearsal to-day wit full ranks. The strike was aban doned at the request of Freder Fradkin, the former concert master, whose discharge for publicly snubbing Conductor Pierre Monteux was resented by some of the players.

After the rehearsal, the players who are members of a newly organized union, held a meeting at which it was said demands upon the management would be formulated. An advance of $1000 a year for all players has been requested and refused. Recognition of the union, which was asked recently, has not been granted as yet.

The striking players were allowed to join in the rehearsal to-day, although President Cabot of the orchestra had sent to each a letter saying they were excused from attendance. In the letters he announced that action against the strikers for violation of contract was contemplated, and requested the men to see him to-day prior to action by the trustees.

Mr. Fradkin's letter to the strikers said the cause for which they organized was bigger than the issue involved in his case.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled to give a concert in Infantry Hall in this city to-morrow evening.

The accompanying artiste on tomorrow evening's programme is to be Jean Bedetti, the famous French 'cellist. An unusually fine programme has been planned by M. Monteux.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
Providence, R. I.

From

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT MASTER IS DISMISSED

Directors Declare He Failed to Keep Contract Agreement.

Boston, March 5.—Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the board of trustees late to-night.

In a letter to Fradkin, Frederick P. Cabot, President of the trustees, said the dismissal came because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

Fradkin did not rise at the concert when Conductor Pierre Monteux motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause after the playing of a symphony. A few persons in the audience hissed when Fradkin

TRIBUNE
ess: Providence, R. I.
MAR 7 1920 A

PART OF SYMPHONY OR

Thirty Members Refused to Play Because One Wasn't Reinstated.

Boston, March 6.—About 30 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for to-night's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one quarter of the orchestra membership would not join in the evening's program, Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall before the concert, but was told that he would not be allowed to take part.

m TRIBUNE
dress: Providence, R. I. te

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(From the Boston Herald.)

The statement made by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is straightforward and reassurring. It should put an end to gossip about the present condition and the future of the orchestra. Erroneous statements have been published; there has been much idle chatter. Malicious reports have been circulated in other cities by those who, for selfish reasons, would welcome the downfall of our orchestra. Nor is the German propaganda at an end. There are some who cannot endure the thought of anyone but a German as a conductor.

The trustees show irrefutably that the stories about the inadequate pay of the members have been extravagant and in some instances false. They have stated their side of the case calmly; they have contented themselves with showing the facts. And facts are stubborn things. The trustees have made no attempt at intimidation; they say to the few restless members: "If you are not satisfied, the door is open. Others, capable musicians, will be knocking for admission."

It is not surprising in these days of general discontent that a few of the younger men in the orchestra should make trouble; men who have served only a short time who have not ranked with the indispensable members. They have found relief in excited talk; they, perhaps, have been taken seriously by some, always ready to entertain gossip; by others, who were wholly unacquainted with the truth of the situation. Members that needlessly stir up strife are not wanted. If they should leave at the expiration of their contracts, their contracts would not be renewed.

The trustees begin my saying: "In any event, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be carried on and its great qualities maintained." That is enough. The charter of the trustees is such that these words will not be misunderstood. The orchestra was never musically in a more viable position than it is to-day. Its standard and its proficiency were never higher. It has for a conductor a man of great ability as a drill master; a musician of fine and catholic taste; a poetic interpreter of classic, modern and ultra-modern compositions. It is for the people of Boston to support gladly this orchestra, which has for years, is now, and will be a source of civic pride. Nor will any demands made for this support be unreasonable, or burdensome.

From Provid
MAR

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BE HERE TO-MORROW EVENING

Complete Programme to Be Given at Infantry Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, despite the threatened disruption of its membership over the discharge of Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster, will appear at Infantry Hall, in this city, to-morrow evening in the fourth of its series of concerts and will provide the complete scheduled programme. This announcement was made from Symphony Hall, Boston, this forenoon.

Endeavors to have other union members of the orchestra join those who remained away from Saturday night's concert over the Fradkin issue were unsuccessful, it was stated. Strike members appeared at this morning's rehearsal at 10 o'clock and voluntarily joined in the rehearsal, it was announced.

In personal letters to striking members, Judge Frerick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of Symphony Orchestra, pointed out that their refusal to appear Saturday night had constituted a breach of the terms of their contract. He said would meet them at Symphony Hall this afternoon, between 2 and 5, if they cared to call. When the striking members appeared at this morning's rehearsal, and asked if they could join in the rehearsal, they were told that they could join voluntarily.

According to announcement from Boston this forenoon, not only will the scheduled programme be given in this city to-morrow night but the requisite number of players be on hand.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
Providence, R. I.
FEB 27 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MAY BE REORGANIZED SOON

Unless Union Membership is Recognized by Trustees Players Will Withdraw and Form New Orchestra Affiliated with Unions, It is Declared.

[By the Associated Press]

Boston Feb 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players to-day. Ninety per cent. of the members have joined the union and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it was said.

Unionization is "the only thing that will hold the organization together," the statement declares. "The players have not received sufficient salary and, being non-union men, could get little outside work. As a result men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union, and the constant change in membership has been a damper to proper team work.

"The trustees have assumed a most autocratic attitude toward the men. It was said a year ago that the only opposition to unionization was that the union prohibited bringing players from Europe for the orchestra. The contract labor laws make this impossible now and there should be no objection."

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday, and it is claimed that of the 20 players who have not joined, 10 have announced their intention of doing so. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players' committee as being in sympathy with unionization.

The trustees have recently rejected a request for an increase of $1000 a year for each player, but have expressed a willingness to have a fall season of popular concerts to add to the players' receipts.

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

Affairs of the Boston symphony orchestra appear to be approaching a crisis. A request for higher salaries has been made by many of the players, and the trustees, recognizing that the expenses of the orchestra must increase, have announced a campaign for raising a $2,000,000 fund for the upkeep of the organization. So far, all might be harmonious. But the unionization movement, which has invaded the orchestra before, has made new headway, and it is asserted that a great majority of the members are now ready to become union members. The principal argument for unionization, from the players' point of view, is that many of them must accept outside work in order to have a sufficient income, and that being nonunion musicians stands in their way. The trustees are said to be unwilling to treat with the players as union men. They assert, however, that in spite of the present deficit of $100,000 and in spite of any disruption that may come, the orchestra will be maintained. On the other hand, unionized members assert that there are wealthy Boston men ready to back them as the nucleus of a new orchestra if the secede. If this is correct, there are apparently some persons in Boston who would like to see the orchestra under different control. Judge Cabot, of the trustees, says that since the retirement of Maj Higginson certain men have contributed annually double the amount that Maj Higginson contributed to the orchestra's support. This is asserted to have not been in excess of $50,000 in any one year.

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

Affairs of the Boston symphony orchestra appear to be approaching a crisis. A request for higher salaries has been made by many of the players, and the trustees, recognizing that the expenses of the orchestra must increase, have announced a campaign for raising a $2,000,000 fund for the upkeep of the organization. So far, all might be harmonious. But the unionization movement, which has invaded the orchestra before, has made new headway, and it is asserted that a great majority of the members are now ready to become union members. The principal argument for unionization, from the players' point of view, is that many of them must accept outside work in order to have a sufficient income, and that being nonunion musicians stands in their way. The trustees are said to be unwilling to treat with the players as union men. They assert, however, that in spite of the present deficit of $100,000 and in spite of any disruption that may come, the orchestra will be maintained. On the other hand, unionized members assert that there are wealthy Boston men ready to back them as the nucleus of a new orchestra if the secede. If this is correct, there are apparently some persons in Boston who would like to see the orchestra under different control. Judge Cabot, of the trustees, says that since the retirement of Maj Higginson certain men have contributed annually double the amount that Maj Higginson contributed to the orchestra's support. This is asserted to have not been in excess of $50,000 in any one year.

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

SYMPHONY STRIKE ENDS

Boston, March 8—The Boston symphony orchestra, which was almost disrupted by a strike of 35 players on its regular concert Saturday night, held a rehearsal to-day with full ranks. The strike was abandoned at the request of Frederic Fradkin, the former concertmaster, whose discharge for publicly snubbing Conductor Pierre Monteux was resented by some of the players.

NEGLIGENT LANDLORD FINED

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

DEMAND MORE WAGES

Members of Boston Symphony Orchestra Told Organization Has No Money to Meet Demands

Boston, Feb. 18—Players of the Boston symphony orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages, and have taken steps toward joining the musicians' union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said to-day that the question of union membership was not an issue between players and management, although recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

The request for more wages was submitted in a letter, and was based on the plea that the players' present compensation is inadequate under increased living costs.

Judge Cabot said the number who joined in the request was "large," possibly as many as 80. At a meeting of the orchestra subsequently, he told the players that the resources of the organization were such that no funds were available for the $100,000 advance necessary to meet their request.

The orchestra has approximately $100,000 to draw upon, and its operating expenditure is upwards of $90,000 a year.

The orchestra management has not overlooked the possibiljty that some of the players may decide that they must receive more money than can be had by remaining with the Boston symphony. Such men, it is admitted, can probably obtain higher rates by joining the musicians' union and playing under its contracts.

FEB 28 1920

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

SYMPHONY THREATENED

Boston Orchestra Players Present Ultimatum to Trustees

Boston, Feb. 27—Unless the Boston symphony orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players to-day. Ninety per cent of the members have joined the union and financial backing of the proper new orchestra has been offered it is said.

Frederick Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday and it is claimed that of the 20 players who have not joined, 10 have announced their intention of doing so. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players' committee as being in sympathy with unionization.

ESTABLISHED 1881
Providence, R.
Bulletin
FEB 24 1920 A

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SAID TO BE UNIONIZE

Chirman of Committee of Players Says That 60 of 95 Members Are Enrolled in Musicial Organization and Will Negotiate for Higher Pay.

Boston, Feb. 24.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has become unionized, according to a statement last night by Carl Gardner, chairman of a committee of seven Symphony players appointed to conduct negotiations between the union and the trustees.

Chairman Gardner declared that 60 out of the 95 members of the orchestra have already enrolled and paid thier initiation fees to the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, and that the remaining members would probably enroll within a day or two.

The fact that yesterday was a holiday which fought outside engagements to many of the players, he declared, prevented their attendance at the conference held at union headquarters on St. Botolph street, but he had received assurances from the absentees that warranted his assertions that the orchestra had become unionized. While there were but 36 players in the union two weeks ago when the demands were first made for increase in salaries, to-day there are 60 members.

At the conference yesterday there were present in addition to the Symphony members, Thomas F. Gamble, International Secretary of the American Federation of Musicians; Fred C. Kingman, President of the Boston local; Herman P. Liehr, Secretary of the Boston local; William Dodge, chairman of the board of directors, and Arthur Berenson, attorney

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Providence, R.
FEB 18 1920 A

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS SEEK INCREASE IN WAGES

Demands Aggregating $100,000 More Pay Refused; May Join Union.

[By the Associated Press]

Boston, Feb. 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said to-day. The question of union membership is not an issue between players and management, he explained, although recognition of a union has been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

Judge Cabot said the trustees had recently received a letter from some of the players, in which they asked for more wages, on the ground that their present compensation was inadequate under increased living costs. The number of players who joined in the request was "large," possibly as many as 80. At a meeting of the orchestra subsequently, Judge Cabot told the players that the resources of the organization were such that no funds for the $100,000 advance necessary to meet their request were available. The orchestra has approximately $100,000 to draw upon, and its operating expenditure is upward of $90,000 a year.

"Settlement on an individual basis will be made in some cases with moderate increases, but any substantial advance is out of the question, with our limited resources," Judge Cabot said.

The orchestra management has not overlooked the possibility that some of the players may decide that they must receive more money than can be had by remaining with the Boston Symphony. Such men, it is admitted, can probably obtain higher rates by joining the Musicians' Union and playing under its contracts.

REPUBLICAN CLUB URGES

GLOBE DEMOCRAT
St. Louis, Mo.
FEB 19

BOSTON ORCHESTRA DENIED $100,000 WAGE INCREASE

BOSTON, MASS., February 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the Board of Trustees of the orchestra, said today that the question of union membership was not an issue between players and management, although recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would determine who should play with the orchestra.

The request for more wages was based on the plea that the players' present compensation is inadequate under increased living conditions.

"Settlement on an individual basis will be made in some cases with moderate increases, but any substantial advance is out of the question with our limited resources," Judge Cabot said.

From
Bill Board
MAR 6 1920
Cincinnati, O.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MEMBERS JOINING THE UNION

Of the Twenty Not Yet Affiliated With A. F. of M. Ten Have Announced Intention of Doing So, It Is Said—Must Unionize 100 Per Cent, Declares J. N. Weber

New York, Feb. 26.—Joseph N. Weber, international president of the American Federation of Musicians, was asked today by a Billboard representative what he knew about the situation in Boston regarding the unionizing of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Weber said that his assistant had spent a few days in Boston to see how matters stood, and he understands that about seventy per cent of the musicians have filed applications to join the union. There are ninety-five members in the orchestra.

"We are now awaiting further developments," said Mr. Weber, who declared also that the movement afoot to unionize is very strong, and, that assuming only part of the orchestra succeed in organizing, he is sure the union members will speedily leave the Boston Symphony to affiliate themselves with a union organization.

According to a Boston dispatch in the morning papers, a statement interpreted as defiance of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who have signified their intention of unionizing, has been issued by Judge Cabot, chairman of the Trustees. Judge Cabot is quoted as declaring to orchestra members at a rehearsal that their wages are thirty per cent higher than they were before the war. Judge Cabot is said to have told members, in substance, that those who wish to continue under present conditions may do so, but it is desired that those who find it impossible to remain, notify the management at once.

New York, Feb. 28.—The committee of the orchestra players issued the following statement yesterday:

"Unionization is the only thing that will hold the organization together. The players have not received a sufficient salary, and, being nonunion men, could not get outside work. As a result men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union, and the constant change in membership has been a damper to proper team work. The trustees have assumed a most autocratic attitude toward the men. It was said a year ago that the only opposition to unionization was that the union prohibited bringing players from Europe for the orchestra. The contract labor laws make this impossible now, and there should be no objection."

Frederic Fradkin, the concert master of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday, and it is claimed that of the twenty players who have not joined ten have announced their intention of doing so. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players' committee as being in sympathy with unionization.

The players committee today sent formal notice to the trustees of the orchestra that a large majority of the members had affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians as "the only effectual means of remedying conditions no longer tolerable." The notice asked that players' contracts be revised to enable them "to comply with the duties and obligations fixed by the by-laws of the Federation and the principle for which it stands." The trustees were requested to appoint a time and place to meet the committee.

From Express
N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA UNION

Members of symphony body may form new organization.

Boston, Mass., Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players today. Ninety per cent. of the members have joined the union and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it is said.

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday and it is claimed that of the twenty players who have not joined, ten have announced their intention of doing so. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players' committee as being in sympathy with unionization.

The trustees have recently rejected a request for an increase of $1,000 a year for each player, but have expressed a willingness to have a fall season of popular concerts to add to the players' receipts.

Quarantine against raw broom corn.

From
COMMERCIAL TRIBUNE,
Cincinnati, Ohio

Boston Symphony Artists Demand $100,000 Rise; Threaten To Join Union

BOSTON, Feb. 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, Chairman of the Board of Trustees of the orchestra, said today that the question of union membership was not an issue between players and management, although recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

The request for more wages was submitted in a letter and was based on the plea that the players' present compensation is inadequate under increased living conditions. Judge Cabot told the players that the resources of the organization were such that no funds were available for the $100,000 advance necessary to meet their request.

The orchestra has approximately $100,000 to draw upon, and its operating expenditure is upward of $90,000 a year.

"Settlement on an individual basisi will be made in some cases with moderate increases, but any substantial advance is out of the question with our limited resources," Judge Cabot said.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From 4
ENQUIRER,
Cincinnati, Ohio

MUSICIANS TO WITHDRAW

From Boston Symphony If Recognition Is Denied.

Boston, Mass., February 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players to-day. Ninety per cent of the members have joined the union, and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it is said.

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, has joined the union, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players committee as being in symphany with unionization.

The trustees recently rejected a request for an increase of $1,000 a year for each player, but expressed a willingness to conduct a series of popular concerts next fall to add to the players' receipts.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
COMMERCIAL TRIBUNE,
Cincinnati, Ohio
MAR - 7 192

MUSICIANS TO CONSIDER STRIKE

BOSTON, March 6.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arranged a meeting late today to consider whether they would refuse to hold their usual concert tonight as a means of forcing reinstatement of Frederick Fradkin, concert master. Fradkin was discharged after he had refused to rise last night when Conductor Monteux was applauded.

From Dispatch
FEB 28 1920 M
Pittsburg, Pa.

and bring Government control.

Orchestra in Split

BOSTON, Feb 27—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recog-

INFORMATION OBSCURED

NEW YORK
LISHED 1861

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MAY BE REORGANIZED SOON

Unless Union Membership is Recognized by Trustees Players Will Withdraw and Form New Orchestra Affiliated with Unions, It is Declared.

[By the Associated Press]

Boston Feb 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players to-day. Ninety per cent. of the members have joined the union and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it was said.

Unionization is "the only thing that will hold the organization together," the statement declares. "The players have not received sufficient salary and, being non-union men, could get little outside work. As a result men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union, and the constant change in membership has been a damper to proper team work.

"The trustees have assumed a most autocratic attitude toward the men. It was said a year ago that the only opposition to unionization was that the union prohibited bringing players from Europe for the orchestra. The contract labor laws make this impossible now and there should be no objection."

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday, and it is claimed that of the 20 players who have not joined, 10 have announced their intention of doing so. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players' committee as being in sympathy with unionization.

The trustees have recently rejected a request for an increase of $1000 a year for each player, but have expressed a willingness to have a fall season of popular concerts to add to the players' receipts.

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

Affairs of the Boston symphony orchestra appear to be approaching a crisis. A request for higher salaries has been made by many of the players, and the trustees, recognizing that the expenses of the orchestra must increase, have announced a campaign for raising a $2,000,000 fund for the upkeep of the organization. So far, all might be harmonious. But the unionization movement, which has invaded the orchestra before, has made new headway, and it is asserted that a great majority of the members are now ready to become union members. The principal argument for unionization, from the players' point of view, is that many of them must accept outside work in order to have a sufficient income, and that being nonunion musicians stands in their way. The trustees are said to be unwilling to treat with the players as union men. They assert, however, that in spite of the present deficit of $100,000 and in spite of any disruption that may come, the orchestra will be maintained. On the other hand, unionized members assert that there are wealthy Boston men ready to back them as the nucleus of a new orchestra if the

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

Affairs of the Boston symphony orchestra appear to be approaching a crisis. A request for higher salaries has been made by many of the players, and the trustees, recognizing that the expenses of the orchestra must increase, have announced a campaign for raising a $2,000,000 fund for the upkeep of the organization. So far, all might be harmonious. But the unionization movement, which has invaded the orchestra before, has made new headway, and it is asserted that a great majority of the members are now ready to become union members. The principal argument for unionization, from the players' point of view, is that many of them must accept outside work in order to have a sufficient income, and that being nonunion musicians stands in their way. The trustees are said to be unwilling to treat with the players as union men. They assert, however, that in spite of the present deficit of $100,000 and in spite of any disruption that may come, the orchestra will be maintained. On the other hand, unionized members assert that there are wealthy Boston men ready to back them as the nucleus of a new orchestra if the secede. If this is correct, there are apparently some persons in Boston who would like to see the orchestra under different control. Judge Cabot, of the trustees, says that since the retirement of Maj Higginson certain men have contributed annually double the amount that Maj Higginson contributed to the orchestra's support. This is asserted to have not been in excess of $50,000 in any one year.

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

DEMAND MORE WAGES

Members of Boston Symphony Orchestra Told Organization Has No Money to Meet Demands

Boston, Feb. 18—Players of the Boston symphony orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages, and have taken steps toward joining the musicians' union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100.000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said to-day that the question of union membership was not an issue between players and management, although recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

The request for more wages was submitted in a letter, and was based on the plea that the players' present compensation is inadequate under increased living costs.

Judge Cabot said the number who joined in the request was "large," possibly as many as 80. At a meeting of the orchestra subsequently, he told the players that the resources of the organization were such that no funds were available for the $100,000 advance necessary to meet their request.

The orchestra has approximately $100,000 to draw upon, and its operating expenditure is upwards of $90,000 a year.

The orchestra management has not overlooked the possibility that some of the players may decide that they must receive more money than can be had by remaining with the Boston symphony. Such men, it is admitted, can probably obtain higher rates by joining the musicians' union and playing under its contracts.

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

SYMPHONY THREATENED

Boston Orchestra Players Present Ultimatum to Trustees

Boston, Feb. 27—Unless the Boston Symphony orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players to-day. Ninety per cent of the members have joined the union and financial backing of the proper new orchestra has been offered it is said.

Frederick Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday and it is claimed that of the 20 players who have not joined, 10 have announced their intention of doing so. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players' committee as being in sympathy with unionization.

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

SYMPHONY STRIKE ENDS

Boston, March 8—The Boston symphony orchestra, which was almost disrupted by a strike of 35 players on its regular concert Saturday night, held a rehearsal to-day with full ranks. The strike was abandoned at the request of Frederic Fradkin, the former concertmaster, whose discharge for publicly snubbing Conductor Pierre Monteux was resented by some of the players.

NEGLIGENT LANDLORD FINED

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS SEEK INCREASE IN WAGES

Demands Aggregating $100,000 More Pay Refused; May Join Union.

[By the Associated Press]

Boston, Feb. 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said to-day. The question of union membership is not an issue between players and management, he explained, although recognition of a union has been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

Judge Cabot said the trustees had recently received a letter from some of the players, in which they asked for more wages, on the ground that their present compensation was inadequate under increased living costs. The number of players who joined in the request was "large," possibly as many as 80. At a meeting of the orchestra subsequently, Judge Cabot told the players that the resources of the organization were such that no funds for the $100,000 advance necessary to meet their request were available. The orchestra has approximately $100,000 to draw upon, and its operating expenditure is upward of $90,000 a year.

"Settlement on an individual basis will be made in some cases with moderate increases, but any substantial advance is out of the question, with our limited resources," Judge Cabot said.

The orchestra management has not overlooked the possibility that some of the players may decide that they must receive more money than can be had by remaining with the Boston Symphony. Such men, it is admitted, can probably obtain higher rates by joining the Musicians' Union and playing under its contracts.

REPUBLICAN CLUB URGES

...ts, Etc.

ABLISHED 1881

From

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SAID TO BE UNIONIZE

Chirman of Committee of Players Says That 60 of 95 Members Are Enrolled in Musician Organization and Will Negotiate for Higher Pay.

Boston, Feb. 24.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has become unionized, according to a statement last night by Carl Gardner, chairman of a committee of seven Symphony players appointed to conduct negotiations between the union and the trustees.

Chairman Gardner declared that 60 out of the 95 members of the orchestra have already enrolled and paid thier initiation fees to the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, and that the remaining members would probably enroll within a day or two.

The fact that yesterday was a holiday, which fought outside engagements to many of the players, he declared, prevented their attendance at the conference held at union headquarters on St. Botolph street, but he had received assurances from the absentees that warranted his assertions that the orchestra had become unionized. While there were but 36 players in the union two weeks ago when the demands were first made for increase in salaries, to-day there are 60 members.

At the conference yesterday there were present in addition to the Symphony members, Thomas F. Gamble, International Secretary of the American Federation of Musicians; Fred C. Kingman, President of the Boston local; Herman P. Liehr, Secretary of the Boston local; William Dodge, chairman of the board of directors, and Arthur Berenson, attorney

GLOBE DEMOCRAT
St. Louis, Mo.
FEB 19

BOSTON ORCHESTRA DENIED $100,000 WAGE INCREASE

BOSTON, MASS., February 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the Board of Trustees of the orchestra, said today that the question of union membership was not an issue between players and management, although recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would determine who should play with the orchestra.

The request for more wages was based on the plea that the players' present compensation is inadequate under increased living conditions.

"Settlement on an individual basis will be made in some cases with moderate increases, but any substantial advance is out of the question with our limited resources," Judge Cabot said.

om
Bill Board
Cincinnati, O.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MEMBERS JOINING THE UNION

Of the Twenty Not Yet Affiliated With A. F. of M. Ten Have Announced Intention of Doing So, It Is Said—Must Unionize 100 Per Cent, Declares J. N. Weber

New York, Feb. 26.—Joseph N. Weber, international president of the American Federation of Musicians, was asked today by a Billboard representative what he knew about the situation in Boston regarding the unionizing of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Weber said that his assistant had spent a few days in Boston to see how matters stood, and he understands that about seventy per cent of the musicians have filed applications to join the union. There are ninety-five members in the orchestra.

"We are now awaiting further developments," said Mr. Weber, who declared also that the movement afoot to unionize is very strong, and, that assuming only part of the orchestra succeed in organizing, he is sure the union members will speedily leave the Boston Symphony to affiliate themselves with a union organization.

According to a Boston dispatch in the morning papers, a statement interpreted as defiance of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who have signified their intention of unionizing, has been issued by Judge Cabot, chairman of the Trustees. Judge Cabot is quoted as declaring to orchestra members at a rehearsal that their wages are thirty per cent higher than they were before the war. Judge Cabot is said to have told members, in substance, that those who wish to continue under present conditions may do so, but it is desired that those who find it impossible to remain, notify the management at once.

New York, Feb. 28.—The committee of the orchestra players issued the following statement yesterday:

"Unionization is the only thing that will hold the organization together. The players have not received a sufficient salary, and, being nonunion men, could not get outside work. As a result men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union, and the constant change in membership has been a damper to proper team work. The trustees have assumed a most autocratic attitude toward the men. It was said a year ago that the only opposition to unionization was that the union prohibited bringing players from Europe for the orchestra. The contract labor laws make this impossible now, and there should be no objection."

Frederic Fradkin, the concert master of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday, and it is claimed that of the twenty players who have not joined ten have announced their intention of doing so. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players' committee as being in sympathy with unionization.

The players committee today sent formal notice to the trustees of the orchestra that a large majority of the members had affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians as "the only effectual means of remedying conditions no longer tolerable." The notice asked that players' contracts be revised to enable them "to comply with the duties and obligations fixed by the by-laws of the Federation and the principle for which it stands." The trustees were requested to appoint a time and place to meet the committee.

ESTABLISHED 1881
COMMERCIAL TRIBUNE,
Cincinnati, Ohio

MUSICIANS TO CONSIDER STRIKE

BOSTON, March 6.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arranged a meeting late today to consider whether they would refuse to hold their usual concert tonight as a means of forcing reinstatement of Frederick Fradkin, concert master. Fradkin was discharged after he had refused to rise last night when Conductor Monteux was applauded.

From Dispatch
Pittsburg, Pa.

and bring Government control to...

Orchestra in Split

BOSTON, Feb 27—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recog...

From Express
...N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA UNION

Members of symphony body may form new organization.

Boston, Mass., Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players today. Ninety per cent. of the members have joined the union and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it is said.

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday and it is claimed that of the twenty players who have not joined, ten have announced their intention of doing so. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players' committee as being in sympathy with unionization.

The trustees have recently rejected a request for an increase of $1,000 a year for each player, but have expressed a willingness to have a fall season of popular concerts to add to the players' receipts.

Quarantine against raw broom corn.

From
COMMERCIAL TRIBUNE,
Cincinnati, Ohio

BostonSymphonyArtists Demand $100,000 Rise; Threaten To Join Union

BOSTON, Feb. 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, Chairman of the Board of Trustees of the orchestra, said today that the question of union membership was not an issue between players and management, although recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

The request for more wages was submitted in a letter and was based on the plea that the players' present compensation is inadequate under increased living conditions. Judge Cabot told the players that the resources of the organization were such that no funds were available for the $100,000 advance necessary to meet their request.

The orchestra has approximately $100,000 to draw upon, and its operating expenditure is upward of $90,000 a year.

"Settlement on an individual basisi will be made in some cases with moderate increases, but any substantial advance is out of the question with our limited resources," Judge Cabot said.

ESTABLISHED 1881
from
ENQUIRER,
Cincinnati, Ohio

MUSICIANS TO WITHDRAW

From Boston Symphony If Recognition Is Denied.

Boston, Mass., February 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players to-day. Ninety per cent of the members have joined the union, and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it is said.

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, has joined the union, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players committee as being in symphany with unionization.

The trustees recently rejected a request for an increase of $1,000 a year for each player, but expressed a willingness to conduct a series of popular concerts next fall to add to the players' receipts.

From EVENING POST, New York City
FEB 27

Boston Symphony Men Determined to Have Union

Players Will Form Orchestra Themselves if Trustees Refuse to Recognize Organization

BOSTON, February 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players to-day. Ninety per cent. of the members have joined the union, and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it is said.

Unionization is "the only thing that will hold the organization together," the statement declares. "The players have not received a sufficient salary, and, being non-union men, could get little outside work. As a result men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union, and the constant change in membership has been a damper to proper teamwork.

"The trustees have assumed a most autocratic attitude toward the men. It was said a year ago that the only opposition to unionization was that the union prohibited bringing players from Europe for the orchestra. The contract labor laws make this impossible now, and there should be no objection."

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday, and it is claimed that of the twenty players who have not joined, ten have announced their intention of doing so. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players' committee as being in sympathy with unionization.

The trustees have recently rejected a request for an increase of $1,000 a year for each player, but have expressed a willingness to have a fall season of popular concerts to add to the players' receipts.

Commercial
m.....
ress New York City
FEB 19 1920 K
e.....

training.
Boston Symphony Orchestra players will join musicians' union because an increase in wages asked by them was rejected.

MAR - 9
From WORLD, New York City

SYMPHONY STRIKE ENDS.

Boston Orchestra Holds Rehearsal With All Members.

BOSTON, March 8.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was almost disrupted by a strike of thirty-five players at its regular concert Saturday night, held a rehearsal to-day with full ranks. The strike was abandoned at the request of Frederic Fradkin, the former concert master whose discharge for publicly snubbing Conductor Monteux was resented by the players.

The striking players were allowed to join in the rehearsal, although President Cabot of the orchestra had sent to each a letter saying they were excused from attendance.

MAR - 9 1920 E
From Times
New York City

ASK SPECIAL UNION RULE FOR BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Management Is Willing to Recognize Union on These Terms, the Players Report.

BOSTON, March 8.—A committee of three of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who have joined a union affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians conferred today with Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Board of Trustees of the orchestra.

They reported back to a union meeting that they had been informed that the Trustees would not object to union affiliation "if the American Federation of Musicians will make special rules for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, granting this organization privileges neither granted to nor asked for by any one of the other sixteen organizations of this kind in this country."

No action was taken on this report. Earlier in the day the thirty-five players who had refused to participate in the regular concert last Saturday night because of the dismissal of Frederic Fradkin, concert master, joined the other members of the orchestra in a rehearsal. They took this action upon the advice of Mr. Fradkin.

From MAR 8 1920 L
WORLD, New York City

LABOR BACKS ARTISTS.

BOSTON, March 7.—The Central Labor Union passed resolutions today asking the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to reinstate Frederic Fradkin, concert master, dismissed for failure to accompany a plause. The resolutions recognition of the

Variety
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS DEMAND MORE PAY FOR MUSIC

New Contracts Are Now Being Made and Question Has Come up. Annual $100,000 Deficit Met by Guarantee. Popular Concerts an Additional Means of Revenue. Delegate Confers with Musicians' Union.

Boston, Feb. 25.

It appears from reports that there are some interesting and possibly serious things in store for the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its sponsors and the music loving public of this and other cities where the orchestra, the pet of Bostonians, is in the habit of showing during the season.

From what can be gathered, about 80 members of the orchestra, which includes all but 20 who lead the instrumental choirs, are not content with their present salaries and have asked for an increase of $1,000 a year in the new contracts and those now in force. The cost of living, the general rise in salaries and the demand for players of such a standard as those who comprise the bulk of the orchestra are the reasons given for this desired increase in salary.

This is the time of the year when the new contracts are being made and that is why the question has cropped up now. Also, it is claimed that the members of the orchestra, who ask for the increases, realize that their services would not go begging and that players are needed by the New York and the Philadelphia orchestras.

The trustees of the orchestra, however, do not see at this time how the increases can possibly be granted. The matter has been discussed with the players by one of the trustees and it is said the trustees are without means to meet the demands. The present guarantee fund meets the deficit between receipts and expenditures, which amounts to about $100,000 a year. No provision is made, however, for additional charges.

It has been planned to have another month of the "Pops" to get additional revenue to meet the deficit and also a popular drive for a $2,000,000 fund to perpetuate the concerts has been discussed. However, the additional burden of about $100,000, which would be the result of an increase such as the musicians ask, would mean that this endowment fund would have to reach a $4,000,000 figure instead of the $2,000,000 to serve the end planned. This the trustees do not believe reasonable.

While it is claimed that the matter of union or non-union does not and has not entered into the matter at all, it is said that a delegate of the Symphony musicians has been in conference with the Musicians' Union, affiliated with the A. F. of L. here, and that the matter of the musicians joining the union as a body was discussed. No definite action has been taken as yet, however.

Major Henry L. Higginson, of this city, who died recently, for years supplied personally the deficit of the orchestra and in his will made provisions for the future of the band. But, it is pointed out, this provision was made on the basis of fixed charges as they are and do not allow for additional charges; hence the trouble.

Newspaper
rom.....
ddress New York City
MAR - 7 1920 L

LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY DISMISSED

Trustees Drop Frederic Fradkin on Charge That He Failed to Keep His Agreement.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, March 6.

Frederic Fradkin is no longer concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was dismissed last night by the organization's board of trustees.

The dismissal, according to a statement by Frederic P. Cobot, president of the board of trustees, was because Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

Fradkin did not rise at the concert when Conductor Pierre Monteux motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause after the playing of a symphony. A few persons in the audience hissed when Fradkin remained seated.

In explaining his failure to rise, Mr. Fradkin said that he considered the applause was meant for the conductor and not for himself.

om EVENING SUN
ddress New York City
ate FEB 2 1920

SYMPHONY STRIKE FLARES UP AGAIN

Galli-Curci Comes to Aid of Boston Musicians.

Special Despatch to The Evening Sun.

BOSTON, March 12.—All Boston is watching the outcome of the strike of thirty-two members of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last Saturday night and looked as if it had been settled peacefully on Monday, but broke out again with renewed vigor yesterday.

The thirty-two members who stood by Frederic Fradkin, the former concert master, who was dismissed by the trustees of the orchestra after what they allege was an "insule" to Leader Monteaux, have announced a monster concert for their benefit at the Colonial Thearte on Sunday night with Galli-Curci as the probable soloist and Marinuzzi, of the Chicag Opera Company, as conductor.

The Symphony "strike," supposed t have come to an end last Monda when Fradkin told the "strikers" to g back, even though he was out of th orchestra. This they did, but yes terday they refused to attend a re hearsal and went to their union head quarters nearby instead.

After a meeting at union headqua ters the musicians announced the benefit concert. The Chicago Oper Company is in town, and the mu sicians appealed to Marinuzzu and Galli-Curci. Both agreed to aid th "strikers" if they find it possible remain in Boston. The Chicago Oper Company is due to leave the city Sun day, but both the leader and the sin er said to-day that they would ma every effort to remain over and a pear with the "strikers" at the co cert in the Colonial Theatre.

The "strikers" will have a sy phony orchestra made up of thirty-two members woh are out the Boston Symphony Orchestra other musicians from New York.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OF BOSTON WILL PLAY UNDER UNION CONTROL

Organized Musicians Vote to Take Over Its Management—Popular Concerts Planned.

BOSTON, Feb. 29.—The musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have voted to take over the management of their institution regarded as the foremost group of artists in the country and to appeal to the workers to attend the popular concerts which they will give next fall in order to maintain the orchestra as a union organization.

This marks the end of a long campaign that the American Federation of Musicians has made to unionize the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The death of Major Higginson, who had endowed the orchestra, removed the last obstacle to the union getting control.

So bitter was the aged financier to interference in his pet hobby that he imported European masters under contract in the same way that other capitalists would like to import coolies as contract laborers.

In refusing to meet the union's scale of wages, the trustees of the Higginson estate claimed not to be able to afford the increase of $1,000 a year asked for the musicians.

By joining the union the players will be able to obtain outside work now, and thereby augment their earnings something they could not do whi they were considered hostile to the o ganized musicians.

The battle was won when Fred Fradkin, concertmaster, and Pi Monteuz, conductor, were both on over to the union's side.

From Variety
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY BREACH.

Instead of the matter being patche up and a peace being declared th breach between the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the trustees has been widened during the week. As things stand now there is talk of the players asking the trustees in the course of a few days to either grant the increases of $1,000 a year for each player or else they will sign up with other orchestras throughout the country, representatives of which are in town at the present time.

If this action is taken, and the trustees adhere to their original stand that they are powerless to grant such demands the course of the orchestra for the future looks rough, for players of such worth as the members of the Symphony are hard to find, as was discovered when, during the war, it was necessary to fill the places of the German members of the band.

During the week the greater majority of the players affiliated themselves with the musician's union.

Carl Gardner, who is the representative of the players' claims the average pay of the Boston Symphony players is $35 a week while in Detroit the minimum is $45 and that in other cities as high as $70 is paid. On trips out of town the players are allowed $5 a day for expenses, he says as against $4 a day in 1914.

Frederic Fradkin, concert-master of the orchestra, is one of those who is talking loudest in favor of the union. He joined and in a conference with Judge Cabot stated that while he personally did not have any kick coming he believed his fellow members did and joined the organization for this purpose. He denied the report that a unionization of the orchestra would tend to destroy the artistic standard of the players and said that in other cities and in France all members of symphony orchestras are union men.

Philadelphia, March 3.

The statements emanating from Boston, crediting Hedda van den Beemt, violinist of the Philadelphia Orchestra, as endeavoring to obtain Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians brought a hot retort from Arthur Judson, manager of the local organization this week.

om.....
dress New York City
MAR 12 1920 H
te.....

WOMEN MAY PLAY IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

As result of the strike last Saturday o thirty-five musicians for recognition of thei union affiliations, the Boston Symphony Orchestra may be forced to hire women musicians to fill the band or abandon the Carnegie Hall engagement here next week.

The board of trustees of the orchestra said that the American Federation of Musicians would substitute their judgment fo that of the board and that the latter would become secondary.

TELEGRAM
ess New York City
FEB 18 1920 L

Boston Symphony to Join Union

Action Follows Refusal of $100,000 Wage Increase.

BOSTON, Wednesday.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Camot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said today that the question of union membership was not an issue between players and management, although recognition of a union had been refused, because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under [illegible] conditions.

From EVENING POST, New York City

Music and Drama Notes

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have asked for increased wages amounting to about $100,000 a year. The demand has been refused on account of limited resources. What will happen remains to be seen.

From Tribune
New York City
MAR 7 1920

Thirty Boston Symphony Musicians Go on Strike

Concert Proceeds Minus Men Who Refused to Play Without Dismissed Leader

BOSTON, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for to-night's concert.

President Cabot of the board of trustees of the orchestra told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's program Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall before the concert, but was told that he would not be permitted to take part.

om EVENING SUN
ddress New York City
FEB 26 1920

DEFIES ORCHESTRA PLAYERS.

Judge Cabot Forces Issue in Boston Symphony.

BOSTON, Feb. 26. — Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made a statement in defiance of members of the orchestra who recently joined the union to try to enforce their demands for better pay. Judge Cabot says the orchestra wages are 80 per cent. higher than before the war. He urges those in the orchestra whose contracts are about to expire to notify the management whether they desire to continue as members. It is important for the orchestra to know how many places are to be filled, if any, he explains.

From
EVENING POST, New York City

Boston Symphony Men Want Union Orchestra

Demand for Increased Wages Refused—Fund Too Small, Says Trustee

BOSTON, February 14.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, approximately $100,000 a year, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the orchestra, said to-day recognition of a union has been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

The request for more wages was based on increased living costs. Judge Cabot said the number who joined in the request was "large," possibly as many as eighty. He told the players no funds were available to meet their request.

The orchestra has approximately $100,000 to draw upon, and its operating expenditure is more than $200,000 a year.

"Settlement on an individual basis will be made in some cases with moderate increases, but any substantial advance is out of the question with our limited resources," Judge Cabot said.

The orchestra management has not overlooked the possibility that some of the players may decide that they must receive more money than can be had by remaining with the Boston Symphony. Such men, it is admitted, can probably obtain higher rates by joining the Musicians' Union and playing under its contracts.

From Herald
New York City

BOSTON MUSICIANS ASK FOR MORE PAY

Symphony Orchestra's Demand Aggregates $100,000.

Special to The Sun and New York Herald.

BOSTON, Feb. 18.—Demand for a wage advance representing approximately $100,000 has been made by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The financial condition of the organization precludes the granting of the demand, it was officially announced. It was authoritatively stated that the trustees, of which Judge Frederick P. Cabot is chairman, are considering the advisability of making an appeal to the public for a $2,000,000 endowment fund, the income from which would be used to meet the yearly deficit in the organization's budget.

The expenses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra amount to about

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

Boston Symphony Men Determined to Have Union.

Players Will Form Orchestra Themselves if Trustees Refuse to Recognize Organization

BOSTON, February 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players to-day. Ninety per cent. of the members have joined the union, and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it is said.

Unionization is "the only thing that will hold the organization together," the statement declares, "The players have not received a sufficient salary, and, being non-union men, could get little outside work. As a result men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union, and the constant change in membership has been a damper to proper teamwork.

"The trustees have assumed a most autocratic attitude toward the men. It was said a year ago that the only opposition to unionization was that the union prohibited bringing players from Europe for the orchestra. The contract labor laws make this impossible now, and there should be no objection."

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday, and it is claimed that of the twenty players who have not joined, ten have announced their intention of doing so. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players' committee as being in sympathy with unionization.

The trustees have recently rejected a request for an increase of $1,000 a year for each player, but have expressed a willingness to have a fall season of popular concerts to add to the players' receipts.

m.....

ress New York City

e.....

training.

Boston Symphony Orchestra players will join musicians' union because an increase in wages asked by them was rejected.

18

From WORLD,
New York City

SYMPHONY STRIKE ENDS.

Boston Orchestra Holds Rehearsal With All Members.

BOSTON, March 8.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was almost disrupted by a strike of thirty-five players at its regular concert Saturday night, held a rehearsal to-day with full ranks. The strike was abandoned at the request of Frederic Fradkin, the former concert master whose discharge for publicly snubbing Conductor Monteux was resented by the players.

The striking players were allowed to join in the rehearsal, although President Cabot of the orchestra had sent to each a letter saying they were excused from attendance.

MAR - 9 1920 L

From Times
New York City

ASK SPECIAL UNION RULE FOR BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Management Is Willing to Recognize Union on These Terms, the Players Report.

BOSTON, March 8.—A committee of three of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who have joined a union affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians conferred today with Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Board of Trustees of the orchestra. They reported back to a union meeting that they had been informed that the Trustees would not object to union affiliation "if the American Federation of Musicians will make special rules for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, granting this organization privileges neither granted to nor asked for by any one of the other sixteen organizations of this kind in this country."

No action was taken on this report. Earlier in the day the thirty-five players who had refused to participate in the regular concert last Saturday night because of the dismissal of Frederic Fradkin, concert master, joined the other members of the orchestra in a rehearsal. They took this action upon the advice of Mr. Fradkin.

From MAR 8
WORLD,
New York City

LABOR BACKS ARTISTS.

BOSTON, March 7.—The Central Labor Union passed resolutions today asking the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to reinstate Frederic Fradkin, concert master, who was dismissed for failure to acknowledge applause. The resolutions [illegible] for the recognition of the [illegible] of Symphony players.

Variety
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS DEMAND MORE PAY FOR MUSIC

New Contracts Are Now Being Made and Question Has Come up. Annual $100,000 Deficit Met by Guarantee. Popular Concerts an Additional Means of Revenue. Delegate Confers with Musicians' Union.

Boston, Feb. 25.

It appears from reports that there are some interesting and possibly serious things in store for the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its sponsors and the music loving public of this and other cities where the orchestra, the pet of Bostonians, is in the habit of showing during the season.

From what can be gathered, about 80 members of the orchestra, which includes all but 20 who lead the instrumental choirs, are not content with their present salaries and have asked for an increase of $1,000 a year in the new contracts and those now in force. The cost of living, the general rise in salaries and the demand for players of such a standard as those who comprise the bulk of the orchestra are the reasons given for this desired increase in salary.

This is the time of the year when the new contracts are being made and that is why the question has cropped up now. Also, it is claimed that the members of the orchestra, who ask for the increases, realize that their services would not go begging and that players are needed by the New York and the Philadelphia orchestras.

The trustees of the orchestra, however, do not see at this time how the increases can possibly be granted. The matter has been discussed with the players by one of the trustees and it is said the trustees are without means to meet the demands. The present guarantee fund meets the deficit between receipts and expenditures, which amounts to about $100,000 a year. No provision is made, however, for additional charges.

It has been planned to have another month of the "Pops" to get additional revenue to meet the deficit and also a popular drive for a $2,000,000 fund to perpetuate the concerts has been discussed. However, the additional burden of about $100,000, which would be the result of an increase such as the musicians ask, would mean that this endowment fund would have to reach a $4,000,000 figure instead of the $2,000,000 to serve the end planned. This the trustees do not believe reasonable.

While it is claimed that the matter of union or non-union does not and has not entered into the matter at all, it is said that a delegate of the Symphony musicians has been in conference with the Musicians' Union, affiliated with the A. F. of L. here, and that the matter of the musicians joining the union as a body was discussed. No definite action has been taken as yet, however.

Major Henry L. Higginson, of this city, who died recently, for years supplied personally the deficit of the orchestra and in his will made provisions for the future of the band. But, it is pointed out, this provision was made on the basis of fixed charges as they are and do not allow for additional charges; hence the trouble.

Newspaper

rom.....

ddress New York City

LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY DISMISSED

Trustees Drop Frederic Fradkin on Charge That He Failed to Keep His Agreement.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, March 6.

Frederic Fradkin is no longer concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was dismissed last night by the organization's board of trustees.

The dismissal, according to a statement by Frederic P. Cobot, president of the board of trustees, was because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

Fradkin did not rise at the concert when Conductor Pierre Monteux motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause after the playing of a symphony. A few persons in the audience hissed when Fradkin remained seated.

In explaining his failure to rise, Mr. Fradkin said that he considered the applause was meant for the conductor and not for himself.

om EVENING SUN

ddress New York City

ate

SYMPHONY STRIKE FLARES UP AGAIN

Galli-Curci Comes to Aid of Boston Musicians.

Special Despatch to THE EVENING SUN.

BOSTON, March 12.—All Boston is watching the outcome of the strike of thirty-two members of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last Saturday night and looked as if it had been settled peacefully on Monday, but broke out again with renewed vigor yesterday.

The thirty-two members who stood by Frederic Fradkin, the former concert master, who was dismissed by the trustees of the orchestra after what they allege was an "insule" to Leader Monteaux, have announced a monster concert for their benefit at the Colonial Thearte on Sunday night, with Galli-Curci as the probable soloist and Marinuzzi, of the Chicago Opera Company, as conductor.

The Symphony "strike," supposed to have come to an end last Monday when Fradkin told the "strikers" to go back, even though he was out of the orchestra. This they did, but yesterday they refused to attend a rehearsal and went to their union headquarters nearby instead.

After a meeting at union headquarters the musicians announced the benefit concert. The Chicago Opera Company is in town, and the musicians appealed to Marinuzzu and Galli-Curci. Both agreed to aid the "strikers" if they find it possible to remain in Boston. The Chicago Opera Company is due to leave the city Sunday, but both the leader and the singer said to-day that they would make every effort to remain over and appear with the "strikers" at the concert in the Colonial Theatre.

The "strikers" will have a symphony orchestra made up of thirty-two members woh are out of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and other musicians from New York.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OF BOSTON WILL PLAY UNDER UNION CONTROL

Organized Musicians Vote to Take Over Its Management—Popular Concerts Planned.

BOSTON, Feb. 29.—The musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have voted to take over the management of their institution regarded as the foremost group of artists in the country and to appeal to the workers to attend the popular concerts which they will give next fall in order to maintain the orchestra as a union organization.

This marks the end of a long campaign that the American Federation of Musicians has made to unionize the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The death of Major Higginson, who had endowed the orchestra, removed the last obstacle to the union getting control.

So bitter was the aged financier to interference in his pet hobby that he imported European masters under contract in the same way that other capitalists would like to import coolies as contract laborers.

In refusing to meet the union's scale of wages, the trustees of the Higginson estate claimed not to be able to afford the increase of $1,000 a year asked for the musicians.

By joining the union the players will be able to obtain outside work now, and thereby augment their earnings something they could not do while they were considered hostile to the organized musicians.

The battle was won when Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster, and Pierre Monteuz, conductor, were both won over to the union's side.

From Variety
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY BREACH.

Instead of the matter being patched up and a peace being declared the breach between the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the trustees has been widened during the week. As things stand now there is talk of the players asking the trustees in the course of a few days to either grant the increases of $1,000 a year for each player or else they will sign up with other orchestras throughout the country, representatives of which are in town at the present time.

If this action is taken, and the trustees adhere to their original stand that they are powerless to grant such demands the course of the orchestra for the future looks rough, for players of such worth as the members of the Symphony are hard to find, as was discovered when, during the war, it was necessary to fill the places of the German members of the band.

During the week the greater majority of the players affiliated themselves with the musician's union.

Carl Gardner, who is the representative of the players' claims the average pay of the Boston Symphony players is $35 a week while in Detroit the minimum is $45 and that in other cities as high as $70 is paid. On trips out of town the players are allowed $5 a day for expenses, he says as against $4 a day in 1914.

Frederic Fradkin, concert-master of the orchestra, is one of those who is talking loudest in favor of the union. He joined and in a conference with Judge Cabot stated that while he personally did not have any kick coming he believed his fellow members did and joined the organization for this purpose. He denied the report that a unionization of the orchestra would tend to destroy the artistic standard of the players and said that in other cities and in France all members of symphony orchestras are union men.

Philadelphia, March 3.

The statements emanating from Boston, crediting Hedda van den Beemt, violinist of the Philadelphia Orchestra, as endeavoring to obtain Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians brought a hot retort from Arthur Judson, manager of the local organization this week.

om.....

ddress New York City

te.....

WOMEN MAY PLAY IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

As result of the strike last Saturday of thirty-five musicians for recognition of their union affiliations, the Boston Symphony Orchestra may be forced to hire women musicians to fill the band or abandon the Carnegie Hall engagement here next week.

The board of trustees of the orchestra said that the American Federation of Musicians would substitute their judgment for that of the board and that the latter would become secondary.

TELEGRAM

ess New York City

FEB 18 1920 L

Boston Symphony to Join Union

Action Follows Refusal of $100,000 Wage Increase.

BOSTON, Wednesday.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Camot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said today that the question of union membership was not an issue between players and management, although recognition of a union had been refused, because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under [illegible] ditions.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

Music and Drama Notes

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have asked for increased wages amounting to about $100,000 a year. The demand has been refused on account of limited resources. What will happen remains to be seen.

From
Tribune
New York City
MAR - 7 1920

Thirty Boston Symphony Musicians Go on Strike

Concert Proceeds Minus Men Who Refused to Play Without Dismissed Leader

BOSTON, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for to-night's concert.

President Cabot of the board of trustees of the orchestra told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's program Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall before the concert, but was told that he would not be permitted to take part.

om EVENING SUN

ddress New York City

DEFIES ORCHESTRA PLAYERS.

Judge Cabot Forces Issue in Boston Symphony.

BOSTON, Feb. 26.—Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made a statement in defiance of members of the orchestra who recently joined the union to try to enforce their demands for better pay. Judge Cabot says the orchestra wages are 30 per cent. higher than before the war. He urges those in the orchestra whose contracts are about to expire to notify the management whether they desire to continue as members. It is important for the orchestra to know how many places are to be filled, if any, he explains.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

Boston Symphony Men Want Union Orchestra

Demand for Increased Wages Refused—Fund Too Small, Says Trustee

BOSTON, February 14.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, approximately $100,000 a year, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the orchestra, said to-day recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

The request for more wages was based on increased living costs. Judge Cabot said the number who joined in the request was "large," possibly as many as eighty. He told the players no funds were available to meet their request.

The orchestra has approximately $100,000 to draw upon, and its operating expenditure is more than $90,000 a year.

"Settlement on an individual basis will be made in some cases with moderate increases, but any substantial advance is out of the question with our limited resources," Judge Cabot said.

The orchestra management has not [illegible] the possibility that some of the players may decide that they [illegible] more money than can be [illegible] with the Boston Symphony. She men, it is admitted, can probably obtain higher rates by joining the Musicians' Union and playing under its contracts.

From Herald
New York City

BOSTON MUSICIANS ASK FOR MORE PAY

Symphony Orchestra's Demand Aggregates $100,000.

Special to THE SUN AND NEW YORK HERALD.

BOSTON, Feb. 18.—Demand for a wage advance representing approximately $100,000 has been made by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The financial condition, of the organization precludes the granting of the demand, it was officially announced. It was authoritatively stated that the trustees, of which Judge Frederick P. Cabot is chairman, are considering the advisability of making an appeal to the public for a 2,000,000 endowment fund, the income from which would be used to meet the yearly deficit in the organization's budget.

The expenses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra amount to about

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TIGHT BINDING

From Tribune
New York City

Musicians Go on Strike

Concert Proceeds Minus Men Who Refused to Play Without Dismissed Leader

BOSTON, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for to-night's concert.

President Cabot of the board of trustees of the orchestra told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's program Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall before the concert, but was told that he would not be permitted to take part.

From EVENING SUN
New York City

DEFIES ORCHESTRA PLAYERS.

Judge Cabot Forces Issue in Boston Symphony.

BOSTON, Feb. 26. — Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made a statement in defiance of members of the orchestra who recently joined the union to try to enforce their demands for better pay. Judge Cabot says the orchestra wages are 30 per cent. higher than before the war. He urges those in the orchestra whose contracts are about to expire to notify the management whether they desire to continue as members. It is important for the orchestra to know how many places are to be filled, if any, he explains.

From EVENING POST,
New York City

Boston Symphony Men Want Union Orchestra

Demand for Increased Wages Refused—Fund Too Small, Says Trustee

Boston, February 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, approximately $100,000 a year, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the orchestra, said to-day recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

The request for more wages was submitted on increased living costs. Judge Cabot said the number who joined in the request was "large," possibly as many as eighty. He told the players that no funds were available to meet their request. The orchestra has approximately $100,000 to draw upon, and its operating expenditure is more than $90,000 a year.

"Settlement on an individual basis will be made in some cases with moderate increases, but any substantial advance is out of the question with our limited resources," Judge Cabot said.

The orchestra management has not overlooked the possibility that some of the players may decide that they must receive more money than can be had by remaining with the Boston Symphony. Such men, it is admitted, can probably obtain higher rates by joining the Musicians' Union and playing under its contracts.

From Herald SUN
New York City
FEB 19 1920 M

BOSTON MUSICIANS ASK FOR MORE PAY

Symphony Orchestra's Demands Aggregate $100,000.

BOSTON, Feb. 18.—Demand for a wage increase representing approximately $100,000 has been made by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The financial condition of the organization precludes the granting of the demand, it was officially announced. It was authoritatively stated that the trustees, of which Judge Frederick P. Cabot is chairman, are considering the advisability of making an appeal to the public for a $2,000,000 endowment fund, the income from which would be used to meet the yearly deficit in the organization's budget.

The expenses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra amount to about $90,000 a season. The trustees have $100,000 a year to draw on to meet these expenses.

From EVENING GLOBE
New York City
FEB 18 1920 E

BOSTON PLAYERS WILL JOIN UNION

Wage Request Refused, Symphony Members Plan to Unite With Organization.

BOSTON, Feb. 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said the question of union membership was not an issue between the players and the management, although recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

The request for more wages was submitted in a letter and based on the plea that the players' present compensation is inadequate under increased living costs. Judge Cabot said that the number who joined in the request was "large," possibly as many as 80.

At a meeting of the orchestra subsequently, he told the players that the resources of the organization were such that no funds were available for the $100,000 advance necessary to meet their request. The orchestra has approximately $100,000 to draw upon and its operating expenditure is more than $90,000 a year.

"Settlement on an individual basis will be made in some cases with moderate increases, but any substantial advance is out of the question with our limited resources," Judge Cabot said.

The orchestra management has not overlooked the possibility that some of the players may decide that they must receive more money than can be had by remaining with the Boston Symphony. Such men, it is admitted, can probably obtain higher rates by joining the musicians' union and playing under its contracts.

From TRIBUNE,
New York City

Union Music at Boston

A Defence of Organization by an Old Member

To the Editor of The Tribune.

Sir: Being the oldest member among those who refused to play at Symphony Hall Saturday, March 6, I wish to explain the reasons that prompted my colleagues and myself to proceed in that manner.

When this new era of democracy dawned upon us we were told by President Wilson that the governed had some rights in deciding the form of government they wished, all of which makes beautiful reading, but in practice this is distasteful to a certain set of people.

When a committee of the orchestra—I being one of them—called upon Mr. Monteux, himself a member of the Federation of Musicians of France, in regard to the union question, he assured us of his absolute neutrality. At the same time, through his attitude toward Mr. Fradkin, a strong and altruistic promoter of our cause, Mr. Monteux showed plainly that his statement to us was not sincere and thus the situation grew more and more acute and finally led to the most unfortunate occurrence on Friday afternoon. I want to state right here that I deplore Mr. Fradkin's refusal to rise when bidden to do so by Mr. Monteux, but it is apparent that the treatment meted out to him by Mr. Monteux was irritating beyond human endurance. We felt obliged to uphold him since Mr. Fradkin made his sacrifice for us.

Judge Cabot had stated that the Fradkin incident had nothing whatsoever to do with the union movement. He is quite correct if he refers to it directly, but indirectly it is only too evident that this agitation was the sole cause of all the trouble. Probably the most important factor in our move is that this is a great opportunity to open the eyes of the public to the fact that a great crisis in regard to the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is at hand.

Altogether seventy-four have pledged themselves to stand together in the movement, which means that every one of these men will quit at the expiration of his contract if the union is not recognized by the trustees. In that way, within one year, more than three-quarters of the entire personnel of the orchestra must necessarily be replaced. Judge Cabot evidently is not at all concerned about this fact. I myself think it to be entirely impossible. He stated he would willingly continue the concerts under these adverse conditions and gradually build the orchestra up to its former standard. This will take a great many years, if it can be accomplished at all, and for the public there will be ample opportunity to do some watchful waiting. All other orchestras in the country are organized and it seems that this fact does not interfere with their artistic development. I need mention only the Chicago and Philadelphia orchestras which in the musical world are considered superior to ours, which proves the old notion of art and organization not belonging together to be an exploded theory.

All of this, coming after thirty-eight years of service in this orchestra, causes me the greatest mental agony I have ever suffered. It is but natural that it should pain me beyond measure to witness this splendid organization, in which I have spent the best part of my life, broken beyond repair. There is yet time to save it, and I hope the trustees will relent. OTTO ROTH.

Boston, Mass., March 15, 1920.

From TRIBUNE
New York City
FEB 10 1920 M

Hub Symphony Players Ask for $100,000 Raise

Plea Refused, They Take Steps to Join the Musicians' Union

BOSTON, Feb. 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said to-day that the question of union membership was not an issue between players and management, although recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

Judge Cabot said the number who joined in the request for increased wages was "large," possibly as many as eighty. He told the players that no funds were available to meet their request.

"Settlement on an individual basis will be made in some cases with mod[illegible]," Judge Cabot said.

From Times
New York City
FEB 13 1920 B

POLICE STOP MUSIC PICKE

Strikers Have Enlisted the Aid Lambs and Actors' Equity.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, March 12.—The dismiss musicians of the Boston Symphony C chestra were barred by the police fro picketing the stage entrance to Sym phony Hall at rehearsal today. S pickets selected from members of th newly formed union gathered near th door, but were made to "keep moving by policemen apparently stationed there especially to prevent the strikers from doing picket duty.

While the orchestra management was revising its concert programs the strikers were arranging for a benefit concert, to be given by themselves and union sympathizers in the Colonial Theatre a week from Sunday night and in various other enterprises in connection with the continuance of their strike.

The concert is being arranged by Mr. Dodge, who is the originator of the ten band concerts that are conducted annually in Mechanics' Building. He has been in touch with the Lambs and the Actors' Equity Association, and through these associations a number of prominent stars are to appear at the concert, which will be conducted by Emil Mollenhauer.

From Dramatic Mirror
New York City
FEB 28

WANT MORE PAY

Boston Symphony Orchestra Men Demand $100,000

Demand for a wage advance representing approximately $100,000 has been made by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The financial condition of the organization precludes the granting of the demand, it was officially announced. It was authoritatively stated that the trustees, of which Judge Frederick P. Cabot is chairman, are considering the advisability of making an appeal to the public for a $2,000,000 endowment fund, the income from which would be used to meet the yearly deficit in the organization's budget.

The expenses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra amount to about $90,000 a season. The trustees have $100,000 a year to draw on to meet these expenses.

From EVENING SUN
New York City

1 FIRED MUSICIANS IN SYMPHONY STRIKE

Clause in Contract Causes Trouble in Famous Boston Organization.

Boston, March 11.—Thirty-two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were dismissed to-day because they refused to sign an agreement that specified "intention to perform their contracts without further breach." A strike was immediately called by the musicians.

Trustees yesterday voted to reinstate those members who signed the agreement which called for payment of a fine of $10 for violation of their contracts. Three members signed. The others refused and were dismissed.

From Star
New York City

BOSTON PLAYERS GO BACK

Boston, March 10.—Following a meeting with Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday the committee of three of the members who joined the union affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians reported to the union that the Trustees would not object to union affiliation under the following conditions: That the American Federation of Musicians make special rules for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, granting this organization privileges neither granted to nor asked for by any one of the sixteen organizations of this kind in this country.

No action was taken by the union on this report and thirty-five musicians who had refused to play in the regular concert last Saturday joined the other members of the orchestra. They refused to play Saturday because Frederic Fradkin, concert master, had been dismissed, and rejoined on the advice of Mr. Fradkin. An increase of $1,000 a year for each player had been requested and refused.

Clipper
New York City

MUSICIANS TO PLAY

N, Mass., Mar. 15.—Union musicians who were formerly members of the Symphony Orchestra, but are now on strike, will give a symphony concert Sunday at the Colonial Theatre, conducted by Emil Mollenhauer. Solos will be offered by concert-master Fradkin, violinist, and also by Gustave Heim, trumpet.

From EVENING SUN
New York City
FEB 10 1920 D

ORCHESTRA MAY JOIN UNION.

Boston Players Want More Pay—Fight Looms.

BOSTON, Feb. 19.—Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians want more pay and are going to join the musicians' union to get it, according to announcement yesterday.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told the players no funds were available to meet the demand. The union will not be recognized either, it was said, because union leaders wanted to say who would play in the orcestra and under what conditions. Individual increases may be made, Judge Cabot said, and those who do not fare well under this plan will have recourse to the union and the higher rates obtainable by playing elsewhere under its contracts.

From EVENING MAIL,
New York City
FEB 13 1920 M

Boston Symphony Artists Ask Raise, Meet Refusal

Boston, Feb. 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the musicians' union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said to-day the question of union membership was not an issue between players and management, although recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

From MAR 13 1920 K
EVENING POST,

While the Damrosch societies are thus out of danger for the present, one of the leading American organizations, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is in a precarious condition. When Major Higginson died, he did not leave to the orchestra created by him the hoped-for million, probably because he foresaw that it would be unionized, a step to which he had always been bitterly opposed. The men have now demanded an increase in pay which would amount to $100,000 a year, and the trustees have declared themselves unable to meet this demand. Ninety per cent. of the members have affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians.

T. Finck

A sensational detail last week was the summary discharge of the concert master, Frederic Fradkin. There had been a "verbal clash," as the Boston Herald puts it, in Cambridge between him and the conductor, M. Monteux. The growing bitterness reached a dramatic climax in Symphony Hall, Boston, when Mr. Fradkin refused to rise with the other musicians in response to the applause which Monteux wanted the players to share with him. As Philip Hale described the scene:

"Mr. Fradkin, by not rising with the others, acted discourteously toward the applauding audience. When he left the stage for the intermission many in the audience hissed him for his rudeness. When he returned, some, especially in the second balcony, applauded; there was also hissing; some in the orchestra were so tactless, not to say discourteous, toward the audience as to join in the applause. Mr. Fradkin had the assurance to stand up this time. He bowed to the audience and the orchestra.

"As soon as Mr. Monteux reappeared there was a mighty counter-demonstration. The applause was enthusiastic; it grew louder and louder until the great audience stood for some time, clapping hands vigorously; there was also cheering. Mr. Monteux then went on with the concert.

"It was a deplorable scene. Nothing like it had happened in the history of the orchestra. May nothing like it happen again!"

om EVENING SUN
ddress New York City
ate MAR 13 1920 E

THE SYMPHONIES.

At each of the final pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season, to be given next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux will give a notable piece its first performance in New York: on Thursday, John Alden Carpenter's piano "Concertino," assisted by E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist; on Saturday, "The Pauses of Silence: Seven Symphonic Expressions," by Malipiero, the daring young Italian composer, whose music has attracted considerable attention. The other numbers for the Thursday concert will be Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman." For Saturday, Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's Symphony in G minor (Kochel 550) and Charpentier's

[illegible] New York City

An orchestra [illegible] is usually a [illegible] and a nuisance. It teaches people to talk while [illegible] is being made, and this encourages bad manners [illegible] the opera and in concert halls. In the opera [illegible] the orchestra is a necessity. Giorgio Polacco shows us that there is a wealth of beauty even in [illegible] despised orchestra scores of Donizetti and Bellini. Much of the beauty of the operas of Verdi, Bizet, Gounod, Puccini and others lies in the orchestral accompaniments, and in Wagner's operas the colors are so glowingly rich and varied that they make one eager to hear them even when the singers are not of the best. It would therefore be a serious thing for operagoers if the efficiency of the Metropolitan Opera Company's famous orchestra should be impaired by the new demands of the Musical Mutual Protective Union, which would add over $50,000 to the management's expenses of this department.

In concert halls good orchestral compositions are considered the highest achievements of creative genius; but it takes an orchestra of eighty to a hundred skilled and trained players to do them justice. In recent years there has been in this country about a dozen high-class orchestras. The post-bellum situation which has been coming to a head this week makes one wonder how many of these will be in existence a few years hence.

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, in particular, has been hard hit. The late Major Higginson, who founded it at the age of forty-seven, and during thirty-seven years spent about a million on it, did not leave it the expected nest egg of another million, and it has since been in a dubious position. Thirty-one of its best men had to be discharged as enemy aliens. A few days ago the same number were dismissed for reasons connected with demands for more pay, which cannot be met. The concert master has been disciplined for joining the strikers, although he gets two or three times as much as the other men. At the moment of writing this there are various conflicting rumors: One that a concert master is forming an orchestra of his own with the thirty-one dismissed men as a nucleus; another, that he is in a conciliatory mood to prevent the disruption of the famous orchestra; still another, that M. Monteux will come to New York next week with women players in place of the lost members! That would be revolutionary. We shall see.

One thing is certain. Unless another Major Higginson is forthcoming the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not likely to be in the future what it was in the past. Another of the famous orchestras that visit us regularly, the Philadelphian, has also been trying, amicably enough, to adjust its differences with the union musicians. For the present danger seems to have been averted. It is not denied that, under present conditions, the men ought to have more, and they will get more; but if they get all they ask, who is to pay for the orchestra's upkeep? An endowment of some $900,000 was raised this winter, but the income from that does not cover the extra $60,000 asked for by the musicians.

Florence had its Medicis. We have had some too, but we need more. When Theodore Thomas took his orchestra to Chicago he wisely insisted on having a hall built for it to save rent for concerts and rehearsals. Deficits occurring, nevertheless, were taken over by his friend, Mæcenas Pullman. For its excellent opera company Chicago has to present the princely Harold McCormick, to whom New Yorkers are also under great obligations. He made it possible for Cleofonte Campanini to carry out his most ambitious schemes and to perpetuate the Hammerstein blessings.

One of the most generous of New York's Medicis was the late E. J. de Coppet, who spent a fortune in floating the Flonzaley Quartet. He reminded one of the Esterhazys and other European princes who used to keep their own orchestras. Andrew Carnegie signed many a check in support of orchestral music in this city and Harry Harkness Flagler is still more lavish. Joseph Pulitzer's endowment of the Philharmonic Orchestra was a noble gift, applied with laudable judgment. There is evidently plenty of money to back up the latest organization, the New Symphony Orchestra; but it must be said that a new orchestra was the last thing New York needed. Instead of adding thirty more pairs of concerts it would have been much wiser to curtail the present number by thirty pairs.

Plant breeders have found it more advisable to foster the best existing varieties of vegetables, fruits and flowers than to create new ones. The same principle should be applied to orchestras. The New York Philharmonic is our oldest and best orchestra. It needs a Medici to keep up its standard. Major Higginson was often referred to as Boston's foremost citizen, because he made that city famous as a musical centre. Among the ten thousand new millionaires since the war is there not one who would like to be called New York's foremost citizen? It would cost less than owning a steam yacht.

From [illegible]
Address New York City
Date [illegible]

Part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has gone on strike. It is understood they demand time and a half for encores.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TIGHT BINDING

From
Tribune
New York City
MAR - 7 1920

Thirty Boston Symphony Musicians Go on Strike

Concert Proceeds Minus Men Who Refused to Play Without Dismissed Leader

BOSTON, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for to-night's concert.

President Cabot of the board of trustees of the orchestra told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's program Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall before the concert, but was told that he would not be permitted to take part.

om EVENING SUN
FEB 28 1920
ddress New York City

DEFIES ORCHESTRA PLAYERS.

Judge Cabot Forces Issue in Boston Symphony.

BOSTON, Feb. 26. — Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made a statement in defiance of members of the orchestra who recently joined the union to try to enforce their demands for better pay. Judge Cabot says the orchestra wages are 30 per cent. higher than before the war. He urges those in the orchestra whose contracts are about to expire to notify the management whether they desire to continue as members. It is important for the orchestra to know how many places are to be filled, if any, he explains.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

Boston Symphony Men Want Union Orchestra

Demand for Increased Wages Refused.—Fund Too Small, Says Trustee

BOSTON, February 13.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, approximately $100,000 a year, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the orchestra, said to-day recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

The request for more wages was based on increased living costs. Judge Cabot said the number who joined in the request was "large," possibly as many as eighty. He told the players no funds were available to meet their request.

The orchestra has approximately $100,000 to draw upon, and its operating expenditure is more than $90,000 a year.

"Settlement on an individual basis will be made in some cases with moderate increases, but any substantial advance is out of the question with our limited resources," Judge Cabot said.

The orchestra management has not overlooked the possibility that some of the players may decide that they must receive more money than can be had by remaining with the Boston Symphony. Such men, it is admitted, can probably obtain higher rates by joining the Musicians' Union and playing under its contracts.

From Herald SUN
New York City
FEB

BOSTON MUSICIANS ASK FOR MORE PAY

Symphony Orchestra's Demand Aggregates $100,000.

Special to THE SUN AND NEW YORK HERALD.

BOSTON, Feb. 18.—Demand for a wage advance representing approximately $100,000 has been made by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The financial condition of the organization precludes the granting of the demand, it was officially announced. It was authoritatively stated that the trustees, of which Judge Frederick P. Cabot is chairman, are considering the advisability of making an appeal to the public for a $2,000,000 endowment fund, the income from which would be used to meet the yearly deficit in the organization's budget.

The expenses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra amount to about $90,000 a season. The trustees have $100,000 a year to draw on to meet these expenses.

From
EVENING GLOBE
New York City
Press
FEB 18 1920 B

BOSTON PLAYERS WILL JOIN UNION

Wage Request Refused, Symphony Members Plan to Unite With Organization.

BOSTON, Feb. 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said the question of union membership was not an issue between the players and management, although recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

The wage request was based on the plea that present compensation is inadequate under living conditions. Judge Cabot told the players the resources of the organization were such that no funds were available for the $100,000 advance.

"Settlement on an individual basis will be made in some cases, with moderate increases, but any substantial advance is out of the question," said Judge Cabot.

The orchestra management has not overlooked the possibility that some of the players may decide that they must receive more money than can be made with the Boston Symphony. Such men can probably obtain higher rates by joining the musicians' union.

EVENING SUN
New York City

31 FIRED MUSICIANS IN SYMPHONY STRIKE

Clause in Contract Causes Trouble in Famous Boston Organization.

BOSTON, March 11.—Thirty-two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were dismissed to-day because they refused to sign an agreement that specified, "intention to perform their contracts without further breach." A strike was immediately called by the musicians.

Trustees yesterday voted to reinstate those members who signed the agreement which called for payment of a fine of $10 for violation of their contracts. Three members signed. The others refused and were dismissed.

rom
Star
New York City

BOSTON PLAYERS GO BACK

Boston, March 10.—Following a meeting with Fredeick P. Cabot, President of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday the committee of three of the members who joined the union affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians reported to the union that the Trustees would not object to union affiliation under the following conditions: That the American Federation of Musicians make special rules for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, granting this organization privileges neither granted to nor asked for by any one of the sixteen organizations of this kind in this country.

No action was taken by the union on this report and thirty-five musicians who had refused to play in the regular concert last Saturday joined the other members of the orchestra. They refused to play Saturday because Frederic Fradkin, concert master, had been dismissed, and rejoined on the advice of Mr. Fradkin. An increase of $1,000 a year for each player had been requested and refused.

lipper
w York City

KING MUSICIANS TO PLAY

N, Mass., Mar. 15.—Union musicians who were formerly members of the Symphony Orchestra, but are now on strike, will give a symphony concert Sunday at the Colonial Theatre, conducted by Emil Mollenhauer. Solos will be offered by concert-master Fradkin, and also by Gustave Heim, cornet.

From
TRIBUNE,
New York City

Union Music at Boston

A Defence of Organization by an Old Member

To the Editor of The Tribune.

Sir: Being the oldest member among those who refused to play at Symphony Hall Saturday, March 6, I wish to explain the reasons that prompted my colleagues and myself to proceed in that manner.

When this new era of democracy dawned upon us we were told by President Wilson that the governed had some rights in deciding the form of government they wished, all of which makes beautiful reading, but in practice this is distasteful to a certain set of people.

When a committee of the orchestra—I being one of them—called upon Mr. Monteux, himself a member of the Federation of Musicians of France, in regard to the union question, he assured us of his absolute neutrality. At the same time, through his attitude toward Mr. Fradkin, a strong and altruistic promoter of our cause, Mr. Monteux showed plainly that his statement to us was not sincere and thus the situation grew more and more acute and finally led to the most unfortunate occurrence on Friday afternoon. I want to state right here that I deplore Mr. Fradkin's refusal to rise when bidden to do so by Mr. Monteux but it is apparent that the treatment meted out to him by Mr. Monteux was irritating beyond human endurance. We felt obliged to uphold him since Mr. Fradkin made his sacrifice for us.

Judge Cabot had stated that the Fradkin incident had nothing whatsoever to do with the union movement. He is quite correct if he refers to it directly, but indirectly it is only too evident that this agitation was the sole cause of all the trouble. Probably the most important factor in our move is that this is a great opportunity to open the eyes of the public to the fact that a great crisis in regard to the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is at hand.

Altogether seventy-four have pledged themselves to stand together in the movement, which means that every one of these men will quit at the expiration of his contract if the union is not recognized by the trustees. In that way, within one year, more than three-quarters of the entire personnel of the orchestra must necessarily be replaced. Judge Cabot evidently is not at all concerned about this fact. I myself think it to be entirely impossible. He stated he would willingly continue the concerts under these adverse conditions and gradually build the orchestra up to its former standard. This will take a great many years, if it can be accomplished at all, and for the public there will be ample opportunity to do some watchful waiting. All other orchestras in the country are organized and it seems that this fact does not interfere with their artistic development. I need mention only the Chicago and Philadelphia orchestras which in the musical world are considered superior to ours, which proves the old notion of art and organization not belonging together to be an exploded theory.

All of this, coming after thirty-eight years of service in this orchestra, causes me the greatest mental agony I have ever suffered. It is but natural it should pain me beyond measure to witness this splendid organization, in which I have spent the best part of my life, broken beyond repair. There is yet time to save it, and I hope the trustees will relent. OTTO ROTH.

Boston, Mass., March 15, 1920.

EVENING SUN
ess New York City

ORCHESTRA MAY JOIN UNION.

Boston Players Want More Pay—Fight Looms.

BOSTON, Feb. 19.—Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians want more pay and are going to join the musicians' union to get it, according to announcement yesterday.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told the players no funds were available to meet the demands. The union will not be recognized either, it was said, because union leaders wanted to say who would play in the orcestra and under what conditions. Individual increases may be made, Judge Cabot said, and those who do not fare well under this plan will have recourse to the union and the higher rates obtainable by playing elsewhere under its contracts.

From Times
New York City

Boston Symphony Wage Demand Refused; Musicians Take Steps to Join Union

BOSTON, Feb. 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said today that the question of union membership was not an issue between the players and the management, although recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said that they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

The request for more wages was submitted in a letter and based on the plea that the players' present compensation is inadequate under increased living costs. Judge Cabot said that the number who joined in the request was "large," possibly as many as 80.

At a meeting of the orchestra subsequently, he told the players that the resources of the organization were such that no funds were available for the $100,000 advance necessary to meet their request. The orchestra has approximately $100,000 to draw upon and its operating expenditure is more than $90,000 a year.

"Settlement on an individual basis will be made in some cases with moderate increases, but any substantial advance is out of the question with our limited resources," Judge Cabot said.

The orchestra management has not overlooked the possibility that some of the players may decide that they must receive more money than can be had by remaining with the Boston Symphony. Such men, it is admitted, can probably obtain higher rates by joining the musicians' union and playing under its contracts.

TRIBUNE
New York City
FEB 19 1920

Hub Symphony Players Ask for $100,000 Raise

Plea Refused, They Take Steps to Join the Musicians' Union

BOSTON, Feb. 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said to-day that the question of union membership was not an issue between players and management, although recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

Judge Cabot said the number who joined in the request for increased wages was "large," possibly as many as eighty. He told the players that no funds were available to meet their request.

"Settlement on an individual basis will be made in some cases with mod[illegible] increases," Judge Cabot said.

From Times
New York City

POLICE STOP MUSIC PICKE

Strikers Have Enlisted the Aid Lambs and Actors' Equity.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, March 12.—The dismiss musicians of the Boston Symphony O chestra were barred by the police fro picketing the stage entrance to Sy phony Hall at rehearsal today. S pickets selected from members of th newly formed union gathered near th door, but were made to "keep moving and were unceremoniously hustled along by policemen apparently stationed there especially to prevent the strikers from doing picket duty.

While the orchestra management was revising its concert programs the strikers were arranging for a benefit concert, to be given by themselves and union sympathizers in the Colonial Theatre a week from Sunday night and in various other enterprises in connection with the continuance of their strike.

The concert is being arranged by Mr. Dodge, who is the originator of the ten band concerts that are conducted annually in Mechanics' Building. He has been in touch with the Lambs and the Actors' Equity Association, and prominent stars are to appear at the concert, which will be conducted by Emil Mollenhauer.

From Dramatic Mirror
New York City

WANT MORE PAY

Boston Symphony Orchestra Men Demand $100,000

Demand for a wage advance representing approximately $100,000 has been made by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The financial condition of the organization precludes the granting of the demand, it was officially announced. It was authoritatively stated that the trustees, of which Judge Frederick P. Cabot is chairman, are considering the advisability of making an appeal to the public for a $2,000,000 endowment fund, the income from which would be used to meet the yearly deficit in the organization's budget.

The expenses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra amount to about $90,000 a season. The trustees have $100,000 a year to draw on to meet these expenses.

EVENING MAIL,
New York City

Boston Symphony Artists Ask Raise, Meet Refusal

Boston, Feb. 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the musicians' union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said to-day the question of union membership was not an issue between players and management, although recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

om
/ENING POST,

While the Damrosch societies are thus out of danger for the present, one of the leading American organizations, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is in a precarious condition. When Major Higginson died, he did not leave to the orchestra created by him the hoped-for million, probably because he foresaw that it would be unionized, a step to which he had always been bitterly opposed. The men have now demanded an increase in pay which would amount to $100,000 a year, and the trustees have declared themselves unable to meet this demand. Ninety per cent. of the members have affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians.

T. Finck

A sensational detail last week was the summary discharge of the concert master, Frederic Fradkin. There had been a "verbal clash," as the Boston Herald puts it, in Cambridge between him and the conductor, M. Monteux. The growing bitterness reached a dramatic climax in Symphony Hall, Boston, when Mr. Fradkin refused to rise with the other musicians in response to the applause which Monteux wanted the players to share with him. As Philip Hale described the scene:

"Mr. Fradkin, by not rising with the others, acted discourteously toward the applauding audience. When he left the stage for the intermission many in the audience hissed him for his rudeness. When he returned, some, especially in the second balcony, applauded; there was also hissing; some in the orchestra were so tactless, not to say discourteous, toward the audience as to join in the applause. Mr. Fradkin had the assurance to stand up this time. He bowed to the audience and the orchestra.

"As soon as Mr. Monteux reappeared there was a mighty counter-demonstration. The applause was enthusiastic; it grew louder and louder until the great audience stood for some time, clapping hands vigorously; there was also cheering. Mr. Monteux then went on with the concert.

"It was a deplorable scene. Nothing like it had happened in the history of the orchestra. May nothing like it happen again!"

om EVENING SUN
ddress New York City
ate MAR 13 1920 E

THE SYMPHONIES.

At each of the final pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season, to be given next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux will give a notable piece its first performance in New York: on Thursday, John Alden Carpenter's piano "Concertino," assisted by E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist; on Saturday, "The Pauses of Silence: Seven Symphonic Expressions," by Malipiero, the daring young Italian composer, whose music has attracted considerable attention. The other numbers for the Thursday concert will be Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman." For Saturday, Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's Symphony in G minor (Kochel 550) and Charpentier's

Music Needs Medicis

An orchestra in a theatre is usually a superfluity and a nuisance. It teaches people to talk while music is being made, and this encourages bad manners at the opera and in concert halls. In the opera house the orchestra is a necessity. Giorgio Polacco showed us that there is a wealth of beauty even in the despised orchestra scores of Donizetti and Bellini. Much of the beauty of the operas of Verdi, Bizet, Gounod, Puccini and others lies in the orchestral accompaniments, and in Wagner's operas the colors are so glowingly rich and varied that they make one eager to hear them even when the singers are not of the best. It would therefore be a serious thing for operagoers if the efficiency of the Metropolitan Opera Company's famous orchestra should be impaired by the new demands of the Musical Mutual Protective Union, which would add over $50,000 to the management's expenses of this department.

In concert halls good orchestral compositions are considered the highest achievements of creative genius; but it takes an orchestra of eighty to a hundred skilled and trained players to do them justice. In recent years there has been in this country about a dozen high-class orchestras. The post-bellum situation which has been coming to a head this week makes one wonder how many of these will be in existence a few years hence.

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, in particular, has been hard hit. The late Major Higginson, who founded it at the age of forty-sevn, and during thirty-seven years spent about a million on it, did not leave it the expected nest egg of another million, and it has since been in a dubious position. Thirty-one of its best men had to be discharged as enemy aliens. A few days ago the same number were dismissed for reasons connected with demands for more pay, which cannot be met. The concert master has been disciplined for joining the strikers, although he gets two or three times as much as the other men. At the moment of writing this there are various conflicting rumors: One that a concert master is forming an orchestra of his own with the thirty-one dismissed men as a nucleus; another, that he is in a conciliatory mood to prevent the disruption of the famous orchestra; still another, that M. Monteux will come to New York next week with women players in place of the lost members! That would be revolutionary. We shall see.

One thing is certain. Unless another Major Higginson is forthcoming the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not likely to be in the future what it was in the past. Another of the famous orchestras that visit us regularly, the Philadelphian, has also been trying, amicably enough, to adjust its differences with the union musicians. For the present danger seems to have been averted. It is not denied that, under present conditions, the men ought to have more, and they will get more; but if they get all they ask, who is to pay for the orchestra's upkeep? An endowment of some $900,000 was raised this winter, but the income from that does not cover the extra $60,000 asked for by the musicians.

Florence had its Medicis. We have had some too, but we need more. When Theodore Thomas took his orchestra to Chicago he wisely insisted on having a hall built for it to save rent for concerts and rehearsals. Deficits occurring, nevertheless, were taken over by his friend, Mæcenas Pullman. For its excellent opera company Chicago has to present the princely Harold McCormick, to whom New Yorkers are also under great obligations. He made it possible for Cleofonte Campanini to carry out his most ambitious schemes and to perpetuate the Hammerstein blessings.

One of the most generous of New York's Medicis was the late E. J. de Coppet, who spent a fortune in floating the Flonzaley Quartet. He reminded one of the Esterhazys and other European princes who used to keep their own orchestras. Andrew Carnegie signed many a check in support of orchestral music in this city and Harry Harkness Flagler is still more lavish. Joseph Pulitzer's endowment of the Philharmonic Orchestra was a noble gift, applied with laudable judgment. There is evidently plenty of money to back up the latest organization, the New Symphony Orchestra; but it must be said that a new orchestra was the last thing New York needed. Instead of adding thirty more pairs of concerts it would have been much wiser to curtail the present number by thirty pairs.

Plant breeders have found it more advisable to foster the best existing varieties of vegetables, fruits and flowers than to create new ones. The same principle should be applied to orchestras. The New York Philharmonic is our oldest and best orchestra. It needs a Medici to keep up its standard. Major Higginson was often referred to as Boston's foremost citizen, because he made that city famous as a musical centre. Among the ten thousand new millionaires since the war is there not one who would like to be called New York's foremost citizen? It would cost less than owning a steam yacht.

From.....

Address New York City

Date.....

* * *

Part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has gone on strike. It is understood they demand time and a half for encores.

* * *

EVENING SUN
ress New York City
MAR 12 1920

Orchestral Strikers.

The democratization of industr
may do very well, it all depends o
what Mr. WILSON meant by the ex pression. But when we come to the democratization of music the ide
must give pause to the music love
however he construes it. The strik
in the Boston Symphony Orchestr
has gone on merrily for some days
Boston. The fact that the orchest not run for profit and could abolished without costing its backe
a cent affords no deterrent.

The plan under way to have dismissed concertmaster, FRADK
and his striking or discharged as iates give concerts on their own p depends for its financial succ
largely on the view that concerts p
Sometimes they do, but the line
ween customer and patron is hard saw. If the strikers, after aband ng the patrons of the original orch ra, can find enough sympathizers back them, they may become secee nd start an orchestra of their o cooperatively run somewhat as he Philharmonic for over a gene ion.

But as a strike, pure and simp
he conflict can hardly be made within the bounds of music. Else must admit the possibility of sabot
by the trombones, union rules as t
full crew of wood winds and pay he measure played, with pay-and half for largo passages and mo

TELEGRAM
MAR 11
New York City

ston Orchestra May Employ Women

TON, Thursday. — The Boston
hony Orchestra faces the necessity wing on women musicians to com-its personnel as result of the trouween trustees of the orchestra and ive members who struck on the last Saturday night's concert. The ng musicians have refused to have
ing more to do with the orchestra
s full fledged union members un-ll union conditions, and the union's ity is preventing available men accepting places with the organi-

trustees in a statement say that e judgment and discretion of a f trustees the rules of the Amerideration of Musicians would sub-
the judgment of the executive of the federation, a body with he musical supremacy of the Bos-mphony Orchestra would be, and
ly ought to be, of an importance econdary to the welfare of the ion.

om
Variety MAR 12 1920
ew York City

STON'S SYMPHONY'S MAT

Boston, March
r a week in which things that sent shudders of dis
the spines of staid Boston porters of the almost sacred B hony Orchestra, and during w derick Fradkin, concert master ed" by the trustees for a clash with ctor Monteux, and half of the rs went out on "strike" just before concert Saturday night and refused appear, things now are just about re they were when the controver ed, with the exception, import Fradkin, that he is still out of estra.
this fashion the matter
ds. Undoubtedly, the players for a time—both sides are sparr
me. The musicians realize th nsibilities to the music lov
of Boston, the trustees do
o be placed in the position
the orchestra under anythi ir direct control. What, if a this the fourth week of the c y will bring remains to be se

MAR 12 1920 A
rom American
New York City

ston Symphony Issues Ultimatum to Strikers

BOSTON, March 11.—
Boston Symphony Orchestra,
depleted one-third by a strike,
ll be recruited to full strength hin a day or two, according to management. The men struck
Saturday because of the dis-of Concert Master Fradkin, ain yesterday because their withheld pending discipli-
They are forming an orchestra with Fradkin for a tour of New Eng-

rs will be given until return, after which
be filled, it is said.
of the orchestra
The possi-

EVENING SUN
ress New York City
MAR 21 19

ate

Boston's Symphonic Discord.

The veteran Otto Roth, of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sends the following open letter in regard to the recent disturbances in the organization:

"Being the oldest member among those who refused to play at Symphony Hall last Saturday, March 6, I wish to explain the reasons that prompted my colleagues and myself to proceed in that manner.

"When this new era of democracy dawned upon us we were told by President Wilson that the governed had some rights in deciding the form of government they wished, all of which makes beautiful reading, but in practice this is distasteful to a certain set of people.

"When a committee of the orchestra, I being one of them, called upon Mr. Monteux, himself a member of the Federation of Musicians of France, in regard to the union question, he assured us of his absolute neutrality. At the same time through his attitude toward Mr. Fradkin, a strong and altruistic promoter of our cause, Mr. Monteux showed plainly that his statement to us was not sincere, and thus the situation grew more and more acute, and finally led to the most unfortunate occurrence on Friday afternoon. I want to state right here that I deplore Mr. Fradkin's refusal to rise when bidden to do so by Mr. Monteux, but it is apparent that the treatment ted out to him by Mr. Monteux was tating beyond human endurance; felt obliged to uphold him since . Fradkin made his sacrifice for us. 'Judge Cabot had stated that the adkin incident had nothing to do atsoever with the union movement is quite correct if he refers to it ectly, but indirectly it is only too ident that this agitation was the e cause of all the trouble. Probably e most important factor in our move is that this is a great opportunity to open the eyes of the public to the fact that a great crisis in regard to the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was at hand.

"Altogether seventy-four have pledged themselves to stand together in the movement, which means that every one of these men must quit at the expiration of his contract if the union is not recognized by the trustees. In that way within one year more than three-quarters of the entire personnel of the orchestra must necessarily be replaced. Judge Cabot evidently is not at all concerned about this fact—I myself think it to be entirely impossible. He stated he would willingly continue the concerts under these adverse conditions and gradually build it up to its former standard. This will take a great many years, if it can be accomplished at all, and for the public there will be ample opportunity to do some watchful waiting. All other orchestras in the country are organized, and it seems that this fact does not interfere with their artistic development. I need only mention the Chicago and Philadelphia orchestras, which in the musical world, are considered our superior, which proves that the old notion of art and organization not belonging together, to be an exploded theory.

"All of this, coming after thirty-eight years of service in this orchestra, causes me the greatest mental agony I have ever suffered; it is but natural that it would pain me beyond measure to witness this splendid organization in which I have spent the best part of my life broken beyond repair; there is yet time to save it, and I hope the trustees will relent."

Mr. Roth's letter proves conclusively that the present state of the Boston Orchestra is precarious. If its men are pledged to unionism and the trustees remain firm in their determination not to recognize a union the present orchestra will cease to exist and a new one will have to be formed. If the trustees believe that they can go out and buy a new Boston Symphony Orchestra just as they would buy a new bass drum they are lamentably mistaken. To the disinterested outsider it looks as if the famous old orchestra was approaching dissolution. Such an outcome of the matter would be a calamity to the musical world and all music lovers will fervently hope that differences may be adjusted.

From.....
Address New York City
Date MAR 12 1920 H

STRIKE LEADER.—A walkout of many of the artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was caused by the dismissal of Fred Fradkin, concertmaster, after his refusal to rise and bow on a signal from the leader. They returned later at Fradkin's request. (By Int'l.)

From FEB 1920 K
Theatre Magazine
New York City

Philadelphia came to New [illegible] Apollo-like Leopold Stokowski led his resuscitated orchestra with the joy of renewed life. In Philadelphia, they would not let the orchestra perish, and raised many thousands of dollars among the people, so that it would go on, unworried by finance and such-like material thoughts.

Boston's men, under the batôn of Pierre Monteux, made its regular visit. Boston's orchestra is not dead, either, although many of the pessimistic gentlemen of the press pointed out in dolorous accents that it would surely perish. When Pierre Monteux was selected, mon dieu, it was pff—finale!

HOWEVER, Boston's Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, seems not very much disturbed. Being the greatest organization, it cannot disintegrate after its years of life and close companionship. These men play like the parts of a single instrument; the orchestra does not consist of eighty souls, but one.

EV
ess New York City
Mar 15 1920 H

Dissonances in a Symphony

In any comment upon the regrettable wrath engendered in the celestial minds composing the Boston Symphony Orchestra we could wish to avoid the curse of SOPHUS if possible; yet none may be quite deaf to the cacophonies resulting from the criticism of a musical gentleman's individual opinion.

At the orchestral concert in Boston on March 6 a second round of applause for a certain number led the conductor, PIERRE MONTEUX, to give a signal for the members of the orchestra to rise in acknowledgment. All stood up save FREDERIC FRADKIN, the concert master, who remained as firmly set upon his base as the rock of RODERICK DHU. Some discussion after the concert led to Mr. FRADKIN's refusal to sign an agreement forming part of the visible cohesive policy of the orchestra, whereupon the conductor dismissed the concert master. About thirty members of the orchestra protested, and declared that unless Mr. FRADKIN were reinstated they would not join in the evening's programme. So Mr. F. P. CABOT, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, announced a change in the programme to be played, whereby the concert could be given without Mr. FRADKIN and his supporters. And it was so.

Since then the blue vault of heaven has been plangent with the concussions and reverberations of language less musical than one would naturally expect from Boston musicians. The devoted thirty-five stood in unbroken phalanx with uplifted eyebrows and curling lips. The trustees of the orchestra maintained the traditions of the great house of CABOT, the air was filled with suggestions of replacing the self-conscious thirty-five with women musicians who, as women and sensible, would naturally be amenable to order and discipline.

Since the male musicians' union rules prevented recruiting any more men this suggestion of broadening the artistic field for women seemed a natural result of the trouble, because a hoary tradition of the Boston orchestra—not yet wholly dissipated by the beams of the New Day in which all human beings are equal and nobody need work unwillingly—forbade the drafting of advanced pupils from the many conservatories and music schools of Boston. It is not known that the Olive Mead quartet received overtures—or even voluntaries—from the trustees; but it is reported that the thirty-five are taking the aggressive and propose to give a concert of their own under direction of MARINUZZI of the Chicago Opera Company—now consuming lotus and lentils in Boston—with a solo performance by that distinguished prima donna and true Italian friend of freedom hailed by one of her greatest New York admirers as GALLI the Curch.

When Music, heavenly maid, was young she never got into such a scrape as all that. What wails of anguish may yet be drawn from the self-inhibited violins none can tell—what hollow, saxophonic groans may come, what thunder[illegible] burst from the torn [illegible] of the kettledrums [illegible] bilities remain to [illegible] ready bewildered without either booz[illegible] Nations. But we [illegible] thing else, and we c[illegible] that.

From
Clipper
New York City
MAR 10 1920

SYMPHONY MUSICIANS STRIKE

BOSTON, March 7.—Thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra did not appear at last night's concert in accordance with their decision not to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed on Friday night for not responding to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux.

A committee of the musicians were told by Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, that Fradkin would not be reinstated. They told him that one-quarter of the orchestra would not join in the evening's program, with the result that Cabot arranged a different number of selections, to enable the concert to go on without them.

From
TRIBUNE,
New York City

New Orchestra for Boston

Four Wealthy Society Women Back Fradkin in Project

Special Dispatch to The Tribune.

BOSTON, March 15.—Frederic Fradkin, the deposed concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced to-day at a meeting of thirty-three former members of the organization that a fund of $100,000 has been offered by four wealthy society women for the purpose of starting a new symphony orchestra here.

It is predicted that when the contracts of other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra expire at the close of the present season they will sign up with the new aggregation, which will by that time be fully organized and in a position to arrange for acquiring its personnel for next season.

Programs for Two Boston Symphony Concerts Changed

Owing to the disrupted condition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because of the recent strike, which grew out of the differences between conductor Pierre Monteux and the former concert-master Frederic Fradkin, it has been necessary to make a change in the programs for the New York concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The revised programs will be as follows: Thursday evening, Beethoven, Symphony No. 4 in B flat major, Op. 60, Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," excerpts from Act III of "The Mastersingers"; Saturday afternoon, Beethoven, Overture to "Fidelio," Mozart, Symphony in G minor (Koch[illegible] 550), Borodin, "On the Steppe[illegible] Asia," Debussy, Petite Suit

ss New York City
DEC 3 1920 L

Symphony Pickets Thrown from Hall

BOSTON, Saturday.—Six pickets, the members of the newly formed union, were unceremoniously hustled from the stage entrance of Symphony Hall today when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was in rehearsal. The Lambs and the Actors' Equity Association have expressed their sympathy for the strikers and will assist in a benefit performance.

Judge F. P. Cabot, president of the Symphony trustees, announced that the thirty-two players who went on strike have been discharged from the organization and that the concerts scheduled for Boston and elsewhere would be given.

The benefit concert is being arranged for a week from Sunday night by Mr. William G. Dodgeg personal representative of President Webber, of the American Federation of Musicians. He is in touch with the Lambs and the Actors' Equity Association, and through these organizations a number of prominent stars are to appear at the concert, to be conducted by Emil Mollenhauer.

In addition to the concert by the strikers the programme provides for a violin solo by Frederic Fradkin, the dismissed concert master.

An offer of $5,000 to finance a series of "small time" concerts by the thirty-two former members of the Symphony was made today by a prominent local amateur musician.

The Executive Board of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employes held a meeting today and unanimously indorsed the strike. It was voted to give all possible assistance.

No information has been received regarding the method of filling the vacant places in the orchestra. Trustees refused to comment on the probability that women would be offered the chance of joining the famous musical organization. The rumor persists that women have been engaged.

MORNING TELEGRAPH
York City
MAR - 8 1920 A

The Right of Orchestra Owners to Run the Musicians

When the owner of an orchestra or of any other[illegible] cern for that matter ceases to run things and permits [illegible] ployees to dictate, it is time for him to go out of busine[illegible] If the man who owns anything cannot run it himself, h[illegible] surely would not wish the men he hires to work for him to boss things. Take the case of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for example. There are men at The Hub who have put considerable money into it and who give concerts in Boston and New York and other cities. The chief owner of this amusement enterprise is Mr. Cabot. One of his employees was Frederic Fradkin, who acted as concert master, working under orders of Pierre Monteux, the leader. Fradkin refused to obey an order of Monteux, his chief, and was discharged. Thirty musicians went on a strike and notified President Cabot that they would not appear at the concert scheduled to be given Saturday in Boston unless Fradkin was reinstated. That is these thirty men made the impudent demand that they be permitted to run the orchestra in which they were paid to play. The demand was promptly refused and they announced again that they would not play. It made little difference, as there were 30 musicians left who would play, and [illegible] score and ten men can make a lot of noise on wind and stringed instruments, [illegible] counting the drums and cymbals. The program was rearranged and the [illegible] went ahead and gave a satisfying concert. It is something to be wonder[illegible] ever, that 30 men in an orchestra of 120 would have the appalling [illegible] take the run the whole business and dictate to the [illegible]

EVENING SUN

dress New York City

MAR 17 1920

Orchestral Strikers.

The democratization of industr
may do very well, it all depends o
what Mr. WILSON meant by the ex pression. But when we come to th
democratization of music the ide
must give pause to the music love
however he construes it. The strik
in the Boston Symphony Orchestr
has gone on merrily for some days
Boston. The fact that the orchestr is not run for profit and could abolished without costing its backe
a cent affords no deterrent.

The plan under way to have dismissed concertmaster, FRADK
and his striking or discharged as sociates give concerts on their own p depends for its financial succ
largely on the view that concerts p
Sometimes they do, but the line
tween customer and patron is hard drawn. If the strikers, after aband ing the patrons of the original orch tra, can find enough sympathizers
back them, they may become seced
and start an orchestra of their o
cooperatively run somewhat as the Philharmonic for over a gene
tion.

But as a strike, pure and sim
the conflict can hardly be made within the bounds of music. Else
must admit the possibility of sabot
by the trombones, union rules as t
full crew of wood winds and pay the measure played, with pay-and half for largo passages and mo

TELEGRAM

MAR 11

New York City

ston Orchestra May Employ Women

STON, Thursday. — The Boston
hony Orchestra faces the necessity
awing on women musicians to com-
its personnel as result of the trou-tween trustees of the orchestra and
-five members who struck on the last Saturday night's concert. The ng musicians have refused to have
ing more to do with the orchestra
as full fledged union members unull-union conditions, and the union's lity is preventing available men
accepting places with the organi-
n.

trustees in a statement say that
e judgment and discretion of a
of trustees the rules of the Ameri-
deration of Musicians would sub-
the judgment of the executive
of the federation, a body with the musical supremacy of the Bos-mphony Orchestra would be, and
ly ought to be, of an importance econdary to the welfare of the ion.

om
Variety
ew York City

STON'S SYMPHONY'S MAT

Boston, March
fter a week in which things
ed that sent shudders of dis vn the spines of staid Boston porters of the almost sacred Bo mphony Orchestra, and during w ederick Fradkin, concert master was red" by the trustees for a clash with rector Monteux, and half of the yers went out on "strike" just before concert Saturday night and refused appear, things now are just about ere they were when the controver rted, with the exception, import Fradkin, that he is still out of hestra.

n this fashion the matter n
ds. Undoubtedly, the players
for a time—both sides are sparr
ime. The musicians realize th onsibilities to the music lov
of Boston, the trustees do
o be placed in the position
g the orchestra under anythi their direct control. What, if an this the fourth week of the co
y will bring remains to be se

rom American
New York City

ston Symphony Issues Ultimatum to Strikers

BOSTON, March 11.

HE Boston Symphony Orchestra,
depleted one-third by a strike,
ll be recruited to full strength
thin a day or two, according to management. The men struck st on Saturday because of the disrge of Concert Master Fradkin.
again yesterday because their
was withheld pending discipli-action. They are forming an pendent orchestra with Fradkin
leader for a tour of New Eng-

strikers will be given until orrow to return, after which places will be filled, it is said.
members of the orchestra
be called upon. The possi-women may be taken nsideration for the first uggested, but the

m SUN

ress New York City

MAR 1

Boston's Symphonic Discord.

The veteran Otto Roth, of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sends the following open letter in regard to the recent disturbances in the organization:

"Being the oldest member among those who refused to play at Symphony Hall last Saturday, March 6, I wish to explain the reasons that prompted my colleagues and myself to proceed in that manner.

"When this new era of democracy dawned upon us we were told by President Wilson that the governed had some rights in deciding the form of government they wished, all of which makes beautiful reading, but in practice this is distasteful to a certain set of people.

"When a committee of the orchestra, I being one of them, called upon Mr. Monteux, himself a member of the Federation of Musicians of France, in regard to the union question, he assured us of his absolute neutrality. At the same time through his attitude toward Mr. Fradkin, a strong and altruistic promoter of our cause, Mr. Monteux showed plainly that his statement to us was not sincere, and thus the situation grew more and more acute, and finally led to the most unfortunate occurrence on Friday afternoon. I want to state right here that I deplore Mr. Fradkin's refusal to rise when bidden to do so by Mr. Monteux, but it is apparent that the treatment ted out to him by Mr. Monteux was itating beyond human endurance; felt obliged to uphold him since Fradkin made his sacrifice for us. "Judge Cabot had stated that the adkin incident had nothing to do atsoever with the union movement; is quite correct if he refers to it ectly, but indirectly it is only too ident that this agitation was the e cause of all the trouble. Probably e most important factor in our move is that this is a great opportunity to open the eyes of the public to the fact that a great crisis in regard to the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was at hand.

"Altogether seventy-four have pledged themselves to stand together in the movement, which means that every one of these men must quit at the expiration of his contract if the union is not recognized by the trustees. In that way within one year more than three-quarters of the entire personnel of the orchestra must necessarily be replaced. Judge Cabot evidently is not at all concerned about this fact—I myself think it to be entirely impossible. He stated he would willingly continue the concerts under these adverse conditions and gradually build it up to its former standard. This will take a great many years, if it can be accomplished at all, and for the public there will be ample opportunity to do some watchful waiting. All other orchestras in the country are organized, and it seems that this fact does not interfere with their artistic development. I need only mention the Chicago and Philadelphia orchestras, which in the musical world, are considered our superior, which proves that the old notion of art and organization not belonging together, to be an exploded theory.

"All of this, coming after thirty-eight years of service in this orchestra, causes me the greatest mental agony I have ever suffered; it is but natural that it would pain me beyond measure to witness this splendid organization in which I have spent the best part of my life broken beyond repair; there is yet time to save it, and I hope the trustees will relent."

Mr. Roth's letter proves conclusively that the present state of the Boston Orchestra is precarious. If its men are pledged to unionism and the trustees remain firm in their determination not to recognize a union the present orchestra will cease to exist and a new one will have to be formed. If the trustees believe that they can go out and buy a new Boston Symphony Orchestra just as they would buy a new bass drum they are lamentably mistaken. To the disinterested outsider it looks as if the famous old orchestra was approaching dissolution. Such an outcome of the matter would be a calamity to the musical world and all music lovers will fervently hope that differences may be adjusted.

From.....

Address New York City

Date

STRIKE LEADER.—A walkout of many of the artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was caused by the dismissal of Fred Fradkin, concertmaster, after his refusal to rise and bow on a signal from the leader. They returned later at Fradkin's request. (By Int'l.)

From
Theatre Magazine
New York Ci

Philadelphia came to New [illegible] Apollo-like Leopold Stokowski led his resuscitated orchestra with the joy of renewed life. In Philadelphia, they would not let the orchestra perish, and raised many thousands of dollars among the people, so that it would go on, unworried by finance and such-like material thoughts.

Boston's men, under the batôn of Pierre Monteux, made its regular visit. Boston's orchestra is not dead, either, although many of the pessimistic gentlemen of the press pointed out in dolorous accents that it would surely perish. When Pierre Monteux was selected, monsieur, it was pff—finale!

HOWEVER, Boston's Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, seems not very much disturbed. Being the greatest organization, it cannot disintegrate after its years of life and close companionship. These men play like the parts of a single instrument; the orchestra does not consist of eighty souls, but one.

From
Clipper
New York City

SYMPHONY MUSICIANS STRIKE

BOSTON, March 7.—Thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra did not appear at last night's concert in accordance with their decision not to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed on Friday night for not responding to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux.

A committee of the musicians were told by Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, that Fradkin would not be reinstated. They told him that one-quarter of the orchestra would not join in the evening's program, with the result that Cabot arranged a different number of selections, to enable the concert to go on without them.

EVENING SUN

ess New York City

MAR 15 1920

Dissonances in a Symphony

In any comment upon the regrettable wrath engendered in the celestial minds composing the Boston Symphony Orchestra we could wish to avoid the curse of SPORUS if possible; yet none may be quite deaf to the cacophonies resulting from the criticism of a musical gentleman's individual opinion.

At the orchestral concert in Boston on March 6 a second round of applause for a certain number led the conductor, PIERRE MONTEUX, to give a signal for the members of the orchestra to rise in acknowledgment. All stood up save FREDERIC FRADKIN, the concert master, who remained as firmly set upon his base as the rock of RODERICK DHU. Some discussion after the concert led to Mr. FRADKIN'S refusal to sign an agreement forming part of the visible cohesive policy of the orchestra, whereupon the conductor dismissed the concert master. About thirty members of the orchestra protested, and declared that unless Mr. FRADKIN were reinstated they would not join in the evening's programme. So Mr. F. P. CABOT, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, announced a change in the programme to be played, whereby the concert could be given without Mr. FRADKIN and his supporters. And it was so.

Since then the blue vault of heaven has been plangent with the concussions and reverberations of language less musical than one would naturally expect from Boston musicians. The devoted thirty-five stood in unbroken phalanx with uplifted eyebrows and curling lips. The trustees of the orchestra maintained the traditions of the great house of CABOT, the air was filled with suggestions of replacing the self-conscious thirty-five with women musicians who, as women and sensible, would naturally be amenable to order and discipline.

Since the male musicians' union rules prevented recruiting any more men this suggestion of broadening the artistic field for women seemed a natural result of the trouble, because a hoary tradition of the Boston orchestra—not yet wholly dissipated by the beams of the New Day in which all human beings are equal and nobody need work unwillingly—forbade the drafting of advanced pupils from the many conservatories and music schools of Boston. It is not known that the Olive Mead quartet received overtures—or even voluntaries—from the trustees; but it is reported that the thirty-five are taking the aggressive and propose to give a concert of their own under direction of MARINUZZI of the Chicago Opera Company—now consuming lotus and lentils in Boston—with a solo performance by that distinguished prima donna and true Italian friend of freedom hailed by one of her greatest New York admirers as GALLI the Curch.

When Music, heavenly maid, was young she never got into such a scrape as all that. What wails of anguish may yet be drawn from the self-inhibited violins none can tell—what hollow, saxophonic groans may come, what thunder[illegible] burst from the torn[illegible] of the kettledrums[illegible] bilities remain to [illegible] ready bewildered [illegible] without either booz[illegible] Nations. But we [illegible] thing else, and we c[illegible] that.

From
TRIBUNE,
New York City

New Orchestra for Boston

Four Wealthy Society Women Back Fradkin in Project

Special Dispatch to The Tribune

BOSTON, March 15.—Frederic Fradkin, the deposed concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced to-day at a meeting of thirty-three former members of the organization that a fund of $100,000 has been offered by four wealthy society women for the purpose of starting a new symphony orchestra here.

It is predicted that when the contracts of other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra expire at the close of the present season they will sign up with the new aggregation, which will by that time be fully organized and in a position to arrange for acquiring its personnel for next season.

Programs for Two Boston Symphony Concerts Changed

Owing to the disrupted condition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because of the recent strike, which grew out of the differences between conductor Pierre Monteux and the former concert-master Frederic Fradkin, it has been necessary to make a change in the programs for the New York concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The revised programs will be as follows: Thursday evening, Beethoven, Symphony No. 4 in B flat major, Op. 60, Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," excerpts from Act III of "The Mastersingers"; Saturday afternoon, Beethoven, Overture to "Fidelio," Mozart, Symphony in G minor (Koch[illegible] 550), Borodin, "On the Steppe[illegible] Asia," Debussy, Petite Suit[illegible]

ss New York City

Symphony Pickets Thrown from Hall

BOSTON, Saturday.—Six pickets, the members of the newly formed union, were unceremoniously hustled from the stage entrance of Symphony Hall today when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was in rehearsal. The Lambs and the Actors' Equity Association have expressed their sympathy for the strikers and will assist in a benefit performance.

Judge F. P. Cabot, president of the Symphony trustees, announced that the thirty-two players who went on strike have been discharged from the organization and that the concerts scheduled for Boston and elsewhere would be given.

The benefit concert is being arranged for a week from Sunday night by Mr. William G. Dodge, personal representative of President Webber, of the American Federation of Musicians. He is in touch with the Lambs and the Actors' Equity Association, and though these organizations a number of prominent stars are to appear at the concert, to be conducted by Emil Mollenhauer.

In addition to the concert by the strikers the programme provides for a violin solo by Frederic Fradkin, the dismissed concert master.

An offer of $5,000 to finance a series of "small time" concerts by the thirty-two former members of the Symphony was made today by a prominent local amateur musician.

The Executive Board of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employes held a meeting today and unanimously indorsed the strike. It was voted to give all possible assistance.

No information has been received regarding the method of filling the vacant places in the orchestra. Trustees refused to comment on the probability that women would be offered the chance of joining the famous musical organization. The rumor persists that women have been engaged.

MORNING TELEGRAPH

York City

The Right of Orchestra Owners to Run the Musicians

When the owner of an orchestra or of any other concern for that matter ceases to run things and permits employees to dictate, it is time for him to go out of business. If the man who owns anything cannot run it himself, he surely would not wish the men he hires to work for him to boss things. Take the case of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for example. There are men at The Hub who have put considerable money into it and who give concerts in Boston and New York and other cities. The chief owner of this amusement enterprise is Mr. Cabot. One of his employees was Frederic Fradkin, who acted as concert master, working under orders of Pierre Monteux, the leader. Fradkin refused to obey an order of Monteux, his chief, and was discharged. Thirty musicians went on a strike and notified President Cabot that they would not appear at the concert scheduled to be given Saturday in Boston unless Fradkin was reinstated. That is these thirty men made the impudent demand that they be permitted to run the orchestra in which they were paid to play. Their demand was promptly refused and they announced again that they would not play. It made little difference, as there were 90 musicians left who would play, and four score and ten men can make a lot of noise on wind and stringed instruments, not counting the drums and cymbals. The program was rearranged and the 90 men went ahead and gave a satisfying concert. It is something to be wondered at, however, that 30 men in an orchestra of 120 would have the appalling nerve to undertake the run the whole business and dictate to the men who

EVENING SUN

dress New York City

MAR 17 1920

Orchestral Strikers.

The democratization of industr
may do very well, it all depends o
what Mr. WILSON meant by the e
pression. But when we come to th
democratization of music the ide
must give pause to the music love
however he construes it. The stril
in the Boston Symphony Orchestr
has gone on merrily for some days
Boston. The fact that the orchest
not run for profit and could abolished without costing its backe cent affords no deterrent.

The plan under way to have dismissed concertmaster, FRADK
and his striking or discharged as ciates give concerts on their own p depends for its financial succ
largely on the view that concerts p
Sometimes they do, but the line
ween customer and patron is hard draw. If the strikers, after aband
ng the patrons of the original orch
tra, can find enough sympathizers
back them, they may become seced
and start an orchestra of their o
cooperatively run somewhat as the Philharmonic for over a gene
tion.

But as a strike, pure and sim
the conflict can hardly be made within the bounds of music. Else
must admit the possibility of sabot
by the trombones, union rules as t
full crew of wood winds and pay
the measure played, with pay-and half for largo passages and mo

TELEGRAM

MAR 11

New York City

ston Orchestra May Employ Women

STON, Thursday. — The Boston
hony Orchestra faces the necessity
awing on women musicians to com-
its personnel as result of the trou-
tween trustees of the orchestra and
-five members who struck on the last Saturday night's concert. The ng musicians have refused to have
ing more to do with the orchestra
as full fledged union members un-
ull union conditions, and the union's lity is preventing available men
accepting places with the organi-
n.

trustees in a statement say that
e judgment and discretion of a
of trustees the rules of the Ameri-
deration of Musicians would sub-
the judgment of the executive
of the federation, a body with the musical supremacy of the Bos-mphony Orchestra would be, and
ly ought to be, of an importance econdary to the welfare of the ion.

om
Variety
ew York City

STON'S SYMPHONY'S MATTER

Boston, March 10.

fter a week in which things hap-ed that sent shudders of dismay
the spines of staid Bostonians, porters of the almost sacred Boston mphony Orchestra, and during which ederick Fradkin, concert master was
ed" by the trustees for a clash with rector Monteux, and half of the
yers went out on "strike" just before concert Saturday night and refused appear, things now are just about ere they were when the controversy rted, with the exception, important Fradkin, that he is still out of the hestra.

n this fashion the matter now ds. Undoubtedly, the players will for a time—both sides are sparring ime. The musicians realize their onsibilities to the music lovin
of Boston, the trustees do
o be placed in the position
g the orchestra under anythi
their direct control. What, if an
, this the fourth week of the co
will bring remains to be se

MAR 21

rom American

New York City

ston Symphony Issues Ultimatum to Strikers

BOSTON, March 11.

HE Boston Symphony Orchestra,
depleted one-third by a strike,
ll be recruited to full strength
thin a day or two, according to management. The men struck
st on Saturday because of the dis-ge of Concert Master Fradkin,
again yesterday because their
was withheld pending disciplі-action. They are forming an pendent orchestra with Fradkin
leader for a tour of New Eng-

strikers will be given until orrow to return, after which places will be filled, it is said.
members of the orchestra
be called upon. The possi-
women may be taken ization for the first ggested, but the

m SUN

ress New York City

MAR 21

ate

Boston's Symphonic Discord.

The veteran Otto Roth, of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sends the following open letter in regard to the recent disturbances in the organization:

"Being the oldest member among those who refused to play at Symphony Hall last Saturday, March 6, I wish to explain the reasons that prompted my colleagues and myself to proceed in that manner.

"When this new era of democracy dawned upon us we were told by President Wilson that the governed had some rights in deciding the form of government they wished, all of which makes beautiful reading, but in practice this is distasteful to a certain set of people.

"When a committee of the orchestra, I being one of them, called upon Mr. Monteux, himself a member of the Federation of Musicians of France, in regard to the union question, he assured us of his absolute neutrality. At the same time through his attitude toward Mr. Fradkin, a strong and altruistic promoter of our cause, Mr. Monteux showed plainly that his statement to us was not sincere, and thus the situation grew more and more acute, and finally led to the most unfortunate occurrence on Friday afternoon. I want to state right here that I deplore Mr. Fradkin's refusal to rise when bidden to do so by Mr. Monteux, but it is apparent that the treatment meted out to him by Mr. Monteux was irritating beyond human endurance; we felt obliged to uphold him since Mr. Fradkin made his sacrifice for us.

"Judge Cabot had stated that the Fradkin incident had nothing to do whatsoever with the union movement; he is quite correct if he refers to it directly, but indirectly it is only too evident that this agitation was the root cause of all the trouble. Probably the most important factor in our move is that this is a great opportunity to open the eyes of the public to the fact that a great crisis in regard to the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was at hand.

"Altogether seventy-four have pledged themselves to stand together in the movement, which means that every one of these men must quit at the expiration of his contract if the union is not recognized by the trustees. In that way within one year more than three-quarters of the entire personnel of the orchestra must necessarily be replaced. Judge Cabot evidently is not at all concerned about this fact—I myself think it to be entirely impossible. He stated he would willingly continue the concerts under these adverse conditions and gradually build it up to its former standard. This will take a great many years, if it can be accomplished at all, and for the public there will be ample opportunity to do some watchful waiting. All other orchestras in the country are organized, and it seems that this fact does not interfere with their artistic development. I need only mention the Chicago and Philadelphia orchestras, which in the musical world, are considered our superior, which proves that the old notion of art and organization not belonging together, to be an exploded theory.

"All of this, coming after thirty-eight years of service in this orchestra, causes me the greatest mental agony I have ever suffered; it is but natural that it would pain me beyond measure to witness this splendid organization in which I have spent the best part of my life broken beyond repair; there is yet time to save it, and I hope the trustees will relent."

Mr. Roth's letter proves conclusively that the present state of the Boston Orchestra is precarious. If its men are pledged to unionism and the trustees remain firm in their determination not to recognize a union the present orchestra will cease to exist and a new one will have to be formed. If the trustees believe that they can go out and buy a new Boston Symphony Orchestra just as they would buy a new bass drum they are lamentably mistaken. To the disinterested outsider it looks as if the famous old orchestra was approaching dissolution. Such an outcome of the matter would be a calamity to the musical world and all music lovers will fervently hope that differences may be adjusted.

From.....

Address New York City

Date.....

EADER.—A walkout of many of the Boston Symphony Orused by the dismissal of Fred ertmaster, after his refusal to on a signal from the leader, ned later at Fradkin's request. (By Int'l.)

From
Theatre Magazine
New York Ci

came to New ... old Stokowski led his resusciith the joy of renewed life. In would not let the orchestra many thousands of dollars , so that it would go on, unby finance and such-like material oughts.

Boston's men, under the batôn of Pierre Monteux, made its regular visit. Boston's orhestra is not dead, either, although many of he pessimistic gentlemen of the press pointed but in dolorous accents that it would surely rish. When Pierre Monteux was selected, mon eu, it was pff—finale!

HOWEVER, Boston's Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, seems not very uch disturbed. Being the greatest organizaon, it cannot disintegrate after its years of life d close companionship. These men play like e parts of a single instrument; the orchestra not consist of eighty souls, but one.

EVENING SUN

ess New York City

MAR 15 1920 D

Dissonances in a Symphony

In any comment upon the regrettable wrath engendered in the celestial minds composing the Boston Symphony Orchestra we could wish to avoid the curse of SPORUS if possible; yet none may be quite deaf to the cacophonies resulting from the criticism of a musical gentleman's individual opinion.

At the orchestral concert in Boston on March 6 a second round of applause for a certain number led the conductor, PIERRE MONTEUX, to give a signal for the members of the orchestra to rise in acknowledgment. All stood up save FREDERIC FRADKIN, the concert master, who remained as firmly set upon his base as the rock of RODERICK DHU. Some discussion after the concert led to Mr. FRADKIN's refusal to sign an agreement forming part of the visible cohesive policy of the orchestra, whereupon the conductor dismissed the concert master. About thirty members of the orchestra protested, and declared that unless Mr. FRADKIN were reinstated they would not join in the evening's programme. So Mr. F. P. CABOT, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, announced a change in the programme to be played, whereby the concert could be given without Mr. FRADKIN and his supporters. And it was so.

Since then the blue vault of heaven has been plangent with the concussions and reverberations of language less musical than one would naturally expect from Boston musicians. The devoted thirty-five stood in unbroken phalanx with uplifted eyebrows and curling lips. The trustees of the orchestra maintained the traditions of the great house of CABOT, the air was filled with suggestions of replacing the self-conscious thirty-five with women musicians who, as women and sensible, would naturally be amenable to order and discipline.

Since the male musicians' union rules prevented recruiting any more men this suggestion of broadening the artistic field for women seemed a natural result of the trouble, because a hoary tradition of the Boston orchestra—not yet wholly dissipated by the beams of the New Day in which all human beings are equal and nobody need work unwillingly—forbade the drafting of advanced pupils from the many conservatories and music schools of Boston. It is not known that the Olive Mead quartet received overtures—or even voluntaries—from the trustees; but it is reported that the thirty-five are taking the aggressive and propose to give a concert of their own under direction of MARINUZZI of the Chicago Opera Company—now consuming lotus and lentils in Boston—with a solo performance by that distinguished prima donna and true Italian friend of freedom hailed by one of her greatest New York admirers as GALLI the Curch.

When Music, heavenly maid, was young she never got into such a scrape as all that. What wails of anguish may yet be drawn from the self-inhibited violins none can tell—what hollow, saxophonic groans may come, what thunders of Sinai may yet burst from the tormented diaphragms of the kettledrums—all these possibilities remain to rack the souls already bewildered by a civilization without either booze or a League of Nations. But we have ... thing else, and we c... that.

From
Clipper
New York City

SYMPHONY MUSICIANS STRIKE

BOSTON, March 7.—Thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra did not appear at last night's concert in accordance with their decision not to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed on Friday night for not responding to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux.

A committee of the musicians were told by Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, that Fradkin would not be reinstated. They told him that one-quarter of the orchestra would not join in the evening's program, with the result that Cabot arranged a different number of selections, to enable the concert to go on without them.

From
TRIBUNE,
New York City

MAR 1 5 1920 D

New Orchestra for Boston

Four Wealthy Society Women Back Fradkin in Project

Special Dispatch to The Tribune

BOSTON, March 15.—Frederic Fradkin, the deposed concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced to-day at a meeting of thirty-three former members of the organization that a fund of $100,000 has been offered by four wealthy society women for the purpose of starting a new symphony orchestra here.

It is predicted that when the contracts of other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra expire at the close of the present season they will sign up with the new aggregation, which will by that time be fully organized and in a position to arrange for acquiring its personnel for next season.

Programs for Two Boston Symphony Concerts Changed

Owing to the disrupted condition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because of the recent strike, which grew out of the differences between conductor Pierre Monteux and the former concert-master Frederic Fradkin, it has been necessary to make a change in the programs for the New York concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The revised programs will be as follows: Thursday evening, Beethoven, Symphony No. 4 in B flat major, Op. 60, Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," excerpts from Act III of "The Mastersingers"; Saturday afternoon, Beethoven, Overture to "Fidelio," Mozart, Symphony in G minor (Koch 550), Borodin, "On the Steppe ... Asia," Debussy, Petite Suit

ss New York City

Symphony Pickets Thrown from Hall

BOSTON, Saturday.—Six pickets, the members of the newly formed union, were unceremoniously hustled from the stage entrance of Symphony Hall today when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was in rehearsal. The Lambs and the Actors' Equity Association have expressed their sympathy for the strikers and will assist in a benefit performance.

Judge F. P. Cabot, president of the Symphony trustees, announced that the thirty-two players who went on strike have been discharged from the organization and that the concerts scheduled for Boston and elsewhere would be given.

The benefit concert is being arranged for a week from Sunday night by Mr. William G. Dodge, personal representative of President Webber, of the American Federation of Musicians. He is in touch with the Lambs and the Actors' Equity Association, and through these organizations a number of prominent stars are to appear at the concert, to be conducted by Emil Mollenhauer.

In addition to the concert by the strikers the programme provides for a violin solo by Frederic Fradkin, the dismissed concert master.

An offer of $5,000 to finance a series of "small time" concerts by the thirty-two former members of the Symphony was made today by a prominent local amateur musician.

The Executive Board of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employes held a meeting today and unanimously indorsed the strike. It was voted to give all possible assistance.

No information has been received regarding the method of filling the vacant places in the orchestra. Trustees refused to comment on the probability that women would be offered the chance of joining the famous musical organization. The rumor persists that women have been engaged.

... owner of an orchestra or of any oth...
...atter ceases to run things and permit...
..., it is time for him to go out of busin...
... the man who owns anything cannot run it himself, ...
surely would not wish the men he hires to work for him to ... boss things. Take the case of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for example. There are men at The Hub who have put considerable money into it and who give concerts in Boston and New York and other cities. The chief owner of this amusement enterprise is Mr. Cabot. One of his employees was Frederic Fradkin, who acted as concert master, working under orders of Pierre Monteux, the leader. Fradkin refused to obey an order of Monteux, his chief, and was discharged. Thirty musicians went on a strike and notified President Cabot that they would not appear at the concert scheduled to be given Saturday in Boston unless Fradkin was reinstated. That is these thirty men made the impudent demand that they be permitted to run the orchestra in which they were paid to play. Their demand was promptly refused and they announced again that they would not play.
It made little difference, as there were 90 musicians left who would play, and four score and ten men can make a lot of noise on wind and stringed instruments, no counting the drums and cymbals. The program was rearranged and the 90 men went ahead and gave a satisfying concert. It is something to be wondered at, however, that 30 men in an orchestra of 120 would have the appalling nerve to un-take the run the whole business and dictate to the men who

INFORMATION OBSCURED

GREAT MUSICAL WEEK BEGINS
SOLOISTS OF FIRST MAGNITU

by that organization under the Monteux or any other conductor.

Tetrazzini, Ruffo, Fitziu and Whitehill the Singers at Hippodrome This Afternoon and Evening. Fritz Kreisler and Jascha Heifetz in Great Programs.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS WELCOME

"Ruddigore" at Park Theatre Continues to Crowded Audiences. Frank Moulan, Craig Campbell and William Danforth a Comic Trinity.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

TETRAZZINI, greatest of living sopranі, with Clarence Whitehill, American baritone of the Metropolitan on her program, will be at the Hippodrome this afternoon; and this evening at the same famous concert hall Titta Ruffo, the world's greatest baritone, with Anna Fitziu, American soprano, or the Chicago Opera Company, will be heard. It is a fortuitous and significant beginning for a week that brings another succession of symphony concerts, a dozen eminent pianists, a squad of solo violinists led by Kreisler and Heifetz and a procession of the established stars and favorite operas at the Metropolitan.

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Pierre Monteux conducting will enrich the musical store of the current week and focussing the attention of the local followers of the great Boston organization upon the internal troubles which within the past fortnight have come near to disrupting the famous orchestra. Boston is yet talking about the unionizing of their precious symphony and the turmoil over the dismissal of Concertmaster Fradkin has not subsided there nor here, neither, since every friend and factor of symphonic music is keenly in sympathy with the unforseen and wholly non-professional difficulties which have suddenly confronted Conductor Monteux. It was the irony of cruel fate, too, that the the outbreak of insubordination in the Boston orchestra should have occurred at a concert which was being hailed as the biggest and most emphatic artistic success ever achieved

From HERALD
Address New York City MAR 7
Date

30 LOCKED OUT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

They Insisted on Reinstatement of Concert Master.

BOSTON, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for to-night's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's programme Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall before the concert but was told that he would not be allowed to take part.

From WORLD,
New York City

SYMPHONY ARTISTS STRIKE.

Part of Boston Orchestra Demands Concert Master's Reinstatement.

BOSTON, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for to-night's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Board of Trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's programme, Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall before the concert, but was told he would not be allowed to take part.

From EVENING WORLD,
New York City

Labor Backs Musicians.

BOSTON, March 8.—The Central Labor Union passed resolutions yesterday asking the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to reinstate Frederic Fradkin, concert master, who was dismissed for failure to acknowledge applause. The resolutions also ask for the recognition of the union of Symphony players.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
MAR 11 1920 K

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY GET WOMEN MUSICIANS

BOSTON, March 11.—Developments in the trouble between the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the thirty-five members who struck on the eve of last Saturday night's concert include the refusal of the thirty-five to have anything more to do with the orchestra save as full-fledged union members under full union conditions; the likelihood of the trustees being compelled to recruit players to fill the vacancies from the ranks of women musicians, owing to the union's hostility preventing available men from accepting positions with the orchestra, and a statement by the trustees to symphoy concert patrons setting forth their side of the controversy.

TELEGRAM
New York City
MAR 14 1920 L

With Orchestras and Their Conductors

Coming for its last pair of concerts this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Pierre Monteux, will play in Carnegie Hall Thursday night John Alden Carpenter's concertino for piano and orchestra with E. Robert Schmitz as soloist. Other numbers will be Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony and the "Flying Dutchman" overture. Saturday afternoon the final programme will be played, at which will be heard "The Pauses of Silence," seven symphonic impressions by Malipiero, a young Italian composer; Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture, Mozart's symphony in G major and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

TELEGRAM
New York City
MAR - 8 1920 L

Boston Orchestra Backed by Labo

BOSTON, Monday.—The Central Labor Union has passed resolutions asking the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to reinstate Frederic Fradkin, concert master, who was dismissed for failure to acknowledge applause. The resolutions also ask for the recognition of the union of Symphony players.

They assert that the trustees "by their hasty and arbitrary action have not only threatened the dissolution of a world famous orchestra, but have violated the principle of free organization, which lies at the basis of Americanism and all true democracy, and have offered an insult to organized labor in Boston and throughout the country."

EVENING SUN
New York City
MAR - 8 1920 D

UNION APPEALS TO ORCHESTRA.

Wants Boston Symphony to Reinstate Concert Master.

BOSTON, March 8.—A resolution has been sent to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the Central Labor Union in which the union requests that Frederic Fradkin, concert master, be reinstated. The orchestra dismissed him for not acknowledging applause.

TELEGRAM
New York City
MAR - 6 1920 L

Boston Orchestra Dismiss Fradkin

BOSTON, Saturday.—Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the Board of Trustees early today.

In a letter to Fradkin Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, said the dismissal came because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

Fradkin did not rise at the concert when Pierre Monteux, conductor, motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause after the playing of a symphony. A few persons in the audience hissed when Fradkin remained seated.

In explaining his failure to rise, Mr. Fradkin said that he considered the applause was meant for the conductor and not for himself.

From PIONEER PRESS
Address: St. Paul, Minn.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Courier
BUFFALO N.Y.

MUSICIANS PLAY NO MORE UNTIL FELLOW RETURNS

Boston, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for tonight's concert. Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra membership would not join in the evening's programme, Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them. Fradkin appeared at Symphony hall before the concert, but was told that he would not be allowed to take part.

TELEGRAM
New York City
MAR 1 1920 L

Boston Symphony Is Practically Unionized

(Special to the Evening Telegram.)

BOSTON, Sunday.—A general increase in the minimum wages paid to musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be put into effect as soon as the $2,000,000 endowment fund is raised.

Judge Frederic P. Cabot, president of the trustees, made this announcement. He said that the players have been informed repeatedly that the trustees desire to be as liberal as possible, but that further increases could not be made until greater income was provided for. The price of seats is also likely to be increased, he said.

The union men claim that seventy-four of the ninety-four members of the orchestra are now affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians. Fifty-four of them have joined the Boston local. As soon as existing contracts of some of the union men in the orchestra expire, they will not be permitted to continue playing with a non-union orchestra. The union men still playing can have their contracts annulled by paying $200.

Arthur Berenson, counsel for the union members, has been invited to give his version of the controversy next Thursday before the Women's League for Democratic Freedom, in Pilgrim Hall, and before the Forum of the Clarendon Street Baptist Church on Wednesday evening.

Announcement was made that a leading conductor and composer has volunteered his services in a series of concerts planned by the striking players. A telegram was received from the manager of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, stating that he is prepared to employ the men now out. A representative of a booking agency also offered to engage the men.

It was stated that Frederic Fradkin, deposed concert master, has been ostracised by the Harvard Musical Association, which cancelled an engagement made with him. The cancellation was accompanied by a forfeiture check.

TELEGRAM
New York City
MAR - 8 1920 L

Boston Symphony Is Practically Unionized

BOSTON, Monday.—The Central Labor Union has passed resolutions asking the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to reinstate Frederic Fradkin, concert master, who was dismissed for failure to acknowledge applause. The resolutions also ask for the recognition of the union of Symphony players.

They assert that the trustees "by their hasty and arbitrary action have not only threatened the dissolution of a world famous orchestra, but have violated the principle of free organization, which lies at the basis of Americanism and all true democracy, and have offered an insult to organized labor in Boston and throughout the country."

EVENING SUN
New York City
MAR - 6 1920 D

FRADKIN OUT OF ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Dismisses Concert Master.

BOSTON, March 6.—Frederick Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the board of trustees last night. Reason for the dismissal was given Fradkin's failure to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

Fradkin failed to rise when Conductor Pierre Monteux motioned the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause. He said he considered the applause as meant for the conductor and not himself.

Correll to Speak at St. Agnes's.

TELEGRAM
New York City
MAR 13 1920 D

35 ORCHESTRA MEMBERS QUIT

Boston Symphony Trustees Oust Fradkin for Refusal to Bow—Friends Strike.

(Special to the Evening Telegram.)

BOSTON, Mass., Sunday.—Despite the inconvenience occasioned by the refusal of thirty-five players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to appear upon the stage in Symphony Hall unless the management reinstated Concert Master Frederic Fradkin, dismissed Friday night for disobedience to Conductor Monteux during the Friday afternoon concert, a successful concert, with a changed programme, was given here. The orchestra was reduced to fifty-three players, and was under the direction of Conductor Pierre Monteux.

Fradkin, whose dismissal by the trustees was the direct result of his refusal to rise and bow with the other musicians on Friday afternoon when signalled to do so by the conductor, appeared at the hall at the usual time and offered his services to the management in his customary capacity. He was informed that he was no longer a member of the orchestra.

Some thirty-five members then refused to go on the platform. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, made the announcement that because of their attitude and the resultant curtailment of the orchestra, it would be necessary to change the programme to suit the situation.

Conductor Monteux's appearance, together with that of Judge Cabot, was greeted with thunderous applause from the audience, which rose to its feet the moment the conductor stepped into view. Throughout the concert the applause was unusual in its enthusiasm. The audience demonstrated in every possible way the fact that its sympathies are with the conductor and the loyal members of the orchestra.

The orchestra, now facing the possibility of losing many of its best players, may also lose through the strike the prestige of being the "best symphony orchestra in America," as many of the players have offers to go to orchestras

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

OSTON SYMPHONY LEADER DISMISSE

Frederick Fradkin Dropped by Trustees—Failed to Keep Agreement, Is Charge.

BOSTON, March 6.—Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the board of trustees last night.

In a letter of Fradkin, Frederic P. Cabot, president of the trustees, said the dismissal came because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon.

Fradkin did not rise at the concert when Conductor Pierre Monteux motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause after the playing of a symphony. A few persons in the audience hissed when Fradkin remained seated.

In explaining his failure to rise, Mr. Fradkin said that he considered the applause was meant for the conductor and not for himself.

A controversy between members of the orchestra and the trustees concerning salary increases, resulting in an announcement that many members of the orchestra had affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians, came to a head at a concert last night when Conductor Monteux is said to have refused Fradkin the use of his dressing room.

The president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., begins with the sentence: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra is going to carry on the purpose, standards and ideals for which it was founded and for which it has been sustained."

EVENING SUN
New York City
MAR 13 1920 D

Troublous and trembling are these days in the plans of operatic and symphonic orchestras. The series of the various symphonies are drawing to a close; the Philadelphians are already through with their season's visits to New York, the Bostonians finish here during the next week. The local orchestras, too, speak in their announcements of their last or their next to last appearances. And even the close of the Metropolitan season, which always punctuates the final word of springtime, is only little more than a month away.

It is harder to appreciate, therefore, why all these flares of argument and discontent should suddenly burst out in different cities just when the end is in full sight. But it is equally hard to imagine that these difficulties will not be overcome and tamped into ready shape over the summer.

Boston will have a more difficult time of it, perhaps. The insurgents from that symphony orchestra print a story to the effect that they are to give concerts on their own account, and near it in the news columns is the hint that, if necessary, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will replace them with women. The Bostonians, when

From Times
New York City

THIRTY ORCHESTRA MEN DECLINE TO PLAY

Refusal to Reinstate Boston Concert Master Causes Break in Organization.

BOSTON, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for tonight's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Board of Trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's programme, Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall before the concert, but was told he would not be allowed to take part.

Address New York City
Date MAR 13 1920

CHESTRA PICKETING BARRED

ston Symphony Strikers Ordered to Keep Moving.

OSTON, March 13.—Dismissed members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are prevented by the police from picketing the stage entrance of Symphony Hall. Six pickets turned up at rehearsal time yesterday, but were ordered to keep moving.

The strikers have arranged for

It is now learned that Major Henry Lee Higginson willed his library of music to the Boston Symphony orchestra, of which he was principal patron up to the time of the Muck episode. The legacy comprises scores used by the orchestra, also musical instruments.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From

ORCHESTRA JOINS UNION

Boston Symphony Served Ultimatum on Trustees.

BOSTON, Friday, Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under [illegible] by a committee of the musicians.

New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY TURNING

BOSTON, Feb. 16.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000 has been refused. This organization, one of the largest of its kind in the country, has, since its formation, been blacklisted by the union.

Judge Frederick P. Camot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, has made public the statement that the question of union membership was not an issue between players and management, although recognition of a union has been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who would play with the orchestra and under what conductorship.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

GREAT MUSICAL WEEK BEGINS SOLOISTS OF FIRST MAGNITU

Tetrazzini, Ruffo, Fitziu and Whitehill the Singers at Hippodrome This Afternoon and Evening. Fritz Kreisler and Jascha Heifetz in Great Programs.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS WELCOME

"Ruddigore" at Park Theatre Continues to Crowded Audiences. Frank Moulan, Craig Campbell and William Danforth a Comic Trinity.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

TETRAZZINI, greatest of living soprani, with Clarence Whitehill, American baritone of the Metropolitan on her program, will be at the Hippodrome this afternoon; and this evening at the same famous concert hall Titta Ruffo, the world's greatest baritone, with Anna Fitziu, American soprano, or the Chicago Opera Company, will be heard. It is a fortuitous and significant beginning for a week that brings another succession of symphony concerts, a dozen eminent pianists, a squad of solo violinists led by Kreisler and Heifetz and a procession of the established stars and favorite operas at the Metropolitan.

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Pierre Monteux conducting will enrich the musical store of the current week and focussing the attention of the local followers of the great Boston organization upon the internal troubles which within the past fortnight have come near to disrupting the famous orchestra. Boston is yet talking about the unionizing of their precious symphony and the turmoil over the dismissal of Concertmaster Fradkin has not subsided there nor here, neither, since every friend and factor of symphonic music is keenly in sympathy with the unforseen and wholly non-professional difficulties which have suddenly confronted Conductor Monteux. It was the irony of cruel fate, too, that the the outbreak of insubordination in the Boston orchestra should have occurred at a concert which was being hailed as the biggest and most emphatic artistic success ever achieved

TELEGRAM
New York City

35 ORCHESTRA MEMBERS QUIT

Boston Symphony Trustees Oust Fradkin for Refusal to Bow—Friends Strike.

(Special to the Evening Telegram.)

BOSTON, Mass., Sunday.—Despite the inconvenience occasioned by the refusal of thirty-five players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to appear upon the stage in Symphony Hall unless the management reinstated Concert Master Frederic Fradkin, dismissed Friday night for disobedience to Conductor Monteux during the Friday afternoon concert, a successful concert, with a changed programme, was given here. The orchestra was reduced to fifty-three players, and was under the direction of Conductor Pierre Monteux.

Fradkin, whose dismissal by the trustees was the direct result of his refusal to rise and bow with the other musicians on Friday afternoon when signalled to do so by the conductor, appeared at the hall at the usual time and offered his services to the management in his customary capacity. He was informed that he was no longer a member of the orchestra.

Some thirty-five members then refused to go on the platform. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, made the announcement that because of their attitude and the resultant curtailment of the orchestra, it would be necessary to change the programme to suit the situation.

Conductor Monteux's appearance, together with that of Judge Cabot, was greeted with thunderous applause from the audience, which rose to its feet the moment the conductor stepped into view. Throughout the concert the applause was unusual in its enthusiasm. The audience demonstrated in every possible way the fact that its sympathies are with the conductor and the loyal members of the orchestra.

The orchestra, now facing the possibility of losing many of its best players, may also lose through the strike the prestige of being the "best symphony orchestra in America," as many of the players have offers to go to orchestras in other cities.

Troublous and trembling are these days in the plans of operatic and symphonic orchestras. The series of the various symphonics are drawing to a close; the Philadelphians are already through with their season's visits to New York, the Bostonians finish here during the next week. The local orchestras, too, speak in their announcements of their last or their next to last appearances. And even the close of the Metropolitan season, which always punctuates the final word of springtime, is only little more than a month away.

It is harder to appreciate, therefore, why all these flares of argument and discontent should suddenly burst out in different cities just when the end is in full sight. But it is equally hard to imagine that these difficulties will not be overcome and tamped into ready shape over the summer.

Boston will have a more difficult time of it, perhaps. The insurgents from that symphony orchestra print a story to the effect that they are to give concerts on their own account, and near it in the news columns is the hint that, if necessary, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will replace them with women. The Bostonians, when

by that organization under the b
Monteux or any other conductor.

TELEGRAM
New York City

With Orchestras and Their Conductors

Coming for its last pair of concerts this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Pierre Monteux, will play in Carnegie Hall Thursday night John Alden Carpenter's concertino for piano and orchestra, with E. Robert Schmitz as soloist. Other numbers will be Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony and the "Flying Dutchman" overture. Saturday afternoon the final programme will be played, at which will be heard "The Pauses of Silence," seven symphonic impressions by Malipiero, a young Italian composer; Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture, Mozart's symphony in G major and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

TELEGRAM
New York City

Boston Symphony Is Practically Unionized

(Special to the Evening Telegram.)

BOSTON, Sunday.—A general increase in the minimum wages paid to musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be put into effect as soon as the $3,000,000 endowment fund is raised.

Judge Frederic P. Cabot, president of the trustees, made this announcement. He said that the players have been informed repeatedly that the trustees desire to be as liberal as possible, but that further increases could not be made until greater income was provided for. The price of seats is also likely to be increased, he said.

The union men claim that seventy-four of the ninety-four members of the orchestra are now affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians. Fifty-four of them have joined the Boston local. As soon as existing contracts of some of the union men in the orchestra expire, they will not be permitted to continue playing with a non-union orchestra. The union men still playing can have their contracts annulled by paying $200.

Arthur Berenson, counsel for the union members, has been invited to give his version of the controversy next Thursday before the Women's League for Democratic Freedom, in Pilgrim Hall, and before the Forum of the Clarendon Street Baptist Church on Wednesday evening.

Announcement was made that a leading conductor and composer has volunteered his services in a series of concerts planned by the striking players. A telegram was received from the manager of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, stating that he is prepared to employ the men now out. A representative of a booking agency also offered to engage the men.

It was stated that Frederic Fradkin, deposed concert master, has been ostracised by the Harvard Musical Association, which cancelled an engagement made with him. The cancellation was accompanied by a forfeiture check.

EVENING SUN
New York City
MAR 13 1920 D

From HERALD
Address New York City MAR 7
Date

30 LOCKED OUT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

They Insisted on Reinstatement of Concert Master.

BOSTON, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for to-night's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's programme Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall before the concert but was told that he would not be allowed to take part.

TELEGRAM
New York City

Boston Orchestra Backed by Labo

BOSTON, Monday.—The Central Labor Union has passed resolutions asking the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to reinstate Frederic Fradkin concert master, who was dismissed for failure to acknowledge applause. The resolutions also ask for the recognition of the union of Symphony players.

They assert that the trustees "by their hasty and arbitrary action have not only threatened the dissolution of a world famous orchestra, but have violated the principle of free organization, which lies at the basis of Americanism and all true democracy, and have offered an insult to organized labor in Boston and throughout the country."

EVENING SUN
New York City

FRADKIN OUT OF ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Dismisses Con cert Master.

BOSTON, March 6.—Frederick Fra kin, concert master of the Boston Sym phony Orchestra, was dismissed the board of trustees last night. Re son for the dismissal was given Fradkin's failure to keep his writt agreement in that he did not comp with the instructions of the conduct in reference to his deportment a order at the public rehearsal this ternoon."

Fradkin failed to rise when C ductor Pierre Monteux motioned the orchestra to stand in acknowle ment of applause. He said he co sidered the applause as meant for the conductor and not himself.

Correll to Speak at St. Agnes's.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

OSTON SYMPHONY LEADER DISMISSE

Frederick Fradkin Dropped by Trustees—Failed to Keep Agreement, Is Charge.

BOSTON, March 6.—Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the board of trustees last night.

In a letter of Fradkin, Frederic P. Cabot, president of the trustees, said the dismissal came because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon.

Fradkin did not rise at the concert when Conductor Pierre Monteux motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause after the playing of a symphony. A few persons in the audience hissed when Fradkin remained seated.

In explaining his failure to rise, Mr. Fradkin said that he considered the applause was meant for the conductor and not for himself.

A controversy between members of the orchestra and the trustees concerning salary increases, resulting in an announcement that many members of the orchestra had affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians, came to a head at a concert last night when Conductor Monteux is said to have refused Fradkin the use of his dressing room.

From the president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., begins with the intence: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra is going to carry on the purpose, standards and ideals for which it was founded and for which it has been sustained."

From WORLD,
New York City

SYMPHONY ARTISTS STRIKE.

Part of Boston Orchestra Demands Concert Master's Reinstatement.

BOSTON, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for to-night's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Board of Trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's programme, Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall before the concert, but was told he would not be allowed to take part.

EVENING SUN
New York City

UNION APPEALS TO ORCHESTRA.

Wants Boston Symphony to Reinstate Concert Master.

BOSTON, March 8.—A resolution has been sent to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the Central Labor Union in which the union requests that Frederic Fradkin, concert master, be reinstated. The orchestra dismissed him for not acknowledging applause.

TELEGRAM
New York City

Boston Orchestra Dismiss Fradkin

BOSTON, Saturday.—Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the Board of Trustees early today.

In a letter to Fradkin Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, said the dismissal came because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

Fradkin did not rise at the concert when Pierre Monteux, conductor, motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause after the playing of a symphony. A few persons in the audience hissed when Fradkin remained seated.

In explaining his failure to rise, Mr. Fradkin said that he considered the applause was meant for the conductor and not for himself.

Times
New York City

THIRTY ORCHESTRA MEN DECLINE TO PLAY

Refusal to Reinstate Boston Concert Master Causes Break in Organization.

BOSTON, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for tonight's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Board of Trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's programme, Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall before the concert, but was told he would not be allowed to take part.

Address New York City
Date

CHESTRA PICKETING BARRED

ston Symphony Strikers Ordered to Keep Moving.

OSTON, March 13.—Dismissed mem
s of the Boston Symphony Orches are prevented by the police from cketing the stage entrance of Sym ony Hall. Six pickets turned up a hearsal time yesterday, but were or ed to keep moving.

The strikers have arranged for oncert to be given

From EVENING WORLD,
New York City

Labor Backs Musicians.

BOSTON, March 8.—The Central Labor Union passed resolutions yesterday asking the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to reinstate Frederic Fradkin, concert master, who was dismissed for failure to acknowledge applause. The resolutions also ask for the recognition of the union of Symphony players.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY GET WOMEN MUSICIANS

BOSTON, March 11.—Developments in the trouble between the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the thirty-five members who struck on the eve of last Saturday night's concert include the refusal of the thirty-five to have anything more to do with the orchestra save as full-fledged union members under full union conditions; the likelihood of the trustees being compelled to recruit players to fill the vacancies from the ranks of women musicians, owing to the union's hostility preventing available men from accepting positions with the orchestra, and a statement by the trustees to symphoy concert patrons setting forth their side of the controversy.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Courier
BUFFALO N. Y.

MUSICIANS PLAY NO MORE UNTIL FELLOW RETURNS

Boston, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for tonight's concert. Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra membership would not join in the evening's programme, Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them. Fradkin appeared at Symphony hall before the concert, but was told that he would not be allowed to take part.

om PIONEER PRESS
dress: St. Paul, Minn.

It is now learned that Major Henry Lee Higginson willed his library of music to the Boston Symphony orchestra, of which he was principal patron up to the time of the Muck episode. The legacy comprises scores used by the orchestra, also musical instruments.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

ORCHESTRA JOINS UNION

Boston Symphony Serves Ultimatum on Trustees.

BOSTON, Friday, Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under conditions, according to a compact signed by a committee of Nine.

New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY TURNING

BOSTON, Feb. 16.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000 has been refused. This organization, one of the largest of its kind in the country, has, since its formation, been blacklisted by the union.

Judge Frederick P. Camot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, has made public the statement that the question of union membership was not an issue between players and management, although recognition of a union has been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who would play with the orchestra and under what conductorship.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

GREAT MUSICAL WEEK BEGINS SOLOISTS OF FIRST MAGNITU

by that organization under the h
Monteux or any other conductor.

Tetrazzini, Ruffo, Fitziu and Whitehill the Singers at Hippodrome This Afternoon and Evening. Fritz Kreisler and Jascha Heifetz in Great Programs.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS WELCOME

"Ruddigore" at Park Theatre Continues to Crowded Audiences. Frank Moulan, Craig Campbell and William Danforth a Comic Trinity.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

TETRAZZINI, greatest of living soprani, with Clarence Whitehill, American baritone of the Metropolitan on her program, will be at the Hippodrome this afternoon; and this evening at the same famous concert hall Titta Ruffo, the world's greatest baritone, with Anna Fitziu, American soprano, or the Chicago Opera Company, will be heard. It is a fortuitous and significant beginning for a week that brings another succession of symphony concerts, a dozen eminent pianists, a squad of solo violinists led by Kreisler and Heifetz and a procession of the established stars and favorite operas at the Metropolitan.

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Pierre Monteux conducting will enrich the musical store of the current week and focussing the attention of the local followers of the great Boston organization upon the internal troubles which within the past fortnight have come near to disrupting the famous orchestra. Boston is yet talking about the unionizing of their precious symphony and the turmoil over the dismissal of Concertmaster Fradkin has not subsided here nor here, neither, since every friend and factor of symphonic music is keenly in sympathy with the unforseen and wholly non-professional difficulties which have suddenly confronted Conductor Monteux. It was the irony of cruel fate, too, that the the outbreak of insubordination in the Boston orchestra should have occurred at a concert which was being hailed as the biggest and most emphatic artistic success ever achieved

TELEGRAM
New York City

35 ORCHESTRA MEMBERS QUIT

Boston Symphony Trustees Oust Fradkin for Refusal to Bow—Friends Strike.

(Special to the Evening Telegram.)

BOSTON, Mass., Sunday.—Despite the inconvenience occasioned by the refusal of thirty-five players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to appear upon the stage in Symphony Hall unless the management reinstated Concert Master Fradkin, dismissed Friday night for disobedience to Conductor Monteux during the Friday afternoon concert, a successful concert, with a changed programme, was given here. The orchestra was reduced to fifty-three players, and was under the direction of Conductor Pierre Monteux.

Fradkin, whose dismissal by the trustees was the direct result of his refusal to rise and bow with the other musicians on Friday afternoon when signalled to do so by the conductor, appeared at the hall at the usual time and offered his services to the management in his customary capacity. He was informed that he was no longer a member of the orchestra.

Some thirty-five members then refused to go on the platform. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, made the announcement that because of their attitude and the resultant curtailment of the orchestra, it would be necessary to change the programme to suit the situation.

Conductor Monteux's appearance, together with that of Judge Cabot, was greeted with thunderous applause from the audience, which rose to its feet the moment the conductor stepped into view. Throughout the concert the applause was unusual in its enthusiasm. The audience demonstrated in every possible way the fact that its sympathies are with the conductor and the loyal members of the orchestra.

The orchestra, now facing the possibility of losing many of its best players, may also lose through the strike the prestige of being the "best symphony orchestra in America," as many of the players have offers to go to orchestras in other cities.

TELEGRAM
New York City

With Orchestras and Their Conductors

Coming for its last pair of concerts this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Pierre Monteux, will play in Carnegie Hall Thursday night John Alden Carpenter's concertino for piano and orchestra, with E. Robert Schmitz as soloist. Other numbers will be Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony and the "Flying Dutchman" overture. Saturday afternoon the final programme will be played, at which will be heard "The Pauses of Silence," seven symphonic impressions by Malipiero, a young Italian composer; Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture, Mozart's symphony in G major and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

TELEGRAM
New York City

Boston Symphony Is Practically Unionized

(Special to the Evening Telegram.)

BOSTON, Sunday.—A general increase in the minimum wages paid to musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be put into effect as soon as the $3,000,000 endowment fund is raised.

Judge Frederic P. Cabot, president of the trustees, made this announcement. He said that the players have been informed repeatedly that the trustees desire to be as liberal as possible, but that further increases could not be made until greater income was provided for. The price of seats is also likely to be increased, he said.

The union men claim that seventy-four of the ninety-four members of the orchestra are now affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians. Fifty-four of them have joined the Boston local. As soon as existing contracts of some of the union men in the orchestra expire, they will not be permitted to continue playing with a non-union orchestra. The union men still playing can have their contracts annulled by paying $200.

Arthur Berenson, counsel for the union members, has been invited to give his version of the controversy next Thursday before the Women's League for Democratic Freedom, in Pilgrim Hall, and before the Forum of the Clarendon Street Baptist Church on Wednesday evening.

Announcement was made that a leading conductor and composer has volunteered his services in a series of concerts planned by the striking players. A telegram was received from the manager of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, stating that he is prepared to employ the men now out. A representative of a booking agency also offered to engage the men.

It was stated that Frederic Fradkin, deposed concert master, has been ostracised by the Harvard Musical Association, which cancelled an engagement made with him. The cancellation was accompanied by a forfeiture check.

EVENING SUN
New York City
MAR 13 1920 D

Troublous and trembling are these days in the plans of operatic and symphonic orchestras. The series of the various symphonies are drawing to a close; the Philadelphians are already through with their season's visits to New York, the Bostonians finish here during the next week. The local orchestras, too, speak in their announcements of their last or their next to last appearances. And even the close of the Metropolitan season, which always punctuates the final word of springtime, is only little more than a month away.

It is harder to appreciate, therefore, why all these flares of argument and discontent should suddenly burst out in different cities just when the end is in full sight. But it is equally hard to imagine that these difficulties will not be overcome and tamped into ready shape over the summer.

Boston will have a more difficult time of it, perhaps. The insurgents from that symphony orchestra print a story to the effect that they are to give concerts on their own account, and near it in the news columns is the hint that, if necessary, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will replace them with women. The Bostonians, wher

From HERALD
Address New York City MAR 7
Date

30 LOCKED OUT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

They Insisted on Reinstatement of Concert Master.

BOSTON, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for to-night's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's programme Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall before the concert but was told that he would not be allowed to take part.

TELEGRAM
New York City

Boston Orchestra Backed by Labo

BOSTON, Monday.—The Central Labor Union has passed resolutions asking the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to reinstate Frederic Fradkin, concert master, who was dismissed for failure to acknowledge applause. The resolutions also ask for the recognition of the union of Symphony players.

They assert that the trustees "by their hasty and arbitrary action have not only threatened the dissolution of a world famous orchestra, but have violated the principle of free organization, which lies at the basis of Americanism and all true democracy, and have offered an insult to organized labor in Boston and throughout the country."

EVENING SUN
New York City

FRADKIN OUT OF ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Dismisses Concert Master.

BOSTON, March 6.—Frederick Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the board of trustees last night. Reason for the dismissal was given Fradkin's failure to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

Fradkin failed to rise when Conductor Pierre Monteux motioned the orchestra to stand in acknowlement of applause. He said he considered the applause as meant for the conductor and not himself.

Correll to Speak at St. Agnes's.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

OSTON SYMPHONY LEADER DISMISSE

Frederick Fradkin Dropped by Trustees—Failed to Keep Agreement, Is Charge.

BOSTON, March 6.—Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the board of trustees last night.

In a letter of Fradkin, Frederic P. Cabot, president of the trustees, said the dismissal came because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon.

Fradkin did not rise at the concert when Conductor Pierre Monteux motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause after the playing of a symphony. A few persons in the audience hissed when Fradkin remained seated.

In explaining his failure to rise, Mr. Fradkin said that he considered the applause was meant for the conductor and not for himself.

...turn into the broad, new I...
...sportation. From all direct...
...g New York's great attrac...

they play here next Thursday night and Saturday afternoon, will probably be a curtailed organization, unless some sudden substitutions are effected. And meanwhile a statement from the president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., begins with the intence: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra is going to carry on the purpose, standards and ideals for which it was founded and for which it has been sustained."

From WORLD,
New York City

SYMPHONY ARTISTS STRIKE.

Part of Boston Orchestra Demands Concert Master's Reinstatement.

BOSTON, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for to-night's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Board of Trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's programme, Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall before the concert, but was told he would not be allowed to take part.

EVENING SUN
New York City

UNION APPEALS TO ORCHESTRA.

Wants Boston Symphony to Reinstate Concert Master.

BOSTON, March 8.—A resolution has been sent to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the Central Labor Union in which the union requests that Frederic Fradkin, concert master, be reinstated. The orchestra dismissed him for not acknowledging applause.

TELEGRAM
New York City

Boston Orchestra Dismiss Fradkin

BOSTON, Saturday.—Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the Board of Trustees early today.

In a letter to Fradkin Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, said the dismissal came because "Fradkin had failed to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

Fradkin did not rise at the concert when Pierre Monteux, conductor, motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause after the playing of a symphony. A few persons in the audience hissed when Fradkin remained seated.

In explaining his failure to rise, Mr. Fradkin said that he considered the applause was meant for the conductor and not for himself.

Times
New York City

THIRTY ORCHESTRA MEN DECLINE TO PLAY

Refusal to Reinstate Boston Concert Master Causes Break in Organization.

BOSTON, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for tonight's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Board of Trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's programme, Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall before the concert, but was told he would not be allowed to take part.

Address New York City
Date

ORCHESTRA PICKETING BARRED

Boston Symphony Strikers Ordered to Keep Moving.

BOSTON, March 13.—Dismissed members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are prevented by the police from picketing the stage entrance of Symphony Hall. Six pickets turned up at rehearsal time yesterday, but were ordered to keep moving.

The strikers have arranged for a concert to be given [illegible]

From EVENING WORLD,
New York City

Labor Backs Musicians.

BOSTON, March 8.—The Central Labor Union passed resolutions yesterday asking the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to reinstate Frederic Fradkin, concert master, who was dismissed for failure to acknowledge applause. The resolutions also ask for the recognition of the union of Symphony players.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY GET WOMEN MUSICIANS

BOSTON, March 11.—Developments in the trouble between the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the thirty-five members who struck on the eve of last Saturday night's concert include the refusal of the thirty-five to have anything more to do with the orchestra save as full-fledged union members under full union conditions; the likelihood of the trustees being compelled to recruit players to fill the vacancies from the ranks of women musicians, owing to the union's hostility preventing available men from accepting positions with the orchestra, and a statement by the trustees to symphoy concert patrons setting forth their side of the controversy.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Courier
BUFFALO, N. Y.

MUSICIANS PLAY NO MORE UNTIL FELLOW RETURNS

Boston, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for tonight's concert. Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's programme, Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them. Fradkin appeared at Symphony hall before the concert, but was told that he would not be allowed to take part.

om PIONEER PRESS
dress: St. Paul, Minn.
te

It is now learned that Major Henry Lee Higginson willed his library of music to the Boston Symphony orchestra, of which he was principal patron up to the time of the Muck episode. The legacy comprises scores used by the orchestra, also musical instruments.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From

ORCHESTRA JOINS UNION

Boston Symphony Serves Ultimatum on Trustees.

BOSTON, Friday, Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under [illegible] by a committee of Nine.

New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY TURNING

BOSTON, Feb. 16.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000 has been refused. This organization, one of the largest of its kind in the country, has, since its formation, been blacklisted by the union.

Judge Frederick P. Camot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, has made public the statement that the question of union membership was not an issue between players and management, although recognition of a union has been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who would play with the orchestra and under what conductorship.

Trouble in Boston Orchestra

There seems to be trouble in the ...n Symphony Orchestra. The ... made a demand for increased ...s which has been refused, the ...ces of the organization stating ... they have no funds at their ...posal and that the concerts do ... now meet the expenses. The ...mbers of the orchestra appear to ...ke Monteux, though some still ...fer his predecessor, Rabaud. So ...re is division on that point. The members of the orchestra ...el that they should have a raise ... at least $1,000 per man in salary ...r next season. Judge Cabot, the ...airman of the board of trustees, ...ld the men that he would make no ...romises for the future, and would ...nly deal with each member per...onally, as his present contract ran ...ut.

You may recall that when Maj. ...ee Higginson was the sustaining ...orce of the Symphony Orchestra ...e made it a condition that none ...f the members should join the ...merican Federation of Musicians. ...ince his death I believe that some ...hirty have made application to join ...he union, and others are ready to ...o the same thing. This has an ...mportant bearing on the situation. There seems to be some feeling ...mong the members of the orches...tra, too, with regard to the recent ...mportation of three horn players ...from Holland, who are said not to ...be of the highest rank. As it is ...well known in Europe that the mem...bers of the Boston Symphony ar... nonunion, anyone coming to play ...with it charges an extra salary. It ...is, therefore, pointed out that the ...finances of the orchestra would b... ...in better shape if the members d... ...join the union.

Manager Brennan, of the orches...tra, told a number of persons, afte... the late Maj. Higginson died, an... before his will was read, that h... had left $1,000,000 for a fund t... carry on the orchestra. Therefore ... it must have been a sad blow t... him and to those interested, that the ... major left nothing at all for them.

One thing is certain. The Boston Symphony cannot exist and maintain its nobly won prestige unless it consists of first-class players. First-class players cannot live decently, even, on the old salaries. The result of this is that if the salaries are raised there will be a further deficit. Now then, the question arises, should this deficit be met by a few public-spirited people, or should it be met by the people of Boston? It seems to me that it is up to the people of Boston. How can they claim, as they do, credit for their great orchestra, if they permit a few public-spirited, wealthy people to make good the deficit all the time?

Notwithstanding earlier reports that there would be no attempt to revive the Bayreuth Festival this year, latest advices are to the effect that the Bavarian government has taken up the matter officially and appointed a commission to see if it is feasible to prepare for a Wagner Festival in the summer.

The strict seclusion in which Mme. Campanini has held herself since the death of her husband did not prevent her from hearing the concert given in Chicago recently by her famous sister, Luisa Tetrazzini. The prima donna had the happy idea of installing a dictaphone on the stage of the auditorium with connections to her sister's room in another part of the hotel, so that Mme. Campanini was able to hear her without any breach of her privacy. Music lovers will not forget that Eva Tetrazzini-Campanini was, during her operatic career, as famous as her sister now is. No less an authority than Giulio Gatti-Casazza once told us that Mme. Campanini was the finest dramatic soprano he had ever heard.

That Pierre Monteux has fulfilled all that was expected of him and more is seen in the fact that he has been engaged for three years more as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The manner in which this able French conductor has pulled together the completely disorganized body is sufficient proof of his skill.

From Variety
New York City
MAR 19 1920

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is ing business without 35 of its play This is the number who joined union and participated in the strike a meeting of the trustees it was to hold up the pay of the men and them, for not appearing at the rehe and when they refused to accept ... their contracts were canceled. ... leaves the orchestra much depleted ... numbers for the time, but steps a being taken to take it out on the ros with programs arranged accordingly

From
TRIBUNE
New York City
MAR 27 1920 D

$500,000 for New Orchestra

Boston Strikers Find Backer for Five-Year Guaranty

Special Dispatch to The Tribune

BOSTON, March 26. — The thirty-three striking Boston Symphony Orchestra players have a guaranty of $500,000 for the support of the new symphony orchestra in Boston for the next five years after its incorporation and promise of the construction of an auditorium for its concerts, according to an announcement they made to-day. The identity of the backer, it is promised, will be disclosed at the concert scheduled for Easter Sunday night.

It is expected to have the incorporation of the new orchestra completed by that time and to announce the names of the twenty-four trustees, as well as those of the general management. Enrico Caruso is expected to sing at the Easter concert.

Sponsors for the new orchestra also are going ahead with plans for a season of summer "pop" concerts to rival those annually given by the symphony orchestra.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

Weekly Comment on Things Musical in Discriminating Philadelphia

THE trouble in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which culminated last week in the dismissal of the concertmaster, Frederick Fradkin, has been of long standing, but it seems now to have broken out in a new place, as Mr. Fradkin was one of the new members and had nothing to do with the regime of Doctor Muck, which musicians regarded as the chief danger point to the well-being and harmony of the organization.

Fradkin's offense was a flagrant one, as at a concert he refused to rise and acknowledge the applause of the audience with the other members of the orchestra, when summoned to do so by the conductor, Mr. Monteux. Both audience and orchestra then took part in the tumultuous scene which followed, some applauding the concertmaster, but by far the greater number joining in a remarkable demonstration to Mr. Monteux. It was an exhibition which could hardly have been conceived as happening in the highly trained and severely disciplined Boston orchestra of a few years ago.

Fradkin's dismissal followed at a meeting of the trustees of the orchestra held the same evening, and, although there is talk of taking the matter to the courts, it is unlikely that this extreme action will follow.

THE lack of the rigid discipline necessary to a great orchestra has been apparent to an ordinarily keen musical observer ever since the directorship of the organization changed. The former conductors from Gericke, who was one of the most severe disciplinarian, down to Muck, had been able to build up and maintain a high morale among the men, ... to those who heard only an occasional concert of the orchestra as we ... in Philadelphia, seemed to disappear ... when Mr. Rabaud assumed ... and, though better now, is by ... back to the old standard.

... discipline was apparent ... the or...

last two seasons. There can be no two sides as to who was in the right in the latest row, for Mr. Fradkin, by his contract, was bound to obey the directions of the conductor, and his refusal to do so was made the official grounds for his dismissal.

The origin of the trouble between Fradkin and the conductor, it is said, was the question of the unionizing of the orchestra, always a ticklish matter between players and management. The Boston management had long fought this step successfully, but now the organization is, or soon will be, fully unionized. Just why this matter should be such a bone of contention is not quite clear to the average musical observer, as in those orchestras where it has been effected there seems to be no change in artistic achievement, nor is there likely to be as long as the union and management can confer amicably on the points at issue.

WHAT the effect will be of the dismissal of a concertmaster of a great orchestra in midseason remains to be seen. Mr. Fradkin is quoted as having said that "if the directors seek to break up the orchestra, they could not have struck upon a more effective means."

If he is correctly quoted, he takes himself far too seriously. He is a good violinist, but did not make a conspicuously successful concertmaster, two very different things, and in his first appearances here he did not seem to be at all familiar with the actual technique of his position, even in view of the fact that the string section was thoroughly experienced and well seasoned. With a lack of orchestral "routine," to use a musicians' term, that was very apparent, he did not especially adorn the chair formerly occupied by such great concertmasters as Willy Hess, Anton Witek and, the greatest of them all, Franz Kneisel.

The Boston Orchestra will probably not suffer artistically by Mr. Fradkin's departure, and the cause of discipline will be tremendously advanced. That trouble of such a serious nature could develop in the organization is a matter for wonderment, but it may be that the summary action of the board of trustees will clear the atmosphere, without which the regaining of its former position will be a long and painful process.

Concert Master Fired, Symphony Players tSrike

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, March 6.—About 30 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederick Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for tonight's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's program Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selection to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fraklin appeared at symphony hall before the concert, but was told that he would not be allowed to take part.

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

The trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra, according to the music editor of the Boston Transcript, "have reason to believe that the events of the past fortnight will bring them financial support that they might not easily have gained when the concerts were running in tranquil and prosperous course." Does this mean that the orchestra as a strike-breaking proposition has a command over the purses of wealthy Bostonians that it does not enjoy as a musical organization?

From

32 BOSTON SYMPHONY
PLAYERS REJECT TE

Vote to Hold Independent Co... Sunday Night.

Boston, Mass., March 10.—All but ... of the 35 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who refused to participate in last Saturday's concert because Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, was dismissed for refusing to obey a signal of the conductor to acknowledge applause, voted to-night not to accept the terms offered them by the Symphony Society trustees, as a condition precedent to their remainng members of the orchestra. They also voted to hold an independent concert in this city on Sunday night.

The 35 appeared at a rehearsal Monday, but were informed to-day that they would be discharged for refusing to play last Saturday unless they paid the usual forfeiture for absence and agreed to abide by principles outlined in a letter from the trustees stipulating that the conduct of the orchestra should be subject to no outside interference.

From
Providence R. I.
MAR 10 1920 A

SYMPHONY TRUSTEES' ACTION
EXPLAINED IN STATEME

Frederick P. Cabot, President of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., ... night issued a statement explaining actions of the trustees since the re... union agitation started among the me... bers of the orchestra. He pointed ... that the trustees did not feel that g... music or fair conditions to the musici... could result from the formation of ... union among the members of the orc... tra.

He said in this statement that it ... found, after consultation with the offi... of the Boston Musicians' Protective ... sociation and Mr. Webber of the Am... can Federation of Musicians, that, ... less changed, the union obligations ... came supreme, and required that inst... of the musical qualifications being fin... judged by the conductor, they were t... decided by the union."

Mr. Cabot stated that other condit... more drastic, such as contracts, the ... ing of foreign musicians and the pr... ples of the closed shop, were to he... quired by the union, although it wa... first thought that modifications migh... made. The trustees refused to co... nance such restrictments, he declare...

The final words of the statement fo... "The trustees have duties and ob... tions to the present subscribers and ... tainers and to the ever-widening g... of subscribers and sustainers who ... ready and eager to maintain the orch... tra according to its great traditions. T... trustees are going to live up to th... obligations and duties, and to carry ... the concerts, and they cannot consent ... the men assuming obligations fundame... tally inconsistent with their contracts.

From
EVENING WORLD,
New York City
MAR 12

To Beat Orchestra Strike.

BOSTON, March 12.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, depleted by a strike of one-third of its players, will be recruited to full strength in a day or two, the management said to-day. The strikers, who are forming an independent orchestra with Carmen ...

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra issued another statement to the institution's supporters on Wednesday, in which it was pointed out that the termination of Mr. Fradkin's connection with the orchestra bore no relation to his activities on behalf of the Musician's Union.

The issue between union and management has resolved itself into two distinct differences. The first concerns the au...

...ority of management, since the union ...les would place the final determination ...f what players should and should not ...e members of the orchestra with the Boston local and of the Musicians' Federation instead of with the director and management.

The second concerns pay. It is pointed out that the salary account, exclusive of the conductor's salary, has grown from $172,351 in 1914 to $224,129 a year, and that the union's present demands would involve an addition of about $100,000 a year, "an increase beyond any resources now at command."

The report has been circulated during ...week that there is a possibility that ...n players may be engaged for the ...tra in case of necessity.

From
HERALD
...dress Washington, D. C.
...te MAR 17 1920

The man who has had to bear the brunt of the controversy over management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a Cabot. It is a family that, though old is virile still, and also progressive in attitude also, Dr. Richard C. Cabot, the physician, teacher of religion and professor of social ethics at Harvard, being a living witness. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra, has ample means. His vocation is sitting day after day in the Juvenile Court of the Boston region and getting at the bottom of "cases" that if not handled wisely will develop into permanent public charges. He is not quite as busy on this job as he was a while ago, for prohibition is steadily cutting down his docket, just as it is emptying the jails, the almshouses and the houses of detention of Massachusetts. Judge Cabot is a trustee of Radcliffe College, and though comparatively youthful, has all the accomplishments of his caste, being cultivated, philanthropic and civic spirited.

From Providence
...rom
MAR 16 1920 NEWS

NEW SYMPHONY TO INCORPORAT STRIKERS

Boston, March 16.—Preliminary legal action toward the formation of a new orchestra by the strikers and other union members of the present Boston Symphony Orchestra will be made today by Attorney Arthur Berenson, counsel for the 33 musicians dismissed.

Fredric Fradkin, the discharged concertmaster, announced at a meeting of the strikers in the St. Botolph street headquarters that four Boston women had offered to subscribe $25,000 each to start a new orchestra.

The meeting appointed a committee to act with Attorney Berenson in any steps that may be necessary to a realization of the project.

Among the chief features in connection with the projected incorporation, as pointed out last night by members of the committee, are that free scholarships will be given to talented students who need assistance, and composers, the conductor and all players will be Americans. The new organization, it was said, is assured of the services as a permanent leader of "the most gifted composer and conductor in America today."

The strikers who attended the meeting stated that A. Laus, member of the American Federation of Musicians, but who did not go on strike because of his personal regard for Conductor Monteux, has said that he will play at the concert the strikers are to give in the Colonial Theatre Sunday evening.

From Dramatic Mirror
New York City
MAR 13 1920

Fradkin Dismissed

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been dismissed by the board of trustees.

Fradkin did not rise when Conductor Pierre Monteux motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause. A few persons in the audience hissed when Fradkin remained seated. Mr. Fradkin said that he considered the applause ... for the conductor.

From
From Providence
MAR 17 1920 NEWS

BOSTON SYMPHONY LETS STRIKING MUSICIANS GO

Boston, March 12.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its concerts in Boston and elsewhere as previously arranged, although 32 of the 90 members of the organization "went on strike" and have been dismissed from further service, according to an announcement made last night by Judge F. P. Cabot, president of the corporation. In some instances, however, the scheduled programme will be changed.

"If I may judge by the replies already received," said Judge Cabot, "to the statement addressed to the supporters of the orchestra and by voluntary expressions of interest and endorsement from subscribers to our concerts in New York and southern cities, also from private individuals, the action taken by the trustees toward those who violated their contracts has met with general approval.

"I greatly regret the recent events, but in view of the conviction of the trustees that the orchestra can best be carried on by members free from obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts, the trustees were not able to take any other position in the matter."

Asked regarding the status of the strikers who refused to sign his declaration against unionization, Judge Cabot replied tersely, "they are dismissed."

When questioned regarding the possibility of women players being engaged to fill places vacated by the "strikers," he said:

"Undoubtedly there are women musicians in Boston as well qualified as some of the players who were members of the Symphony a week ago. I can see no objection to the engagement of women, provided they have the requisite qualifications. The Cologne Orchestra has had women musicians among its membership for some time. The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a woman harpist for years."

If women are added to the Boston orchestra they probably will be used to augment the string choir, which the strike has left the weakest department. The trustees, prefer, however, to leave most of the vacancies until the end of the season, May 1, rather than to accept any but first-class musicians, and it is probable that the remaining six pairs of concerts in this city and those to be given on the southern trip, beginning next week, will be performed by a reduced orchestra.

...rom
MAR 17 1920 A
NEWS

BOSTON MERCHANTS MAY BACK A NEW UNION ORCHESTRA

Boston, March 17.—Boston merchants, fearing the possible disruption of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would have a depressing effect on their business and would dim the reputation of "Boston as the music centre of the world," have expressed a willingness to back a new symphony orchestra here with the present striking players as the nucleus.

In consequence of this offer the project of incorporating an orchestra of their own by the striking players and their backers will be deferred for a few days to give the men and their committee time to consider carefully the latest development, which especially appeals to a large number of the men.

...UNION
...Y.

...EMBERS
...SYMPHONY

...Thirty-two
...Symphony
...day be-
...agree-
...per-
...ther
...tely

...urs Re...
...—"Protest...
...No Fear of C...

Trouble in Boston Orchestra

There seems to be trouble in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The men made a demand for increased wages which has been refused, the trustees of the organization stating that they have no funds at their disposal and that the concerts do not now meet the expenses. The members of the orchestra appear to like Monteux, though some still prefer his predecessor, Rabaud. So there is division on that point.

The members of the orchestra feel that they should have a raise of at least $1,000 per man in salary for next season. Judge Cabot, the chairman of the board of trustees, told the men that he would make no promises for the future, and would only deal with each member personally, as his present contract ran out.

You may recall that when Maj. Lee Higginson was the sustaining force of the Symphony Orchestra he made it a condition that none of the members should join the American Federation of Musicians. Since his death I believe that some thirty have made application to join the union, and others are ready to do the same thing. This has an important bearing on the situation.

There seems to be some feeling among the members of the orchestra, too, with regard to the recent importation of three horn players from Holland, who are said not to be of the highest rank. As it is well known in Europe that the members of the Boston Symphony are nonunion, anyone coming to play with it charges an extra salary. It is, therefore, pointed out that the finances of the orchestra would be in better shape if the members did join the union.

Manager Brennan, of the orchestra, told a number of persons, after the late Maj. Higginson died, and before his will was read, that he had left $1,000,000 for a fund to carry on the orchestra. Therefore it must have been a sad blow to him and to those interested, that the major left nothing at all for them.

One thing is certain. The Boston Symphony cannot exist and maintain its nobly won prestige unless it consists of first-class players. First-class players cannot live decently, even, on the old salaries. The result of this is that if the salaries are raised there will be a further deficit. Now then, the question arises, should this deficit be met by a few public-spirited people, or should it be met by the people of Boston? It seems to me that it is up to the people of Boston. How can they claim, as they do, credit for their great orchestra, if they permit a few public-spirited, wealthy people to make good the deficit all the time?

Notwithstanding earlier reports that there would be no attempt to revive the Bayreuth Festival this year, latest advices are to the effect that the Bavarian government has taken up the matter officially and appointed a commission to see if it is feasible to prepare for a Wagner Festival in the summer.

The strict seclusion in which Mme. Campanini has held herself since the death of her husband did not prevent her from hearing the concert given in Chicago recently by her famous sister, Luisa Tetrazzini. The prima donna had the happy idea of installing a dictaphone on the stage of the auditorium with connections to her sister's room in another part of the hotel, so that Mme. Campanini was able to hear her without any breach of her privacy. Music lovers will not forget that Eva Tetrazzini-Campanini was, during her operatic career, as famous as her sister now is. No less an authority than Giulio Gatti-Casazza once told us that Mme. Campanini was the finest dramatic soprano he had ever heard.

That Pierre Monteux has fulfilled all that was expected of him and more is seen in the fact that he has been engaged for three years more as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The manner in which this able French conductor has pulled together the completely disorganized body is sufficient proof of his skill.

Variety
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is ing business without 35 of its play This is the number who joined union and participated in the strike. a meeting of the trustees it was to hold up the pay of the men and them for not appearing at the rehe and when they refused to accept fines their contracts were canceled. Th leaves the orchestra much depleted numbers for the time, but steps a being taken to take it out on the ros with programs arranged accordingly

TIMES
ess: Buffalo, N. Y.
MAR 7 1920

Concert Master Fired, Symphony Players tSrike

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, March 6.—About 30 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederick Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for tonight's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's program Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selection to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fraklin appeared at symphony hall before the concert, but was told that he would not be allowed to take part.

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

The trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra, according to the music editor of the Boston Transcript, "have reason to believe that the events of the past fortnight will bring them financial support that they might not easily have gained when the concerts were running in tranquil and prosperous course." Does this mean that the orchestra as a strike-breaking proposition has a command over the purses of wealthy Bostonians that it does not enjoy as a musical organization?

From

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra issued another statement to the institution's supporters on Wednesday, in which it was pointed out that the termination of Mr. Fradkin's connection with the orchestra bore no relation to his activities on behalf of the Musician's Union.

The issue between union and management has resolved itself into two distinct differences. The first concerns the au-jority of management, since the union ules would place the final determination f what players should and should not e members of the orchestra with the Boston local and of the Musicians' Federation instead of with the director and management.

The second concerns pay. It is pointed out that the salary account, exclusive of the conductor's salary, has grown from $172,351 in 1914 to $224,169 a year, and that the union's present demands would involve an addition of about $100,000 a year, "an increase beyond any resources now at command."

The report has been circulated during week that there is a possibility that n players may be engaged for the stra in case of necessity.

HERALD
dress Washington, D. C.
te MAR 17 1920

The man who has had to bear the brunt of the controversy over management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a Cabot. It is a family that though old is virile still, and also progressive in attitude also, Dr. Richard C. Cabot, the physician, teacher of religion and professor of social ethics at Harvard, being a living witness. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra, has ample means. His vocation is sitting day after day in the Juvenile Court of the Boston region and getting at the bottom of "cases" that if not handled wisely will develop into permanent public charges. He is not quite as busy on this job as he was a while ago, for prohibition is steadily cutting down his docket, just as it is emptying the jails, the almshouses and the houses of detention of Massachusetts. Judge Cabot is a trustee of Radcliffe College, and though comparatively youthful, has all the accomplishments of his caste, being cultivated, philanthropic and civic spirited.

From Providence
NEWS

NEW SYMPHONY TO INCORPORAT STRIKERS

Boston, March 16.—Preliminary legal action toward the formation of a new orchestra by the strikers and other union members of the present Boston Symphony Orchestra will be made today by Attorney Arthur Berenson, counsel for the 33 musicians dismissed.

Fredric Fradkin, the discharged concertmaster, announced at a meeting of the strikers in the St. Botolph street headquarters that four Boston women had offered to subscribe $25,000 each to start a new orchestra.

The meeting appointed a committee to act with Attorney Berenson in any steps that may be necessary to a realization of the project.

Among the chief features in connection with the projected incorporation, as pointed out last night by members of the committee, are that free scholarships will be given to talented students who need assistance, and composers, the conductor and all players will be Americans. The new organization, it was said, is assured of the services as a permanent leader of "the most gifted composer and conductor in America today."

The strikers who attended the meeting stated that A. Laus, member of the American Federation of Musicians, but who did not go on strike because of his personal regard for Conductor Monteux, has said that he will play at the concert the strikers are to give in the Colonial Theatre Sunday evening.

From Providence
NEWS

BOSTON SYMPHONY LETS STRIKING MUSICIANS GO

Boston, March 12.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its concerts in Boston and elsewhere as previously arranged, although 32 of the 90 members of the organization "went on strike" and have been dismissed from further service, according to an announcement made last night by Judge F. P. Cabot, president of the corporation. In some instances, however, the scheduled programme will be changed.

"If I may judge by the replies already received," said Judge Cabot, "to the statement addressed to the supporters of the orchestra and by voluntary expressions of interest and endorsement from subscribers to our concerts in New York and southern cities, also from private individuals, the action taken by the trustees toward those who violated their contracts has met with general approval.

"I greatly regret the recent events, but in view of the conviction of the trustees that the orchestra can best be carried on by members free from obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts, the trustees were not able to take any other position in the matter."

Asked regarding the status of the strikers who refused to sign his declaration against unionization, Judge Cabot replied, tersely, "they are dismissed."

When questioned regarding the possibility of women players being engaged to fill places vacated by the "strikers," he said:

"Undoubtedly there are women musicians in Boston as well qualified as some of the players who were members of the Symphony a week ago. I can see no objection to the engagement of women, provided they have the requisite qualifications. The Cologne Orchestra has had women musicians among its membership for some time. The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a woman harpist for years."

If women are added to the Boston orchestra they probably will be used to augment the string choir, which the strike has left the weakest department. The trustees, prefer, however, to leave most of the vacancies until the end of the season, May 1, rather than to accept any but first-class musicians, and it is probable that the remaining six pairs of concerts in this city and those to be given on the southern trip beginning next week, will be performed by a reduced orchestra.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

Weekly Comment on Things Musical in Discriminating Philadelphia

THE trouble in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which culminated last week in the dismissal of the concertmaster, Frederick Fradkin, has been of long standing, but it seems now to have broken out in a new place, as Mr. Fradkin was one of the new members and had nothing to do with the regime of Doctor Muck, which musicians regarded as the chief danger point to the well-being and harmony of the organization.

Fradkin's offense was a flagrant one, as at a concert he refused to rise and acknowledge the applause of the audience with the other members of the orchestra, when summoned to do so by the conductor, Mr. Monteux. Both audience and orchestra then took part in the tumultuous scene which followed, some applauding the concertmaster, but by far the greater number joining in a remarkable demonstration to Mr. Monteux. It was an exhibition which could hardly have been conceived as happening in the highly trained and severely disciplined Boston orchestra of a few years ago.

Fradkin's dismissal followed at a meeting of the trustees of the orchestra held the same evening, and, although there is talk of taking the matter to the courts, it is unlikely that this extreme action will follow.

THE lack of the rigid discipline necessary to a great orchestra has been apparent to an ordinarily keen musical observer ever since the directorship of the organization changed. The former conductors from Gericke, who was one of the most severe disciplinarian, down to Muck, had been able to build up and maintain a high morale among the men, which, to those who heard only an occasional concert of the orchestra as we did in Philadelphia, seemed to disappear rapidly when Mr. Rabaud assumed charge, and, though better now, is by means back to the old standard.

lack of discipline was apparent in the playing of the or- has been commented upon

TRIBUNE
New York City
MAR 27 1920 D

$500,000 for New Orchestra

Boston Strikers Find Backer for Five-Year Guaranty

Special Dispatch to The Tribune

BOSTON, March 26. — The thirty-three striking Boston Symphony Orchestra players have a guaranty of $500,000 for the support of the new symphony orchestra in Boston for the next five years after its incorporation and promise of the construction of an auditorium for its concerts, according to an announcement they made to-day. The identity of the backer, it is promised, will be discolsed at the concert scheduled for Easter Sunday night.

It is expected to have the incorporation of the new orchestra completed by that time and to announce the names of the twenty-four trustees, as well as those of the general management. Enrico Caruso is expected to sing at the Easter concert.

Sponsors for the new orchestra also are going ahead with plans for a season of summer "pop" concerts to rival those annually given by the symphony orchestra.

last two seasons. There can be no two sides as to who was in the right in the latest row, for Mr. Fradkin, by his contract, was bound to obey the directions of the conductor, and his refusal to do so was made the official grounds for his dismissal.

The origin of the trouble between Fradkin and the conductor, it is said, was the question of the unionizing of the orchestra, always a ticklish matter between players and management. The Boston management had long fought this step successfully, but now the organization is, or soon will be, fully unionized. Just why this matter should be such a bone of contention is not quite clear to the average musical observer, as in those orchestras where it has been effected there seems to be no change in artistic achievement, nor is there likely to be as long as the union and management can confer amicably on the points at issue.

WHAT the effect will be of the dismissal of a concertmaster of a great orchestra in midseason remains to be seen. Mr. Fradkin is quoted as having said that "if the directors seek to break up the orchestra, they could not have struck upon a more effective means."

If he is correctly quoted, he takes himself far too seriously. He is a good violinist, but did not make a conspicuously successful concertmaster, two very different things, and in his first appearances here he did not seem to be at all familiar with the actual technique of his position, even in view of the fact that the string section was thoroughly experienced and well seasoned. With a lack of orchestral "routine," to use a musicians' term, that was very apparent, he did not especially adorn the chair formerly occupied by such great concertmasters as Willy Hess, Anton Witek and, the greatest of them all, Franz Kneisel.

The Boston Orchestra will probably not suffer artistically by Mr. Fradkin's departure, and the cause of discipline will be tremendously advanced. That trouble of such a serious nature could develop in the organization is a matter for wonderment, but it may be that the summary action of the board of trustees will clear the atmosphere, without which the regaining of its former position will be a long and painful process.

From New York City
MAR 27 1920 D

32 BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS REJECT TE

Vote to Hold Independent Co Sunday Night.

Boston, Mass., March 10.—All but of the 35 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who refused to participate in last Saturday's concert because Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, was dismissed for refusing to obey a signal of the conductor to acknowledge applause, voted to-night not to accept the terms offered them by the Symphony Society trustees, as a condition precedent to their remainng members of the orchestra. They also voted to hold an independent concert in this city on Sunday night.

The 35 appeared at a rehearsal Monday, but were informed to-day that they would be discharged for refusing to play last Saturday unless they paid the usual forfeiture for absence and agreed to abide by principles outlined in a letter from the trustees stipulating that the conduct of the orchestra should be subject to no outside interference.

rom

SYMPHONY TRUSTEES' ACTION EXPLAINED IN STATEME

Frederick P. Cabot, President of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., night issued a statement explaining actions of the trustees since the rec union agitation started among the me bers of the orchestra. He pointed that the trustees did not feel that g music or fair conditions to the musici could result from the formation of union among the members of the orch tra.

He said in this statement that it found, after consultation with the offic of the Boston Musicians' Protective sociation and Mr. Webber of the Am can Federation of Musicians, that, less changed, the union obligations came supreme, and required that inst of the musical qualifications being fin judged by the conductor, they were t decided by the union."

Mr. Cabot stated that other condit more drastic, such as contracts, the ing of foreign musicians and the pr ples of the closed shop, were to he quired by the union, although it wa first thought that modifications migh made. The trustees refused to co nance such restrictments, he declare

The final words of the statement fo "The trustees have duties and ob tions to the present subscribers and tainers and to the ever-widening g of subscribers and sustainers who a ready and eager to maintain the orch tra according to its great traditions. T trustees are going to live up to th obligations and duties, and to carry the concerts, and they cannot consent the men assuming obligations fundame tally inconsistent with their contracts

From
EVENING WORLD,
New York City

To Beat Orchestra Strike.

BOSTON, March 12.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, depleted by a strike of one-third of its players, will be recruited to full strength in a day or two, the management said to-day. The strikers, who are forming an independent orchestra with Concert Master

From Dramatic Mirror
New York City

Fradkin Dismissed

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been dismissed by the board of trustees.

Fradkin did not rise when Conductor Pierre Monteux motioned the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause. A few persons in the audience hissed while Fradkin remained seated. Mr. Fradkin said that he considered the applause

From
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

DISCHARGE 32 MEMBERS OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, March 11.—Thirty-two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were dismissed to-day because they refused to sign an agreement that specified "intention to perform their contracts without further breach." A strike was immediately called by the musicians.

rom

BOSTON MERCHANTS MAY BACK A NEW UNION ORCHESTRA

Boston, March 17.—Boston merchants, fearing the possible disruption of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would have a depressing effect on their business and would dim the reputation of "Boston as the music centre of the world," have expressed a willingness to back a new symphony orchestra here with the present striking players as the nucleus.

In consequence of this offer the project of incorporating an orchestra of their own by the striking players and their backers will be deferred for a few days to give the men and their committee time to consider carefully the latest development, which especially appeals to a large number of the men.

Trouble in Boston Orchestra

There seems to be trouble in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The men made a demand for increased wages which has been refused, the trustees of the organization stating that they have no funds at their disposal and that the concerts do not now meet the expenses. The members of the orchestra appear to like Monteux, though some still prefer his predecessor, Rabaud. So there is division on that point.

The members of the orchestra feel that they should have a raise of at least $1,000 per man in salary for next season. Judge Cabot, the chairman of the board of trustees, told the men that he would make no promises for the future, and would only deal with each member personally, as his present contract ran out.

You may recall that when Maj. Lee Higginson was the sustaining force of the Symphony Orchestra he made it a condition that none of the members should join the American Federation of Musicians. Since his death I believe that some thirty have made application to join the union, and others are ready to do the same thing. This has an important bearing on the situation.

There seems to be some feeling among the members of the orchestra, too, with regard to the recent importation of three horn players from Holland, who are said not to be of the highest rank. As it is well known in Europe that the members of the Boston Symphony are nonunion, anyone coming to play with it charges an extra salary. It is, therefore, pointed out that the finances of the orchestra would be in better shape if the members did join the union.

Manager Brennan, of the orchestra, told a number of persons, after the late Maj. Higginson died, and before his will was read, that he had left $1,000,000 for a fund to carry on the orchestra. Therefore it must have been a sad blow to him and to those interested, that the major left nothing at all for them.

One thing is certain. The Boston Symphony cannot exist and maintain its nobly won prestige unless it consists of first-class players. First-class players cannot live decently, even, on the old salaries. The result of this is that if the salaries are raised there will be a further deficit. Now then, the question arises, should this deficit be met by a few public-spirited people, or should it be met by the people of Boston? It seems to me that it is up to the people of Boston. How can they claim, as they do, credit for their great orchestra, if they permit a few public-spirited, wealthy people to make good the deficit all the time?

Notwithstanding earlier reports that there would be no attempt to revive the Bayreuth Festival this year, latest advices are to the effect that the Bavarian government has taken up the matter officially and appointed a commission to see if it is feasible to prepare for a Wagner Festival in the summer.

The strict seclusion in which Mme. Campanini has held herself since the death of her husband did not prevent her from hearing the concert given in Chicago recently by her famous sister, Luisa Tetrazzini. The prima donna had the happy idea of installing a dictaphone on the stage of the auditorium with connections to her sister's room in another part of the hotel, so that Mme. Campanini was able to hear her without any breach of her privacy. Music lovers will not forget that Eva Tetrazzini-Campanini was, during her operatic career, as famous as her sister now is. No less an authority than Giulio Gatti-Casazza once told us that Mme. Campanini was the finest dramatic soprano he had ever heard.

That Pierre Monteux has fulfilled all that was expected of him and more is seen in the fact that he has been engaged for three years more as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The manner in which this able French conductor has pulled together the completely disorganized body is sufficient proof of his skill.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

Weekly Comment on Things Musical in Discriminating Philadelphia

THE trouble in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which culminated last week in the dismissal of the concertmaster, Frederick Fradkin, has been of long standing, but it seems now to have broken out in a new place, as Mr. Fradkin was one of the new members and had nothing to do with the regime of Doctor Muck, which musicians regarded as the chief danger point to the well-being and harmony of the organization.

Fradkin's offense was a flagrant one, as at a concert he refused to rise and acknowledge the applause of the audience with the other members of the orchestra, when summoned to do so by the conductor, Mr. Monteux. Both audience and orchestra then took part in the tumultuous scene which followed, some applauding the concertmaster, but by far the greater number joining in a remarkable demonstration to Mr. Monteux. It was an exhibition which could hardly have been conceived as happening in the highly trained and severely disciplined Boston orchestra of a few years ago.

Fradkin's dismissal followed at a meeting of the trustees of the orchestra held the same evening, and, although there is talk of taking the matter to the courts, it is unlikely that this extreme action will follow.

THE lack of the rigid discipline necessary to a great orchestra has been apparent to an ordinarily keen musical observer ever since the directorship of the organization changed. The former conductors from Gericke, who was one of the most severe disciplinarian, down to Muck, had been able to build up and maintain a high morale among the men, which, to those who heard only an occasional concert of the orchestra as we did in Philadelphia, seemed to disappear rapidly when Mr. Rabaud assumed charge, and, though better now, is by no means back to the old standard.

This lack of discipline was apparent always in the playing of the orchestra has been commented upon

TIMES
Press: Buffalo, N. Y.
Date: MAR 7 1920

Concert Master Fired, Symphony Players tSrike

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, March 6.—About 30 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederick Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for to-night's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's program Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selection to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fraklin appeared at symphony hall before the concert, but was told that he would not be allowed to take part.

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

The trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra, according to the music editor of the Boston Transcript, "have reason to believe that the events of the past fortnight will bring them financial support that they might not easily have gained when the concerts were running in tranquil and prosperous course." Does this mean that the orchestra as a strike-breaking proposition has a command over the purses of wealthy Bostonians that it does not enjoy as a musical organization?

Variety
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is ing business without 35 of its pla This is the number who joined union and participated in the strike a meeting of the trustees it was to hold up the pay of the men and them for not appearing at the rehe and when they refused to accept fines their contracts were canceled. leaves the orchestra much depleted numbers for the time, but steps a being taken to take it out on the ros with programs arranged accordingly

TRIBUNE
New York City
MAR 27 1920 D

$500,000 for New Orchestra

Boston Strikers Find Backer for Five-Year Guaranty

Special Dispatch to The Tribune

BOSTON, March 26. — The thirty-three striking Boston Symphony Orchestra players have a guaranty of $500,000 for the support of the new symphony orchestra in Boston for the next five years after its incorporation and promise of the construction of an auditorium for its concerts, according to an announcement they made to-day. The identity of the backer, it is promised, will be discolsed at the concert scheduled for Easter Sunday night.

It is expected to have the incorporation of the new orchestra completed by that time and to announce the names of the twenty-four trustees, as well as those of the general management. Enrico Caruso is expected to sing at the Easter concert.

Sponsors for the new orchestra also are going ahead with plans for a season of summer "pop" concerts to rival those annually given by the symphony orchestra.

last two seasons. There can be no two sides as to who was in the right in the latest row, for Mr. Fradkin, by his contract, was bound to obey the directions of the conductor, and his refusal to do so was made the official grounds for his dismissal.

The origin of the trouble between Fradkin and the conductor, it is said, was the question of the unionizing of the orchestra, always a ticklish matter between players and management. The Boston management had long fought this step successfully, but now the organization is, or soon will be, fully unionized. Just why this matter should be such a bone of contention is not quite clear to the average musical observer, as in those orchestras where it has been effected there seems to be no change in artistic achievement, nor is there likely to be as long as the union and management can confer amicably on the points at issue.

WHAT the effect will be of the dismissal of a concertmaster of a great orchestra in midseason remains to be seen. Mr. Fradkin is quoted as having said that "if the directors seek to break up the orchestra, they could not have struck upon a more effective means."

If he is correctly quoted, he takes himself far too seriously. He is a good violinist, but did not make a conspicuously successful concertmaster, two very different things, and in his first appearances here he did not seem to be at all familiar with the actual technique of his position, even in view of the fact that the string section was thoroughly experienced and well seasoned. With a lack of orchestral "routine," to use the musicians' term, that was very apparent, he did not especially adorn the chair formerly occupied by such great concertmasters as Willy Hess, Anton Witek and, the greatest of them all, Franz Kneisel.

The Boston Orchestra will probably not suffer artistically by Mr. Fradkin's departure, and the cause of discipline will be tremendously advanced. That trouble of such a serious nature could develop in the organization is a matter for wonderment, but it may be that the summary action of the board of trustees will clear the atmosphere, without which the regaining of its former position will be a long and painful process.

From

32 BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS REJECT TE

Vote to Hold Independent Con Sunday Night.

Boston, Mass., March 10.—All but of the 35 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who refused to participate in last Saturday's concert because Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, was dismissed for refusing to obey a signal of the conductor to acknowledge applause, voted to-night not to accept the terms offered them by the Symphony Society trustees, as a condition precedent to their remainng members of the orchestra. They also voted to hold an independent concert in this city on Sunday night.

The 35 appeared at a rehearsal Monday, but were informed to-day that they would be discharged for refusing to play last Saturday unless they paid the usual forfeiture for absence and agreed to abide by principles outlined in a letter from the trustees stipulating that the conduct of the orchestra should be subject to no outside interference.

rom

SYMPHONY TRUSTEES' ACTION EXPLAINED IN STATEMENT

Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., last night issued a statement explaining the actions of the trustees since the recent union agitation started among the members of the orchestra. He pointed out that the trustees did not feel that good music or fair conditions to the musicians could result from the formation of a union among the members of the orchestra.

He said in this statement that it was found, after consultation with the officers of the Boston Musicians' Protective Association and Mr. Webber of the American Federation of Musicians, that, "unless changed, the union obligations became supreme, and required that instead of the musical qualifications being finally judged by the conductor, they were to be decided by the union."

Mr. Cabot stated that other conditions more drastic, such as contracts, the hiring of foreign musicians and the principles of the closed shop, were to be required by the union, although it was at first thought that modifications might be made. The trustees refused to countenance such restrictments, he declared.

The final words of the statement follow:

"The trustees have duties and obligations to the present subscribers and sustainers and to the ever-widening group of subscribers and sustainers who are ready and eager to maintain the orchestra according to its great traditions. The trustees are going to live up to their obligations and duties, and to carry on the concerts, and they cannot consent that the men assuming obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts

From
EVENING WORLD,
New York City

To Beat Orchestra Strike.

BOSTON, March 12.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, depleted by a strike of one-third of its players, will be recruited to full strength in a day or two, the management said to-day. The strikers, who are forming an independent orchestra with Concert Master

m

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra issued another statement to the institution's supporters on Wednesday, in which it was pointed out that the termination of Mr. Fradkin's connection with the orchestra bore no relation to his activities on behalf of the Musician's Union.

The issue between union and management has resolved itself into two distinct differences. The first concerns the au-ority of management, since the union ules would place the final determination f what players should and should not e members of the orchestra with the Boston local and of the Musicians' Federation instead of with the director and management.

The second concerns pay. It is pointed out that the salary account, exclusive of the conductor's salary, has grown from $172,351 in 1914 to $224,139 a year, and that the union's present demands would involve an addition of about $100,000 a year, "an increase beyond any resources now at command."

The report has been circulated during the week that there is a possibility that women players may be engaged for the orchestra in case of necessity.

HERALD
dress Washington, D. C.
te MAR 12 1920

The man who has had to bear the brunt of the controversy over management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a Cabot. It is a family that though old is virile still, and also progressive in attitude also, Dr. Richard C. Cabot, the physician, teacher of religion and professor of social ethics at Harvard, being a living witness. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra, has ample means. His vocation is sitting day after day in the Juvenile Court of the Boston region and getting at the bottom of "cases" that if not handled wisely will develop into permanent public charges. He is not quite as busy on this job as he was a while ago, for prohibition is steadily cutting down his docket, just as it is emptying the jails, the almshouses and the houses of detention of Massachusetts. Judge Cabot is a trustee of Radcliffe College, and though comparatively youthful, has all the accomplishments of his caste, being cultivated, philanthropic and civic spirited.

rom Providence R
NEWS

NEW SYMPHONY TO INCORPORATE, STRIKERS SAY

Boston, March 16.—Preliminary legal action toward the formation of a new orchestra by the strikers and other union members of the present Boston Symphony Orchestra will be made today by Attorney Arthur Berenson, counsel for the 33 musicians dismissed.

Frederic Fradkin, the discharged concertmaster, announced at a meeting of the strikers in the St. Botolph headquarters that four Boston men had offered to subscribe $25,000 each to start a new orchestra.

A meeting appointed a committee to act with Attorney Berenson on steps that may be necessary to the formation of the project.

Among the chief features in connection with the projected incorporation pointed out last night by members of the committee, are that scholarships will be given to music students who need assistance, that composers, the conductor and players will be Americans. The organization, it was said, is assured the services as a permanent head of "the most gifted composer-conductor in America to-day."

Members who attended the meeting stated that A. Laus, member of the American Federation of Musicians, but who did not go on strike because of his personal regard for Conductor Monteux, has said that he will play at the concert the strikers plan to give in the Colonial Theatre Sunday evening.

From Providence R
NEWS
MAR 12 1920 A

BOSTON SYMPHONY LETS STRIKING MUSICIANS GO

Boston, March 12.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its concerts in Boston and elsewhere as previously arranged, although 32 of the 90 members of the organization "went on strike" and have been dismissed from further service, according to an announcement made last night by Judge F. P. Cabot, president of the corporation. In some instances, however, the scheduled programme will be changed.

"If I may judge by the replies already received," said Judge Cabot, "to the statement addressed to the supporters of the orchestra and by voluntary expressions of interest and endorsement from subscribers to our concerts in New York and southern cities, also from private individuals, the action taken by the trustees toward those who violated their contracts has met with general approval.

"I greatly regret the recent events, but in view of the conviction of the trustees that the orchestra can best be carried on by members free from obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts, the trustees were not able to take any other position in the matter."

Asked regarding the status of the strikers who refused to sign his declaration against unionization, Judge Cabot replied tersely, "they are dismissed."

When questioned regarding the possibility of women players being engaged to fill places vacated by the "strikers," he said:

"Undoubtedly there are women musicians in Boston as well qualified as some of the players who were members of the Symphony a week ago. I can see no objection to the engagement of women, provided they have the requisite qualifications. Cologne Orchestra has had women musicians among its members some time. The Boston Orchestra had a woman years."

addeu to the Boston robably will be used ring choir, which the weakest de- , prefer, how- he vacancies n, May 1, ut first- obable con- to be up begin- be performed a.

rom

BOSTON MERCHANTS MAY BACK A NEW UNION ORCHESTRA

Boston, March 17.—Boston merchants, fearing the possible disruption of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would have a depressing effect on their business and would dim the reputation of "Boston as the music centre of the world," have expressed a willingness to back a new symphony orchestra here with the present striking players as the nucleus.

In consequence of this offer the project of incorporating an orchestra of their own by the striking players and their backers will be deferred for a few days to give the men and their committee time to consider carefully the latest development, which especially appeals to a large number of the men.

n 1920 amatic Mirror
New York City

Fradkin Dismissed

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been dismissed by the board of trustees.

Fradkin did not rise when Conductor Pierre Monteux motioned the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause. A few persons in the audience hissed while Fradkin remained seated. Mr. Fradkin said that he considered the ap-

ANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

ISCHARGE 32 MEMBERS OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, March 11.—Thirty-two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were dismissed to-day because they refused to sign an agreement that specified "intention to perform their contracts without further breach." A strike was immediately called by the musicians.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From
Bill Board
Cincinnati, O.

MAR 20 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

To Tour With Reduced Personnel—Mollenhauer To Conduct Benefit Performance for Strikers

Boston, March 13.—With thirty-five of the Boston Symphony players out on a strike the management intends to carry on the Southern tour, which opens Monday in Washington, with a reduced number of players.

Friday at a meeting of the Boston stage hands it was voted to stand back of the players out on strike, and notice has been sent to headquarters at New York. President Webber also requested that they take up the Boston situation with unions that control theaters in which symphony concerts are booked, asking that no assistance be given the non-union musicians on tour.

Saturday strikers held a meeting to plan for a monster benefit concert to be given at the Colonial Theater, Sunday March 21. Emil Mollenhauer will conduct the orchestra and Frederick Fradkin, the dismissed concert master, will play a violin solo.

The trustees state that they will not fill the vacant places in the orchestra with women, but will play with a reduced personnel until the end of the season. The trustees today started a campaign to raise three hundred thousand dollars.

President Webber is expected in Boston today. Notice was sent today to the Actors' Equity Association, asking them to withdraw their members from any hall or theater booking the symphony orchestra on tour.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From

32 BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS REJECT TE

Vote to Hold Independent Concert Sunday Night.

Boston, Mass., March 10.—All but three of the 35 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who refused to participate in last Saturday's concert because Frederic Fradkin, the concert master was dismissed for refusing to obey the signal of the conductor to acknowledge applause, voted to-night not to accept the terms offered them by the Symphony Society trustees, as a condition precedent to their remaining members of the orchestra. They also voted to hold an independent concert in this city on Sunday night.

The 35 appeared at a rehearsal Monday, but were informed to-day that they would be discharged for refusing to play last Saturday unless they paid the usual forfeiture for absence and agreed to abide by principles outlined in a letter from the trustees stipulating that the conductor of the orchestra should be subject to no outside interference.

From

MAR 12 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY LETS ALL STRIKING MUSICIANS LEAVE

Dismissal of 32 Players Follows Refusal to Quit Union.—President of Corporation Declares That All Concert Dates Will be Filled.

Boston, March 12.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its concerts in Boston and elsewhere as previously arranged, although 32 of the 90 members of the organiation "went on strike" and have been dismissed from further service, according to an announcement made last night by Judge F. P. Cabot, President of the corporation. In some instances, however, the scheduled programme will be changed.

"If I may judge by the replies already received," said Judge Cabot, "to the statement addressed to the supporters of the orchestra and by voluntary expressions of interest and endorsement from subscribers to or concerts in New York and Southern cities, also from private individuals, the action taken by the trustees toward those who violated their contracts has met with general approval.

"I greatly regret the recent events, but in view of the conviction of the trustees that the orchestra can best be carried on by members free from obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts, the trustees were able to take any other position in the matter."

Asked regarding the status of the strikers who refused to sign his declaration against unionisation, Judge Cabot replied, tersely, "they are dismissed."

When questioned regarding the possibility of women players being engaged to fill places vacated by the "strikers," he said:

"Undoubtedly there are women musicians in Boston as well qualified as any of the players who were members of the Symphony a week ago. I can see no objection to the engagement of women, provided they have the requisite qualifications. The Cologne Orchestra has had women musicians among its membership for some time. The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a woman harpist for years."

If women are added to the Boston orchestra they probably will be used to augment the string choir, which the strike has left the weakest department. The trustees, prefer, however, to leave most of the vacancies until the end of the season, May 1, rather than to accept any but first-class musicians. It is probable that the remaining two pairs of concerts in this city and those to be given on the Southern trip, beginning next week, will be performed by the reduced orchestra.

Mr. Monteux is revising the programme of the concerts of the next fortnight in New York, Philadelphia, Washington and the other cities to be visited on the spring trip.

While the orchestra management was revising its concert programmes, the "strikers" were arranging for a concert to be given by themselves and union sympathizers in the Colonial Theatre a week from next Sunday night, and in various other enterprises in connection with the continuance of their "strike."

The "strikers" hope later to develop an organization equal to the Boston Symphony, with several weeks season in Boston and several on the road.

The Symphony Orchestra will leave Boston at 7:30 Sunday night for its Southern tour and will play in Washington, Monday; Baltimore, Tuesday; Philadelphia, Wednesday; New York, Thursday; Brooklyn, Friday; New York, Saturday; Newark, N. J., Sunday, returning to Boston on the following Monday for a rehearsal here March 23.

From
TRIBUNE,
New York City

Rival Orchestra Planned In Boston Symphony Row

Wealthy Music Patrons Offer Financial Support to Members Who Were Discharged

Special Dispatch to The Tribune

BOSTON, March 11.—The possibility of an organization to rival the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared to-day in the statement of Arthur Berenson, attorney for the discharged musicians; to the effect that wealthy music patrons had come forward with proffers of financial support.

In this connection it was said that one individual whose name is secret has offered $10,000 at once for financing a series of rival "pop" concerts or for aiding the union players in their fight.

It is announced to-day that the thirty-five former symphony artists are busily engaged in preparing a concert tour to include the principal cities of New England, and possibly New York and elsewhere. On this tour Frederic Fradkin, the noted concert master, who has been a storm center in the controversy since he took sides with the men in their demand for more money, will appear as conductor.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From

MAR -7 1920

memories of older days, when musicians keenly coveted positions in the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the prestige it conferred on them, are recalled by the present contest between musicians and management over the question of unionism and the wage scale. That a number of the orchestra's players, particularly the first violinists, are teachers, and that their enrollment of pupils is materially swelled by the reputation their orchestral work gives them, is a fact that is familiar to friends of the institution. Events of recent seasons, however, have brought in a considerable number of younger players, unacquainted in Boston, who have not yet had time to establish themselves as teachers, and among them much of the present agitation has found its fertile field. In a recent statement concerning the salary list drawn out by the management it was shown that the minimum pay of players is approximately $1600, which for a season of 40 weeks brings it to $40 a week. On the other end of the scale no salaries are given, for the Boston orchestra has always included a considerable number of star players whose incomes were in proportion to their artistry.

In addition to their income from teaching a number of the members have Sunday church engagements, and there are several smaller organizations based on the orchestra's personnel, the Kneisel Quartet being the most famous that ever grew out of it. One of the factors affecting the situation is that the organization's season is longer, including the two weeks of "pop" concerts, than that of any similar orchestra in the country, and the member's return from his orchestral work is greater, per year, than elsewhere.

On the other side of the argument the point is made that because they are union members the players are debarred from certain summer engagements, as in hotel orchestras whers union players will not wait except to the melodies of union musicians.

An interesting factor in the situation is the time which orchestral work demands of the members. There is no rigidly fixed schedule, but in general there are rehearsals on days when concerts are given, while on other days rehearsals are ordinarily from 10 to 12:30. This season includes 110 concerts.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From

30 BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS REFUSE TO PLAY

Fail to Take Seats Following Concert Master's Suspension.

Boston, March 6.—About 30 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the managemnt reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for tonight's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, President of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's programme, Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall before the concert, but was told that he would not be allowed to take part.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

STAR

From Kansas City, Mo.

MAR -7 1920

"STRIKE" IN BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Thirty Musicians Refused to Play Because Member Wasn't Reinstated.

BOSTON, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from the conductor, Pierre Monteaux, did not take their seats for tonight's concert.

OREGONIAN

ss: Portland, Oregon

MAR

BOSTON MUSICIANS QUIT

Symphony Orchestra Force Reduced But Concert Goes On.

BOSTON, March 6.—About 30 members of the Boston symphony orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for tonight's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's programme Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at symphony hall before the concert but was told that he would not be allowed to take part.

From

FEB 28

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GOES OVER TO UNION.

[BY A. P. DAY WIRE.]

BOSTON, Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliations, according to a statement made by a committee of the players today. Ninety per cent. of the members have joined the union and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it is said.

Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players' committee as being in sympathy with unionization.

From
Clipper
New York City

MAR 24

STRIKER WANTS TO ARGUE

BOSTON, Mar. 20.—A challenge publicly to debate the merits of the present controversy between the striking players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the management of the orchestra has been sent to Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, by Frederic Fradkin, deposed concert master of the orchestra.

In his challenge Mr. Fradkin leaves the naming of the date, place and all other details to Judge Cabot, his sole interest being, he says, the opportunity to publicly argue the matter with those opposed to the stand taken by the striking players, so that the public may decide which is right.

From Musical Leader
Chicago, Ill.

BOSTON SYMPHONY MEN GO OUT ON STRIKE

Troubles of Venerable Orchestra Result in Walk-Out by One-Third of the Instrumentalists After Discharge of Concertmaster

ACTION PRECIPITATED AT CONCERT

Trustees Refuse to Redress Grievances of Men—Saturday Evening Program Given with Diminished Orchestra Personnel

Boston witnessed its Symphony Orchestra's troubles in dramatic form last week, when Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster and leader of the instrumentalists who seek higher wages and recognition of their union membership, precipitated the situation on the platform of Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, thereby earning his dismissal from the organization, and when, the following evening, the threat of a walk-out caused the hurried substitution of a program for a much diminished orchestra. Public opinion remains divided on the merits of the case, though it is reported that the patrons of the symphony concerts for the most part side with the trustees.

Only recently have members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra been members of the Musicians' Federation, "the union." Until the defection of Dr. Muck, the conductor who was discovered to be a German agent, and the consequent withdrawal of Col. Higginson from the current subsidy of the symphony season, employment was accepted by instrumentalists with the understanding that theirs was an art incapable of being "unionized." Recent discussions have revealed that the minimum of pay to musicians even in motion-picture houses is more than the amount paid to the ordinary Symphony man in Boston and that lack of membership in the Federation has prevented the latter from obtaining outside employment in spare hours.

Two weeks ago it was announced that 90 per cent of the orchestra's players had joined the Federation and that continued non-recognition on the part of the trustees would entail a strike. It was reported, also, that the trustees had not long previously refused the instrumentalists' request for individual increases of $1,000 a year, offering instead engagements for an additional season of popular concerts. On Feb. 26 Frederic Fradkin, the concertmaster, joined the Federation. Eight days later he was discharged from the orchestra.

First, however, he brought about the situation that Associated Press dispatches have made known to all the country. At last Friday afternoon's concert, following the performance of Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," which immediately preceded the intermission, Pierre Monteux, the conductor, motioned to the orchestra men to rise in recognition of applause. Only the concertmaster kept his seat. After the concert he was discharged by the orchestra management on grounds of breach of discipline and affront to the audience and, it is believed, under the clause in the player's contract providing that:

> The corporation shall be the sole and final judge of the behavior and the quality of performance of the said musician, and if in the judgment of the said corporation the said musician has failed to keep his agreement the said corporation, acting by its trustees, may treat this agreement as having been broken by the fault of the said musician and may thereupon dismiss the said musician from its orchestra, paying him his agreed compensation to the time of dismissal.

The players contend that this clause invalidates the contract.

Union members of the orchestra met Saturday afternoon and voted to strike if recognition of their union status and immediate re-instatement of the former concertmaster should not be granted by the trustees. Their demand was refused by Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board, and about 30 per cent (instead of the 90 per cent previously reported as having assumed union affiliations) made known their decision not to appear at the evening concert. A hasty substitution of compositions for small orchestra made possible, however, the presentation of a program at the regular hour. Mr. Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall, but was not allowed to join the performers.

Mr. Monteux, the conductor, is generally assumed to give little sympathy to the case of the strikers. It is to be noted, nevertheless, that he is himself employed under a contract that, in the case of any controversy between the trustees and the instrumentalists, might make his present duty alien to his permanent sympathy. It is asserted that he is, however, a member of the French Federation of Musicians and as such is obligated to support union claims in any country.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From
Bill Board
Cincinnati, O.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

To Tour With Reduced Personnel—Mollenhauer To Conduct Benefit Performance for Strikers

Boston, March 13.—With thirty-five of the Boston Symphony players out on a strike the management intends to carry on the Southern tour, which opens Monday in Washington, with a reduced number of players.

Friday at a meeting of the Boston stage hands it was voted to stand back of the players out on strike, and notice has been sent to headquarters at New York. President Webber also requested that they take up the Boston situation with unions that control theaters in which symphony concerts are booked, asking that no assistance be given the non-union musicians on tour.

Saturday strikers held a meeting to plan for a monster benefit concert to be given at the Colonial Theater, Sunday March 21. Emil Mollenhauer will conduct the orchestra and Frederick Fradkin, the dismissed concert master, will play a violin solo.

The trustees state that they will not fill the vacant places in the orchestra with women, but will play with a reduced personnel until the end of the season. The trustees today started a campaign to raise three hundred thousand dollars.

President Webber is expected in Boston today. Notice was sent today to the Actors' Equity Association, asking them to withdraw their members from any hall or theater booking the symphony orchestra on tour.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From
TRIBUNE.
New York City

Rival Orchestra Planned In Boston Symphony Row

Wealthy Music Patrons Offer Financial Support to Members Who Were Discharged

Special Dispatch to The Tribune

BOSTON, March 11.—The possibility of an organization to rival the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared to-day in the statement of Arthur Berenson, attorney for the discharged musicians, to the effect that wealthy music patrons had come forward with proffers of financial support.

In this connection it was said that one individual whose name is secret has offered $10,000 at once for financing a series of rival "pop" concerts or for aiding the union players in their fight.

It is announced to-day that the thirty-five former symphony artists are busily engaged in preparing a concert tour to include the principal cities of New England, and possibly New York and elsewhere. On this tour Frederic Fradkin, the noted concert master, who has been a storm center in the controversy since he took sides with the men in their demand for more money, will appear as conductor.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From

memories of older days, when musicians keenly coveted positions in the ...on Symphony Orchestra for the prestige it conferred on them, are recalled ...he present contest between musicians ...management over the question of ...nism and the wage scale. That a ... many of the orchestra's players, ...cularly the first violinists, are teach... ...and that their enrollment of pupils ...aterially swelled by the reputation ... orchestral work gives them, is a ...or that is familiar to friends of the ...ution. Events of recent seasons, ...ever, have brought in a considerable ...ber of younger players, unacquainted ...Boston, who have not yet had time ...stablish themselves as teachers, and ...ng them much of the present agita... ...has found its fertile field. In a re... ...statement concerning the salary list ...n out by the management it was ...wn that the minimum pay of players ... approximately $1600, which for a ...n of 40 weeks brings it to $40 a ... On the other end of the scale no ...ties are given, for the Boston or... ...ra has always included a consid... ...number of star players whose in... ...were in proportion to their ar...

...ddition to their income from teach... ...number of the members have Sun... ...urch engagements, and there are ...l smaller organizations based on ...rchestra's personnel, the Kneisel ...t being the most famous that ever ...out of it. One of the factors af... ...the situation is that the organi... ...'s season is longer, including the ...eks of "pop" concerts, than that ...y similar orchestra in the country. ...the member's return from his or... ...al work is greater, per year, than ...here.

...the other side of the argument the ...is made that because they are ...union members the players are ...d from certain summer engage... ...s, as in hotel orchestras where union ...rs will not wait except to the melo... ...of union musicians.

...interesting factor in the situation is ...me which orchestral work demands ...the members. There is no rigidly ...schedule, but in general there are ...rehearsals on days when concerts are ..., while on other days rehearsals ...ordinarily from 10 to 12:30. This ...schedule includes 110 concerts.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From

BOSTON SYMPHONY LETS ALL STRIKING MUSICIANS LEAVE

Dismissal of 32 Players Follows Refusal to Quit Union.—President of Corporation Declares That All Concert Dates Will be Filled.

Boston, March 12.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its concerts in Boston and elsewhere as previously arranged, although 32 of the 90 members of the organiaztion "went on strike" and have been dismissed from further service, according to an announcement made last night by Judge P. P. Cabot, President of the corporation. In some instances, however, the scheduled programme will be changed.

"If I may judge by the replies already received," said Judge Cabot, "to the statement addressed to the supporters of the orchestra and by voluntary expressions of interest and endorsement from subscribers to or concerts in New York and Southern cities, also from private individuals, the action taken by the trustees toward those who violated their contracts has met with general approval.

"I greatly regret the recent events, but in view of the conviction of the trustees that the orchestra can best be carried on by members free from obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts, the trustees were p...ble to take any other position in t... matter."

Asked regarding the status of ... strikers who refused to sign his dec...ration against unionization, Judge Ca... replied, tersely, "they are dismissed."

When questioned regarding the p...sibility of women players being enga... to fill places vacated by the "strike" ... he said:

"Undoubtedly there are women m...cians in Boston as well qualified as ... of the players who were member... the Symphony a week ago. I can se... no objection to the engagement of wom...en, provided they have the requisite ...qualifications. The Cologne Orchestra ha... had women musicians among its mem...bership for some time. The Boston Sym...phony Orchestra had a woman harpi... for years."

If women are added to the Bosto... orchestra they probably will be used ... augment the string choir, which t... strike has left the weakest departmen... The trustees, prefer, however, to lea... most of the vacancies until the end ... the season, May 1, rather than to a...cept any but first-class musicians, a... it is probable that the remaining ... pairs of concerts in th's city and th... to be given on the Southern trip,

...uning next week, will be performed by ... reduced orchestra.

Mr. Monteux is revising the programme ...r the concerts of the next fortnight ... New York, Philadelphia, Washington ...ad the other cities to be visited on the ...ring trip.

While the orchestra management was ...evising its concert programmes, the ...strikers" were arranging for a concert ...o be given by themselves and union ...ympathizers in the Colonial Theatre a ...week from next Sunday night, and in ...various other enterprises in connection ...with the continuance of their "strike."

The "strikers" hope later to develop an ...organization equal to the Boston Symphony, with several weeks season in Boston and several on the road.

The Symphony Orchestra will leave Boston at 7:30 Sunday night for its Southern tour and will play in Washington, Monday; Baltimore, Tuesday; Philadelphia, Wednesday; New York, Thursday; Brooklyn, Friday; New York, Saturday; Newark, N. J., Sunday, returning to Boston on the following Monday for a rehearsal here March 23.

From

30 BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS REFUSE TO PLAY

Fail to Take Seats Following Concert Master's Suspension.

Boston, March 6.—About 30 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the managemnt reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for tonight's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, President of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's programme, Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall before the concert but was told that he would not be allowed to take part.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From

"STRIKE" IN BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Thirty Musicians Refused to Play Because Member Wasn't Reinstated.

Boston, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from the conductor, Pierre Monteaux, did not take their seats for tonight's concert.

OREGONIAN
ss: Portland, Oregon

BOSTON MUSICIANS QUIT

Symphony Orchestra Force Reduced But Concert Goes On.

BOSTON, March 6.—About 30 members of the Boston symphony orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for tonight's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's programme Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at symphony hall before the concert but was told that he would not be allowed to take part.

From

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GOES OVER TO UNION.

[BY A. P. DAY WIRE.]

BOSTON, Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliations, according to a statement made by a committee of the players today. Ninety per cent. of the members have joined the union and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it is said.

Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players' committee as being in sympathy with unionization.

From
Clipper
New York City

STRIKER WANTS TO ARGUE

BOSTON, Mar. 20.—A challenge publicly to debate the merits of the present controversy between the striking players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the management of the orchestra has been sent to Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, by Frederic Fradkin, deposed concert master of the orchestra.

In his challenge Mr. Fradkin leaves the naming of the date, place and all other details to Judge Cabot, his sole interest being, he says, the opportunity to publicly argue the matter with those opposed to the stand taken by the striking players, so that the public may decide which is right.

From Musical Leader
Chicago, Ill.

BOSTON SYMPHONY MEN GO OUT ON STRIKE

Troubles of Venerable Orchestra Result in Walk-Out by One-Third of the Instrumentalists After Discharge of Concertmaster

ACTION PRECIPITATED AT CONCERT

Trustees Refuse to Redress Grievances of Men—Saturday Evening Program Given with Diminished Orchestra Personnel

Boston witnessed its Symphony Orchestra's troubles in dramatic form last week, when Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster and leader of the instrumentalists who seek higher wages and recognition of their union membership, precipitated the situation on the platform of Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, thereby earning his dismissal from the organization, and when, the following evening, the threat of a walk-out caused the hurried substitution of a program for a much diminished orchestra. Public opinion remains divided on the merits of the case, though it is reported that the patrons of the symphony concerts for the most part side with the trustees.

Only recently have members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra been members of the Musicians' Federation, "the union." Until the defection of Dr. Muck, the conductor who was discovered to be a German agent, and the consequent withdrawal of Col. Higginson from the current subsidy of the symphony season, employment was accepted by instrumentalists with the understanding that theirs was an art incapable of being "unionized." Recent discussions have revealed that the minimum of pay to musicians even in motion-picture houses is more than the amount paid to the ordinary Symphony man in Boston and that lack of membership in the Federation has prevented the latter from obtaining outside employment in spare hours.

Two weeks ago it was announced that 90 per cent of the orchestra's players had joined the Federation and that continued non-recognition on the part of the trustees would entail a strike. It was reported, also, that the trustees had not long previously refused the instrumentalists' request for individual increases of $1,000 a year, offering instead engagements for an additional season of popular concerts. On Feb. 26 Frederic Fradkin, the concertmaster, joined the Federation. Eight days later he was discharged from the orchestra.

First, however, he brought about the situation that Associated Press dispatches have made known to all the country. At last Friday afternoon's concert, following the performance of Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," which immediately preceded the intermission, Pierre Monteux, the conductor, motioned to the orchestra men to rise in recognition of applause. Only the concertmaster kept his seat. After the concert he was discharged by the orchestra management on grounds of breach of discipline and affront to the audience and, it is believed, under the clause in the player's contract providing that:

> The corporation shall be the sole and final judge of the behavior and the quality of performance of the said musician, and if in the judgment of the said corporation the said musician has failed to keep his agreement the said corporation, acting by its trustees, may treat this agreement as having been broken by the fault of the said musician and may thereupon dismiss the said musician from its orchestra, paying him his agreed compensation to the time of dismissal.

The players contend that this clause invalidates the contract.

Union members of the orchestra met Saturday afternoon and voted to strike if recognition of their union status and immediate re-instatement of the former concertmaster should not be granted by the trustees. Their demand was refused by Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board, and about 30 per cent (instead of the 90 per cent previously reported as having assumed union affiliations) made known their decision not to appear at the evening concert. A hasty substitution of compositions for small orchestra made possible, however, the presentation of a program at the regular hour. Mr. Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall, but was not allowed to join the performers.

Mr. Monteux, the conductor, is generally assumed to give little sympathy to the case of the strikers. It is to be noted, nevertheless, that he is himself employed under a contract that, in the case of any controversy between the trustees and the instrumentalists, might make his present duty alien to his permanent sympathy. It is asserted that he is, however, a member of the French Federation of Musicians and as such is obligated to support union claims in any country.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From
Bill Board
Cincinnati, O.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

To Tour With Reduced Personnel—Mollenhauer To Conduct Benefit Performance for Strikers

Boston, March 13.—With thirty-five of the Boston Symphony players out on a strike the management intends to carry on the Southern tour, which opens Monday in Washington, with a reduced number of players.

Friday at a meeting of the Boston stage hands it was voted to stand back of the players out on strike, and notice has been sent to headquarters at New York. President Webber also requested that they take up the Boston situation with unions that control theaters in which symphony concerts are booked, asking that no assistance be given the non-union musicians on tour.

Saturday strikers held a meeting to plan for a monster benefit concert to be given at the Colonial Theater, Sunday March 21. Emil Mollenhauer will conduct the orchestra and Frederick Fradkin, the dismissed concert master, will play a violin solo.

The trustees state that they will not fill the vacant places in the orchestra with women, but will play with a reduced personnel until the end of the season. The trustees today started a campaign to raise three hundred thousand dollars.

President Webber is expected in Boston today. Notice was sent today to the Actors' Equity Association, asking them to withdraw their members from any hall or theater booking the symphony orchestra on tour.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From
TRIBUNE,
New York City

Rival Orchestra Planned In Boston Symphony Row

Wealthy Music Patrons Offer Financial Support to Members Who Were Discharged

Special Dispatch to The Tribune

BOSTON, March 11.—The possibility of an organization to rival the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared to-day in the statement of Arthur Berenson, attorney for the discharged musicians, to the effect that wealthy music patrons had come forward with proffers of financial support.

In this connection it was said that one individual whose name is secret has offered $10,000 at once for financing a series of rival "pop" concerts or for aiding the union players in their fight.

It is announced to-day that the thirty-five former symphony artists are busily engaged in preparing a concert tour to include the principal cities of New England, and possibly New York and elsewhere. On this tour Frederic Fradkin, the noted concert master, who has been a storm center in the controversy since he took sides with the men in their demand for more money, will appear as conductor.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From
TRIBUNE,
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY LETS ALL STRIKING MUSICIANS LEAVE

Dismissal of 32 Players Follows Refusal to Quit Union.—President of Corporation Declares That All Concert Dates Will be Filled.

Boston, March 12.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its concerts in Boston and elsewhere as previously arranged, although 32 of the 90 members of the organiastion "went on strike" and have been dismissed from further service, according to an announcement made last night by Judge F. P. Cabot, President of the corporation. In some instances, however, the scheduled programme will be changed.

"If I may judge by the replies already received," said Judge Cabot, "to the statement addressed to the supporters of the orchestra and by voluntary expressions of interest and endorsement from subscribers to or concerts in New York and Southern cities, also from private individuals, the action taken by the trustees toward those who violated their contracts has met with general approval.

"I greatly regret the recent events, but in view of the conviction of the trustees that the orchestra can best be carried on by members free from obligations fundamentally inconsistent with their contracts, the trustees were unable to take any other position in the matter."

Asked regarding the status of strikers who refused to sign his declaration against unionization, Judge Cabot replied, tersely, "they are dismissed."

When questioned regarding the possibility of women players being engaged to fill places vacated by the "strikers" he said:

"Undoubtedly there are women musicians in Boston as well qualified as some of the players who were members of the Symphony a week ago. I can see no objection to the engagement of women, provided they have the requisite qualifications. The Cologne Orchestra has had women musicians among its membership for some time. The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a woman harpist for years."

If women are added to the Boston orchestra they probably will be used to augment the string choir, which the strike has left the weakest department. The trustees, prefer, however, to leave most of the vacancies until the end of the season, May 1, rather than to accept any but first-class musicians. It is probable that the remaining pairs of concerts in this city and those to be given on the Southern trip, beginning next week, will be performed by the reduced orchestra.

Mr. Monteux is revising the programme of the concerts of the next fortnight in New York, Philadelphia, Washington and the other cities to be visited on the spring trip.

While the orchestra management was revising its concert programmes, the "strikers" were arranging for a concert to be given by themselves and union sympathizers in the Colonial Theatre a week from next Sunday night, and in various other enterprises in connection with the continuance of their "strike."

The "strikers" hope later to develop an organization equal to the Boston Symphony, with several weeks season in Boston and several on the road.

The Symphony Orchestra will leave Boston at 7:30 Sunday night for its Southern tour and will play in Washington, Monday; Baltimore, Tuesday; Philadelphia, Wednesday; New York, Thursday; Brooklyn, Friday; New York, Saturday; Newark, N. J., Sunday, returning to Boston on the following Monday for a rehearsal here March 29.

From

30 BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS REFUSE

Fail to Take Seats Follo... cert Master's Suspen...

Boston, March 6.—About 30 ... the Boston Symphony Orches... suance of their decision to ref... unless the managemnt reinsta... eric Fradkin, the concert maste... dismissed last night for failure ... to signal from Conductor Pi... teux, did not take their seats ... night's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, President ... board of trustees of the orches... a committee of the musicians b... concert that Fradkin would no... stated. When they informed ... one-quarter of the orchestra's ... ship would not join in the eveni... gramme, Mr. Cabot announced a ... in the selections to be played, ... the concert was enabled to proce... out them.

Fradkin appeared at Sympho... before the concert but was told ... would not be allowed to take p...

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From Kansas City, Mo.
MAR - 7 1920

"STRIKE" IN BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Thirty Musicians Refused to Play Because Member Wasn't Reinstated.

BOSTON, March 6.—About thirty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from the conductor, Pierre Monteaux, did not take their seats for tonight's concert.

OREGONIAN

ss: Portland, Oregon

BOSTON MUSICIANS QUIT

Symphony Orchestra Force Reduced But Concert Goes On.

BOSTON, March 6.—About 30 members of the Boston symphony orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for tonight's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's programme Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at symphony hall before the concert but was told that he would not be allowed to take part

From

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GOES OVER TO UNION.

[BY A. P. DAY WIRE.]

BOSTON, Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliations, according to a statement made by a committee of the players today. Ninety per cent. of the members have joined the union and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it is said.

Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players' committee as being in sympathy with unionization.

From
Clipper
New York City

STRIKER WANTS TO ARGUE

BOSTON, Mar. 20.—A challenge publicly to debate the merits of the present controversy between the striking players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the management of the orchestra has been sent to Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, by Frederic Fradkin, deposed concert master of the orchestra.

In his challenge Mr. Fradkin leaves the naming of the date, place and all other details to Judge Cabot, his sole interest being, he says, the opportunity to publicly argue the matter with those opposed to the stand taken by the striking players, so that the public may decide which is right.

From Musical Leader
Chicago, Ill.

BOSTON SYMPHONY MEN GO OUT ON STRIKE

Troubles of Venerable Orchestra Result in Walk-Out by One-Third of the Instrumentalists After Discharge of Concertmaster

ACTION PRECIPITATED AT CONCERT

Trustees Refuse to Redress Grievances of Men—Saturday Evening Program Given with Diminished Orchestra Personnel

Boston witnessed its Symphony Orchestra's troubles in dramatic form last week, when Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster and leader of the instrumentalists who seek higher wages and recognition of their union membership, precipitated the situation on the platform of Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, thereby earning his dismissal from the organization, and when, the following evening, the threat of a walk-out caused the hurried substitution of a program for a much diminished orchestra. Public opinion remains divided on the merits of the case, though it is reported that the patrons of the symphony concerts for the most part side with the trustees.

Only recently have members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra been members of the Musicians' Federation, "the union." Until the defection of Dr. Muck, the conductor who was discovered to be a German agent, and the consequent withdrawal of Col. Higginson from the current subsidy of the symphony season, employment was accepted by instrumentalists with the understanding that theirs was an art incapable of being "unionized." Recent discussions have revealed that the minimum of pay to musicians even in motion-picture houses is more than the amount paid to the ordinary Symphony man in Boston and that lack of membership in the Federation has prevented the latter from obtaining outside employment in spare hours.

Two weeks ago it was announced that 90 per cent of the orchestra's players had joined the Federation and that continued non-recognition on the part of the trustees would entail a strike. It was reported, also, that the trustees had not long previously refused the instrumentalists' request for individual increases of $1,000 a year, offering instead engagements for an additional season of popular concerts. On Feb. 26 Frederic Fradkin, the concertmaster, joined the Federation. Eight days later he was discharged from the orchestra.

First, however, he brought about the situation that Associated Press dispatches have made known to all the country. At last Friday afternoon's concert, following the performance of Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," which immediately preceded the intermission, Pierre Monteux, the conductor, motioned to the orchestra men to rise in recognition of applause. Only the concertmaster kept his seat. After the concert he was discharged by the orchestra management on grounds of breach of discipline and affront to the audience and, it is believed, under the clause in the player's contract providing that:

> The corporation shall be the sole and final judge of the behavior and the quality of performance of the said musician, and if in the judgment of the said corporation the said musician has failed to keep his agreement the said corporation, acting by its trustees, may treat this agreement as having been broken by the fault of the said musician and may thereupon dismiss the said musician from its orchestra, paying him his agreed compensation to the time of dismissal.

The players contend that this clause invalidates the contract.

Union members of the orchestra met Saturday afternoon and voted to strike if recognition of their union status and immediate re-instatement of the former concertmaster should not be granted by the trustees. Their demand was refused by Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board, and about 30 per cent (instead of the 90 per cent previously reported as having assumed union affiliations) made known their decision not to appear at the evening concert. A hasty substitution of compositions for small orchestra made possible, however, the presentation of a program at the regular hour. Mr. Fradkin appeared at Symphony Hall, but was not allowed to join the performers.

Mr. Monteux, the conductor, is generally assumed to give little sympathy to the case of the strikers. It is to be noted, nevertheless, that he is himself employed under a contract that, in the case of any controversy between the trustees and the instrumentalists, might make his present duty alien to his permanent sympathy. It is asserted that he is, however, a member of the French Federation of Musicians and as such is obligated to support union claims in any country.

...MERCHANTS
...BACK A NEW
...ON ORCHESTRA

...arch 17.—Boston mer... possible disrup... Symphony Orches... a depressing effect ... would dim the ... as the music ... have expressed ... with the pres... as the nucleus. ... this offer the ... an orchestra ... striking players ... be deferred for ... men and their ... consider carefully ... plan especially ... number of ...

...UNION ...
...BERS ...
...SYMPHONY ...

...Thirty-two ... Symphony ... to-day be... an agree... on to per... further ... immediately

...memories of older days, when musi... keenly coveted positions in the ...on Symphony Orchestra for the pres... it conferred on them, are recalled ...he present contest between musicians ... management over the question of ...nism and the wage scale. That a ... many of the orchestra's players, ...icularly the first violinists, are teach... and that their enrollment of pupils ...aterially swelled by the reputation ... orchestral work gives them, is a ...r that is familiar to friends of the ...ution. Events of recent seasons, ...ever, have brought in a considerable ...ber of younger players, unacquainted ...Boston, who have not yet had time ...stablish themselves as teachers, and ...ng them much of the present agita... has found its fertile field. In a re... statement concerning the salary list ...n out by the management it was ...n that the minimum pay of players ...approximately $1600, which for a ...n of 40 weeks brings it to $40 a ... On the other end of the scale no ...tics are given, for the Boston or... has always included a consid... number of star players whose in... were in proportion to their ar...

...ddition to their income from teach... number of the members have Sun... urch engagements, and there are ... smaller organizations based on ...rchestra's personnel, the Kneisel ...t being the most famous that ever ...out of it. One of the factors af... the situation is that the organi... season is longer, including the ...eks of "pop" concerts, than that ... similar orchestra in the country, ... the member's return from his or... work is greater, per year, than ...here.

...the other side of the argument the ... is made that because they are ...union members the players are ...d from certain summer engage... as in hotel orchestras where union ...rs will not wait except to the melo... of union musicians.

...interesting factor in the situation is ...me which orchestral work demands ... the members. There is no rigidly ...schedule, but in general there are ...rehearsals on days when concerts are ..., while on other days rehearsals ...ordinarily from 10 to 12:30. This ...schedule includes 110 concerts.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

FEB 22 1920

PLAYERS of the Boston Symphony O... crescendo, for a $100,000 rulse, adagi...

From ... EVENING TELE...

Address New York City

Date ... 20 1920

HUB MUSICIANS WANT MORE PAY

Directors of Boston Symphony Orchestra Worried by Demands for Increases.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Mass., Feb. 19.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are up against a real problem. Some eighty players, about four-fifths of the orchestra, and including practically all members save the leaders of the instrumental chorus have demanded an increase in pay of $1,000 per year per man. Some thirty of these are said to have applied for membership in the musicians' union, making their first deposit with the idea eventually of unionizing the whole orchestra. The trustees are not giving serious consideration to the union plans, but are decidedly concerned over the pay increase.

They have no money with which to meet the demand. The present guarantee fund covers the annual deficit, which runs in the neighborhood of $100,000. The trustees realize the justice of the men's demands, in view of the excessive cost of living, and would welcome a solution of the problem. They announced to-day that they had under consideration a plan which was to have been launched May 1, for a public appeal for an endowment fund of $2,000,000, the income to be used to meet the annual deficit.

To meet the $80,000 to $100,000 pay increase and at the same time provide for the deficit would require an endowment fund of $4,000,000. Such a sum the trustees do not believe it advisable to attempt to raise at this time.

EVENING SUN
...ress New York City
...te FEB 19 1920

HIGHER PAY ASKED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Musicians in Orchestra Seek $100,000 Increase.

BOSTON, Feb. 19.—Demand for a wage advance representing approximately $100,000 has been made by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The financial condition of the organization precludes the granting of the demand, it was officially announced. It was authoritatively stated that the trustees, of which Judge Frederick P. Cabot is chairman, are considering the advisability of making an appeal to the public for a $2,000,000 endowment fund, the income from which would be used to meet the yearly deficit in the organization's budget.

The expenses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra amount to about $90,000 a season. The trustees have $100,000 a year to draw on to meet these expenses.

CITIZEN
...s: Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 20 ... A

The troubles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have not yet been settled. The union question is being pressed in a manner that seems to complicate the situation. What appears to be clear to outsiders is that the orchestra cannot in the ordinary sense be at once both unionized and supported for strictly artistic ends.

From Tribune
New York City
FEB 28 1920 D

Hub Orchestra Demands Recognition of Union

Otherwise Musicians Threaten to Disband and Form Organization of Own

BOSTON, Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players to-day. Ninety per cent of the members have joined the union, and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it is said.

Unionization is "the only thing that will hold the organization together," the statement declares. "The players have not received a sufficient salary and, being non-union men, could get little outside work. As a result men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union, and the constant change in membership has been a damper to proper team work."

The players' committee to-day sent formal notice to the trustees of the orchestra that a large majority of the members had affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians as "the only effectual means of remedying conditions no longer tolerable."

The notice asked that players' contracts be revised to enable them "to comply with the duties and obligations fixed by the by-laws of the federation and the principles for which it stands." The trustees were requested to appoint a time and place to meet the committee.

om Times FEB 28 ... E
New York City

BOSTON ORCHESTRA DECLARES FOR UNIO...

Players Announce They Will Form Their Own Orchestra If Recognition Is Not Granted.

BOSTON, Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players today. Ninety per cent. of the members have joined the union and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it is said.

Unionization is "the only thing that will hold the organization together," the statement declares. "The players have not received a sufficient salary and, being non-union men, could get little outside work. As a result men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union, and the constant change in membership has been a damper to proper team work.

"The trustees have assumed a most autocratic attitude toward the men. It was said a year ago that the only opposition to unionization was that the union prohibited bringing players from Europe for the orchestra. The contract labor laws make this impossible now and there should be no objection."

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday, and it is claimed that of the twenty players who have not joined ten have announced their intention of doing so. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players' committee as being in sympathy with unionization.

The trustees have recently rejected a request for an increase of $1,000 a year for each player, but have expressed a willingness to have a Fall season of popular concerts to add to the players' receipts.

The players' committee today sent formal notice to the trustees of the orchesta that a large majority of the members had affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians as "the only effectual means of remedying conditions no longer tolerable." The notice asked that players' contracts be revised to enable them "to comply with the duties and obligations fixed by the by-laws of the federation and the principles for which it stands." The trustees were requested to appoint a time and place to meet the ...

e ... FEB 28 1920 A

MUSICIANS OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WANT $1,000 RAISE

Deficit on Present Season of Organization Will Reach $100,000.

(Special to The New York Review.)

Boston, Feb. 27.—With a deficit of $100,000 staring them in the face to make up at the end of this season the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been asked by the musicians of the organization to give them a raise of $1,000 each next year.

Also, it is claimed that the members of the orchestra, who ask for the increases, realize that their services would not go begging and that players are needed by the New York and the Philadelphia orchestras.

The trustees of the orchestra, however, do not see at this time how the increases can possibly be granted. The matter has been discussed with the players by one of the trustees and it is said the trustees are without means

EVENING SUN
New York City
FEB 28 1920 E

FRADKIN BECOMES LABOR UNIONIST

Boston Symphony Concert Master Wants All to Join.

Special Despatch to THE EVENING SUN.

BOSTON, Feb. 28.—The labor union movement has hit the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra. Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the organization, announced last night that he had joined the Musicians' Union, and that he was in favor of all of the members of the orchestra joining along with him, asserting that their pay is not adequate for the work that they do.

Just what effect the leadership of the concert master of the Symphony Orchestra becoming a labor unionist will have on music in the city of culture can only be guessed at, but Fradkin, in no uncertain terms, announces his stand for the unionization.

"I could not sit in my chair and know that the men behind me are not getting enough salary to buy the things they need to live properly," said the concert master to-day. "I believe that it is to the benefit, individually and collectively, of the members of the orchestra as well as the trustees to have the orchestra unionized. It will produce a better comradeship and morale.

"I have never asked the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra officially for a thing—I have never been refused anything and am antagonistic to no one. I joined the union as a matter of principle. I have no intention of going elsewhere. I have been very happy here and personally have been fairly treated by the trustees.

"Conservative people believe that the unionizing of the orchestra will tend to take away from its high artistic standard. But I firmly believe that the existence of union affiliations among the members will in no way interfere with the artistic standards. It is not an antagonistic movement against the trustees. It is simply a movement for existence.

EVENING SUN
New York City
FEB 28 1920 D

FRADKIN BECOMES LABOR UNIONIST

Boston Symphony Concert Master Wants All to Join.

Special Despatch to THE EVENING SUN.

BOSTON, Feb. 28.—The labor union movement has hit the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra. Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the organization, announced last night that he had joined the Musicians' Union, and that he was in favor of all of the members of the orchestra joining along with him, asserting that their pay is not adequate for the work that they do.

Just what effect the leadership of the concert master of the Symphony Orchestra becoming a labor unionist will have on music in the city of culture can only be guessed at, but Fradkin, in no uncertain terms, announces his stand for the unionization.

"I could not sit in my chair and know that the men behind me are not getting enough salary to buy the things they need to live properly," said the concert master to-day. "I believe that it is to the benefit, individually and collectively, of the members of the orchestra as well as the trustees to have the orchestra unionized. It will produce a better comradeship and morale.

"I have never asked the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra officially for a thing—I have never been refused anything and am antagonistic to no one. I joined the union as a matter of principle. I have no intention of going elsewhere. I have been very happy here and personally have been fairly treated by the trustees.

"Conservative people believe that the unionizing of the orchestra will tend to take away from its high artistic standard. But I firmly believe that the existence of union affiliation among the members will in no way interfere with the artistic standards. It is not an antagonistic movement against the trustees. It is simply a movement for existence.

"The best musicians in America, exclusive of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are union musicians and it has never been found that their union affiliations interfere with their artistic standards. In France every famous conductor belongs to the French Syndicate of Musicians. I think that with the orchestra unionized a larger scope in obtaining material for the orchestra

From FEB 27 ... E
EVENING WORLD,

UNION MUSICIANS THREATEN TO BOLT BOSTON SYMPHON...

Will Play Under Union Affiliatio... Unless Trustees Recognize Their Organization They Declare.

BOSTON, Feb. 27.

UNLESS the Boston Symphony Orchestra Players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a committee of the players to-day. ninety per cent. of the members have joined the union and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered it is said.

Unionization is "the only thing that will hold the organization together," the statement declares. "The players have not received a sufficient salary and, being non-union men, could get little outside work. As a result men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union and the constant change in membership has been a damper to proper team work."

From News
Baltimore, Md.
... 3 ... E

ASK HIGHER SALARIES

Members Of Boston Symphony Orchestra May Join Union.

(By the Associated Press.)

Boston, Feb. 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Orchestra, said today that the question of union membership was not an issue between players and management, although recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the Orchestra and under what conditions.

From FEB ... 3 ... E
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

WOULD CONTROL SYMPHONY

Woman Plans To Replace Higginson In Boston Orchestra.

[Special Dispatch to The Evening Sun.]

Boston, Feb. 23.—Latest gossip concerning the rumpus in Boston Symphony Orchestra circles over the increased pay demanded and threat to unionize the orchestra says that a wealthy Boston woman is back of the whole movement. Her ambition is said to be to secure control of the orchestra similar to that exercised by the late Major Henry L. Higginson. This she believes to be a possibility if the present board of trustees can be ousted.

Her plans are said to include the raising of an endowment fund for the orchestra of $3,000,000, the contributors to be a few close friends, with the main contribution coming from her own purse.

The income from this fund, it is believed, would not only care for the annual deficit, but also be sufficient to meet the increased pay demands.

From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony Me... May Join Unio...

Action Is Contemplated Because R... quest For Increased Wages Was Refused.

Boston, Feb. 19.—Players of the Bo... ton Symphony Orchestra have made joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said today that the question of union membership was not an issue between the players and the management, although recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said that they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

The request for more wages was submitted in a letter and based on the plea that the players' present compensation is inadequate under increased living costs.

POST
...ss Pittsburgh, Pa.
FEB 28 1920

BOSTON, Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players today. Ninety per cent of the members have joined the union, and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered it is said.

...BLISHED 1881
...ers
...om
...Provid...

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS TO JOIN UNION

Boston, Mass., Feb. 20.—F. C. Kingman, President of the local union of musicians of this city, admitted last night that members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had asked to be permitted to join the Musicians' Protective Association, which is a subordinate local of the American Federation of Musicians.

Nearly three-quarters of the personnel of the orchestra held a meeting in Symphony Hall yesterday and discussed local unionism, emphasizing the fact that the Boston orchestra was the only non-union symphony orchestra in the country.

The members have decided to drop their demand for a salary increase and to place the matter in the hands of an official of the musicians' union. He said that of the 100 members, 80 have announced their willingness to join the union and others were expected to come in within a few days.

...ID WARSHIPS
From ...

STRIKING PLAYERS TO HAVE ORCHESTRA

Leaders of the striking Boston Symphony Orchestra players announced yesterday afternoon, after an executive meeting at the union musicians' headquarters on St. Botolph street, that a "Union Boston Symphony Orchestra" will be incorporated within the next few days, with the strikers as a nucleus.

The new symphony, it was said, will be conducted by a board of 24 trustees, whose names will be announced within a day or two, and will include a prominent New England financier. These trustees are prepared to assume all financial responsibility for the strikers' concert on Easter Sunday night at the Colonial Theatre. A series of these concerts and a season of "pops" is under consideration.

It is understood that the 24 trustees have received the pledge from the strikers that the latter will not consummate any new contracts for the remainder of this season and next season, or until released by the trustees from the obligation. In mentioning the pledge the strikers stated that Frederic Fradkin, discharged concert master, rejected a $40,000 contract to conduct a concert tour of this country for the remainder of this season and next season.

Questioned regarding his action, he said it was his desire to remain with the men who stood with him in his "fight for the union principle." He added that 18 of the 24 players who have remained with the Boston Symphony Orchestra have contracted to play with other symphony orchestras next season, but that the strikers had declined

Boston Symphony Musicians Threaten To Leave Management.

Boston, Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphon Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players today. Ninety per cent. of the members have joined the union and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it is said.

Unionization is "the only thing that will hold the organization together," the statement declares. "The players have not received a sufficient salary and being nonunion men could get little outside work. As a result men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union, and the constant change in membership has been a damper to proper teamwork."

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday.

The trustees recently rejected a request for an increase of $1,000 a year for each player, but expre... a willing...

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

PLAYERS of the Boston Symphony Or... crescendo, for a $100,000 raise, adagi...

From.....

Address New York City

Date.....

HUB MUSICIANS WANT MORE PAY

Directors of Boston Symphony Orchestra Worried by Demands for Increases.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Mass., Feb. 19.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are up against a real problem. Some eighty players, about four-fifths of the orchestra, and including practically all members save the leaders of the instrumental chorus have demanded an increase in pay of $1,000 per year per man. Some thirty of these are said to have applied for membership in the musicians' union, making their first deposit with the idea eventually of unionizing the whole orchestra. The trustees are not giving serious consideration to the union plans, but are decidedly concerned over the pay increase.

They have no money with which to meet the demand. The present guarantee fund covers the annual deficit, which runs in the neighborhood of $100,000. The trustees realize the justice of the men's demands, in view of the excessive cost of living, and would welcome a solution of the problem. They announced to-day that they had under consideration a plan which was to have been launched May 1, for a public appeal for an endowment fund of $2,000,000, the income to be used to meet the annual deficit.

To meet the $80,000 to $100,000 pay increase and at the same time provide for the deficit would require an endowment fund of $4,000,000. Such a sum the trustees do not believe it advisable to attempt to raise at this time.

EVENING SUN

...ress New York City

...te.....

HIGHER PAY ASKED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Musicians in Orchestra Seek $100,000 Increase.

BOSTON, Feb. 19.—Demand for a wage advance representing approximately $100,000 has been made by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The financial condition of the organization precludes the granting of the demand, it was officially announced. It was authoritatively stated that the trustees, of which Judge Frederick P. Cabot is chairman, are considering the advisability of making an appeal to the public for a $2,000,000 endowment fund, the income from which would be used to meet the yearly deficit in the organization's budget.

The expenses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra amount to about $90,000 a season. The trustees have $100,000 a year to draw on to meet these expenses.

...Newspaper

CITIZEN

...s: Brooklyn, N. Y.

The troubles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have not yet been settled. The union question is being pressed in a manner that seems to complicate the situation. What appears to be clear to outsiders is that the orchestra cannot in the ordinary sense be at once both unionized and supported for strictly artistic ends.

From Tribune
New York City

Hub Orchestra Demands Recognition of Union

Otherwise Musicians Threaten to Disband and Form Organization of Own

BOSTON, Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players to-day. Ninety per cent of the members have joined the union, and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it is said.

Unionization is "the only thing that will hold the organization together," the statement declares. "The players have not received a sufficient salary and, being non-union men, could get little outside work. As a result men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union, and the constant change in membership has been a damper to proper team work."

The players' committee to-day sent formal notice to the trustees of the orchestra that a large majority of the members had affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians as "the only effectual means of remedying conditions no longer tolerable."

The notice asked that players' contracts be revised to enable them "to comply with the duties and obligations fixed by the by-laws of the federation and the principles for which it stands." The trustees were requested to appoint a time and place to meet the committee.

om Times
New York City

BOSTON ORCHESTRA // DECLARES FOR UNIO

Players Announce They Will Form Their Own Orchestra If Recognition Is Not Granted.

BOSTON, Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players today. Ninety per cent. of the members have joined the union and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it is said.

Unionization is "the only thing that will hold the organization together," the statement declares. "The players have not received a sufficient salary and, being non-union men, could get little outside work. As a result men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union, and the constant change in membership has been a damper to proper team work."

"The trustees have assumed a most autocratic attitude toward the men. It was said a year ago that the only opposition to unionization was that the union prohibited bringing players from Europe for the orchestra. The contract labor laws make this impossible now and there should be no objection."

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday, and it is claimed that of the twenty players who have not joined ten have announced their intention of doing so. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players' committee as being in sympathy with unionization.

The trustees have recently rejected a request for an increase of $1,000 a year for each player, but have expressed a willingness to have a Fall season of popular concerts to add to the players' receipts.

The players' committee today sent formal notice to the trustees of the orchesta that a large majority of the members had affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians as "the only effectual means of remedying conditions no longer tolerable." The notice asked that players' contracts be revised to enable them "to comply with the duties and obligations fixed by the by-laws of the federation and the principles for which it stands." The trustees were requested to appoint a time and place to meet the committee.

...e.....

MUSICIANS OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WANT $1,000 RAISE

Deficit on Present Season of Organization Will Reach $100,000.

(Special to The New York Review.)

Boston, Feb. 27.—With a deficit of $100,000 staring them in the face to make up at the end of this season the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been asked by the musicians of the organization to give them a raise of $1,000 each next year.

Also, it is claimed that the members of the orchestra, who ask for the increases, realize that their services would not go begging and that players are needed by the New York and the Philadelphia orchestras.

The trustees of the orchestra, however, do not see at this time how the increases can possibly be granted. The matter has been discussed with the players by one of the trustees and it is said the trustees are without means

EVENING SUN
New York City

FRADKIN BECOMES LABOR UNIONIST

Boston Symphony Concert Master Wants All to Join.

Special Despatch to THE EVENING SUN.

BOSTON, Feb. 28.—The labor union movement has hit the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra. Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the organization, announced last night that he had joined the Musicians' Union, and that he was in favor of all of the members of the orchestra joining along with him, asserting that their pay is not adequate for the work that they do.

Just what effect the leadership of the concert master of the Symphony Orchestra becoming a labor unionist will have on music in the city of culture can only be guessed at, but Fradkin, in no uncertain terms, announces his stand for the unionization.

"I could not sit in my chair and know that the men behind me are not getting enough salary to buy the things they need to live properly," said the concert master to-day. "I believe that it is to the benefit, individually and collectively, of the members of the orchestra as well as the trustees to have the orchestra unionized. It will produce a better comradeship and morale.

"I have never asked the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra officially for a thing—I have never been refused anything and am antagonistic to no one. I joined the union as a matter of principle. I have no intention of going elsewhere. I have been very happy here and personally have been fairly treated by the trustees.

"Conservative people believe that the unionizing of the orchestra will tend to take away from its high artistic standard. But I firmly believe that the existence of union affiliations among the members will in no way interfere with the artistic standards. It is not an antagonistic movement against the trustees. It is simply a movement for existence.

EVENING SUN
New York City

FRADKIN BECOMES LABOR UNIONIST

Boston Symphony Concert Master Wants All to Join.

Special Despatch to THE EVENING SUN.

BOSTON, Feb. 28.—The labor union movement has hit the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra. Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the organization, announced last night that he had joined the Musicians' Union, and that he was in favor of all of the members of the orchestra joining along with him, asserting that their pay is not adequate for the work that they do.

Just what effect the leadership of the concert master of the Symphony Orchestra becoming a labor unionist will have on music in the city of culture can only be guessed at, but Fradkin, in no uncertain terms, announces his stand for the unionization.

"I could not sit in my chair and know that the men behind me are not getting enough salary to buy the things they need to live properly," said the concert master to-day. "I believe that it is to the benefit, individually and collectively, of the members of the orchestra as well as the trustees to have the orchestra unionized. It will produce a better comradeship and morale.

"I have never asked the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra officially for a thing—I have never been refused anything and am antagonistic to no one. I joined the union as a matter of principle. I have no intention of going elsewhere. I have been very happy here and personally have been fairly treated by the trustees.

"Conservative people believe that the unionizing of the orchestra will tend to take away from its high artistic standard. But I firmly believe that the existence of union affiliation among the members will in no way interfere with the artistic standards. It is not an antagonistic movement against the trustees. It is simply a movement for existence.

From EVENING WORLD,

UNION MUSICIANS THREATEN TO BOLT BOSTON SYMPHON

Will Play Under Union Affiliatio Unless Trustees Recognize Their Organization They Declare.

BOSTON, Feb. 27.

UNLESS the Boston Symphony Orchestra Players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a committee of the players to-day. ninety per cent. of the members have joined the union and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered it is said.

Unionization is "the only thing that will hold the organization together," the statement declares. "The players have not received a sufficient salary and, being non-union men, could get little outside work. As a result men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union and the constant change in membership has been a damper to proper team work."

From News
Baltimore, Md.

ASK HIGHER SALARIES

Members Of Boston Symphony Orchestra May Join Union.

(By the Associated Press.)

Boston, Feb. 18.—Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made a joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Orchestra, said today that the question of union membership was not an issue between players and management, although recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said they would claim the right to say who should play with the Orchestra and under what conditions.

...m
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

WOULD CONTROL SYMPHONY

Woman Plans To Replace Higginson In Boston Orchestra.

[Special Dispatch to The Evening Sun.]

Boston, Feb. 23.—Latest gossip concerning the rumpus in Boston Symphony Orchestra circles over the increased pay demanded and threat to unionize the orchestra says that a wealthy Boston woman is back of the whole movement. Her ambition is said to be to secure control of the orchestra similar to that exercised by the late Major Henry L. Higginson. This she believes to be a possibility if the present board of trustees can be ousted.

Her plans are said to include the raising of an endowment fund for the orchestra of $3,000,000, the contributors to be a few close friends, with the main contribution coming from her own purse.

The income from this fund, it is believed, would not only care for the annual deficit, but also be sufficient to meet the increased pay demands.

From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony Me... May Join Unio...

Action Is Contemplated Because R... quest For Increased Wages Was Refused.

Boston, Feb. 19.—Players of the Bo... ton Symphony Orchestra have made joint request for increased wages and have taken steps toward joining the Musicians' Union. The wage request, involving an annual advance of approximately $100,000, has been refused.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, said today that the question of union membership was not an issue between the players and the management, although recognition of a union had been refused because union leaders said that they would claim the right to say who should play with the orchestra and under what conditions.

The request for more wages was submitted in a letter and based on the plea that the players' present compensation is inadequate under increased living costs.

POST
...ss Pittsburgh, Pa.
FEB 28 1920

BOSTON, Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players today. Ninety per cent of the members have joined the union, and financial backing for the reposed new orchestra has been offered it is said.

...BLISHED 1881

...om

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS TO JOIN UNION

Boston, Mass., Feb. 20.—F. C. Kingman, President of the local union of musicians of this city, admitted last night that members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had asked to be permitted to join the Musicians' Protective Association, which is a subordinate local of the American Federation of Musicians.

Nearly three-quarters of the personnel of the orchestra held a meeting in Symphony Hall yesterday and discussed local unionism, emphasizing the fact that the Boston orchestra was the only non-union symphony orchestra in the country.

The members have decided to drop their demand for a salary increase and to place the matter in the hands of an official of the musicians' union. He said that of the 100 members, 80 have announced their willingness to join the union and others were expected to come in within a few days.

...IP WARSHIPS...

From

STRIKING PLAYERS TO HAVE ORCHESTRA

Leaders of the striking Boston Symphony Orchestra players announced yesterday afternoon, after an executive meeting at the union musicians' headquarters on St. Botolph street, that a "Union Boston Symphony Orchestra" will be incorporated within the next few days, with the strikers as a nucleus.

The new symphony, it was said, will be conducted by a board of 24 trustees, whose names will be announced within a day or two, and will include a prominent New England financier. These trustees are prepared to assume all financial responsibility for the strikers' concert on Easter Sunday night at the Colonial Theatre. A series of these concerts and a season of "pops" is under consideration.

It is understood that the 24 trustees have received the pledge from the strikers that the latter will not consummate any new contracts for the remainder of this season and next season, or until released by the trustees from the obligation. In mentioning the pledge the strikers stated that Frederic Fradkin, discharged concert master, rejected a $40,000 contract to conduct a concert tour of this country for the remainder of this season and next season.

Questioned regarding his action, he said it was his desire to remain with the men who stood with him in his "fight for the union principle." He added that 18 of the 24 players who have remained with the Boston Symphony Orchestra have contracted to play with other symphony orchestras next season, but that the strikers had declined

Boston Symphony Musicians Threaten To Leave Management.

Boston, Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphon Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players today. Ninety per cent. of the members have joined the union and financial backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it is said.

Unionization is "the only thing that will hold the organization together," the statement declares. "The players have not received a sufficient salary and being nonunion men could get little outside work. As a result men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union, and the constant change in membership has been a damper to proper teamwork."

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday.

The trustees recently rejected a request for an increase of $1,000 a year for each player, but expre... a willing...

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From ROCHESTER, N. Y. MAR - 9 1920
Address New York City
Date MAR 12

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY TAKE WOMEN PLAYERS

Labor Controversy Threatens to Disrupt Plans of Famous Orchestra.

New York musical circles yesterday were agitated over the telegraphed story from Boston that the labor unrest and internal troubles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have reached such a stage that it may be necessary to enlist women musicians to fill the depleted ranks of Pierre Monteux's band or abandon the engagement of the orchestra at Carnegie Hall here next week. The new developments in the trouble between the trustees of the orchestra and the thirty-five members who struck on the eve of last Saturday night's concert included the refusal of the thirty-five to have anything more to do with the orchestra save as full-fledged union members under full union conditions; the likelihood of the trustees being compelled to recruit players to fill the vacancies from the ranks of women musicians, owing to the union's hostility preventing available men from accepting positions with the orchestra, and a statement by the trustees to symphony concert patrons setting forth their side in the controversy.

The trustees in their statement say that for the judgment and discretion of a board of trustees the rules of the American Federation of Musicians would substitute the judgment of the executive board of the federation, a body with whom the musical supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be and probably ought to be, of an importance quite secondary to the welfare of the federation.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Times
New York City

Boston Symphony Orchestra May Get Women Musicians

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, March 10.—Today's developments in the trouble between the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the thirty-five members who struck on the eve of last Saturday night's concert included the refusal of the thirty-five to have anything more to do with the orchestra save as full-fledged union members under full union conditions; the likelihood of the trustees being compelled to recruit players to fill the vacancies from the ranks of women musicians, owing to the union's hostility preventing available men from accepting positions with the orchestra, and a statement by the trustees to symphony concert patrons, setting forth their side in the controversy.

The trustees in their statement say that for the judgment and discretion of a Board of Trustees the rules of the American Federation of Musicians would substitute the judgment of the Executive Board of the federation, a body with whom the musical supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be, and probably ought to be, of an importance quite secondary to the welfare of the federation.

From
Address New York City
Date

...kin Is Dismissed From Boston Symphony

...ston, March 6.—Frederick Fradkin, concert master of the Boston ...phony Orchestra, was dismissed by the board of trustees last night. ...son for the dismissal was given ...Fradkin's failure to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment in order at the public rehearsal this afternoon."

Fradkin failed to rise when Conductor Pierre Monteux motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause. He said he consid-

...om
...dress New York City
MAR 10

Boston Symphony On Strike After 30 Members Are Fired

BOSTON, March 11.—Thirty-two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were dismissed today because they refused to sign an agreement the specified "intention to perform their contracts without further breach." A strike was immediately called by the musicians.

Trustees yesterday voted to reinstate the members who signed the agreement which called for payment of a fine of $10 for violation of their contract. Three members signed. The ... used and were dismissed.

Striking Boston Symphony Players Return to Places

Boston, March 9.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, which was almost disrupted by a strike of thirty-five players at its regular concert Saturday night, held a rehearsal yesterday with full ranks. The strike was abandoned at the request of Frederic Fradkin, the former concert master, whose discharge for publicly snubbing Conductor Pierre Monteux was resented by some of the players.

After the rehearsal, the players, who are members of a newly organized union, held a meeting at which it was said demands upon the management would formulated. An advance of $1,000 a year for all players has been requested, and refused. Recognition of the union, which was recently asked, has not been granted as yet.

Threaten Break Unless Affiliation Is Recognized by Trustees

BOSTON, Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves after union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players today. Ninety per cent. of the members have joined the union, and official backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it is said.

Unionization is "the only thing that will hold the organization together," the statement declares. "The players have not received a sufficient salary and, being non-union men, could get little outside work. As a result men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union and the constant change in membership has been a damper to proper team work."

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players' committee as being in sympathy with unionization.

The trustees recently rejected a request for an increase of $1000 a year for each player, but expressed a willingness to have a fall season of popular concerts to add to the players' receipts.

The players' committee today sent formal notice to the trustees of the orchestra that a large majority of the members had affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians. The trustees were requested to appoint a time and place to meet the committee.

From Herald
New York City

RIVAL BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Offers Are Made to Back Discharged Musicians.

Special to THE SUN AND NEW YORK HERALD.

BOSTON, March 11.—Wealthy patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made offers to back the thirty-five discharged musicians in forming a rival organization, it was stated to-day by Arthur Berenson, their attorney. It also became known to-day that the discharged artists will soon tour leading New England cities and possibly New York with Frederic Fradkin, the deposed concert master and storm centre in the controversy, as conductor.

It is reported that women may replace the union players in the Boston orchestra. Judge Cabot, head of the trustees, admitted that the idea is under consideration. "There are undoubtedly women who can qualify and I see no objection," he declared.

...ess New York City
MAR 11

Acting Mayor Tells Boston Symphony To Continue Strike

BOSTON, March 10.—Acting Mayor Moriarity urged union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to continue their strike for recognition of the union at a meeting today at Musicians' Union headquarters.

The meeting was held to determine what action their committee should take at their conference with the trustees later. About 50 of the symphony musicians attended.

Union officials declined to make known their new demands, which will be offered to the committee representing the trustees. It has been planned to settle all matters relating to the strike at this ...

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO REPLACE STRIKERS

...phony Management Gives ...en Until Today to Return— Will Make Southern Tour.

...STON, March 11. — The Boston ...phony Orchestra, depleted by a ...e of one-third of its players, will ...recruited to full strength within a ...or two, according to a statement ...the management today. The men ...ck first on Saturday because of the ...harge of Concert Master Fradkin ...again yesterday because their pay ... withheld pending disciplinary ...on. They are forming an independent orchestra with Fradkin as ...der for a tour of New England.

...he strikers will be given until to-...row to return, after which their ...es will be filled, it is said. Former ...mbers of the orchestra, some of ...om have already volunteered, will ...t be called upon. The possibility ...t women may be taken into the ...anization for the first time has been ...gested.

...he orchestra held its daily rehearsal today without the thirty-two strikers, who met at union headquarters and discussed their further procedure.

The orchestra will make its Southern tour beginning next week, the management announced.

NEW YORK PUBLIC
ESTABLISHED 1881
From Ledger
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

PHILADELPHIA

I AM pleased to report that Benno Moiseiwitsch rather swung the critics into line at his recent pianoforte recital in Carnegie Hall. In his first efforts here the Russian was called a "minimist," but he played with enough breadth and sweep on this occasion to compel a reversal of opinion on the part of some reviewers who were fair enough to express a change of mind. Next season should find Moiseiwitsch more popular than ever with his audiences, for he is a distinguished pianist who takes his art with the seriousness it deserves.

Very little credence is being given the "rumor" of a possible merging of the Philharmonic and New Symphony orchestras, but what many people do not know is that the rumor was a life-sized affair. I am informed from an unquestionably reliable Philharmonic source that a definite proposal was made by the New Symphony Orchestra to join forces. The latter organization declares, however, the conference actually held by the two orchestras was a "get-together" affair which each had an equal part in starting. And there you are.

L

While we are on the subject of orchestras it is pertinent to comment upon the final two concerts given here by the crippled Boston musicians. What a pity that this once premier band should have so fallen in strength of personnel! Twenty-four of the "striking" regulars were replaced on these two occasions by former instrumentalists whose best days have gone. The playing achievements were therefore much below the former Boston symphony mark. What the future of this institution is to be seems a hazardous conjecture, but there can be no doubt about the seriousness of the situation, in which the question of "unionization" is a leading issue.

* * *

m Morning Citizen
ress New York City
e
MAR 2

Are Women Musicians to Scab?

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's plight is putting a new problem up to women. Thirty-five men members of the orchestra struck on Saturday, March 8, and refused to have anything more to do with the orchestra, except as full union conditions were met. It is announced that the trustees will, in all likelihood, recruit players from the ranks of women musicians.

Now what will the women do?

As women they have hitherto been discriminated against by men. This may be an opening wedge for them to take their proper places in orchestral music. If they do take the places of strikers, they will be accounted scabs.

Is it better to scab on men who have crowded them out, or hold out for an economic position which will pre-eminently benefit men if it is attained?

Going and coming the women seem to be at a disadvantage.

HAVE ROW OVER DRESSING ROOM

Quarrell Between Symphony Conductor and Concert Master Nearly Caused Strike of Players.

Boston, March 5.—An open breach between Pierre B. Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the same body and members of the union, created last night, when the conductor ordered Mr. Fradkin to dress with the players.

The custom has been for the conductor and concertmaster to use the same dressing room.

The trouble came at the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last night, when the orchestra was to play, and nearly caused a strike of the players, who staged the concert only after pressure had been brought to bear on them by members of the union players' committee of seven and by Mr. Fradkin himself. The players, however, will demand that an apology be made to Mr. Fradkin, it was stated last night.

Mr. Fradkin could not be reached last night, but the story was verified by a members of the players' committee, who accompanied the concertmaster to his home.

The trouble started when Mr. Fradkin entered the dressing room of Conductor Monteux last night. The custom has been for both men to use the same room. Mr. Monteux, however, immediately informed Mr. Fradkin that the room was for the management and since he now was one of the musicians he might as well dress with them. The concertmaster was dumfounded, hardly believing his ears, at first and questioned the conductor three or four times, each time receiving the same reply.

PLAYERS INCENSED.

Mr. Fradkin then went to the players' room. Here the news of the break spread quickly, and the players becoming incensed said they would refuse to appear. Then they demanded that the conductor apologize to Mr. Fradkin. Finally, however, the matter was dropped temporarily by the players, after much urging by members of the union committee and especially by Mr. Fradkin himself, and the concert was given.

The players, however, will demand of the board of trustees that Conductor Monteux apologize to the concertmaster for his action last night.

Last night's episode is believed to be the result of the present controversy over the unionization of the orchestra.

MAR 21 1920 A
Journal

Boston Strikers Are Active.

The striking Boston Symphony players have taken legal steps toward the formation of an orchestra of their own. Frederic Fradkin, the discharged concertmaster, announced at a recent meeting of the strikers that four Boston women had promised support to the extent of $25,000 each.

The new organization is planned to be all-American, not only in personnel but in compositions played. It is stated, too, that scholarships will be offered needy and talented students, and that the director will be "the most gifted composer and conductor in America today." Henry Hadley has been mentioned as the man. He has expressed his unwillingness to confirm or deny the rumor in a statement for publication. He admits there are all sorts of reports going about and that "sometimes people think they want one man and then they want another," but prefers not to say whether he has been approached.

The striking players will give a benefit concert in Boston to-night, led by Emil Mollenhauer, the programme including a solo by Fradkin. Joseph N. Webber, President of the American Federation of Musicians, is to give an address. In the meantime the Symphony's ranks are being filled with students from the Conservatory of Music and pensioners who have been recalled.

A Tschaikowsky Opera.

From
Clipper 31 1920 H
New York City

$500,000 TO BACK ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, March 28.—The thirty-three striking members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have a guarantee of $500,000 for the support of a new symphony orchestra. It has been promised that the identity of their backer will be disclosed at a concert Easter Sunday night, at which time Enrico Caruso is expected to sing.

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS ON STRIKE

Thirty Members Refuse to Take Seats When Reinstatement Is Refused Concert Master

Boston, March 6—About 30 members of the symphony orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for to-night's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's program, Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony ha... before the concert, but was told tha... he would not be allowed to take par...

Providence, R. I.
MAR 5 1920 E

...Early in the movement Mr. Fradkin surprised players and management alike by voluntarily applying for admission to the union. Since that time he has been extremely active in the movement to organize the orchestra and has acted with the committee of seven, which is conducting the union players' affairs.

From Providence
MAR 22 1920 A

BOSTON SYMPHONY STRIKERS GIVE FIRST CONCERT

Boston, March 22.—An audience responsive to the programme in all its phases greeted the striking players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their concert at the Colonial Theatre last night. The greatest demonstration centred about Fredric Gradkin, deposed concertmaster of the Symphony Orchestra.

There was also vigorous response for Harry D. Brenton of the American Federation of Musicians and the sentiments he expressed in a speech as representative of President Joseph N. Webber of the association, who was unable to be present.

Mr. Fradkin was recalled four times after he had rendered the Meditation from "Thais" as a violin solo and was compelled to give two encores, Greisler's "Tambourine Chinois" and "The Beautiful Rosemarin." Gustav Heim drew hearty applause with a trumpet solo, "The Last Chord."

Emil Mollenhauer conducted the concert, which opened with "The Star Spangled Banner." Then followed "Lenore" No. 3 and Bizet's "Les Toreadors."

Both balconies were filled solidly when the concert opened and the orchestra floor was crowded almost to capacity. The ranks of the strikers were reinforced for the concert by other union musicians of the city.

TELEGRAM
New York City
MAR 29 1920 L

The gaps made in the personnel of ... Boston Symphony Orchestra due to ... men members going on strike, will prob... bly be filled by women musicians.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Variety APR 2 - 1920 H
New York City

SYMPHONY STRIKERS WIN.

Boston, March 31.

The strikers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to be organized as the "Union Boston Symphony Orchestra," and it is said arrangements are completed for them to give a series of "pop" concerts during the summer with regular concerts here in the winter.

...om
Bulletin MAR 27 1920 M
Philadelphia, Pa.

...ter the casual ... [illegible]

—The gaps made in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra due to the men members going on strike, will probably be filled by women musicians.

—Because women are plentiful and ca...

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ROCHESTER, N. Y. MAR - 9 1920 POST

Address New York City

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY TAKE WOMEN PLAYERS

Labor Controversy Threatens to Disrupt Plans of Famous Orchestra.

New York musical circles yesterday were agitated over the telegraphed story from Boston that the labor unrest and internal troubles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have reached such a stage that it may be necessary to enlist women musicians to fill the depleted ranks of Pierre Monteux's band or abandon the engagement of the orchestra at Carnegie Hall here next week. The new developments in the trouble between the trustees of the orchestra and the thirty-five members who struck on the eve of last Saturday night's concert included the refusal of the thirty-five to have anything more to do with the orchestra save as full-fledged union members under full union conditions; the likelihood of the trustees being compelled to recruit players to fill the vacancies from the ranks of women musicians, owing to the union's hostility preventing available men from accepting positions with the orchestra, and a statement by the trustees to symphony concert patrons, setting forth their side in the controversy.

The trustees in their statement say that for the judgment and discretion of a board of trustees the rules of the American Federation of Musicians would substitute the judgment of the executive board of the federation, a body with whom the musical supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be, and probably ought to be, of an importance quite secondary to the welfare of the federation.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Times

New York City

Boston Symphony Orchestra May Get Women Musicians

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, March 10.—Today's developments in the trouble between the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the thirty-five members who struck on the eve of last Saturday night's concert included the refusal of the thirty-five to have anything more to do with the orchestra save as full-fledged union members under full union conditions; the likelihood of the trustees being compelled to recruit players to fill the vacancies from the ranks of women musicians, owing to the union's hostility preventing available men from accepting positions with the orchestra, and a statement by the trustees to symphony concert patrons, setting forth their side in the controversy.

The trustees in their statement say that for the judgment and discretion of a Board of Trustees the rules of the American Federation of Musicians would substitute the judgment of the Executive Board of the federation, a body with whom the musical supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be, and probably ought to be, of an importance quite secondary to the welfare of the federation.

m

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Adkin Is Dismissed From Boston Symphony

Boston, March 6.—Frederick Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was dismissed by the board of trustees last night. The reason for the dismissal was given as Fradkin's failure to keep his written agreement in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment in order at the public rehearsal this afternoon.

Fradkin failed to rise when Conductor Pierre Monteux motioned to the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause. He said he consid-

om

ddress New York City

MAR

Boston Symphony On Strike After 30 Members Are Fired

BOSTON, March 11.—Thirty-two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were dismissed today because they refused to sign an agreement that specified "intention to perform their contracts without further breach." A strike was immediately called by the musicians.

Trustees yesterday voted to reinstate and members who signed the agreement which called for payment of a of $10 for violation of their contract. Three members signed. The refused and were dismissed.

Striking Boston Symphony Players Return to Places

Boston, March 9.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, which was almost disrupted by a strike of thirty-five players at its regular concert Saturday night, held a rehearsal yesterday with full ranks. The strike was abandoned at the request of Frederic Fradkin, the former concert master, whose discharge for publicly snubbing Conductor Pierre Monteux was resented by some of the players.

After the rehearsal, the players, who are members of a newly organized union, held a meeting at which it was said demands upon the management would formulated. An advance of $1,000 a year for all players has been requested, and refused. Recognition of the union, which was recently asked, has not been granted as yet.

Threaten Break Unless Affiliation Is Recognized by Trustees

BOSTON, Feb. 27.—Unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra players are recognized as a union by the trustees, they will form an orchestra themselves under union affiliation, according to a statement made by a committee of the players today. Ninety per cent. of the members have joined the union, and official backing for the proposed new orchestra has been offered, it is said.

Unionization is "the only thing that will hold the organization together," the statement declares. "The players have not received a sufficient salary and, being non-union men, could get little outside work. As a result men have left the orchestra year after year to join the union and the constant change in membership has been a damper to proper team work."

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, joined the union yesterday, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, is represented by the players' committee as being in sympathy with unionization.

The trustees recently rejected a request for an increase of $1000 a year for each player, but expressed a willingness to have a fall season of popular concerts to add to the players' receipts.

The players' committee today sent formal notice to the trustees of the orchestra that a large majority of the members had affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians. The trustees were requested to appoint a time and place to meet the committee.

From Herald

New York City

RIVAL BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Offers Are Made to Back Discharged Musicians.

Special to THE SUN AND NEW YORK HERALD.

BOSTON, March 11.—Wealthy patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have made offers to back the thirty-five discharged musicians in forming a rival organization, it was stated to-day by Arthur Berenson, their attorney. It also became known to-day that the discharged artists will soon tour leading New England cities and possibly New York with Frederic Fradkin, the deposed concert master and storm centre in the controversy, as conductor.

It is reported that women may replace the union players in the Boston orchestra. Judge Cabot, head of the trustees, admitted that the idea is under consideration. "There are undoubtedly women who can qualify and I see no objection," he declared.

ss New York City

MAR

Acting Mayor Tells Boston Symphony To Continue Strike

BOSTON, March 10.—Acting Mayor Moriarity urged union members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to continue their strike for recognition of the union at a meeting today at Musicians' Union headquarters.

The meeting was held to determine what action their committee should take at their conference with the trustees later. About 50 of the symphony musicians attended.

Union officials declined to make known their new demands, which will be offered to the committee representing the trustees. It has been planned to settle all matters relating to the strike at this ses-

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO REPLACE STRIKERS

Symphony Management Gives Men Until Today to Return—Will Make Southern Tour.

BOSTON, March 11. — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, depleted by a strike of one-third of its players, will be recruited to full strength within a week or two, according to a statement issued by the management today. The men struck first on Saturday because of the discharge of Concert Master Fradkin and again yesterday because their pay had been withheld pending disciplinary action. They are forming an independent orchestra with Fradkin as leader for a tour of New England.

The strikers will be given until tomorrow to return, after which their places will be filled, it is said. Former members of the orchestra, some of whom have already volunteered, will not be called upon. The possibility that women may be taken into the organization for the first time has been suggested.

The orchestra held its daily rehearsal today without the thirty-two strikers, who met at union headquarters and discussed their further procedure.

The orchestra will make its Southern tour beginning next week, the management announced.

NEW YORK PUBLIC

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Ledger

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Are Women Musicians to Scab?

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's plight is putting a new problem up to women. Thirty-five men members of the orchestra struck on Saturday, March 8, and refused to have anything more to do with the orchestra, except as full union conditions were met. It is announced that the trustees will, in all likelihood, recruit players from the ranks of women musicians.

Now what will the women do?

As women they have hitherto been discriminated against by men. This may be an opening wedge for them to take their proper places in orchestral music. If they do take the places of strikers, they will be accounted scabs.

Is it better to scab on men who have crowded them out, or hold out for an economic position which will pre-eminently benefit men if it is attained?

Going and coming the women seem to be at a disadvantage.

I AM pleased to report that Benno Moiseiwitsch rather swung the critics into line at his recent pianoforte recital in Carnegie Hall. In his first efforts here the Russian was called a "miniaturist," but he played with enough breadth and sweep on this occasion to compel a reversal of opinion on the part of some reviewers who were fair enough to express a change of mind. Next season should find Moiseiwitsch more popular than ever with his audiences, for he is a distinguished pianist who takes his art with the seriousness it deserves.

Very little credence is being given the "rumor" of a possible merging of the Philharmonic and New Symphony orchestras, but what many people do not know is that the rumor was a life-sized affair. I am informed from an unquestionably reliable Philharmonic source that a definite proposal was made by the New Symphony Orchestra to join forces. The latter organization declares, however, the conference actually held by the two orchestras was a "get-together" affair which each had an equal part in starting. And there you are.

While we are on the subject of orchestras it is pertinent to comment upon the final two concerts given here by the crippled Boston musicians. What a pity that this once premier band should have so fallen in strength of personnel! Twenty-four of the "striking" regulars were replaced on these two occasions by former instrumentalists whose best days have gone. The playing achievements were therefore much below the former Boston symphony mark. What the future of this institution is to be seems a hazardous conjecture, but there can be no doubt about the seriousness of the situation, in which the question of "unionization" is a leading issue.

* * *

m

ress New York City

e

MAR

HAVE ROW OVER DRESSING ROOM

Quarrell Between Symphony Conductor and Concert Master Nearly Caused Strike of Players.

Boston, March 5.—An open breach between Pierre B. Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the same body and members of the union, created last night, when the conductor ordered Mr. Fradkin to dress with the players.

The custom has been for the conductor and concertmaster to use the same dressing room.

The trouble came at the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last night, when the orchestra was to play, and nearly caused a strike of the players, who staged the concert only after pressure had been brought to bear on them by members of the union players' committee of seven and by Mr. Fradkin himself. The players, however, will demand that an apology be made to Mr. Fradkin, it was stated last night.

Mr. Fradkin could not be reached last night, but the story was verified by a members of the players' committee, who accompanied the concertmaster to his home.

The trouble started when Mr. Fradkin entered the dressing room of Conductor Monteux last night. The custom has been for both men to use the same room. Mr. Monteux, however, immediately informed Mr. Fradkin that the room was for the management and since he now was one of the musicians he might as well dress with them. The concertmaster was dumfounded, hardly believing his ears, at first and questioned the conductor three or four times, each time receiving the same reply.

PLAYERS INCENSED.

Mr. Fradkin then went to the players' room. Here the news of the break spread quickly and the players becoming incensed said they would refuse to appear. Then they demanded that the conductor apologize to Mr. Fradkin. Finally, however, the matter was dropped temporarily by the players, after much urging by members of the union committee and especially by Mr. Fradkin himself, and the concert was given.

The players, however, will demand of the board of trustees that Conductor Monteux apologize to the concertmaster for his action last night.

Last night's episode is believed to be the result of the present controversy over the unionization of the orchestra.

Boston Strikers Are Active.

The striking Boston Symphony players have taken legal steps toward the formation of an orchestra of their own. Frederic Fradkin, the discharged concertmaster, announced at a recent meeting of the strikers that four Boston women had promised support to the extent of $25,000 each.

The new organization is planned to be all-American, not only in personnel but in compositions played. It is stated, too, that scholarships will be offered needy and talented students, and that the director will be "the most gifted composer and conductor in America today." Henry Hadley has been mentioned as the man. He has expressed his unwillingness to confirm or deny the rumor in a statement for publication. He admits there are all sorts of reports going about and that "sometimes people think they want one man and then they want another," but prefers not to say whether he has been approached.

The striking players will give a benefit concert in Boston to-night, led by Emil Mollenhauer, the programme including a solo by Fradkin. Joseph N. Webber, President of the American Federation of Musicians, is to give an address. In the meantime the Symphony's ranks are being filled with students from the Conservatory of Music and pensioners who have been recalled.

A Tschaikowsky Opera.

From Clipper

New York City

1920 H

$500,000 TO BACK ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, March 28.—The thirty-three striking members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have a guarantee of $500,000 for the support of a new symphony orchestra. It has been promised that the identity of their backer will be disclosed at a concert Easter Sunday night, at which time Enrico Caruso is expected to sing.

From Republican

Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS ON STRIKE

Thirty Members Refuse to Take Seats When Reinstatement Is Refused Concert Master

Boston, March 6—About 30 members of the symphony orchestra, in pursuance of their decision to refuse to play unless the management reinstated Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, who was dismissed last night for failure to respond to a signal from Conductor Pierre Monteux, did not take their seats for to-night's concert.

Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, told a committee of the musicians before the concert that Fradkin would not be reinstated. When they informed him that one-quarter of the orchestra's membership would not join in the evening's program, Mr. Cabot announced a change in the selections to be played, whereby the concert was enabled to proceed without them.

Fradkin appeared at Symphony ha before the concert, but was told tha he would not be allowed to take par

From Providence, R. I.

MAR 5 1920 A

196

BOSTON SYMPHONY STRIKERS GIVE FIRST CONCERT

Boston, March 22.—An audience responsive to the programme in all its phases greeted the striking players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their concert at the Colonial Theatre last night. The greatest demonstration centred about Fredric Gradkin, deposed concertmaster of the Symphony Orchestra.

There was also vigorous response for Harry D. Brenton of the American Federation of Musicians and the sentiments he expressed in a speech as representative of President Joseph N. Webber of the association, who was unable to be present.

Mr. Fradkin was recalled four times after he had rendered the Meditation from "Thais" as a violin solo and was compelled to give two encores, Greisler's "Tambourine Chinois" and "The Beautiful Rosemarin." Gustav Heim drew hearty applause with a trumpet solo, "The Lost Chord."

Emil Mollenhauer conducted the concert, which opened with "The Star Spangled Banner." Then followed "Lenore" No. 3 and Bizet's "Les Toreadors."

Both balconies were filled solidly when the concert opened and the orchestra floor was crowded almost to capacity. The ranks of the strikers were reinforced for the concert by other union musicians of the city.

Early in the movement Mr. Fradkin surprised players and management alike by voluntarily applying for admission to the union. Since that time he has been extremely active in the movement to organize the orchestra and has acted with the committee of seven, which is conducting the union players' affairs.

From Provide

the State Bra

BOSTON SYMPHONY STRIKERS GIVE FIRST CONCERT

Boston, March 22.—An audience responsive to the programme in all its phases greeted the striking players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their concert at the Colonial Theatre last night. The greatest demonstration centred about Fredric Gradkin, deposed concertmaster of the Symphony Orchestra.

There was also vigorous response for Harry D. Brenton of the American Federation of Musicians and the sentiments he expressed in a speech as representative of President Joseph N. Webber of the association, who was unable to be present.

Mr. Fradkin was recalled four times after he had rendered the Meditation from "Thais" as a violin solo and was compelled to give two encores, Greisler's "Tambourine Chinois" and "The Beautiful Rosemarin." Gustav Heim drew hearty applause with a trumpet solo, "The Lost Chord."

Emil Mollenhauer conducted the concert, which opened with "The Star Spangled Banner." Then followed "Lenore" No. 3 and Bizet's "Les Toreadors."

Both balconies were filled solidly when the concert opened and the orchestra floor was crowded almost to capacity. The ranks of the strikers were reinforced for the concert by other union musicians of the city.

TELEGRAM

New York City

MAR

The gaps made in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra due to men members going on strike, will probably be filled by women musicians.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Variety APR 2 - 1920 H

New York City

SYMPHONY STRIKERS WIN.

Boston, March 31.

The strikers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to be organized as the "Union Boston Symphony Orchestra," and it is said arrangements are completed for them to give a series of "pop" concerts during the summer with regular concerts here in the winter.

om

Bulletin

Philadelphia, Pa.

MAR 27

ter the casual

—The gaps made in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra due to the men members going on strike, will probably be filled by women musicians.

—Because women are plentiful and can

Noted Boston Symphony Orchestra Refuses To Become A Closed-Shop At Dictation of Musicians' Union.

Mayor Higginson's Famous Organization Stands By Its American Principles.

What the mailed fist of unionism has tried to do to the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra has been unknown to Buffalo music lovers—simply because of the deadly parallel that exists between its story and that of unionism everywhere in its attempt to throttle freedom of expression.

The closed-shop newspapers of this city, for instance, would not dare to put before their readers the sorry tale of the American Federation of Musicians' effort to make this great old orchestra a "closed-shop" in every sense of the word.

Luckily, the first principles of American freedom live in the vicinity of Bunker Hill. The trustees of the Boston Symphony have resisted the attempt to make it a mere tool in the hands of a musicians' union and, indirectly, another club for the American Federation of Labor.

The situation with regard to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been for 37 years in the very forefront of American musical endeavor, is best set forth in the statement which has been issued by Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of Major Higginson's famous organization.

That statement is in part as follows:

HIGGINSON'S BRAVE STAND

"The question of the affiliation of members of the Orchestra with the American Federation of Musicians, through the 'local' known as the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, is not of recent origin. This general problem confronted Major Higginson early in the thirty-seven years of his maintenance of the Orchestra. He took and resolutely held the position that the artistic ideals of the Orchestra he had established required liberty in its management, unhampered from without, to select its members when, where and for such length of service as the management deemed best, and to be the sole judge of the artistic qualifications of the artists selected; he considered no less essential the unfettered power to terminate the engagement of any member in case his conduct or musical performance might no longer justify his connection with the Orchestra.

"Shortly after the present trustees assumed the conduct of the Orchestra, this question was raised again. The trustees made no objection to the affiliation of members of the Orchestra with the Federation of Musicians, provided it could be brought about consistently with those ideals of the Orchestra which had become its most cherished traditions. The rules of the Association, as then shown and explained to the trustees, were not consistent with such ideals.

UNION WANTED TO RUN IT.

"Substantially they provided for the 'Closed-Shop': that is, only members of the Association could play in the Orchestra; no musician could be engaged outside the jurisdiction of the Boston 'Local' without its consent; only citizens of the United States, or Canada, and those who had taken out their first naturalization papers, could acquire membership in the Association, and therefore in the Orchestra; no artist could be engaged in Europe; contracts could be made only for one year; all obligations must be expressly subordinate to the obligations of membership in the Association.

"Any exceptions or modifications to these rules, which unmodified the Trustees regarded as fatal to the conduct of the Orchestra in accordance with its past standards, were to depend not upon the judgment of the trustees and conductor but upon the consent of the executive board of the American Federation of Musicians, a board entirely without intimate knowledge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra or special interest in its welfare. Under the operation of these rules, a large part of the men who have contributed to the success of the Orchestra could not have been engaged without the consent of that committee.

WANTED $1,000 A YEAR MORE

"The desire of some of the Symphony players to join the Federation has been placed upon the ground that their material welfare would thus be promoted. Independently of such affiliation they asked that the salary of each member of the Orchestra should be increased by $1,000. This would involve a total addition of approximately $100,000 a year to the expense of maintaining the Orchestra. The trustees were obliged to point out the fact that such an increase was beyond any resources now at their command; that since 1914 the salary account, exclusive of the Conductor's salary, had grown from $172,351.01 to $224,169.86 a year; that they proposed to increase their resources available for salaries by an extension of the "Pop Concert" season, by such advance in the price of season tickets as they believe the subscribers would be willing to accept, and by an organized effort, at the most favorable time, to secure a large permanent endowment for the Orchestra.

"It must be obvious that membership or non-membership in any musicians' association cannot increase the resources of the trustees or their ability to pay larger salaries to the Orchestra.

"It is significant to note that the players who requested an increase of $1,000 a year for every member of the Orchestra expressly urged that no additional concerts be given to defray this increase of salary, on the ground that the additional expense should be borne by the public.

OUTSIDE DICTATION

"The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yield to nobody in their desire to see the members of the Orchestra treated with all possible generosity. But the question of their joining the American Federation of Musicians is precisely the same as it was two years ago. The rules are the same now as they were in 1918. They present the same conflict of authority. For the judgment and discretion of a board of trustees, who have accepted the obligation to maintain at the highest possible level of artistic excellence a distinguished local and national institution, these rules, unchanged, would substitute the judgment of the executive board of the American Federation of Musicians, a body with whom the musical supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be, and probably ought to be, of an importance quite secondary to the welfare of the Federation.

"The trustees of the Orchestra have for their chief concern its continuance and development as the splendid instrument of art and civilization into which it has grown through its nearly forty years of existence. Their concern is for the exceptional, the best; the concern of the Federation is, of necessity, for the general, the average. The trustees believe that in a conflict between the rules representing these two ideals, they cannot accept the second, and that the upholding of the first will make in the long run not only for the higher standards of art but for the better interests of the members of the Orchestra."

The National [illegible]
New York City [illegible] 1920

THE dismissal of thirty-two men from the Boston Symphony Orchestra apparently foreshadows further demoralization of that once splendid organization. Beginning with the refusal of its founder, the late Major Higginson, to compel it to play the national anthem, on which point he had to yield, followed by the arrest and internment of the unworthy Dr. Muck, the war-time deterioration of the orchestra was rapid. This season the trouble has come up again, but now it is the snag of unionization which has been struck. Major Higginson was absolutely opposed to the members of the orchestra joining a union, and he accordingly forbade it; but since the players received a weekly wage which in some instances was far below the union scale, the desire for union cards naturally was great. The directors have now dismissed the concert-master, about whom the storm centered, and his thirty-one supporters, but there are rumors that the dismissed members will found and support a new union orchestra of their own. Altogether, it is a most unhappy situation. Major Higginson intended to leave a million dollars to the Boston Symphony, but for some reason or other he altered his will. The new directors are, therefore, asking rich music-lovers to meet the deficit as Major Higginson was in the habit of doing. They are not willing, however, to profit by the example of New York orchestras, whose membership in the union is an accepted fact.

ESTABLISHED 1881
APR 5 1920
From Providence, R.
NEWS

UNION SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MAY LEAVE BOSTON

Boston, April 5.—Because of the lack of interest shown in last night's concert of former members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who have been giving Sunday evening performances at the Colonial Theatre under the name of the American Federation Symphony Orchestra, a meeting will be held today or tomorrow to decide upon the advisability of continuing the series.

The players were unable to determine whether the small attendance of last night was due to the weather and counter entertainments throughout the city or whether their friends and supporters had abandoned them but whatever the cause, they expressed themselves as being discouraged.

The feeling is general among the players that they are not receiving the patronage of the music lovers of the city and they feel that they could do better by establishing themselves in some nearby city.

While last night's audience was small it was none the less appreciatoive, being generous with applause for both solo and orchestra pieces. The soloist, Gustav Heim, trumpeter; Fredric Fradkin, violinist, and Theodore Cella, harpist, were obliged to respond to the outbursts of enthusiasm.

The programme was: Overture "Mignon," Thomas; trumpet solo from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens, Mr. Heim; Andante Cantabile for string quartet, op. 11, Tschaikowski; Minuet, Bolzoni; violin solo Gypsy Airs, Sarasate, Mr. Fradkin Poeme Symphonique, "Le Roue d'Omphale, Saint-Saens; harp solo "Mazurka," Schuecker, Mr. Cella overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

Emil Mollenhauer was conducto and James Ecker accompanist.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From MAR 28
Providence, R.

On the Symphony.

The fact that the Boston Symphony C chestra has kept to its schedule in sp of depleted numbers, is gaining for a fresh enthusiasm from its audienc Some of the former members of the o ganization have come back and there a changes in the programme to compo with the instruments available.

James Hunaker picks out old friends the organization:

"After the defection in Boston some o members came forward and among the were Charles Martin Loeffler, our leadin composer, and Timothee Adamowski, wh offered their services. Both these artist were first violins in the orchestra whe Frank Kneisel was concert master an Gericke conductor, Arcadian days, indeed.

"As Mr. Fradkin is now playing the role of the insurgent Lucifer, his seat was occupied by Mr. Theodorowicz, and we also noted the veteran violoncellist, Alwyn Schroeder, at his accustomed seat desk; M. Longy, oboist extraordinary, whose tone resembles the etched line of a graphic composition, was like thin fire as it ringed the woodwind choir.

"The musical world will not allow such an orchestra to perish because of rebellion in the ranks. There is always an

---

ESTABLISHED 1881
From ROCHESTER, N.Y.
MAR -8 19[illegible]

STRIKING MEMBERS OF BOSTON SYMPHONY SAY ROCHESTER PAYS MORE

Boston, March 7.—Following the action of the 35 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who refused to appear with the rest of the company in consequence of the action of the trustees in dismissing Concert Master Fradkin, the striking members held a meeting at which the position of the members was set forth by Carl E. Gardner, spokesman for the committee of nine.

"We are unanimous in our decision that we will not appear with the rest of the company unless Mr. Fradkin is reinstated and if the public feels any disappointment they must know that the action of the trustees was calculated to bring about the condition that obtains to-day," said Gardner. "We have been advised by our attorney as to our rights under our several contracts and in view of the circumstances we are determined to maintain our position in this refusal to appear.

"We have no apprehension whatever as to our future. For some time past, since the very beginning of our troubles here in Boston, we have offers from managers throughout the country, especially at Detroit, Philadelphia, Rochester and Louisville. Under the circumstances, we personally would not care to continue any longer here in Boston, and would gladly welcome a change with the position and salary previously offered us at these cities. When it comes to music, Boston has been paying $25 a week less than other cities are paying and there is no reason why we should continue under the existing circumstances."

VOL. LXXIX

The Book of Fradkin

1. Now it came to pass in the days when the Galoshi ruled, that there was a concert in the land of Kahmbrij, which is the locknut on the Hub-of-the-Universe. And the people of Kahmbrij betook them unto the Tabernacle of Sanders in the Hall called Memmoriel.

2. And there came a certain man, a concert master, to the dressing-room of the conductor of the orchestra. The orchestra's name was Bahstan-Symphahnie.

3. Now Fradkin was of the union, while the conductor was not of the union, neither did he love Fradkin.

4. So he spake unto him saying, This is my dressing-room; thy dressing-room is yonder with thy friends of the union.

5. Thereupon Fradkin replied unto him saying, It is like Beelzebub thy dressing-room: it is my dressing-room.

6. But his words availed him not and he betook him unto his brethren and nursed his anger amongst them.

7. So the conductor forthwith suspended him from the Symphahnie. Then did Fradkin recommend unto him a warm place to spend the winter and took away with him certain of the players that struck, that he might form a new Symphahnie.

8. Yet he was not mad nor was he in love, for he said unto them, Know ye, that at the concert in Bahstan my two hindmost suspender buttons did detach themselves as I sat me down after the playing: how could I then arise without support?

9. And he showed them the trousers and lo, it was as he had said.

10. Thus from the loss of suspension do I gain suspension, said Fradkin. And his heart was heavy within him.

UNIONIZED SYMPHONIES.

Musical New England—indeed the entire musical United States—will watch with interest to see whether or not the labor union business is going to ruin forever the famous organization known as the Boston Symphony orchestra. To a candid and unprejudiced eye it would seem about as appropriate to unionize the Symphony as it would be to insist that John Singer Sargent take out a card from the Housepainters' union before being allowed to do a portrait—but there's no accounting for the artistic temperament.

A little while ago agitation broke out anew to unionize the world-famous Boston band, which has never been affiliated with the glorious galaxy of plasterers, plumbers, coal miners, stevedores and other highly artistic callings. Moreover, the attempt went somewhat beyond the usual material considerations of wages and hours. It demanded that nobody should play with the unionized symphony players who was not himself a union man, and more than that a naturalized or natural-born American citizen. It is quite possible that this bit of impetuousness was the last real straw that broke down the whole plan—for it would have prevented recruiting the symphony as of yore from the expert ranks of every country, and it would have debarred such eminent soloists as Fritz Kreisler from appearing with the Boston musicians.

Now art is a thing which is reasonably international, and it may easily remain so without harming any one. Any such proposition as that put forward by the agitators in the Boston Symphony is so manifestly inconsistent with artistry as to warrant the dictum that, rather than assent to any such thing, the Symphony orchestra would better be abandoned at once and forever. The present question appears to be whether sufficient financial support can be secured to endow this admirable organization and make it secure against the insidious assaults of these musical bolsheviki, who have recently done so much to wreck a company which Boston can ill spare. Time was when the late Major Higginson was supposed to be ready to perpetuate his work for this orchestra, by will—but when he died, for some occult reason, it wasn't done. Possibly this was a sequel to the nauseous upheaval over Dr. Muck. But at all events it wasn't done; and the orchestra, weakened thus from without, has lately fallen a prey to machinations from within. It is, however, to be hoped that Boston money can be found in plenty to bid defiance to this unblushing bid to prostitute the highest type of musical art to the baser uses of commercialized federation. This is a time when organized labor feels uncommonly cocky about everything, of course—but there are certain lines in which the antics of the walking delegate simply do not fit and this is one of them. There is nothing in common between striking bricklayers and striking trombone players. The former are craftsmen. The latter are artists—or were supposed to be, until they fell to bickering like a lot of perfectly ordinary mortals unappreciative of art.

Many of us would miss our Symphony dissipations. More of us still would miss our time-honored "Pops," even though the glory of beer and light wines has departed. But there is likely to be a very general feeling that before the Boston Symphony is degraded to the level of a sordid bartenders'

LOWELL COURIE

union, it would better die—if that were the only alternative. Better still, however, would be the raising of the three millions desired by the trustees of the orchestra to make its footing financially safe, and insure its freedom from the domination of long-haired bolsheviks whose skilful manipulation of the bow and clavier appears to be rated by themselves as quite on a par with the operation of a typewriting machine, or a pair of tonsorial clippers, or a beer pump.

Meantime, no doubt, those busy little Black Bay bees who love strikes and worship strikers are probably patting the Symphony unionists on the back and are telling them what great heroes they are because they have at last put the musicians on the same plane with the longshoremen! The ordinary onlooker, however, is more likely to look on the whole sorry mess with contemptuous disgust—which is all it deserves from a sensible person.

Buffalo Commercial Feb 27

Noted Boston Symphony Orchestra Refuses To Become A Closed-Shop At Dictation of Musicians' Union.

Mayor Higginson's Famous Organization Stands By Its American Principles.

What the mailed fist of unionism has tried to do to the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra has been unknown to Buffalo music lovers—simply because of the deadly parallel that exists between its story and that of unionism everywhere in its attempt to throttle freedom of expression.

The closed-shop newspapers of this city, for instance, would not dare to put before their readers the sorry tale of the American Federation of Musicians' effort to make this great old orchestra a "closed-shop" in every sense of the word.

Luckily, the first principles of American freedom live in the vicinity of Bunker Hill. The trustees of the Boston Symphony have resisted the attempt to make it a mere tool in the hands of a musicians' union and, indirectly, another club for the American Federation of Labor.

The situation with regard to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been for 37 years in the very forefront of American musical endeavor, is best set forth in the statement which has been issued by Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of Major Higginson's famous organization.

That statement is in part as follows:

HIGGINSON'S BRAVE STAND

"The question of the affiliation of members of the Orchestra with the American Federation of Musicians, through the 'local' known as the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, is not of recent origin. This general problem confronted Major Higginson early in the thirty-seven years of his maintenance of the Orchestra. He took and resolutely held the position that the artistic ideals of the Orchestra he had established required liberty in its management, unhampered from without, to select its members when, where and for such length of service as the management deemed best, and to be the sole judge of the artistic qualifications of the artists selected; he considered no less essential the untrammeled power to terminate the engagement of any member in case his conduct or musical performance might no longer justify his connection with the Orchestra.

"Shortly after the present trustees assumed the conduct of the Orchestra, this question was raised again. The trustees made no objection to the affiliation of members of the Orchestra with the Federation of Musicians, provided it could be brought about consistently with those ideals of the Orchestra which had become its most cherished traditions. The rules of the Association, as then shown and explained to the trustees, were not consistent with such ideals.

UNION WANTED TO RUN IT.

"Substantially they provided for the 'Closed-Shop': that is, only members of the Association could play in the Orchestra; no musician could be engaged outside the jurisdiction of the Boston 'Local' without its consent; only citizens of the United States, or Canada, and those who had taken out their first naturalization papers, could acquire membership in the Association, and therefore in the Orchestra; no artist could be engaged in Europe; contracts could be made only for one year; all obligations must be expressly subordinate to the obligations of membership in the Association.

"Any exceptions or modifications to these rules, which unmodified the Trustees regarded as fatal to the conduct of the Orchestra in accordance with its past standards, were to depend not upon the judgment of the trustees and conductor but upon the consent of the executive board of the American Federation of Musicians, a board entirely without intimate knowledge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra or special interest in its welfare. Under the operation of these rules, a large part of the men who have contributed to the success of the Orchestra could not have been engaged without the consent of that committee.

WANTED $1,000 A YEAR MORE

"The desire of some of the Symphony players to join the Federation has been placed upon the ground that their material welfare would thus be promoted. Independently of such affiliation they asked that the salary of each member of the Orchestra should be increased by $1,000. This would involve a total addition of approximately $100,000 a year to the expense of maintaining the Orchestra. The trustees were obliged to point out the fact that such an increase was beyond any resources now at their command; that since 1914 the salary account, exclusive of the Conductor's salary, had grown from $172,351.01 to $324,169.86 a year; that they proposed to increase their resources available for salaries by an extension of the "Pop Concert" season, by such advance in the price of season tickets as they believe the subscribers would be willing to accept, and by an organized effort, at the most favorable time, to secure a large permanent endowment for the Orchestra.

"It must be obvious that membership or non-membership in any musicians' association cannot increase the resources of the trustees or their ability to pay larger salaries to the Orchestra.

"It is significant to note that the players who requested an increase of $1,000 a year for every member of the Orchestra expressly urged that no additional concerts be given to defray this increase of salary, on the ground that the additional expense should be borne by the public.

OUTSIDE DICTATION

"The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yield to nobody in their desire to see the members of the Orchestra treated with all possible generosity. But the question of their joining the American Federation of Musicians is precisely the same as it was two years ago. The rules are the same now as they were in 1918. They present the same conflict of authority. For the judgment and discretion of a board of trustees, who have accepted the obligation to maintain at the highest possible level of artistic excellence a distinguished local and national institution, these rules, unchanged, would substitute the judgment of the executive board of the American Federation of Musicians, a body with whom the musical supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be, and probably ought to be, of an importance quite secondary to the welfare of the Federation.

"The trustees of the Orchestra have for their chief concern its continuance and development as the splendid instrument of art and civilization into which it has grown through its nearly forty years of existence. Their concern is for the exceptional, the best; the concern of the Federation is, of necessity, for the general, the average. The trustees believe that in a conflict between the rules representing these two ideals, they cannot accept the second, and that the upholding of the first will make in the long run not only for the higher standards of art but for the better interests of the members of the Orchestra."

the co
is a g for ty led the France.
Lovell
livered game I

The Nation MAR 2 0 1920
New York City

THE dismissal of thirty-two men from the Boston Symphony Orchestra apparently foreshadows further demoralization of that once splendid organization. Beginning with the refusal of its founder, the late Major Higginson, to compel it to play the national anthem, on which point he had to yield, followed by the arrest and internment of the unworthy Dr. Muck, the war-time deterioration of the orchestra was rapid. This season the trouble has come up again, but now it is the snag of unionization which has been struck. Major Higginson was absolutely opposed to the members of the orchestra joining a union, and he accordingly forbade it; but since the players received a weekly wage which in some instances was far below the union scale, the desire for union cards naturally was great. The directors have now dismissed the concert-master, about whom the storm centered, and his thirty-one supporters, but there are rumors that the dismissed members will found and support a new union orchestra of their own. Altogether, it is a most unhappy situation. Major Higginson intended to leave a million dollars to the Boston Symphony, but for some reason or other he altered his will. The new directors are, therefore, asking rich music-lovers to meet the deficit as Major Higginson was in the habit of doing. They are not willing, however, to profit by the example of New York orchestras, whose membership in the union is an accepted fact.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

UNION SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MAY LEAVE BOSTON

Boston, April 5.—Because of the lack of interest shown in last night's concert of former members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who have been giving Sunday evening performances at the Colonial Theatre under the name of the American Federation Symphony Orchestra, a meeting will be held today or tomorrow to decide upon the advisability of continuing the series.

The players were unable to determine whether the small attendance of last night was due to the weather and counter entertainments throughout the city or whether their friends and supporters had abandoned them but whatever the cause, they expressed themselves as being discouraged.

The feeling is general among the players that they are not receiving the patronage of the music lovers of the city and they feel that they could do better by establishing themselves in some nearby city.

While last night's audience was small it was none the less appreciative, being generous with applause for both solo and orchestra pieces. The soloists, Gustav Heim, trumpeter; Fredric Fradkin, violinist, and Theodore Cella, harpist, were obliged to respond to the outbursts of enthusiasm.

The programme was: Overture "Mignon," Thomas; trumpet solo from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens, Mr. Heim; Andante Cantabile for string quartet, op. 11, Tschaikowski; Minuet, Bolzoni; violin solo Gypsy Airs, Sarasate, Mr. Fradkin; Poeme Symphonique, "Le Roue d'Omphale, Saint-Saens; harp solo "Mazurka," Schuecker, Mr. Cella; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

Emil Mollenhauer was conductor and James Ecker accompanist.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From ROCHESTER, N.Y.

STRIKING MEMBERS OF BOSTON SYMPHONY SAY ROCHESTER PAYS MORE

Boston, March 7.—Following the action of the 35 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who refused to appear with the rest of the company in consequence of the action of the trustees in dismissing Concert Master Fradkin, the striking members held a meeting at which the position of the members was set forth by Carl E. Gardner, spokesman for the committee of nine.

"We are unanimous in our decision that we will not appear with the rest of the company unless Mr. Fradkin is reinstated and if the public feels any disappointment they must know that the action of the trustees was calculated to bring about the condition that obtains to-day," said Gardner. "We have been advised by our attorney as to our rights under our several contracts and in view of the circumstances we are determined to maintain our position in this refusal to appear.

"We have no apprehension whatever as to our future. For some time past, since the very beginning of our troubles here in Boston, we have offers from managers throughout the country, especially at Detroit, Philadelphia, Rochester and Louisville. Under the circumstances, we personally would not care to continue any longer here in Boston, and would gladly welcome a change with the position and salary previously offered us at these cities. When it comes to music, Boston has been paying $25 a week less than other cities are paying and there is no reason why we should continue under the existing circumstances."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

On the Symphony.

The fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has kept to its schedule in spite of depleted numbers, is gaining for it a fresh enthusiasm from its audience. Some of the former members of the organization have come back and there are changes in the programme to compose with the instruments available.

James Huneker picks out old friends in the organization:

"After the defection in Boston some of the members came forward and among them were Charles Martin Loeffler, our leading composer, and Timothee Adamowski, who offered their services. Both these artists were first violins in the orchestra when Franz Kneisel was concert master and Gericke conductor. Arcadian, days, indeed.

"As Mr. Fradkin is now playing the role of the insurgent Lucifer, his seat was occupied by Mr. Theodorowicz, and we also noted the veteran violoncellist, Alwyn Schroeder, at his accustomed seat desk; M. Longy, oboist extraordinary, whose tone resembles the etched line of a graphic composition, was like thin fire as it ringed the woodwind choir.

"The musical world will not allow such an orchestra to perish because of rebellion in the ranks. There is always as ish in the sea as ever

VOL. LXXIX

The Book of Fradkin

1. Now it came to pass in the days when the Galoshi ruled, that there was a concert in the land of Kahmbrij, which is the locknut on the Hub-of-the-Universe. And the people of Kahmbrij betook them unto the Tabernacle of Sanders in the Hall called Memmoriel.

2. And there came a certain man, a concert master, to the dressing-room of the conductor of the orchestra. The orchestra's name was Bahstan-Symphahnie.

3. Now Fradkin was of the union, while the conductor was not of the union, neither did he love Fradkin.

4. So he spake unto him saying, This is my dressing-room; thy dressing-room is yonder with thy friends of the union.

5. Thereupon Fradkin replied unto him saying, It is like Beelzebub thy dressing-room: it is my dressing-room.

6. But his words availed him not and he betook him unto his brethren and nursed his anger amongst them.

7. So the conductor forthwith suspended him from the Symphahnie. Then did Fradkin recommend unto him a warm place to spend the winter and took away with him certain of the players that struck, that he might form a new Symphahnie.

8. Yet he was not mad nor was he in love, for he said unto them, Know ye, that at the concert in Bahstan my two hindmost suspender buttons did detach themselves as I sat me down after the playing: how could I then arise without support?

9. And he showed them the trousers and lo, it was as he had said.

10. Thus from the loss of suspension do I gain suspension, said Fradkin. And his heart was heavy within him.

UNIONIZED SYMPHONIES.

Musical New England—indeed the entire musical United States—will watch with interest to see whether or not the labor union business is going to ruin forever the famous organization known as the Boston Symphony orchestra. To a candid and unprejudiced eye it would seem about as appropriate to unionize the Symphony as it would be to insist that John Singer Sargent take out a card from the Housepainters' union before being allowed to do a portrait—but there's no accounting for the artistic temperament.

A little while ago agitation broke out anew to unionize the world-famous Boston band, which has never been affiliated with the glorious galaxy of plasterers, plumbers, coal miners, stevedores and other highly artistic callings. Moreover, the attempt went somewhat beyond the usual material considerations of wages and hours. It demanded that nobody should play with the unionized symphony players who was not himself a union man, and more than that a naturalised or natural-born American citizen. It is quite possible that this bit of bumptiousness was the last real straw that broke down the whole plan—for it would have prevented recruiting the symphony as of yore from the expert ranks of every country, and it would have debarred such eminent soloists as Fritz Kreisler from apearing with the Boston musicians.

Now art is a thing which is reasonably international, and it may easily remain so without harming any one. Any such proposition as that put forward by the agitators in the Boston Symphony is so manifestly inconsistent with artistry as to warrant the dictum that, rather than assent to any such thing, the Symphony orchestra would better be abandoned at once and forever. The present question appears to be whether sufficient financial support can be secured to endow this admirable organization and make it secure against the insidious assaults of these musical bolsheviki, who have recently done so much to wreck a company which Boston can ill spare. Time was when the late Major Higginson was supposed to be ready to perpetuate his work for this orchestra, by will—but when he died, for some occult reason, it wasn't done. Possibly this was a sequel to the nauseous upheaval over Dr. Muck. But at all events it wasn't done; and the orchestra, weakened thus from without, has lately fallen a prey to machinations from within. It is, however, to be hoped that Boston money can be found in plenty to bid defiance to this unblushing bid to prostitute the highest type of musical art to the baser uses of commercialized federation. This is a time when organized labor feels uncommonly cocky about everything, of course—but there are certain lines in which the antics of the walking delegate simply do not fit and this is one of them. There is nothing in common between striking bricklayers and striking trombone players. The former are craftsmen. The latter are artists—or were supposed to be, until they fell to bickering like a lot of perfectly ordinary mortals unappreciative of art.

Many of us would miss our Symphony dissipations. More of us still would miss our time-honored "Pops," even though the glory of beer and light wines has departed. But there is likely to be a very general feeling that before the Boston Symphony is degraded to the level of a sordid bartenders'

LOWELL COURIE

union, it would better die—if that were the only alternative. Better still, however, would be the raising of the three millions desired by the trustees of the orchestra to make its footing financially safe, and insure its freedom from the domination of long-haired bolsheviks whose skilful manipulation of the bow and clavier appears to be rated by themselves as quite on a par with the operation of a typewriting machine, or a pair of tonsorial clippers, or a beer pump.

Meantime, no doubt, those busy little Back Bay bees who love strikes and worship strikers are probably patting the Symphony unionists on the back and are telling them what great heroes they are because they have at last put the musicians on the same plane with the longshoremen! The ordinary onlooker, however, is more likely to look on the whole sorry mess with contemptuous disgust—which is all it deserves from a sensible person.

SYMPHONY SUES SYMPHONY

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1920

SYMPHONIES.

England—[illegible] the United States—will [illegible] great to see whether or [illegible] Boston business is going [illegible] the famous organisa- [illegible] the Boston Symphony [illegible] To a candid and unprejudiced eye it would seem absurd as applause to unionize the Symphony as it would be to insist that John Singer Sargent take out a card from the housepainters' union before being allowed to do a portrait—but there's no reasoning for the artistic temperament.

A little while ago agitation broke out anew to unionize the world-famous Boston band, which has never been affiliated with the glorious galaxy of plasterers, plumbers, coal miners, stevedores and other highly artistic callings. Moreover, the attempt went somewhat beyond the usual material considerations of wages and hours. It demanded that nobody should play with the unionized symphony players who was not himself a union man, and more than that a naturalized or natural-born American citizen. It is quite possible that this bit of bumptiousness was the last real straw that broke down the whole plan—for it would have prevented recruiting the symphony as of yore from the expert folks of every country, and it would have debarred such eminent soloists as Fritz Kreisler from spearing with Boston musicians.

For art is a thing which is reasonably international, and it may easily [illegible] so without harming any one. Any such proposition as that put forward by the agitators in the Boston Symphony is so manifestly inconsistent with artistry as to warrant the dictum [illegible], rather than assent to any such thing, the Symphony orchestra would rather be abandoned at once and forever. The present question appears to be whether sufficient financial support can be secured to endow this admirable organization and make it secure against the insidious assaults of these musical bolsheviki, who have recently done so much to wreck a company which Boston can ill spare. Time was when the late Major Higginson was supposed to be ready to perpetuate his work for this orchestra, by will—but when he died, for some occult reason, it wasn't done. Possibly this was a sequel to the nauseous upheaval of Dr. Muck. But at all events it wasn't done; and the orchestra, weakened thus from without, has lately been a prey to machinations from within. It is, however, to be hoped that Boston money can be found in plenty to bid defiance to this unblushing bid to prostitute the highest type of musical art to the baser uses of commercialized federation. This is a time when organized labor feels unusually cocky about everything, of course—but there are certain lines in which the antics of the walking delegate simply do not fit and this is one of them. There is nothing in common between striking bricklayers and striking trombone players. The former are craftsmen. The latter are [illegible]—or were supposed to be, until they fell to bickering like a lot of perfectly ordinary mortals unappreciative [illegible]

[illegible] of us would miss our Symphony dissipations. More of us still would miss our time-honored "Pops," although the glory of beer and light wines has departed. But there is likely to be a very general feeling that because the Boston Symphony is degraded to the level of a mordid bartenders'

LOWELL COURIE

[illegible], it would better die—if that were the only alternative. Better still, however, would be the raising of the three millions desired by the trustees of the orchestra to make its footing financially secure, and insure its freedom from the domination of long-haired bolsheviki whose skilful manipulation of the violin and clavier appears to be rated by themselves as quite on a par with the operation of a typewriting machine, a pair of tonsorial clippers, or a [illegible]

[illegible], no doubt, those busy little bees who love strikes and the strikers are probably patting the symphony unionists on the back and telling them what great heroes they are because they have at last put themselves on the same plane with [illegible] The ordinary onlooker, however, is more likely to look upon the whole sorry mess with contempt and disgust—which is all it deserves from a sensible person.

Fradkin Sues Symphony Orchestra for $115,000

Charges Libel in Letter of Dismissal and a Breach of Contract to Employ Him as Concert Master—Attaches Funds

Frederick Fradkin, deposed as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a result of an open clash with Pierre Monteux, the conductor, today began two suits against the orchestra, seeking $115,000 in damages.

He sues for $100,000 for alleged libel, claimed to have been made in a letter sent by the orchestra trustees notifying him of his dismissal from the organization. He also asks $15,000 for alleged breach of contract to employ him as concert master.

Writs were served today by sheriffs and recorded in the Suffolk registry of deeds. The filing of the suit and the plaintiff's declaration will be made at the May term of the Suffolk superior court.

Fradkin, through his attorney, Arthur Berenson, has attached funds of the orchestra in a Boston bank.

Fradkin's dismissal from the orchestra followed a break with Monteux at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, when the conductor refused to let Fradkin use his private dressing room. This precipitated a walkout of 35 members of the orchestra, who stood loyally by the concert master. Although the trustees refused to reinstate Fradkin, the strikers subsequently returned to their seats, only to again leave when, it is claimed, their pay was held up.

FRADKIN FILES SUIT FOR $115,000

Asks $100,000 for Libel, $15,000 in Contract

Two suits, one in tort for $100,000 and the other in contract for $15,000, were filed in Suffolk Superior Court yesterday by attorney Arthur Berenson, representing Frederic Fradkin, the deposed concert master, against the Symphony Orchestra, Inc.

While the declarations have not yet been prepared by attorney Berenson it is understood that the tort count will allege libel on the part of the corporation in having sent out a letter relating to Fradkin's dismissal.

In the contract count it is understood that Fradkin will seek to recover damages which he alleges he suffered by the action of the trustees in terminating his contract.

FRADKIN SUES FOR $115,000

Former Symphony Concert Master Alleges Breach of Contract and Injury

Frederic Fradkin, former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has brought suit for $115,000 against the orchestra corporation.

In one of the suits Fradkin asked $100,000 damages because of a letter which he said the trustees caused to be sent out following his discharge. In the other suit he seeks $15,000 for breach of contract.

FRADKIN TO SUE BOSTON SYMPHONY

ATTORNEY BERENSON STARTS TWO SUITS, AGGREGATING $115,000, FOR OUSTED CONCERT MASTER OF THE ORCHESTRA

Attorney Arthur Berenson, of the Pemberton Building, has started two suits, aggregating $115,000, against Boston Symphony Orchestra Incorporated. The actions are brought on behalf of Frederic Fradkin, the ousted concert-master. One is an action in tort for $100,000 and the other is an action for contract for $15,000. While the declarations have not yet been prepared by Attorney Berenson, it is understood that the tort action will allege libel on the part of the representatives of the corporation in having sent out a letter relating to Fradkin's dismissal as concert-master; and in the contract action Fradkin will seek to recover what he claims is due him.

MUSICIANS TO SUE SYMPHONY

Fradkin Suits, Totalling $115,000, Lead Way

Rumors that some 10 former Boston Symphony Orchestra players are about to take steps to sue the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., for alleged breach of contract followed close yesterday on the heels of the $115,000 suits brought by Frederic Fradkin, deposed concert master, against the corporation.

The Fradkin suits—one for $15,000 for alleged breach of contract and another for $100,000 for alleged libel—were filed in the Suffolk Superior Court yesterday through Attorney Arthur Berenson of the Pemberton building, Fradkin's lawyer.

The $15,000 alleged breach of contract suit, according to Attorney Berenson, is based on the balance of the two-year term of the contract, which had one more year to run. The suit for $100,000, an action of tort, Attorney Berenson told the Post reporter, is based "on alleged libellous statements of the Symphony executives in a letter dismissing Mr. Fradkin, which the executives made public or caused to be made public."

FRADKIN BRINGS SUIT FOR $115,000

Charges Symphony Broke Contract and Libelled Him

Frederic Fradkin, deposed as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a result of an open clash with Pierre Monteux, the conductor, yesterday began two suits against the orchestra, seeking $115,000 in damages.

He sues for $100,000 for alleged libel, claimed to have been made in a letter sent by the orchestra trustees notifying him of his dismissal from the organization. He also asks $15,000 for alleged breach of contract to employ him as concert master.

Writs were served yesterday by sheriffs and recorded in the Suffolk registry of deeds. The filing of the suit and the plaintiff's declaration will be made at the May term of the Suffolk superior court.

Fradkin, through his attorney, Arthur Berenson, has attached funds of the orchestra in a Boston bank.

Fradkin's dismissal from the orchestra followed a break with Monteux at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, when the conductor refused to let Fradkin use his private dressing room. This precipitated a walkout of 35 members of the orchestra, who stood loyally by the concert master. Although the trustees refused to reinstate Fradkin, the strikers subsequently returned to their seats, only to again leave when, it is claimed, their pay was held up.

FRADKIN IN COURT FIGHT 'TO FINISH'

Says Symphony Reinstates Pro-Germans; Sues for $115,000

The controversy between union musicians and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that last March threatened to wreck the famous organization is due for a thorough airing in the courts as a result of two suits totalling $115,000 filed by Frederic Fradkin, ousted concert-master.

The ex-concert master and his attorney, Arthur Berenson last night declared it was a fight to a finish.

"We ask $100,000 for the way Judge Frederic P. Cabot, president of the corporation, defamed Mr. Fradkin's character in a letter following Mr. Fradkin's dismissal," said Attorney Berenson. "We ask $15,000 for breach of contract in the second suit. Writs have been served and attachments placed, the writs being returnable in Superior Court in May."

IS "MADE THE GOAT."

"I have been made the goat," said Fradkin, "but I have one reward and that is that the musicians are now getting better pay than they ever got before. They have tried their best to besmirch my character. They have called me a German, but I was born in Troy, N. Y., and was educated in France. They tried to make it out that our fight for better wages was the tail-end of alleged pro-Germanism in the orchestra at the time Dr. Karl Muck was dismissed. But everyone knows that the leaders in the union movement like myself were all native born Americans.

"It might interest the public to know, too, that several of the alltged pro-German musicians dismissed at tht time Dr. Muck went out have bten reinstated. One of these men was found in New York just as he was about to sail for Germany. It is also inttresting to note that stveral of the thirty musicians hat wen out on the so-called srike are back in their places in the orchestra again. The others have drifttd into better positions. Dr. Cabot did not realize that he had good musicians until he lost them."

HAVE PROOF, SAYS LAWYER.

Attorney Berenson said that every contention of the orchestra trustees would be met. "We have the proofs," he said," and are confident of ultimate victory in the courts."

Fradkin is still at his home, No. 80 Fenway. He is devoting all his time to his music pupils.

The trouble began when a portion of the orchestra unionized, and Fradkin, siding with the men, was denied permission to share the dressing room of Mr. Monteux. At the next Boston concert, the concert master declined to respond to a signal of the conductor for the entire orchestra to arise and share in the applause of the audience. He was immediately dismissed by the trustees on the ground that he had failed to obey orders, and his contract was therefore automatically dissolved. Thirty-five of the men struck in sympathy with the violinist, and [illegible] replaced.

CALLS GRAFT MEXICAN [illegible]

[illegible] Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
March of the Little Lead Soldiers ..... Pierne
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" ..... Strauss
"Peace Forever" ..... Sousa
California Sketches
a. By the Ocean
b. In the Mission
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Wagner
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
March of the Little Lead Soldiers ..... Pierne
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" ..... Strauss
"Peace Forever" ..... Sousa

INFORMATION OBSCURED

AT THE CLUBHOUSE

A gala event for the Boston Teachers' Club will be their "Pops Concerts," when everybody will get together for a jolly evening in Symphony Hall. It is the closing social event of the season, and the program committee, with Miss Margaret M. Whalen of the Prescott School as chairman, has arranged a most varied and delightful calendar for the pleasure of the hundreds of members.

The specially invited guests include Superintendent and Mrs. F. V. Thompson, members of the school committee and board of superintendents: Dr. and Mrs. Charles Parmenter, Mr. and Mrs. William Keough; Miss Mary McSkinnon, president of the Massachusetts Teachers' Federation.

June 8 has been reserved as Teachers Club Night and the large membership is keeping that date in red letters. The program is as follows: Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba," Gounod; Overture to "Zampa," Harold; Waltz, "Vienna Blood," Strauss; Fantasie, "Othello," Verdi; Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; Tarantelle, (with flute solo) Jacchia; Reve Angelique, Rubinstein; "In the Hall of the Mountain King," Grieg; Selection, "Pinafore," Sullivan; Menuet a l'Antique, Paderewski; "Indian Summer," and American Idyl, Herbert; Pomp and Circumstance, (with organ) Elgar.

* * * * *

Alert to the artistic enjoyment of the "Pops" the Boston Teachers' Club programme committee will close its calendar of events with a "Boston Teachers' Club night" at Symphony Hall, Thursday, June 3. Miss Margaret M. Whalen of the Prescott School is chairman and there has been an extensive response from the teachers and their friends who delight in this artistic and informal diversion, an especial feature of Boston's summer season.

The Boston Teachers' Club will be represented by its officers, the Misses Annie G. Scollard, president; Lena G. Perrigo, treasurer; Caroline E. Nutter, corresponding secretary; Madeline B. Driscoll, membership secretary. The invited guests will include his Honor, Mayor Peters, Superintendent of Schools Frank V. Thompson and Mrs. Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Lane, Mr. and Mrs. Michael H. Corcoran, Dr. and Mrs. Frederick Bogan, Mr. Charles O'Connor, Miss Frances G. Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. Jeremiah Burke, Mr. and Mrs. Augustine L. Rafter, Mr. and Mrs. Frank W. Ballou, Miss Mary C. Mellyn, Mr. and Mrs. John Brodhead, Dr. and Mrs. Charles E. Parmenter, Miss Mary McSkimmon, Miss Margaret Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Keough. The members of the executive board will act as hostesses.

Boston Teachers at Pops

Thursday will be Boston Teachers' night at the "Pop" concert. There will be an orchestra of 80 Symphony players, and a special program has been arranged.

Miss Margaret Whalen, chairman of the program committee of the Boston Teachers' Club, has charge of the arangements. The special guests include His Honor Mayor Peters, Mr. and Mrs. Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Lane, Mr. and Mrs. Michael H. Corcoran, Dr. and Mrs. Frederick Bogan, Mr. Charles O'Connor, Miss Frances G. Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. Jeremiah Burke, Mr. and Mrs. Augustine L. Rafter, Mr. and Mrs. Frank W. Ballou, Miss Mary C. Mellyn, Mr. and Mrs. John Brodhead, Dr. and Mrs. Charles E. Parmenter, Miss Mary McSkimmon, Miss Margaret Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Keough. The members of the executive board will act as hostesses.

President's Club

TEACHERS' NIGHT AT "POPS"

Club Arranges Programme for Next Thursday Evening

Boston Teachers Club will hold its night at the "Pops" next Thursday the guests of honor will include intendent and Mrs. Frank V. Thompmembers of the school committee, of superintendents; Dr. and Mrs. es Parmenter, and Miss Mary mmon, president of the MassachuTeachers' Federation.

Wheelock School Gradu

CONSERVATORY GHT" AT THE POPS

propriate Program Given for the Occasion

der the auspices of the graduating of the New England Conservatory usic, "Conservatory Night" at the concert was celebrated last evenwith an appropriate program. the selections of school interest Chadwick's "Young Lochinvar," Morse Wemple of the faculty, and nging of the Conservatory chorus. rrow evening in Jordan Hall the concert of the senior class will ven, and on Friday afternoon the s will hold their reception in Hall.

Conservatory management anes the accession of four dished artists to the faculty, whose g will begin next September. Antoninette Szumowska-Adampianist, returns to the Conory after several years' absence. ork in connection with the Polish is internationally famous. erick Shepard Converse, for years a member of the board of of which he is now a vice-

CIAL POPS PROGRAMS

ballots for Request Night at the Concerts in Symphony Hall (next June 21) have been counted staff of workers especially enfor the purpose. The twelve g pieces will constitute the 100 ent. popular program (stated). On Friday night, June 25, what will be still more interto many—an Italian-Verdi Agide Jacchia, famous tor of Italian opera in many h have chosen selections from Verdi's operas and single livers Rossini, Mascagni, Puccigame Wolf-Ferrari and others. Al- Insurance Society of ll come in numbers rt of Wednesday, all other nights are blic occasions, exnight (June 22), Association Symphony Hall

MAYOR AMONG GUESTS OF TEACHERS' CLUB AT "POPS"

Teachers of Boston and vicinity filled Symphony Hall last evening at the "Pops," as it was Boston Teachers' Club night. Among the guests were Mayor and Mrs Peters, members of the School Committee, and board of superintendents, and representatives of the various educational societies of the city. Miss Annie G. Scollard, president of the cl and members of the executive boa were the hostesses. Miss Margains. Whelan was chairman of the entertas ment committee.

Globe June 4

Mayor to Be Guest of Teachers at "Pops"

The Boston Teachers' Club will ha as guests at the Pop Concert this eve ing: Mayor Peters, Mr. and Mr., Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Richar Lane, Mr. and Mrs. Michael H. Cocoran, Dr. and Mrs. Frederick Bogga- Mr. Charles O'Connor, Miss Franc G. Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. Jeremia Burke, Mr. and Mrs. Augustine L. Ra ter, Mr. and Mrs. Frank W. Ballo Miss Mary C. Mellyn, Mr. and Mrs. John Brodhead, Dr. and Mrs. Parmenter, Miss Mary McSkimmon, Miss Margaret Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Keough.

The members of the Executive Board will act as hostesses.

Eighth Week of the "Pop" Concerts at Symphony Hal

The Bank Officers' Association of Boston will have their annual "Pop" concert night Tuesday at Symphony Hall, the only evening of the week which will not be given to the public. The "Request" program will be given tomorrow and there will be a large attendance Wednesday when many members of the Insurance Society of Massachusetts will be present.

The 12 winning pieces on Conductor Jacchia's program tomorrow evening will be as follows: "Pomp and Circumstance, Elgar; waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; "Volga Bargemen's Song," arranged by Agide Jacchia; Overture to "Tannhauser,"

POPS PROGRAMS FOR NEXT WEEK

All ballots for Request Night at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall (next Monday, June 21) have been counted by a staff of workers especially engaged for the purpose. The 12 leading pieces will constitute the 100 per cent. popular program (stated below). On Friday night, June 25th, comes what will be still more interesting to many—an Italian-Verdi program. Agide Jacchia, famous conductor of Italian opera in many countries, has chosen selections from four of Verdi's operas and single numbers of Rossini, Mascagni, Puccini, Wolf-Ferrari and others. Although the Insurance Society of Massachusetts will come in numbers to the Pop Concert of Wednesday, June 23, this and all other nights are in every way public occasions, excepting Tuesday night (June 22), when the Bank Officers' Association of Boston will have Symphony Hall to themselves.

Traveler 14

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The following programme will be presented at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight by Agide Jacchia and his Symphony orchestra:

Pomp and Circumstance (with organ)...Elgar
Overture to "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Ave Maria .....Bach-Gounod
Bassoon, Abdon Laus; organ, Albert W. Snow; pianoforte, E. Hoffmann,
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" .....Leoni
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia" .....Delibes
a. Les Chasseresses.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

At the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Agide Jacchia will conduct the following programme:

Festival March .....Borch
[illegible] Galatea .....Suppe

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Although the Insurance Society of Massachusetts is celebrating at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight, the

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The Traffic Club of New England have taken a number of seats for the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. Nevertheless the concert will be in every sense public. The programme follows:

March, "Manhattan Beach".....Sousa
[illegible] Robespierre".....Litolf

Request Night at the Pops

Request night, the most popular and democratic of the season, on which the programme is entirely determined by public vote, will make the Pop Concert at Symphony Hall one of the biggest of the season. Of the many numbers requested, the following 12, which comprise the programme, received the most votes:

Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube."

TO NIGHT AT THE POPS

One of the most interesting and eventful Pop concerts of the season will take place at Symphony Hall tonight, when Agide Jacchia, the conductor, who has long been famous as director of Italian opera, will present a programme consisting entirely of Italian music, and featuring the operas of Verdi. The programme in detail follows:

Overture to "La Gazza Ladra".....Rossini
Prelude and Siciliana, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .....Mascagni
[illegible] orchestra

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight will be in every way a public affair, although the Rotary Club has taken a section of the floor. Agide Jacchia has made the following programme:

Procession of the Sardar.....Ippolitoff-Ivanoff
Overture to "Fra Diavolo".....Auber
[illegible] Woman and Song".....Strauss

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia and his superfine orchestra of Symphony players will give the following programme at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Although the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight is dedicated to the new Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Agide Jacchia, the Pops conductor, is director, the concert will be open to the public and of unusual interest. Of the soloists to be heard Hans Ebell, the famous pianist, is a member of the Conservatory faculty. The other soloists belong to the Conservatory and to the orchestra as well. Mr. Jacchia's programme follows:

Hungarian March ("Rakoczy") .....Berlioz
Overture to "Mignon" .....Thomas
Organ solo, "Festival Song"
the United States.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The music of Sir Arthur Sullivan will dominate at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. Two numbers will be conducted by John C. Mullaly, famous in the 80's, as the foremost conductor of the Gilbert and Sullivan operettas. The complete programme follows:

Hungarian March (Rakoczy) .....Berlioz

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

One of the most distinctive programmes this season, with several numbers from Wagner's operas, will be given at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The programme follows:

Second Polonaise .....Liszt
Overture, "Fingal's Cave" .....Mendelssohn

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The following holiday programme will take place at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa
Overture, "Mignon" .....Thoms
Waltz, "A Night in Venice".....Strauss
Fantasia, "Faust" .....Gounod
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Cortege de Bacchus.....Delibes
Kammenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique).Rubinstein
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1 in F.....Liszt
American Military Fantasy.....Rollinson
Andante Cantabile.....W. S. Smith
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".....Vollstedt
March, "Victory" .....Turabull

AT THE POPS

Mountains of ballots have been counted by a special staff of workers for request night at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall. The twelve winning places (stated below) constitute the 100 per cent. popular program which will be given tomorrow night. To many, however, the Italian-Verdi program, which comes Friday night, will be equally interesting. Needless to say, Agide Jacchia, famous as a conductor of Italian opera in many a large metropolis, will be in his element. Tuesday night the Bank Officers' Association of Boston will have Symphony Hall to themselves. The request program for tomorrow night follows:

Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube".....Strauss
Volga Bargeman's Song, Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Anitra's Dance from "Peer Gynt" Suite.Grieg
Largo (with organ).....Handel
Overture Solennelle, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Tarantelle (with flute solo).....Jacchia
Kamenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique).Rubenstein
Dardanella .....Bernard-Black

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Although tonight will be Boston University night at the Pops, both admissions and reserved seats are on public sale. The program follows:

Wedding March .....Mendelssohn
Overture to "Tao der Esau"

BANKERS AT THE POPS

The National Bankers' Convention, having taken over Symphony Hall for the Pop concert tonight, there will be no public sale. The bankers will celebrate with the folowing program:

March from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Overture, "Ruy Blas".....Mendelssohn

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Request night, on which the program is entirely determined by public vote, will make the Pop concert at Symphony Hall this evening one of the biggest of the season. Of the many numbers requested, the following 12, which comprise the program, received the most votes:

Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube."

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program:

March, "Manhattan Beach".....Sousa
Overture, "Maximilian Robespierer".....Litolff

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Although the Insurance Society of Massachusetts is celebrating at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight, this concert will be in every sense public. The following program will be conducted by Agide Jacchia:

March from "The Queen of Sheba".....Gounod
[illegible] .....Thomas

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia has made the following program for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

March from "The Prophet".....Meyerbeer
[illegible] to "Phedre".....Massenet
.....Strauss

said.

VERDI NIGHT AT POPS

One of the most interesting Pop concerts of the season will take place in Symphony Hall tonight, when Agide Jacchia, the conductor, who has long been famous as director of Italian opera, will present a program consisting entirely of Italian music, and featuring the operas of Verdi. The program follows:

Overture to "La Gazza Ladra".....Rossini
[illegible] and Siciliana. "Cavalleria

TONIGHT'S POPS

Although the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight is dedicated to the new Conservatory of Music, of which Agide Jacchia, the conductor, is director, the concert will be open to the public and of unusual interest. Of the soloists, Hans Ebell, the pianist, is a member of the Conservatory faculty. The other soloists belong to the Conservatory and to the Symphony orchestra. The program:

Hungarian March ("Rakoczy").....Berlioz

MULLALY AT POPS

The music of Sir Arthur Sullivan a dominate the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. Two numbers will be conducted by John C. Mullaly, famous in the 80's as the foremost conductor of the Gilbert and Sullivan operettas. The complete program follows:

Hungarian March (Rakoczy).....Berlioz

WAGNER NIGHT AT POPS

One of the most distinctive programmes this season, with several numbers from Wagner's operas, will be given at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The program follows:

Second Polonaise.....
[illegible] Cave".....Mendelssohn

POP CONCERT TONIGHT

At the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Agide Jacchia will conduct the program.

March, "Jericho".....Chadwick
Overture to "The Bartered Bride".....Smetana
Waltz, "La Barcarole".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
Third Movement from "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
(The Prince and the Princess)
Largo (with organ).....Handel
Scene from "Vanity Fair"
(Pilgrim's Progress).....Stillman Kelley
Rhapsody Espana.....Chabrier
German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride".....Mohr
Waltzes from "The Rose Cavalier".....Strauss
Polonaise from "Eugen Oneigen".Tschaikowsky

bers Next Monday and Pieces from Italian Opera
—Other Incidents of the

A "REQUEST NIGHT" on Monday and an evening of Italian music, for the most part operatic and from Verdi, on Friday are the outstanding items in the calendar of The Pops next week. The balloting for the programme of Monday has resulted in the usual array of favorite pieces: the "Blue Danube" waltz, the "1812" overture, Händel's Largo, the overture to "Tannhäuser," Liszt's second rhapsody; the orchestral version of the Volga bargeman's song—all the "standbys," in short, of Mr. Jacchia's easier repertory. For Friday, he has set down numbers from the operas, "Il Trovatore," "La Forza del Destino," "Aida" and "Othello" for Verdi's share, along with other operatic pieces from Rossini, Mascagni, Ponchiello, Puccini and Wolf-Ferrari—a vertiable "Italian night" with plenty of the music of the theatre with which Mr. Jacchia excels. For the other evenings of the week—on Tuesday, the Bank Officers' Association will have Symphony Hall to itself; on Wednesday, Mr. Mager, the first trumpet, will be heard as soloist: on Thursday the programme includes the second and the less known suite from Grieg's music to "Peer Gynt"—the suite containing Solvejg's Song—and a piece for viola d'amore to be played by Mr. Shirley; on Saturday, Mr. Hoffmann will be heard in a violin piece and familiar fragments from Wagner

At the Pops Tonight

March from "The Queen of Sheba"
Gounod

At the Pops Tonight

(Request Night)

March, "Pomp and Circumstance".Elgar
Waltz, "Blue Danube".

At the Pops Tonight

The Bank Officers' Association has taken the whole of Symphony Hall for this evening and there are no places available for the public

At the Pops Tonight

Traffic Club Night
(Open to the Public)

March, "Manhattan Beach".....Sousa
Overture, "Robespierre"

At the Pops Tonight

Italian Programme

Overture to "La Gazza Ladra".Rossini

At the Pops Tonight

Military March .....Schubert

At the Pops Tonight

Procession of the Sardar,
Ippolitov-Ivanov

At the Pops Tonight

At the Pops Tonight

At the Pops Tonight

Operatic Programme

Prelude to "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "The Barber of Seville"

At the Pops Tonight

Russian Programme

Wedding March from "Feramors".
Rubinstein
Entrance of Raymonda from the like-named Ballet .....Glazunov
The Miniature War.....Cui
Finale of "Scheherazade".....
Rimsky-Korsakov
Three Numbers from the "Nutcracker" Ballet — Waltz, "Dornröschen"—Song Without Words—
Finale of the Fourth Symphony—
Overture, "1812" .....Chaikovsky
Hymn to the Sun from "The Golden Cockerell" .....Rimsky-Korsakov
Angelic Vision .....Rubinstein
Russian Folk Song, "Dubinushka".
Jacchia

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

... A. Jacchia.

"1812" overture, Händel's Largo, the overture to "Tannhäuser," Liszt's second rhapsody; the orchestral version of the Volga bargeman's song—all the "standbys," in short, of Mr. Jacchia's easier repertory. For Friday, he has set down numbers from the operas, "Il Trovatore," "La Forza del Destino," "Aida" and "Othello" for Verdi's share, along with other operatic pieces from Rossini, Mascagni, Ponchiello, Puccini and Wolf-Ferrari—a vertiable "Italian night" with plenty of the music of the theatre with which Mr. Jacchia excels. For the other evenings of the week—on Tuesday, the Bank Officers' Association will have Symphony Hall to itself; on Wednesday, Mr. Mager, the first trumpet, will be heard as soloist: on Thursday the programme includes the second and the less known suite from Grieg's music to "Peer Gynt"—the suite containing Solvejg's Song—and a piece for viola d'amore to be played by Mr. Shirley; on Saturday, Mr. Hoffmann will be heard in a violin piece and familiar fragments from Wagner's operas, will be given at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The program follows:

Second Polonaise.....Liszt
Overture, "Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Waltz, "La Barcarole".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
Third Movement from "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
(The Prince and the Princess)
Largo (with organ).....Handel
Scene from "Vanity Fair"
(Pilgrim's Progress).....Stillman Kelley
Rhapsody Espana.....Chabrier
German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride".....Mohr
Waltzes from "The Rose Cavalier".....Strauss
Polonaise from "Eugen Oneigen".Tschaikowsky

Boston Conservatory Programme

Tuesday night, June 22, will be Boston Conservatory of Music night at the pop concert in Symphony Hall. Agide Jacchia, director of this conservatory, will then conduct a programme of which four numbers will be played by members of the Boston Conservatory of Music faculty. These members are Hans Ebell, pianist, who will play a movement from his own concerto for piano and orchestra; Albert Snow, organist, who will play as a solo, Nairstow's "Evening Song"; Louis Speyer and Abdon Laus, oboist and bassoonist, who, with E. Hoffman, pianist, will take part in the performance of Pillevetre's trio, "Idylle Bretonne." Other numbers which the orchestra will play will be Berlioz' "Rackozy March," Thomas' "Mignon Overture," Tschaikowsky's "Marche Slav," Chabrier's "Espana," the tempest scene from Verdi's "Otello" and Wagner's introduction to [illegible] act of "Lohengrin."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

AT THE CLUBHOUSE

Record May 27

A gala event for the Boston Teachers' Club will be their "Pops Concerts," when everybody will get together for a jolly evening in Symphony Hall. It is the closing social event of the season, and the program committee, with Miss Margaret M. Whalen of the Prescott School as chairman, has arranged a most varied and delightful calendar for the pleasure of the hundreds of members.

The specially invited guests include Superintendent and Mrs. F. V. Thompson, members of the school committee and board of superintendents; Dr. and Mrs. Charles Parmenter, Mr. and Mrs. William Keough; Miss Mary McSkinnon, president of the Massachusetts Teachers' Federation.

June 3 has been reserved as Teachers Club Night and the large membership is keeping that date in red letters. The program is as follows: Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba," Gounod; Overture to "Zampa," Harold; Waltz, "Vienna Blood," Strauss; Fantasie, "Othello," Verdi; Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; Tarantelle, (with flute solo) Jacchia; Reve Angelique, Rubinstein; "In the Hall of the Mountain King," Grieg; Selection, "Pinafore," Sullivan; Menuet a l'Antique, Paderewski; "Indian Summer," and American Idyl, Herbert; Pomp and Circumstance, (with organ) Elgar.

* * * *

Sunday Post May 28

Alert to the artistic enjoyment of the "Pops" the Boston Teachers' Club programme committee will close its calendar of events with a "Boston Teachers' Club night" at Symphony Hall, Thursday, June 3. Miss Margaret M. Whalen of the Prescott School is chairman and there has been an extensive response from the teachers and their friends who delight in this artistic and informal diversion, an especial feature of Boston's summer season.

The Boston Teachers' Club will be represented by its officers, the Misses Annie G. Scollard, president; Lena G. Perrigo, treasurer; Caroline E. Nutter, corresponding secretary; Madeline B. Driscoll, membership secretary. The invited guests will include his Honor, Mayor Peters, Superintendent of Schools Frank V. Thompson and Mrs. Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Lane, Mr. and Mrs. Michael H. Corcoran, Dr. and Mrs. Frederick Bogan, Mr. Charles O'Connor, Miss Frances G. Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. Jeremiah Burke, Mr. and Mrs. Augustine L. Rafter, Mr. and Mrs. Frank W. Ballou, Miss Mary C. Mellyn, Mr. and Mrs. John Brodhead, Dr. and Mrs. Charles E. Parmenter, Miss Mary McSkimmon, Miss Margaret Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Keough. The members of the executive board will act as hostesses.

Boston Teachers at Pops

Herald

Thursday will be Boston Teachers' Night at the "Pop" concert. There will be an orchestra of 80 Symphony players, and a special program has been arranged.

Miss Margaret Whalen, chairman of the program committee of the Boston Teachers' Club, has charge of the arrangements. The special guests include His Honor Mayor Peters, Mr. and Mrs. Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Lane, Mr. and Mrs. Michael H. Corcoran, Dr. and Mrs. Frederick Bogan, Mr. Charles O'Connor, Miss Frances G. Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. Jeremiah Burke, Mr. and Mrs. Augustine L. Rafter, Mr. and Mrs. Frank W. Ballou, Miss Mary C. Mellyn, Mr. and Mrs. John Brodhead, Dr. and Mrs. Parmenter, Miss Mary McSkimmon, Miss Margaret Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Keough. The members of the executive board will act as hostesses.

Presidents' Club

May 29

TEACHERS' NIGHT AT "POPS"

Club Arranges Programme for Next Thursday Evening

Boston Teachers Club will hold its night at the "Pops" next Thursday the guests of honor will include intendent and Mrs. Frank V. Thompmembers of the school committee, of superintendents; Dr. and Mrs. es Parmenter, and Miss Mary immon, president of the Massachu-Teachers' Federation.

Wheelock School Festival

Herald. 5. 15

CONSERVATORY "IGHT" AT THE POPS

propriate Program Given for the Occasion

der the auspices of the graduating of the New England Conservatory usic, "Conservatory Night" at the concert was celebrated last evenwith an appropriate program. g the selections of school interest Chadwick's "Young Lochinvar," Morse Wemple of the faculty, and nging of the Conservatory chorus. rrow evening in Jordan Hall the l concert of the senior class will ven, and on Friday afternoon the s will hold their reception in l Hall.

Conservatory management an- the accession of four dished artists to the faculty, whose g will begin next September. Antoninette Szumowska-Adampianist, returns to the Conory after several years' absence. ork in connection with the Polish is internationally famous. erick Shepard Converse, for years a member of the board of of which he is now a vice-ballots for Request Night at the Concerts in Symphony Hall (next June 21) have been counted staff of workers especially enfor the purpose. The twelve g pieces will constitute the 100 ent. popular program (stated On Friday night, June 25, what will be still more interto many—an Italian-Verdi Agide Jacchia, famous tor of Italian opera in many chosen selections from Verdi's operas and single Rossini, Mascagni, Puccigame Ferrari and others. Alnsurance Society of ill come in numbers ert of Wednesday, all other nights are blic occasions, exnight (June 22), cers' Association Symphony Hall

CIAL POPS PROGRAMS

Post

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

At the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Agide Jacchia will conduct the following programme:

Festival March ..... Borch
[illegible] Beautiful Galatea" ... Suppe
[illegible] ... Hill

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Although the Insurance Society of Massachusetts is celebrating at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight, the

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The Traffic Club of New England have taken a number of seats for the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. Nevertheless the concert will be in every sense public. The programme follows:

March, "Manhattan Beach" ..... Sousa
[illegible] "Robespierre" ..... Litolf

Request Night at the Pops

Request night, the most popular and democratic of the season, on which the programme is entirely determined by public vote, will make the Pop Concert at Symphony Hall one of the biggest of the season. Of the many numbers requested, the following 12, which comprise the programme, received the most votes:

Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube."

TO NIGHT AT THE POPS

One of the most interesting and eventful Pop concerts of the season will take place at Symphony Hall tonight, when Agide Jacchia, the conductor, who has long been famous as director of Italian opera, will present a programme consisting entirely of Italian music, and featuring the operas of Verdi. The programme in detail follows:

Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" ..... Rossini
Prelude and Sicilliana, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ..... Mascagni
[illegible] orchestra

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight will be in every way a public affair, although the Rotary Club has taken a section of the floor. Agide Jacchia has made the following programme:

Procession of the Sardar ..... Ippolitoff-Ivanoff
Overture to "Fra Diavolo" ..... Auber
"Woman and Song" ..... Strauss graduating exercises.

MAYOR AMONG GUESTS OF TEACHERS' CLUB AT "POPS"

Teachers of Boston and vicinity filled Symphony Hall last evening at the "Pops," as it was Boston Teachers' Club night. Among the guests were Mayor and Mrs Peters, members of the School Committee, and board of superintendents, and representatives of the various educational societies of the city. Miss Annie G. Scollard, president of the club and members of the executive board were the hostesses. Miss Margaret Whelan was chairman of the entertainment committee.

Globe June 2

Mayor to Be Guest of Teachers at "Pops"

The Boston Teachers' Club will have as guests at the Pop Concert this evening: Mayor Peters, Mr. and Mrs. Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Lane, Mr. and Mrs. Michael H. Corcoran, Dr. and Mrs. Frederick Bogan, Mr. Charles O'Connor, Miss Frances G. Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. Jeremiah Burke, Mr. and Mrs. Augustine L. Rafter, Mr. and Mrs. Frank W. Ballou, Miss Mary C. Mellyn, Mr. and Mrs. John Brodhead, Dr. and Mrs. Parmenter, Miss Mary McSkimmon, Miss Margaret Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Keough.

The members of the Executive Board will act as hostesses.

Eighth Week of the "Pop" Concerts at Symphony Hall

The Bank Officers' Association of Boston will have their annual "Pop" concert night Tuesday at Symphony Hall, the only evening of the week which will not be open to the public. The "Request" program will be given tomorrow and there will be a large attendance Wednesday when many members of the Insurance Society of Massachusetts will be present.

The 12 winning pieces on Conductor Jacchia's program tomorrow evening will be as follows: "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; "Volga Bargemen's Song," arranged by Agide Jacchia; overture to "Tannhauser,"

POPS PROGRAMS FOR NEXT WEEK

All ballots for Request Night at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall (next Monday, June 21) have been counted by a staff of workers especially engaged for the purpose. The 12 leading pieces will constitute the 100 per cent. popular program (stated below). On Friday night, June 25th, comes what will be still more interesting to many—an Italian-Verdi program. Agide Jacchia, famous conductor of Italian opera in many countries, has chosen selections from four of Verdi's operas and single numbers of Rossini, Mascagni, Puccini, Wolf-Ferrari and others. Although the Insurance Society of Massachusetts will come in numbers to the Pop Concert of Wednesday, June 23, this and all other nights are in every way public occasions, excepting Tuesday night (June 22), when the Bank Officers' Association of Boston will have Symphony Hall to themselves.

Traveller 19

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The following programme will be presented at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight by Agide Jacchia and his Symphony orchestra:

Pomp and Circumstance (with organ) ... Elgar
Overture to "Poet and Peasant" ..... Suppe
Ave Maria ..... Bach-Gounod
Bassoon, Abdon Laus; organ, Albert W. Snow; pianoforte, E. Hoffmann.
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ..... Leoni
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
a. Ler Chasseresses.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia and his superfine orchestra of Symphony players will give the following programme at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Overture to "Poet and Peasant" ..... Suppe

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Although the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight is dedicated to the new Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Agide Jacchia, the Pops conductor, is director, the concert will be open to the public and of unusual interest. Of the soloists to be heard Hans Ebell, the famous pianist, is a member of the Conservatory faculty. The other soloists belong to the Conservatory and to the orchestra as well. Mr. Jacchia's programme follows:

Hungarian March ("Rakoczy") ..... Berlioz
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Organ solo, "Evening Song" ..... [illegible]
the United States.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The music of Sir Arthur Sullivan will dominate at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. Two numbers will be conducted by John C. Mullaly, famous in the 80's, as the foremost conductor of the Gilbert and Sullivan operettas. The complete programme follows:

Hungarian March (Rakoczy) ..... Berlioz

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

One of the most distinctive programmes this season, with several numbers from Wagner's operas, will be given at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The programme follows:

Second Polonaise ..... Liszt
Overture "Fingal's Cave" ..... Mendelssohn

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The following holiday programme will take place at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Stars and Stripes Forever ..... Sousa
Overture, "Mignon" ..... Thoms
Waltz, "A Night in Venice" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "Faust" ..... Gounod
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Cortege de Bacchus ..... Delibes
Kammenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique) ..... Rubinstein
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1 in F ..... Liszt
American Military Fantasy ..... Rollinson
Andante Cantabile ..... W. S. Smith
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ..... Vollstedt
March, "Victory" ..... Turabull

Herald

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Although tonight will be Boston University night at the Pops, both admissions and reserved seats are on public sale. The program follows:

Wedding March ..... Mendelssohn
Overture to "Tao des Eaes" ..... [illegible]

BANKERS AT THE POPS

The National Bankers' Convention, having taken over Symphony Hall for the Pop concert tonight, there will be no public sale. The bankers will celebrate with the folowing program:

March from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Overture, "Ruy Blas" ..... Mendelssohn
W[illegible]

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Request night, on which the program is entirely determined by public vote, will make the Pop concert at Symphony Hall this evening one of the biggest of the season. Of the many numbers requested, the following 12, which comprise the program, received the most votes:

Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Waltz [illegible]

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program:

March, "Manhattan Beach" ..... Sousa
Overture, "Maximilian Robespierer" ..... Litolff

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Although the Insurance Society of Massachusetts is celebrating at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight, this concert will be in every sense public. The following program will be conducted by Agide Jacchia:

March from "The Queen of Sheba" ..... Gounod
[illegible] ..... Thomas

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia has made the following program for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

March from "The Prophet" ..... Meyerbeer
[illegible] to "Phedre" ..... Massenet said. ..... Strauss

VERDI NIGHT AT POPS

One of the most interesting Pop concerts of the season will take place in Symphony Hall tonight, when Agide Jacchia, the conductor, who has long been famous as director of Italian opera, will present a program consisting entirely of Italian music, and featuring the operas of Verdi. The program follows:

Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" ..... Rossini
War[illegible] and Sicilliana. "Cavalleria

TONIGHT'S POPS

Although the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight is dedicated to the new Conservatory of Music, of which Agide Jacchia, the conductor, is director, the concert will be open to the public and of unusual interest. Of the soloists, Hans Ebell, the pianist, is a member of the Conservatory faculty. The other soloists belong to the Conservatory and to the Symphony orchestra. The program:

Hungarian March ("Rakoczy") ..... Berlio

MULLALY AT POPS

The music of Sir Arthur Sullivan a[illegible] dominate the Pop concert in Symphon[illegible] Hall tonight. Two numbers will be co[illegible] ducted by John C. Mullaly, famous [illegible] the 80's as the foremost conductor [illegible] the Gilbert and Sullivan operettas. T[illegible] complete program follows:

Hungarian March (Rakoczy) ..... Ber[illegible]

WAGNER NIGHT AT POP

One of the most distinctive progr[illegible] this season, with several numbers f[illegible] Wagner's operas, will be given at [illegible] Pop concert in Symphony Hall toni[illegible] The program follows:

Second Polonaise ..... [illegible]
[illegible] ..... Mendels

POP CONCERT TONIGH

At the Pop Concert in Symphony [illegible] tonight, Agide Jacchia will conduct [illegible] program.

March, "Jericho" ..... Chad[illegible]
Overture to "The Bartered Bride" ..... Sme[illegible]
Waltz, "La Barcarole" ..... Waldt[illegible]
Fantasia, "La Tosca" ..... P[illegible]
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-[illegible]
Third Movement from "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Kors[illegible]
(The Prince and the Princess)
Largo (with organ) ..... H[illegible]
Scene from "Vanity Fair" ..... [illegible]
(Pilgrim's Progress) ..... Stillman [illegible]
Rhapsody Espana ..... Ch[illegible]
German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride" ..... [illegible]
Waltzes from "The Rose Cavalier" ..... S[illegible]
Polonaise from "Eugen Oneigen" ..... Tschai[illegible]

[illegible] Request Programme of [illegible]
bers Next Monday and
Pieces from Italian Opera
—Other Incidents of the

Transcript

At the Pops Tonight

March from "The Queen of Sheba"
Gounod

At the Pops Tonight

(Request Night)
March, "Pomp and Circumstance" Elgar
Waltz, "Blue Danube"

At the Pops Tonight

The Bank Officers' Association has taken the whole of Symphony Hall for this evening and there are no places available for the public

At the Pops Tonight

Traffic Club Night
(Open to the Public)
March, "Manhattan Beach" ..... Sousa
Overture, "Robespierre"

At the Pops Tonight

Italian Programme
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" Rossini

At the Pops Tonight

Military March ..... Schubert
[illegible] ..... Suppé

At the Pops Tonight

Procession of the Sardar,
Ippolitov-Ivanov

At the Pops Tonight

At the Pops Tonight

At the Pops Tonight

Operatic Programme
Prelude to "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture to "The Barber of Seville"

At the Pops Tonight

Russian Programme
Wedding March from "Feramors". Rubinstein
Entrance of Raymonda from the like-named Ballet ..... Glazunov
The Miniature War ..... Cui
Finale of "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Three Numbers from the "Nutcracker" Ballet — Waltz, "Dornröschen"—Song Without Words—Finale of the Fourth Symphony—
Overture, "1812" ..... Chaikovsky
Hymn to the Sun from "The Golden Cockerell" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Angelic Vision ..... Rubinstein
Russian Folk Song, "Dubinushka".
Jacchia
Conductor: A. Jacchia.

AT THE POPS

Mountains of ballots have been counted by a special staff of workers for request night at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall. The twelve winning places (stated below) constitute the 100 per cent. popular program which will be given tomorrow night. To many, however, the Italian-Verdi program, which comes Friday night, will be equally interesting. Needless to say, Agide Jacchia, famous as a conductor of Italian opera in many a large metropolis, will be in his element. Tuesday night the Bank Officers' Association of Boston will have Symphony Hall to themselves. The request program for tomorrow night follows:

Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube." Strauss
Volga Bargemen's Song, Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Anitra's Dance from "Peer Gynt" Suite ..... Grieg
Largo (with organ) ..... Handel
Overture Solennelle, "1812" ..... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Faust" ..... Gounod
Tarantelle (with flute solo) ..... Jacchia
Kamenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique) ..... Rubenstein
Dardanella ..... Bernard-Black

A "REQUEST NIGHT" on Monday and an evening of Italian music, for the most part operatic and from Verdi, on Friday are the outstanding items in the calendar of The Pops next week. The balloting for the programme of Monday has resulted in the usual array of favorite pieces: the "Blue Danube" waltz, the "1812" overture, Händel's Largo, the overture to "Tannhäuser," Liszt's second rhapsody; the orchestral version of the Volga bargeman's song—all the "standbys," in short, of Mr. Jacchia's easier repertory. For Friday, he has set down numbers from the operas, "Il Trovatore," "La Forza del Destino," "Aida" and "Othello" for Verdi's share, along with other operatic pieces from Rossini, Mascagni, Ponchiello, Puccini and Wolf-Ferrari—a vertiable "Italian night" with plenty of the music of the theatre with which Mr. Jacchia excels. For the other evenings of the week—on Tuesday, the Bank Officers' Association will have Symphony Hall to itself; on Wednesday, Mr. Mager, the first trumpet, will be heard as soloist: on Thursday the programme includes the second and the less known suite from Grieg's music to "Peer Gynt"—the suite containing Solvejg's Song—and a piece for viola d'amore to be played by Mr. Shirley; on Saturday, Mr. Hoffmann will be heard in a violin piece and familiar fragments [illegible] Jacchia.

de Jacchia, famous
lian opera in many will be in his element. Although the Insurance Society of Massachusetts will come in numbers to the pop concert of Wednesday, June 23, this and all other nights are in every way public occasions, excepting Tuesday night, June 22, when the Bank Officers' Association of Boston will have Symphony Hall to themselves.

Boston Conservatory Programme

Tuesday night, June 29, will be Boston Conservatory of Music night at the pop concert in Symphony Hall. Agide Jacchia, director of this conservatory, will then conduct a programme of which four numbers will be played by members of the Boston Conservatory of Music faculty. These members are Hans Ebell, pianist, who will play a movement from his own concerto for piano and orchestra; Albert Snow, organist, who will play as a solo, Nairstow's "Evening Song"; Louis Speyer and Abdon Laus, oboist and bassoonist, who, with E. Hoffman, pianist, will take part in the performance of Pillevestre's trio, "Idylle Bretonne." Other numbers which the orchestra will play will be Berlioz' "Rackozy March," Thomas' "Mignon Overture," Tschaikowsky's "Marche Slav," Chabrier's "Espana," the tempest scene from Verdi's "Otello" and Wagner's introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin."

PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK'S POPS

Mountains of ballots having been counted by a special staff of workers for Request night at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, the 12 winning pieces (stated below) constitute the 100 per cent. popular program which will be given tomorrow night. To many, however, the Italian-Verdi program, which comes on Friday night, June 25, will be the most interesting of the week. Although opera always dominates Italian music, it will be noted that, with selections from four of Verdi's operas and from single operas of Mascagni, Puccini, Wolf-Ferrari and Ponchielli, there is nevertheless only one number (the Ballet Music from "La Gioconda") in common with the operatic program given earlier in the season. Needless to say, Agide Jacchia, who has conducted Italian opera in many large cities, will be in his element. The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY

Pomp and Circumstance—Elgar
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"—Strauss
Volga Bargemen's Song
Overture to "Tannhauser"—Wagner
Second Hungarian Rhapsody—Liszt
Anitra's Dance from "Peer Gynt"—Grieg
Largo (with organ)—Handel
Overture Solennelle, "1812"—Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Faust"—Gounod
Tarantelle (with flute solo)—Popper
Kamenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique)—Rubinstein
Dardanella—Black

TUESDAY

The Bankers' Officers Association and the entire house.

WEDNESDAY

March from "The Queen of Sheba"—Goldmark
Overture to "Raymond"—Thomas
Waltz, "Espana"—Chabrier
Fantasia, "Carmen"—Bizet
Marche Slave—Tschaikowsky
Largo (with organ)—Handel
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"—Wagner
Overture to "William Tell"—Rossini
Selection, "Mlle Modiste"—Herbert
"The Lost Chord" (Trumpet obligato by Georges Mager)—Sullivan
Concert Mazurka, "La Czarina"—Bendix
American Patrol—Meacham

THURSDAY

March, "Manhattan Beach"—Sousa
Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre"—Litolff
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube"—Ivanovici
Fantasia, "I Pagliacci"—Leoncavallo
Suite, "Peer Gynt," No. 2—Grieg
(a) Peer Gynt's Home Coming—Stormy Evening on the Coast.
(b) Solveig's Song.
(c) Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter.
Viola d'Amore Solo—"Spirit of the Woods"—Shirley
(Mr. Paul Shirley)
(Harp Accompaniment by Mr. Alfred Holy)
Concert Mazurka—Macomber

FRIDAY

Overture to "Il Trovatore" (1853)—G. Verdi
Prelude to "La Forza del Destino" (1862)—Giuseppe Verdi
Prelude to "Aida" (1871)—1813-1901
Tempest Scene from "Othello" (1889)—G. Verdi
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly"—Puccini
"Dal l'Italia"—Acerbi
Waltz, "Il Bacio" ("The Kiss")—Arditi
Dance of the Camorrists from The Jewels of the Madonna"—Wolf-Ferrari

SATURDAY

Marché Militaire—Schubert
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"—Suppe
Violin Solo (Mr. Jacques Hoffmann)
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo"—Leoni
Excerpts from "The Mastersingers"—Wagner
Introduction to Act III—Dance of the Apprentices—Homage to Hans Sachs
Prelude—Jarnefeldt
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann"—Offenbach
Finale, Fourth Symphony—Tschaikowsky
American Military Fantasia—Rollinson
American Idyl, "Indian Summer"—Herbert
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"—Strauss
Swedish Coronation March—Svendsen

SUNDAY CONCERTS PROVED SUCCESSFUL

The series of Sunday evening concerts given at various churches in and about Boston the past winter under the supervision of Paul Shirley, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have met with unqualified success.

There have been 43 musical services in nine churches of Greater Boston—Boston, Cambridge, Somerville, Roxbury, Dorchester, Newton, Newton Centre, Newtonville, Waltham. While two of the churches were Congregationalist, the remaining seven were Methodist. Thirty-nine members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and 21 Boston artists rendered their services toward the execution of works by Beethoven, Bach, Tchaikowsky, Grieg, Wagner, Mozart, etc. Of the American composers Cadman, MacDowell, Beach, Hadley Manney and others have been performed.

The sincerity of the musicians, the assistance of the organists, the help and good will of the church committees and above all the fine spirit of the ministers made this movement possible and successful. Mr. Sharley writes that it will be an honor to remain in charge of the work next season.

Tokio, Japan, has a new and unique music library which contains about 40,000 books on music.

Special Pops

All ballots for Request Night at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall next Monday, June 21, have been counted by a staff of workers especially engaged for the purpose. The 12 leading pieces will constitute the 100 p.c. popular program. On Friday night, June 25, comes what will be still more interesting to many—an Italian-Verdi Program. Agide Jacchia, famous conductor of Italian opera in many countries, has chosen selections from four of Verdi's operas and single numbers of Rossini, Mascagni, Puccini, Wolf-Ferrari and others. Although the Insurance Society of Massachusetts will come in numbers to the Pop Concert of Wednesday, June 23, this and all other nights are in every way public occasions, excepting Tuesday night, June 22, when the Bank Officers' Assn. of Boston will have Symphony Hall to themselves.

ONLY TWO MORE WEEKS OF 'POPS'

Only two more weeks remain of what will be the largest season the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall have ever enjoyed. A number of special features will make the six nights of next week (all of which are public occasions) of unusual interest.

The program of Tuesday, June 29, bears the name of the new Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Agide Jacchia, Pops conductor, is the director. Hans Ebell, the celebrated pianist, who is on the faculty, will play a movement from his own concerto for piano and orchestra; Albert Snow, organist, who will play a solo, Naurstow's "Evening Song;" Louis Speyer and Abdon Laus, oboist and bassoonist, who, with E. Hoffman, pianist, will take part in the performance of Pillevestre's trio, "Idylle Bretonne." Other numbers which the orchestra will play will be Berlioz's "Rackozy March," Thomas's "Mignon Overture," Tschaikowsky's "Marche Slave," Chabrier's "Espana," the tempest scene from Verdi's "Otello" and Wagner's introduction to the third act from "Lohengrin."

On Thursday, July 1, several numbers of Sullivan will be played, and Friday brings a Wagner program with selections from "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhausser," "Lohengrin," "The Valkyries" and "The Mastersingers." The rest of the program is also of unusual musical interest.

"POPS" DELLA SETTIMANA

Venerdì prossimo la Symphony Hall di Boston dovrebbe essere affollata di pubblico italiano per rendere omaggio all'immortale Giuseppe Verdi. La serata è dedicata alla memoria di quel grande, la cui gloria artistica è massimo vanto del popolo d'Italia. Sarà eseguito il seguente programma:

1 Overture to "La Gazza Ladra"; Rossini — 2 Prelude and Siciliana, "Cavalleria Rusticana"; Mascagni — 3 Capriccio (arranged for String Orchestra by Agide Jacchia); Scarlatti — 4 Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda"; Ponchielli — 5 Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" (1853) — 6 Overture to "La Forza del Destino" (1862) — 7 Prelude to "Aida" (1871) — 8 Tempest Scene from "Othello" (1889); Giuseppe Verdi (1813-1901 — 9 Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly"; Puccini — 10 "Dall'Italia"; Acerbi — 11 Waltz, "Il Bacio" (The Kiss); Arditi — 12 Dance of the Camorristi from "The Jewels of the Madonna"; Wolf-Ferrari.

Dirigerà l'orchestra il valente e popolare maestro Agide Jacchia, il quale è anche direttore del Boston Conservatory of Music.

Harvard Night at the "Pops"

Tonight is "Harvard Night" at the Pops. The orchestra, led by Agide Jacchia, will be assisted by the University Glee Club which, in addition to a group of three songs alone, will sing twice with the orchestra accompanying. The first of these numbers is "The Answer of the Stars," written by M. A. DeWolfe Howe '87 and conducted by Frederic S. Converse '93, in commemoration of the Harvard men who lost their lives in the war. It was sung at the Memorial Day exercises in Sanders Theatre.

On Thursday evening the club will hold its first Yard concert on the Library steps.

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

The Concerts to Be Renewed in September—An Interesting Week in Prospect with a "Wagner Night" and Various Novel Features

With the end of the Spring Pops only a fortnight away the pleasing news comes that, after an interval of eight summer weeks, they will be resumed on Monday, Sept. 6, as Fall Pops, and so continue through that month, until at the beginning of October, Mr. Monteux calls the full Symphony Orchestra for rehearsal. There is not a visible reason why the concerts should not be as grateful to the public, resident or transient, in September as they are in May or June, especially as the Pops of early autumn will correspond exactly with the Pops of late spring. Again Mr. Jacchia will lead and keep to its mettle a band of seventy or eighty men drawn from the Symphony Orchestra; again he will make his well-liked programmes; while the "refreshments" of September will not differ from the "refreshments" of June. In a word, the public has only to acquire the habit of fall Pops to be pleasured by them; and in all the thirty-odd years of "these concerts," the audiences have never before been so uniformly large and eager as for the past seven weeks.

Now, at the beginning of summer, the "special nights" for clubs, colleges, conventions and the like have vanished from the schedules of Symphony Hall. None the less the six Pops of next week will not lack interesting episodes. On Monday, for example, the musically curious may hear the intermezzo from "Goyescas," the opera, little known in Boston, of the Spaniard, Granados. On Tuesday, Mr. Ebell, the pianist—one of Mr. Jacchia's colleagues at the Boston Conservatory of Music—will be heard in the finale of his own concerto for piano and orchestra. Two members of the orchestra—Mr. Speyer (oboe) and Mr. Laus (bassoon)—likewise teachers at the school, will join Mr. E. Hoffmann, pianist, in a "Breton Idyl" for their instruments. On Wednesday, for solo piece, Mr. de Mailly (flute), Mr. Mimart (clarinet) and Mr. Hoffmann (piano) will play parts of a seldom heard trio by the Russian, Cui. On Thursday, four pieces by Sullivan stand on the programme—his "Graceful Dances"; his ballad, "The Lost Chord," as arranged for organ and orchestra; and the overtures to two of his operettas, "The Pirates" and "The Mikado." In the overtures, Mr. John C. Mullaly, now in his seventy-third year, who led in them when they were new to Boston, will again conduct, as of old at more than one theatre. For Friday, Mr. Jacchia has picked six numbers from Wagner's operas—two pieces from "The Mastersingers"; the "Fire-Music" from "The Valkyr"; the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin"; a sailor's chorus from "The Flying Dutchman" and the overture to "Tannhäuser." On Saturday the programme includes the suave and fanciful music of Rimsky-Korsakov for the woung prince and the young princess of "Scheherazade" when "they sat in the garden and talked of love"; and for the first time in Boston, one of the episodes in Vanity Fair from Mr. Stillman-Kelley's oratorio drawn from "Pilgrim's Progress."

ITALIAN-VERDI NIGHT AT "POP" CONCERTS

One of the most interesting Pop Concerts of the season will take place at Symphony Hall tonight, when Agide Jacchia, the conductor, who has long been famous as director of Italian opera, will present the following programe, consisting entirely of Italian music, and featuring the opera of Verdi:

Overture to "La Gazza Ladra"—Rossini
Prelude and Siciliana, "Cavalleria Rusticana"—Mascagni
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"—Verdi
Prelude to "Aida"—Verdi
Tempest Scene from "Othello"—Verdi
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda"—Ponchielli
Waltz, "Il Bacio"—Arditi
Dance of the Camorristi from "The Jewels of the Madonna"—Wolf-Ferrari

POP PROGRAM TONIGHT AT SYMPHONY HALL

At the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program:

1. March, "Manhattan Beach"—Sousa
2. Overture, "Ma—
3. W—
4. Fantasia, "Fa—

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia and his superfine orchestra of symphony players will give the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Militaire—Schubert
Overture—Suppe

"POPS" PROGRAM TONIGHT AT SYMPHONY HALL

The following program will be played at the Pops tonight:

1. Procession of the Sardar—Ippolitoff-Ivanoff
2. Overture to "Fra Diavolo"—Auber

POPS PROGRAM TONIGHT AT SYMPHONY HALL

Although the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight is dedicated to the new Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Agide Jacchia, the Pops conductor, is director, the concert will be open to the public. The programme follows:

1. Hungarian March "Rakocay"—Berlioz
2. Overture to "Mignon"—Thomas
3. Organ Solo "Evening Song"—Bairstow
(Mr. Albert W. Snow.)

POPS OPERATIC NIGHT

Agide Jacchia, the Pops conductor, who has also been for many years a celebrated operatic conductor, has compiled the [illegible] unusually eventful operatic program for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

"Carmen"—Bizet
The Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann" ballet—Offenbach
Overture to "Tannhauser"—Wagner
Second Hungarian Rhapsody—Liszt
Serenade—Pierne
Intermezzo from "Goyescas"—Granados
Entrance of the Boyards—Halvorsen

BOSTON CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC NIGHT—TUESDAY

Hungarian March ("Rakoczy")—Berlioz
Overture to "Mignon"—Thomas
Organ Solo, "Evening Song"—Bairstow
(Mr. Albert W. Snow.)
Marche Slave—Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "La Boheme"—Puccini
Finale of Concerto in F-sharp minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra—Ebell
(Mr. Hans Ebell.)
Minuet (for strings)—Bolzoni
Rhapsody, "Espana"—Chabrier
Tempest Scene from "Othello"—Verdi
Trio, "Idylle Bretonne"—Pillevestre
(Oboe, Mr. Louis Speyer; bassoon, Mr. Abdon Laus; piano, Mr. E. Hoffmann.)
Waltz, "Estudiantina"—Waldteufel
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"—Wagner

WEDNESDAY

March, "Boston Normal School"—Mairey
Overture to "Morning, Noon and Night"—Suppe
Trio { Flute—C. DeMailly; Clarinet—P. Mimart; Piano—E. Hoffmann }
Fantasia, "Mefistofele"—Boito
March to the Scaffold from the "Fantastic" Symphony—Berlioz
Prelude to "Aida"—Verdi
Solvejg's Song, "Peer Gynt"—Grieg
Capriccio Italienne—Tschaikowsky
Overture to "Semiramide"—Rossini
"To a Wild Rose"—MacDowell
(Arranged by C. Lenom.)
Waltz, "Vienna Bon Bons"—Strauss
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen"—Bizet

THURSDAY.

Hungarian March ("Rakoczy")—Berlioz
Overture to "William Tell"—Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"—Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida"—Verdi
Overture to "The Pirates of Penzance" } Sir Arthur S. Sullivan, 1842-1900.
The Lost Chord (with organ)
Three Graceful Dances
Overture to "The Mikado"
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"—Ponchielli
Kammanoi Ostrow (Reven Angelique)—Rubinstein
Waltz, "Dornroeschen"—Tschaikowsky

POPS CLOSING NIGHT

In Symphony Hall, tonight, the Pop Concerts will close with this program:

Hungarian March ("Rakoczy")—Berlioz
Overture to "Mignon"—Thomas
Reverie (with organ)—Redway-Rissland
Fantasia, "Aida"—Verdi
Marche Slave—Tschaikowsky
Violin solo, ("Scandia")—delli Ponti
(Mr. Antonio Gerardi)
Volga Bargemen's Song.
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Overture to "Tannhauser"—Wagner
Egyptian Impressions—Crist
a. Carro— b. To a Mummy. c. Katabet.
d. A L— Song.
—Handel
Beautiful Blue Danube."—Strauss

POPS CONCERTS

The Pop concerts at Symphony Hall are about to enter upon the next to the last week. Agide Jacchia, conductor, has made programs of unusual interest for the remaining nights, all of which will be public, Tuesday night being dedicated to the new Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Mr. Jacchia is the director. Solos will be played by Hans Ebell, Albert W. Snow, Louis Speyer and Abdon Laus. Friday will bring a Wagner

LAST WEEK OF POPS

Only two more weeks what will be the largest Pop Concerts at Symphony ever enjoyed. A number features will make the si— next week (all of which occasions) of unusual in— program of Tuesday (Jun— the name of the new Bo— servatory of Music, of w— Jacchia, Pops conductor, i— tor. Hans Ebell, the cele— ist, who is on the faculty, a solo, and also several musicians who belong to the Conservatory and the orchestra as well. On Thursday, July 1, several numbers of Sullivan will be played, and Friday brings a Wagner program with selections from "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "The Valkyries," and "The Mastersingers." The rest of the program is also of unusual musical interest.

Pops Near Close

Only two more weeks remain of what will be the largest season the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall have ever enjoyed. A number of special features will make the six nights of next week (all of which are public occasions) of unusual interest. The program of Tuesday (June 29), bears the name of the new Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Agide Jacchia, Pops Conductor, is the director. Hans Ebell, pianist, who is on the faculty, will play a solo, and also several musicians who belong to the Conservatory and the Orchestra as well. On Thursday, July 1, several numbers of Sullivan will be played, and Friday brings a Wagner program, with selections from "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhausser," "Lohengrin," "The Valkyries," and "The Mastersingers."

Last Week But One of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall

The last week but one of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall will start tomorrow and Agide Jacchia, conductor of the orchestra, has made programs of special interest for the coming nights, all of which will be public. Tuesday night is dedicated to the new Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Mr Jacchia is the director. Interesting solos will be played by Hans Ebell, pianist, who is a member of the faculty, and by Messrs Albert W. Snow, organist; Louis Speyer, oboe, and Abdon Laus, bassoon, who belong to the Conservatory and the orchestra as well.

Thursday, July 1, the middle section of the program will be devoted to the music of Sir Arthur S. Sullivan, and the overtures to "The Pirates of Penzance" and the "Mikado" will be conducted by John C. Mullaly, the veteran violinist of the orchestra, who in the 90's conducted many of the Gilbert & Sullivan operettas in this country. Next Friday will bring a Wagner program.

RUSSIAN NIGHT AT POPS

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight (which is the last concert but one of the season and the last concert with a special program) the music will consist entirely of Russian numbers and, in particular, of the music of Tschaikowsky. The program follows:

—Rubinstein
Feramors"—Rubinstein

POPS CLOSING NIGHT

In Symphony Hall, tonight, the Pop Concerts will close with this program:

Hungarian March ("Rakoczy")—Berlioz
Overture to "Mignon"—Thomas
Reverie (with organ)—Redway-Rissland
Fantasia, "Aida"—Verdi
Marche Slave—Tschaikowsky
Violin solo, ("Scandia")—delli Ponti
(Mr. Antonio Gerardi)
Volga Bargemen's Song.
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Overture to "Tannhauser"—Wagner
Egyptian Impressions—Crist
a. Carro— b. To a Mummy. c. Katabet.
d. A L— Song.
—Handel
Beautiful Blue Danube."—Strauss

ONLY TWO MORE WEEKS OF "POPS"

Drawing towards the close of by far their largest season, the Pop Concerts, which take place every night (Sundays excepted) in Symphony Hall, are about to enter upon the next to the last week.

Agide Jacchia, conductor of the superfine Symphony Orchestra, has made programs of unusual interest for the succeeding nights, all of which will be public. Tuesday night will be dedicated to the new Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Mr. Jacchia is the director. On Thursday, July 1, the middle section of the program will be devoted to the music of Sir Arthur S. Sullivan, and the Overture to "The Pirates of Penzance" and "The Mikado" will be conducted by John C. Mullaly, the veteran violinist of the orchestra. Friday, July 2, will bring a Wagner program which is musically eventful throughout. The programs in full follow:

MONDAY.

Procession of the Sardar—Ippolitoff-Ivanoff
Overture to "Fra Diavolo"—Auber
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"—Strauss
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"—Mascagni
Ballet Music from "The Queen of Sheba"—Goldmark
Third Slavonic Dance—Dvorak
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann"—Offenbach
Overture to "Tannhauser"—Wagner
Second Hungarian Rhapsody—Liszt
Serenade—Pierne
Intermezzo from "Goyescas"—Granados
Entrance of the Boyards—Halvorsen

BOSTON CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC NIGHT—TUESDAY

Hungarian March ("Rakoczy")—Berlioz
Overture to "Mignon"—Thomas
Organ Solo, "Evening Song"—Bairstow
(Mr. Albert W. Snow.)
Marche Slave—Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "La Boheme"—Puccini
Finale of Concerto in F-sharp minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra—Ebell
(Mr. Hans Ebell.)
Minuet (for strings)—Bolzoni
Rhapsody, "Espana"—Chabrier
Tempest Scene from "Othello"—Verdi
Trio, "Idylle Bretonne"—Pillevestre
(Oboe, Mr. Louis Speyer; bassoon, Mr. Abdon Laus; piano, Mr. E. Hoffmann.)
Waltz, "Estudiantina"—Waldteufel
Introduction to Act, III, "Lohengrin"—Wagner

WEDNESDAY.

March, "Boston Normal School"—Mairey
Overture to "Morning, Noon and Night"—Suppe
Trio { Flute—C. DeMailly; Clarinet—P. Mimart; Piano—E. Hoffmann }
Fantasia, "Mefistofele"—Boito
March to the Scaffold from the "Fantastic" Symphony—Berlioz
Prelude to "Aida"—Verdi
Solvejg's Song, "Peer Gynt"—Grieg
Capriccio Italienne—Tschaikowsky
Overture to "Semiramide"—Rossini
"To a Wild Rose"—MacDowell
(Arranged by C. Lenom.)
Waltz, "Vienna Bon Bons"—Strauss
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen"—Bizet

THURSDAY.

Hungarian March ("Rakoczy")—Berlioz
Overture to "William Tell"—Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"—Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida"—Verdi
Overture to "The Pirates of Penzance" } Sir Arthur S. Sullivan, 1842-1900.
The Lost Chord (with organ)
Three Graceful Dances
Overture to "The Mikado"
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"—Ponchielli
Kammanoi Ostrow (Reven Angelique)—Rubinstein
Waltz, "Dornroeschen"—Tschaikowsky

SYMPHONY TO GIVE ITALIAN VERDI NIGHT

The Pops-Special for next Friday will be Italian Verdi night. The program follows:—

Overture to "La Gaza Ladra," Rossini; Prelude and Sicilliana, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Capriccio, (arranged for string orchestra by Agide Jacchia), Scarlatti; Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Fantasia, "Il Trovatore," Overture to "La Forza del Destino," Prelude to "Aida," Tempest Scene from "Othello," Guiseppe Verdi; Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly," Puccini; Prelude to "Dall'Italia," Acerbi; Waltz, "Il Bacio" (The Kiss), Arditi; Dance of the Camorristi from "The Jewels of the Madonna," Wolf-Ferrari.

delegate will be allowed for the Post itself and one additional delegate for each one hundred paid-up members and for any major fraction thereof.

American
JULY 1, 1920

DEAN OF 'POPS' TO CONDUCT

John C. Mullaly, at 73, Will Lead Orchestra in Sullivan Numbers Tonight

A special feature is planned for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight which will be a revival in everything but the religious sense.

Numbers by Sir Arthur Sullivan will be conducted by John C. Mullaly, the oldest living member of the orchestra, who will be remembered by the "old-timers" as a foremost figure in the musical Boston of the eighties, conducting all the Gilbert and Sullivan operattas when the craze for "Patience," "Iolanthe," "Pinafore," "The Mikado" and the rest had everyone humming.

VIGOROUS AT 73.

When, a short while ago, Mr. Mullaly called upon a doctor for the first time in his life, he was declared to have a perfect physique

"Seventy-three," mused the doctor. "It is unbelievable. The digits should be reversed."

Of Scotch and Irish parentage, Mr. Mullaly has lived in Boston from childhood. As a lad of sixteen, when the Civil War was in full blast, he conducted Gilmore's Band, famous in those days, attracting much attention by his dashing manner.

In the early seventies he first became a familiar figure, conducting orchestras in the Boston Theatre and in the Globe Theatre, which stood on the corner of Essex and Washington streets. Here and in the old Music Hall on Hamilton place he directed everything from "Tannhauser" and "The Dutchman," with the greatest stars of the day, to a burlesque show, with all shades between.

LED POPS SECOND YEAR.

He conducted the Pops in their second season (1886). For twenty-nine Summers he was the idol of Newport as director of the Casino Orchestra there. He has conducted everything Gilbert and Sullivan wrote, and notably presided over the first American production of "Pirates of Pensance" in 1888. Tonight's program in full follows:

1. Hungarian March (Rakoczy)—Berlioz
2. Overture to "William Tell"—Rossini
3. Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"—Strauss
4. Fantasia, "Aida"—Verdi
5. *Overture to "The Pirates of Pensance"
6. The Lost Chord (with organ)
7. Three Graceful Dances
8. *Overture to "The Mikado"
Sir Arthur Sullivan, 1842-1900
9. Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"—Ponchielli
10. Kammonoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique)—Rubinstein
11. Waltz, "Dornroeschen"—Tschaikowsky
12. Pomp and Circumstance—Elgar
*Conducted by John C. Mullaly.

TONIGHT'S POPS

The following program will be presented at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight by Agide Jacchia and his symphony orchestra:

Procession of the Sardar—Ippolitoff-Ivanoff
Overture to "William Tell"—Rossini

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The following holiday program will take place at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Stars and Stripes Forever"—Sousa
Overture, "Mignon"—Thomas
Waltz, "A Night in Venice"—Strauss
Fantasia, "Faust"—Gounod
Prelude to "Lohengrin"—Wagner
Portege de Bacchus—Delibes
Kammenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique), Rubenstein
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1 in F—Liszt
American Military Fantasy—Rollinson
Andante Cantabile—W. S. Smith
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"—Vollstedt
March, "Victory"—Turnbull

The Pops

The Pops will begin the final week of the Spring and Summer season at Symphony Hall, Monday. This has been the most successful season the Pops have had, so successful that the management has decided to give a supplementary season starting Sept. 6. Night after night the capacity of Symphony Hall has been tested by audiences that have shown their delight in the playing of the large orchestra in such ideal surroundings.

For the coming week there will be a special patriotic program on Monday, and an all operatic program on Wednesday.

PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK'S POPS

Mountains of ballots having been counted by a special staff of workers for Request night at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, the 12 winning pieces (stated below) constitute the 100 per cent. popular program which will be given tomorrow night. To many, however, the Italian-Verdi program, which comes on Friday night, June 25, will be the most interesting of the week. Although opera always dominates Italian music, it will be noted that, with selections from four of Verdi's operas and from single operas of Mascagni, Puccini, Wolf-Ferrari and Ponchielli, there is nevertheless only one number (the Ballet Music from "La Gioconda") in common with the operatic program given earlier in the season. Needless to say, Agide Jacchia, who has conducted Italian opera in many large cities, will be in his element. The programs of the week follow:

MONDA

Pomp and Circumstance..
Waltz, "On the Beautifu
Volga Bargemen's Song
Overture to "Tannhause
Second Hungarian Rhap
Anitra's Dance from "P
Largo (with organ).....
Overture Solennelle, "18
Fantasia, "Faust".....
Tarantelle (with flute so Kamenoi Ostrow (Reve A Dardanella .....

TUESD

The Bankers' Officers
the entire house.

WEDNES

March from "The Queen o
Overture to "Raymond"..
Waltz, "Espana".....
Fantasia, "Carmen".....
Marche Slave.....
Largo (with organ).....
Introduction to Act III, "
Overture to 'William Tell'
Selection, "Mlle Modiste'
"The Lost Chord" (Tru Georges Mager) .....
Concert Mazurka, "La Cz American Patrol.....

THURSD

March, "Manhattan Beach"
Overture, "Maximilian Ro
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube".....Ivanovici
Fantasia, "I Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Suite, "Peer Gynt," No. 2.....Grieg
(a) Peer Gynt's Home Coming—Stormy Evening on the Coast.
(b) Solvejg's Song.
(c) Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter.
Viola d'Amore Solo—"Spirit of the Woods".....Shirley
(Mr. Paul Shirley)
(Harp Accompaniment by Mr. Alfred Holy)

Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" (1853).....G. Verdi
Overture to "La Forza del Destino".....1862) Giuseppe Verdi
Prelude to "Aida".....(1871) 1813-1901
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....(1889).....G. Verdi
Fantasia "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
"Dell' Acqua".....Acerbi
Waltz, "Il Bacio" ("The Kiss").....Arditi
Dance of the Camorrists from The Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari

SATURDAY

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Violin Solo (Mr. Jacques Hoffmann)
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo".....Leoni
Excerpts from "The Mastersingers"...Wagner
Introduction to Act III—Dance of the Apprentices—Homage to Hans Sachs
Prelude.....Jarnefeldt
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann".....Offenbach
Finale, Fourth Symphony.....Tschaikowsky
American Military Fantasy.....Rollinson
American Joyl, "Indian Summer".....Herbert
Waltz, "Vienna Blood".....Strauss
Swedish Coronation March.....Svendsen

SUNDAY CONCERTS PROVED SUCCESSFUL

The series of Sunday evening concerts given at various churches in and about Boston the past winter under the supervision of Paul Shirley, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have met with unqualified success.

There have been 183 musical services in nine churches of Greater Boston—Boston, Cambridge, Somerville, Roxbury, Dorchester, Newton, Newton Centre, Newtonville, Waltham. While two of the churches were Congregationalist, the remaining seven were Methodist. Thirty-nine members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and 21 Boston artists rendered their services toward the execution of works by Beethoven, Bach, Tchaikowsky, Grieg, Wagner, Mozart, etc. Of the American composers Cadman, MacDowell, Beach, Hadley Manney and others have been performed.

The sincerity of the musicians, the assistance of the organists, the help and good will of the church committees and above all the fine spirit of the ministers made this movement possible and successful. Mr. Sharley writes that it will be an honor to remain in charge of the work next season.

Tokio, Japan, has a new and unique music library which contains about 40 000 books on music.

Special Pops

All ballots for Request Night at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall next Monday, June 21, have been counted by a staff of workers especially engaged for the purpose. The 12 leading pieces will constitute the 100 p.c. popular program. On Friday night, June 25, comes what will be still more interesting to many—an Italian-Verdi Program. Agide Jacchia, famous conductor of Italian opera in many countries, has chosen selections from four of Verdi's operas and single numbers of Rossini, Mascagni, Puccini, Wolf-Ferrari and others. Although the Insurance Society of Massachusetts will come in numbers to the Pop Concert of Wednesday, June 23, this and all other nights are in every way public occasions, excepting Tuesday night, June 22, when the Bank Officers' Assn. of Boston will have Symphony Hall to themselves.

ONLY TWO MORE WEEKS OF 'POPS'

Only two more weeks remain of what will be the largest season the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall have ever enjoyed. A number of special features will make the six nights of next week (all of which are public occasions) of unusual interest.

The program of Tuesday, June 29, bears the name of the new Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Agide Jacchia, Pops conductor, is the director. Hans Ebell, the celebrated pianist, who is on the faculty, will play a movement from his own concerto for piano and orchestra; Albert Snow, organist, who will play a solo, Naurstow's "Evening Song;" Louis Speyer and Abdon Laus, oboist and bassoonist, who, with E. Hoffman, pianist, will take part in the performance of Pillevestre's trio, "Idylle Bretonne." Other numbers which the orchestra will play will be Berlioz's "Rackozy March," Thomas's "Mignon Overture," Tschaikowsky's "Marche Slave," Chabrier's "Espana," the tempest scene from Verdi's "Otello" and Wagner's introduction to the third act from "Lohengrin."

On Thursday, July 1, several numbers of Sullivan will be played, and Friday brings a Wagner program with selections from "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "The Valkyries" and "The Mastersingers." The rest of the program is also of unusual musical interest.

LAST WEEK OF POPS

Only two more weeks remain of what will be the largest season the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall have ever enjoyed. A number of special features will make the six nights of next week (all of which are public occasions) of unusual interest. The program of Tuesday (June 29), bears the name of the new Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Agide Jacchia, Pops Conductor, is the director. Hans Ebell, pianist, who is on the faculty, will play a solo, and also several musicians who belong to the Conservatory and the Orchestra as well. On Thursday, July 1, several numbers of Sullivan will be played, and Friday brings a Wagner program with selections from "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "The Valkyries," and "The Mastersingers."

ITALIAN-VERDI NIGHT AT "POP" CONCERTS

One of the most interesting Pop Concerts of the season will take place at Symphony Hall tonight, when Agide Jacchia, the conductor, who has long been famous as director of Italian opera, will present the following programe, consisting entirely of Italian music, and featuring the opera of Verdi:

Overture to "La Gazza Ladra".....Rossini
Prelude and Sicilliana, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni

POP PROGRAM TONIGHT AT SYMPHONY HALL

At the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program:

1. March, "Manhattan Beach".....Sousa
2. Overture, "Ma
3. Wal
4. Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
5. Agide Jacchia and his superfine orchestra of symphony players will give the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:
Militaire.....Schubert
.....Suppe

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

"POPS" PROGRAM TONIGHT AT SYMPHONY HALL

The following program will be played at the Pops tonight:

1. Procession of the Sardar.....Ippolitoff-Ivanoff
2. Overture to "Fra Diavolo".....Auber

POPS PROGRAM TONIGHT AT SYMPHONY HALL

Although the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight is dedicated to the new Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Agide Jacchia, the conductor, is director, the concert will be open to the public. The programme follows:

1. Hungarian March "Rakoczy".....Berlioz
2. Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
3. Organ Solo "Exening Song".....Bairstow
(Mr. Albert W. Snow)

POPS OPERATIC NIGHT

Agide Jacchia, the Pops conductor, who has also been for many years a celebrated operatic conductor, has compiled the following unusually eventful operatic program for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

"Carmen".....Bizet
The Bar ballet
"Feramors"...Rubinstein

RUSSIA NIGHT AT POPS

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight (which is the last concert but one of the season and the last concert with a special program) the music will consist entirely of Russian numbers and, in particular, of the music of Tschaikowsky. The program follows:

ished.

POPS CLOSING NIGHT

In Symphony Hall, tonight, the Pop Concerts will close with this program:

Hungarian March ("Rakoczy").....Berlioz
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Reverie (with organ).....Redway-Rissland
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky
Violin solo, ("Scandia").....delil Ponti
(Mr. Antonio Gerardi)
Volga Bargemen's Song.
(Arranged by Agide Jacchia)
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Egyptian Impressions.....Crist
a. Caravan. b. To a Mummy. c. Katabet.
d. A Dea
Largo (with organ).....Handel
Beautiful Blue Danube."

Pops Near Close

Only two more weeks remain of what will be the largest season the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall have ever enjoyed. A number of special features will make the six nights of next week (all of which are public occasions) of unusual interest. The program of Tuesday (June 29), bears the name of the new Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Agide Jacchia, Pops Conductor, is the director. Hans Ebell, pianist, who is on the faculty, will play a solo, and also several musicians who belong to the Conservatory and the Orchestra as well. On Thursday, July 1, several numbers of Sullivan will be played, and Friday brings a Wagner program, with selections from "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "The Valkyries," and "The Mastersingers."

Last Week But One of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall

The last week but one of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall will start tomorrow and Agide Jacchia, conductor of the orchestra, has made programs of special interest for the coming nights, all of which will be public. Tuesday night is dedicated to the new Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Mr Jacchia is the director. Interesting solos will be played by Hans Ebell, pianist, who is a member of the faculty, and by Messrs Aibert W. Snow, organist; Louis Speyer, oboe, and Abdon Laus, bassoon, who belong to the Conservatory and the orchestra as well.

Thursday, July 1, the middle section of the program will be devoted to the music of Sir Arthur S. Sullivan, and the overtures to "The Pirates of Penzance" and the "Mikado" will be conducted by John C. Mullaly, the veteran violinist of the orchestra, who in the 90's conducted many of the Gilbert & Sullivan operettas in this country. Next Friday will bring a Wagner program.

POP CONCERTS

The Pop concerts at Symphony Hall are about to enter upon the next to the last week. Agide Jacchia, conductor, has made programs of unusual interest for the remaining nights, all of which will be public. Tuesday night being dedicated to the new Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Mr. Jacchia is the director. Solos will be played by Hans Ebell, Albert W. Snow, Louis Speyer and Abdon Laus. Friday will bring a Wagner

LA SERATA VERDIANA AI "POPS" DELLA SYMPHONY

Venerdì prossimo la Symphony Hall di Boston dovrebbe essere affollata di popolo italiano per rendere omaggio all'immortale Giuseppe Verdi. La serata è dedicata alla memoria di quel Grande, la cui gloria artistica è massimo orgoglio del popolo d'Italia. Sarà eseguito il seguente programma:

1 Overture to "La Gazza Ladra"; Rossini — 2 Prelude and Siciliana, "Cavalleria Rusticana"; Mascagni — 3 Capriccio (arranged for String Orchestra by Agide Jacchia); Scarlatti — 4 Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda"; Ponchielli — 5 Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" (1853) — 6 Overture to "La Forza del Destino" (1862) — 7 Prelude to "Aida" (1871) — 8 Tempest Scene from "Othello" (1889); Giuseppe Verdi (1813-1901 — 9 Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly"; Puccini — 10 "Dall'Italia"; Acerbi — 11 Waltz, "Il Bacio" (The Kiss) ;Arditi — 12 Dance of the Camorristi from "The Jewels of the Madonna"; Wolf-Ferrari.

Dirigerà l'orchestra il valente e popolare maestro Agide Jacchia, il quale è anche direttore del Boston Conservatory of Music.

delegate will be allowed for the Post itself and one additional delegate for each one hundred paid-up members and for any major fraction thereof.

SYMPHONY TO GIVE ITALIAN VERDI NIGHT

The Pops-Special for next Friday will be Italian Verdi night. The program follows:—

Overture to "La Gaza Ladra," Rossini; Prelude and Sicilliana, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Capriccio, (arranged for string orchestra by Agide Jacchia), Scarlatti; Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Fantasia, "Il Trovatore," Overture to "La Forza del Destino," Prelude to "Aida," Tempest Scene from "Othello," Guiseppe Verdi; Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly," Puccini; "Dall'Italia" (

Ca

Ma

JULY 1, 1920

ONLY TWO MORE WEEKS OF "POPS"

Drawing towards the close of by far their largest season, the Pop concerts, which take place every night (Sundays excepted) in Symphony Hall, are about to enter upon the next to the last week.

Agide Jacchia, conductor of the superfine Symphony Orchestra, has made programs of unusual interest for the succeeding nights, all of which will be public. Tuesday night will be dedicated to the new Boston Conservatory of Music, of which Mr. Jacchia is the director. On Thursday, July 1, the middle section of the program will be devoted to the music of Sir Arthur S. Sullivan, and the Overture to "The Pirates of Penzance" and "The Mikado" will be conducted by John C. Mullaly, the veteran violinist of the orchestra. Friday, July 2, will bring a Wagner program which is musically eventful throughout. The programs in full follow:

MONDAY.

Procession of the Sardar.....Ippolitoff-Ivanoff
Overture to "Fra Diavolo".....Auber
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song".....Strauss
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Ballet Music from "The Queen of Sheba".....Goldmark
Third Slavonic Dance.....Dvorak
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann".....Offenbach
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Serenade.....Pierne
Intermezzo from "Goyescas".....Granados
Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen

BOSTON CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC NIGHT—TUESDAY

Hungarian March ("Rakoczy").....Berlioz
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Organ Solo, "Evening Song".....Bairstow
(Mr. Albert W. Snow.)
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Finale of Concerto in F-sharp minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra.....Ebell
(Mr. Hans Ebell.)
Minuet (for strings).....Bolzoni
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Trio, "Idylle Bretonne".....Pillevestre
(Oboe, Mr. Louis Speyer; bassoon, Mr. Abdon Laus; piano, Mr. E. Hoffmann.)
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"..Wagner

WEDNESDAY.

March, "Boston Normal School".....Mulrey
Overture to "Morning, Noon and Night"..Suppe
Trio { Flute.....C. DeMailly; Clarinet.....P. Mimart; Piano.....E. Hoffmann }
Fantasia, "Mefistofele".....Boito
March to the Scaffold from the "Fantastic" Symphony.....Berlioz
Prelude to "Aida".....Verdi
Solvejg's Song, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Capriccio Italienne.....Tschaikowsky
Overture to "Semiramide".....Rossini
"To a Wild Rose".....MacDowell
(Arranged by C. Lenom.)
Waltz, "Vienna Bon Bons".....Strauss
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet

THURSDAY.

Hungarian March ("Rakoczy").....Berlioz
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"..Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "The Pirates of Penzance" } Sir Arthur S. Sullivan, 1842-1900.
The Lost Chord (with organ)... } Sir Arthur S. Sullivan, 1842-1900.
Three Graceful Dances..... } Sir Arthur S. Sullivan, 1842-1900.
Overture to "The Mikado"..... } Sir Arthur S. Sullivan, 1842-1900.
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"...Ponchielli
Kammanoi Ostrow (Reven Angelique).Rubinstein
Waltz, "Dornroeschen".....Tschaikowsky

DEAN OF 'POPS' TO CONDUCT

John C. Mullaly, at 73, Will Lead Orchestra in Sullivan Numbers Tonight

A special feature is planned for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight which will be a revival in everything but the religious sense.

Numbers by Sir Arthur Sullivan will be conducted by John C. Mullaly, the oldest living member of the orchestra, who will be remembered by the "old-timers" as a foremost figure in the musical Boston of the eighties, conducting all the Gilbert and Sullivan operattas when the craze for "Patience," "Iolanthe," "Pinafore," "The Mikado" and the rest had everyone humming.

VIGOROUS AT 73.

When, a short while ago, Mr. Mullaly called upon a doctor for the first time in his life, he was declared to have a perfect physique

"Seventy-three," mused the doctor. "It is unbelievable. The digits should be reversed."

Of Scotch and Irish parentage, Mr. Mullaly has lived in Boston from childhood. As a lad of sixteen, when the Civil War was in full blast, he conducted Gilmore's Band, famous in those days, attracting much attention by his dashing manner.

In the early seventies he first became a familiar figure, conducting orchestras in the Boston Theatre and in the Globe Theatre, which stood on the corner of Essex and Washington streets. Here and in the old Music Hall on Hamilton place he directed everything from "Tannhauser" and "The Dutchman," with the greatest stars of the day, to a burlesque show, with all shades between.

LED POPS SECOND YEAR.

He conducted the Pops in their second season (1886). For twenty-nine Summers he was the idol of Newport as director of the Casino Orchestra there. He has conducted everything Gilbert and Sullivan wrote, and notably presided over the first American production of "Pirates of Penzance" in 1888. Tonight's program in full follows:

1. Hungarian March (Rakoczy).....Berlioz
2. Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
3. Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube".....Strauss
4. Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
5. *Overture to "The Pirates of Penzance"
6. The Lost Chord (with organ)
7. Three Graceful Dances
8. *Overture to "The Mikado"
Sir Arthur Sullivan, 1842-1900
9. Ballet Music from "La Gioconda".Ponchielli
10. Kammonoi Ostrow (Reve Angellique) Rubinstein
11. Waltz, "Dornroeschen".....Tschaikowsky
12. Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar

*Conducted by John C. Mullaly.

Harvard Night at the "Pops"

Tonight is "Harvard Night" at the Pops. The orchestra, led by Agide Jacchia, will be assisted by the University Glee Club which, in addition to a group of three songs alone, will sing twice with the orchestra accompanying. The first of these numbers is "The Answer of the Stars," written by M. A. DeWolfe Howe '87 and composed by Frederic S. Converse '93, in commemoration of the Harvard men who lost their lives in the war. It was sung at the Memorial Day exercises in Sanders Theatre.

On Thursday evening the club will hold its first Yard concert on the Library steps.

historians writing thereon. SOJOURNER.

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

The Concerts to Be Renewed in September—An Interesting Week in Prospect with a "Wagner Night" and Various Novel Features

WITH the end of the spring Pops only a fortnight away, the pleasing news comes that, after an interval of eight summer weeks, they will be resumed on Monday, Sept. 6, as will Pops, and so continued through that month, until at the beginning of October, Mr. Monteux calls the full Symphony Orchestra for rehearsal. There is not a visible reason why the concerts should not be as grateful to the public, resident or transient, in September as they are in May or June, especially as the Pops of early autumn will correspond exactly with the Pops of late spring. Again Mr. Jacchia will lead and keep to its mettle a band of seventy or eighty men drawn from the Symphony Orchestra; again he will make his well-liked programmes; while the "refreshments" of September will not differ from the "refreshments" of June. In a word, the public has only to acquire the habit of fall Pops to be pleasured by them; and in all the thirty-odd years of "these concerts," the audiences have never before been so uniformly large and eager as for the past seven weeks.

Now, at the beginning of summer, the "special nights" for clubs, colleges, conventions and the like have vanished from the schedules of Symphony Hall. None the less the six Pops of next week will not lack interesting episodes. On Monday, for example, the musically curious may hear the intermezzo from "Goyescas," the opera, little known in Boston, of the Spaniard, Granados. On Tuesday, Mr. Ebell, the pianist—one of Mr. Jacchia's colleagues at the Boston Conservatory of Music—will be heard in the finale of his own concerto for piano and orchestra. Two members of the orchestra—Mr. Speyer (oboe) and Mr. Laus (bassoon)—likewise teachers at the school, will join Mr. E. Hoffmann, pianist, in a "Breton Idyl" for their instruments. On Wednesday, for solo piece, Mr. de Mailly (flute), Mr. Mimart (clarinet) and Mr. Hoffmann (piano) will play parts of a seldom heard trio by the Russian, Cui. On Thursday, four pieces by Sullivan stand on the programme—his "Graceful Dances"; his ballad, "The Lost Chord," as arranged for organ and orchestra; and the overtures to two of his operettas, "The Pirates" and "The Mikado." In the overtures, Mr. John C. Mullaly, now in his seventy-third year, who led in them when they were new to Boston, will again conduct, as of old at more than one theatre. For Friday, Mr. Jacchia has picked six numbers from Wagner's operas—two pieces from "The Mastersingers"; the "Fire-Music" from "The Valkyr"; the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin"; a sailor's chorus from "The Flying Dutchman" and the overture to "Tannhäuser." On Saturday the programme includes the suave and fanciful music of Rimsky-Korsakov for the woung prince and the young princess of "Scheherazade" when "they sat in the garden and talked of love": and for the first time in Boston, one of the episodes in Vanity Fair from Mr. Stillman-Kelley's oratorio drawn from "Pilgrim's Progress."

TONIGHT'S POPS

The following program will be presented at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight by Agide Jacchia and his symphony orchestra:

Procession of the Sardar.....Ippolitoff-Ivanoff
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The following holiday program will take place at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Stars and Stripes Forever".....Sousa
Overture, "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltz, "A Night in Venice".....Strauss
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Cortege de Dacchus.....Delibes
Kammenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique).
Rubenstein
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1 in F.....Liszt
American Military Fantasy.....Rollinson
Andante Cantabile.....W. S. Smith
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".....Vollstedt
March, "Victory".....Turnbull

The Pops

The Pops will begin the final week of the Spring and Summer season at Symphony Hall, Monday. This has been the most successful season the Pops have had, so successful that the management has decided to give a supplementary season starting Sept. 6. Night after night the capacity of Symphony Hall has been tested by audiences that have shown their delight in the playing of the large orchestra in such ideal surroundings.

For the coming week there will be a special patriotic program on Monday, and an all operatic program on Wednesday.

LEADS AT POPS

Oldest Living Symphony Member Conducts Orchestra

By J. V. CLARK

John C. Mullaly, the oldest living member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of Boston's most honored musicians, led the orchestra at the "Pops" last evening and devoted a considerable portion of the program to the music of Arthur Sullivan.

It was particularly fitting that Mr. Mullaly should be called to conduct this music. He presided over the first American production of "The Pirates of Penzance" in 1888. He conducted the other Gilbert and Sullivan operas over the entire country. In Boston he has conducted music of all kinds, from the Wagnerian operas to burlesque shows. He has conducted orchestras, good, bad and indifferent. He conducted the Pops in their second season, 1886, and for a time conducted the brilliant orchestra at the Newport Casino. He played for many years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An audience that packed the great hall to its capacity, many denied admission, shouted and applauded its pleasure at Mr. Mullaly's return. All the world of Boston music and theatredom, still in town, turned out to honor their old friend who conducted with the fire of his youth. Particularly happy was Mr. Mullaly in the "Pirates" music, which many in the audience had never heard played before with a great orchestra and with authority. Short sentiment encore pieces from the unfamiliar Sullivan repetoire made up the encores.

Again Georges Miquelle, the first 'cellist, delighted by his beautiful playing of solo parts in routine numbers. Appreciated by the audience, he was featured in a special number, the Drigo "Harlequin." Mr. Miquelle quickly has become one of the stars of the Pops.

The Pops season has been so successful that a supplementary fall season will be given at Symphony Hall, starting Labor Day.

JACCHIA IS PUT UNDER BAN BY UNION

Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Pops for the past three seasons, and one of the best known operatic conductors in America, has been engaged to conduct the Pops' air performance of "Aida" at Braves Field on September 1, a production which is expected to be the greatest and most spectacular performance of opera ever seen in America.

When Jacchia was engaged, the management of the Pilgrim performance of "Aida," as the production is called, were not aware of any obstacle to prevent a well-known opera conductor from conducting opera.

George W. Stewart, the celebrated band leader and manager, was asked at the same time to secure an orchestra of 150 and a stage band of fifty for the production from the Boston Musicians' Union.

Because Jacchia has conducted the Pops, composed of Boston Symphony players, the American Federation of Musicians will not permit union musicians to play under his baton, thus bringing up a new feature of the controversy which is raging between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the union.

H. P. Liehr, secretary and treasurer of Local No. 9, A. F. of L., has made the following statement in a letter to Mr. Stewart:

"In answer to your inquiry of the 29th ultimo, I am constrained to advise you that, in accordance with our Federation laws, it would be impossible for our musicians to perform under Mr. Jacchia's direction, as he is an expelled member of the Federation and conducting an organization unfair to the A. F. of M."

Up to the present time there has been no hard and fast rule regarding conductors, and leaders have frequently led a union orchestra one night and a non-union orchestra another without getting into difficulties.

As the "Aida" production will require the largest orchestra which ever played that wonderful music, a chorus of one thousand, a ballet of one hundred, and a cast of world renowned soloists, the post of conductor is a great honor. Mr. Jacchia was selected because of his popularity with Boston music lovers and his long operatic experience.

Jacchia came to this country with Mascagni some fifteen years ago and has conducted in the leading opera houses of the country with great success. Since becoming conductor of the Pops he has lived in Boston.

CLOSING WEEK OF "POP" CONCERTS

The combination of diverting symphonic music and refreshments now draws everyone on warm nights to the stony coolness of Symphony Hall where the famous Pop concerts are now entering the closing week of their largest season on record. The programs in full follow:

MONDAY, JULY 5

Holiday Program

Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltz, "A Night in Venice".....Strauss
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
"Cortege de Bacchus".....Delibes
Kammenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique).Rubinstein
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1 in F.....Liszt
American Military Fantasy.....Rollinson
Andante Cantabile .....W. S. Smith
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".....Vollstedt
March, "Victory".....Turnbull

TUESDAY, JULY 6

Procession of the Sardar.....Ippolitoff-Ivanoff
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor".....Donizetti
Suite, "Peer Gynt," No. 1.....Grieg
a. Morning Mood. b. Anitra's Dance. c. In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Largo from the "New World" Symphony.Dvorak
"Lon du Bal".....Gillet
Overture Solennelle, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
Tempest scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Russian Folk Song, "Bubinushka"
Arr. by Agide Jacchia
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube".Strauss
March, "Lorraine".....Gannek,

WEDNESDAY, JULY 7

Operatic Night

Prelude to "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "The Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Waltz from the ballet music of "Faust".Gounod
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah"
Saint-Saens
Prelude and Siciliana from "Cavalieria Rusticana".....Mascagni
"Largo" from Xerxes.....Handel
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Intermezzo, "I Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Waltz from "Eugen Onegin".....Tschaikowsky
Coronation March from "The Prophet"
Meyerbeer

THURSDAY, JULY 8

Pomp and Circumstance (with organ).....Elgar
Overture, "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Ave Maria.....Bach-Gounod
Bassoon, Abdon Laus; organ, Albert W. Snow; pianoforte, E. Hoffmann.
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo".....Leoni
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
a. Les Chasseresses. b. Pizzicati. c. Cortege de Bacchus.
"Californian Sketches".....Tandler
a. By the Ocean. b. In the Mission.
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
March of the Little Lead Soldiers.....Pierne
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods".Strauss
"Peace Forever".....Sand

FRIDAY, JULY 9

Russian-Tschaikowsky Program

Wedding March from "Feramors"....Rubinstein
Entrance of Raymonda from the Ballet "Raymonda".....Glazounoff
"The Miniature War".....Cesar Cui
Finale of "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Festival at Bagdad: The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.
Suite, "Nutcracker".....Tschaikowsky
a. Ouverture Miniature. b. Danse de la Fee Dragee. c. Trepak.
Waltz, "Dornroeschen".....Tschaikowsky
Song without words.....Tschaikowsky
Finale of the Fourth Symphony...Tschaikowsky
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
Hymn to the Sun from "Le Coq d'Or"
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Kammenoi Ostrow (with organ).....Rubinstein
Russian Folk Song, Dubinushka
Arr. by Agide Jacchia

SATURDAY, JULY 10

Closing Night

Hungarian March (Rakoczy).....Berlioz
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Reverie (with organ).....Redway-Rissland
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky
Violin Solo, "Scandia".....Delli Ponti
Antonio Gerardi
Volga Bargemen's Song.....Arr. by Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Egyptian Impressions.....Crist
a. Caravan. b. To a Mummy. c. Katabet. d. A Desert Song.
Largo (with organ).....Handel
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa

Mr. Albert Roscoe as Gabrielle and other feature of the programmes. This programme will be continued for two weeks more only.

CLOSING WEEK OF POPS

The combination of diverting symphonic music and refreshments now draws everyone on warm nights to the stony coolness of Symphony Hall, where the famous Pop concerts are entering the closing week of their largest season on record. The final six programmes (for the concerts of the coming week) are replete with popular numbers. Conductor Agide Jacchia has also prepared some highly attractive special nights. Tomorrow brings a popular holiday programme, with spectacular surprises to suit the occasion. On Wednesday, June 7, there will be an operatic programme with overtures, fantasies, ballets and intermezzos from the operas of all lands. On Friday, June 9, a Russian-Tschaikowsky programme will bring such popular numbers as the "1812" overture, the "Nutcracker Suite," the finale of Scheherazade and the Hymn to the Sun of Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Kammenoi Ostrow," "Dubinushka," and others. The closing night on Saturday, July 10, is so popular as to be almost in the nature of a request night.

...will be an extra matinee tomorrow.

Closing Week of "Pop" Concerts at Symphony Hall

This is the last week of the attractive "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall and the final six programs are replete with popular numbers. Conductor Agide Jacchia has also prepared some highly pleasing special nights.

Tomorrow brings a popular holiday program; Wednesday there will be an operatic program, and Friday a Russian-Tschaikowsky program. The selections for Saturday evening are in the nature of "request" numbers.

Tomorrow's program wil lbe as follows: "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa; overture, "Mignon," Thomas; waltz, "A Night in Venice," Strauss;

POPS IN SEPTEMBER

The patrons of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall want more. So insistent indeed is the demand that the only possible answer is an extension of the season in the Fall. Accordingly the orchestra will reassemble on Labor Day, under their distinguished conductor, Agide Jacchia, to give several extra weeks of these popular concerts.

MORE POPS IN SEPTEMBER

The 10 weeks' season of "Pops" which has just drawn to a close in Symphony Hall was the largest and in every way the most successful in the long history of these famous concerts. The patrons of the Pops are far from satisfied by 60 nights of them. So insistent, indeed, is the demand for more that the only possible answer is an extension of the season in the fall. Accordingly, the great Symphony Orchestra will reassemble on Labor Day, Sept. 6, after a good vacation and rest, under their celebrated conductor, Agide Jacchia, to give several extra weeks of these popular concerts. Refreshments served at the tables and at the "1920 bar" and all the other attractions of the "Pops" will then be resumed. There will also be special programmes of interest, including another "Request Night."

MORE POPS IN SEPTEMBER

The ten weeks season of Pops which has just drawn to a close in Symphony Hall was the largest and in every way the most successful in the long history of these famous concerts. The patrons of the Pops are far from satisfied by sixty nights of them. So insistent indeed is the demand for more, that the only possible answer is an extension of the season in the fall. Accordingly, the great symphony orchestra will re-assemble on Labor day (September 6) after a good vacation and rest, under their celebrated conductor, Agide Jacchia, to give several extra weeks of these popular concerts. Refreshments served at the tables and at the "1920 Bar," and all the other attractions of the "Pops," will then be resumed. There will also be special programs of interest, including another Request night.

Sullivan at the Pops

To the Editor of The Herald:

The extremely cordial greeting given to the veteran conductor, Mr. John C. Mullally, on his taking the baton at the Pops to conduct some of Sullivan's music, and the very hearty applause given at the conclusion of the overture to "The Pirates of Penzance," leads one to wonder why none of this charming composer's music (with one exception, I believe) was given previously during the entire season of the Pops.

Besides this delightful music of Sullivan, there is an apparently endless amount by composers contemporaneous with Sullivan whose music would surely charm a present Pop audience and help dissipate the present tendency to tiresome repetitions now so apparent on Pop programs of today.

Let us have more of this music during the supplementary season of the Pops in September, Mr. Jacchia. M. E. S.

Roxbury.

MORE POPS IN THE FALL

So extraordinarily successful has been the thirty-fifth season of Pop concerts just ending in Symphony Hall, that the insistent demand for more Pops can be met only by an extension. Consequently after several weeks of vacation and rest the famous orchestra will reassemble on Labor Day (September 6) under Agide Jacchia, the illustrious Pops' conductor.

...tion was made under the personal supervision of Maxwell Karger, director.

LAST WEEK OF POPS

Tomorrow the famous Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall enter the closing week of their largest season on record. The final six programs are replete with popular numbers. Conductor Agide Jacchia has prepared a popular holiday program for tomorrow night. On Wednesday there will be an operatic program; on Friday, a Russian Tschaikowsky program, and on Saturday, the last night, a medley of favorite numbers.

Pop Concerts

The final week of the present season of Pop concerts started at Symphony Hall last evening to a capacity house. Tomorrow evening will be operatic night, one of the most popular of the series. So successful have these concerts been that a supplementary season will be given starting Labor Day. The management reports that the receipts for the Pops this year have far exceeded the receipts for any other season since the Pops were inaugurated.

LEADS AT POPS

Oldest Living Symphony Member Conducts Orchestra

By J. V. CLARK

John C. Mullaly, the oldest living member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of Boston's most honored musicians, led the orchestra at the "Pops" last evening and devoted a considerable portion of the program to the music of Arthur Sullivan.

It was particularly fitting that Mr. Mullaly should be called to conduct this music. He presided over the first American production of "The Pirates of Penzance" in 1888. He conducted the other Gilbert and Sullivan operas over the entire country. In Boston he has conducted music of all kinds, from the Wagnerian operas to burlesque shows. He has conducted orchestras, good, bad and indifferent. He conducted the Pops in their second season, 1886, and for a time conducted the brilliant orchestra at the Newport Casino. He played for many years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An audience that packed the great hall to its capacity, many denied admission, shouted and applauded its pleasure at Mr. Mullaly's return. All the world of Boston music and theatredom, still in town, turned out to honor their old friend who conducted with the fire of his youth. Particularly happy was Mr. Mullaly in the "Pirates" music, which many in the audience had never heard played before with a great orchestra and with authority. Short sentiment-l encore pieces from the unfamiliar Sullivan repetoire made up the encores.

Again Georges Miquelle, the first 'cellist, delighted by his beautiful playing of solo parts in routine numbers. Appreciated by the audience, he was featured in a special number, the Drigo "Harlequin." Mr. Miquelle quickly has become one of the stars of the Pops.

The Pops season has been so successful that a supplementary fall season will be given at Symphony Hall, starting Labor Day.

JACCHIA IS PUT UNDER BAN BY UNION

Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Pops for the past three seasons, and one of the best known operatic conductors in America, has been engaged to conduct the open air performance of "Aida" at Braves Field on September 1, a production which is expected to be the greatest and most spectacular performance of opera ever seen in America.

When Jacchia was engaged, the management of the Pilgrim performance of "Aida," as the production is called, were not aware of any obstacle to prevent a well-known opera conductor from conducting opera.

George W. Stewart, the celebrated band leader and manager, was asked at the same time to secure an orchestra of 150 and a stage band of fifty for the production from the Boston Musicians' Union.

Because Jacchia has conducted the Pops, composed of Boston Symphony players, the American Federation of Musicians will not permit union musicians to play under his baton, thus bringing up a new feature of the controversy which is raging between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the union.

H. P. Liehr, secretary and treasurer of Local No. 9, A. F. of L., has made the following statement in a letter to Mr. Stewart:

"In answer to your inquiry of the 29th ultimo, I am constrained to advise you that, in accordance with our Federation laws, it would be impossible for our musicians to perform under Mr. Jacchia's direction, as he is an expelled member of the Federation and conducting an organization unfair to the A. F. of M."

Up to the present time there has been no hard and fast rule regarding conductors, and leaders have frequently led a union orchestra one night and a non-union orchestra another without getting into difficulties.

As the "Aida" production will require the largest orchestra which ever played that wonderful music, a chorus of one thousand, a ballet of one hundred, and a cast of world renowned sololists, the post of conductor is a great honor. Mr. Jacchia was selected because of his popularity with Boston music lovers and his long operatic experience.

Jacchia came to this country with Mascagni some fifteen years ago and has conducted in the leading opera houses of the country with great success. Since becoming conductor of the Pops he has lived in Boston.

CLOSING WEEK OF "POP" CONCERTS

The combination of diverting symphonic music and refreshments now draws everyone on warm nights to the stony coolness of Symphony Hall, where the famous Pop concerts are now entering the closing week of their largest season on record. The programs in full follow:

MONDAY, JULY 5

Holiday Program

Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltz, "A Night in Venice".....Strauss
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Prelude to "Loheangrin".....Wagner
"Cortege de Bacchus".....Delibes
Kammenoi Ostrow (Reve Angelique).Rubinstein
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1 in F.....Liszt
American Military Fantasy.....Rollinson
Andante Cantabile .....W. S. Smith
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".....Vollstedt
March, "Victory".....Turnbull

TUESDAY, JULY 6

Procession of the Sardar.....Ippolitoff-Ivanoff
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor"....Donizetti
Suite, "Peer Gynt," No. 1.....Grieg
a. Morning Mood. b. Anitra's Dance. c. In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Largo from the "New World" Symphony.Dvorak
"Lon du Bal".....Gillet
Overture Solennelle, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
Tempest scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Russian Folk Song, "Bubinushka"
Arr. by Agide Jacchia
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube".Strauss
March, "Lorraine".....Ganne

WEDNESDAY, JULY 7

Operatic Night

Prelude to "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "The Barber of Seville"....Rossini
Waltz from the ballet music of "Faust".Gounod
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah"
Saint-Saens
Prelude and Siciliana from "Cavalieria Rusticana".....Mascagni
"Largo" from Xerxes.....Handel
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Intermezzo, "I Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Waltz from "Eugen Onegin".....Tschaikowsky
Coronation March from "The Prophet"
Meyerbeer

THURSDAY, JULY 8

Pomp and Circumstance (with organ).....Elgar
Overture, "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Ave Maria.....Bach-Gounod
Bassoon, Abdon Laus; organ, Albert W. Snow; pianoforte, E. Hoffmann.
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo".....Leoni
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
a. Les Chasseresses. b. Pizzicati. c. Cortege de Bacchus.
"Californian Sketches".....Tandler
a. By the Ocean. b. In the Mission.
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
March of the Little Lead Soldiers.....Pierne
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods".Strauss
"Peace Forever".....Sand

FRIDAY, JULY 9

Russian-Tschaikowsky Program

Wedding March from "Feramors"...Rubinstein
Entrance of Raymonda from the Ballet "Raymonda".....Glazounoff
"The Miniature War".....Cesar Cui
Finale of "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Festival at Bagdad: The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.
Suite, "Nutcracker".....Tschaikowsky
a. Ouverture Miniature. b. Danse de la Fee Dragee. c. Trepak.
Waltz, "Dornroeschen".....Tschaikowsky
Song without words.....Tschaikowsky
Finale of the Fourth Symphony...Tschaikowsky
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
Hymn to the Sun from "Le Coq d'Or"
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Kammenoi Ostrow (with organ).....Rubinstein
Russian Folk Song, Dubinushka
Arr. by Agide Jacchia

SATURDAY, JULY 10

Closing Night

Hungarian Match (Rakoczy).....Berlioz
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Reverie (with organ).....Redway-Rissland
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky
Violin Solo, "Scandia".....Delli Ponti
Antonio Gerardi
Volga Bargemen's Song.....Arr. by Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Egyptian Impressions.....Crist
a. Caravan. b. To a Mummy. c. Katabet. d. A Desert Song.
Largo (with organ).....Handel
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Stars and Str[illegible]

Albert Roscoe as Gabrielle

[illegible] other feature of the programme [illegible] programme will be continued for two weeks more only.

CLOSING WEEK OF POPS

The combination of diverting symphonic music and refreshments now draws everyone on warm nights to the stony coolness of Symphony Hall, where the famous Pop concerts are entering the closing week of their largest season on record. The final six programmes (for the concerts of the coming week) are replete with popular numbers. Conductor Agide Jacchia has also prepared some highly attractive special nights. Tomorrow brings a popular holiday programme, with spectacular surprises to suit the occasion. On Wednesday, June 7, there will be an operatic programme with overtures, fantasies, ballets and intermezzos from the operas of all lands. On Friday, June 9, a Russian-Tschaikowsky programme will bring such popular numbers as the "1812" overture, the "Nutcracker Suite," the finale of Scheherazade and the Hymn to the Sun of Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Kammenoi Ostrow," "Dubinushka," and others. The closing night on Saturday, July 10, is so popular as to be almost in the nature of a request night.

[illegible] be an extra matinee tomorrow.

Closing Week of "Pop" Concerts at Symphony Hall

This is the last week of the attractive "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall and the final six programs are replete with popular numbers. Conductor Agide Jacchia has also prepared some highly pleasing special nights.

Tomorrow brings a popular holiday program; Wednesday there will be an operatic program, and Friday a Russian-Tschaikowsky program. The selections for Saturday evening are in the nature of "request" numbers.

Tomorrow's program wil lbe as follows: "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa; overture, "Mignon," Thomas; waltz, "A Night in Venice," Strauss;

POPS IN SEPTEMBER

The patrons of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall want more. So insistent indeed is the demand that the only possible answer is an extension of the season in the Fall. Accordingly the orchestra will reassemble on Labor Day, under their distinguished conductor, Agide Jacchia, to give several extra weeks of these popular concerts.

MORE POPS IN SEPTEMBER

The 10 weeks' season of "Pops" which has just drawn to a close in Symphony Hall was the largest and in every way the most successful in the long history of these famous concerts. The patrons of the Pops are far from satisfied by 60 nights of them. So insistent, indeed, is the demand for more that the only possible answer is an extension of the season in the fall. Accordingly, the great Symphony Orchestra will reassemble on Labor Day, Sept. 6, after a good vacation and rest, under their celebrated conductor, Agide Jacchia, to give several extra weeks of these popular concerts. Refreshments served at the tables and at the "1920 bar" and all the other attractions of the "Pops" will then be resumed. There will also be special programmes of interest, including another "Request Night."

MORE POPS IN SEPTEMBER

The ten weeks season of Pops which has just drawn to a close in Symphony Hall was the largest and in every way the most successful in the long history of these famous concerts. The patrons of the Pops are far from satisfied by sixty nights of them. So insistent indeed is the demand for more, that the only possible answer is an extension of the season in the fall. Accordingly, the great symphony orchestra will re-assemble on Labor day (September 6) after a good vacation and rest, under their celebrated conductor, Agide Jacchia, to give several extra weeks of these popular concerts. Refreshments served at the tables and at the "1920 Bar," and all the other attractions of the "Pops," will then be resumed. There will also be special programs of interest, including another Request night.

Sullivan at the Pops

To the Editor of The Herald:

The extremely cordial greeting given to the veteran conductor, Mr. John C. Mullally, on his taking the baton at the Pops to conduct some of Sullivan's music, and the very hearty applause given at the conclusion of the overture to "The Pirates of Penzance," leads me to wonder why none of this charming composer's music (with one exception, I believe) was given previously during the entire season of the Pops.

Besides this delightful music of Sullivan, there is an apparently endless amount by composers contemporaneous with Sullivan whose music would surely charm a present Pop audience and help dissipate the present tendency to tiresome repetitions now so apparent on Pop programs of today.

Let us have more of this music during the supplementary season of the Pops in September, Mr. Jacchia. M. E. S.
Roxbury.

MORE POPS IN THE FALL

So extraordinarily successful has been the thirty-fifth season of Pop concerts just ending in Symphony Hall, that the insistent demand for more Pops can be met only by an extension. Consequently after several weeks of vacation and rest the famous orchestra will reassemble on Labor Day (September 6) under Agide Jacchia, the illustrious Pops' conductor.

[illegible] production was made under the personal supervision of Maxwell Karger, director [illegible]

LAST WEEK OF POPS

Tomorrow the famous Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall enter the closing week of their largest season on record. The final six programs are replete with popular numbers. Conductor Agide Jacchia has prepared a popular holiday program for tomorrow night. On Wednesday there will be an operatic program; on Friday, a Russian Tschaikowsky program, and on Saturday, the last night, a medley of favorite numbers.

[illegible]NARY

Pop Concerts

The final week of the present season of Pop concerts started at Symphony Hall last evening to a capacity house. Tomorrow evening will be operatic night, one of the most popular of the series. So successful have these concerts been that a supplementary season will be given starting Labor Day. The management reports that the receipts for the Pops this year have far exceeded the receipts for any other season since the Pops were inaugurated.

The Boston Post

The Independent Democratic Paper of New England

(Issued Daily by Post Publishing Co.)
JULY 10, 1920. NO. 9; VOL. 406.
Office, 259 Washington st., Boston 4, Mass.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—POSTPAID.

Daily—U. S. and Canada—One year....$5 Six months, $2.50; 3 months, $1.25; 1 month, 50c. Foreign—One month.....$1

Sunday—One year, $4; six months, $2; three months, $1; one month, 35c. To all points in Canada, 12c per copy. When a subscription includes Daily and Sunday the rate of the Sunday Post to Canada is $5 per year. Foreign, 17c per copy. In the Boston Postal District, one cent extra per copy, Daily and Sunday, is charged for postage.

Entered as second class matter at the post-office, Boston, Mass.

All money sent at sender's risk. Do not send cash or stamps. All checks, drafts and money orders should be made payable to

POST PUBLISHING CO.

TELEPHONES

Editorial Rooms	1004–1005–7400 Main
Sporting Editor	1539 Main
Sunday Editor	3380 Main
Financial Editors	1383 Main
Business Office
Advertisements

All subscriptions to the Post must be paid in advance, and they will be discontinued without further notice upon expiration.

If you cannot obtain the Post regularly from your newsdealer or newsboy please notify us by postal at once.

EDWIN A. GROZIER
Editor and Publisher

MEMBER OF THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
The Associated Press is exclusively entitled to the use for republication of all news despatches credited to it or not otherwise credited in this paper, and also the local news published herein. All rights of republication of special despatches herein are also reserved.

The Boston Post can always be found on file at 20 Cockspur street, London, and 47 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France.

"THE BOSTON POST possesses, undisputably, the largest Daily Morning circulation in the United States."
—The Fourth Estate.

SATURDAY, JULY 10, 1920.

YES, ONE

"No one, making the best of it," says the Springfield Republican, "has yet ventured to assert that if Mr. Roosevelt could come back he would be truly enthusiastic over the nomination of Senator Harding."

Well, one has come rather near to it, and that one is the esteemed New York Tribune, which asserted not long ago that Colonel Roosevelt would be the first to take Senator Harding by the hand were he alive today.

That certainly would be an act of great magnanimity on the part of a man who had been called a faker and a liar and likened to Benedict Arnold and Aaron Burr, as the colonel was by Mr. Harding's paper in 1912.

THE POPULARITY OF "POPS"

So great has been attendance at the "Pops" in Symphony Hall that the programmes, which close for the summer season tonight, will be resumed for a period in September, it is announced. This step is taken in view of the fact that patronage has been unusually heavy from the opening to the closing night. There has been a large number of programmes which many Bostonians missed because the hall would not hold all who wanted to hear them.

The institution of "Pops" not only, but the appreciative acceptance of it by our citizens, is a very fine compliment to Boston. The compliment is recognized in the announcement that the musical taste of our people is to be further gratified by an extended season.

TOO MANY OF THEM

...tomorrow ... Fools," that ... comedy of Austin Strong's ... found high favor with Boston ... theatre lovers last season.

The three old "fools," Claude Gillingwater as the gruff financier; Howard Gould, the grave judge, and Harry Davenport as the doctor who writes treatises on "the unburied dead," form a trio whose character portrayal is one of the delightful remembrances of last season. Among others in the cast are mentioned Donald Foster, Millard Vincent, Wallace Fortune, Hazel Sexton, Harry Forsman, Minnie Remaley and Harry Leighton.

Those who saw this cleverly-conceived comedy will remember that the plot deals with the lives of three crusty old bachelors, domiciled together in the old aristocratic Washington-sq neighborhood of New York. Thrust suddenly into their midst is a young girl. How the three old mossbacks are yanked out of their placid existence—and like it—forms the plot.

"The Joan Danvers," New Play at the Copley

At the Copley Theatre tomorrow evening Henry Jewett will present "The Joan Danvers," a drama by Frank Stayton, for the first time in America. It was first acted by Miss Horniman's company in Manchester and then taken by her to London, where at the Coronet Theatre, the birthplace of many famous plays, it received the approval of metropolitan audiences.

The plot, the action, the characters and the scenes of "The Joan Danvers" are of the England of today. James Danvers is a shrewd business man, who is autocratic in his home, unscrupulous in his dealings with other men and a rigorous devotee of the church. His two children, James the son and Joan the daughter, rebel and break loose. The daughter marries without his knowledge one of his own captains; the son runs away and secretes himself on the very ship that his father has practically doomed to destruction. The father's character and its reaction upon his children give the play its dramatic motive.

The father will be acted by E. E. Clive, the daughter by Elma Royton, and other leading parts will be played by H. Conway Wingfield, Noel Leslie, Lyonel Watts, Nicholas Joy, May Ediss, Viola Roach and Blanche LeRoy.

Emma Carus and Other Stars at Keith's Theatre

The popular musical comedy star, Emma Carus, assisted by J. Walter Leopold, pianist, will return to Keith's Theatre this week with her new budget of songs and comedy. Another headline act, "Follies of Song and Dance," will be introduced by the clever team consisting of Bradley and Ardine. The picture program will include Kinograms and Topics of the Day.

In the vaudeville will be seen Irving and Jack Kaufman, with witty sayings; Joe Laurie Jr, with a new laughing skit; Rose Clare, the "1950 Girl"; Ed Ford, comedian; Chandon Trio, sensational stunts; Jack and Kitty Demaco in a novelty, and Harry Conley and Naomi Ray in "Rice and Old Shoes".

Second Week of "The Little Whopper" at the Majestic

"The Little Whopper" will tomorrow night begin its second week at the Majestic. This musical comedy, with book by Otto A. Harbach, music by Rudolf Friml and lyrics by Bide Dudley, has met with favor here.

Vivienne Segal, as a boarding school miss, has a role which not only shows off her voice to advantage, but gives her an opportunity to display her talent as a comedienne. Harry C. Browne has rarely been seen to better advantage. W. J. Ferguson, veteran of the American stage, has been cordially welcomed. Helen Gunther, George Rasely, Nellie Graham-Dent and numerous others con-

...Mollenhauer will conduct the ...formance. Marie Paporello will guide the ballot. Alexius Puglia will be regisseur generale. The entire production is directed by Fred J. McIsaac.

"Civilian Clothes" Opens Somerville Theatre Season

Manager Clyde E. McArdle will open the new season at the Somerville Theatre tomorrow with the comedy, "Civilian Clothes," which tells the story of a girl who was wooed and wed by an Apollo of the bivouac, who didn't appear so fascinating when she saw her lord and master in his civilian togs.

Carrol Ashburn, remembered as last season's popular leading man, will essay the role of the captain, while Anne Bronaugh will play the role of the society girl. Others in the cast will be John Gordon, George Wettenald, Mabel Colcord, W. W. Gerard, Jerry Cornell, Helen Ingram, Myrtle Ellen Clark and Therese Van Grove.

"Pops" Will Begin Again in Symphony Hall Next Week

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are returning from the Adirondacks, the White Mountains, Maine, even from Europe, to prepare for the supplementary season of "Pop" concerts, which are to begin Tuesday, Sept 7, in Symphony Hall. The concerts will continue until the opening of the regular Boston Symphony season on Oct 8 and 9.

Conductor Agide Jacchia is preparing programs of the best for his fine orchestra. There will be special nights of all sorts. The usual menu of refreshments will be served at the floor tables and at the "1920 bar," in the balcony.

Gordon's Olympia and Scollay Square Theatres

This week the film feature at Gordon's Scollay Square and Olympia Theatres will be a version of Jack London's novel, "The Mutiny of the Elsinore." This is one of his notable stories of the sea in which a crew of city gangsters attempt to take over the control of the ship from the officers in charge; and in addition there is a charming love story, the thread of which is crossed by the evil passion of Andreas Mellaire to possess the beautiful daughter of Jason West, half owner of the Elsinore.

Margaret West is in love with Dick Somers, the captain's son, and she resents the attentions of Mellaire, whom she distrusts and fears; and Mellaire, to accomplish his purpose of possessing Margaret, incites the crew to mutiny.

Firm, however, against the machinations of Mellaire and his rascally henchmen stands John Pike, the Elsinore's first mate. Pike has long loved Margaret, too, but the realization of his age makes him certain that she belongs to a man younger than himself. And so, when the mutiny starts, the iron hand of John Pike raises to quell it.

Vaudeville, the Olympia Weekly and a film comedy complete the two programs.

Opening Bill of the New Broadway Theatre

The new Broadway Theatre, at Broadway and F st, South Boston, will be opened next Friday evening with an attractive bill of pictures and vaudeville. The feature film announced by manager J. J. Raymond is J. Warren Kerrigan and his own company in "The Green Flame." It is an absorbing mystery play by the famous playwright and novelist Raymond G. Hill. Kerrigan is seen as a clever private detective who has been engaged by a jewelry concern to protect the "Green Flame," a priceless emerald, at one time a crown jewel of Russia.

The vaudeville program will include Marguerite Farell, in character songs; "Snap Shots of 1920," a musical comedi-ette; Kanawaza Boys, a novelty Jap act; "Equilibrists With a Laugh," and Burtin and Wills, singing, talking and dancing comedians. In addition to the

Gordon

Directing officials ... Olympia circuit ... voted their efforts ... class photoplay ent... don's Old South The... the Gordon chain, a... are well pleased with... offered them is shown... records of the past ...

The second week o... ford photoplay, "Hea... will start tomorrow an... topliner through the w... ford is shown as a g... tains, whose mission i... includes a fierce desire ... ory stick lickings," a ... even" with aristocrats i... avenge the death of her... nent in Miss Pickfor... Jack Gilbert, Sam De G... MacDowell.

Other releases will ... there will be organ re... formances by Arthur J...

Park The...

This week at the P... photoplays and stars a... lows: Monday and T... Dalton in "My Wife's H... day and Thursday, ... "Hawthorne of the U... by Harrison Ford, Lil... Roberts and Tullie M... and Saturday, Hobar... Jane Novak in "Behin...

Gordon's Centr...

King Vidor's producti... lly Honor" will be the ... first half of the week ... Central Square Theatr... based upon the influ... woman on men and de... different characters, ... each is brought to t... vaudeville acts are al... ginning Thursday th... be Mildred Harris Ch... the Storm Country," ... run from 7:30 until 10:...

Franklin Pa...

The three-day photo... Park Theatre will in...

Continued o...

PARK THEATRE
CONTINUOUS 10 A.M. TILL 10.30
MON. Doroth... in "His W...
WED. Walla... in "Hawth...
FRI. Thos. Ince's "Behind..."
PARAMOU... A REVIEW of the S...

...HEATRE

...at Loew's Co... ...met with instant ...cheme consists of ...ombined with many ... Two changes are ... Monday and Thurs... ...gular Sunday concerts ...st of attractive vaude... ...n numbers. With the ... this popular change, ...t has also installed an ...

...ER PATTER"

...Theatre beginning Labor ... William B. Friedlander ...itter Patter," based on ...and Grant Stewart's ...Rain." The cast ...ane Richard... ...ll, John ...Mildred ...of

GARDENS

...ens, Revere Beach, ...t announces as a special ...r this coming week exhibi... ...g every evening by the well ... feature dancers, "Billie" and ...trude Gallagher.

The biggest event of the season will be staged next Wednesday night when Jackson's famous Black and White Jazz Orchestra will play in a battle of music with the Crescent Gardens Singing Orchestra.

THE POPS AGAIN

The insatiable demand for the pop concerts at Symphony Hall, as seen in the crowded season of the early summer, is to be met by an additional fall season. Accordingly, the musicians of the Boston Symphony orchestra are returning from the Adirondacks, the White Mountains, Maine, even Europe, to prepare for the brilliant opening night on Tuesday, Sept. 7. Since most September evenings bring ideal pops weather, Symphony Hall will become nightly Boston's musical and festive rendezvous during the few weeks which precede the opening of the regular Boston Symphony season on Oct. 8 and 9. This new opportunity to hear pop concerts in September will bring every element which spells the popularity of the pops. Conductor Agide Jacchia is preparing programmes of the best for his fine orchestra. There will be special nights of all sorts. The usual menu of refreshments will be served at the floor tables and at the "1920 Bar" in the balcony.

MOXIE OUTING

All departments of the Moxie Company were closed Saturday, Aug. 28, to permit the annual outing of the Moxie employees.

...et of Moxie trucks left the main ...7:30 a. m., to transport the ...tion to Canobie

GAYETY THEATRE

Laughter and applause greeted Sam Howe's Jollities of 1920 at the Gayety Theatre yesterday. It is called a Revusical Fable and from all accounts the appellation seems well applied. The song numbers are tuneful and lingering

GORDON'S STRAND

Certainly one aspect of the critical housing situation has been relieved by the picture which had its premier showing in Dorchester at Gordon's Strand Theatre last evening, "Parlor, Bedroom and Bath." It provides more room for laughs than any offering on the screen since such productions as "Fair and Warmer."

...ght ... "The ...e being ... Park Thea... ...ery afternoon and ...

Besides the concert orchestra there will be other musical attractions. The special show for the children today and Friday will be "Rip Van Winkle."

GORDON'S CENTRAL SQ.

"The Family Honor" was shown at Gordon's Cambridge Central Square Theatre last night. A youth in his teens loses all of his money in a gambling hell secretly run by the mayor of the town. In addition to this very fine photoplay, there were five all-star vaudeville acts.

POP CONCERTS

The special fall season of he Pop concerts at Symphony Hall will start Tuesday, Sept. 7. This continuation series will be given in response to a wide demand for extra concerts at the spring series which were more popular this year than ever before.

...AMES THEATRE

...s are that those who ... St. James Theatre and ... By" are still thinking ... one of the many great ...H. Chambers. There is ...l comedy, "The Dumb-...al," and vaudeville.

...K THEATRE

...on, in one of her best ... Wife's Friend," started ... which is being shown ...atre this week.

...eetings

...ETING will be held in ...d 17, on WEDNESDAY, ...id meeting will be held ...h Section 4, Chapter 27, ...rdinances of 1914.
FRANK H. COWIN.

...ETING will be held in ...d 8, on FRIDAY EVE., ...d meeting will be held ...n Section 4, Chapter 27, ...rdinances of 1914.
JOHN F. SHEEHAN.

CUTICURA
FOR THE DAILY TOILET

Use Cuticura Soap daily for the toilet and have a healthy clear complexion, soft white hands and good hair. Assist when necessary by touches of Cuticura Ointment. The Cuticura Talcum is also ideal for the skin.

Sample Each Free by Mail. Address: "Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. 12G, Malden 48, Mass." Sold everywhere. Soap 25c. Ointment 25 and 50c. Talcum 25c. Cuticura Soap shaves without mug.

Where to Deposit Your Savings

A Savings Account is the Forerunner of Fortune

START SAVING NOW and reap the reward of thrift and economy. Deposits made in the following Massachusetts institutions will draw interest from the dates named:—

Savings Banks

BOSTON

Franklin Savings Bank, 6 Park Sq	Sept. 1
Boston Penny Savings Bank, 1375 Washington St	Sept. 10
Home Savings Bank, 75 Tremont St	Sept. 10
Suffolk Savings Bank, 1 Tremont St	Sept. 10

OUTSIDE BOSTON

Waltham Savings Bank	Sept. 10

Trust Companies
(Savings or Interest Departments)

BOSTON

Charlestown Trust Co	Sept. 1
Columbia Trust Co	Sept. 1
Commonwealth Trust Co	Sept. 1
Dorchester Trust Co	Sept. 1
International Trust Co	Sept. 1
Liberty Trust Co	Sept. 1
United States Trust Co	Sept. 1
Cosmopolitan Trust Co	Sept. 5

OUTSIDE BOSTON

Everett Trust Co	Sept. 1
Guaranty Trust Co., Cambridge	Sept. 1
Melrose Trust Co	Sept. 1
Park Trust Co., Worcester	Sept. 8

National Banks

BOSTON

Back Bay National Bank	Sept. 1
Boylston National Bank	Sept. 1
National Rockland Bank, Roxbury	Sept. 1
Peoples National Bank	Sept. 1

OUTSIDE BOSTON

Mattapan National Bank	Sept. 1
Union Market National Bank, Watertown	Sept. 1

The Boston Post

The Independent Democratic Paper of New England

(Issued Daily by Post Publishing Co.)
JULY 10, 1920. NO. 9; VOL. 406.
Office, 259 Washington st., Boston 4, Mass.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—POSTPAID.

Daily—U. S. and Canada—One year....$5 Six months, $2.50; 3 months, $1.25; 1 month, 50c. Foreign—One month.....$1

Sunday—One year, $4; six months, $2; three months, $1; one month, 35c. To all points in Canada, 12c per copy. When a subscription includes Daily and Sunday the rate of the Sunday Post to Canada is $5 per year. Foreign, 17c per copy. In the Boston Postal District, one cent extra per copy, Daily and Sunday, is charged for postage.

Entered as second class matter at the post-office, Boston, Mass.

All money sent at sender's risk. Do not send cash or stamps. All checks, drafts and money orders should be made payable to POST PUBLISHING CO.

TELEPHONES

Editorial Rooms.....1004-1005-7460 Main
Sporting Editor.....1539 Main
Sunday Editor.....3380 Main
Financial Editors, Business Office, Advertisements.....1383 Main

All subscriptions to the Post must be paid in advance, and they will be discontinued without further notice upon expiration.

If you cannot obtain the Post regularly from your newsdealer or newsboy please notify us by postal at once.

EDWIN A. GROZIER
Editor and Publisher

MEMBER OF THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
The Associated Press is exclusively entitled to the use for republication of all news despatches credited to it or not otherwise credited in this paper, and also the local news published herein. All rights of republication of special despatches herein are also reserved.

The Boston Post can always be found on file at 20 Cockspur street, London, and 47 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France.

"THE BOSTON POST possesses, undisputably, the largest Daily Morning circulation in the United States."
—The Fourth Estate.

SATURDAY, JULY 10, 1920.

YES, ONE

"No one, making the best of it," says the Springfield Republican, "has yet ventured to assert that if Mr. Roosevelt could come back he would be truly enthusiastic over the nomination of Senator Harding."

Well, one has come rather near to it, and that one is the esteemed New York Tribune, which asserted not long ago that Colonel Roosevelt would be the first to take Senator Harding by the hand were he alive today.

That certainly would be an act of great magnanimity on the part of a man who had been called a faker and a liar and likened to Benedict Arnold and Aaron Burr, as the colonel was by Mr. Harding's paper in 1912.

THE POPULARITY OF "POPS"

So great has been attendance at the "Pops" in Symphony Hall that the programmes, which close for the summer season tonight, will be resumed for a period in September, it is announced. This step is taken in view of the fact that patronage has been unusually heavy from the opening to the closing night. There has been a large number of programmes which many Bostonians missed because the hall would not hold all who wanted to hear them.

The institution of "Pops" not only, but the appreciative acceptance of it by our citizens, is a very fine compliment to Boston. The compliment is recognized in the announcement that the musical taste of our people is to be further gratified by an extended season.

TOO MANY OF THEM

One of the most curious bequests ever made was that of Count Pablo Bajnotti, of Turin, Italy, establishing by his will a fund of $10,000, the interest of wh... was to be devoted annually to a ... lady of Providence, R. I., who, ... 20 years old, marriageable and a... ter of the common people, ... deserve it by her conduct a... virtues."

That was a sticker, a... council of Providence has ... declined the legacy. ... perhaps, for the ta... young lady who bes... sum was filled ... is no such be... woman i... te...

the market in that city showed yesterday a "sharp downturn in the price of corn and provisions." Is this the beginning of joy? Will the drop of one dollar a barrel in the quoted dealings in pork, and a like falling in the price of lard, be reflected at the counter of the retail dealer just around the corner?

We may hope that the movement will make itself felt at a distance and intimately. From the wholesale market to the family dinner table is a long stretch and there are hills and pitfalls along the road. But it must get here pretty soon.

ADMIRABLY BALANCED

The more one studies the Democratic ticket put in nomination at San Francisco, the more will he be impressed by the admirable balance furnished by the candidates.

James M. Cox is a self-made man, emerging from the ranks of poverty and hard work to a notable success in journalism by his own hard work. He fought his way up the political ladder with no "interests" to give him a boost. He won his place in Ohio because Ohio people felt that he deserved it. He is a bluff, hearty, approachable person who has a strong sympathy for those who have to buck against fate sometimes. He is and will be his own man, and he owes nothing to any political coterie of bosses regarding him as "safe." But he is no rampant radical on any lines.

Franklin D. Roosevelt offers a bit of contrast along certain ways that makes the ticket one of fine proportion. He was born "to the purple," so far as our good American spirit permits, of distinguished lineage and with a name held in pride. He has the culture that a great university gives, and he might have had a life of scholarly calm. But like his great relative, the 26th President of the United States, he felt the call to public service and he answered it with a devotion and energy that have made him eminently successful. And like his cousin, too, he is not too proud to be a thorough democrat or to grasp the hand of a man who does an honest day's work of any kind.

That is the personal balance of a fine ticket, and it amounts to a great deal, for the personal equation is bound to cut a big figure in this campaign. Even names have their influence, no matter how unstatesmanlike that fact may be.

There is another balance that must not be overlooked—the geographical-political. Ohio and New York form a strong combination in presidential campaigns. Looking back at successful tickets, we find Hayes and Wheeler, Garfield and Arthur, McKinley and Roosevelt, Taft and Sherman—all Ohio-New York. There has been more than sentiment in this; political sagacity has governed it. It is today a balance that cannot be called negligible.

Cox and Roosevelt; Ohio and New York. A pretty good combination any way you look at it.

AN IMPROVEMENT

The Tuskegee records of lynchi... this country for the first six mo... the year show a distinct impro... compared with other years. ... was compiled by Monroe ... has charge of records an... institute and shows ... date. During the ... 1919 there were ... same period i...

All lyn... The ...

spired the enthusiastic de... in the City of Mexico, ... tion of the city with fla... attendance of representati... government at the banque... the "American colony" ther...

There must be a sincere ... underlying all this, encoura... fidence in the expectation ... lishment of better relatio... those which existed under ... regime.

GERMANY TO DISA...

In the face of the Allied t... failure to comply with the d... complete disarmament wou... invasion, the Germans at ... minute of grace reluctantly ... protest have accepted the ter...

There was really no alter... either side. The Allies had t... disarmament before they coul... with the financial and econo... of the parley; because, with... still in arms and in a mo... resistance whenever opport... any agreement on the t... would be merely anothe... paper." For Germany in... position there was nothi... bluffing as long as she ... accept.

Having secured safet... pelling disarmament, ... now proceed to apply ... of the treaty. They ... ruin Germany furth... keep her indust... chaotic conditi... it is necessary ... expect to collec... to allow Ge... utmost.

The Germ... granted a h... ally and it ... in allied ci... will be cr... successfully ... to take a ... anteed by ... Germany, ... hardly ta... convince... are not ... impair G...

It is ... need for ... bluffing ... been d... armame... seem t... to tax ... the All...

Gov... one ... cipa... nam... Ga... R... b...

piers are one ... dred (100) feet wide ... of standard gauge with ... to two Gantry crane tracks.

Each of the piers is equipped with ... Gantry cranes with sufficient clearance to per... tion of standard locomotives and cars. In addition e... is equipped with two locomotive cranes, and Pier B ... bridge crane, span of 118 feet and lifting capacity of 100 ton... Between piers there is 266 feet of clear water space, which permits the docking of four ships in each slip.

Each pier is provided with high pressure water mains, fuel, oil, electric and compressed air lines.

The storage yards are wired for electric light and piped for water and air.

There are 50 ways — 40 wood, 10 concrete — each equipped with fixed stiff-leg derricks. Hog Island also has 10 electrically equipped pumping stations, 75 miles overhead wiring, over 75 miles underground cables, 45 miles fibre duct laid in concrete. Filtration plant, sewage disposal plant, which, with the other appliances, facilities and equipment, undoubtedly provides it with the fundamentals for a modernly equipped terminal and storage yard.

Detailed inventory, blueprints, photographs and other data have been filed in the office of the Director of the Supply and Sales Division, 6th and B streets S. W., Washington, D. C., and may be seen by prospective bidders during business hours. Permits for inspection of the yard may be obtained on application.

Bids must be submitted in duplicate on standard proposal forms, made in the manner designated therein and inclosed in sealed envelope marked "Proposal No. 2007, not to be opened until October 30, 1920."

Proposal forms may be had at any of the sales or district sales offices. Bids must be accompanied by certified check, made payable to the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation for $1,000,000.

This amount will be applied upon the purchase price to be paid by the successful bidder, but in the event that such bidder fails to consummate the contract of purchase the deposit will be forfeited to the corporation. The balance of the purchase price is to be paid within a reasonable period, not exceeding in any case five years from date of sale. Bidders must be American or American controlled. Preference will be given bids covering short period of payment, other things being equal. Possession of the property will be given upon completion of the present ship construction program, about February 1, 1921.

Title to the property will remain in the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation until full purchase price has been paid.

The Corporation reserves the right to reject any or all bids.

United States Shipping Board
Emergency Fleet Corporation
W. S. BENSON, President.

nig...
acts.
day Mildr... in "Polly of the ...

WALDRON'S CA...

The Golden Crook Company at W... dron's Casino is a well-balanced organization and the principals form an unusually strong cast. The chorus is made up of singers and dancers.

FENWAY THEATRE

House Peters in "Silk Husbands and Calico Wives," Tom Moore in "The Great Accident" were the pictures shown yesterday. Thursday H. B. Warner will be seen in "Uncharted Channels" and Maurice Tourneur's production, "The White Circle."

EXETER ST. THEATRE

Up to and including Wednesday evening the bill will be Norma Talmadge in "Yes or No" and Sessue Hayakawa in "An Arabian Knight." The remainder of the week will be devoted to "The Family Honor."

UPHAM'S COR. STRAND

"Parlor, Bedroom and Bath" is the attraction at this theatre for the rest of the week. Robert Warwick's latest production, "The 14th ... seen, together ... the Strand Weekly ... Thursday, Friday and Saturday Mildred Harris Chaplin will be seen in "Polly of the Storm Country."

LOEW'S COLUMBIA

Yesterday Dorothy Gish in "Remodeling Her Husband" and Holbrook Blinn in "The Ivory Snuff Box" headed the bill. Ethel Clayton in "A Lady in Love" and Robert Warwick in "The Man Who Forgot" will be the attractions for last ...

Herald Aug 31

THE POPS AGAIN

The demand for the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall, as seen in the crowded season of the early summer, is to be met by a Fall season. Beginning Tuesday, Sept. 7. Mr. Jacchia's program for the opening night follows:

March, "Father of Victory".....Ganne
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Suite, "Peer Gynt" No. 1.....Grieg
Ave Maria from "Othella".....Verdi
Scherzo, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn
Overture Solennelle "1812"..Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"..... Mascagni
Valse Bluette.....Drigo
"Kammenoi Ostrow" (Reve Angelique) Rubinstein
Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fucik

Irving and Jack Kaufman
THE POPULAR
Emerson Records
Favorites at Keith's Theatre This Week
HEAR THEM EXCLUSIVELY ON Emerson Records

Sw...ee Shore
...arion
Darda...lla Blues
My Di... Rosary
Kar...an
Nobody ...Knows
PRICE $1... EACH
Mail Orders Filled, ... cents Extra

THE MUSIC B...X AND GIFT SH...
144 Summer ...reet
Near South Station Pho... Main 3661
New England Dist...utors
NEW ENGLAND ...SUPPLY & EQUIPMENT ... INC.
221 Columbus A..., Boston

BLANK PAGE

MAJOR HIGGINSON

Henry Lee Higginson and the Boston Orchestra

One of the kind of kings we make in this country, a king by the divine right of achievement, and the devotion to that end of a large part of his income, passed away on the 14th of November. Born on the 18th of November, 1834, he lacked four days of finishing his eighty-fifth year. Surely a good old age, and with only one regret, so far as could be known to one on the outside, —that his last few days should have been embittered by events that came between him and his cherished orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been his special pride by right of ownership, and one towards which he had maintained an unerring ideal during nearly forty years of his life. He founded the orchestra, he sustained it, paying all losses from out his own income; and yet at the very end, when the public should have cherished him with infinite tenderness, he felt that he must turn his great life-work, the institution that had brought him the most unique distinction that had come to any man in this country, over to the public, that was momentarily ungrateful, and to its representatives, to administer as they thought best. It was purely voluntary on his part. There was no one who could force him to it. There was probably no one who wished him to do it. And yet, at the very end of his life, at the culminating point of fruition, the joy and satisfaction of years was removed. A younger man would perhaps have handled the matter differently, would have felt differently, might have been ready to fight. But to the man of eighty-three there was nothing to fight, only an endeavor to handle things diplomatically, and save any unnecessary friction. He succumbed, however, a victim to the psychology of the mob. The public, emotionally aroused, loses its head, and has no feeling for anyone. Later it repents, as it did in the case of Major Higginson.

In the year 1881, when the writer of this article was in his early student years in Boston, one Friday afternoon at about one-thirty o'clock, he deposited twenty-five cents in the box office at the old Music Hall, and joined the throng that was beginning to gather. It was not long before the spacious lobby was packed, and at two the doors were opened and the rush began. There were no reserved seats. The early arrivals chose their places, the others went where they could. The hall was crowded.

When the orchestra was organized it was planned that there should be one weekly concert on each Saturday evening, admission seventy-five and twenty-five cents, preceded by a public rehearsal on Friday afternoons, at which the admission should be only twenty-five cents. In the end this proved impractical, and the prices of admission were not only raised, but the seats were reserved as well. At first the Friday concerts were not reviewed by the press, on the ground that they were rehearsals. Later the Friday rehearsals were raised to the dignity of regular concerts, as it was realized that they were only rehearsals in name.

In one of Major Higginson's first letters in regard to forming the orchestra, he figured that after he expenses of salaries for seventy players, conductor, soloists, hall rent, etc., had been paid, and an estimated income of $85,000 received, there would be a loss of $50,000 to be supplied by him, or the interest on one million dollars. This sum of money he expected to set aside for the purpose. Meanwhile expenses began to soar almost at once, although income continually increased also, and some seasons he practically had to call on the income of two million dollars to pay the losses. During thirty-seven years Major Higginson carried this personally. His ideal, however, he never allowed to swerve from its orginal purpose, in spite of much hostility that has been manifested from time to time, and he built up an orchestra with the greatest prestige of any in the world. In this he was aided by the very great ability of his manager, Charles A. Ellis, in whom he placed implicit confidence from the beginning.

At his eightieth birthday he was almost deified by his public, and received glowing tributes from all over the country. Two years later the same public was vilifying him for his attitude in the famous Dr. Muck incident. But how could he have acted differently. He had brought the distinguished conductor here in good faith. In the beginning there was nothing but rumors in regard to him. He played the Star Spangled Banner the first time Major Higginson requested it. The government at Washington gave the conductor a clean slate. Under these conditions, what could Major Higginson do but endeavor to keep things placid? Washington had practically ordered him to take no decided action. In a letter to the editor of this magazine, written in his own handwriting, under date of Dec. 9, 1917, Major Higginson said in part as follows:

"Many duties have delayed a reply to your kind note, and meanwhile the authorities at Washington have given the Orchestra leave to play. * * * The row has been hysterical in part—and also quite natural. I've no blame except for the cowards who write anonymously ,and the blackguards who lie. * * * No one can state the musical case more fairly than you have done, and I for one am grateful to you for it—as also for your letter. What is to come, we cannot guess, but of course any action which meddles with our country's welfare or clashes with the law, old or new, is wrong—and will not be considered by us.

Before this war is over, we may see strange changes. Meanwhile our one object is to win,—to live in freedom and peace,—and nothing else will be thought of.

Just now Halifax fills us with horror and sympathy.

Yours truly,
(Signed) H. L. HIGGINSON.

Certain critics accused Major Higginson of being un-American and unpatriotic. These cut him to the quick. It seemed so unjust that he, a civil war veteran, and a man who had been making ringing speeches in regard to every patriotic American giving his service to the colors in the great emergency, and regretting that he was no longer a young man so that he could volunteer his services,—should be attacked so virulently when he was simply trying to do his duty by his conductor, and at the same time under the supervision of his government at Washington. As soon as Washington made public its findings, Major Higginson bowed to the inevitable. He did not question the government, not its action. But it is not easy for a man of eighty-three to overlook the ingratitude of a public of which he had been the voluntary, but munificent benefactor, during two-thirds of his business life. Certain other public happenings had wounded him sorely a year or two before, and helped to pave the way for his complete breakdown in the end. He withdrew his connection with the Orchestra, and presented it to the great public to do with as should seem wisest. Boston accepted the gift, and its destiny was placed in the hands of a Board of Trustees. Thus far they have taken up the task earnestly and conscientiously, and are endeavoring to continue the ideals that were laid down by Major Higginson, and which have resulted in giving it the greatest prestige of any organization of the kind in the world. Meanwhile nothing can dim the glory that has come to Major Higginson as the founder and sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The public frenzy has meanwhile had time to become calm again. The better element regrets that its hysterical emotion should have permitted it to wound the great heart that had been its benefactor for thirty-seven years. It regrets that it was the cause of Major Higginson's learning, as many others have learned, that the public has but little active gratitude to bestow upon those who sacrifice for the general good, and for the universal uplift. Those who make such a sacrifice should in the beginning firmly resolve that the service is to be an absolutely impersonal one. The reward, the satisfaction, the gratification, may be in the personal conciousness. The service should be done in a manner that will be oblivious to the changes of external recognition. The Muck episode was most unfortunate. The government at Washington was watching it, and in the end disposed of it. Could the vitriolic press and public have allowed Major Higginson to pilot the affair in a diplomatic and unfrenzied manner, he might have died in the full realization that the Boston Orchestra not only owed its entire existence to him, but that it still belonged to him as long as he drew breath. Thus the deep pathos of it all could have been avoided, and Major Higginson's end could have been meted out with its full quota of joy.

Local Dramatic Outlook

Lord Dunsany was in town recently, and gave one of his combined lectures and readings at Orchestra Hall. His message was not a cheerful one in that it gave but a gloomy view of conditions in the dramatic world of today. He stated that he did not offer his dramas to the London managers because the public cared nothing for high class dramas, or the managers declared they did not, but only musical comedy and extravaganza found favor. He intimated that interest in the Shakespearian drama was dead, and that nothing of equal merit had come to take its place, and it was doubtful if the public would accept it if it did.

There is one consideration in regard to attendance at the Shakespearian drama that is rarely, if ever, mentioned. Does the public attend the performances of Hamlet and Othello because they have a passion for Shakespeare and all that he represents, or is it that it is the glamor of great names that draw them? Shakespeare is not essayed except by actors of the highest rank. The advertisements read Edwin Booth in Hamlet, not simply Hamlet, with the names of those taking part mentioned in small letters. Of course, there is a large constituency with a genuine love for Shakespeare, but not enough in any average community to fill the theatre several evenings. So far as the general public is concerned, is it, or is it not, attracted to the playhouse by the name of the great actor or actress who is headlined?

Detroit had a recent experience when Walter Hampden came to the New Detroit as an exponent of the role of Hamlet. He proved to be one of the finest that has ever been known upon the stage. Intellectual, emotional, artistic, with a keen and lucid insight into the meaning and needs of the role, and an ability that presented it in a manner that was overwhelmingly impressive. He also had a company that was most competent, and scenically the presentation was adequate, and in some scenes most artistic, creating a genuinely poetic atmosphere, or one of vague mystery, as the case might require. Although the performances were given at unusual hours, yet one would have supposed that an unusual effort would have been made to be present at one of them. But if the collective sum of all those in attendance represents the Shakespeare lovers of Detroit, then Dunsany can hardly be gainsayed in his remarks on the low ebb of dramatic taste.

Christmas week brings to us Sothern and Marlowe in Shakespearian roles. In this case there will be a double advantages, for in addition to performances that have always been known as splendid achievements, Sothern and Marlowe are widely known as the chief representatives of the highest dramatic art on the stage today. An appreciative and multitudinous attendance on the part of the culture of the city is a foregone conclusion in this case. They have earned their right to this appreciation and support, and the fact that they have returned to the stage cannot be other than a source of unlimited gratitude on the part of the lovers of the best the stage has to offer.

A little later in the season Robert Mantell will come to the New Detroit in a season of Shakespearian performances. Mr. Mantell has become a veteran in these roles, and is perhaps the only specialist who has been presenting Shakespeare without interruption for a quarter of century or more, now appearing on the stage. He has a large constituency which he has rightly earned, and it will be a source of regret when he no longer returns to give us his virile and emotional conceptions. At any rate we shall have had three seasons of Shakespearian performances, which is more than we have some winters.

Following the Sothern and Marlowe performances, the two Shubert theatres

HENRY
ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From BOSTON, MASS.
MAR -- 1920

A GREAT PRIVATE CITIZEN

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

BY M. A. DEWOLFE HOWE

I

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON, who died in Boston on November 14, 1919, personified to an extraordinary degree a quality in American citizenship for which the need was never greater than at the present moment. This was the quality of a patriot's idealism evoked in time of war and sustained to the very end of a long life. He was the embodied refutation of the doctrine, now proclaimed on many sides, that the war-time spirit of idealism is all very fine, but that it cannot be expected to endure. In him it did endure — in him and a few others, scattered throughout the country, who offered their lives in the physical struggle of the Civil War, yet found in it also a great spiritual adventure, from which they returned spiritually quickened for the rest of their days. The rigid realists can point to their tens of thousands, not so quickened, but rather hardened to make the most of every material opportunity that reared its head once war was put aside; and none can deny that such there were, in disheartening numbers. Such no doubt there will be again, in the new period on which we have entered. But a life like that of Major Higginson, ending on the threshold of this period, has something to say both of the past and of the future. What it meant to the young men of successive generations for whom he was an inspiring visible presence, his memory may still mean to the multitude of his countrymen who have now laid down their arms after the greatest of wars, and are confronted with the immediate danger of losing that generous spirit of idealism which it nourished in them. He did not lose this spirit — nor need they.

If Major Higginson, in respect of his sustained idealism, represented an exception to the general rule, he embodied also several obvious contradictions. His very title of 'Major' was one of them; he was in reality brevetted Lieutenant-Colonel, U.S.V., before the end of the war 'for gallant and meritorious services,' and might naturally have gone through life 'Colonel Higginson.' He was commonly designated 'the first citizen of Boston' — and so justly that no second citizen has stepped at once into his vacant place; but, not even a native of New England, he was born in New York, November 18, 1834. He was a preëminent son of Harvard, but studied at the University for less than a single year, the freshman year of the class of 1855. He was best known throughout the country as a patron of music and education, as the 'founder and sustainer' of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a liberal benefactor of Harvard; he was a Puritan at heart, and in his daily life a hard-working, hard-headed man of affairs, deeply immersed in intensely practical matters, a member of an important financial firm, a director of powerful corporations. For approximately forty years he held a conspicuous place in the public eye;

HENRY
ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From BOSTON, MASS.
MAR -- 1920 K

A GREAT PRIVATE CITIZEN

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

BY M. A. DEWOLFE HOWE

I

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON, who died in Boston on November 14, 1919, personified to an extraordinary degree a quality in American citizenship for which the need was never greater than at the present moment. This was the quality of a patriot's idealism evoked in time of war and sustained to the very end of a long life. He was the embodied refutation of the doctrine, now proclaimed on many sides, that the war-time spirit of idealism is all very fine, but that it cannot be expected to endure. In him it did endure — in him and a few others, scattered throughout the country, who offered their lives in the physical struggle of the Civil War, yet found in it also a great spiritual adventure, from which they returned spiritually quickened for the rest of their days. The rigid realists can point to their tens of thousands, not so quickened, but rather hardened to make the most of every material opportunity that reared its head once war was put aside; and none can deny that such there were, in disheartening numbers. Such no doubt there will be again, in the new period on which we have entered. But a life like that of Major Higginson, ending on the threshold of this period, has something to say both of the past and of the future. What it meant to the young men of successive generations for whom he was an inspiring visible presence, his memory may still mean to the multitude of his countrymen who have now laid down their arms after the greatest of wars, and are confronted with the immediate danger of losing that generous spirit of idealism which it nourished in them. He did not lose this spirit — nor need they.

If Major Higginson, in respect of his sustained idealism, represented an exception to the general rule, he embodied also several obvious contradictions. His very title of 'Major' was one of them; he was in reality brevetted Lieutenant-Colonel, U.S.V., before the end of the war 'for gallant and meritorious services,' and might naturally have gone through life 'Colonel Higginson.' He was commonly designated 'the first citizen of Boston' — and so justly that no second citizen has stepped at once into his vacant place; but, not even a native of New England, he was born in New York, November 18, 1834. He was a preëminent son of Harvard, but studied at the University for less than a single year, the freshman year of the class of 1855. He was best known throughout the country as a patron of music and education, as the 'founder and sustainer' of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a liberal benefactor of Harvard; he was a Puritan at heart, and in his daily life a hard-working, hard-headed man of affairs, deeply immersed in intensely practical matters, a member of an important financial firm, a director of powerful corporations. For approximately forty years he held a conspicuous place in the public eye; but he never held public office. It was as a private citizen, a great private citizen, that he did his far-reaching work for his community and his country.

Major Higginson was forty-seven years old when, in 1881, he established, out of resources acquired by his own industry and intelligence, not through inheritance, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and committed himself to maintaining it by means of resources still to be acquired on the same terms. This work lasted for thirty-seven years. It would have been an impossible task but for certain personal endowments, native and cultivated — courage, unselfishness, a capacity for public friendship, and a pervading sense of whimsical humor, that surest companion to a true sense of relative values. These gifts were not suddenly bestowed at the age of forty-seven. They grew out of his inheritances, his boyhood, and the maturing experiences of his earlier manhood.

The essential Puritan in him, that part of him which cried out against extravagance and waste, both public and private, and gave to his personal habits an austerity quite foreign to the households of modern American financiers, came to him direct from the earliest settlers of New England. His first American ancestor of his own name was the Reverend Francis Higginson, who came to Salem, Massachusetts, in 1629. This Puritan divine had, in the words of Cotton Mather, 'a most charming voice, which rendered him unto his hearers, in all his exercises, another Ezekiel, for Lo, he was unto them, as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well upon an instrument.' This suggestion of music in a pioneer of bleak New England may be associated, by no overstraining of fancy, with his distant descendant.

The generations between the Salem minister and Major Higginson's father, George Higginson, were constantly fed from the streams of Massachusetts blood and tradition. To cite these tributaries would be to make a catalogue of family names intimately associated with the civil and religious direction of New England. It is enough to say here that in his father Major Higginson had a friend and exemplar who definitely affected the course of his life. George Higginson's early mercantile ventures in New York came to grief in the financial disturbances of 1837. He then came to Boston, where in 1848 he formed, with his cousin, John C. Lee, the stock-brokerage firm of Lee & Higginson. It was a day of comparatively small things, and George Higginson never owned a house or a horse of his own until within a few years of his death in 1889. But he gave his children, four sons and a daughter, all that the time and place afforded in the way of education, and set them a high standard of helpfulness and integrity. One day a business friend, irritated by some misconception, walked into his office and said, 'Mr. Higginson, I always supposed you were an honest man.' 'No, you did not,' was the answer; 'you knew it.' Taking such facts for granted, and a constant readiness to do things for others, were thus bred in the bone of his son Henry.

When he was a boy at the Boston Latin School, he took his part with a fierce energy in the snowball fights on Boston Common. Henry Adams, in his Education, recalls the battles between the Latin School boys and all comers on the Common, the trick of inserting stones in snowballs, and his own depression one day at 'seeing one of his trustiest leaders, Henry Higginson — "Bully Hig," his school name — struck by a stone over the eye, and led off the field bleeding in rather a ghastly manner.'

His college career was cut short before the end of one year by a weakness of his eyes. This did not disqualify him for business, and for several years he was employed in the counting-house of S. & E. Austin, a well-known firm of Boston merchants. But 'Trade,' as he wrote from Europe to his father in 1857, 'was not satisfying to the inner man as a life-occupation.' Having gone abroad, in 1856, without definite plans, he soon found himself bent on the serious study of music. 'If I find that I am not profiting at all by my work,' he wrote to his father, 'I shall throw it up and go home. If I gain something, I shall stick to it. You will ask, "What is to come of it all if successful?" I do not know. But this is clear. I have then improved my own powers, which is every man's duty. I have a resource to which I can always turn with delight, however the world may go with me. I am so much the stronger, the wider, the wiser, the better for my duties in life. I can then go with satisfaction to my business, knowing my resource at the end of the day. It is already made, and has only to be used and it will grow. Finally, it is my province in education, and having cultivated myself in it, I am fully prepared to teach others in it. Education is the object of man, and it seems to me the duty of us all to help in it, each according to his means and in his sphere. . . . And now, old daddy, I hope you will be able to make something out of this long letter. You should not have been troubled with it, but I thought you would prefer to know all about it. It is only carrying out your own darling idea of making an imperishable capital in education. My money may fly away; my knowledge cannot. One belongs to the world, the other to me.'

These were thoughtful and prophetic words to proceed from a youth of twenty-three. A letter written to his father in the same year contains another significant bit of self-revelation: 'What is money good for, if not to spend for one's friends and to help them? You 've done so all your life — let me do so too, when I can, for it is in me (I have always known it) to be a close man, a miser. I know about this.'

For about four years the young man remained in Europe, at first preparing himself, — chiefly in Vienna, — by hard study of the piano, singing, and composition, for such possibilities as a musical career might open to him, and afterwards adjusting himself to the necessity of abandoning it. This was the direct result of over-exertion. A headache that lasted for three days drove him to a barber, who let blood from his left arm to relieve his suffering. He returned to his piano practice too soon after this experience, and disabled his arm, as an eminent physician assured him, permanently. 'I came home,' he wrote, 'and swore like a pirate for a day; then, coming to my senses, I decided to sing away, study composition, etc., hard, magnetize, and await the result. . . . I've hurt myself many times by doing things which other people avoid as a matter of course.'

While reconciling himself to his disablement, and to a growing realization that his musical gifts were not such as to make him a musician of the first order, he supplemented his personal economies by giving lessons in English. Some months before returning to America in November of 1860, he wrote to his father, who must have wondered at his protracted absence from home, confessing the disappointment he had met, and adding, 'If you consider the whole thing and remember that I enjoy in the depths of my soul music as nothing else, you'll easily comprehend my stay.'

Long afterwards, when the orchestra he founded had been established in Boston for more than twenty-five years, he wrote to an old friend who had advised him wisely at its origin, a letter which confirmed the modest estimate he had made of himself as a musical student in Vienna, and at the same time revealed, in his words about Beethoven's Third Symphony, an appreciation of music, and a response to its appeal, which were a life-long justification of his early studies. Thus, in part, the letter runs:

'A few words about our talk last night. Of course I loved music, and therefore studied it — and found no talent whatsoever.

'We young folks used to consider the problems of life, and the rights and needs of men and women, and the injustices of both, also the need of refreshment and not of luxuries or even comforts. And it seemed to me that we of the young beautiful country should and could have music of the best. Hence my hopes and efforts, both for the sake of art and the sake of humanity. Do you see? But talent, or even keen perception of musical talent in others, I have little or none; nor have I ever found talent for anything, except power of work, and of recognizing friends of the best, and the enormous value of them to me. It is all second or third class, and I've been built up and lifted up to a wrong place by friends.

'As to the "Eroica," I had meant to tell you how I felt about it, but it opens the flood-gates, and I can't. The wail of grief, and then the sympathy which should comfort the sufferer. The wonderful funeral dirge, so solemn, so full, so deep, so splendid, and always with courage and comfort. The delightful march home from the grave in the scherzo — the wild Hungarian, almost gypsy in tone — and then the climax of the melody, where the gates of Heaven open, and we see the angels singing and reaching their hands to us with perfect welcome. No words are of any avail, and never does that passage of entire relief and joy come to me without tears — and I wait for it through life, and hear it, and wonder.'

The dreams of youth and the realities of old age — for Major Higginson was nearly seventy-five when he wrote this letter — have not often stood in a closer relationship.

II

When he returned to the United States late in 1860, realities were soon to supersede the dreams. Within six months Sumter was to fall, and the mettle of individual Americans to be tried. Henry Higginson met the test by immediate participation in the forming of the Second Massachusetts Regiment of Infantry, begun April 18, 1861. A remarkable group of young men joined in this undertaking, and became officers of the regiment. The name of Robert Gould Shaw typifies the quality of them all. It was a band of chosen spirits, aflame with the ideals for which a war is most nobly fought; and it was entirely characteristic of Henry Higginson that his friendship with these men entered into the very warp and woof of his army life, and permanently influenced him. A passionate devotion to his country may fairly be counted the controlling motive of all his years. With it was inextricably interwoven a passionate devotion to friends. Indeed, he seems to have conceived virtually all the relations of life in terms of friendship. In his attitude toward his country, his city, his college, even toward the art of music, there was something intensely personal — just as there was in his dealings with individual men and women. It was in blended patriotism and friendship that he made his two chief gifts to Harvard College — the Soldiers Field for athletic games, the Harvard Union for social intercourse. He set up on Soldiers Field the names of six soldier friends,

HENRY
ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From BOSTON, MASS.
MAR -- 1920 K

and said about them to the students of Harvard College: —

'Now, what do the lives of our friends teach us? Surely the beauty and the holiness of work and of utter, unselfish, thoughtful devotion to the right cause, to our country, and to mankind. It is well for us all, for you and for the boys of future days, to remember such deeds and such lives and to ponder on them. These men loved study and work, and loved play too. They delighted in athletic games, and would have used this field, which is now given to the College and to you, for your health and recreation. But my chief hope in regard to it is, that it will help to make you full-grown, well-developed men, able and ready to do good work of all kinds — steadfastly, devotedly, thoughtfully; and that it will remind you of the reasons for living, and of your own duties as men and citizens of the Republic.'

An older man does not wholly improvise thoughts of this kind. He brings them out of an experience like war because he takes a great deal into it. As a young officer Henry Higginson took into the war a full measure of enthusiasm and energy. He worked hard at recruiting and drilling his men before they went to the front. They recognized a fighter in him, and liked him. One day he overheard a soldier swearing in the ranks, and checked him, saying, 'If there is any swearing to be done in this company, I will attend to it.' No doubt he did, and by means of the vigor it implied stiffened the discipline for which he was responsible. Talking to some college students in 1913 about discipline in the army, he said, —

'One incident of the time showed the power of obedience which our men had learned. One afternoon, as the regiment came in from drill, I, being on guard, noticed a man who was talking and talking. I knew he was a blackguard, having noted him before. In a few moments he was sent down by his captain to the guard-house, to be kept there until he was sober. I said to the corporal, "Get the man's knapsack and rifle and bring him here." (In those days we expected an attack, and our rifles were kept loaded.) The man was brought back and told to march up and down. The guard-tents were in a row, and the muskets stacked about fifteen yards from the officers' tents, where I stood. The man marched up and came back, clubbed his musket, and told me he would like to knock my head off. "No matter," said I, "march on." (We had taken the cap off his rifle in order that he should do no harm.) He marched up and down once or twice, and then stopped where the rifles were stacked, took a percussion-cap out of his pocket, put it on the rifle, and took a good aim at my belt, and used queer language about a "hole in my body." There was not much chance for me, for if he had fired, I should not be here talking to you. All I said was, "Bring that piece to your shoulder!" and he brought his rifle up to his shoulder; and then I said, "March on!" and he marched up to where I was. Then the sergeant took charge of him, unloaded his rifle, and the man marched until he dropped from fatigue. He was a miserable soldier, and about ten years ago I saw him in Charles Street coming out of a rum-shop.'

While the young officer was imparting discipline after this fashion, he was also acquiring his own experience of it. The infantry regiment he had joined at its inception went to the front in July, 1861, when he was promoted from second to first lieutenant. In October he was transferred from the Second Massachusetts Infantry to the First Massachusetts Cavalry, formed in September, and received a captain's commission. In his brief infantry experience he saw no battle, but was much engrossed in the routine duties of soldiering. With the cavalry, which had by degrees to disprove its inferiority to the mounted forces of the Confederacy, his fighting began. It continued through the Antietam campaign, in the autumn of 1862, through the winter months before Fredericksburg, and the spring campaign of 1863 in Virginia. On June 17 it came to an end, at the beginning of the battle of Aldie, when Major Higginson, sent to recall a fellow officer, Captain Sargent, who had gone beyond the point to which he had been ordered to advance, followed him, in the zest of an unexpected fight, and found himself and his men overpowered by superior numbers. His horse was shot under him, and in the hand-to-hand encounter that ensued he was wounded by pistol-shot and sabre-cuts, one of which left its scar on his face for life. When he recovered consciousness, he contrived to save himself from capture, but the wounds he had received incapacitated him from any further active service. As soon as he could do anything, he made himself useful again in recruiting, and for a brief time served on the staff of General Francis C. Barlow.

He would himself have been the first to say that his war-record was not exceptional. The passionate spirit of patriotism in which it was rendered, and his communion in that spirit with noble young contemporaries, many of whom gave their lives for the Union cause, left their indelible marks upon his character. Like many another fighter against disunion, he gave to the reunited country in its entirety the same devotion through life that he had given to the cause of the North in his earlier years, and again and again spoke of the men against whom he had fought as only a chivalrous foe could speak.

An incident of later years, related by one of his business partners, is significant. A Confederate officer nearly eighty years of age came into the firm's office one day, and said he would like to shake hands with Major Higginson. He was asked to sit down and await the major's return, which was expected at any moment. While waiting, the visitor, subject to an old heart trouble, fainted away, and was carried to an inner room where restoratives were bringing him back to consciousness when Major Higginson returned.

'What's the trouble? Who is that?' he asked.

'Colonel ——, Confederate officer in the Civil War. He came in to see you.'

Mr. Higginson stepped forward, leaned over the old man as he opened his eyes, and said, 'I am sorry, colonel; but there's one good thing — you can't die here. This is an Abolitionist's office.'

A flickering smile was the visitor's reply, soon followed by his sitting up and entering into conversation. Before long the two old men left the office arm in arm, and the Southern colonel was heard to say, 'You certainly did put my trolley on the wire to-day, major!'

Still another story illustrates the quizzical humor that was quite his own and accompanied him into all surroundings. He was discussing truth-telling one day with a younger associate. 'It is essential in business,' he is quoted as declaring, 'but socially it is very diverting to lie. For instance, I was standing on the corner of Park and Tremont Streets the other day when a motor came down the hill, locked wheels with another, and turned over. In a moment a crowd was buzzing round; it was just like kicking a hornet's nest. A lady came by — uncertain of age, nondescript clothes, flat heels, carrying a bag — you know the type, you see them in Boston. 'Addressing no particular person, she said as she passed me, "Anybody hurt? Anybody hurt?"

HENRY
ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From BOSTON, MASS.
MAR -- 1920 K

'Very politely I replied with a bow, "I hope so, madam."

'She looked at me sharply, and discovering that I was old and gray and probably deaf, she repeated the inquiry in a louder tone. "Yes, madam, I heard the first time; I said, I hope so; think how disappointed all the people would be if nobody were hurt."

'Murmuring, "What a wretched, wicked old man!" she walked on about ten feet; then, turning, she came back, and scrutinizing me closely, said, "Are n't you Mr. Higginson?" "No, madam." "You look very much like him." "I have been told so." I lifted my hat and bowed most politely as the lady walked away in a quandary.'

The twinkling look that went with words like these, never deceiving the quick-witted for more than a moment, cannot be reproduced in any telling of the anecdote.

Such chaffing of a woman encountered by chance was characteristic of him in all his social relations. But of women in general, and especially of their high place in the true partnership between man and wife, he was the unfailing champion. His own marriage, with a daughter of Louis Agassiz, about six months after his disabling fight at Aldie, placed him in a rarely harmonious domestic relation which to the end of his days afforded the basis of happiness, sympathy, and coöperation in which all his other relations were rooted. Through this marriage, moreover, his intimacy with his brother-in-law, Alexander Agassiz, his classmate in college, became so close as to count among the positive influences of his life, with notable results both in affairs and in thought.

Yet it was from his comrades in arms that the incentives to the citizenship he practised were primarily derived. Even before the war one of them, Charles Russell Lowell, a kinsman with whom he was in the closest sympathy, had revealed in a letter to their common friend, John C. Bancroft, son of the historian, the attitude toward life which their little circle of idealists was taking. 'Last February,' he wrote from Rome in 1857, 'when Henry [Higginson] joined me in Florence, we laid our heads together to get you across the water; as a preliminary standpoint we concocted an extensive plan of migration, you and Jim Savage and Henry and I were all to move to Virginia or somewhere — we were to cultivate the vine and the olive, to think none but high thoughts, to speak none but weighty words, and to become, in short, the worthies of our age.'

After they had 'moved to Virginia' several years later, for a purpose then quite unforeseen, the future took on a new aspect, and Lowell, who had discovered 'a thorough born merchant' in his friend Higginson while they were traveling as youths together in Europe, wrote to him in the last year of the war, 'I hope, Mr. Higginson, that you are going to live like a plain Republican, mindful of the beauty and the duty of simplicity. Nothing fancy now, Sir, if you please. . . . I hope you have outgrown all foolish ambitions and are now content to become a "useful citizen." . . . Don't grow rich; if you once begin, you will find it much more difficult to be a useful citizen.'

The attempts to attain independence were at first unsuccessful, both in an oil-venture in Ohio and in a cotton-planting enterprise in Georgia, an experiment in which a patriotic motive played an important part. With his joining the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., in Boston, in 1868, more prosperous days began to dawn; but it was only after thirteen years of hard, self-denying work that he found himself in a position to carry out a purpose he had long been forming, the establishment and maintenance of a great orchestra which should give to the people of his own city and country music of the same supreme order of merit as that which had nourished his spirit as a young man in Europe. This was essentially a patriotic purpose, conceived in the desire to enrich the life of his own beloved country. Music, as he had long before written to his father from Europe, was his province in education. Long afterwards he quoted the words that Fanny Kemble had once spoken to him: 'Life in the United States is hard and dry. Your country is a great cornfield. See that you plant flowers in it.' Still later he amplified the same thought in saying, 'This beautiful land is our workshop, our playground, our garden, our home; and we can have no more urgent or pleasant task than to keep our workshop busy and content, our playground bright and gay, our garden well tilled and full of flowers and fruits, our home happy and pure.' It was precisely for these objects that he established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881.

III

At that time public benefactions of this general nature were far less familiar than they have since become, and such a benefaction in the realm of music was wholly original. The endowed or privately supported orchestra is now an accepted institution in many American cities, and this is so in large measure because of the pioneering example set by Mr. Higginson. The value of that example lay by no means only in the spectacle of large annual expenditures, the fruit of annual earnings and income which might otherwise have been employed in the rolling up of a modern fortune, but also in the devotion of personal energies to an immensely difficult and complicated task. How exacting this task was, — in the selection and judicious handling of conductors, to say nothing of the whole company of highly temperamental persons who constitute the orchestra; in dealing with the genus irritabile of soloists and with a public sometimes only a little less difficult, — few could realize. Humor, patience, a decisive will, an infinite desire to serve his generation carried him over many rough patches of the long road. At the very end of it, when he had carried on this work with increasing success for thirty-seven years, the tensity of war-time feeling and the sorrow that came from clinging too long to the trust he had placed in one who proved unworthy of it, imposed a burden he could no longer bear, and, broken by the bitter experience, he committed to other hands the institution he had created. But on the very last day of his life he found occasion to deplore the course of a contemporary who had recently bequeathed a great fortune to a worthy object, on the ground that his wealth might have been doing good through many years of its accumulation, and to pity him for having missed all the fun of spending it for others.

When Mr. Higginson wrote an article, 'A Hint to the Rich,' for the Atlantic nine years ago, he began and ended it with the quotation: —

> What I gave, I have;
> What I spent, I had;
> What I kept, I lost.

There was his whole philosophy of riches. His practice was itself a hint to the rich, for his constant refusal to count the cost in what he did for others was offset at every turn by the little severities he imposed upon his own mode of life. 'I look at fifty cents myself,' he wrote in a private letter soon after the war broke out in Europe, 'and think whether I will take a carriage or walk. Indeed I nearly missed my train on Sunday because I did not take a carriage. There is something about "the

HENRY
ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From BOSTON, MASS.
MAR -- 1920 K

spigot and the bung" that applies to everybody.'

Personal indulgence of any kind was as alien to him as to his Puritan forebears. 'Puritanism!' he wrote to a friend in 1889; 'the older I grow, the more I incline to their ideal, and the luxury and the wastefulness and a thousand things send me that way — in thought, though hardly in deeds and living perhaps.' It could not have been entirely from the Puritans of tradition that he derived, for example, his interest in schemes of profit-sharing. It was a cardinal principle of his economic creed that the wage-earner should have 'a larger piece of the pie.' The same sympathy which prompted this feeling kept him youthful to the last, drew him and his young associates, in business and friendship, together, and placed him constantly with those whose eyes were turned toward the sunrise.

His personal presence truthfully bespoke the man within. Compact of stature, visaged with distinction, military in bearing, alert and vigorous, forthright and staccato of speech, both in public and in private, he visibly embodied the qualities of utter fearlessness and honesty, joined with a fortunate capacity for quick and righteous anger. These qualities, moreover, were not wholly unrelated to a human and endearing tendency to make impulsive mistakes. But they stood in an equally close relation to a definite gift for bestowing and winning affection. To a remarkable degree his letters spoke with his living voice. Nothing of good or evil fortune could befall his friends without his writing to them, briefly or at length, in terms appropriately compact of sympathy and humor. His good letters were not the product of accident, for he had a theory of letter-writing which he once communicated to a business associate as follows: 'You sit down and visualize the person you are addressing; you dictate exactly as if he were present; you watch the changes in his face and anticipate his replies. You go through it and cut out all the adjectives and adverbs; then you probably have a good letter.' A point of his own practice is not enumerated here — namely, the addition of a postscript in long hand, to almost every type-written letter, making it even more personal than it was before.

Major Higginson's letters will long continue to speak, with authentic inflection, for the man himself, to all who may read them. In this place a single letter published twenty years ago in Dr. A. V. G. Allen's Life of Phillips Brooks will surely not be unwelcome to readers who have seen it before; to them and to others it will carry a clear suggestion of the personal quality of its writer — not a churchman, or a regular church-goer himself, but a holder of the simple faith that 'without God the bottom drops out of everything.' It needs only to be said that the letter was written to Phillips Brooks, his school and college classmate, at the time when he was considering an urgent call to quit his work at Trinity Church, Boston, and become preacher to Harvard University, from which any call came to either of these two friends, these devoted sons of the college, almost as a command: —

BOSTON, April 12, 1881.

DEAR OLD CHAP, —

Forty years is it since we began learning Latin and mischief together — you the Latin and I the mischief? Since which we have never had a cross word, and so I will run the chance of one by impertinence.

Folks say that the College is asking for you; and it is true, I know. Since you took your course for life, you have gone on steadily and enthusiastically until you've won a great place. Just think of the empty old church and of the present full church! Just think of the men and women of the intelligent and educated classes whom you've drawn into your fold! Think what these men will do for the less fortunate people of our city, and still more, think how your women work! We have not seen the like for a great, great while. It has fallen to you to do this thing, and I will not pass on your deserts, but merely on your luck to have done something in this life worth doing. Is not that what we all are after, and what goes far to save us from remorse or despair? How can a chap be content for a day, unless he is aiming at something of a serious kind? It is the only theory on which one can explain this life, is n't it? And how many of our comrades have made a success of their lives? or how often does it occur in our experience to see it?

You have — no matter how or why; and still more, the future for you is greater in promise than the past has been in performance. Don't dream of leaving your own field. Your personal contact with all these folks is a necessity, if you will go on. How can you then think of Cambridge and the dear old University? You can't work on those boys in the same way, simply because they are at the questioning, critical, restless age. The worst of them are not bad, but frivolous or idle-minded. The best of them are seeking for the truth everywhere, and had better seek by themselves. Let them ferment. Of course you can help many a restless spirit, when he wishes to be helped — but you can do it as well here as at Cambridge. You certainly can talk to or preach to or teach them at Cambridge occasionally — as in Boston. But, for Heaven's sake, don't leave your stronghold for this new field. It would be the mistake of your life — and you will rue it deeply and forever.

Now how do I know? I do not know, and yet I feel absolutely sure of it. I've talked to some of the middle-aged and some of the younger folk of it, and listened with much interest — to but one reply.

You know that personally I get nothing from your being in town. We both are too busy to meet often unless at church; and there I do not go. So I am free from bias. But I can't but feel much interested in your work, and glad of your great influence. Don't risk losing it — don't go away until your sun sets.

This letter calls for no reply. If it annoys you, burn it and forgive me for the sake of old times. I know that it is presuming, impertinent, arrogant even. It has not one word of praise or admiration for you. Such a word is not called for or needed, but no one can value work and enthusiasm more than I. You know full well how I feel about your life.

God bless you, old fellow.

HENRY L. HIGGINSON.

There is much, very much more that might be said and quoted. From the many fields of activity of this great private citizen — fields of business, education, art, friendship, and public service privately rendered — instances innumerable might be drawn to illustrate the living out of his avowed belief that 'there seems no other outcome, no other foundation for a happy mankind, for civilization, than a full, generous, wise use of our powers for the good of our fellow men, and a happy forgetfulness of ourselves.' But this is far less a memoir than a suggestion, a turning of consideration to the immediate meaning of such a life as Major Higginson's.

When the eighty-fifth birthday he did not quite attain was drawing near, and some observance of it had been proposed to him, he wrote to a friend: 'I've had only too many kind words of praise for doing my duty, and only my duty, as my eyes and those of dear, dead friends saw it. The simple tale — that he tried to fill up gaps and sought to bring sunshine into the lives of his fellow men and women, that he usually kept his word, given and implied, and that he worshipped his country and had the very best and most far-seeing of friends — is the whole story.'

Thus in retrospect he saw his life. To others it may stand preëminently, as these pages began by suggesting, for the possibility of sustaining from youth to old age an idealism born in time of war. This central meaning of it was richly symbolized at his burial. Into

HENRY
ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1891
From BOSTON, MASS.
MAR -- 1920 K

and out of the academic surroundings of a college chapel the veteran soldier, the indomitable lover of righteousness and beauty, was borne in the uniform of his army days, his sword at his side; and over his grave the 'grieving bugle' sounded its martial note of farewell. For his country and its ideals he enlisted in the war of more than half a century ago. The enlistment proved to be for life. He believed with all his heart that the young men of this later day were the true spiritual sons of their fathers. It is for them, in the light of such a life as his, to justify this faith of the older generation.

BOYS

BY R. S. V. P.

I

PARENTS who have a boy always disclose the fact with a smile, or in a tone of gratification. Then usually there follows the assurance that he is a 'real boy, too.' Though you might think him noisy and untidy, bent upon his own concerns, and a great tease, rather rough and inconsiderate, yet, for themselves, they do not mind: they like boys. Boys will be boys, and a real boy is the real thing.

You meet this 'real boy,' too, in all books about boys. You even seem to see him constantly on the street and in your neighbor's yard, or trespassing on your own land. You unquestioningly believe schools to be full of him, and your office-boy perhaps appears to be a sample of him. But among boys whom you really know, which one is really such a boy? Is your well-beloved nephew that kind of a real boy, or the boys you know well among your pupils? Were your brothers like that, or your own son, or you yourself? Scarcely. Yet, if this is not the real boy, what is a boy, really? What are boys like? Here are hundreds of them passing before us, swiftly, vigorously moving from babyhood to manhood. What definite things do we really know about them? and if they are not like what we think they are like, why do we think they are like that, and not like what they really are like?

Our habitual assumptions about boys are pretty definite. They have a positive reputation. During the past ten years, I have been collecting what is currently said and constantly written about boys, noting and jotting down each familiar phrase as I happened across it. Putting them all together, I get a popular characterization which runs thus (everyone will recognize how common the ideas are):—

Boys are noisy and decidedly in need of physical activity, for they possess an inexhaustible supply of surplus energy. Boys are dreadfully untidy, very inconsiderate, bent upon their own concerns and inobservant of all else. Boys are pugnacious and athletic, yet they are lazy. To lessons they are indifferent, laughing and rebelling at them and at all poetry, sentiment, and religion. Scornful of mothers, girls, and babies, boys are, nevertheless, generous, brave protectors of the weak; are good-hearted and loyal, and hate meanness, lies, and cowardice. On the other hand, they are impatient of reproof and insensitive to it, as well as to disgust and fear; they spend much of their time dodging their duties, deceiving those in authority, and teasing those beneath them. Boys love so to rule that they are superlatively resistive and rebellious. They are full of creativity, because of which they devote themselves to keen interests, one at a time, with the passion of collector and specialist. At the same time, they are very emulative, and so responsive to competition, that two young boys together are scarcely safe in a dangerous place where either one alone would be perfectly trustworthy, and three together are sure to get into trouble. Indeed, they have such an inclination to show off, that they thus speedily take leave of their common sense when they gather in groups; but they hate to be shown off by others. In truth, boys have so great a desire to excel, that it is said that every boy at some time wants and expects to become president; this gives them a high standard in whatever they undertake; so, if they think they cannot reach that standard, they refuse to try at all. Indeed, when you come to know them, you find boys supersensitive and very dependent on sympathy and comprehension, highly objective and very dramatic, and not at all self-cognizant. They are built in compartments, and a real boy cannot see one part of himself when another is engaging his attention.

Everyone must recognize that this concatenation of contradictory claims and charges, heterogeneous as it is, includes after all only what is currently said and constantly written about boys. Yet, collected and bound together, it reads like an ill-sorted bundle of unrelated impressions made regarding separate boys of various temperaments and tastes at sundry times — it appears to be, not a characterization, but a scrap-heap. The lads whom we know do not categorically answer to this description, though we recognize that each is like some part of it. Our own lads are sons and brothers and human souls; each is a person, different from all others that ever were. The characteristics which all boys have in common seem to us so few as to be almost negligible, and even these few appear in separate boys in very varying degrees. Besides, there is almost nothing which boys have in common that men do not also have; and most of what makes boy and man is common in girls and women, too.

'Boy' probably pointed out originally nothing but the mere fact that a man is young before he is old. There is, we all know, very little which distinguishes a boy from a man, except his youth — that is, his obviousness in interests, his inexperience, and his inexpertness. In thinking of boys, we are thinking of men, minus responsibilities and skill.

Your own boy at twelve or fourteen is as much a full-grown man as Richard the Lion-Hearted ever was (though not as great). He is able, or should be able, to maintain himself in the inanimate world and to handle simple personal relations with some good sense. The only difference between the boy and the man that he is to become is in self-use and in use of the world about him. Nevertheless, in the long ages since there was not even that difference between boy and man, certain salient characteristics may have accumulated in the mere boy, — in boys as boys, — somewhat separate from

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

June 29

NEWS OF MUSIC

THE CECILIA AND A TALE THAT IS TOLD

Its Continuing Ambition to Be the Chorus of the Symphony Orchestra—Loeffler, Mr. Rosenfeld and Now Mr. Hill—The Cleveland Orchestra to Visit Boston—Stadium Summer Concerts in New York—Elsa, Salome and Miss Farrar—The Munich Operatic Festival Renewed—Items, Incidents, Opinions

NOW that Mr. Stephen Townsend has scattered broadcast his circular re-assembling the Symphony Chorus, an amusing tale goes to and fro amongst those who must have their gossip about the musical affairs of this town. As such tongues wag, there are members of The Cecilia, low-placed and high-placed, that expected its choir to be joined to the Symphony Orchestra for the choral work of next season. As some say, indeed, they still confusedly expect it. To be the chorus of the Orchestra is, of course, a long-standing ambition of The Cecilia. It came to actual fruition in Mr. Fiedler's time as conductor of the band, but the outcome, in critical and uncritical ears, did not encourage such union. Since those distant days, the powers at Symphony Hall have not often sought The Cecilia, even for a few incidental voices; while, after the gathering of the Symphony Chorus, it fell quite out of their reckoning.

Meanwhile The Cecilia in spite of just glories in the days of B. J. Lang and in a Boston that was not exactly the Boston of 1915-20, has steadily lost place in the musical life and interest of the city. The brave and often well-considered attempt to reanimate it with the young abilities and ambitions of Mr. Chalmers Clifton as conductor, failed under irremovable conditions within and without the choir. Since that defeat, it has become a slender, semi-private body, undertaking two concerts in a season, open to subscribers only; limiting those concerts to choral music in the smaller and simpler forms; and virtually maintained by a few faithful patrons, one of whom is also a present pillar of the Symphony Orchestra. Nor have its conductors, since Mr. Clifton's day, been able much to better it. By agreeing judgment of practised listeners, the recent numbers, quality and habits with work of The Cecilia have hardly been those to commend it as ally to Mr. Monteux's band in the exacting choral pieces, of large dimensions, projected by him for performance next season. Yet, as current gossip runs, members of The Cecilia have believed of late that such an opportunity would open to them and sought to increase accordingly the numbers of the choir. Indeed, as some aver, when a final dissolution of The Cecilia—for lack of a supporting and interested public—was recently debated in its inner circles, coöperation with the Symphony Orchestra was frankly and earnestly encouraged as the only way to salvation. Yet, with The Cecilia what it has been of late years, such a union seems altogether fantastical. H. T. P.

Contentious Matter

A week ago these columns contained the final paragraph of Mr. Paul Rosenfeld's essay on the music of Mr. Loeffler, quoted from his recently published volume of "Musical Portraits." It was printed here because readers of the book often chattered about it and because it fairly exemplified the view that the youth of American music take of Boston and Bostonians. Indeed, it had rather to do with the traits of this town in general and in particular than with the quality of Mr. Loeffler as composer. None the less, the quotation has drawn from Professor Edward Burlingame Hill of the Division of Music at Harvard the following letter:

> The quotation from Mr. Rosenfeld's essay on Mr. Loeffler, which appeared in your columns on June 22, in my opinion represents a prejudiced and thoroughly unjust view of this, our most gifted resident composer. May I suggest that the following sentences from Professor Spalding's recently published book, "Music: An Art and a Language," is more in accord with the sentiments of discriminating musicians and critics throughout the country.
>
> The composer of greatest genius and scope in America is undoubtedly Charles Martin Lœffler; but although his best works have been composed in this country, we can hardly claim him as an American composer, for his music vividly reflects French taste and ideals. His inspired works—in particular "La Mort de Tintagiles," "Pagan Poem" and a Symphony (in one movement)—are of peculiar importance for their connection with works of literature and for consumate power in orchestration. Not even Debussy has expressed more subtly the tragic spirit of Maeterlinck than has Lœffler in "La Mort de Tintagiles"; and "Pagan Poem," founded on an Eclogue of Virgil portrays most eloquently the romance of those pastoral days. Lœffler's latest work, a String Quartet dedicated to the memory of Victor Chapman, the Harvard aviator, is remarkable for the heart-felt beauty of its themes and for advanced technique in treating the four solo instruments.
>
> While Professor Spalding would undoubtly be the first to disclaim that the above is a comprehensive analysis of Mr. Loeffler's rare and searching qualities as a composer, the fact that he alone of American musicians was chosen for individual comment is of vital significance.

The reviewer of music for the Transcript, having often put in print his notion of Mr. Loeffler, as composer, prefers to hold chastely neutral in this controversy. Yet he may not forbear the reflection that whatever Mr. Rosenfeld's errors of judgment as to Mr. Loeffler's music, that slightly ironical and appreciably self-confident young essayist would now be surer than ever of his view of Boston as self-centred. "Behold," it is easy to hear him saying, with tongue in cheek, Shavianwise, "here is one Harvard professor of music quoting another in print and both apropos a resident composer!"

Here in Boston

In the course of the winter we shall hear in Boston one at least of the newer orchestras of the Middle West—the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra. On a journey into the East it has taken Symphony Hall for an evening concert. The conductor of the band from Cleveland is Nikolai Sokoloff, of old a violinist in the Boston Orchestra, more recently orchestral leader in San Francisco.

In a review of his "musical adventures" during the season lately ended, Mr. Huneker, writing in The Century for July, gives a single sentence to the Boston Orchestra: "Sadly jarred by discordant elements, it will, like the fabled phoenix, arise with new life from its ashes."

A mastodonic out-of-door performance of Verdi's opera, "Aida," is projected at Braves' Field in September. As the impressario's communiqué goes, it will enlist a chorus of a thousand voices, an orchestra of 150 instruments, a ballet of a hundred dancers; noted singers for the individual personages, swarms of "supers" for the ensemble-scenes, elephants, camels, other spectacular paraphernalia; and an eminent operatic conductor to order the whole. The surface of the field will be the stage. Such monstrous performances of "Aida" have taken place elsewhere in Europe and America in recent years and have drawn their thousands.

Summer-Music in New York

Unless recollection slips, the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall through May, June and the first weeks of July in each year are unique from one end of the country to the other. From time to time various orchestras has attempted similar series; but none, even in cities as large as New York or Philadelphia, has gained a sustaining public, much less a public that has renewed itself, as in Boston, for thirty-odd years. The nearest present approach to The Pops—and the resemblance is by no means close—are the Stadium Concerts begun last Saturday in New York and to continue there nightly for ten weeks. They take place out-of-doors in the Stadium, well uptown, of the College of the City of New York. The orchestra sits against a sounding-board in the centre of the ellipse; while the audience scatters about the tiers of seats. Smoke it may; but there are no drinks, tables, intermittent prattle, to intersperse summer music and soothe summer heats. Rather the listener hears often pieces that he might encounter in ordinary symphony concerts of the winter; Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," for example; or Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony"; or Dvorák's "Symphony from the New World"—to choose at random from the programmes announced for the first week. Of course there the lighter numbers, but "standard pieces" equally abound, like Liszt's tone-poem, "Preludes"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice"; and fragments from Wagner's operas. Even concertos have place, with pianists like Mr. Bauer or the best obtainable violinists to play them—to say nothing of assisting singers, operatically inclined. As a rule, the first half of a given programme tends to be substantial, while the second half affords an easier pleasure. This summer the orchestra is the New (or National) Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Rothwell of Los Angeles as conductor. As yet these Stadium Concerts, though well attended, do not pay for themselves—much less yield a profit like the Bostonian Pops—but, as usual in New York for symphonic music, guarantors are plentiful.

Miss Farrar and Her Parts

In the New York Evening Post, Mr. Finck, its reviewer of music, prints a characteristic note from Miss Farrar about her parts in current or impending operas at the Metropolitan.

> Mr. Gatti offered me "Lohengrin" for next season. I admit, in default of Elizabeth, Elsa was a great temptation, but one that I think I did wisely to put aside in favor of Miss Easton, who will not only sing the part beautifully, but will thus have a more advanced stellar position, which she richly deserves. I thought of my worries of a Monday evening "Lohengrin," a Wednesday "Carmen" and a Saturday "Zaza," and what chameleon changes would be demanded of me. Then, too, you know I have a deep-rooted objection to translations, and so Elsa, I think, will always remain out of my repetory. "Louise" is so far the only novelty I have in mind, although I have been hoping arrangements could be made for "Salome," but Gatti has not awakened to the fact, so Garden will probably do it next year here. It was a great pleasure to revive "Manon," though I did suffer when I saw 1903 written in Lilli's Lehmann's bold hand in commemoration of my first appearance in it in Berlin."

The Munich Festival Renewed

Contrary to foreign expectation, the state theatres at Munich are renewing this summer, for the first time since the beginning of the late war, the "Wagner-Mozart Festival," which was one of the artistic glories of the city and which used to fill it with visitors from England, France, America and Central Europe. Thus does Munich once more excel Baireuth, which has put by for the present its ceremonial performances of Wagner's operas. Munich, moreover, is not only continuing its festival, but adding to it. Thus the programme includes not only operas by Wagner and Mozart, but new German music-dramas, produced during the war and little known to Western Europe and America—Strauss's revised "Ariadne" (on Aug. 31); his newest opera, "Die Frau ohne Schatten" (on Sept. 5); Pfitzner's "Palestrina" (on Sept. 23 and 29), and Schreker's "Die Gezeichneten" (on Sept. 9). Furthermore: sundry German classics of opera will be included in the festival-performances — Weber's "Oberon" (on Aug. 11 and 27, Sept. 2) and Wolf's "Corregidor" (on Sept. 11). The chosen pieces from Wagner are "Parsifal," "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger" and one "cycle" of the "Ring" music-dramas; from Mozart: "Figaro's Wedding," "The Magic Flute," "Cosi Fan Tutte," "Il Seraglio" and "Don Juan." The response of the European public of old will be interesting to watch.

Items of the Day

Seemingly Mr. Heifetz, the violinist, has renounced the European tour projected for him next season and will be heard again in this country. Anyhow, he is now at sea on his way back to America after only a few concerts in London. Report goes that conditions on the Continent are not yet favorable to tours by virtuosi.

According to a recent interview Mr. Thibaud as wandering virtuoso will play the violin here, there and everywhere for ten years more. Then, when he is nearing fifty, he will take his ease and please his artistic self as occasional player of chamber-music in public. But before he quite withdraws from the world, say about 1940, he would like to assemble and conduct a "wonderful" orchestra of his own.

Now that the Opéra in Paris has produced d'Indy's "Saint Christopher," it has begun rehearsals of "Les Sept," "Chansons" ("The Seven Songs"), music-drama by the bold and fantastical Italian, Malipiero, some of whose symphonic pieces have been heard in America. It also has in hand an opera drawn from the Arab legend of Antar—the background to a symphony by Rimsky-Korsakov—with music by a Frenchman of the younger generation, Gabrial Dupont.

Miss Hempel will return to the operatic stage, next season, as well as sing in many concerts of her own. For once the Chicago Company takes from the Metropolitan and she will join it for an autumn tour in the Middle West and a spring tour to the Pacific coast. Between these expeditions stand her concerts in Boston and many another city.

According to Alfredo Casella, the Italian composer, writing from Rome to Musical America, the "Negro Rhapsody" of John Powell, the American composer and pianist, more impressed the audience than any other piece played at Mr. Damrosch's concert there. For once, it seems, a European audience heard American music of clear, immediately recognizable and stimulating American voice. Mr. Powell, himself, played the piano part.

Minor items of news say that next autumn Joseph Hofmann, the pianist, will revisit England for the first time in years; that Mr. de Lamarter's prize for an organ sonata by an American composer has been awarded to Harry Jepson, organist at Yale; and that the Metropolitan Opera House at Philadelphia has passed to "The Shriners" who will use it as a "temple" and also let it as concert-hall or theatre.

Appraisals—Without Bach our intellectual conception of music could not be what it is. Handel is but rough-hewn beside him; Mozart, in the contrapuntal vein, is but a composer in a haste; Haydn is insignificant. Bach alone gives to counterpoint a divine perfection, finality and ease. [The Manchester Guardian —Manufacturers say they will deliberately follow a policy of underproduction rather than reduce prices. A selfish policy that will find no sympathy when the pinch comes. [Baltimore American

---

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

9.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

rom
Express NOV 16 1919
Buffalo, N. Y.

ENRY L. HIGGINSON, BANKER, PATRON OF MUSIC, IS DEAD

Dies few hours after undergoing operation in Massachusetts General hospital.

OUNDER OF ORCHESTRA

Established Boston Symphony organization in 1881 and since had paid its deficits.

ANTED TO AID POORER PEOPLE

Arranged for cheap concerts for their benefit—Was brevetted lieutenant colonel in the Civil War.

Boston, Mass., Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was announced today. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday, he would have been 85 years of age.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the Symphony orchestra. He had been a members of the banking firm since 1868.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year until his death Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at 25 cents each. These rehearsals in later years came to be concerts in full form.

Orchestra his hobby.

The symphony orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philantrophy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York city on November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil war, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he has been a member of the Harvard corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

From
Herald NOV 18 1919
Yonkers, N. Y.

"In the Day's News"

Henry Lee Higginson, financier and philanthropist, who to-day reaches the age of four-score and five, is a native of New York, descended from an old New England family, who has come to be regarded as Boston's leading citizen by reason of his activity as a sponsor of good causes and the financial aid he renders them. As a matter of course he went to Harvard College, served with distinction in the civil war, winning the title of major, and then entered the banking business. The fortune that he has made he has shared to a large extent with Harvard University and with institutions in the city of Boston. His leading title to national fame is his patronage and control of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, which ranks among the great orchestras of the world.

NEW YORK POST
ESTABLISHED 1881
From DEC 28 1919 Denver, Colo.

IGGINSON CUTS OFF ORCHESTRA ON MUCK'S GOING

Backer of Boston Symphony Revoked Bequest to Musical Organization.

The will of Major Higginson did not become public knowledge until much laudatory ink had been used in long obituary notices which might have struck a lower key in some musical quarters if its contents had been known. For it was confidently expected that the founder and generous supporter thru many years of the Boston Symphony orchestra had left at least a million to provide for its future welfare.

Before troubles arose over the now happily deported Muck, it was known that Major Higginson intended such a provision. It did not appear in the will, however, and what mention was made of the orchestra seems in the nature of a skeptical challenge of its vitality. It is, in fact, put on probation in the matter of owning its instruments. H. T. Parker, the well-informed critic of the Boston Transcript, makes the situation clear.

"As was to be expected, Mr. Higginson's will makes no mention of the endowment with which he once purposed to secure the future of the Symphony orchestra. When the band passed from his hands, he counted himself free from obligation of maintenance, and even declined, if common report is to be trusted, to share in the subscriptions that met the deficit of last year.

"Indeed, had not the wiser counsels of close friends finally prevailed, the probability was that he would have dispersed the orchestra in the summer of 1918, so bitterly did he resent the tumults and disorders into which the anti-German moods of war-time plunged it; so firmly did he believe that, reorganized and differently controlled, it could never regain its old perfection.

"The bequest that he had often promised, publicly and privately, was seemingly revoked, while certainly his mistrust of the new regime continued to the end. Else he would hardly have directed one of his executors to hold as trustee various scores and instruments for three or five years and then decide whether the new Symphony orchestra has been wisely enough managed and held to sufficiently high standards to deserve to receive them.

"Like most musically minded men of his generation, and the more for long association with German conductors, Mr. Higginson could hardly conceive of an orchestra, or, indeed, of the whole art of music, other than in German terms. Being a man of worldly and musical experience, he was unlikely ever to have made the absurd remark attributed to him in his war-time chagrins—that only German conductors could read a score. Deep in his mind and heart, however, was mistrust of all other conductors and of any regime but his at Symphony hall. He transferred the orchestra to the present trustees; but, naturally in a man of his years, temperament and experiences, the conviction remained unaltered. So also do various ironies."—The Literary Digest.

From Gazette Times
Pittsburg, Pa.

Maj. Higginson Leaves No Funds to Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra did not benefit financially in the will of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, its founder and former supporter. Its erstwhile manager, Charles A. Ellis, now a noted concert impressario, was remembered with a bequest of $10,000, while the bulk of the estate was left to the major's widow and son, Alexander Higginson.

The Higginson library of music, which includes the scores used by the orchestra, and many musical instruments, among which are counted those used by the orchestra, were given in trust to Charles Francis Adams, with instructions to allow the symphony orchestra to use the scores and instruments free of charge, provided he so desires.

RONICLE-TELEGRAPH
Pittsburg, Pa.
NOV 15 1919

FOUNDER OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA SUCCUMBS

Hnry Lee Higginson Dies Following an Operation—Well-Known Harvard Man.

Boston, November 15. — (Associated Press.)—The death of Major Henry Lee Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was announced today. He died at Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year until his death Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket.

The Symphony Orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York City, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel.

106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
NOV 22 1919
From
Bill Board
Cincinnati, O.

Major Henry Lee Higginson,

Founder of the Famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dies Suddenly

Boston, Nov. 15.—Ill but a few days Major Henry Lee Higginson died at Massachusetts General Hospital early today. Major Higginson was a great banker and a generous philanthropist, but was best known as the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he started in 1881 and with which he was connected until April, 1918. Altho for many years the Boston Orchestra ranked among the best in the United States it was not a success financially, but even tho year after year the receipts showed a deficit, reaching into many thousands, Major Higginson never lost his interest, but continued his financial support of the organization. He withdrew from the orchestra after the arrest and internment of Dr. Muck. It will be remembered that at the time of Dr. Muck's arrest Major Higginson denied the orchestra had refused to play the "Star Spangled Banner," and it was after the Federal authorities took action Major Higginson announced that he had severed his connection with the orchestra.

Henry Lee Higginson was born in Boston November 18, 1834. He studied at Harvard University, but left before graduating that he might enter the banking house of S. & E. Austin. It was due to his generosity in contributing the sum of $150,000 as an endowment to Harvard that the building of the Harvard Union was made possible. One son, A. Henry Higginson, survives him.

LEADER
Pittsburgh, Pa.
NOV 15

H. L. Higginson, Leading Financier, Expires Suddenly

Boston, Nov. 15.—Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, one of the foremost bankers of the United States and founder of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, died suddenly at the Massachusetts General hospital early today.

From
Times NOV 16 1919
Seattle, Wash.

MAJOR HIGGINSON DEAD

Boston Banker and Founder of Symphony Orchestra Succumbs.

BOSTON, Saturday, Nov. 15.—Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, one of the foremost bankers of the United States and founder of the

om SUN
ress: Pittsburgh, Pa.
NOV 15 191

ENRY L. HIGGINSON IS TAKEN BY DEATH

Veteran Banker and Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra Dies in Hub.

By International News Service.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Major Henry Lee Higginson, one of the foremost bankers of the United States, and founder of the famous Boston symphony orchestra, died suddenly at the Massachusetts General hospital early today.

Major Higginson succumbed suddenly after an operation. He had been ill but a few days.

Through his marriage to Ida Agassiz on December 5, 1863, two great financial houses were united. Mrs. Higginson was at his bedside when the major died. His son, Henry Higginson, is known in the world of sport as a lover of thoroughbred hunters and running horses. Had he lived Major Higginson would have been 85 years old on Tuesday next.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. The symphony orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York City, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

ERALD
Washington, D. C.
DEC 10 1919

Boston, Dec. 9.—No provision is made for the Boston Symphony in the will of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, founder and former supporter of the orchestra, who died a week ago, under the terms of the will, filed here today. The bulk of his estate is left to his widow, and his son, Alexander Higginson. While the orchestra is not financially benefitted by the will of the noted financier, who controlled its destinies for so many years, the former manager of the Symphony, Charles A. Ellis, now a noted concert manager who began his career in the offices of the Higginson banking office, is remembered with a bequest of $10,000. Most of the bequests are in sums ranging from several hundred to several thousand dollars, to various employes of his firm and household.

The Symphony is not altogether forgotten.

The Higginson library of music, which includes the scores used by the Symphony Orchestra, and musical instruments, including those used by the orchestra, are given in trust to Charles Francis Adams with instructions to allow the Symphony Orchestra to use the scores and the instruments fre of charge, if Adams so desires.

The will provides that in not less than three nor more than five years the trustee must either turn over the music scores and instruments to the Symphony Orchestra or sell the same. In his will Maj. Higginson wrote, "I hope the trustee will be guided by the manner in which the Symphony Orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards."

This will was made October 19, 1918, and a codicil was added December 26, 1918.

Maj. Higginson resigned his active relationship with the Symphony shortly after the Muck episode. The veteran soldier is said to have placed implicit confidence in the discredited conductor, even after Dr. Muck was interned.

The filing of the will disposes of stories that Maj. Higginson had provided a million dollar endowment for the Symphony. It is generally believed that he intended to leave this sum to assure the future of the orchestra, but that the Muck incident changed his lifelong plans.

ESTABLISHED 1881
NEW YORK
From STAR
Montreal, Can.
NOV 15 1919

SYMPHONY HEAD DEAD.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, Banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been 85 years of age.

From
Bill Board NOV 15 1919
Cincinnati, O.

DECEMBER 15

Is the Date Chosen for the First Concert of the Boston Musical Association

From all reports Boston is determined to give a hearing to the works of American composers. Georges Longy, founder and director of the Boston Musical Association, and first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has organized a small orchestra of young musicians of Boston and vicinity, and is arranging a series of concerts, the first one to be given December 15. Included in Mr. Longy's plans for the association is an appointment of a committee of composers to pass by vote on American compositions submitted to the organization, and those compositions meeting with approval will be placed on the programs of the concerts to be given by the Boston Musical Association.

om OREGONIAN
dress: Portland, Oregon
te NOV 1 1919

The will of the late Henry Lee Higginson, the Boston banker and backer for many years of the Boston Symphony orchestra, does not leave any substantial financial provision for the future of that noted orchestra.

[illegible capital given by students] We suggest

From
Bill Board NOV 15 1919
Cincinnati, O.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Inaugurated New York Season at Carnegie Hall November 6

New York, Nov. 7.—New Yorkers evidenced their warm interest in the series of concerts to be given in the metropolis by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that every seat in Carnegie Hall was sold days in advance of the opening concert, which was given the evening of November 6.

From
Star DEC 14 1919
Kansas City, Mo.

The will of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson contains no bequest to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded and maintained for so long, although it was his purpose, expressed a few years ago, to leave a million dollars to insure its maintenance. It is known that he took deeply to heart the Dr. Muck episode, but his act in disinheriting the orchestra has occasioned great surprise.

ES STAR,
cinnati, Ohio

H. L. HIGGINSON'S WILL IS FILED

Musical Library May Be Given to Boston Symphony.

(ASSOCIATED PRESS DISPATCH.)

BOSTON, November 26.—By the will of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony or-

News
Cleveland, Ohio
NOV 1

Music "Angel" Dies.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston symphony orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been eighty-five years old.

ESTABLISHED 1841
NOV 16 1919
From Dispatch
Pittsburg, Pa.

Boston Orchestra

From Express
Buffalo, N. Y.
NOV 10 1919

HENRY L. HIGGINSON, BANKER, PATRON OF MUSIC, IS DEAD

Dies few hours after undergoing operation in Massachusetts General hospital.

FOUNDER OF ORCHESTRA

Established Boston Symphony organization in 1881 and since had paid its deficits.

WANTED TO AID POORER PEOPLE

Arranged for cheap concerts for their benefit—Was brevetted lieutenant colonel in the Civil War.

Boston, Mass., Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was announced today. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday, he would have been 85 years of age.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the Symphony orchestra. He had been a members of the banking firm since 1868.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year until his death Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at 25 cents each. These rehearsals in later years came to be concerts in full form.

Orchestra his hobby.

The symphony orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than philantrophy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York city on November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil war, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he has been a member of the Harvard corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

From
Herald
Yonkers, N. Y.
NOV 18 1919

"In the Day's News"

Henry Lee Higginson, financier and philanthropist, who to-day reaches the age of four-score and five, is a native of New York, descended from an old New England family, who has come to be regarded as Boston's leading citizen by reason of his activity as a sponsor of good causes and the financial aid he renders them. As a matter of course he went to Harvard College, served with distinction in the civil war, winning the title of major, and then entered the banking business. The fortune that he has made he has shared to a large extent with Harvard University and with institutions in the city of Boston. His leading title to national fame is his patronage and control of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, which ranks among the great orchestras of the world.

NEW YORK POST
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
DEC 28 1919
Denver, Colo.

HIGGINSON CUTS OFF ORCHESTRA ON MUCK'S GOING

Backer of Boston Symphony Revoked Bequest to Musical Organization.

The will of Major Higginson did not become public knowledge until much laudatory ink had been used in long obituary notices which might have struck a lower key in some musical quarters if its contents had been known. For it was confidently expected that the founder and generous supporter thru many years of the Boston Symphony orchestra had left at least a million to provide for its future welfare.

Before troubles arose over the now happily deported Muck, it was known that Major Higginson intended such a provision. It did not appear in the will, however, and what mention was made of the orchestra seems in the nature of a skeptical challenge of its vitality. It is, in fact, put on probation in the matter of owning its instruments. H. T. Parker, the well-informed critic of the Boston Transcript, makes the situation clear.

"As was to be expected, Mr. Higginson's will makes no mention of the endowment with which he once purposed to secure the future of the Symphony orchestra. When the band passed from his hands, he counted himself free from obligation of maintenance, and even declined, if common report is to be trusted, to share in the subscriptions that met the deficit of last year.

"Indeed, had not the wiser counsels of close friends finally prevailed, the probability was that he would have dispersed the orchestra in the summer of 1918, so bitterly did he resent the tumults and disorders into which the anti-German moods of war-time plunged it; so firmly did he believe that, reorganized and differently controlled, it could never regain its old perfection.

"The bequest that he had often promised, publicly and privately, was seemingly revoked, while certainly his mistrust of the new regime continued to the end. Else he would hardly have directed one of his excutors to hold as trustee various scores and instruments for three or five years and then decide whether the new Symphony orchestra has been wisely enough managed and held to sufficiently high standards to deserve to receive them.

"Like most musically minded men of his generation, and the more for long association with German conductors, Mr. Higginson could hardly conceive of an orchestra, or, indeed, of the whole art of music, other than in German terms. Being a man of worldly and musical experience, he was unlikely ever to have made the absurd remark attributed to him in his war-time chagrins—that only German conductors could read a score. Deep in his mind and heart, however, was mistrust of all other conductors and of any regime but his at Symphony hall. He transferred the orchestra to the present trustees; but, naturally in a man of his years, temperament and experiences, the conviction remained unaltered. So also do various ironies."—The Literary Digest.

From Gazette Times
Pittsburg, Pa.
DEC 14 19

Maj. Higginson Leaves No Funds to Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra did not benefit financially in the will of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, its founder and former supporter. Its erstwhile manager, Charles A. Ellis, now a noted concert impressario, was remembered with a bequest of $10,000, while the bulk of the estate was left to the major's widow and son, Alexander Higginson.

The Higginson library of music, which includes the scores used by the orchestra, and many musical instruments, among which are counted those used by the orchestra, were given in trust to Charles Francis Adams, with instructions to allow the symphony orchestra to use the scores and instruments free of charge, provided he so desires.

CHRONICLE-TELEGRAPH
Pittsburg, Pa.
NOV 15 1919

FOUNDER OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA SUCCUMBS

Hnry Lee Higginson Dies Following an Operation—Well-Known Harvard Man.

Boston, November 15. — (Associated Press.)—The death of Major Henry Lee Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was announced today. He died at Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year until his death Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket.

The Symphony Orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York City, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel.

106-110 SEVE...
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Bill Board
Cincinnati, O.

Major Henry Lee Higginson,

Founder of the Famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dies Suddenly

Boston, Nov. 15.—Ill but a few days Major Henry Lee Higginson died at Massachusetts General Hospital early today. Major Higginson was a great banker and a generous philanthropist, but was best known as the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he started in 1881 and with which he was connected until April, 1918. Altho for many years the Boston Orchestra ranked among the best in the United States it was not a success financially, but even tho year after year the receipts showed a deficit, reaching into many thousands, Major Higginson never lost his interest, but continued his financial support of the organization. He withdrew from the orchestra after the arrest and internment of Dr. Muck. It will be remembered that at the time of Dr. Muck's arrest Major Higginson denied the orchestra had refused to play the "Star Spangled Banner," and it was after the Federal authorities took action Major Higginson announced that he had severed his connection with the orchestra.

Henry Lee Higginson was born in Boston November 18, 1834. He studied at Harvard University, but left before graduating that he might enter the banking house of S. & E. Austin. It was due to his generosity in contributing the sum of $150,000 as an endowment to Harvard that the building of the Harvard Union was made possible. One son, A. Henry Higginson, survives him.

LEADER
38 Pittsburgh, Pa.

H. L. Higginson, Leading Financier, Expires Suddenly

Boston, Nov. 15.—Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, one of the foremost bankers of the United States and founder of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, died suddenly at the Massachusetts General hospital early today.

From
Times
Seattle, Wash.
NOV 16 1919

MAJOR HIGGINSON DEAD

Boston Banker and Founder of Symphony Orchestra Succumbs.

BOSTON, Saturday, Nov. 15.—Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, one of the foremost bankers of the United States and founder of the [illegible]

pm SUN
press: Pittsburgh, Pa.
NOV 15 191

HENRY L. HIGGINSON IS TAKEN BY DEATH

Veteran Banker and Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra Dies in Hub.

By International News Service.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Major Henry Lee Higginson, one of the foremost bankers of the United States, and founder of the famous Boston symphony orchestra, died suddenly at the Massachusetts General hospital early today.

Major Higginson succumbed suddenly after an operation. He had been ill but a few days.

Through his marriage to Ida Agassiz on December 5, 1863, two great financial houses were united. Mrs. Higginson was at his bedside when the major died. His son, Henry Higginson, is known in the world of sport as a lover of thoroughbred hunters and running horses. Had he lived Major Higginson would have been 85 years old on Tuesday next.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. The symphony orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York City, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

ERALD
Washington, D. C.
DEC 10 1919

Boston, Dec. 9.—No provision is made for the Boston Symphony in the will of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, founder and former supporter of the orchestra, who died a week ago, under the terms of the will, filed here today. The bulk of his estate is left to his widow, and his son, Alexander Higginson. While the orchestra is not financially benefitted by the will of the noted financier, who controlled its destinies for so many years, the former manager of the Symphony, Charles A. Ellis, now a noted concert manager who began his career in the offices of the Higginson banking office, is remembered with a bequest of $10,000. Most of the bequests are in sums ranging from several hundred to several thousand dollars, to various employes of his firm and household.

The Symphony is not altogether forgotten.

The Higginson library of music which includes the scores used by the Symphony Orchestra, and musical instruments, including those used by the orchestra, are given in trust to Charles Francis Adams with instructions to allow the Symphony Orchestra to use the scores and the instruments fre of charge, if Adams so desires.

The will provides that in not less than three nor more than five years the trustee must either turn over the music scores and instruments to the Symphony Orchestra or sell the same. In his will Maj. Higginson wrote, "I hope the trustee will be guided by the manner in which the Symphony Orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards."

This will was made October 19, 1918, and a codicil was added December 26, 1918.

Maj. Higginson resigned his active relationship with the Symphony shortly after the Muck episode. The veteran soldier is said to have placed implicit confidence in the discredited conductor, even after Dr. Muck was interned.

The filing of the will disposes of stories that Maj. Higginson had provided a million dollar endowment for the Symphony. It is generally believed that he intended to leave this sum to assure the future of the orchestra, but that the Muck incident changed his lifelong plans.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From STAR
[illegible] Can.
NOV 15 1919

SYMPHONY HEAD DEAD.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, Banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been 85 years of age.

From
Bill Board
Cincinnati, O.
[illegible]19

DECEMBER 15

Is the Date Chosen for the First Concert of the Boston Musical Association

From all reports Boston is determined to give a hearing to the works of American composers. Georges Longy, founder and director of the Boston Musical Association, and first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has organized a small orchestra of young musicians of Boston and vicinity, and is arranging a series of concerts, the first one to be given December 15. Included in Mr. Longy's plans for the association is an appointment of a committee of composers to pass by vote on American compositions submitted to the organization, and those compositions meeting with approval will be placed on the programs of the concerts to be given by the Boston Musical Association.

om OREGONIAN
dress: Portland, Oregon
te

The will of the late Henry Lee Higginson, the Boston banker and backer for many years of the Boston Symphony orchestra, does not leave any substantial financial provision for the future of that noted orchestra.

[illegible] capital given by students. We suggest

From
Bill Board
[illegible]cinnati, O.
19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Inaugurated New York Season at Carnegie Hall November 6

New York, Nov. 7.—New Yorkers evidenced their warm interest in the series of concerts to be given in the metropolis by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that every seat in Carnegie Hall was sold days in advance of the opening concert, which was given the evening of November 6.

From Star
Kansas City, Mo.

The will of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson contains no bequest to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded and maintained for so long, although it was his purpose, expressed a few years ago, to leave a million dollars to insure its maintenance. It is known that he took deeply to heart the Dr. Muck episode, but his act in disinheriting the orchestra has occasioned great surprise.

ES STAR,
[illegible]nnati, Ohio

H. L. HIGGINSON'S WILL IS FILED

Musical Library May Be Given to Boston Symphony.

(ASSOCIATED PRESS DISPATCH.)

BOSTON, November 26.—By the will of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony or-

News
Cleveland, Ohio

Music "Angel" Dies.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston symphony orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been eighty-five yrs old.

ESTABLISHED 1881
NOV 16 1919
From Dispatch
Pittsburg, Pa.

Boston Orchestra

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ESTABLISHED 1881
From REPUBLIC
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
DEC 22 1919

WORLD'S PROGRESS

Major Henry L. Higginson, for nearly half a century the first citizen of Boston, founder of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra and noted the breadth of this land for his acts of philanthropy and social service, died recently at 85.

Major Higginson was, of course, a well-to-do man but his heart and his sympathies were with those who labor and with the poor. He knew the hopes and fears, the prejudices and dislikes of us people who work for our living, but he did not see in them the dangers to the nation that many of the less courageous citizens of the republic are visioning today.

Some time before his death, Major Higginson wrote the following to a friend:

"I disclaim any ill-temper or despondency about our country * * Can a man or woman have lived through the last 80 years and seen and felt the revolution of 1848 in Europe, the reactions from this revolution as viewed on the ground, the dozen wars which have taken place and yet feel a single doubt that the world has greatly progressed in morals and religion and in the welfare of every nation?

"In any case, the men with whom I grew up and lived, felt the movement of this great spirit throughout the world and carelessly discussed the problems which are before us today. Such problems cannot die and must fill us with thought and hope until they are settled.

"The welfare and progress of the human race absolutely need the help of everyone, and it is unwise to turn away or even discourage any class of mankind, whether the wage-earner, the mill-owner, the capitalist or even the idler, all of whom can well help. If a man fails to help, he should be tempted to do so and not be repelled by harsh words. All our interests are mutual, and the more fully this patent fact is recognized, the better life will become; and mutual interests breed mutual good will, then sympathy, and then reach our goal. It is the poorest people who attain most by wise, intelligent teamwork, and, this given, we can go along in peace and hope."

From NOV 15 1919
COMMERCIAL TRIBUNE,
Cincinnati, Ohio

"IN THE DAY'S NEWS."

Henry Lee Higginson, financier and philanthropist, who today reaches the age of four score and five, is a native of New York, descended from an old New England family, who has come to be regarded as Boston's leading citizen by reason of his activity as a sponsor of good causes and the financial aid he renders them. As a matter of course he went to Harvard college, served with distinction in the civil War, winning the title of Major, and then entered the banking business. The fortune that he has made he has shared to a large extent with Harvard University and with institutions in the city of Boston. His leading title to national fame is his patronage and control of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, which ranks among the greatest orchestras in the world.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From EXPRESS,
Los Angeles, Calif.
1919

Founder of Boston Symphony Dies at 84

By Associated Press

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts general hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1881.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York City on November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston.

ENQUIRER
Cincinnati, O.

AGED BANKER

Succumbs in Boston.

Major Henry L. Higginson, Founder of Symphony Concert, Dies After Operation.

Boston, November 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was reported to-day. He died in Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

The death of MajorHigginsonwas due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major

From Evening Star
Washington, D. C.
NOV 15 1919

MAJ. HIGGINSON, BENEFACTOR, DIES

Boston Banker Founded the Symphony Orchestra in 1881 as "Hobby."

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, November 15.—The death of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been eighty-five years old.

The death of Maj. Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble, for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Maj. Higginson probably was widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University, and through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Orchestra Established in 1881.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank, who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year, until his death, Mr Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket.

One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at 25 cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The Symphony Orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery was to other men of wealth.

Spent Years in Boston.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York city, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

In 1890 Maj. Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds, on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of master of arts by Harvard and that of doctor of laws by Yale.

From TIMES STAR,
Cincinnati, Ohio
NOV 15 19

MAN WHO BUILT UP THE BOSTON SYMPHONY, DIES

Major Henry Higginson, Banker, Founded the Orchestra.

WAS HARVARD MAN

Presented Soldiers' Field to the University.

(ASSOCIATED PRESS DISPATCH.)

BOSTON, November 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, 84, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was announced, today. He died at the Massachusetts general hospital last night after an operation.

Mr. Higginson established the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players and conductors from the musical capitals of Europe, who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year until his death Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at twenty-five cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

In 1890 Maj. Higginson presented to Harvard, his alma mater, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the civil war, Soldiers field, the athletic grounds, on a part of which the Harvard stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard union. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

From Star
Kansas City, Mo.

MAJ. H. L. HIGGINSON DEAD.

The Banker Was Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Maj. Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. He obtained the services of expert players from Europe and engaged conductors of the first rank until it became one of the foremost orchestras in the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year Mr. Higginson made up the deficit. One of his purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at twenty-five cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The symphony orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard and in 1856 went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War and was discharged for disability in 1864. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers Field, the athletic grounds on which the Harvard stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the

PRESS
Pittsburgh, Pa.
NOV 15 1919

MAJOR H. L. HIGGINSON, BOSTON BANKER AND ORCHESTRA HEAD, DIES

By International News Service.

Boston, Nov. 15.—Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, one of the foremost bankers of the United States and founder of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, died suddenly at the Massachusetts General hospital early today.

Maj. Higginson succumbed suddenly after an operation. He had been ill but a few days of an intestinal disorder. Through his marriage with Ida Agassiz on Dec. 5, 1863, two great financial houses were united. Mrs. Higginson was at his bedside when the major died.

His son, A. Henry Higginson, is noted in the world of sport as a lover and owner of thoroughbred hunters and running horses. Had he lived Maj. Higginson would have been aged 85 Tuesday next.

From OREGONIAN
Address: Portland, Oregon
Date NOV 16

MAJOR HIGGINSON DIES

Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra Succumbs at 84.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Hig[illegible]

JOURNAL
Minneapolis, Minn.
NOV 15 1919 M

Founder of Boston Symphony Is Dead

Boston, Mass., Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, 84 years old, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General hospital last night after an operation.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter.

Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson probably was widely known as a benefactor of Harvard university and through his association with the Symphony orchestra

PRESS
Pittsburgh, Pa.
NOV 28 1919

MAJOR HIGGINSON LEAVES NO MONEY TO ORCHESTRA

Boston, Mass., Nov. 28.—Disappointment has followed the filing of the will of the late Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, in that there was found to be no $1,000,000 bequest to the Boston Symphony orchestra, as had been expected. Maj. Higginson for years had paid the deficits of the orchestra and had indicated that, upon his death, he would provide a fund of at least $1,000,000. Nothing but a lot of musical scores and instruments are left to the organization.

ESS: Buffalo, N. Y.
NOV 16

MAJOR HIGGINSON DIES IN BOSTON AFTER OPERATION

Was Founder of Famed Symphony Orchestra and One of Massachusetts' Leading Bankers.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

Two years ago after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an enemy allen, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the symphony organization, which he had formed in 1881.

Mr. Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank who developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue, in every other year until his death, Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at twenty-five cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to the concerts in full form.

The Symphony Orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York City, Nov. 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of Major and brevet Lieutenant Colonel. Returning to Boston he entered the banking business, and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union.

Since 1898 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them.

He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

Sentinel
Milwaukee, Wis.
NOV 16 1919

MAJ. HIGGINSON, FOUNDER BOSTON SYMPHONY, DEAD

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night, after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday, he would have been 85 years of age.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee Higginson & Company, bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

From
Sentinel
Milwaukee, Wis.

FOUNDER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY PASSE

By The Associated Press

BOSTON—The death of [illegible] Higginson, banker and [illegible] the Boston Symphony o[illegible] announced here on Sa[illegible] the Massachuset[illegible]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ESTABLISHED 1881
From REPUBLICAN PHOENIX, ARIZ.
DEC 22 1919

WORLD'S PROGRESS

Major Henry L. Higginson, for nearly half a century the first citizen of Boston, founder of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra and noted the breadth of this land for his acts of philanthropy and social service, died recently at 85.

Major Higginson was, of course, a well-to-do man but his heart and his sympathies were with those who labor and with the poor. He knew the hopes and fears, the prejudices and dislikes of us people who work for our living, but he did not see in them the dangers to the nation that many of the less courageous citizens of the republic are visioning today.

Some time before his death, Major Higginson wrote the following to a friend:

"I disclaim any ill-temper or despondency about our country * * Can a man or woman have lived through the last 80 years and seen and felt the revolution of 1848 in Europe, the reactions from this revolution as viewed on the ground, the dozen wars which have taken place and yet feel a single doubt that the world has greatly progressed in morals and religion and in the welfare of every nation?

"In any case, the men with whom I grew up and lived, felt the movement of this great spirit throughout the world and carelessly discussed the problems which are before us today. Such problems cannot die and must fill us with thought and hope until they are settled.

"The welfare and progress of the human race absolutely need the help of everyone, and it is unwise to turn away or even discourage any class of mankind, whether the wage-earner, the mill-owner, the capitalist or even the idler, all of whom can well help. If a man fails to help, he should be tempted to do so and not be repelled by harsh words. All our interests are mutual, and the more fully this patent fact is recognized, the better life will become; and mutual interests breed mutual good will, then sympathy, and then reach our goal. It is the poorest people who attain most by wise, intelligent teamwork, and, this given, we can go along in peace and hope."

From
COMMERCIAL TRIBUNE,
Cincinnati, Ohio

"IN THE DAY'S NEWS."

Henry Lee Higginson, financier and philanthropist, who today reaches the age of four score and five, is a native of New York, descended from an old New England family, who has come to be regarded as Boston's leading citizen by reason of his activity as a sponsor of good causes and the financial aid he renders them. As a matter of course he went to Harvard college, served with distinction in the civil War, winning the title of Major, and then entered the banking business. The fortune that he has made he has shared to a large extent with Harvard University and with institutions in the city of Boston. His leading title to national fame is his patronage and control of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, which ranks among the greatest orchestras in the world.

TODAYS BIRTHDAYS

ESTABLISHED 1881
From EXPRESS,
Los Angeles, Calif.

Founder of Boston Symphony Dies at 84

By Associated Press

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts general hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1881.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York City on November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston.

From
ENQUIRER
Cincinnati, O.

AGED BANKER

Succumbs in Boston.

Major Henry L. Higginson, Founder of Symphony Concert, Dies After Operation.

Boston, November 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was reported to-day. He died in Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

The death of MajorHigginsonwas due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major

From
Evening Star
Washington, D. C.
NOV 15 1919

MAJ. HIGGINSON, BENEFACTOR, DIES

Boston Banker Founded the Symphony Orchestra in 1881 as "Hobby."

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, November 15.—The death of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been eighty-five years old.

The death of Maj. Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble, for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Maj. Higginson probably was widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University, and through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Orchestra Established in 1881.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank, who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year, until his death, Mr Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket.

One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at 25 cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The Symphony Orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery was to other men of wealth.

Spent Years in Boston.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York city, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

In 1890 Maj. Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds, on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of master of arts by Harvard and that of doctor of laws by Yale.

From TIMES STAR,
Cincinnati, Ohio
NOV 15 19

MAN WHO BUILT UP THE BOSTON SYMPHONY, DIES

Major Henry Higginson, Banker, Founded the Orchestra.

WAS HARVARD MAN

Presented Soldiers' Field to the University.

(ASSOCIATED PRESS DISPATCH.)

BOSTON, November 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, 84, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was announced, today. He died at the Massachusetts general hospital last night after an operation.

Mr. Higginson established the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players and conductors from the musical capitals of Europe, who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year until his death Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at twenty-five cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

In 1890 Maj. Higginson presented to Harvard, his alma mater, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the civil war, Soldiers field, the athletic grounds, on a part of which the Harvard stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard union. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
COMMERCIAL TRIBUNE,
Cincinnati, Ohio
NOV 16 191

MAJOR HIGGINSON DIES IN BOSTON AFTER OPERATION

Was Founder of Famed Symphony Orchestra and One of Massachusetts' Leading Bankers.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

Two years ago after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the symphony organization, which he had formed in 1881.

Mr. Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank who developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue, in every other year until his death, Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at twenty-five cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to the concerts in full form.

The Symphony Orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery was to other men of wealth.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York City, Nov. 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of Major and brevet Lieutenant Colonel. Returning to Boston he entered the banking business, and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union.

Since 1898 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them.

He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

From Star
Kansas City, Mo.

MAJ. H. L. HIGGINSON DEAD.

The Banker Was Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Maj. Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. He obtained the services of expert players from Europe and engaged conductors of the first rank until it became one of the foremost orchestras in the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year Mr. Higginson made up the deficit. One of his purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at twenty-five cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The symphony orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard and in 1856 went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War and was discharged for disability in 1864. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on which the Harvard stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000

K. F. Piano Sh

PRESS
Pittsburgh, Pa.

MAJOR H. L. HIGGINSON, BOSTON BANKER AND ORCHESTRA HEAD, DIES

By International News Service.

Boston, Nov. 15.—Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, one of the foremost bankers of the United States and founder of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, died suddenly at the Massachusetts General hospital early today.

Maj. Higginson succumbed suddenly after an operation. He had been ill but a few days of an intestinal disorder. Through his marriage with Ida Agassiz on Dec. 5, 1863, two great financial houses were united. Mrs. Higginson was at his bedside when the major died.

His son, A. Henry Higginson, is noted in the world of sport as a lover and owner of thoroughbred hunters and running horses. Had he lived Maj. Higginson would have been aged 85 Tuesday next.

From OREGONIAN
Address: Portland, Oregon
Date

MAJOR HIGGINSON DIES

Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra Succumbs at 84.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson

JOURNAL
Minneapolis, Minn.

Founder of Boston Symphony Is Dead

Boston, Mass., Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, 84 years old, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General hospital last night after an operation.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter.

Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson probably was widely known as a benefactor of Harvard university and through his association with the Symphony orchestra.

PRESS
Pittsburgh, Pa.
NOV 28 1919

MAJOR HIGGINSON LEAVES NO MONEY TO ORCHESTRA

Boston, Mass., Nov. 28.—Disappointment has followed the filing of the will of the late Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, in that there was found to be no $1,000,000 bequest to the Boston Symphony orchestra, as had been expected. Maj. Higginson for years had paid the deficits of the orchestra and had indicated that, upon his death, he would provide a fund of at least $1,000,000. Nothing but a lot of musical scores and instruments are left to the organization.

TIMES
Buffalo, N. Y.

MAJ. HIGGINSON, FOUNDER BOSTON SYMPHONY, DEAD

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night, after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday, he would have been 85 years of age.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee Higginson & Company, bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Sentinel
Milwaukee, Wis.

FOUNDER OF BOSTO SYMPHONY PASSES

By The Associated Pr

BOSTON—The death of L Higginson, banker and the Boston Symphony o announced here on Sa the Massachuse

INFORMATION OBSCURED

m TRIBUNE
dress: Providence, R. I. te 254 NOV 17 1919

TAIS HONOR TO HIGGINSON

Harvard University Holds Simple Funeral Services in Appleton Chapel.

Cambridge, Mass., Nov. 17.—Harvard University to-day paid last honors to Henry Lee Higginson, philanthropist and banker who die Friday night. Although the head of a numerous and prominent family, and conspicuous otherwise as the dean of the bankers of Boston, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, veteran of the Civil War and patron of art, all these interests were subordinated in the University's final testimonial to its son. Maj. Higginson was a former student at Harvard, a trustee and a benefactor, the donor of it's athletic plant on Soldiers' Field, and the founder of the Harvard Union, the undergraduates' meeting place.

The services were simple. In Appleton Chapel within the Harvard yard, where Maj. Higinson was married half a century ago, funeral exercises were held while all University activities paused for an hour. Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, a Harvard graduate, conducted the services. The University choir, an undergraduate body, sang, while members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra played. President A. Lawrence Lowell and the Fellows of the University acted as honorary pall bearers. Nephews of Maj. Higginson were actual pall bearers, but surrendered the casket to undergraduates at the chapel door.

From this point the undergraduate bearers, including the captains of most of the major athletic teams and other student leaders bore the body through a double rank of undergraduates, who lined the walk from Appleton Chapel to University Hill, where the hearse awaited. At Mount Auburn Cemetery, Harvard's last word was spoken for its son by Dean James H. Ropes, who conducted a brief burial service. A bugler from the Loyal Legion sounded

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.
NOV 18 1919

HARVARD FUNERAL OF MAJ HIGGINSON

University Fellows and Students Pay Last Honors to Boston Banker and Philanthropist

Cambridve, Nov. 17—Harvard university to-day paid last honors to Henry Lee Higginson, philanthropist and banker, who died Friday night. Although the head of a numerous and prominent family and conspicuous otherwise as the dean of the bankers of Boston, founder if the Boston symphony orchestra, veteran of the civil war and patron of art, all these interests were subordinated in the university's final testimonial to its son. Maj Higginson was a former student at Harvard, a trustee and a benefactor, the giver of its athletic plant on Soldiers' field and the founder of the Harvard Union, the undergraduates' meeting place.

The services were simple. In Appleton chapel, within the Harvard yard, where Maj Higginson was married half a century ago, funeral exercises were held, while all university activities paused for an hour. Rev Samuel M. Crothers, a Harvard graduate, conducted the services. The university choir, an undergraduate body, sang, and members of the Boston symphony orchestra played.

President A. Lawrence Lowell and the fellows of the university acted as honorary bearers. Nephews of Maj Higginson were actual bearers, but surrendered the casket to undergraduates at the chapel doors.

From this point the undergraduate bearers, including the captains of most of the major teams and other student leaders, bore the body through a double rank of undergraduates, who lined the walk from Appleton chapel to University hall, where the hearse was in waiting. At Mount Auburn cemetery, Harvard's last word was spoken for its son by Dean James H. Ropes, who conducted the brief burial service. A bugler from the Loyal Legion sounded "taps."

From Journal-Courier
New Haven, Conn.
X NOV

The Use Of Private Wealth.

THE theory that some men are born with t talent to make money and accumulate just as other men are born with the talent paint pictures or to plan great structures o invent flying machines or create great literar masterpieces—the number in each case bein extremely limited—has its usefulness in a dis cussion over the unequal distribution of dollars Just why critics should pick upon rich me rather than upon great artists has alway passed our comprehension, but we have con cluded that in some mysterious way peopl have convinced themselves that with a purs full of gold all the other extraordinary talent can be garnered.

The theory takes on an additional fascination when the man with a natural faculty for gaining great wealth views the possession of it as a trust to be administered for the happiness of others. It has been rightly said that the world owes its great hospitals of every kind, its museums, its art galleries, its enterprises in behalf of great research work, its important educational institutions, and so on and so on to these men of financial genius, who have exercised to the utmost their talent for wealth making without developing a love of the possession of it. In the absence of any proof worth considering that these advocates of addition, subtraction and division have offered any constructive plan for providing the world with these essentials of civilization, ought not to waste our time in envying th generously disposed owners of fat purses. would be very much more to the general goo if we should consider ourselves lucky to hav them hanging about ready to serve humanity

Major Henry L. Higginson, who died at his home in Boston on Saturday, was one of these men with a talent for money making who at the same time considered himself under the heaviest moral obligations to serve the community. His self imposed task was to organize and support a great orchestra of the best musicians in the world he could hire. It is today one of the greatest musical bands in the world and is known wherever lovers of music dwell as the Boston Symphony Orchestra. What this organization has done to develop a love of music in this country, and through that love to create higher standards of citizenship, living man can begin to compute. can be said literally that our own local hony orchestra is also a child of the great heart of Henry L. Higginson and the be said of like bands all over the ought to be glad that at

From Journal
Providence, R. I.

Providence shared liberally in the musical beneficence of the late Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, whose long-continued support of the Boston Symphony Orchestra constitued him one of the country's most distinguished and generous patrons of music. While Boston was the chief beneficiary, Providence and other New England communities were materially advanced in musical interest through the orchestra's regular visits.

Maj. Higginson not only founded the orchestra and started it on its brilliant career—he carried it along year after year knowing that each season would end with a deficit of from $20,000 to $50,000. In his will he left to the organization $1,00,000.

"It is my desire," he said, when he announced the bequest six years ago, "to have the symphony orchestra benefit all the people; that was my early ambition in founding it, as I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interest is a poor specimen of a citizen. Each year there is a deficit: originally I reckoned on a deficit of $20,000 a season but there have been seasons when the deficit reached $50,000."

One of Maj. Higginson's announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide music of the finest quality for people of small means, and from the beginning he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at 25 cents each. These rehearsals later gave place to the regular Friday afternoon concerts.

The musical service at the Washington Park Methodist Episcopal Church will be given to-day by Miss Minnette Sutherland, soprano; Hervey McNally, tenor; Fred Edgeworth, Jr., bass, and Mrs. Mary Stine, alto, who is also director. The numbers will be: Anthem, "Great and Marvellous," Turner; "Prayer of Thanksgiving," Kremser, and trio, "Praise Ye," Verdi.

SUN
Pittsburgh, Pa.

Henry Lee Higginson.

By his patriotic service in the Civil War, by his philanthropy, by his contributions to education, and by his honorable banking methods, Henry Lee Higginson, who died in Boston Saturday, left the world the better for his having lived in it. But the most conspicuous service he rendered America was the founding and maintenance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has become a model for similar organizations.

Major Higginson, a financier, felt that he could best add to the happiness of his fellow citizens by giving some concrete expression of sympathy for their esthetic needs. A musician himself, he decided that nothing would be more conducive to the cultivation of high ideals and the development of good taste in music

From Journal
Providence, R. I.
NOV 16 1919

H. L. HIGGINSON, BANKER, IS DEAD

Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra Was in 85th Year

DIES AFTER AN OPERATION

Member of Lee, Higginson Company and Widely Known for His Interest in Musical Organizations, Falls Victim to Ailment of Long Standing.

[By the Associated Press]

Boston, Nov. 15.—The death of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced to-day. Maj. Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night following an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Maj. Higginson would have been 85 years of age.

The death of Maj. Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Maj. Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the symphony orchestra, and other musical organizations. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Maj. Higginson was taken to the hospital yesterday afternoon and was operated upon shortly after. During the early evening his condition became worse and death occurred about 8:30. He had been in poor health for some time, never having fully recovered his strength after his previous illness.

Funeral services for Maj. Higginson, who was a member of the Corporation of Harvard University, will be held in Appleton Chapel at the university on Monday at noon. Recitations and lectures in all departments will be suspended from 12 to 1 o'clock on that day.

Two years ago, after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an enemy alien, Maj. Higginson relinquished active direction of the symphony organization, which he had formed in 1881. At the time it was explained that his advanced years made it necessary that he be relieved of the administrative burden. The control of the orchestra, at Maj. Higginson's request, then passed into the hands of a board of trustees, headed by Frederick T. Cabot.

Henry Lee Higignson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year until his death. Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at 25 cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The Symphony Orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby, rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York city, Nov. 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his studies, to enter a countinghouse. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of Major and brevet Lieutenant Colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

In 1890 Maj. Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds, on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1898 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and Doctor of Laws by Yale.

From ESTABLISHED 1881 Bulletin
Providence, R. I.
NOV 15 1919

MAJOR HIGGINSON, BOSTON SYMPHONY FOUNDER, IS DEAD

Banker, Widely Known Through Association with Musical Organizations Succumbs Follow

From

H. L. HIGGINSON, FOUNDER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY, DEAD

Banker and Patron of Music Fails to Rally After Operation

Boston, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night, following an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been 85 years of age.

The death of Major Higginsons was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Company, bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the Symphony Orchestra and other musical organizations. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Major Higginson was taken to the hospital yesterday afternoon and was operated upon shortly after. During the early evening his condition became worse and death occurred about 8:30. He had been in poor health for some time, never having fully recovered his strength after his previous illness.

Major Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year until his death Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at 25 cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The Symphony Orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York City, Nov. 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a countinghouse. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Times
Hartford, Conn.
NOV 15

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROMOTER PASSES

Death in Boston Hospital of Major Henry L. Higginson.

WIDE ACQUAINTANCE IN FINANCE WORLD

Music for the Public His Avowed Hobby—Record in the Civil War.

Boston, November 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was announced to-day. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been 85 years of age.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & company, bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the Symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Major Higginson was taken to the hospital yesterday afternoon and was operated upon shortly after. During the early evening his condition became worse and death occurred about 8:30. He had been in poor health for some time, never having fully recovered his strength after his previous illness.

Boston Symphony Founder.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket.

One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at twenty-five cents each. These "rehearsals in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The Symphony orchestra, Mr Higginson considered his hobby rather than philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were other men of wealth.

Studied At Harvard.

Higginson was born in New York, November 18, 1834, but spent most his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In he went to Vienna, where he ed music for a year. He served three years in the Civil war, was eral times wounded and was discged for disability in 1864, with the of major and brevet lieutenant el. Returning to Boston, he enthe banking business and for years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

1890 Major Higginson presented Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard who were killed in the Civil war, ers' Field, the athletic grounds on t of which the Harvard Stadium stands. Nine years later he made of $150,000 to the university for rection of the Harvard Union. 1893 he had been a member of Harvard corporation and became known to the students through frequent addresses to them. He awarded the degree of Master of by Harvard and that of Doctor ws by Yale.

Funeral Monday.

eral services for Major Higginson, was a member of the corporation rvard university, will be held at ton chapel of the university on ay noon. Recitations and lec- in all departments will be sus- d from 12 to 1 o'clock on that a statement issued at the univerty offices to-day Major Higginson ferred to as one of Harvard's greatt benefactors.

Harvard Expression.

The statement adds: "He gave the arvard union which for many years as been useful as a common meeting ace for Harvard men and as a great ub to which all members of the uniersity are eligible. He also gave oldiers' field. His services as a fel- ow of the corporation are too many nd valuable to recount. His death ill be mourned by Harvard men everyhere."

Karl Muck Episode.

Two years ago after the arrest of r. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an nemy alien, Major Higginson relinuished active direction of the symhony organization. At the time it as explained that his advanced years ade it necessary that he be relieved f the administrative burden. The ontrol of the orchestra at Major Higinson's request then passed into the ands of a board of trustees.

From
Register
New Haven, Conn.

NOV 24 1919

TODAY'S POEM

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON.

Mourn ye, lament
The great, the glorious-hearted.
He the wise in counsel—
He the strong of soul—
Dauntless mid peril,
Stranger to fear—
Alike through storm of battle,
Alike through stress of life—
He the constant leader.
Patriot deeply dear—

Gone is he now, as gone the leaves of autumn;
Gone is he now, his years as garnered sheaves.
Passed is he now to Land of the Departed,
He who saw but half—sees the rounded whole.

Wrap him close, ye colors,
Starry flag above him!
Hark! Up-thrilling fife—
Bugle, roll of drum
Speak of goal achieved
Tell of sunset come.
Far, song-winged they sound it,
Clear voiced taps resound it,
Martial music's pean
"Warrior, welcome home."

—Boston Transcript.

From
Register
New Haven, Conn.

NOV 18 191

A GREAT PATRON OF MUSIC.

Not only the university to which he was so generous a giver, not only the city for which he did so much during his lifetime, but the country is the loser by the death of Major Henry Lee Higginson, soldier, beneficent citizen and patron of the arts, particularly of music. The cause of music in America today suffers a loss greater than either university or city, but fortunate is it indeed that Major Higginson should have accomplished his fondest desire in that field before his death. To him the Boston Symphony orchestra stands and will stand a monument, a memorial recognized in his death as it was recognized as an expression of his desire during his life. Greater than the gift of Soldiers' Field to Harvard, or the endowment of the Harvard Union, was the support of the orchestra, for its effect upon the taste of the entire country. Today the Boston Symphony is known throughout the land as the exponent of the highest in the field of orchestral music. It is the original upon which have been patterned the majority of the orchestras through both east and west, and the endowment plan upon which it was founded, originating with its patrons, nearly 40 years ago, has become the accepted means of bringing to the public enjoyment and uplift which symphonic music alone affords.

If no mention be made of the activities of Major Higginson outside of that of patron of music it is only because those did not concern to such a degree the rest of the country outside of Boston. In his record as brave soldier in war, and of equally brave citizen in peace, leader in the world of finance whose influence was always for the best, patron of the arts and discriminating and generous giver of his substance in his benevolences, Major Higginson typified Bostonian—and American—ideals of citizenship. Such typification was accorded recognition in the honorary degree bestowed upon him by Yale in 1901.

From Journal
Providence, R. I.

NOV 26 1919

WILL OF MAJOR HIGGINSON FILED FOR PROBATE IN HUB

Musical Collection Left in Trust for Three Years.

Boston, Nov. 25.—By the will of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was filed for probate to-day, his library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra are left in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of his executors. The will directs that at the end of not less than three years nor more than five years Mr. Adams must either turn them over to the orchestra or dispose of them by sale.

"I hope," the will says, "the trustee will be guided by the manner in which the Symphony Orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards."

After a few individual bequests, the residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. Among the bequests is one of $10,000 to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Symphony Orchestra. Works of art which Mr. Higginson had loaned to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts are bequeathed to that institution.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 16 19

DEATH CLAIMS FOUNDER OF FAMOUS ORCHESTRA

Major Henry L. Higginson Established Boston Symphony 38 Years Ago.

NEARLY 85 YEARS OF AGE

Boston Banking Firm Head Was Also Widely Known Benefactor of Harvard.

Boston, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson probably was widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year until his death Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at 25 cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The Symphony Orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York city, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the civil war, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

om
R. I.

NOV 26 1919

WILL OF MAJOR HIGGINSON FILED FOR PROBATE IN HUB

Musical Collection Left in Trust for Three Years.

Boston, Nov. 25.—By the will of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was filed for probate to-day, his library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra are left in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of his executors. The will directs that at the end of not less than three years nor more than five years Mr. Adams must either turn them over to the orchestra or dispose of them by sale.

"I hope," the will says, "the tru will be guided by the manner in w
the Symphony Orchestra is condu
and the prospects of its continued e
ence in accordance with high standar

After a few individual bequests,
residue of the estate is left to Mrs.
ginson. Among the bequests is on
$10,000 to Charles A. Ellis, former m ager of the Symphony Orchestra. W of art which Mr. Higginson had lo
to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts bequeathed to that institution.

From
North American
Philadelphia, Pa.

ESTABLISHED 1861 NOV 16 191

MAJ. H. L. HIGGINSON, MUSIC PATRON, DIES

Founded Boston Symphony Orchestra; Made Up Deficits

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts general hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday, he would have been 85 years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Altho head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson probably was widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and thru his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Two years ago, after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the symphony organization, which he had formed in 1881.

Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a revenue. In almost every year until his death Major Higginson made up the deficit.

Major Higginson was born in New York November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house.

In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the civil war and was several times wounded.

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 26 1919

FILE HIGGINSON WILL

Founder of Boston Symphony Leaves Music Library to Orchestra

Boston, Nov. 26.—The will of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston symphony orchestra, was filed for probate yesterday. His library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra, are left to the orchestra in trust. Charles Francis Adams, one of the executors, is trustee.

The residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. A bequest of $10,000 was left to Charles A. Ellis, formerly manager of the s hony orchestra.

n North American
Philadelphia, Pa
NOV 26 1919 E

ORCHESTRA LEFT OUT OF HIGGINSON WILL

No Provision, Altho He Said He Would Leave It Million; Widow Gets Most

BOSTON, Nov. 25.—In the will of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there is no provision made for a bequest or endowment for the orchestra in spite of the fact that during his lifetime Major Higginson had promise that he would leave $1,000,000 to insure the permanence of the organization.

The bulk of the estate is left to Majo Higginson's widow, Ida Agassiz Higginson, outright, if she survives him thirty days after his death. The will states that "in such case I make no financial provision for my said son, because I have entire confidence that my said wife will do what is best for him."

Major Higginson leaves to his son Alexander H. Higginson, his gold watch, sword, personal jewelry, a horse, paintings, ornaments and 80 volumes from the library. The sum of $10,000 is bequeathed to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A codicil to Major Higginson's will dated December 26, 1918, gives $5000 to his daughter-in-law, Higginson.

ESTABLISHED 1861 NOV 26 1919 E

From Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

HIGGINSON WILL FILED

Boston, Nov. 25.—The will of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston symphony orchestra, was filed for probate today. His library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and mu-ical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra, are ft to the orchestra in trust. Charles rancis Adams, one of the executors, trustee.

The residue of the estate is left to rs. Higginson. A bequest of $10,000 as left to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the symphony

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
NOV 25 1919

FOUNDER OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA DEAD

Major Higginson, Noted Banker and Philanthropist, Expires After Operation.

BENEFACTOR OF HARVARD

Special Dispatch to The Star.

Boston, November 15.—Major Henry Lee Higginson, one of the foremost bankers of the United States, and founder of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, died suddenly at the Massachusetts General Hospital at 8:15 o'clock last night.

Major Higginson succumbed suddenly after a surgical operation. He had been ill but a few days of an intestinal disorder.

Through his marriage to Ida Agassiz on December 5, 1863, two great financial houses were united. His son, A. Henry Higginson, is noted in the world of sport as a lover and owner of thoroughbred hunters and running horses. Major Higginson would have been 85 years of age on Tuesday next.

He was born in New York, the son of George and Mary Cabot (Lee) Higginson. He was brought up in Boston and atended Harvard College, but left without being graduated to enter the counting house of S. & E. Austin. He spent one year in Vienna studying music, and when the Civil War broke out entered the army as a second lieutenant of a Massachusetts regiment. He rose to the rank of major and was breveted lieutenant colonel for gallanttry. In August, 1864, he was discharged for disability, having received four wounds.

After the war he managed a cotton plantation near Savannah, but was unsuccessful. He returned to oBston and entered the banking-house of Lee, Higginson & Co., of which he later became the head.

In 1891 he gave Harvard the magnificent athletic ground known as Soldiers' Field, and later donated $150,000 for a college clubhouse, known as the Harvard Union.

His most notable public service was the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which gave its first concert in 1881.

Major Higginson obtained widespread notoriety when he espoused the cause of Karl Muck, conductor of the orchestra, who was accused of disloyalty during the recent war. Major Higginson, however, finally turned against the orchestra leader when charges against him were proven.

North American
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 26 1919 E

WILL PROVIDES FOR ORCHESTRA

Major Higginson Turns Boston Symphony Control Over to Charles Adams.

Boston, Nov. 25.—By the will of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was filed for probate today, his library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra, are left in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of his executors. The will directs that the end of not less than three years nor more than five years Mr. Adams must either turn them over to the orchestra or dispose of them by sale.

"I hope," the will says, "the trustee will be guided by the manner in which the Symphony Orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards."

After a few individual bequests the residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. Among the bequests is one of $10,000 to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Symphony Orchestra. Works of art which Mr. Higginson had loaned to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, are bequeathed to that institution.

lic museum of Boston.

Major Higginson married at Cambridge, Mass., in 1863, Miss Ida Agassiz, a daughter of Professor Louis Agassiz. One son was born, A. Henry Higginson, widely known for his interest in fox hunting. His hounds and horses frequently have been shown at Philadelphia shows.

In the closing months of 1917 Major Higginson was greatly pained by the controversy that arose over Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Orchestra. It resulted in Dr. Muck's internment for pro-German activities. Major Higginson placed great faith in Dr. Muck's promise to refrain from activities in connection with the war, and for a time threatened to disband the orchestra because of the notoriety connected with the conductor.

Dr. Muck was held at a detention camp and was deported only a few weeks ago.

n RECORD
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 26 1919

HIGGINSON WILL FILED

Boston Symphony to Benefit If Properly Conducted.

Boston, Nov. 25.—By the will of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was filed for probate today, his library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra are left in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of his executors. The will directs that at the end of not less than three years nor more than five years Mr. Adams must either turn them over to the orchestra or dispose of them by sale.

"I hope," the will says, "the trustee will be guided by the manner in which the Symphony Orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards."

After a few individual bequests, the residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. Among the bequests is one of $10,000 to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Symphony Orchestra. Works of art which Mr. Higginson had loaned to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts are bequeathed to that institution.

rom
NQUIRER,
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 26 1919

MAJ. HIGGINSON DIES IN BOSTON HOSPITAL

Symphony Orchestra Founder Succumbs After Operation in 84th Year

Philanthropist One of Harvard University's Principal Benefactors

BOSTON,, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson probably was more widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Higginson probably was widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Two years ago after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, an an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the symphony organization which he had formed in 1881.

For the Symphony Orchestra, Major Higginson obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank. They gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world.

Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a revenue. In almost every year until his death Major Higginson made up the deficit.

Major Higginson was born in New York, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house.

In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded, and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union.

Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became well known to the students through frequent addresses. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale. Among the large gifts ma

From Register
New Haven, Conn.

TODAY'S POEM

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON.

Mourn ye, lament
The great, the glorious-hearted.
He the wise in counsel—
He the strong of soul—
Dauntless mid peril,
Stranger to fear
Alike through storm of battle,
Alike through stress of life—
He the constant leader.
Patriot deeply dear—

Gone is he now, as gone the leaves of autumn;
Gone is he now, his years as garnered sheaves.
Passed is he now to Land of the Departed,
He who saw but half—sees the rounded whole.

Wrap him close, ye colors,
Starry flag above him!
Hark! Up-thrilling fife—
Bugle, roll of drum
Speak of goal achieved
Tell of sunset come.
Far, song-winged they sound it,
Clear voiced taps resound it,
Martial music's pean
"Warrior, welcome home."
—Boston Transcript.

From
Register
New Haven, Conn.

A GREAT PATRON OF MUSIC.

Not only the university to which he was so generous a giver, not only the city for which he did so much during his lifetime, but the country is the loser by the death of Major Henry Lee Higginson, soldier, beneficent citizen and patron of the arts, particularly of music. The cause of music in America today suffers a loss greater than either university or city, but fortunate is it indeed that Major Higginson should have accomplished his fondest desire in that field before his death. To him the Boston Symphony orchestra stands and will stand a monument, a memorial recognized in his death as it was recognized as an expression of his desire during his life. Greater than the gift of Soldiers' Field to Harvard, or the endowment of the Harvard Union, was the support of the orchestra, for its effect upon the taste of the entire country. Today the Boston Symphony is known throughout the land as the exponent of the highest in the field of orchestral music. It is the original upon which have been patterned the majority of the orchestras through both east and west, and the endowment plan upon which it was founded, originating with its patrons, nearly 40 years ago, has become the accepted means of bringing to the public enjoyment and uplift which symphonic music alone affords.

If no mention be made of the activities of Major Higginson outside of that of patron of music it is only because those did not concern to such a degree the rest of the country outside of Boston. In his record as brave soldier in war, and of equally brave citizen in peace, leader in the world of finance whose influence was always for the best, patron of the arts and discriminating and generous giver of his substance in his benevolences, Major Higginson typified Bostonian—and American—ideals of citizenship. Such typification was accorded recognition in the honorary degree bestowed upon him by Yale in 1901.

From Journal
Providence, R. I.

WILL OF MAJOR HIGGINSON FILED FOR PROBATE IN HUB

Musical Collection Left in Trust for Three Years.

Boston, Nov. 25.—By the will of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was filed for probate to-day, his library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra are left in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of his executors. The will directs that at the end of not less than three years nor more than five years Mr. Adams must either turn them over to the orchestra or dispose of them by sale.

"I hope," the will says, "the trustee will be guided by the manner in which the Symphony Orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards."

After a few individual bequests, the residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. Among the bequests is one of $10,000 to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Symphony Orchestra. Works of art which Mr. Higginson had loaned to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts are bequeathed to that institution.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 16 19

DEATH CLAIMS FOUNDER OF FAMOUS ORCHESTRA

Major Henry L. Higginson Established Boston Symphony 38 Years Ago.

NEARLY 85 YEARS OF AGE

Boston Banking Firm Head Was Also Widely Known Benefactor of Harvard.

Boston, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson probably was widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year until his death Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at 25 cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The Symphony Orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York city, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the civil war, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

om

WILL OF MAJOR HIGGINSON FILED FOR PROBATE IN HUB

Musical Collection Left in Trust for Three Years.

Boston, Nov. 25.—By the will of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was filed for probate to-day, his library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra are left in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of his executors. The will directs that at the end of not less than three years nor more than five years Mr. Adams must either turn them over to the orchestra or dispose of them by sale.

"I hope," the will says, "the tru will be guided by the manner in wh
the Symphony Orchestra is condu
and the prospects of its continued e
ence in accordance with high standar

After a few individual bequests,
residue of the estate is left to Mrs.
ginson. Among the bequests is on
$10,000 to Charles A. Ellis, former m ager of the Symphony Orchestra. W
of art which Mr. Higginson had lo
to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts
bequeathed to that institution.

ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 16 1917
From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.

MAJ. H. L. HIGGINSON, MUSIC PATRON, DIES

Founded Boston Symphony Orchestra; Made Up Deficits

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts general hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday, he would have been 85 years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Altho head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson probably was widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and thru his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Two years ago, after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the symphony organization, which he had formed in 1881.

Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a revenue. In almost every year until his death Major Higginson made up the deficit.

Major Higginson was born in New York November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house.

In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the civil war and was several times wounded.

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

FILE HIGGINSON WILL

Founder of Boston Symphony Leaves Music Library to Orchestra

Boston, Nov. 26.—The will of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston symphony orchestra, was filed for probate yesterday. His library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra, are left in trust to the orchestra in trust. Charles Francis Adams, one of the executors, is trustee.

The residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. A bequest of $10,000 was left to Charles A. Ellis, formerly manager of the s[illegible] orchestra.

n North American
Philadelphia, Pa

ORCHESTRA LEFT OUT OF HIGGINSON WILL

No Provision, Altho He Said He Would Leave It Million; Widow Gets Most

BOSTON, Nov. 25.—In the will of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there is no provision made for a bequest or endowment for the orchestra in spite of the fact that during his lifetime Major Higginson had promised that he would leave $1,000,000 to insure the permanence of the organization.

The bulk of the estate is left to Major Higginson's widow, Ida Agassiz Higginson, outright, if she survives him thirty days after his death. The will states that "in such case I make no financial provision for my said son, because I have entire confidence that my said wife will do what is best for him."

Major Higginson leaves to his son Alexander H. Higginson, his gold watch, sword, personal jewelry, a horse, paintings, ornaments and 50 volumes from the library. The sum of $10,000 is bequeathed to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A codicil to Major Higginson's will dated December 26, 1918, gives $5000 to his daughter-in-

ESTABLISHED 1881 Higginson.

NOV 26 1919 E
From Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

HIGGINSON WILL FILED

Boston, Nov. 25.—The will of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston symphony orchestra, was filed for probate today. His library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra, are left to the orchestra in trust. Charles Francis Adams, one of the executors, is trustee.

The residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. A bequest of $10,000 was left to Charles A. Ellis, formerly manager of the symphony [illegible]

rom STAR
ddress: Baltimore, Md.
e

FOUNDER OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA DEAD

Major Higginson, Noted Banker and Philanthropist, Expires After Operation.

BENEFACTOR OF HARVARD

Special Dispatch to The Star.

Boston, November 15. — Major Henry Lee Higginson, one of the foremost bankers of the United States, and founder of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, died suddenly at the Massachusetts General Hospital at 8:15 o'clock last night.

Major Higginson succumbed suddenly after a surgical operation. He had been ill but a few days of an intestinal disorder.

Through his marriage to Ida Agassiz on December 5, 1863, two great financial houses were united. His son, A. Henry Higginson, is noted in the world of sport as a lover and owner of thoroughbred hunters and running horses. Major Higginson would have been 85 years of age on Tuesday next.

He was born in New York, the son of George and Mary Cabot (Lee) Higginson. He was brought up in Boston and atended Harvard College, but left without being graduated to enter the counting house of S. & E. Austin. He spent one year in Vienna studying music, and when the Civil War broke out entered the army as a second lieutenant of a Massachusetts regiment. He rose to the rank of major and was breveted lieutenant colonel for gallanttry. In August, 1864, he was discharged for disability, having received four wounds.

After the war he managed a cotton plantation near Savannah, but was unsuccessful. He returned to oBston and entered the banking-house of Lee, Higginson & Co., of which he later became the head.

In 1891 he gave Harvard the magnificent athletic ground known as Soldiers' Field, and later donated $150,000 for a college clubhouse, known as the Harvard Union.

His most notable public service was the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which gave its first concert in 1881.

Major Higginson obtained widespread notoriety when he espoused the cause of Karl Muck, conductor of the orchestra, who was accused of disloyalty during the recent war. Major Higginson, however, finally turned against the orchestra leader when charges against him were proven.

lic museum of Boston.

Major Higginson married at Cambridge, Mass., in 1863, Miss Ida Agassiz, a daughter of Professor Louis Agassiz. One son was born, A. Henry Higginson, widely known for his interest in fox hunting. His hounds and horses frequently have been shown at Philadelphia shows.

In the closing months of 1917 Major Higginson was greatly pained by the controversy that arose over Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Orchestra. It resulted in Dr. Muck's internment for pro-German activities. Major Higginson placed great faith in Dr. Muck's promise to refrain from activities in connection with the war, and for a time threatened to disband the orchestra because of the notoriety connected with the conductor.

Dr. Muck was held at a detention camp and was deported only a few weeks ago.

ess
Philadelphia, Pa.

WILL PROVIDES FOR ORCHESTRA

Major Higginson Turns Boston Symphony Control Over to Charles Adams.

Boston, Nov. 25.—By the will of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was filed for probate today, his library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra, are left in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of his executors. The will directs that the end of not less than three years nor more than five years Mr. Adams must either turn them over to the orchestra or dispose of them by sale.

"I hope," the will says, "the trustee will be guided by the manner in which the Symphony Orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards."

After a few individual bequests the residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. Among the bequests is one of $10,000 to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Symphony Orchestra. Works of art which Mr. Higginson had loaned to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, are bequeathed to that institution.

n RECORD
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 26 1919

HIGGINSON WILL FILED

Boston Symphony to Benefit If Properly Conducted.

Boston, Nov. 25.—By the will of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was filed for probate today, his library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra are left in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of his executors. The will directs that at the end of not less than three years nor more than five years Mr. Adams must either turn them over to the orchestra or dispose of them by sale.

"I hope," the will says, "the trustee will be guided by the manner in which the Symphony Orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards."

After a few individual bequests, the residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. Among the bequests is one of $10,000 to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Symphony Orchestra. Works of art which Mr. Higginson had loaned to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts are bequeathed to that institution.

ron NQUIRER,
Philadelphia, Pa.

MAJ. HIGGINSON DIES IN BOSTON HOSPITAL

Symphony Orchestra Founder Succumbs After Operation in 84th Year

Philanthropist One of Harvard University's Principal Benefactors

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson probably was more widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Two years ago after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, an an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the symphony organization which he had formed in 1881.

For the Symphony Orchestra, Major Higginson obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank. They gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world.

Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a revenue. In almost every year until his death Major Higginson made up the deficit.

Major Higginson was born in New York, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house.

In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded, and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union.

Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became well known to the students through frequent addresses. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by

Among the large gifts mad

From Register
New Haven, Conn.

NOV 24 1915

TODAY'S POEM

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON.

Mourn ye, lament
The great, the glorious-hearted.
He the wise in counsel—
He the strong of soul—
Dauntless mid peril,
Stranger to fear.
Alike through storm of battle,
Alike through stress of life—
He the constant leader.
Patriot deeply dear—

Gone is he now, as gone the leaves of autumn;
Gone is he now, his years as garnered sheaves.
Passed is he now to Land of the Departed,
He who saw but half—sees the rounded whole.

Wrap him close, ye colors,
Starry flag above him!
Hark! Up-thrilling fife—
Bugle, roll of drum
Speak of goal achieved
Tell of sunset come.
Far, song-winged they sound it,
Clear voiced taps resound it,
Martial music's pean
"Warrior, welcome home."

—Boston Transcript.

From
Register
New Haven, Conn. NOV 18 191

A GREAT PATRON OF MUSIC.

Not only the university to which he was so generous a giver, not only the city for which he did so much during his lifetime, but the country is the loser by the death of Major Henry Lee Higginson, soldier, beneficent citizen and patron of the arts, particularly of music. The cause of music in America today suffers a loss greater than either university or city, but fortunate is it indeed that Major Higginson should have accomplished his fondest desire in that field before his death. To him the Boston Symphony orchestra stands and will stand a monument, a memorial recognized in his death as it was recognized as an expression of his desire during his life. Greater than the gift of Soldiers' Field to Harvard, or the endowment of the Harvard Union, was the support of the orchestra, for its effect upon the taste of the entire country. Today the Boston Symphony is known throughout the land as the exponent of the highest in the field of orchestral music. It is the original upon which have been patterned the majority of the orchestras through both east and west, and the endowment plan upon which it was founded, originating with its patrons, nearly 40 years ago, has become the accepted means of bringing to the public enjoyment and uplift which symphonic music alone affords.

If no mention be made of the activities of Major Higginson outside of that of patron of music it is only because those did not concern to such a degree the rest of the country outside of Boston. In his record as brave soldier in war, and of equally brave citizen in peace, leader in the world of finance whose influence was always for the best, patron of the arts and discriminating and generous giver of his substance in his benevolences, Major Higginson typified Bostonian—and American—ideals of citizenship. Such typification was accorded recognition in the honorary degree bestowed upon him by Yale in 1901.

From
Journal NOV 26 1919
Providence, R. I.

WILL OF MAJOR HIGGINSON FILED FOR PROBATE IN HUB

Musical Collection Left in Trust for Three Years.

Boston, Nov. 25.—By the will of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was filed for probate to-day, his library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra are left in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of his executors. The will directs that at the end of not less than three years nor more than five years Mr. Adams must either turn them over to the orchestra or dispose of them by sale.

"I hope," the will says, "the trustee will be guided by the manner in which the Symphony Orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards."

After a few individual bequests, the residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. Among the bequests is one of $10,000 to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Symphony Orchestra. Works of art which Mr. Higginson had loaned to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts are bequeathed to that institution.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 16 19

DEATH CLAIMS FOUNDER OF FAMOUS ORCHESTRA

Major Henry L. Higginson Established Boston Symphony 38 Years Ago.

NEARLY 85 YEARS OF AGE

Boston Banking Firm Head Was Also Widely Known Benefactor of Harvard.

Boston, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson probably was widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year until his death Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at 25 cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The Symphony Orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York city, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the civil war, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

om
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 26 1919

WILL OF MAJOR HIGGINSON FILED FOR PROBATE IN HUB

Musical Collection Left in Trust for Three Years.

Boston, Nov. 25.—By the will of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was filed for probate to-day, his library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra are left in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of his executors. The will directs that at the end of not less than three years nor more than five years Mr. Adams must either turn them over to the orchestra or dispose of them by sale.

"I hope," the will says, "the trustee will be guided by the manner in which the Symphony Orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards."

After a few individual bequests, the residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. Among the bequests is one of $10,000 to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Symphony Orchestra. Works of art which Mr. Higginson had loaned to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts are bequeathed to that institution.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
NOV 16 1919

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.

MAJ. H. L. HIGGINSON, MUSIC PATRON, DIES

Founded Boston Symphony Orchestra; Made Up Deficits

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts general hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday, he would have been 85 years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Altho head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson probably was widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and thru his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Two years ago, after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the symphony organization, which he had formed in 1881.

Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a revenue. In almost every year until his death Major Higginson made up the deficit.

Major Higginson was born in New York November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house.

In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the civil war and was several times wounded.

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 26 1919

FILE HIGGINSON WILL

Founder of Boston Symphony Leaves Music Library to Orchestra

Boston, Nov. 26.—The will of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston symphony orchestra, was filed for probate yesterday. His library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra, are left in trust to the orchestra in trust. Charles Francis Adams, one of the executors, is trustee.

The residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. A bequest of $10,000 was left to Charles A. Ellis, formerly manager of the symphony orchestra.

n North America
Philadelphia, Pa
NOV 26 1919

ORCHESTRA LEFT OUT OF HIGGINSON WILL

No Provision, Altho He Said He Would Leave It Million; Widow Gets Most

BOSTON, Nov. 25.—In the will of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there is no provision made for a bequest or endowment for the orchestra in spite of the fact that during his lifetime Major Higginson had promised that he would leave $1,000,000 to insure the permanence of the organization.

The bulk of the estate is left to Major Higginson's widow, Ida Agassiz Higginson, outright, if she survives him thirty days after his death. The will states that "in such case I make no financial provision for my said son, because I have entire confidence that my said wife will do what is best for him."

Major Higginson leaves to his son Alexander H. Higginson, his gold watch, sword, personal jewelry, a horse, paintings, ornaments and 300 volumes from the library. The sum of $10,000 is bequeathed to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A codicil to Major Higginson's will dated December 26, 1918, gives $5000 to his daughter-in-[illegible] Higginson.

Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

HIGGINSON WILL FILED

Boston, Nov. 25.—The will of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston symphony orchestra, was filed for probate today. His library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra, are left in trust to the orchestra in trust. Charles Francis Adams, one of the executors, is trustee.

The residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. A bequest of $10,000 was left to Charles A. Ellis, formerly manager of the symphony orchestra.

rom STAR
ddress: Baltimore, Md.
NOV 16 1919

FOUNDER OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA DEAD

Major Higginson, Noted Banker and Philanthropist, Expires After Operation.

BENEFACTOR OF HARVARD

Special Dispatch to The Star.

Boston, November 15.—Major Henry Lee Higginson, one of the foremost bankers of the United States, and founder of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, died suddenly at the Massachusetts General Hospital at 8:15 o'clock last night.

Major Higginson succumbed suddenly after a surgical operation. He had been ill but a few days of an intestinal disorder.

Through his marriage to Ida Agassiz on December 5, 1863, two great financial houses were united. His son, A. Henry Higginson, is noted in the world of sport as a lover and owner of thoroughbred hunters and running horses. Major Higginson would have been 85 years of age on Tuesday next.

He was born in New York, the son of George and Mary Cabot (Lee) Higginson. He was brought up in Boston and atended Harvard College, but left without being graduated to enter the counting house of S. & E. Austin. He spent one year in Vienna studying music, and when the Civil War broke out entered the army as a second lieutenant of a Massachusetts regiment. He rose to the rank of major and was breveted lieutenant colonel for gallanttry. In August, 1864, he was discharged for disability, having received four wounds.

After the war he managed a cotton plantation near Savannah, but was unsuccessful. He returned to oBston and entered the banking-house of Lee, Higginson & Co., of which he later became the head.

In 1891 he gave Harvard the magnificent athletic ground known as Soldiers' Field, and later donated $150,000 for a college clubhouse, known as the Harvard Union.

His most notable public service was the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which gave its first concert in 1881.

Major Higginson obtained widespread notoriety when he espoused the cause of Karl Muck, conductor of the orchestra, who was accused of disloyalty during the recent war. Major Higginson, however, finally turned against the orchestra leader when charges against him were proven.

m ess,
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 25 1919 E

WILL PROVIDES FOR ORCHESTRA

Major Higginson Turns Boston Symphony Control Over to Charles Adams.

Boston, Nov. 25.—By the will of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was filed for probate today, his library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra, are left in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of his executors. The will directs that the end of not less than three years nor more than five years Mr. Adams must either turn them over to the orchestra or dispose of them by sale.

"I hope," the will says, "the trustee will be guided by the manner in which the Symphony Orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards."

After a few individual bequests the residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. Among the bequests is one of $10,000 to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Symphony Orchestra. Works of art which Mr. Higginson had loaned to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, are bequeathed to that institution.

lic museum of Boston.

Major Higginson married at Cambridge, Mass., in 1863, Miss Ida Agassiz, a daughter of Professor Louis Agassiz. One son was born, A. Henry Higginson, widely known for his interest in fox hunting. His hounds and horses frequently have been shown at Philadelphia shows.

In the closing months of 1917 Major Higginson was greatly pained by the controversy that arose over Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Orchestra. It resulted in Dr. Muck's internment for pro-German activities. Major Higginson placed great faith in Dr. Muck's promise to refrain from activities in connection with the war, and for a time threatened to disband the orchestra because of the notoriety connected with the conductor.

Dr. Muck was held at a detention camp and was deported only a few weeks ago.

n RECORD
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 26 1919

HIGGINSON WILL FILED

Boston Symphony to Benefit if Properly Conducted.

Boston, Nov. 25.—By the will of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was filed for probate today, his library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra are left in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of his executors. The will directs that at the end of not less than three years nor more than five years Mr. Adams must either turn them over to the orchestra or dispose of them by sale.

"I hope," the will says, "the trustee will be guided by the manner in which the Symphony Orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards."

After a few individual bequests, the residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. Among the bequests is one of $10,000 to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Symphony Orchestra. Works of art which Mr. Higginson had loaned to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts are bequeathed to that institution.

rom
NQUIRER,
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 26 1919

MAJ. HIGGINSON DIES IN BOSTON HOSPITAL

Symphony Orchestra Founder Succumbs After Operation in 84th Year

Philanthropist One of Harvard University's Principal Benefactors

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson probably was more widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Higginson probably was widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Two years ago after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, an an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the symphony organization which he had formed in 1881.

For the Symphony Orchestra, Major Higginson obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank. They gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world.

Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a revenue. In almost every year until his death Major Higginson made up the deficit.

Major Higginson was born in New York, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house.

In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded, and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union.

Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became well known to the students through frequent addresses. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale. Among the large gifts made

rom
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 15 1919

MAJOR HIGGINSON DIES AT BOSTON

Founder of Symphony Orchestra Was Head of Banking Firm and Patron of Harvard

VETERAN OF CIVIL WAR

(By Associated Press.)

Boston, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until Tuesday he would have been eighty-five years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter.

Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson and Company, Major Higginson probably was most widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and backer of the symphony orchestra.

Major Higginson established the Boston Symphony in 1881. He obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank. They gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world.

Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a revenue. In almost every year until his death Major Higginson made up the deficit.

Major Higginson was born in New York, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting-house.

In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded, and was discharged for disability in 1864 with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant-colonel.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harverd men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union.

Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation, and became well known to the students through frequent addresses. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

Among the large gifts made by Major Higginson was $1,500,000 to the public museum of Boston.

Major Higginson married, at Cambridge, Mass., in 1863, Miss Ida Agassiz, a daughter of Professor Louis Agassiz. One son was born, A. Henry Higginson, widely known for his interest in fox hunting. His hounds and horses frequently have been shown at Philadelphia shows.

In the closing months of 1917 Major Higginson was greatly pained by the controversy that arose over Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Orchestra. It resulted in Dr. Muck's internment for pro-German activities. Major Higginson placed great faith in Dr. Muck's promise to refrain from activities in connection with the war, and for a time threatened to disband the orchestra because of the notoriety connected with the conductor.

Dr. Muck was held at a detention camp and was deported only a few weeks ago.

Revelations concerning the career in Boston of Dr. Muck will appear in The Bulletin, beginning Monday. They will show Dr. Muck, in spite of his promises to Major Higginson, was violently anti-American. They also will give interesting revelations of his private life, including the manner in which he deceived a young Boston woman.

From
RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 20 1919

MONEY AND SPIRIT THAT MADE MUSIC

A Financier Who Will Be Remembered for Adventures of the Soul.

HIGGINSON HAD PROBLEMS

It Is Sad His Later Years Were Complicated by War-Feeling.

It seems to us that hardly too much praise can be lavished on such a public-spirited citizen of the domain of art as was Major Henry Lee Higginson. (At last, since his death, we have got his military rank tolerably straightened out. He was a major, and not a colonel, in the Federal Army of our civil war.)

Major Higginson, though an active financier and a tremendously wealthy man, was also a musician. That is to say, he was a "technical" musician, who had studied the art for a year in his young manhood at the then first musical capital of the world, Vienna.

He died a very old man, having lived to see the tragedy of our war with the musical foreign lands he had loved as a boy; and, just before his death, sadly, maybe bitterly, giving up the responsibilities of his backing of the Boston orchestra. Many harsh storms beset him during these almost 40 years of his headship of the magnificent symphonic body he had built up and housed. But also did he achieve much.

The Bigger Career.

For, as Richard Aldrich points out in the New York Times, "his death is deplored, first and foremost, in all the obituary notices of him, as a loss, not to the financial strength of the country, but to the musical world."

This is something to say of a business man. Major Higginson, then past 80 years old, must have been deeply grieved at the position which the break of our war and the rows about Muck put him in. Nobody could question his patriotism; he had been wounded as a soldier in the civil war.

And anybody who knew that he had studied music for a year in Vienna must have made allowance for his probable sympathies in the Teutonic direction, musically at least. Also it was his policy as founder and backer of the orchestra not to interfere with the affairs of the conductor.

True Enthusiasm.

The financier's efforts to make the Boston orchestra as fine as it possibly could be made were extraordinary. For instance, there was one of the conductors who thought he could get a better ensemble tone if all of the violins played were of the same make and quality. Higginson responded immediately to the fantastic suggestion, and at once sent to Germany and imported more than a score of expensive violins by one maker for the experiment. It failed, and the new unified choir of violins was given up.

But here is eloquent proof of the means by which the present Boston Symphony Orchestra rose to its great eminence.

From
Press,
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 16 1919

A PATRON OF MUSIC

The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, of Boston, has removed one of America's most generous and discriminating patrons of music and a philanthropist of national repute. He will be widely and sincerely mourned.

The noblest monument he leaves behind him is undoubtedly the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded some thirty-eight years ago and which he has since supported with unfailing generosity out of his private purse. Himself a musician of ability and taste, he strove from the very beginning to give Boston an orchestra of sterling quality. None but the best players and the ablest conductors would he choose. And so accurate was his choice that before many years had passed the Boston Symphony Orchestra ranked with the foremost in the world. Changes of personnel during the war, culminating in the unfortunate Muck scandal—for which Major Higginson was in no way to blame—worked grave damage to the orchestra's quality. But its founder's enthusiasm never faltered. Only death could interrupt his tireless labors to restore the standard and prestige of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

We have had other American patrons of music since Major Higginson began his splendid work, others equally generous perhaps and equally discriminating. But he was the pioneer. To him goes the credit not only for giving America its first great orchestra, but for setting the example among men of wealth of founding and supporting worthy

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 16 19

MAJOR HIGGINSON DEAD

Founder Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Succumbs To Operation.

Boston, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter.

Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson probably was most widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University through his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

From
ess,
Philadelphia, Pa.

MAJOR HIGGINSON, PATRON OF HARVARD, IS DEAD IN BOSTON

Operation Proves Fatal to Banker and Founder of Symphony Orchestra.

VETERAN OF CIVIL WAR

By Associated Press.

Boston, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higgins, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85-years-old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last Winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Company, bankers Major Higginson probably was widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and through his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Benefactor of Harvard.

Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson and Company, Major Higginson was probably known as a benefactor of Harvard University and backer of the symphony orchestra.

Major Higginson established the Boston Symphony in 1881. He obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank. They gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world.

Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a revenue. In almost every year until his death, Major Higginson made up the deficit.

Major Higginson was born in New York, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting-house.

In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded, and was discharged for disability in 1864 with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant-colonel.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union.

Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation, and became well known to the students through frequent addresses. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

Among the large gifts made by Major Higginson was $1,500,000 to the public museum of Boston.

Major Higginson married, at Cambridge, Mass., in 1863, Miss Ida Agassiz, a daughter of Professor Louis Agassiz. One son was born, A. Henry Higginson, widely known for his interest in fox hunting. His hounds and horses frequently have been shown at Philadelphia shows.

In the closing months of 1917 Major Higginson was greatly pained by the controversy that arose over Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Orchestra. It resulted in Dr. Muck's internment for pro-German activities. Major Higginson placed great faith in Dr. Muck's promise to refrain from activities in connection with the war, and for a time threatened to disband the orchestra because of the notoriety connected with the conductor.

Dr. Muck was held at a detention camp and was deported only a few weeks ago.

From NOV 18 1919
AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

TRIBUTES PAID TO MAJOR HIGGINSON

Cambridge, Mass., November 17.—A distinguished gathering of men prominent in educational and business circles paid final tribute to the memory of Major Henry L. Higginson today at funeral services held in Appleton Chapel, Harvard. Rev. W. G. Crowther officiated. Honorary pallbearers were picked from the undergraduates, each class being represented. Robert W. Emmons II., '20, captain of the baseball team, acted as chief marshal. The student body stood with uncovered heads as the casket passed.

From Public Ledger
Philadelphi Pa.

Major Higginson's Service

AS DOCTOR LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI pointed out at a recent Philadelphia Orchestra meeting, music in America owes to Henry Lee Higginson a debt immeasurable. The Major's constructive record in peace-time matched his service to his country as a soldier. He never spared himself. His first thought was not for his own fortune, but for the good it was in his power to do for his fellow-men. There has not been in our time a more unselfish and disinterested citizen; and men like Mr. Van Rensselaer in this city have found inspiration in his example. Such men as he do not question whether any one else is doing a greater or a better work; they are not rivals but understanding friends. Mr. Higginson did not seek the "credit" of being a pioneer or a pattern; he merely rose up in his place and did his duty, and he goes to his rest and his reward with the blessings of mankind invoked upon his name.

It was hard work and brave work to make that beginning there in Boston. There were many faint hearts, cynics and pessimists to be persuaded and converted. When Boston learned at last that a symphony orchestra was an asset, it became easier to drive that lesson home in other cities.

Mr. Higginson once explained his mainspring motive in words that fit our time and express our duty to Philadelphia and the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1919. He wrote:

"The Civil War taught a great many men that if we were to have a country worthy of the name we must work for it, educate it, as well as fight for it, and this duty lay upon every individual citizen, be it man or woman.

"Such had been the creed of the men with whom I had lived from boyhood; and as most of them were killed in the war, my duty was the greater in order to fill up the gap which their death had left."

Public and press were free to condemn and slow to commend the new establishment; but there was always a hearty popular unanimity from the first in allowing Major Higginson to struggle alone with the enormous annual deficits. The music of Brahms was derided as "the sapient musings of some brilliant idiot," but the coinage of epigrams did not suffice for the running expenses.

This is the great science of Major Higginson—that in sun and storm, through thick and thin, to the end of a long and always honorable lifetime, he kept faith not ...rely with a public that learned to know ...nd to love him, but with his own ideals. ... left not simply a great orchestra, ...e personal example to posterity.

From Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

E NOV 10 1919

HONOR TO WHOM HONOR IS DUE

Theodore Thomas's Place in Musical Progress in America

To the Editor of Public Ledger:

Sir—While agreeing heartily with nearly all of Mr. Stokowski's tribute to Mr. Henry L. Higginson at the Orchestra luncheon on Thursday, I must take issue flatly with him on his statement that "Major Higginson was the foundation of music in America." Mr. Stokowski's youth may make him think so, but older music lovers go back in thought fondly to one who, while not strictly a founder, was a pioneer in promoting the best orchestral music and sowing the seed that was to germinate in such institutions as the Boston Orchestra and our own—I refer to Theodore Thomas. His body of players, a fine organization even according to our present standards, gave splendid concerts in our eastern cities for years, with the appreciation of the few though without the patronage of the many.

Those given here were under the management of Mrs. E. D. Gillespie, a brilliant and far-seeing woman, a descendant of Franklin and a typical Philadelphian. The financial loss in the venture was fortunately overmatched by the artistic gain to the community and the gradual creation of a desire to have such a mode of high enjoyment perpetuated. As a direct result of Mr. Thomas's efforts, the concerts subsequently given here for a number of years by the Boston Orchestra were attended not only by musicians but by the masses as well, and their success naturally led to the endeavor to have an orchestra of our own, an endeavor that speedily grew into a realization, as we all know. But the beginning of a struggle that has ended in this magnificent endowment of nearly $2,000,000 was many, many years back, as I have tried to show.

JOHN H. INGHAM.

Philadelphia, November 7, 1919.

From Etude
Address PHILADELPHIA, P...
Date JAN -- 1920 K

Henry Lee Higginson, philanthropist and music lover, died November 14th, at Boston, Mass., at the age of 85. He was known locally for many years as the generous patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but latterly his name went the length and breadth of the land because of the notorious controversy regarding the conductor, Muck, a German, who treacherously abused the hospitality of the Americans by connivance with the German spy system here at the time of the war. Mr. Higginson, evidently misinformed as to the character of his conductor, came out publicly in staunch support of Muck. But subsequent events proved the truth of the accusations. This no doubt had much to do with shortening the life of the philanthropist, to the regret of ...s both ... and continental

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 22 1919

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

THE death of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, removes a man who stands on a ..., with Theodore Thomas for what he did for music in America. Major Higginson's relation to the Boston Orchestra was peculiar in the fact that is was a hobby with him rather than a philanthropy. He came out with his plan for the Boston Orchestra at just the moment when conditions in America were ripe for such a movement. It was a case of the man, the thought and the opportunity coming together at just the right time, for the old Germania Orchestra, the Handel and Hayden Society, the Harvard concerts and others had paved the way in Boston for the foundation of a great permament orchestra.

Major Higginson was a much better musician personally than any except his close friends knew him to be. He studied piano and composition in Vienna for four years, but whether he ever had the idea of becoming a professional musician is not known, for he permanently injured his hand by too much practice while in a physically weakened condition during his student days and, as he said in a letter at that time, he would "never again be able to play with freedom." However, there is little doubt that his services to the music of his country proved to be greater as things were than they probably would have been in any other musical capacity.

It is unfortunate that the unhappy incidents of the last year of the great organization under Doctor Muck should have happened so near the close of Major Higginson's life, for it cannot but have had a most depressing effect on a man of his age and sensibilities who had been bound up in the welfare of the orchestra for so long a time. However, in its splendid career for thirty years Major Higginson has erected to

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1861

From Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 10 1919

HENRY L. HIGGINSON DIES IN 85TH YEAR

Banker and Boston Symphony Orchestra Founder Succumbs After an Operation

Boston, Nov. 15.—Major Henry Higginson, banker and founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. He would have been eighty-five years old next Tuesday.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson probably was more widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and through his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Two years ago, after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the symphony organization which he had formed in 1881.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe and engaged conductors of the first rank, who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year until his death Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket.

One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at twenty-five cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The symphony orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York city, but passed most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year.

He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he gave $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became widely known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of master of arts by Harvard and that of doctor of laws by Yale.

rom
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 15 1919

MAJOR HIGGINSON DIES AT BOSTON

Founder of Symphony Orchestra Was Head of Banking Firm and Patron of Harvard

VETERAN OF CIVIL WAR

(By Associated Press.)

Boston, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until Tuesday he would have been eighty-five years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter.

Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson and Company, Major Higginson probably was most widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and backer of the symphony orchestra.

Major Higginson established the Boston Symphony in 1881. He obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank. They gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world.

Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a revenue. In almost every year until his death Major Higginson made up the deficit.

Major Higginson was born in New York, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting-house.

In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded, and was discharged for disability in 1864 with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant-colonel.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union.

Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation, and became well known to the students through frequent addresses. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

Among the large gifts made by Major Higginson was $1,500,000 to the public museum of Boston.

Major Higginson married, at Cambridge, Mass., in 1863, Miss Ida Agassiz, a daughter of Professor Louis Agassiz. One son was born, A. Henry Higginson, widely known for his interest in fox hunting. His hounds and horses frequently have been shown at Philadelphia shows.

In the closing months of 1917 Major Higginson was greatly pained by the controversy that arose over Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Orchestra. It resulted in Dr. Muck's internment for pro-German activities. Major Higginson placed great faith in Dr. Muck's promise to refrain from activities in connection with the war, and for a time threatened to disband the orchestra because of the notoriety connected with the conductor.

Dr. Muck was held at a detention camp and was deported only a few weeks ago.

Revelations concerning the career in Boston of Dr. Muck will appear in The Bulletin, beginning Monday. They will show Dr. Muck, in spite of his promises to Major Higginson, was violently anti-American. They also will give interesting revelations of his private life, including the manner in which he deceived a young Boston woman.

From SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date NOV 16

MAJOR HIGGINSON DEAD

Founder Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Succumbs To Operation.

Boston, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson probably was most widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and through his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

RECORD
ss Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 20 1919

MONEY AND SPIRIT THAT MADE MUSIC

A Financier Who Will Be Remembered for Adventures of the Soul.

HIGGINSON HAD PROBLEMS

It Is Sad His Later Years Were Complicated by War-Feeling.

IT seems to us that hardly too much praise can be lavished on such a public-spirited citizen of the domain of art as was Major Henry Lee Higginson. (At last, since his death, we have got his military rank tolerably straightened out. He was a major, and not a colonel, in the Federal Army of our civil war.)

Major Higginson, though an active financier and a tremendously wealthy man, was also a musician. That is to say, he was a "technical" musician, who had studied the art for a year in his young manhood at the then first musical capital of the world, Vienna.

He died a very old man, having lived to see the tragedy of our war with the musical foreign lands he had loved as a boy; and, just before his death, sadly, maybe bitterly, giving up the responsibilities of his backing of the Boston orchestra. Many harsh storms beset him during these almost 40 years of his headship of the magnificent symphonic body he had built up and housed. But also did he achieve much.

The Bigger Career.

For, as Richard Aldrich points out in the New York Times, "his death is deplored, first and foremost, in all the obituary notices of him, as a loss, not to the financial strength of the country, but to the musical world."

This is something to say of a business man. Major Higginson, then past 80 years old, must have been deeply grieved at the position which the break of our war and the rows about Muck put him in. Nobody could question his patriotism; he had been wounded as a soldier in the civil war.

And anybody who knew that he had studied music for a year in Vienna must have made allowance for his probable sympathies in the Teutonic direction, musically at least. Also it was his policy as founder and backer of the orchestra not to interfere with the affairs of the conductor.

True Enthusiasm.

The financier's efforts to make the Boston orchestra as fine as it possibly could be made were extraordinary. For instance, there was one of the conductors who thought he could get a better ensemble tone if all of the violins played were of the same make and quality. Higginson responded immediately to the fantastic suggestion, and at once sent to Germany and imported more than a score of expensive violins by one maker for the experiment. It failed, and the new unified choir of violins was given up.

But here is eloquent proof of the means by which the present Boston Symphony Orchestra rose to its great eminence.

From
Press,
Philadelphia, Pa.

A PATRON OF MUSIC

The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, of Boston, has removed one of America's most generous and discriminating patrons of music and a philanthropist of national repute. He will be widely and sincerely mourned.

The noblest monument he leaves behind him is undoubtedly the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded some thirty-eight years ago and which he has since supported with unfailing generosity out of his private purse. Himself a musician of ability and taste, he strove from the very beginning to give Boston an orchestra of sterling quality. None but the best players and the ablest conductors would he choose. And so accurate was his choice that before many years had passed the Boston Symphony Orchestra ranked with the foremost in the world. Changes of personnel during the war, culminating in the unfortunate Muck scandal—for which Major Higginson was in no way to blame—worked grave damage to the orchestra's quality. But its founder's enthusiasm never faltered. Only death could interrupt his tireless labors to restore the standard and prestige of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

We have had other American patrons of music since Major Higginson began his splendid work, others equally generous perhaps and equally discriminating. But he was the pioneer. To him goes the credit not only for giving America its first great orchestra, but for setting the example among men of wealth of founding and supporting worthy

ess,
Philadelphia, Pa.

MAJOR HIGGINSON, PATRON OF HARVARD, IS DEAD IN BOSTON

Operation Proves Fatal to Banker and Founder of Symphony Orchestra.

VETERAN OF CIVIL WAR

By Associated Press.

Boston, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higgins, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85-years-old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last Winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Company, bankers Major Higginson probably was widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and through his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Benefactor of Harvard.

Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson and Company, Major Higginson was probably known as a benefactor of Harvard University and backer of the symphony orchestra.

Major Higginson established the Boston Symphony in 1881. He obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank. They gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world.

Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a revenue. In almost every year until his death, Major Higginson made up the deficit.

Major Higginson was born in New York, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting-house.

In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded, and was discharged for disability in 1864 with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant-colonel.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union.

Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation, and became well known to the students through frequent addresses. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

Among the large gifts made by Major Higginson was $1,500,000 to the public museum of Boston.

Major Higginson married, at Cambridge, Mass., in 1863, Miss Ida Agassiz, a daughter of Professor Louis Agassiz. One son was born, A. Henry Higginson, widely known for his interest in fox hunting. His hounds and horses frequently have been shown at Philadelphia shows.

In the closing months of 1917 Major Higginson was greatly pained by the controversy that arose over Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Orchestra. It resulted in Dr. Muck's internment for pro-German activities. Major Higginson placed great faith in Dr. Muck's promise to refrain from activities in connection with the war, and for a time threatened to disband the orchestra because of the notoriety connected with the conductor.

Dr. Muck was held at a detention camp and was deported only a few weeks ago.

From AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

TRIBUTES PAID TO MAJOR HIGGINSON

Cambridge, Mass., November 17.—A distinguished gathering of men prominent in educational and business circles paid final tribute to the memory of Major Henry L. Higginson today at funeral services held in Appleton Chapel, Harvard. Rev. W. G. Crowther officiated. Honorary pallbearers were picked from the undergraduates, each class being represented. Robert W. Emmons II., '20, captain of the baseball team, acted as chief marshal. The student body stood with uncovered heads as the casket passed.

From Public Ledger
Philadelphi Pa.

Major Higginson's Service

AS DOCTOR LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI pointed out at a recent Philadelphia Orchestra meeting, music in America owes to Henry Lee Higginson a debt immeasurable. The Major's constructive record in peace-time matched his service to his country as a soldier. He never spared himself. His first thought was not for his own fortune, but for the good it was in his power to do for his fellow-men. There has not been in our time a more unselfish and disinterested citizen; and men like Mr. Van Rensselaer in this city have found inspiration in his example. Such men as he do not question whether any one else is doing a greater or a better work; they are not rivals but understanding friends. Mr. Higginson did not seek the "credit" of being a pioneer or a pattern; he merely rose up in his place and did his duty, and he goes to his rest and his reward with the blessings of mankind invoked upon his name.

It was hard work and brave work to make that beginning there in Boston. There were many faint hearts, cynics and pessimists to be persuaded and converted. When Boston learned at last that a symphony orchestra was an asset, it became easier to drive that lesson home in other cities.

Mr. Higginson once explained his mainspring motive in words that fit our time and express our duty to Philadelphia and the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1919. He wrote:

"The Civil War taught a great many men that if we were to have a country worthy of the name we must work for it, educate it, as well as fight for it, and this duty lay upon every individual citizen, be it man or woman.

"Such had been the creed of the men with whom I had lived from boyhood; and as most of them were killed in the war, my duty was the greater in order to fill up the gap which their death had left."

Public and press were free to condemn and slow to commend the new establishment; but there was always a hearty popular unanimity from the first in allowing Major Higginson to struggle alone with the enormous annual deficits. The music of Brahms was derided as "the sapient musings of some brilliant idiot," but the coinage of epigrams did not suffice for the running expenses.

This is the great science of Major Higginson—that in sun and storm, through thick and thin, to the end of a long and always honorable lifetime, he kept faith not rely with a public that learned to know and to love him, but with his own ideals. left not simply a great orchestra, le personal example to posterity.

From Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 20 19

HONOR TO WHOM HONOR IS DUE

Theodore Thomas's Place in Musical Progress in America

To the Editor of Public Ledger:

Sir—While agreeing heartily with nearly all of Mr. Stokowski's tribute to Mr. Henry L. Higginson at the Orchestra luncheon on Thursday, I must take issue flatly with him on his statement that "Major Higginson was the foundation of music in America." Mr. Stokowski's youth may make him think so, but older music lovers go back in thought fondly to one who, while not strictly a founder, was a pioneer in promoting the best orchestral music and sowing the seed that was to germinate in such institutions as the Boston Orchestra and our own—I refer to Theodore Thomas. His body of players, a fine organization even according to our present standards, gave splendid concerts in our eastern cities for years, with the appreciation of the few though without the patronage of the many.

Those given here were under the management of Mrs. E. D. Gillespie, a brilliant and far-seeing woman, a descendant of Franklin and a typical Philadelphian. The financial loss in the venture was fortunately overmatched by the artistic gain to the community and the gradual creation of a desire to have such a mode of high enjoyment perpetuated. As a direct result of Mr. Thomas's efforts, the concerts subsequently given here for a number of years by the Boston Orchestra were attended not only by musicians but by the masses as well, and their success naturally led to the endeavor to have an orchestra of our own, an endeavor that speedily grew into a realization, as we all know. But the beginning of a struggle that has ended in this magnificent endowment of nearly $2,000,000 was many, many years back, as I have tried to show.

JOHN H. INGHAM.

Philadelphia, November 7, 1919.

From Ledger

Address PHILADELPHIA, P

Date JAN -- 1920 K

Henry Lee Higginson, philanthropist and music lover, died November 14th, at Boston, Mass., at the age of 85. He was known locally for many years as the generous patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but latterly his name went the length and breadth of the land because of the notorious controversy regarding the conductor, Muck, a German, who treacherously abused the hospitality of the Americans by connivance with the German spy system here at the time of the war. Mr. Higginson, evidently misinformed as to the character of his conductor, came out publicly in staunch support of Muck. But subsequent events proved the truth of the accusations. This no doubt had much to do with shortening the life of the philanthropist, to the regret of rs both [illegible]

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 22 1919

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

THE death of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, removes a man who stands on a par with Theodore Thomas for what he did for music in America. Major Higginson's relation to the Boston Orchestra was peculiar in the fact that is was a hobby with him rather than a philanthropy. He came out with his plan for the Boston Orchestra at just the moment when conditions in America were ripe for such a movement. It was a case of the man, the thought and the opportunity coming together at just the right time, for the old Germania Orchestra, the Handel and Hayden Society, the Harvard concerts and others had paved the way in Boston for the foundation of a great permament orchestra.

Major Higginson was a much better musician personally than any except his close friends knew him to be. He studied piano and composition in Vienna for four years, but whether he ever had the idea of becoming a professional musician is not known, for he permanently injured his hand by too much practice while in a physically weakened condition during his student days and, as he said in a letter at that time, he would "never again be able to play with freedom." However, there is little doubt that his services to the music of his country proved to be greater as things were than they probably would have been in any other musical capacity.

It is unfortunate that the unhappy incidents of the last year of the great organization under Doctor Muck should have happened so near the close of Major Higginson's life, for it cannot but have had a most depressing effect on a man of his age and sensibilities who had been bound up in the welfare of the orchestra for so long a time. However, in its splendid career for thirty years Major Higginson has erected to

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

HENRY L. HIGGINSON DIES IN 85TH YEAR

Banker and Boston Symphony Orchestra Founder Succumbs After an Operation

Boston, Nov. 15.—Major Henry Higginson, banker and founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. He would have been eighty-five years old next Tuesday.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson probably was more widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and through his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Two years ago, after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the symphony organization which he had formed in 1881.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe and engaged conductors of the first rank, who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year until his death Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket.

One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at twenty-five cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The symphony orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York city, but passed most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year.

He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he gave $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became widely known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of master of arts by Harvard and that of doctor of laws by Yale.

From Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 15 1919

MAJOR HIGGINSON DIES AT BOSTON

Founder of Symphony Orchestra Was Head of Banking Firm and Patron of Harvard

VETERAN OF CIVIL WAR

(By Associated Press.)

Boston, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until Tuesday he would have been eighty-five years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter.

Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson and Company, Major Higginson probably was most widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and backer of the symphony orchestra.

Major Higginson established the Boston Symphony in 1881. He obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank. They gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world.

Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a revenue. In almost every year until his death Major Higginson made up the deficit.

Major Higginson was born in New York, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting-house.

In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded, and was discharged for disability in 1864 with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant-colonel.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harverd men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union.

Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation, and became well known to the students through frequent addresses. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

Among the large gifts made by Major Higginson was $1,500,000 to the public museum of Boston.

Major Higginson married, at Cambridge, Mass., in 1863, Miss Ida Agassiz, a daughter of Professor Louis Agassiz. One son was born, A. Henry Higginson, widely known for his interest in fox hunting. His hounds and horses frequently have been shown at Philadelphia shows.

In the closing months of 1917 Major Higginson was greatly pained by the controversy that arose over Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Orchestra. It resulted in Dr. Muck's internment for pro-German activities. Major Higginson placed great faith in Dr. Muck's promise to refrain from activities in connection with the war, and for a time threatened to disband the orchestra because of the notoriety connected with the conductor.

Dr. Muck was held at a detention camp and was deported only a few weeks ago.

Revelations concerning the career in Boston of Dr. Muck will appear in The Bulletin, beginning Monday. They will show Dr. Muck, in spite of his promises to Major Higginson, was violently anti-American. They also will give interesting revelations of his private life, including the manner in which he deceived a young Boston woman.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 10

MAJOR HIGGINSON DEAD

Founder Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Succumbs To Operation.

Boston, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson probably was most widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and through his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

RECORD
ss Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 20 1919

MONEY AND SPIRIT THAT MADE MUSIC

A Financier Who Will Be Remembered for Adventures of the Soul.

HIGGINSON HAD PROBLEMS

It Is Sad His Later Years Were Complicated by War-Feeling.

It seems to us that hardly too much praise can be lavished on such a public-spirited citizen of the domain of art as was Major Henry Lee Higginson. (At last, since his death, we have got his military rank tolerably straightened out. He was a major, and not a colonel, in the Federal Army of our civil war.)

Major Higginson, though an active financier and a tremendously wealthy man, was also a musician. That is to say, he was a "technical" musician, who had studied the art for a year in his young manhood at the then first musical capital of the world, Vienna.

He died a very old man, having lived to see the tragedy of our war with the musical foreign lands he had loved as a boy; and, just before his death, sadly, maybe bitterly, giving up the responsibilities of his backing of the Boston orchestra. Many harsh storms beset him during these almost 40 years of his headship of the magnificent symphonic body he had built up and housed. But also did he achieve much.

The Bigger Career.

For, as Richard Aldrich points out in the New York Times, "his death is deplored, first and foremost, in all the obituary notices of him, as a loss, not to the financial strength of the country, but to the musical world."

This is something to say of a business man. Major Higginson, then past 80 years old, must have been deeply grieved at the position which the break of our war and the rows about Muck put him in. Nobody could question his patriotism; he had been wounded as a soldier in the civil war.

And anybody who knew that he had studied music for a year in Vienna must have made allowance for his probable sympathies in the Teutonic direction, musically at least. Also it was his policy as founder and backer of the orchestra not to interfere with the affairs of the conductor.

True Enthusiasm.

The financier's efforts to make the Boston orchestra as fine as it possibly could be made were extraordinary. For instance, there was one of the conductors who thought he could get a better ensemble tone if all of the violins played were of the same make and quality. Higginson responded immediately to the fantastic suggestion, and at once sent to Germany and imported more than a score of expensive violins by one maker for the experiment. It failed, and the new unified choir of violins was given up.

But here is eloquent proof of the means by which the present Boston Symphony Orchestra rose to its great eminence.

From Press,
Philadelphia, Pa.

A PATRON OF MUSIC

The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, of Boston, has removed one of America's most generous and discriminating patrons of music and a philanthropist of national repute. He will be widely and sincerely mourned.

The noblest monument he leaves behind him is undoubtedly the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded some thirty-eight years ago and which he has since supported with unfailing generosity out of his private purse. Himself a musician of ability and taste, he strove from the very beginning to give Boston an orchestra of sterling quality. None but the best players and the ablest conductors would he choose. And so accurate was his choice that before many years had passed the Boston Symphony Orchestra ranked with the foremost in the world. Changes of personnel during the war, culminating in the unfortunate Muck scandal—for which Major Higginson was in no way to blame—worked grave damage to the orchestra's quality. But its founder's enthusiasm never faltered. Only death could interrupt his tireless labors to restore the standard and prestige of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

We have had other American patrons of music since Major Higginson began his splendid work, others equally generous perhaps and equally discriminating. But he was the pioneer. To him goes the credit not only for giving America its first great orchestra, but for setting the example among men of wealth of founding and supporting worthy ss,

Philadelphia, Pa.

MAJOR HIGGINSON, PATRON OF HARVARD, IS DEAD IN BOSTON

Operation Proves Fatal to Banker and Founder of Symphony Orchestra.

VETERAN OF CIVIL WAR

By Associated Press.

Boston, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higgins, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. He died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. Had he lived until next Tuesday he would have been 85 years-old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last Winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Company, bankers Major Higginson probably was widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and through his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Benefactor of Harvard.

Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson and Company, Major Higginson was probably known as a benefactor of Harvard University and backer of the symphony orchestra.

Major Higginson established the Boston Symphony in 1881. He obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank. They gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world.

Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a revenue. In almost every year until his death, Major Higginson made up the deficit.

Major Higginson was born in New York, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting-house.

In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded, and was discharged for disability in 1864 with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant-colonel.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union.

Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation, and became well known to the students through frequent addresses. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

Among the large gifts made by Major Higginson was $1,500,000 to the public museum of Boston.

Major Higginson married, at Cambridge, Mass., in 1863, Miss Ida Agassiz, a daughter of Professor Louis Agassiz. One son was born, A. Henry Higginson, widely known for his interest in fox hunting. His hounds and horses frequently have been shown at Philadelphia shows.

In the closing months of 1917 Major Higginson was greatly pained by the controversy that arose over Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Orchestra. It resulted in Dr. Muck's internment for pro-German activities. Major Higginson placed great faith in Dr. Muck's promise to refrain from activities in connection with the war, and for a time threatened to disband the orchestra because of the notoriety connected with the conductor.

Dr. Muck was held at a detention camp and was deported only a few weeks ago.

From AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

TRIBUTES PAID TO MAJOR HIGGINSON

Cambridge, Mass., November 17.—A distinguished gathering of men prominent in educational and business circles paid final tribute to the memory of Major Henry L. Higginson today at funeral services held in Appleton Chapel, Harvard. Rev. W. G. Crowther officiated. Honorary pallbearers were picked from the undergraduates, each class being represented. Robert W. Emmons II., '20, captain of the baseball team, acted as chief marshal. The student body stood with uncovered heads as the casket passed.

From Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

Major Higginson's Service

AS DOCTOR LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI pointed out at a recent Philadelphia Orchestra meeting, music in America owes to Henry Lee Higginson a debt immeasurable. The Major's constructive record in peace-time matched his service to his country as a soldier. He never spared himself. His first thought was not for his own fortune, but for the good it was in his power to do for his fellow-men. There has not been in our time a more unselfish and disinterested citizen; and men like Mr. Van Rensselaer in this city have found inspiration in his example. Such men as he do not question whether any one else is doing a greater or a better work; they are not rivals but understanding friends. Mr. Higginson did not seek the "credit" of being a pioneer or a pattern; he merely rose up in his place and did his duty, and he goes to his rest and his reward with the blessings of mankind invoked upon his name.

It was hard work and brave work to make that beginning there in Boston. There were many faint hearts, cynics and pessimists to be persuaded and converted. When Boston learned at last that a symphony orchestra was an asset, it became easier to drive that lesson home in other cities.

Mr. Higginson once explained his mainspring motive in words that fit our time and express our duty to Philadelphia and the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1919. He wrote:

"The Civil War taught a great many men that if we were to have a country worthy of the name we must work for it, educate it, as well as fight for it, and this duty lay upon every individual citizen, be it man or woman.

"Such had been the creed of the men with whom I had lived from boyhood; and as most of them were killed in the war, my duty was the greater in order to fill up the gap which their death had left."

Public and press were free to condemn and slow to commend the new establishment; but there was always a hearty popular unanimity from the first in allowing Major Higginson to struggle alone with the enormous annual deficits. The music of Brahms was derided as "the sapient musings of some brilliant idiot," but the coinage of epigrams did not suffice for the running expenses.

This is the great science of Major Higginson—that in sun and storm, through thick and thin, to the end of a long and always honorable lifetime, he kept faith not [illegible]rely with a public that learned to know [illegible]nd to love him, but with his own ideals. [illegible] left not simply a great orchestra, [illegible]le personal example to posterity.

From Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 10 1919

HONOR TO WHOM HONOR IS DUE

Theodore Thomas's Place in Musical Progress in America

To the Editor of Public Ledger:

Sir—While agreeing heartily with nearly all of Mr. Stokowski's tribute to Mr. Henry L. Higginson at the Orchestra luncheon on Thursday, I must take issue flatly with him on his statement that "Major Higginson was the foundation of music in America." Mr. Stokowski's youth may make him think so, but older music lovers go back in thought fondly to one who, while not strictly a founder, was a pioneer in promoting the best orchestral music and sowing the seed that was to germinate in such institutions as the Boston Orchestra and our own—I refer to Theodore Thomas. His body of players, a fine organization even according to our present standards, gave splendid concerts in [illegible]ir eastern cities for years, with the appre[illegible]tion of the few though without the [illegible]tronage of the many.

[illegible]hose given here were under the manage[illegible]e [illegible]t of Mrs. E. D. Gil'espie, a brilliant and [illegible]nu[illegible]seeing woman, a descendant of Frank[illegible]s [illegible]nd a typical Philadelphian. The finan[illegible]tr[illegible]loss in the venture was fortunately [illegible]apatched by the artistic gain to the com[illegible]st [illegible]y and the gradual creation of a desire [illegible]ullv[illegible] such a mode of high enjoyment per[illegible]whi[illegible]ed. As a direct result of Mr. [illegible]or [illegible]n's efforts, the concerts subsequently [illegible]hin[illegible]here for a number of years by the [illegible] Orchestra were attended not only b[illegible]ns but by the masses as well, and [illegible]nt[illegible]success naturally led to the endeavor [illegible]st [illegible]an orchestra of our own, an endeavor [illegible]de[illegible]eedily grew into a realization, as we [illegible]m[illegible]w. But the beginning of a struggle [illegible]s [illegible]s ended in this magnificent endow[illegible]m[illegible]nearly $2,000,000 was many, many [illegible]t[illegible]tick, as I have tried to show.

JOHN H. INGHAM.

[illegible]lphia, November 7, 1919.

From Etude
Address PHILADELPHIA, P[illegible]
Date JAN -- 1920 K

Henry Lee Higginson, philanthropist and music lover, died November 14th, at Boston, Mass., at the age of 85. He was known locally for many years as the generous patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but latterly his name went the length and breadth of the land because of the notorious controversy regarding the conductor, Muck, a German, who treacherously abused the hospitality of the Americans by connivance with the German spy system here at the time of the war. Mr. Higginson, evidently misinformed as to the character of his conductor, came out publicly in staunch support of Muck. But subsequent events proved the truth of the accusations. This no doubt had much to do with shortening the life of the philanthropist, to the regret of [illegible]rs both [illegible]cal and continental

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 22 1919

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

THE death of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, removes a man who stands on a [illegible], with Theodore Thomas for what he did for music in America. Major Higginson's relation to the Boston Orchestra was peculiar in the fact that is was a hobby with him rather than a philanthropy. He came out with his plan for the Boston Orchestra at just the moment when conditions in America were ripe for such a movement. It was a case of the man, the thought and the opportunity coming together at just the right time, for the old Germania Orchestra, the Handel and Hayden Society, the Harvard concerts and others had paved the way in Boston for the foundation of a great permament orchestra.

Major Higginson was a much better musician personally than any except his close friends knew him to be. He studied piano and composition in Vienna for four years, but whether he ever had the idea of becoming a professional musician is not known, for he permanently injured his hand by too much practice while in a physically weakened condition during his student days and, as he said in a letter at that time, he would "never again be able to play with freedom." However, there is little doubt that his services to the music of his country proved to be greater as things were than they probably would have been in any other musical capacity.

It is unfortunate that the unhappy incidents of the last year of the great organization under Doctor Muck should have happened so near the close of Major Higginson's life, for it cannot but have had a most depressing effect on a man of his age and sensibilities who had been bound up in the welfare of the orchestra for so long a time. However, in its splendid career for thirty years Major Higginson has erected to

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

HENRY L. HIGGINSON DIES IN 85TH YEAR

Banker and Boston Symphony Orchestra Founder Succumbs After an Operation

Boston, Nov. 15.—Major Henry Higginson, banker and founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation. He would have been eighty-five years old next Tuesday.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson probably was more widely known as a benefactor of Harvard University and through his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Two years ago, after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the symphony organization which he had formed in 1881.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe and engaged conductors of the first rank, who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year until his death Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket.

One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at twenty-five cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The symphony orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York city, but passed most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year.

He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel.

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he gave $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became widely known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of master of arts by Harvard and that of doctor of laws by Yale.

n HERALD
ress New York City
NOV 18 1918

Major Higginson Buried at Harvard with High Honors

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Monday.—Harvard University today paid last honors to Major Henry Lee Higginson, philanthropist and banker, who died Friday night. Although the head of a numerous and prominent family and conspicuous otherwise as the dean of the bankers of Boston, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, veteran of the civil war and patron of art, all these interests were subordinated in the university's final testimonial to its son. Major Higginson was a former student of Harvard, a trustee and benefactor, the donor of its athletic plant on Soldiers' Field and the founder of the Harvard Union, the undergraduates' meeting place.

In Appleton Chapel, within the Harvard yard, where Major Higginson was married half a century ago, funeral exercises were held, while at the university activities paused for an hour. The Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, a Harvard graduate, conducted the exercises. The university choir, an undergraduate body, sang, and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra played. Dr. A. Lawrence Lowell, president, and the Fellows of the university acted as honorary pallbearers. Nephews of Major Higginson were actual pallbearers, but surrendered the coffin to undergraduates at the chapel door.

From HERALD
Address New York City
Date

MAJOR HENRY L. HIGGINSON.

A solid man of Boston in the banking business, a gallant soldier of the civil war, a student of Harvard whom his university delighted to honor and a native son of this city, Major Henry L. Higginson was for the world of music what the great collectors have been for the world of the fine arts.

Himself a trained musician, he established the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, under one famous conductor after another, set a pace for all other organizations with similar aims everywhere.

To this active man of affairs the orchestra supplied all the excitement that others get out of a racing stable, a yacht, a gallery full of pictures or of Chinese porcelains or a library full of first editions.

Major Higginson's memory will be kept alive by the Symphony Orchestra—and it has belonged to New York almost as much as to Boston—even if his gifts to Harvard of Soldiers' Field and the Union should be forgotten.

From TELEGRAM
Address New York City
Date

MUSIC LIBRARY LEFT TO ORCHESTRA BY HIGGINSON

BOSTON, Wednesday—There are but few public bequests contained in the will of Major Henry L. Higginson, which was filed today in the Probate Court. The bulk of his property is left to his wife, Ida Agassiz Higginson, outright. The will explains that no financial provision is made for Major Higginson's son, Alexander H., "because I have entire confidence that my wife will do what is best for him."

Charles Francis Adams, one of the executors, is to get the library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the musical instruments owned by him and used by the members of the orchestra, but he is to hold these in trust for the benefit of the orchestra, to be turned over to the orchestra or sold within five years.

From
EVENING WORLD,
New York City

MUSIC LIBRARY IN TRUST.

Higginson Executor May Give It to Orchestra in Three Years.

BOSTON, Nov. 26.—By the will of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was filed for probate to-day, his library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra, are left in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of his executors. The will directs that at the end of not less than three years nor more than five, Mr. Adams either must turn them over to the orchestra or sell them.

"I hope," the will says, "the trustee will be guided by the manner in which the symphony orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards."

After a few individual bequests the residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. Among the bequests is one of $1,000 to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the symphony orchestra. Works which Mr. Higginson left to the Museum of Fine Arts are bequeathed to that institution.

From Times
New York City
NOV 26 1919

ORCHESTRA IGNORED IN HIGGINSON'S WILL

To Widow Is Left the Bulk of Major's Estate—Charles A. Ellis Gets $10,000.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., Nov. 25.—In the will of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there is no provision made for a bequest or endowment for the orchestra in spite of the fact that during his lifetime Major Higginson had promised that he would leave $1,000,000 to insure the permanence of the organization.

Although the orchestra is left out of the will, which was filed in the Probate Court here today, it is thought that Major Higginson may have made some provision before his death, and that these plans have not yet been made public.

The will is dated Oct. 19, 1918, and the executors are named as Clift Rogers Clapp of Newton and Charles Francis Adams of Concord, Mass.

The bulk of the estate is left outright to Major Higginson's widow, Ida Agassiz Higginson, if she survives him thirty days after his death. The will states that "in such case I make no financial provision for my said son, because I have entire confidence that my said wife will do what is best for him."

Major Higginson leaves to his son, Alexander H. Higginson, his gold watch, sword, personal jewelry, a horse, paintings, ornaments and 300 volumes from the library.

The sum of $10,000 is bequeathed to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A codicil to Major Higginson's will gives $5,000 to his daughter-in-law, Jean Higginson.

From Morning T
N...

Major Higginson's Library

The will of Major Hig... he Union, took a crotchety position founder of the Boston Sym... n an unnecessary and absurd conchestra, gives his library of ... ict between love for absolute music sisting of musical scores and ... d love for country. That will all by orchestra and musical ... forgotten. Higginson is dead, owned by him, in trust to Cha... America still lives, and the Boscis Adams, one of his executors. ... t Symphony Orchestra also sur-end of three years these must ... vs.
over to the orchestra or disp...
sale.

Zandt Sons...

From TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.
Date

Henry L. Higginson, Eminent Bostonian, Dies in Hospital

BOSTON, Saturday.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours.

...ext Tuesday Major ...e been eighty-five

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

To Endowment for Boston.

In the will of the late Henry Lee ...iggin...on, founder and, until his with-...awal in the midst of the Dr. Muck ...troversy, principal sustainer of the ...ston Symphony Orchestra, no pro-...on was made for the orchestra's en-...ment. Major Higginson had made ...ecret of his original intention to pro-... a fund of $1,600,000 for the or-...tra.

NEW YORK COMMERCIAL
...ss: New York City

From
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 16 19...

He Gave Us the Symphony Orchestra

We have symphony orchestras all over the country now, several of which play in New York every season. Forty years ago there was not one that had an adequate endowment. The only opportunity to hear symphonic music was given by organizations on a precarious financial footing, struggling to win favor from a doubtful and uninstructed public.

Major Henry L. Higginson, who just died in Boston when nearing his eighty-fifth birthday, was the founder of established symphonic musical performances in the United States. He made the Boston Symphony by a lavish and continuing expenditure of money from his private means year after year. His idea was magnificent, and he never relaxed it. For a score of years before the war, when musical art was receiving most opulent support everywhere, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the best in the world. To-day, amid all the wreck and dislocation of the apparatus of civilization, it is unexcelled.

Let us honor the memory of the man who did a great thing to bring happiness to millions of people.

Not all of those millions know the name of Higginson, but if it had not been for him a world of delight and spiritual satisfaction in which they now find joy would have been closed to them. Two years ago Major Higginson, himself a gallant soldier for

From SUN
...ss New York City
...te

HARVARD FUNERAL ... FOR MAJ. HIGGINSON

University Pays Last Honors to Boston Philanthropist.

Special Despatch to THE SUN.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Nov. 17.—Harvard University paid tribute to-day to the memory of Major Henry Lee Higginson of Boston, who died Friday night. Funeral services were held in Appleton Chapel at Harvard. The assemblage of mourners was representative of all that is best in Boston and Harvard life. Leaders and students of the university, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Major Higginson founded and nurtured, representatives of the Loyal Legion, men from State street, where he was so long a commanding figure, and a host of others indicative of the widespread interests and influence of Major Higginson, gathered to do him honor.

The services, severely plain, were conducted at noon by the Rev. Samuel McChord Crothers of Cambridge. The Boston Symphony Orchestra played and the Harvard choir sang funeral selections. The pallbearers were Presidents Lowell and Eliot and the following Fellows of the corporation: Dr. Henry Walcott, Bishop William Lawrence, Thomas N. Perkins, Charles F. Adams and John F. M. Moors. They preceded the casket from the chapel to University Hall, marching through a double file of undergraduates, who stood with bared heads.

The following undergraduates carried the casket: Robert Emmons of Brookline, captain of the baseball team; Fifield Workum of New York, president of the Crimson; Norman Walker of New York, captain of the hockey team; Wendell Davis of New York, captain of the crew; Charles C. Buell of Hartford, Conn., captain of the freshman football team, and John N. Borland of New York, president of the sophomore class. The actual pallbearers included six nephews of the dead man—Barrett Wendell, Jr., and Charles Jackson of the Harvard Alumni Association.

Interment services were held at the cemetery by the Rev. James H. Ropes of Harvard, and as the coffin was lowered a bugler sounded taps.

Among those who attended the chapel services were Senator John W. Weeks, Owen Wister of Philadelphia, Thomas W. Lawson, Mayor Peters of Boston, Judge Robert Grant, W. Cameron Forbes, President McLaurin of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and Howard Elliott.

MAJOR HIGGINSON DEAD

Banker and Founder of Orchestra Was 84 Years of Age.

Boston, Nov. 16.—Major Henry Lee Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead, following an operation. The head of the firm of Lee Higginson & Co. was eighty-four years of age.

On Friday he was taken from his home on Commonwealth avenue to the hospital. His condition became so serious that an immediate operation was deemed necessary. The cause of death was a blood clot on the brain, according to his physician, Dr. F. G. Balch.

n EAGLE
ress Brooklyn, N. Y.
e ...

MAJ. H. L. HIGGINSON, BOSTON BANKER, DIES

Founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Gave It $1,000,000 Endowment.

Boston, Nov. 15—The death of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. Maj. Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday, Maj. Higginson would have been 85 years of age.

The death of Maj. Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Maj. Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Maj. Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year Maj. Higginson made up the deficit from h's own pocket. He finally gave the orchestra an endowment of $1,000,000. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means.

Maj. Higginson was born in New York City on Nov. 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864 with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

...ress EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N.Y.
Date 207 NOV 16 1918

A TRUE FRIEND OF MUSIC.

The death of Colonel Henry L. Higginson of Boston will be mourned wherever good music is loved. Colonel Higginson is the man who organized the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881, supported it through a period when not even in Boston was there following enough to make its concerts self-supporting, sent it through the country until it established a standard of excellence for orchestral performance unknown elsewhere, and finally, a few years before his death, endowed it so substantially that its work can go on indefinitely, with little regard to box-office returns.

The music-lovers of the country owe more to Colonel Higginson than to any other man except Theodore Thomas. Mr. Thomas established a high standard of orchestral music and built up a following for it in this country under financial difficulties which Colonel Higginson knew nothing about. Having no fortune, Mr. Thomas was under the necessity of making his concerts pay, and he had to begin with a large proportion of popular music and to make the masterpieces liked through his own genius as a conductor. Colonel Higginson, a music-lover ready to spend in musical education the fortune he made as a banker, was able to take up the work which Thomas had begun under such difficulties. He engaged the best orchestral performers, supplied them in many cases with rare instruments, put them under the control of eminent conductors, beginning with Nikisch and Henschel, and instructed them to insist on a standard of perfect performance regardless of the public response. What such an opportunity meant to a poet like Nikisch and to a drillmaster like Gericke is known to older music-lovers because they saw what those men did with this incomparable band in its formative years.

That work began nearly forty years ago and for the first half of that period the public response was far from adequate. About the beginning of this century Colonel Higginson's enthusiasm began to bear fruit. The policy of endowing orchestras began to spread, and here in New York we have the old Philharmonic and the newer Symphony orchestras with financial support which enables them to approach the Boston standard of excellence. Half a dozen smaller cities have orchestras which command local support, and the love of orchestral music has grown in volume until it to a considerable degree relieves such orchestras from the need of endowment or subscriptions. And that growth is substantially Colonel Higginson's work. Others have contributed, of course, but without him it would not have been done. In the face of that record of devoted service to musical education the flurry over Karl Muck's Germanism, which led to Colonel Higginson's withdrawal from the control of the orchestra and the appointment of a board of trustees, banks very small. A veteran of the Civil War and a patriot of distinguished service in many fields of civil life, he probably could not believe in the malignity with which Muck supported the German cause. At any rate it was his orchestra. Muck was his leader and he proposed to stand by him. And he did stand by him until he almost wrecked the usefulness of the orchestra to which he had given years of his life and a large fortune. But, thank our stars, the orchestra is safe. It will go on doing the work which Colonel Higginson inspired, while he has passed on to his great reward full of honors. And the best of it is that he deserved them all.

n HERALD

ress New York City

NOV 18 1918

Major Higginson Buried at Harvard with High Honors

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Monday.—Harvard University today paid last honors to Major Henry Lee Higginson, philanthropist and banker, who died Friday night. Although the head of a numerous and prominent family and conspicuous otherwise as the dean of the bankers of Boston, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, veteran of the civil war and patron of art, all these interests were subordinated in the university's final testimonial to its son. Major Higginson was a former student of Harvard, a trustee and benefactor, the donor of its athletic plant on Soldiers' Field and the founder of the Harvard Union, the undergraduates' meeting place.

In Appleton Chapel, within the Harvard yard, where Major Higginson was married half a century ago, funeral exercises were held, while at the university activities paused for an hour. The Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, a Harvard graduate, conducted the exercises. The university choir, an undergraduate body, sang, and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra played. Dr. A. Lawrence Lowell, president, and the Fellows of the university acted as honorary pallbearers. Nephews of Major Higginson were actual pallbearers, but surrendered the coffin to undergraduates at the chapel door.

From HERALD

Address New York City

Date

MAJOR HENRY L. HIGGINSON.

A solid man of Boston in the banking business, a gallant soldier of the civil war, a student of Harvard whom his university delighted to honor and a native son of this city, Major Henry L. Higginson was for the world of music what the great collectors have been for the world of the fine arts.

Himself a trained musician, he established the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, under one famous conductor after another, set a pace for all other organizations with similar aims everywhere.

To this active man of affairs the orchestra supplied all the excitement that others get out of a racing stable, a yacht, a gallery full of pictures or of Chinese porcelains or a library full of first editions.

Major Higginson's memory will be kept alive by the Symphony Orchestra—and it has belonged to New York almost as much as to Boston—even if his gifts to Harvard of Soldiers' Field and the Union should be forgotten.

From TELEGRAM

Address New York City

Date

MUSIC LIBRARY LEFT TO ORCHESTRA BY HIGGINSON

BOSTON, Wednesday—There are but few public bequests contained in the will of Major Henry L. Higginson, which was filed today in the Probate Court. The bulk of his property is left to his wife, Ida Agassiz Higginson, outright. The will explains that no financial provision is made for Major Higginson's son, Alexander H., "because I have entire confidence that my wife will do what is best for him."

Charles Francis Adams, one of the executors, is to get the library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the musical instruments owned by him and used by the members of the orchestra, but he is to hold these in trust for the benefit of the orchestra, to be turned over to the orchestra or sold within five years.

From EVENING WORLD,

New York City

MUSIC LIBRARY IN TRUST.

Higginson Executor May Give It to Orchestra in Three Years.

BOSTON, Nov. 26.—By the will of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was filed for probate to-day, his library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra, are left in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of his executors. The will directs that at the end of not less than three years nor more than five, Mr. Adams either must turn them over to the orchestra or sell them.

"I hope," the will says, "the trustee will be guided by the manner in which the symphony orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards."

After a few individual bequests the residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. Among the bequests is one of $10,000 to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the symphony orchestra. Works of art which Mr. Higginson lent to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts are bequeathed to that institution.

From Times

New York City

NOV 26 1919

ORCHESTRA IGNORED IN HIGGINSON'S WILL

To Widow Is Left the Bulk of Major's Estate—Charles A. Ellis Gets $10,000.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., Nov. 25.—In the will of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there is no provision made for a bequest or endowment for the orchestra in spite of the fact that during his lifetime Major Higginson had promised that he would leave $1,000,000 to insure the permanence of the organization.

Although the orchestra is left out of the will, which was filed in the Probate Court here today, it is thought that Major Higginson may have made some provision before his death, and that these plans have not yet been made public.

The will is dated Oct. 19, 1918, and the executors are named as Clift Rogers Clapp of Newton and Charles Francis Adams of Concord, Mass.

The bulk of the estate is left outright to Major Higginson's widow, Ida Agassiz Higginson, if she survives him thirty days after his death. The will states that "in such case I make no financial provision for my said son, because I have entire confidence that my said wife will do what is best for him."

Major Higginson leaves to his son, Alexander H. Higginson, his gold watch, sword, personal jewelry, a horse, paintings, ornaments and 300 volumes from the library.

The sum of $10,000 is bequeathed to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A codicil to Major Higginson's will gives $5,000 to his daughter-in-law, Jean Higginson.

From Morning T

N

Major Higginson's Library

The will of Major Higg[inson], founder of the Boston Symp[hony Or]chestra, gives his library of m[usic] sisting of musical scores and pa[rts] by orchestra and musical inst[ruments] owned by him, in trust to Charle[s] cis Adams, one of his executors. end of three years these must be over to the orchestra or disposed sale.

Zandt Sons f[or] 5

From TELEGRAM

Address: New York City.

Date

Henry L. Higginson, Eminent Bostonian, Dies in Hospital

BOSTON, Saturday. The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours.

Had he lived until next Tuesday, Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

From Morning Telegraph

New York City

To Endowment for Boston.

In the will of the late Henry Lee Higginson, founder and, until his withdrawal in the midst of the Dr. Muck controversy, principal sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, no provision was made for the orchestra's endowment. Major Higginson had made a secret of his original intention to provide a fund of $1,000,000 for the orchestra.

NEW YORK COMMERCIAL

Address: New York City

From STANDARD UNION

Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV 16 19

He Gave Us the Symphony Orchestra

We have symphony orchestras all over the country now, several of which play in New York every season. Forty years ago there was not one that had an adequate endowment. The only opportunity to hear symphonic music was given by organizations on a precarious financial footing, struggling to win favor from a doubtful and uninstructed public.

Major Henry L. Higginson, who just died in Boston when nearing his eighty-fifth birthday, was the founder of established symphonic musical performances in the United States. He made the Boston Symphony by a lavish and continuing expenditure of money from his private means year after year. His idea was magnificent, and he never relaxed it. For a score of years before the war, when musical art was receiving most opulent support everywhere, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the best in the world. To-day, amid all the wreck and dislocation of the apparatus of civilization, it is unexcelled.

Let us honor the memory of the man who did a great thing to bring happiness to millions of people.

Not all of those millions know the name of Higginson, but if it had not been for him a world of delight and spiritual satisfaction in which they now find joy would have been closed to them. Two years ago Major Higginson, himself a gallant soldier for Union, took a crotchety position an unnecessary and absurd con- t between love for absolute music love for country. That will all orgotten. Higginson is dead, merica still lives, and the Bos- mphony Orchestra also sur-

From SUN

ress New York City

te

HARVARD FUNERAL FOR MAJ. HIGGINSON

University Pays Last Honors to Boston Philanthropist.

Special Despatch to THE SUN.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Nov. 17.—Harvard University paid tribute to-day to the memory of Major Henry Lee Higginson of Boston, who died Friday night. Funeral services were held in Appleton Chapel at Harvard. The assemblage of mourners was representative of all that is best in Boston and Harvard life. Leaders and students of the university, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Major Higginson founded and nurtured, representatives of the Loyal Legion, men from State street, where he was so long a commanding figure, and a host of others indicative of the widespread interests and influence of Major Higginson, gathered to do him honor.

The services, severely plain, were conducted at noon by the Rev. Samuel McChord Crothers of Cambridge. The Boston Symphony Orchestra played and the Harvard choir sang funeral selections. The pallbearers were Presidents Lowell and Eliot and the following Fellows of the corporation: Dr. Henry Walcott, Bishop William Lawrence, Thomas N. Perkins, Charles F. Adams and John F. M. Moors. They preceded the casket from the chapel to University Hall, marching through a double file of undergraduates, who stood with bared heads.

The following undergraduates carried the casket: Robert Emmons of Brookline, captain of the baseball team; Fifield Workum of New York, president of the Crimson; Norman Walker of New York, captain of the hockey team; Wendell Davis of New York, captain of the crew; Charles C. Buell of Hartford, Conn., captain of the freshman football team, and John N. Borland of New York, president of the sophomore class. The actual pallbearers included six nephews of the dead man—Barrett Wendell, Jr., and Charles Jackson of the Harvard Alumni Association.

Interment services were held at the cemetery by the Rev. James H. Ropes of Harvard, and as the coffin was lowered a bugler sounded taps.

Among those who attended the chapel services were Senator John W. Weeks, Owen Wister of Philadelphia, Thomas W. Lawson, Mayor Peters of Boston, Judge Robert Grant, W. Cameron Forbes, President McLaurin of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and Howard Elliott.

MAJOR HIGGINSON DEAD

Banker and Founder of Orchestra Was 84 Years of Age.

Boston, Nov. 16.—Major Henry Lee Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead, following an operation. The head of the firm of Lee Higginson & Co. was eighty-four years of age.

On Friday he was taken from his home on Commonwealth avenue to the hospital. His condition became so serious that an immediate operation was deemed necessary. The cause of death was a blood clot on the brain, according to his physician, Dr. F. G. Balch.

n EAGLE

ress Brooklyn, N. Y.

e

MAJ. H. L. HIGGINSON, BOSTON BANKER, DIES

Founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Gave It $1,000,000 Endowment.

Boston, Nov. 15—The death of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. Maj. Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday, Maj. Higginson would have been 85 years of age.

The death of Maj. Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Maj. Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Maj. Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe, and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year Maj. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket. He finally gave the orchestra an endowment of $1,000,000. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means.

Maj. Higginson was born in New York City on Nov. 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a counting house. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864 with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

rom EAGLE

Address Brooklyn, N.Y.

Date 207 NOV 16 19

A TRUE FRIEND OF MUSIC.

The death of Colonel Henry L. Higginson of Boston will be mourned wherever good music is loved. Colonel Higginson is the man who organized the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881, supported it through a period when not even in Boston was there following enough to make its concerts self-supporting, sent it through the country until it established a standard of excellence for orchestral performance unknown elsewhere, and finally, a few years before his death, endowed it so substantially that its work can go on indefinitely, with little regard to box-office returns.

The music-lovers of the country owe more to Colonel Higginson than to any other man except Theodore Thomas. Mr. Thomas established a high standard of orchestral music and built up a following for it in this country under financial difficulties which Colonel Higginson knew nothing about. Having no fortune, Mr. Thomas was under the necessity of making his concerts pay, and he had to begin with a large proportion of popular music and to make the masterpieces liked through his own genius as a conductor. Colonel Higginson, a music-lover ready to spend in musical education the fortune he made as a banker, was able to take up the work which Thomas had begun under such difficulties. He engaged the best orchestral performers, supplied them in many cases with rare instruments, put them under the control of eminent conductors, beginning with Nikisch and Henschel, and instructed them to insist on a standard of perfect performance regardless of the public response. What such an opportunity meant to a poet like Nikisch and to a drillmaster like Gericke is known to older music-lovers because they saw what those men did with this incomparable band in its formative years.

That work began nearly forty years ago and for the first half of that period the public response was far from adequate. About the beginning of this century Colonel Higginson's enthusiasm began to bear fruit. The policy of endowing orchestras began to spread, and here in New York we have the old Philharmonic and the newer Symphony orchestras with financial support which enables them to approach the Boston standard of excellence. Half a dozen smaller cities have orchestras which command local support, and the love of orchestral music has grown in volume until it to a considerable degree relieves such orchestras from the need of endowment or subscriptions. And that growth is substantially Colonel Higginson's work. Others have contributed, of course, but without him it would not have been done. In the face of that record of devoted service to musical education the flurry over Karl Muck's Germanism, which led to Colonel Higginson's withdrawal from the control of the orchestra and the appointment of a board of trustees, banks very small. A veteran of the Civil War and a patriot of distinguished service in many fields of civil life, he probably could not believe in the malignity with which Muck supported the German cause. At any rate it was his orchestra. Muck was his leader and he proposed to stand by him. And he did stand by him until he almost wrecked the usefulness of the orchestra to which he had given years of his life and a large fortune. But, thank our stars, the orchestra is safe. It will go on doing the work which Colonel Higginson inspired, while he has passed on to his great reward full of honors. And the best of it is that he deserved them all.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From EVENING MAIL

Address: New York City

Date

A Friend of Music and of the People.

The hand and the heart of Henry L. Higginson responded with wise generosity to many an appeal for the improvement of conditions and the enrichment of life in America. But he will be chiefly remembered for his great labor of love in establishing, maintaining and perfecting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At this task, until quite recently, the Boston philanthropist and banker had centered much of his personal attention and based his fondest hopes since 1881.

The results he achieved have been notable, not only within the immediate sphere of the artistic activities of the orchestra but throughout the country. It is to Major Higginson that America owes its musical awakening and the incalculable boon of possessing one of the few really great musical organizations in the world. The financial burden which this munificent gift to his country involved, Major Higginson bore with cheerful generosity and a happy sense of service to America. But, a musician of no mean accomplishment himself, Major Higginson also took probably a controlling part in the artistic direction of the organization upon which he conferred the name of his adopted city.

The banker used to speak of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as his pet hobby, in the sense that other men of large means have yachts, stables, libraries or art galleries for their favorite amusement. But that definition hardly does justice to his relations with the orchestra. The great musical organization to which he devoted so much of his resources and of his life was more than a hobby. It was his pride, his love and his ideal. How closely he approached the attainment of that ideal is known to all music lovers in America.

The events that led to his great disappointment in the conductor he had chosen struck to the depths of his being. It may be truly said that Major Higginson died a brokenhearted man.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From WORLD,
New York City

A GREAT BOSTONIAN.

The late Major Henry Lee Higginson had long been regarded as the first citizen of Boston, and his title to that honor met the strictest Brahmin requirements. His ancestry antedated the Revolutionary War, his military rank was won by distinguished service in the Civil War, he was a fellow of Harvard College, and during a protracted lifetime he had given generously of his large wealth to civic and artistic objects.

His special fame, of course, was due to his munificent patronage of music. As the creator and main supporter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded in 1881, he not only gave Boston a unique eminence in musical art in this country but he also elevated American musical standards to a parity with those of Europe.

The Boston Orchestra, which he is supposed to have endowed under his will, remains his distinctive monument. But certainly the personality of the man, the banker-patron who typified old Bostonian ideals of citizenship and in whom there were some of the attributes of a Medici, must leave an agreeable memory as that of an American in private station illustrious for public service of a peculiar kind.

WALL STREET JOURNAL

From

Address New York City

Date NOV 17

MAJOR H. L. HIGGINSON DEAD

Long Active in Business and a Patron of Science, Art and Music

Boston—Major Henry L. Higginson died Friday night.

Major Henry Lee Higginson was born in this city in 1834, entered Harvard in 1851, received an honorary degree in 1882 and from Yale in 1901. His first employment was with the counting house of S. & E. Austin of Boston. He went to Vienna to study music, but returned to enlist as a volunteer in the Civil War. He was severely wounded and discharged with the rank of Lieutenant Colonel. He was a member of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. from January 1, 1868, and officer and director of many of the country's leading corporations. Much of his leisure was devoted to the promotion of scientific, literary and artistic studies and societies and he was one of the principal organizers and supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From WORLD,
New York City

BOSTON ORCHESTRA FOUNDER IS DEAD

Major Henry L. Higginson, Noted Patron of Music, Passes Away in His Eighty-Fifth Year.

(Special to The World.)

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Major Henry Lee Higginson, head of the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., patron and mainstay of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and long honored as Boston's first citizen, died Friday night in the Massachusetts General Hospital in this city. He would have been eighty-five next Tuesday.

The service for which he was most widely known was performed for the orchestra which he founded in 1881. Under guarantees provided by him, yearly contracts were made with the musicians which placed them above the need of seeking other income and thus enabled them to centre their energies on orchestral playing. As a result the orchestra for many years ranked as the best in the country and it matched in finish and general excellence the famous orchestras of Europe. Major Higginson was proud of this achievement and cheerfully made good the yearly deficit of the organization.

Announced Endowment.

Several years ago he announced that he had provided in his will an endowment of $1,000,000 with which to perpetuate the orchestra. In April, of Dr. Karl Muck, the orchestra's leader, Major Higginson withdrew from the organization. It was not stated whether or not he had cancelled the endowment. In carrying forward the orchestra, he insisted on the employment of pronounced talent only. He came into conflict with the musical union in 1903, when that body ordered twenty of the performers to take out union cards, whereupon seventy-seven members who had union cards returned them, establishing the open shop policy in the organization. On his eighty-fourth birthday 4,000 patrons of the concerts presented Major Higginson with a souvenir book, for which former President Eliot of Harvard wrote the dedication.

Objected to Brandeis.

Conspicuous among Major Higginson's recent activities was his leadership, in 1916, of the unsuccessful protest to the appointment of Louis D. Brandeis to the United States Supreme Court. He established the Soldiers' Field at Harvard as a memorial to friends who had died in the country's service in the Civil War, gave $150,000 for the building of Harvard Union. He was a fellow of Harvard from 1893, and a trustee of the Carnegie Institution. Yale and Williams gave him the degree of LL. D.

Major Higginson came of pre-Revolutionary stock, and was born in New York in 1834. He earned his military rank in the Civil War, in which he rose to the rank of Brevet Lieutenant Colonel, but he preferred to be known as Major, to avoid confusion with Colonel Thomas Wentworth Higginson. In 1863 he married Ida Agassiz, daughter of Louis Agassiz, the scientist. He was associated with many commercial and educational bodies.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From EVENING WORLD,
New York City

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON, BOSTON BANKER, DIE

Had Been in Poor Health for Two Years and Recently Underwent Operation.

(Special Despatch to The Evening World.)

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Major Henry Lee Higginson, head of the banking firm of Lee Higginson & Co., died tonight.

He had been in poor health for the last two years and recently underwent an operation.

Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Funeral services for Major Higginson, who was a member of the Corporation of Harvard University, will be held in Appleton Chapel at the University on Monday at noon. Recitations and lectures in all departments will be suspended from 12 to 1 o'clock on that day.

Two years ago, after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the Symphony organization, which he had

ess New York City

Date NOV 26

ORCHESTRA IGNORED IN HIGGINSON WILL

Boston Financier Fails to Make Provision for Organization.

Special Despatch to THE SUN.

BOSTON, Nov. 25.—In the will of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there is no provision for the orchestra in spite of the fact that during his lifetime Major Higginson had promised that he would leave $1,000,000 to insure the permanence of the organization.

Although the orchestra is left out of the will which was filed in the Probate Court here to-day it is thought that Major Higginson may have made some provision for it before his death and that these plans have not yet been made public. The will is dated October 19, 1918.

The bulk of the estate is left to Major Higginson's widow, Ida Agassiz Higginson, outright if she survives him thirty days after his death. The will states that "in such case I make no financial provision for my son because I have entire confidence that my wife will do what is best for him."

Major Higginson leaves to his son, Alexander H. Higginson, his gold watch, sword, personal jewelry, a horse, paintings, ornaments and 300 volumes from the library.

The sum of $10,000 is bequeathed to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In addition to a gift of $5,000 to his daughter-in-law, Jean Higginson, and $1,000 to his grandson, Henry Lee Higginson, amounts ranging from $200 to $5,000 are left to Major Higginson's secretary and household employees.

The Higginson library of music, which includes the scores used by the Symphony Orchestra, and musical instruments, are given in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of the trustees, with instructions to allow the orchestra to use the scores and instruments free of charge if Adams so desires.

The will provides that in not less than three nor more than five years the trustee must either turn the music and scores over to the Symphony orchestra or sell them. In his will Major Higginson wrote: "I hope the trustees will be guided by the manner in which the orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards."

To the Boston Museum of Fine Arts is given such objects of art as are at present loaned to the institution from the Higginson collection.

EVENING SUN

ess New York City

NOV

NO SYMPHONY BEQUEST IN HIGGINSON'S WILL

He Fails to Provide $1,000,000 That Had Been Expected.

BOSTON, Nov. 26.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, recognized as the premier concert orchestro in this country, receives no benefit under the will of Major Henry Lee Higginson. This came as a surprise to musical circles here as it was understood that Major Higginson, who for many years had paid the annual deficit of the organization, promised in his lifetime that he would provide the payment of $1,000,000 to the orchestra from his estate in his will, to insure its permanence.

There is still a chance, it is believed, that the banker made provision for the organization other than in the will, which is dated Oct. 19, 1918, in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of the trustees, with instructions to permit the orchestra to use them free of charge, if Mr. Adams desires. It is further provided that within the limits of from three to five years this part of his musical library must be turned over to the orchestra, or it must be sold.

To Mrs. Ida Agassiz Higginson, his widow, Major Higginson left the bulk of his estate, outright, if she survives him by thirty years. His personal effects, including his library, his art gallery and his stable, are divided among his son, daughter-in-law and grand children, who lso receive substantial sums of money.

From Variety

NOV

Maj. Henry Lee Higginson.
Boston, Nov. 19.

Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, head of a banking firm of prominence here and the patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died suddenly last week. Maj. Higginson in 1881 undertook, at his personal risk, to be responsible for a series of twenty orchestral concerts of the highest order and an equal number of public rehearsals at a low price. This was the creation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and he supported the company from that time on, paying out of his pocket any deficiencies at the end of the season. For 25 years after he started the orchestra it made money but one. Sometimes the deficit was only $2,000, and another year it went as high as $52,000. It was he who launched the project for the building of Symphony Hall when the site of the old music hall was threatened by improvement work. He also secured Dr. Karl Muck to come here and head the orchestra and his friends claimed that the alleged duplicity of the symphony leader was a hard blow to the millionaire philanthropist. The orchestra played a special selection in his honor at the Saturday night concert.

New York City

NOV 26 1919

HIGGINSON LEAVES MUSIC LIBRARY TO ORCHESTRA

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Tuesday.—There are but few public bequests contained in the will of Major Henry L. Higginson, which was filed today in the Probate Court. The bulk of his property is left to his wife, Ida Agassiz Higginson, outright. The will explains that no financial provision is made for Major Higginson's son, Alexander H., "because I have entire confidence that my wife will do what is best for him."

His money in the firm of Lee Higginson & Co. is to be left in the partnership for ten years.

Charles Francis Adams, one of the executors, is to get the library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the musical instruments owned by him and used by the members of the orchestra, but he is to hold these in trust for the benefit of the orchestra, to be turned over to the orchestra or sold within five years.

SUN

ess New York City

NOV 16 1919

Major HENRY L. HIGGINSON, who died in Boston Friday night, was credited with saying that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he established and supported out of his own pocket, was not a philanthropy but a hobby. Philanthropy or hobby, it has given rare pleasure to thousands besides Major HIGGINSON, and these thousands are indebted to his generosity for the opportunity it provided for them to hear the finest compositions splendidly rendered by the best musicians. To its affairs he gave intelligent, painstaking labor, which raised it to the highest plane among the foremost musical associations of the world and throughout the twoscore years he was identified with it he never forgot that interest in good music is as strong among those whose pocketbooks are thin as it is among those to whom the cost of a ticket of admission is a matter of no consequence. He searched the world for the best performers and best conductors, allowing nothing except musical ability to count in the selection of the members of the orchestra. In a most practical way he demonstrated his scorn of a notion that real art is national or racial. Major HIGGINSON'S military title was not bestowed in courtesy. He won it with wounds in the civil war, and he won by deeds the high esteem in which he was held not only in Boston but wherever due and proper respect is paid to good citizenship.

From WORLD,
New York City

MUSIC LIBRARY IN TRUST.

Higginson Executor May Give It to Orchestra in Three Years.

BOSTON, Nov. 25.—By the will of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was filed for probate to-day, his library of music, consisting of musical scores and parts used by the orchestra, and musical instruments owned by him and used by members of the orchestra, are left in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of his executors. The will directs that at the end of not less than three years nor more than five, Mr. Adams either must turn them over to the orchestra or sell them.

"I hope," the will says, "the trustee will be guided by the manner in which the symphony orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards."

After a few individual bequests the residue of the estate is left to Mrs. Higginson. Among the bequests is one of $10,000 to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the symphony orchestra. Works of art which Mr. Higginson lent to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts are bequeathed to that institution.

From NOV 16 1919
TRIBUNE,
New York City

Major Higginson, Founder of Boston Orchestra, Is Dead

Expires in Hospital, Following Operation, at Age of 85; Banker and Soldier and a Patron of Harvard

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Major Henry Lee Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died last night at the Massachusetts General Hospital after an operation. Major Higginson would have completed his eighty-fifth year Tuesday. His death was due to the recurrence of an old trouble for which he underwent treatment last winter. He was taken to the hospital yesterday afternoon. The operation was performed soon afterward and he died at 8:30 o'clock.

Funeral services will be held in Appleton Chapel, Harvard University, at noon Monday. Recitations and lectures will be suspended for an hour.

In a statement issued at the university offices to-day Major Higginson is referred to as one of Harvard's greatest benefactors. The statement adds:

"He gave the Harvard Union, which for many years has been useful as a common meeting place for Harvard men and as a great club to which all members of the university are eligible. He also gave Soldiers Field. His services as a fellow of the corporation are too many and valuable to recount. His death will be mourned by Harvard men everywhere."

Best Known As Music Patron

Although he was the head of the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., with which he had been associated since 1868, Major Higginson was best known as the founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he maintained close connection as director until the arrest of the conductor, Doctor Karl Muck, two years ago, as a dangerous enemy alien. It was explained at the time that his advanced years rendered his retirement imperative, and control of the orchestra passed into the hands of a board of trustees.

Major Higginson was born in New York City November 18, 1834, the son of George and Mary Cabot Lee Higginson. The family moved to Boston shortly after his birth, and in 1855 Major Higginson entered Harvard, but resigned before graduation to enter a banking firm. His service with this firm was interrupted for a year of musical studies in Vienna, but he remained with it until the outbreak of the Civil War. He entered the army as a second lieutenant, and was made a major for gallantry. Later he was brevetted a lieutenant colonel for bravery on the battlefield. He was wounded four times in 1864 and was retired.

Proud of His War Record

Major Higginson was proud of his war record. It was said he slept at least one night a year in his war relic room on a soldier cot. Soldiers Field at Harvard was his memorial to friends and comrades who died in service.

For years he was a leader in Boston life and affairs. A conservative, he led the opposition to the confirmation of Justice Louis Brandeis as a member of the United States Supreme Court in 1916.

He founded the Boston Symphony in 1881. It never made money, and as patron Major Higginson was frequently called upon to meet deficits amounting sometimes to as much as $50,000 a year. Sixteen years ago he came into conflict with the Musicians' Union because twenty members of the orchestra did not carry cards. This resulted in the entire membership of the orchestra surrendering their union cards, and Major Higginson then announced that if permitted to conduct the orchestra's affairs as he wished it would not end with his death, a pledge which he justified a few years later with an announcement that his will provided $1,000,000 for its maintenance.

Honored by 4,000 Music Lovers

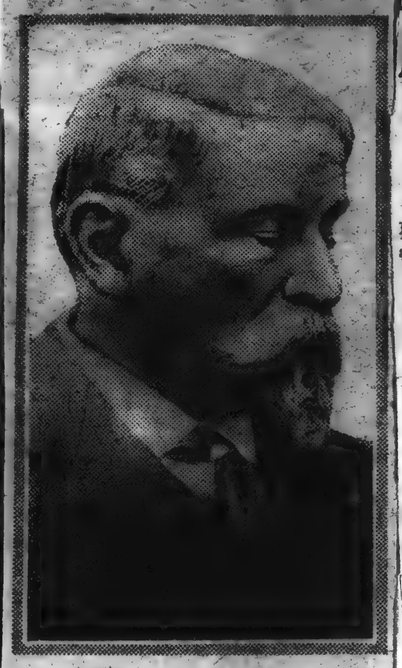
On his eighty-fourth birthday, last year, a souvenir book containing the signatures of 4,000 patrons of the orchestra was presented to him. The first page bore a letter of dedication by Doctor Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard.

After the Civil War Major Higginson first tried cotton planting in Georgia, but without success. He then returned to Boston and entered the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., becoming head of the firm when Henry Lee retired in 1897. He became a member of the Boston Stock Exchange in 1868 and of the New York Stock Exchange in 1876.

Harvard Union was established with $150,000 given by him in 1899. He was elected to the Harvard Corporation in 1893 and became a trustee of the Carnegie Institution at Washington in 1903. Harvard conferred upon him the degree of master of arts and Yale made him a doctor of laws.

From NOV 15 19
EVENING POST,
New York City

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON



By Bain News Service.

Banker and Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra Died in Boston To-day.

HENRY L. HIGGINSON DEAD IN BOSTON

Founder of the Famous Symphony Orchestra

Underwent Surgical Operation Recently—Banker Was in His Eighty-fifth Year.

BOSTON, November 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced to-day. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year until his death Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at twenty-five cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The Symphony Orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York city, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a countinghouse. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

(Continued on Page Two.)

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of master of arts by Harvard and that of doctor of laws by Yale.

ESTABLISHED 1851 NOV 16 1919
From American

Henry L. Higginson, Banker-Founder of Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced to-day. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night, after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last Winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Funeral services for Major Higginson, who was a member of the corporation of Harvard University, will be held in Appleton Chapel, at the university, on Monday at noon. Recitations and lectures in all departments will be suspended from 12 to 1 o'clock on that day. In a statement issued at the university offices to-day, Major Higginson is referred to as one of Harvard's greatest benefactors.

Two years ago, after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the Symphony organization, which he had formed in 1881. At the time it was explained that his advanced years made it necessary that he be relieved of the administrative burden. The control of the orchestra, at Major Higginson's request, then passed into the hands of a board of trustees.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1851 NOV 16 1919
From Morning Telegraph
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY FOUNDER IS DEAD

Patron of Famous Musical Organization Leaves $1,000,000 for Its Perpetuation.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Nov. 15.

At the Massachusetts General Hospital, Major Henry Lee Higginson, prominent banker and founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died last night, though the fact of his death was not announced to the general public until to-day.

Though Major Higginson was reared in New England and there spent most of his life, he was a native of New York, having been born in this city on November 18, 1834. The family moved to Boston and in 1855 young Higginson entered Harvard. The vicissitudes of his life were many. He studied music in Italy for a year, was in the Civil War, and later became a leading banker and noted philanthropist.

But it was as the founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the world at large knew him best. He founded the orchestra in 1881 and withdrew from it last April (1918), after the arrest and internment of its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck.

For many years the Boston Orchestra was admitted to rank among the best string bands in the United States, but it was never a moneymaker. There were seasons when the deficit reached $50,000, but Major Higginson never weakened.

In December, 1903, he came into conflict with the Musical Union, which ordered twenty players of the orchestra to take out union cards. The result of the dispute was that seventy-seven members of the orchestra who had union cards returned them. Major Higginson said at that time if he was permitted to carry on the work of the orchestra as he wished, its life should not end with his death. He justified this promise several years later by the announcement that his will provided $1,000,000 to perpetuate the orchestra.

rom EVENING SUN
ddress New York City
ate NOV 18 1919

Major Higginson.

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON, whose military rank was won by service in the Civil War, was sometimes thought of as "the first citizen of Boston," less, possibly, on account of his war record and his activity for the preservation of certain American landmarks of establishment and tradition, than because of his founding the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Yet a sentence in his will, from the clause by which he bequeathed a million dollars to perpetuate that orchestra, may be read profitably at the present juncture in the world's history by many men of widely varying opinions. "I believe," said Major HIGGINSON, "that a man who lives for himself and his own interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot."

"The greatest string band in the Western Hemisphere," as it was called, gave its first concert in 1881. Its founder's interest in it was merely that of a devoted amateur of music. Each year he made up a substantial, sometimes a heavy, deficit. Its fame rested about equally upon the individual merit of its members—whose faith to the organization covered not only their individual virtuosity but single loyalty to its collective interests—and upon the consummate quality of the whole great orchestra as a single instrument responding to its leader's direction. Its successive conductors contributed harmoniously to its fame as an organism. The war, at last, was able to introduce a lamentably discordant note in the orchestra's history when Major HIGGINSON was more than eighty years old.

In the Boston Symphony Orchestra the United States—and all the civilized world—may behold the worthiest monument to Major HIGGINSON. An organization of the best performers of the best music, moved by the best ideals, removed from the whip of commercial domination, responding only to the spur of the artist's aspiration—this great band now enters upon the second period of its life. Its value to the world will be shown in spite of a determination among rebellious spirits to throw away tradition and rebuild a world without foundation or coherent mass.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date

MAJOR HIGGINSON, MUSIC PATRON, DIES

Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra Succumbs After Operation —Nearly 85 Years Old.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced to-day. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the symphony orchestra, which he established in 1881. He was born in New York City Nov. 18, 1834.

Funeral services for Major Higginson, who was a member of the Corporation of Harvard University, will be held in Appleton Chapel at the university on Monday at noon. Recitations and lectures in all departments will be suspended from 12 to 1 o'clock on that day.

In a statement issued at the university offices to-day Major Higginson is referred to as one of Harvard's greatest benefactors.

Two years ago after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the symphony organization.

At the time it was explained that his advanced years made it necessary that he be relieved of the administrative burden. The control of the orchestra, at Major Higginson's request, then passed into the hands of a board of trustees.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City
Date NOV 15 1919

HENRY L. HIGGINSON, BOSTON BANKER, DIES

Financier Also Was Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced to-day.

Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours.

Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

MAJOR HIGGINSON, MUSIC PATRON, DIES

Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Succumbs After Operation —Nearly 85 Years Old.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced to-day. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the symphony orchestra, which he established in 1881. He was born in New York City Nov. 18, 1834.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1851
From American
New York City

Henry L. Higginson Is Dead in Boston

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last Winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the firm since 18

From NOV 18 19
TRIBUNE,
New York City

Maj. Higginson's Funeral At Harvard University

Members of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Which He Founded, Play at Services

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Nov. 17.—Harvard University suspended activities for an hour to-day while funeral services were held in honor of Major Henry Lee Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died Friday night. He was a former Harvard student.

Simple services were held in Appleton Chapel on the university campus, where Major Higginson was married fifty years ago. The Rev. Samuel M Crothers, a Harvard graduate, conducted the ceremony. The university choir sang and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra played. President A. Lawrence Lowell and the Fellows o the university acted as honorary pallbearers. Nephews of Ma Higginson were actual pallbearer surrendered the casket to und uates at the chapel door.

From th's point the body w through a double rank of un uates, who lined the walk to sity Hall, where the hearse wa Mount Auburn Cemetery D H. Ropes conducted a

From TRIBUNE, New York City

NOV 16 1919

Major Higginson, Founder of Boston Orchestra, Is Dead

Expires in Hospital, Following Operation, at Age of 85; Banker and Soldier and a Patron of Harvard

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Major Henry Lee Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died last night at the Massachusetts General Hospital after an operation. Major Higginson would have completed his eighty-fifth year Tuesday. His death was due to the recurrence of an old trouble for which he underwent treatment last winter. He was taken to the hospital yesterday afternoon. The operation was performed soon afterward and he died at 8:30 oclock.

Funeral services will be held in Appleton Chapel, Harvard University, at noon Monday. Recitations and lectures will be suspended for an hour.

In a statement issued at the university offices to-day Major Higginson is referred to as one of Harvard's greatest benefactors. The statement adds:

"He gave the Harvard Union, which for many years has been useful as a common meeting place for Harvard men and as a great club to which all members of the university are eligible. He also gave Soldiers Field. His services as a fellow of the corporation are too many and valuable to recount. His death will be mourned by Harvard men everywhere."

Best Known As Music Patron

Although he was the head of the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., with which he had been associated since 1868, Major Higginson was best known as the founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he maintained close connection as director until the arrest of the conductor, Doctor Karl Muck, two years ago, as a dangerous enemy alien. It was explained at the time that his advanced years rendered his retirement imperative, and control of the orchestra passed into the hands of a board of trustees.

Major Higginson was born in New York City November 18, 1834, the son of George and Mary Cabot Lee Higginson. The family moved to Boston shortly after his birth, and in 1855 Major Higginson entered Harvard, but resigned before graduation to enter a banking firm. His service with this firm was interrupted for a year of musical studies in Vienna, but he remained with it until the outbreak of the Civil War. He entered the army as a second lieutenant, and was made a major for gallantry. Later he was brevetted a lieutenant colonel for bravery on the battlefield. He was wounded four times in 1864 and was retired.

Proud of His War Record

Major Higginson was proud of his war record. It was said he slept at least one night a year in his war relic room on a soldier cot. Soldiers Field at Harvard was his memorial to friends and comrades who died in service.

For years he was a leader in Boston life and affairs. A conservative, he led the opposition to the confirmation of Justice Louis Brandeis as a member of the United States Supreme Court in 1916.

He founded the Boston Symphony in 1881. It never made money, and as patron Major Higginson was frequently called upon to meet deficits amounting sometimes to as much as $50,000 a year. Sixteen years ago he came into conflict with the Musicians' Union because twenty members of the orchestra did not carry cards. This resulted in the entire membership of the orchestra surrendering their union cards, and Major Higginson then announced that if permitted to conduct the orchestra's affairs as he wished it would not end with his death, a pledge which he justified a few years later with an announcement that his will provided $1,000,000 for its maintenance.

Honored by 4,000 Music Lovers

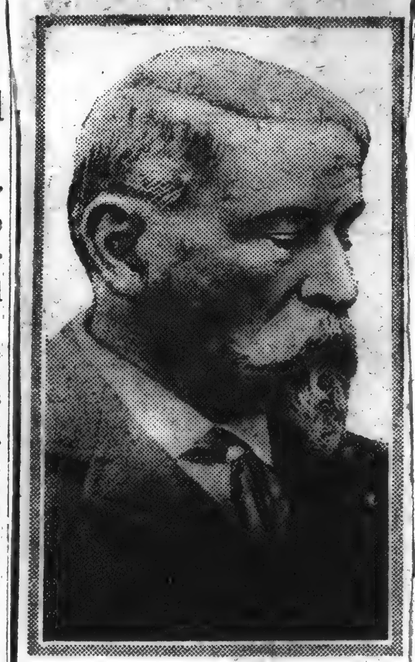
On his eighty-fourth birthday, last year, a souvenir book containing the signatures of 4,000 patrons of the orchestra was presented to him. The first page bore a letter of dedication by Doctor Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard.

After the Civil War Major Higginson first tried cotton planting in Georgia, but without success. He then returned to Boston and entered the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., becoming head of the firm when Henry Lee retired in 1897. He became a member of the Boston Stock Exchange in 1868 and of the New York Stock Exchange in 1876.

Harvard Union was established with $150,000 given by him in 1899. He was elected to the Harvard Corporation in 1893 and became a trustee of the Carnegie Institution at Washington in 1903. Harvard conferred upon him the degree of master of arts and Yale made him a doctor of laws.

From NOV 15 19.. EVENING POST, New York City

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON



By Bain News Service.

Banker and Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra Died in Boston To-day.

HENRY L. HIGGINSON DEAD IN BOSTON

Founder of the Famous Symphony Orchestra

Underwent Surgical Operation Recently—Banker Was in His Eighty-fifth Year.

BOSTON, November 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year until his death Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at twenty-five cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The Symphony Orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York city, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a countinghouse. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

(Continued on Page Two.)

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of master of arts by Harvard and that of doctor of laws by Yale.

ESTABLISHED 1887 NOV 16 1919

From American

Henry L. Higginson, Banker-Founder of Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced to-day. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night, after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last Winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Funeral services for Major Higginson, who was a member of the corporation of Harvard University, will be held in Appleton Chapel, at the university, on Monday at noon. Recitations and lectures in all departments will be suspended from 12 to 1 o'clock on that day. In a statement issued at the university offices to-day, Major Higginson is referred to as one of Harvard's greatest benefactors.

Two years ago, after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the Symphony organization, which he had formed in 1881. At the time it was explained that his advanced years made it necessary that he be relieved of the administrative burden. The control of the orchestra, at Major Higginson's request, then passed into the hands of a board of trustees.

NEW YORK ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 16 1919

From Morning Telegraph New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY FOUNDER IS DEAD

Patron of Famous Musical Organization Leaves $1,000,000 for Its Perpetuation.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Nov. 15.

At the Massachusetts General Hospital, Major Henry Lee Higginson, prominent banker and founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died last night, though the fact of his death was not announced to the general public until to-day.

Though Major Higginson was reared in New England and there spent most of his life, he was a native of New York, having been born in this city on November 18, 1834. The family moved to Boston and in 1855 young Higginson entered Harvard. The vicissitudes of his life were many. He studied music in Italy for a year, was in the Civil War, and later became a leading banker and noted philanthropist.

But it was as the founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the world at large knew him best. He founded the orchestra in 1881 and withdrew from it last April (1918), after the arrest and internment of its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck.

For many years the Boston Orchestra was admitted to rank among the best string bands in the United States, but it was never a moneymaker. There were seasons when the deficit reached $50,000, but Major Higginson never weakened.

In December, 1903, he came into conflict with the Musical Union, which ordered twenty players of the orchestra to take out union cards. The result of the dispute was that seventy-seven members of the orchestra who had union cards returned them. Major Higginson said at that time if he was permitted to carry on the work of the orchestra as he wished, its life should not end with his death. He justified this promise several years later by the announcement that his will provided $1,000,000 to perpetuate the orchestra.

From EVENING SUN

Address New York City

Date NOV 18 1919

Major Higginson.

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON, whose military rank was won by service in the Civil War, was sometimes thought of as "the first citizen of Boston," less, possibly, on account of his war record and his activity for the preservation of certain American landmarks of establishment and tradition, than because of his founding the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Yet a sentence in his will, from the clause by which he bequeathed a million dollars to perpetuate that orchestra, may be read profitably at the present juncture in the world's history by many men of widely varying opinions. "I believe," said Major HIGGINSON, "that a man who lives for himself and his own interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot."

"The greatest string band in the Western Hemisphere," as it was called, gave its first concert in 1881. Its founder's interest in it was merely that of a devoted amateur of music. Each year he made up a substantial, sometimes a heavy, deficit. Its fame rested about equally upon the individual merit of its members—whose faith to the organization covered not only their individual virtuosity but single loyalty to its collective interests—and upon the consummate quality of the whole great orchestra as a single instrument responding to its leader's direction. Its successive conductors contributed harmoniously to its fame as an organism. The war, at last, was able to introduce a lamentably discordant note in the orchestra's history when Major HIGGINSON was more than eighty years old.

In the Boston Symphony Orchestra the United States—and all the civilized world—may behold the worthiest monument to Major HIGGINSON. An organization of the best performers of the best music, moved by the best ideals, removed from the whip of commercial domination, responding only to the spur of the artist's aspiration—this great band now enters upon the second period of its life. Its value to the world will be shown in spite of a determination among rebellious spirits to throw away tradition and rebuild a world without foundation or coherent mass.

From EVENING GLOBE

Address: New York City

Date

MAJOR HIGGINSON, MUSIC PATRON, DIES

Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra Succumbs After Operation —Nearly 85 Years Old.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced to-day. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the symphony orchestra, which he established in 1881. He was born in New York City Nov. 18, 1834.

From EVENING MAIL

Address: New York City

Date NOV 15 1919

HENRY L. HIGGINSON, BOSTON BANKER, DIES

Financier Also Was Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced to-day.

Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours.

Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

EVENING GLOBE

s: New York City

MAJOR HIGGINSON, MUSIC PATRON, DIES

Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Succumbs After Operation —Nearly 85 Years Old.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced to-day. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the symphony orchestra, which he established in 1881. He was born in New York City Nov. 18, 1834.

NEW YORK ESTABLISHED 1881

From American New York City

Henry L. Higginson Is Dead in Boston

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last Winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

From TRIBUNE, New York City

Maj. Higginson's Funeral At Harvard University

Members of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Which He Founded, Play at Services

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Nov. 17.—Harvard University suspended activities for an hour to-day while funeral services were held in honor of Major Henry Lee Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died Friday night. He was a former Harvard student.

Simple services were held in Appleton Chapel on the university campus, where Major Higginson was married fifty years ago. The Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, a Harvard graduate, conducted the ceremony. The university choir sang and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra played. President A. Lawrence Lowell and the Fellows o the university acted as honorary pallbearers. Nephews of Ma... Higginson were actual pallbearers surrendered the casket to und... uates at the chapel door.

From th... point the body w... through a double rank of un... uates, who lined the walk to ... sity Hall, where the hearse wa... Mount Auburn Cemetery D... H. Ropes conducted a ...

...ymphony Orchestra is to

From TRIBUNE, New York City

Major Higginson, Founder of Boston Orchestra, Is Dead

Expires in Hospital, Following Operation, at Age of 85; Banker and Soldier and a Patron of Harvard

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Major Henry Lee Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died last night at the Massachusetts General Hospital after an operation. Major Higginson would have completed his eighty-fifth year Tuesday. His death was due to the recurrence of an old trouble for which he underwent treatment last winter. He was taken to the hospital yesterday afternoon. The operation was performed soon afterward and he died at 8:30 oclock.

Funeral services will be held in Appleton Chapel, Harvard University, at noon Monday. Recitations and lectures will be suspended for an hour.

In a statement issued at the university offices to-day Major Higginson is referred to as one of Harvard's greatest benefactors. The statement adds:

"He gave the Harvard Union, which for many years has been useful as a common meeting place for Harvard men and as a great club to which all members of the university are eligible. He also gave Soldiers Field. His services as a fellow of the corporation are too many and valuable to recount. His death will be mourned by Harvard men everywhere."

Best Known As Music Patron

Although he was the head of the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., with which he had been associated since 1868, Major Higginson was best known as the founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he maintained close connection as director until the arrest of the conductor, Doctor Karl Muck, two years ago, as a dangerous enemy alien. It was explained at the time that his advanced years rendered his retirement imperative, and control of the orchestra passed into the hands of a board of trustees.

Major Higginson was born in New York City November 18, 1834, the son of George and Mary Cabot Lee Higginson. The family moved to Boston shortly after his birth, and in 1855 Major Higginson entered Harvard, but resigned before graduation to enter a banking firm. His service with this firm was interrupted for a year of musical studies in Vienna, but he remained with it until the outbreak of the Civil War. He entered the army as a second lieutenant, and was made a major for gallantry. Later he was brevetted a lieutenant colonel for bravery on the battlefield. He was wounded four times in 1864 and was retired.

Proud of His War Record

Major Higginson was proud of his war record. It was said he slept at least one night a year in his war relic room on a soldier cot. Soldiers Field at Harvard was his memorial to friends and comrades who died in service.

For years he was a leader in Boston life and affairs. A conservative, he led the opposition to the confirmation of Justice Louis Brandeis as a member of the United States Supreme Court in 1916.

He founded the Boston Symphony in 1881. It never made money, and as patron Major Higginson was frequently called upon to meet deficits amounting sometimes to as much as $50,000 a year. Sixteen years ago he came into conflict with the Musicians' Union because twenty members of the orchestra did not carry cards. This resulted in the entire membership of the orchestra surrendering their union cards, and Major Higginson then announced that if permitted to conduct the orchestra's affairs as he wished it would not end with his death, a pledge which he justified a few years later with an announcement that his will provided $1,000,000 for its maintenance.

Honored by 4,000 Music Lovers

On his eighty-fourth birthday, last year, a souvenir book containing the signatures of 4,000 patrons of the orchestra was presented to him. The first page bore a letter of dedication by Doctor Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard.

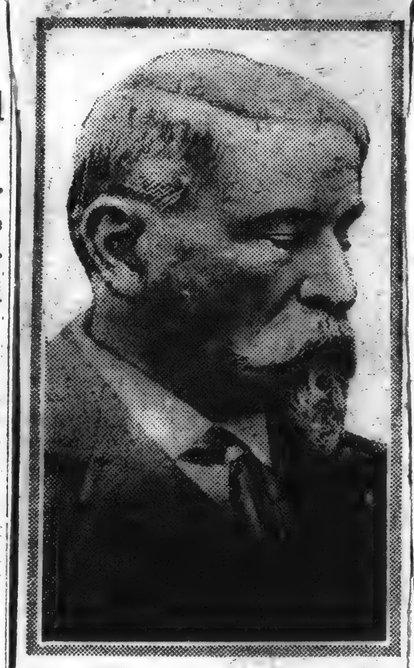
After the Civil War Major Higginson first tried cotton planting in Georgia, but without success. He then returned to Boston and entered the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., becoming head of the firm when Henry Lee retired in 1897. He became a member of the Boston Stock Exchange in 1868 and of the New York Stock Exchange in 1876.

Harvard Union was established with $150,000 given by him in 1899. He was elected to the Harvard Corporation in 1893 and became a trustee of the Carnegie Institution at Washington in 1903. Harvard conferred upon him the degree of master of arts and Yale made him a doctor of laws.

From EVENING POST, New York City

NOV 15

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON



By Bain News Service.

Banker and Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra Died in Boston To-day.

HENRY L. HIGGINSON DEAD IN BOSTON

Founder of the Famous Symphony Orchestra

Underwent Surgical Operation Recently—Banker Was in His Eighty-fifth Year.

BOSTON, November 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Henry Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net revenue; in every other year until his death Mr. Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at twenty-five cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The Symphony Orchestra Mr. Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

Mr. Higginson was born in New York city, November 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a countinghouse. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

(Continued on Page Two.)

In 1890 Major Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of master of arts by Harvard and that of doctor of laws by Yale.

ESTABLISHED 1881

NOV 16 1919

From American

Henry L. Higginson, Banker-Founder of Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced to-day. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night, after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last Winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the symphony orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Funeral services for Major Higginson, who was a member of the corporation of Harvard University, will be held in Appleton Chapel, at the university, on Monday at noon. Recitations and lectures in all departments will be suspended from 12 to 1 o'clock on that day. In a statement issued at the university offices to-day, Major Higginson is referred to as one of Harvard's greatest benefactors.

Two years ago after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the Symphony organization, which he had formed in 1881. At the time it was explained that his advanced years made it necessary that he be relieved of the administrative burden. The control of the orchestra, at Major Higginson's request, then passed into the hands of a board of trustees.

NEW YORK ESTABLISHED 1881

NOV 19

From Morning Telegraph New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY FOUNDER IS DEAD

Patron of Famous Musical Organization Leaves $1,000,000 for Its Perpetuation.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Nov. 15.

At the Massachusetts General Hospital, Major Henry Lee Higginson, prominent banker and founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died last night, though the fact of his death was not announced to the general public until to-day.

Though Major Higginson was reared in New England and there spent most of his life, he was a native of New York, having been born in this city on November 18, 1834. The family moved to Boston and in 1855 young Higginson entered Harvard. The vicissitudes of his life were many. He studied music in Italy for a year, was in the Civil War, and later became a leading banker and noted philanthropist.

But it was as the founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the world at large knew him best. He founded the orchestra in 1881 and withdrew from it last April (1918), after the arrest and internment of its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck.

For many years the Boston Orchestra was admitted to rank among the best string bands in the United States, but it was never a moneymaker. There were seasons when the deficit reached $50,000, but Major Higginson never weakened.

In December, 1903, he came into conflict with the Musical Union, which ordered twenty players of the orchestra to take out union cards. The result of the dispute was that seventy-seven members of the orchestra who had union cards returned them. Major Higginson said at that time if he was permitted to carry on the work of the orchestra as he wished, its life should not end with his death. He justified this promise several years later by the announcement that his will provided $1,000,000 to perpetuate the orchestra.

From EVENING SUN

Address New York City

Date NOV 18 1919

Major Higginson.

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON, whose military rank was won by service in the Civil War, was sometimes thought of as "the first citizen of Boston," less, possibly, on account of his war record and his activity for the preservation of certain American landmarks of establishment and tradition, than because of his founding the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Yet a sentence in his will, from the clause by which he bequeathed a million dollars to perpetuate that orchestra, may be read profitably at the present juncture in the world's history by many men of widely varying opinions. "I believe," said Major HIGGINSON, "that a man who lives for himself and his own interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot."

"The greatest string band in the Western Hemisphere," as it was called, gave its first concert in 1881. Its founder's interest in it was merely that of a devoted amateur of music. Each year he made up a substantial, sometimes a heavy, deficit. Its fame rested about equally upon the individual merit of its members—whose faith to the organization covered not only their individual virtuosity but single loyalty to its collective interests—and upon the consummate quality of the whole great orchestra as a single instrument responding to its leader's direction. Its successive conductors contributed harmoniously to its fame as an organism. The war, at last, was able to introduce a lamentably discordant note in the orchestra's history when Major HIGGINSON was more than eighty years old.

In the Boston Symphony Orchestra the United States—and all the civilized world—may behold the worthiest monument to Major HIGGINSON. An organization of the best performers of the best music, moved by the best ideals, removed from the whip of commercial domination, responding only to the spur of the artist's aspiration—this great band now enters upon the second period of its life. Its value to the world will be shown in spite of a determination among rebellious spirits to throw away tradition and rebuild a world without foundation or coherent mass.

From EVENING GLOBE

Address: New York City

Date

MAJOR HIGGINSON, MUSIC PATRON, DIES

Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra Succumbs After Operation —Nearly 85 Years Old.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced to-day. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the symphony orchestra, which he established in 1881. He was born in New York City Nov. 18, 1834.

Funeral services for Major Higginson, who was a member of the Corporation of Harvard University, will be held in Appleton Chapel at the university on Monday at noon. Recitations and lectures in all departments will be suspended from 12 to 1 o'clock on that day.

In a statement issued at the university offices to-day Major Higginson is referred to as one of Harvard's greatest benefactors.

Two years ago after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the symphony organization.

At the time it was explained that his advanced years made it necessary that he be relieved of the administrative burden. The control of the orchestra, at Major Higginson's request, then passed into the hands of a board of trustees.

From EVENING MAIL

Address: New York City

Date NOV 15 1919

HENRY L. HIGGINSON, BOSTON BANKER, DIES

Financier Also Was Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced to-day.

Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours.

Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

EVENING GLOBE

s: New York City

MAJOR HIGGINSON, MUSIC PATRON, DIES

Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Succumbs After Operation —Nearly 85 Years Old.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced to-day. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the symphony orchestra, which he established in 1881. He was born in New York City Nov. 18, 1834.

NEW YORK ESTABLISHED 1881

From American New York City

Henry L. Higginson Is Dead in Boston

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital but a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years old.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old trouble for which he was under treatment last Winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the Symphony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

From TRIBUNE, New York City

Maj. Higginson's Funeral At Harvard University

Members of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Which He Founded, Play at Services

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Nov. 17.—Harvard University suspended activities for an hour to-day while funeral services were held in honor of Major Henry Lee Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died Friday night. He was a former Harvard student.

Simple services were held in Appleton Chapel on the university campus, where Major Higginson was married fifty years ago. The Rev. Samuel M Crothers, a Harvard graduate, conducted the ceremony. The university choir sang and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra played. President A. Lawrence Lowell and the Fellows o the university acted as honorary pallbearers. Nephews of Mr. Higginson were actual pallbearers surrendered the casket to undergraduates at the chapel door.

From this point the body w through a double rank of un uates, who lined the walk to sity Hall, where the hearse wa Mount Auburn Cemetery Dr. H. Ropes conducted a

...ymphony Orchestra is to

FADED TEXT

EVENING SUN
New York City
NOV 15 1919

H. L. HIGGINSON, BANKER, IS DEAD

Founder and Patron of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NOTED AS PHILANTHROPIST

Led Protest Against Brandeis for Supreme Court.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Major Henry Lee Higginson, head of the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., died at the Massachusetts General Hospital here at 8:15 last night, it was announced to-day.

Henry L. Higginson, New Englander of pre-Revolutionary descent, was locally celebrated as a great banker, a generous philanthropist and, as Boston's "first citizen," a man to be relied upon whenever the welfare of the community was in question.

Conservative to the last degree Major Higginson led the protest which was conducted without success in 1916 against the appointment of Louis D. Brandeis to the Federal Supreme Court. But it was as the founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the world at large knew him best. He founded the orchestra in 1881 and withdrew from it last April (1918) after the arrest and internment of its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck.

For many years the Boston Orchestra was admitted to rank among the best string bands in the United States, but it was never a money maker. There were seasons when the deficit reached $50,000, but Major Higginson never weakened. His interest was that of a devoted amateur of music who could afford to indulge his tastes.

In December, 1903, he came into conflict with the musical union, which ordered twenty players of the orchestra to take out union cards. The result of the dispute was that seventy-seven members of the orchestra who had union cards returned them. Major Higginson said at that time if he was permitted to carry on the work of the orchestra as he wished, its life should not end with his death. He justified his promise several years later by the announcement that he will provided $1,000,000 to perpetuate the orchestra.

In the storm which centred about Dr. Muck when it was charged that he refused to play "The Star Spangled Banner" at a concert in Providence Major Higginson denied that the orchestra had ever refused the national anthem to an audience. After the Federal authorities took action Major Higginson refused to discuss the subject and later announced that he had severed his connection with the orchestra, which would for the future be managed by a corporate board of trustees.

On his eighty-fourth birthday a souvenir book was presented to him containing the signatures of 4,000 patrons of the orchestra's concerts. Dr. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard, filled the first page of the book with a letter of dedication.

Born in New York.

Major Higginson was born in this city Nov. 18, 1834. He was the son of George and Mary Cabet Lee Higginson and a descendant of Francis Higginson who settled in Salem, Mass., in 1629. The family moved to Boston and in 1855 young Higginson entered Harvard. He left college without graduating to enter the banking house of S. & E. Austin. Except for a year he spent in Venice, Italy, studying music he remained with the firm until the outbreak of the Civil War. In 1861 he was commissioned Second Lieutenant in the 2d Massachusetts Volunteers.

Early in 1862 he was promoted to a Majority and later was brevetted Lieutenant-Colonel for gallantry under fire. Wounded four times, he was retired for disability in August, 1864. Although really a Colonel, he was almost always called Major to distinguish him from his neighbor, Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson. He took great pride in his war record, and a story told about him said that, once a year he slept, campaign fashion, on an army cot in a room furnished with war relics.

During the Civil War, while he was on leave in Boston, he married Miss [illegible] Agassiz, daughter of the biologist, [illegible]is Agassiz. Their only child, Alexander H. Higginson, figured in a divorce suit in 1904 when he was sued by a Kentucky beauty of 19 years.

Head of Big Firm.

Immediately after his discharge from the army Major Higginson went with [illegible] and tried to manage a plantation in Georgia.

Hearst
New York City
Nov 16 1919

MAJ. H. L. HIGGINSON, BOSTON BANKER, DIES

Founder of Symphony Orchestra Was Operated On for an Old Ailment at Nearly 85.

A BENEFACTOR OF HARVARD

Internment of Dr. Muck Led Him to Give Up His Connection with Orchestra After 37 Years.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital only a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday, Major Higginson would have been 85 years of age.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old ailment for which he was under treatment last Winter. Although head of the firm of Lee Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the Sym[illegible]

[illegible]hony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Henry Lee Higginson, banker, philanthropist and patron of music, was born in New York City, Nov. 18, 1834, the son of George and Mary Cabot Higginson, and a descendant of Francis Higginson, who came to this country in 1629 and settled at Salem, Mass. He spent only two years at Harvard in the class of 1855, interrupting his course to enter the counting house of S. & E. Austin in Boston, where he remained until the outbreak of the civil war, with the exception of one year's musical study in Vienna.

Entering the war as a Second Lieutenant of Massachusetts volunteers in May, 1861 he was discharged four years later on the ground of disability, having reached the rank of Major and been brevetted Lieutenant Colonel. In the battle of Aldie he had received five wounds.

After an unsuccessful experiment in cotton growing near Savannah Major Higginson, who had married, in 1863, Miss Ida Agassiz, entered the Boston banking house of Lee, Higginson & Co. This firm, of which he later became the virtual head on the retirement of Mr. Lee, has financed some of the most important undertakings of the last fifty years.

Among the loyal sons and benefactors of Harvard University Major Higginson stood among the very first. In 1891 he presented to the university the great athletic ground known as Soldiers' Field. This gift was a memorial to the friends of his youth, who gave their lives in the civil war, and his speech at the dedicatory exercises was regarded as a notable oratorical tribute. In 1899 he provided $150,000 for the building of the Harvard Union, a club to which all members of the university were eligible. The purpose of the donor in this instance was to counteract the influence of exclusive cliques and extravagant living.

The service by which Major Higginson is most widely known and for which he will be longest remembered is his foundation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its first concert on Oct. 22, 1881. This organization set a standard of the highest artistic excellence under a line of famous conductors, including Georg Henschel, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Wilhelm Gericke, Gustav Fiedler and Dr. Karl Muck, and as the first prominent orchestra to be formed upon a permanent basis it led to the establishment of similar organizations in other cities.

The support of the orchestra was said to involve the making up of an annual deficit that averaged about $20,000. Some years ago, after the complete separation of the members of the orchestra from the musicians' union, their patron announced that his will provided $1,000,000 to perpetuate the organization.

Major Higginson relinquished his active connection with the orchestra after the Federal authorities interned its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. It was asserted and denied that the leader had refused to play "The Star Spangled Banner." At any rate, he did play it after complaints were heard. There were many assertions as to his citizenship and pro-Germanism. The storm that arose was a hard trial for the founder, who was 84 years old. In the Spring of 1918 he said farewell in Symphony Hall, Boston, and placed the affairs of the orchestra in the hands of the trustees.

Funeral services will be held tomorrow at noon in Appleton Chapel at Harvard.

[illegible]

he returned to Boston and entered the banking house of Lee, Higginson & Co. When Henry Lee retired in 189[illegible] Major Higginson became head of the firm. He was admitted to the Boston Stock Exchange in 1868 and to the New York Stock Exchange in 1876.

The famous Soldiers Field at Harvard was his memorial to friends who died in service, including Charles Russell Lowell, Robert Gould Shaw, James Savage, Jr., Edward B. Dalton and others.

In 1899 he endowed the university with $150,000 for the building of the Harvard Union. He was elected to the Harvard Corporation in 1893 and [illegible] Trustee of the Carnegie Institution

HERALD
New York City
NOV 16 1919

Major Henry Lee Higginson, Banker and Founder of Boston Orchestra, Dies

Succumbs in Hospital Soon After Operation—Served with Distinction in Civil War.

BOSTON, Mass., Saturday.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital only a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

Funeral services for Major Higginson, who was a member of the Corporation of Harvard University, will be held in Appleton Chapel, at the university, on Monday at noon. Recitations and lectures in all departments will be suspended from twelve to one o'clock on that day.

In a statement issued at the university offices today Major Higginson is referred to as one of Harvard's greatest benefactors. The statement adds:—

"He gave the Harvard Union, which for many years has been useful as a common meeting place for Harvard men and as a great club to which all members of the university are eligible. He also gave Soldiers' Field. His services as a fellow of the corporation are too many and valuable to recount. His death will be mourned by Harvard men everywhere."

Severed Connection with Orchestra.

Two years ago, after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the Symphony organization which he had formed in 1881.

At the time it was explained that his advanced years made it necessary that he be relieved of the administrative burden. The control of the orchestra, at Major Higginson's request, then passed into the hands of a board of trustees.

Major Henry Lee Higginson, banker, philanthropist, founder of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra and donor to Harvard University of the magnificent athletic tract known as "Soldiers' Field," was born in New York city November 18, 1834.

He was the son of George and Mary Cabot (Lee) Higginson and a descendant of Francis Higginson, who came to the United States about 1629, settling in Salem, Mass. He was reared in Boston, where his family resided in his boyhood, and matriculated in Harvard in the class of 1855, but left college before graduation to enter the counting house of S. & E. Austin, of Boston. With the exception of the year 1856, which he passed abroad in the study of music in Vienna, he remained with that firm until the outbreak of the civil war.

His war record was highly creditable. Commissioned a second lieutenant in the Second Regiment, Massachusetts Volunteers, in May, 1861, he was transferred to the cavalry arm of the service and by March, 1862, had risen by promotion to the rank of major. Two years later he was brevetted lieutenant colonel for gallantry and in July, 1864, was serving on the staff of Major General Barlow, First Division, Second Army Corps. In August, 1864, he was discharged for disability, having received four wounds in the battle of Aldie.

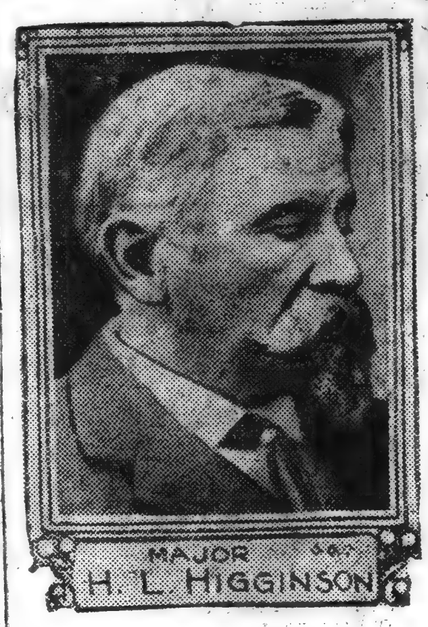
Entered Banking Business.

Major Higginson after the war entered the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., of Boston. When, in 1897, Henry Lee relinquished the leadership he became virtually head of the firm. He was admitted to the Boston Stock Exchange in 1868 and to the New York Stock Exchange in 1876.

Despite his legal and business responsibilities, he devoted much of his time and interest to the advancement of educational movements. In 1891 he gave to Harvard "Soldiers' Field," which he presented as a memorial to friends who had died in the service of the country—General Charles Russell Lowell, Colonel Robert Gould Shaw, Colonel James Savage, Jr.; Colonel Edward B. Dalton and others. His tribute to the memory of these men, spoken at the dedicatory exercises of the memorial, was one of the most memorable orations ever delivered in the history of the university. He also endowed Harvard in 1899 with $150,000 for the erection of the Harvard Union, a club house for all members of the university, which was intended to counteract the influence of exclusive cliques and of extravagant living.

Major Higginson's most conspicuous service to the community probably was in the founding and fostering for years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the few eminent organizations of its kind in the world and one which has set a high standard of excellence throughout the United States. It gave its first concert on October 22, 1881.

In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert musicians from the capitals of Europe and engaged conductors of the first rank. Only in one or two years, however, did the concerts yield a net revenue. In every other year Major Higginson made up the deficits from his private fortune. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first class music for persons of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at twenty-five cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years come to be concerts in full form.



Orchestra Was His Hobby.

The symphony orchestra Major Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

After having ben its guarantor against loss, its founder and its patron for thirty-seven years, Major Higginson severed his connection with the orchestra organization in March, 1918, under somewhat unpleasant circumstances so recent as to be well remembered. The refusal of certain subscribers to continue unless the orchestra dropped from its membership roll several enemy aliens, trouble over the alleged refusal of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, to play "The Star Spangled Banner" while on tour, and attacks led by Mrs. William Jay against the reported disloyalty of the conductor and some of his leading musicians caused Major Higginson, already more than eighty years old, to wash his hands of the whole controversy by withdrawing from his connection with it.

Though Dr. Muck retired from the leadership, Major Higginson had stood by the conductor to the end. He made public a statement in which he asserted that Dr. Muck had never refused to play "The Star Spangled Banner," that he was not an enemy alien, but a citizen of the Swiss Republic, and that he had never made any remark discourteous to the American people or the American flag.

Major Higginson became a member of the Harvard Corporation in 1893 and a trustee of the Carnegie Institution in 1902. In 1882 the degree of M.A. was conferred upon him by Harvard, and in 1901 that of LL.D. by Yale University. He married at Cambridge, Mass., December 5, 1863, Ida, daughter of Professor Louis Agassiz, and had one child.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
NOV 15 19[illegible]

HIGGINSON, WHO BACKED BOSTON SYMPHONY, DEAD

Noted Banker and Civil War Veteran, Defender of Dr. Muck, Succumbs.

By International News Service.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Major Henry Lee Higginson, one of the foremost bankers of the United States and founder of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, died suddenly at the Massachusetts General Hospital early to-day. He succumbed after an operation for an internal disorder. He had been ill but a few days.

Major Higginson gained widespread notoriety in the latter stages of the world war when he insisted upon retaining Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the famous orchestra in the face of widespread protests from patriotic organizations all over the country.

The uproar against Muck was precipitated by his refusal or failure to include "The Star Spangled Banner" in concert programmes. In defense of the conductor Major Higginson issued a statement declaring that the omission of the anthem had been a "mistake" and absolving Muck of all blame. Finally Dr. Muck was arrested and lodged in jail as an enemy alien, and the banker announced that he had accepted the conductor's resignation, "to take effect when the present series of concerts ends."

CIVIL WAR VETERAN.

Later the banker retired from the orchestra organization and it was taken over by a syndicate. The orchestra was founded by Major Higginson in 1881. For many years it suffered a regular deficit, which was made up by the banker from his own pocket. Finally it became noted as one of the foremost orchestras of the world, and in later years was a big paying enterprise.

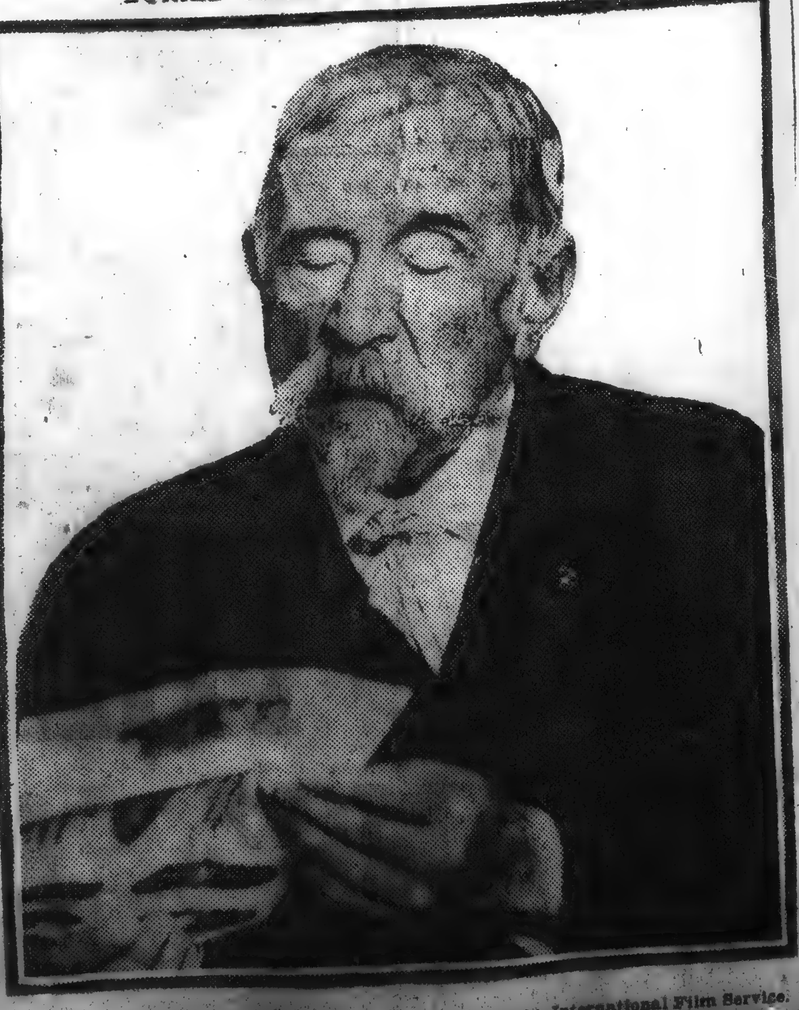
Major Higginson was born in New York City on November 18, 1834. He studied at Harvard, and in 1856 went to Vienna and took a course in music. When the Civil War broke out he enlisted and was wounded several times, finally rising to the rank of major and brevet lieutenant-colonel. After the war he went to Boston and became head of the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

Through his marriage to Ida Agassiz on December 5, 1863, two great financial houses were united. Mrs. Higginson was at his bedside, when the Major died. His son, A. Henry Higginson, is noted in the world of sport as a lover and owner of thoroughbred hunters and running horses.

EVENING SUN
New York City
NOV 17 1919

[illegible] THE [illegible]

BURIED FROM CHAPEL AT HARVARD.



Copyright, International Film Service.

Major Henry Lee Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony

FADED TEXT

EVENING SUN
New York City
NOV 15 1918

H. L. HIGGINSON, BANKER, IS DEAD

Founder and Patron of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NOTED AS PHILANTHROPIST

Led Protest Against Brandeis for Supreme Court.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Major Henry Lee Higginson, head of the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., died at the Massachusetts General Hospital here at 3:15 last night, it was announced to-day.

Henry L. Higginson, New Englander of pre-Revolutionary descent, was locally celebrated as a great banker, a generous philanthropist and, as Boston's "first citizen," a man to be relied upon whenever the welfare of the community was in question.

Conservative to the last degree Major Higginson led the protest which was conducted without success in 1916 against the appointment of Louis D. Brandeis to the Federal Supreme Court. But it was as the founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the world at large knew him best. He founded the orchestra in 1881 and withdrew from it last April (1918) after the arrest and internment of its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck.

For many years the Boston Orchestra was admitted to rank among the best string bands in the United States, but it was never a money maker. There were seasons when the deficit reached $50,000, but Major Higginson never weakened. His interest was that of a devoted amateur of music who could afford to indulge his tastes.

In December, 1903, he came into conflict with the musical union, which ordered twenty players of the orchestra to take out union cards. The result of the dispute was that seventy-seven members of the orchestra who had union cards returned them. Major Higginson said at that time if he was permitted to carry on the work of the orchestra as he wished, its life should not end with his death. He justified this promise several years later by the announcement that he will provided $1,000,000 to perpetuate the orchestra.

In the storm which centred about Dr. Muck when it was charged that he refused to play "The Star Spangled Banner" at a concert in Providence Major Higginson denied that the orchestra had ever refused the national anthem to an audience. After the Federal authorities took action Major Higginson refused to discuss the subject and later announced that he had severed his connection with the orchestra, which would for the future be managed by a corporate board of trustees.

On his eighty-fourth birthday a souvenir book was presented to him containing the signatures of 4,000 patrons of the orchestra's concerts. Dr. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard, filled the first page of the book with a letter of dedication.

Born in New York.

Major Higginson was born in this city Nov. 18, 1834. He was the son of George and Mary Cabet Lee Higginson and a descendant of Francis Higginson who settled in Salem, Mass., in 1629. The family moved to Boston and in 1855 young Higginson entered Harvard. He left college without graduating to enter the banking house of S. & E. Austin. Except for a year he spent in Venice, Italy, studying music he remained with the firm until the outbreak of the Civil War. In 1861 he was commissioned Second Lieutenant in the 2d Massachusetts Volunteers.

Early in 1862 he was promoted to a Majority and later was brevetted Lieutenant-Colonel for gallantry under fire. Wounded four times, he was retired for disability in August, 1864. Although really a Colonel, he was almost always called Major to distinguish him from his neighbor, Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson. He took great pride in his war record, and a story told about him said that once a year he slept, campaign fashion, on an army cot in a room furnished with war relics.

During the Civil War, while he was on leave in Boston, he married Miss [illegible] Agassiz, daughter of the biologist, Louis Agassiz. Their only child, Alexander H. Higginson, figured in a divorce suit in 1904 when he was sued by a Kentucky beauty of 19 years.

Head of Big Firm.

Immediately after his discharge from the army Major Higginson with [illegible] went South and tried to manage a cotton plantation in Georgia. He returned to Boston and entered the banking house of Lee, Higginson & Co. When Henry Lee retired in 1897 Major Higginson became head of the firm. He was admitted to the Boston Stock Exchange in 1868 and to the New York Stock Exchange in 1876.

The famous Soldiers Field at Harvard was his memorial to friends who died in service, including Charles Russell Lowell, Robert Gould Shaw, James Savage, Jr., Edward B. Dalton and others.

In 1899 he endowed the university with $150,000 for the building of the Harvard Union. He was elected to the Harvard Corporation in 1893 and a trustee of the Carnegie Institution

Hired

New York City
Nov 16 1918

MAJ. H. L. HIGGINSON, BOSTON BANKER, DIES

Founder of Symphony Orchestra Was Operated On for an Old Ailment at Nearly 85.

A BENEFACTOR OF HARVARD

Internment of Dr. Muck Led Him to Give Up His Connection with Orchestra After 37 Years.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital only a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday, Major Higginson would have been 85 years of age.

The death of Major Higginson was due to a recurrence of an old ailment for which he was under treatment last Winter. Although head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., bankers, Major Higginson was probably most widely known through his association with the Sym[illegible]

[illegible]hony Orchestra. He had been a member of the banking firm since 1868.

Henry Lee Higginson, banker, philanthropist and patron of music, was born in New York City, Nov. 18, 1834, the son of George and Mary Cabot Higginson, and a descendant of Francis Higginson, who came to this country in 1629 and settled at Salem, Mass. He spent only two years at Harvard in the class of 1855, interrupting his course to enter the counting house of S. & E. Austin in Boston, where he remained until the outbreak of the civil war, with the exception of one year's musical study in Vienna.

Entering the war as a Second Lieutenant of Massachusetts volunteers in May, 1861 he was discharged four years later on the ground of disability, having reached the rank of Major and been brevetted Lieutenant Colonel. In the battle of Aldie he had received five wounds.

After an unsuccessful experiment in cotton growing near Savannah Major Higginson, who had married, in 1863, Miss Ida Agassiz, entered the Boston banking house of Lee, Higginson & Co. This firm, of which he later became the virtual head on the retirement of Mr. Lee, has financed some of the most important undertakings of the last fifty years.

Among the loyal sons and benefactors of Harvard University Major Higginson stood among the very first. In 1891 he presented to the university the great athletic ground known as Soldiers' Field. This gift was a memorial to the friends of his youth, who gave their lives in the civil war, and his speech at the dedicatory exercises was regarded as a notable oratorical tribute. In 1899 he provided $150,000 for the building of the Harvard Union, a club to which all members of the university were eligible. The purpose of the donor in this instance was to counteract the influence of exclusive cliques and extravagant living.

The service by which Major Higginson is most widely known and for which he will be longest remembered is his foundation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its first concert on Oct. 22, 1881. This organization set a standard of the highest artistic excellence under a line of famous conductors, including Georg Henschel, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Wilhelm Gericke, Gustav Fiedler and Dr. Karl Muck, and as the first prominent orchestra to be formed upon a permanent basis it led to the establishment of similar organizations in other cities.

The support of the orchestra was said to involve the making up of an annual deficit that averaged about $20,000. Some years ago, after the complete separation of the members of the orchestra from the musicians' union, their patron announced that his will provided $1,000,000 to perpetuate the organization.

Major Higginson relinquished his active connection with the orchestra after the Federal authorities interned its conductor. Dr. Karl Muck. It was asserted and denied that the leader had refused to play "The Star Spangled Banner." At any rate, he did play it after complaints were heard. There were many assertions as to his citizenship and pro-Germanism. The storm that arose was a hard trial for the founder, who was 84 years old. In the Spring of 1918 he said farewell in Symphony Hall, Boston, and placed the affairs of the orchestra in the hands of the trustees.

Funeral services will be held tomorrow at noon in Appleton Chapel at Harvard.

[illegible]

HERALD
[illegible]w York City
NOV 16 1918

Major Henry Lee Higginson, Banker and Founder of Boston Orchestra, Dies

Succumbs in Hospital Soon After Operation—Served with Distinction in Civil War.

BOSTON, Mass., Saturday.—The death of Major Henry L. Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was announced today. Major Higginson died at the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an operation performed during the afternoon. He had been at the hospital only a few hours. Had he lived until next Tuesday Major Higginson would have been eighty-five years of age.

Funeral services for Major Higginson, who was a member of the Corporation of Harvard University, will be held in Appleton Chapel, at the university, on Monday at noon. Recitations and lectures in all departments will be suspended from twelve to one o'clock on that day.

In a statement issued at the university offices today Major Higginson is referred to as one of Harvard's greatest benefactors. The statement adds:—

"He gave the Harvard Union, which for many years has been useful as a common meeting place for Harvard men and as a great club to which all members of the university are eligible. He also gave Soldiers' Field. His services as a fellow of the corporation are too many and valuable to recount. His death will be mourned by Harvard men everywhere."

Severed Connection with Orchestra.

Two years ago, after the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, as an enemy alien, Major Higginson relinquished active direction of the Symphony organization which he had formed in 1881.

At the time it was explained that his advanced years made it necessary that he be relieved of the administrative burden. The control of the orchestra, at Major Higginson's request, then passed into the hands of a board of trustees.

Major Henry Lee Higginson, banker, philanthropist, founder of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra and donor to Harvard University of the magnificent athletic tract known as "Soldiers' Field," was born in New York city November 18, 1834.

He was the son of George and Mary Cabot (Lee) Higginson and a descendant of Francis Higginson, who came to the United States about 1629, settling in Salem, Mass. He was reared in Boston, where his family resided in his boyhood, and matriculated in Harvard in the class of 1855, but left college before graduation to enter the counting house of S. & E. Austin, of Boston. With the exception of the year 1856, which he passed abroad in the study of music in Vienna, he remained with that firm until the outbreak of the civil war.

His war record was highly creditable. Commissioned a second lieutenant in the Second Regiment, Massachusetts Volunteers, in May, 1861, he was transferred to the cavalry arm of the service and by March, 1862, had risen by promotion to the rank of major. Two years later he was brevetted lieutenant colonel for gallantry and in July, 1864, was serving on the staff of Major General Barlow, First Division, Second Army Corps. In August, 1864, he was discharged for disability, having received four wounds in the battle of Aldie.

Entered Banking Business.

Major Higginson after the war entered the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., of Boston. When, in 1897, Henry Lee relinquished the leadership he became virtually head of the firm. He was admitted to the Boston Stock Exchange in 1868 and to the New York Stock Exchange in 1876.

Despite his legal and business responsibilities, he devoted much of his time and interest to the advancement of educational movements. In 1891 he gave to Harvard "Soldiers' Field," which he presented as a memorial to friends who had died in the service of the country—General Charles Russell Lowell, Colonel Robert Gould Shaw, Colonel James Savage, Jr.; Colonel Edward B. Dalton and others. His tribute to the memory of these men, spoken at the dedicatory exercises of the memorial, was one of the most memorable orations ever delivered in the history of the university. He also endowed Harvard in 1899 with $150,000 for the erection of the Harvard Union, a club house for all members of the university, which was intended to counteract the influence of exclusive cliques and of extravagant living.

Major Higginson's most conspicuous service to the community probably was in the founding and fostering for years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the few eminent organizations of its kind in the world and one which has set a high standard of excellence throughout the United States. It gave its first concert on October 22, 1881.

In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert musicians from the capitals of Europe and engaged conductors of the first rank. Only in one or two years, however, did the concerts yield a net revenue. In every other year Major Higginson made up the deficits from his private fortune. One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first class music for persons of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at twenty-five cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years come to be concerts in full form.

Orchestra Was His Hobby.

The symphony orchestra Major Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

After having ben its guarantor against loss, its founder and its patron for thirty-seven years, Major Higginson severed his connection with the orchestra organization in March, 1918, under somewhat unpleasant circumstances so recent as to be well remembered. The refusal of certain subscribers to continue unless the orchestra dropped from its membership roll several enemy aliens, trouble over the alleged refusal of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, to play "The Star Spangled Banner" while on tour, and attacks led by Mrs. William Jay against the reported disloyalty of the conductor and some of his leading musicians caused Major Higginson, already more than eighty years old, to wash his hands of the whole controversy by withdrawing from his connection with it.

Though Dr. Muck retired from the leadership, Major Higginson had stood by the conductor to the end. He made public a statement in which he asserted that Dr. Muck had never refused to play "The Star Spangled Banner," that he was not an enemy alien, but a citizen of the Swiss Republic, and that he had never made any remark discourteous to the American people or the American flag.

Major Higginson became a member of the Harvard Corporation in 1893 and a trustee of the Carnegie Institution in 1902. In 1882 the degree of M.A. was conferred upon him by Harvard, and in 1901 that of LL.D. by Yale University. He married at Cambridge, Mass., December 5, 1863, Ida, daughter of Professor Louis Agassiz, and had one child.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
NOV 15 1[illegible]

HIGGINSON, WHO BACKED BOSTON SYMPHONY, DEAD

Noted Banker and Civil War Veteran, Defender of Dr. Muck, Succumbs.

By International News Service.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Major Henry Lee Higginson, one of the foremost bankers of the United States and founder of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, died suddenly at the Massachusetts General Hospital early to-day. He succumbed after an operation for an internal disorder. He had been ill but a few days.

Major Higginson gained widespread notoriety in the latter stages of the world war when he insisted upon retaining Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the famous orchestra in the face of widespread protests from patriotic organizations all over the country.

The uproar against Muck was precipitated by his refusal or failure to include "The Star Spangled Banner" in concert programmes. In defense of the conductor Major Higginson issued a statement declaring that the omission of the anthem had been a "mistake" and absolving Muck of all blame. Finally Dr. Muck was arrested and lodged in jail as an enemy alien, and the banker announced that he had accepted the conductor's resignation, "to take effect when the present series of concerts ends."

CIVIL WAR VETERAN.

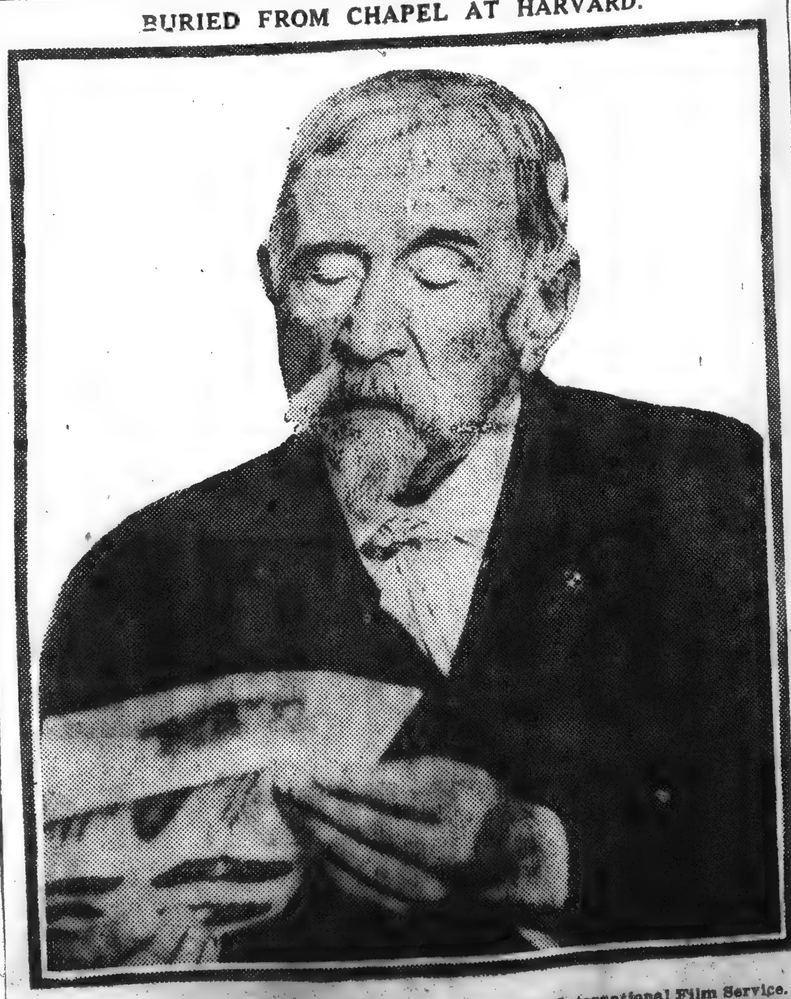
Later the banker retired from the orchestra organization and it was taken over by a syndicate. The orchestra was founded by Major Higginson in 1881. For many years it suffered a regular deficit, which was made up by the banker from his own pocket. Finally it became noted as one of the foremost orchestras of the world, and in later years was a big paying enterprise.

Major Higginson was born in New York City on November 18, 1834. He studied at Harvard, and in 1856 went to Vienna and took a course in music. When the Civil War broke out he enlisted and was wounded several times, finally rising to the rank of major and brevet lieutenant-colonel. After the war he went to Boston and became head of the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

Through his marriage to Ida Agassiz on December 5, 1863, two great financial houses were united. Mrs. Higginson was at his bedside, when the Major died. His son, A. Henry Higginson, is noted in the world of sport as a lover and owner of thoroughbred hunters and running horses.

EVENING SUN
New York City
[illegible]

BURIED FROM CHAPEL AT HARVARD.



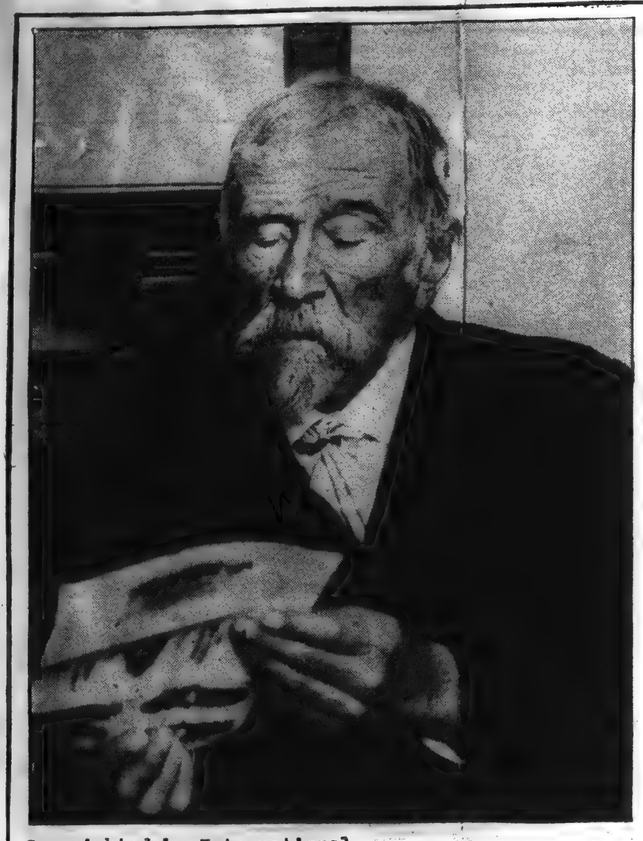
Copyright, International Film Service.

Major Henry Lee Higginson, banker and founder of the Boston Symphony

LETTERS - AND - ART

BOSTON'S MAECENAS

BOSTON'S SUPREME BID for present day fame, it may be, has been its orchestra. Police strikes are temporary disturbances; but the soul of the orchestra, tho the body of the founder has died, lives on. In Major Henry L. Higginson, who died on November 14, is seen a public figure whose example has done more than any other to forward the cause of music in America. The Newark "News" reviewing Mr. Pulitzer's aid to the New York Philharmonic, Mr. Harkness's aid to the New York Symphony, and Philadelphia's rescue of her great orchestra from its financial straits, sees "the genesis of all these movements in Major Higginson's patronage of the Boston Symphony." Founding the orchestra in 1881, there was scarcely a year when his assistance, varying from $2,000 to $40,000, was not needed to meet its deficits. But in giving these sums, says the "News," "he relieved the Boston Symphony from the necessity of meeting its expenses, setting the musicians free to devote themselves to rehearsal and the perfection of their art." But the orchestra, says the New York "Evening Post," "Major Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth." His "incomparable service to American music," says the Springfield "Republican," can best be appreciated "by recalling the low estate of orchestral music in this country when he made possible the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." Thus:



Copyrighted by International.

FOUNDER OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Major Henry L. Higginson, who looked upon the orchestra as his hobby as other rich men look upon their yachts or art-galleries.

"The one good orchestra in the United States was that of Theodore Thomas, which was leading a precarious existence, and the excellence of which depended mainly upon the personal qualities of its leader, who did wonders with the material available. But what Mr. Higginson had in mind was an orchestra which should be not a personal venture, but an institution--a permanent orchestra not merely in the sense of a secure existence, but in the sense, hardly comprehended then in America, of having a permanent personnel. Even in the best orchestras players would miss rehearsals to take other engagements, or attend the rehearsals and send a substitute to the concert. This was harassing to conductors, but there was no remedy unless men could be paid adequately for giving their full time to the orchestra. The achievement of this ideal was the essential part of Mr. Higginson's contribution to music in America, but not stopping there he gratified his fine sense for beauty by undertaking at any cost to make it as perfect an orchestra as could be made.

"This meant paying such salaries as would tempt orchestral musicians of the first rank to leave the European capitals for a remote city not yet on the musical map. It meant an incessant search for the best talent and a generous support of the conductor chosen. When Mr. Gericke, who succeeded George Henschel, had the whim of supplying all the string players with instruments by the same maker, the instruments were forthcoming, tho the exporiment did not achieve the success hoped for. Complete loyalty to the leader selected was not the least of the causes of Mr. Higginson's splendid success; he was wise enough to provide the means and then to refrain from meddling. Whether popular or the reverse, a conductor during the term of his contract had an authority which the czar of Russia might envy; it was not many years before Boston's new orchestra won fame as the best disciplined, the most fastidiously perfect, in the world. Often it was much more than this, the level of its performances varying with the genius of its leader. But except for a brief period during the turmoil of war, it has never fallen below the unsurpassed standard of technical perfection the attainment of which in a peculiar degree depended on its patron's support. It sometimes cost him $20,000 or more a year, but as he liked to put it, the cost was no more than the upkeep of a steam yacht. But has any yachtsman got so much for his money as Mr. Higginson got from the Symphony Orchestra?"

Boston itself knew Major Higginson as a banker and man-of-affairs, but he was many things in his lifetime. The "Evening Post", running over the facts of his career, speaks of him first as a student at Harvard, then a student of music in Vienna and Rome:

"On his return [illegible] 1860, he joined the Army, in which [illegible] of major and brevet lieuten[illegible] 1865 he 'struck oil' in Ohio and soon [illegible] much that he was able to become a partner [illegible] banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. Had he followed the advice offered by a friend, 'Don't grow rich; if you once begin you'll find it much more difficult to be a useful citizen,' he would have lost the opportunity to become one of the most useful citizens Boston has ever had. While studying in Vienna he conceived the hope that some one would establish in Boston an orchestra equal to those he had heard in Europe. Little did he dream that the time would come when he himself would be able to carry out such an ambitious and costly project.

"He soon discovered that many other things besides money were needed to realize the dream of his life. His attempts to start a permanent orchestra, with a substantial backing, naturally aroused the opposition of the struggling organizations then in existence, which helps to account for the hostility of the Boston press to an institution which subsequently conferred so much honor on the Hub."

From
Outlook
New York City
DEC 3 - 1919

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

Though love repine and reason chafe,
There came a voice without reply—
"'Tis man's perdition to be safe,
When for the truth he ought to die."

THESE are the familiar lines which Henry Lee Higginson chose for an inscription to stand at the entrance of the great athletic field which he gave to his University, Harvard. Major Higginson has died, but his love for his University and his abiding faith in its ideals and

(C) International

MAJOR HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

the ideals of American collegiate education will not soon be forgotten. The "Harvard Alumni Bulletin" calls Major Higginson Harvard's greatest benefactor, and the title is well deserved. For he gave not only material things, but a devoted service, which was one of the controlling influences of his own life.

Major Higginson's educational ideals are summed up in a quotation from the address which he made at Harvard University when he turned over to the Corporation the broad acres of The Soldier's Field. The gift of The Soldier's Field was dedicated to the memory of his friends who fell in the Civil War, in the year 1890, but his remarks on the occasion of the transfer of that property have a very direct bearing upon our problems to-day. Major Higginson said:

> Everywhere we see the signs of ferment—questions social, moral, mental, physical, economic. The pot is boiling hard and you must tend it, or it will run over and scald the world. For us came the great questions of slavery and of

From Literary Digest
New York City
DEC 6 - 1919

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 15 19

MAJOR HIGGINSON IS DEAD IN BOSTON

Founder of Famous Symphony Orchestra Expires in His 84th Year.

VETERAN OF THE CIVIL WAR.

Generous Contributor to Charity and Betterment Funds.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Henry Lee Higginson, head of the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., died at his home last night, it was announced to-day. He was in his eighty-fourth year.

Major Henry Lee Higginson, war veteran and banker, and father of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, was born in New York, Nov. 18, 1834. He studied at Harvard, then went to Vienna, where he studied music. He returned at the breaking out of the civil war and served in the volunteer cavalry until 1863, when he was wounded at Aldie, Va., and returned with the rank of major. He was a member of the banking house of Lee, Higginson & Co., and a director in many public service corporations, mining companies and educational institutions. He was a generous contributor to charities and betterment funds, and spent a fortune in organizing the Boston Symphony Orchestra; figured prominently in the controversy over the playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Karl Muck was then the conductor and as a result of which he retired from the control of that organization in April, 1918.

From Commerce & Finance
New York City
NOV 19 1919

MAJOR HIGGINSON

Major Henry Lee Higginson is dead. It will surprise most people to learn that he was born in New York, for as head of the great Boston banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., and founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he was peculiarly identified with the New England metropolis and was generally regarded as its first citizen.

His ancestral record went back to the Mayflower and beyond, his title of Major was won by distinguished service in the Civil War, he was a fellow of Harvard College and during his entire life he had been a consistent and persistent supporter of the things that were "honest, pure, lovely and of good report." The world is better because he lived and the [illegible] who mourn his death are glad that he was spared to

ESTABLISHED

From Spur
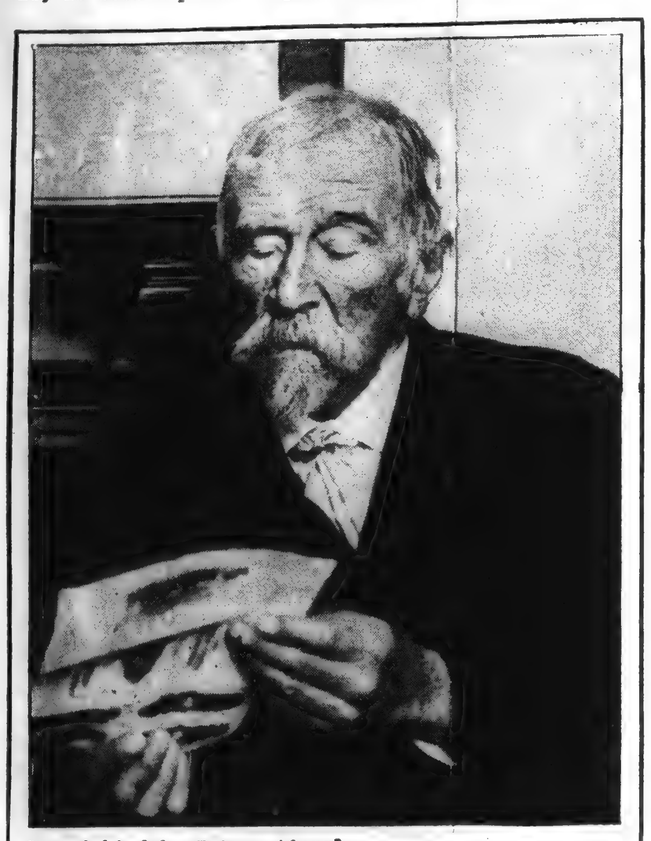
New York City
DEC 15 1919 D

MAJOR HENRY L. HIGGINSON, of Boston, left the bulk of his estate outright to his widow, if she survives him thirty days. "In such case," the will states, "I make no financial provision for my son because I have entire confidence that my wife will do what is best for him." To the son, Alexander H. Higginson, are left certain articles of personal property, including three hundred volumes from the library. The library of music and the collection of musical instruments are left to Charles Francis Adams in trust, and if the latter so desires the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to

LETTERS - AND - ART

BOSTON'S MAECENAS

BOSTON'S SUPREME BID for present day fame, it may be, has been its orchestra. Police strikes are temporary disturbances; but the soul of the orchestra, tho the body of the founder has died, lives on. In Major Henry L. Higginson, who died on November 14, is seen a public figure whose example has done



Copyrighted by International.

FOUNDER OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.
Major Henry L. Higginson, who looked upon the orchestra as his hobby as other rich men look upon their yachts or art-galleries.

more than any other to forward the cause of music in America. The Newark "News" reviewing Mr. Pulitzer's aid to the New York Philharmonic, Mr. Harkness's aid to the New York Symphony, and Philadelphia's rescue of her great orchestra from its financial straits, sees "the genesis of all these movements in Major Higginson's patronage of the Boston Symphony." Founding the orchestra in 1881, there was scarcely a year when his assistance, varying from $2,000 to $40,000, was not needed to meet its deficits. But in giving these sums, says the "News," "he relieved the Boston Symphony from the necessity of meeting its expenses, setting the musicians free to devote themselves to rehearsal and the perfection of their art." But the orchestra, says the New York "Evening Post," "Major Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth." His "incomparable service to American music," says the Springfield "Republican," can best be appreciated "by recalling the low estate of orchestral music in this country when he made possible the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." Thus:

"The one good orchestra in the United States was that of Theodore Thomas, which was leading a precarious existence, and the excellence of which depended mainly upon the personal qualities of its leader, who did wonders with the material available. But what Mr. Higginson had in mind was an orchestra which should be not a personal venture, but an institution--a permanent orchestra not merely in the sense of a secure existence, but in the sense, hardly comprehended then in America, of having a permanent personnel. Even in the best orchestras players would miss rehearsals to take other engagements, or attend the rehearsals and send a substitute to the concert. This was harassing to conductors, but there was no remedy unless men could be paid adequately for giving their full time to the orchestra. The achievement of this ideal was the essential part of Mr. Higginson's contribution to music in America, but not stopping there he gratified his fine sense for beauty by undertaking at any cost to make it as perfect an orchestra as could be made.

"This meant paying such salaries as would tempt orchestral musicians of the first rank to leave the European capitals for a remote city not yet on the musical map. It meant an incessant search for the best talent and a generous support of the conductor chosen. When Mr. Gericke, who succeeded George Henschel, had the whim of supplying all the string players with instruments by the same maker, the instruments were forthcoming, tho the exporiment did not achieve the success hoped for. Complete loyalty to the leader selected was not the least of the causes of Mr. Higginson's splendid success; he was wise enough to provide the means and then to refrain from meddling. Whether popular or the reverse, a conductor during the term of his contract had an authority which the czar of Russia might envy; it was not many years before Boston's new orchestra won fame as the best disciplined, the most fastidiously perfect, in the world. Often it was much more than this, the level of its performances varying with the genius of its leader. But except for a brief period during the turmoil of war, it has never fallen below the unsurpassed standard of technical perfection the attainment of which in a peculiar degree depended on its patron's support. It sometimes cost him $20,000 or more a year, but as he liked to put it, the cost was no more than the upkeep of a steam yacht. But has any yachtsman got so much for his money as Mr. Higginson got from the Symphony Orchestra?"

Boston itself knew Major Higginson as a banker and man-of-affairs, but he was many things in his lifetime. The "Evening Post", running over the facts of his career, speaks of him first as a student at Harvard, then a student of music in Vienna and Rome:

"On his return [illegible] 1860, he joined the Army, in which [illegible] of major and brevet lieuten[illegible] 1865 he 'struck oil' in Ohio and soon [illegible] much that he was able to become a partner [illegible] banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. Had he followed the advice offered by a friend, 'Don't grow rich; if you once begin you'll find it much more difficult to be a useful citizen,' he would have lost the opportunity to become one of the most useful citizens Boston has ever had. While studying in Vienna he conceived the hope that some one would establish in Boston an orchestra equal to those he had heard in Europe. Little did he dream that the time would come when he himself would be able to carry out such an ambitious and costly project.

"He soon discovered that many other things besides money were needed to realize the dream of his life. His attempts to start a permanent orchestra, with a substantial backing, naturally aroused the opposition of the struggling organizations then in existence, which helps to account for the hostility of the Boston press to an institution which subsequently conferred so much honor on the Hub."

From Literary Digest
New York City

NOV 8 1919

From Outlook
New York City

DEC 3 - 1919

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

Though love repine and reason chafe,
There came a voice without reply—
"'Tis man's perdition to be safe,
When for the truth he ought to die."

THESE are the familiar lines which Henry Lee Higginson chose for an inscription to stand at the entrance of the great athletic field which he gave to his University, Harvard. Major Higginson has died, but his love for his University and his abiding faith in its ideals and

(C) International

MAJOR HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

the ideals of American collegiate education will not soon be forgotten. The "Harvard Alumni Bulletin" calls Major Higginson Harvard's greatest benefactor, and the title is well deserved. For he gave not only material things, but a devoted service, which was one of the controlling influences of his own life.

Major Higginson's educational ideals are summed up in a quotation from the address which he made at Harvard University when he turned over to the Corporation the broad acres of The Soldier's Field. The gift of The Soldier's Field was dedicated to the memory of his friends who fell in the Civil War, in the year 1890, but his remarks on the occasion of the transfer of that property have a very direct bearing upon our problems to-day. Major Higginson said:

> Everywhere we see the signs of ferment—questions social, moral, mental, physical, economic. The pot is boiling hard and you must tend it, or it will run over and scald the world. For us came the great questions of slavery and of

From
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV 7

MAJOR HIGGINSON IS DEAD IN BOSTON

Founder of Famous Symphony Orchestra Expires in His 84th Year.

VETERAN OF THE CIVIL WAR.

Generous Contributor to Charity and Betterment Funds.

BOSTON, Nov. 15.—Henry Lee Higginson, head of the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., died at his home last night, it was announced to-day. He was in his eighty-fourth year.

Major Henry Lee Higginson, war veteran and banker, and father of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, was born in New York, Nov. 18, 1834. He studied at Harvard, then went to Vienna, where he studied music. He returned at the breaking out of the civil war and served in the volunteer cavalry until 1863, when he was wounded at Aldie, Va., and returned with the rank of major. He was a member of the banking house of Lee, Higginson & Co., and a director in many public service corporations, mining companies and educational institutions. He was a generous contributor to charities and betterment funds, and spent a fortune in organizing the Boston Symphony Orchestra; figured prominently in the controversy over the playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Karl Muck was then the conductor and as a result of which he retired from the control of that organization in April, 1918.

From Spur
New York City

DEC 15 1919

ESTABLISHED

MAJOR HENRY L. HIGGINSON, of Boston, left the bulk of his estate outright to his widow, if she survives him thirty days. "In such case," the will states, "I make no financial provision for my son because I have entire confidence that my wife will do what is best for him." To the son, Alexander H. Higginson, are left certain articles of personal property, including three hundred volumes from the library. The library of music and the collection of musical instruments are left to Charles Francis Adams in trust, and if the latter so desires the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to

From Commerce & Finance
New York City

NOV 19 1919

MAJOR HIGGINSON

Major Henry Lee Higginson is dead. It will surprise most people to learn that he was born in New York, for as head of the great Boston banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., and founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he was peculiarly identified with the New England metropolis and was generally regarded as its first citizen.

His ancestral record went back to the Mayflower and beyond, his title of Major was won by distinguished service in the Civil War, he was a fellow of Harvard College and during his entire life he had been a consistent and persistent supporter of the things that were "honest, pure, lovely and of good report." The world is better because he lived and the [illegible] who mourn his death are glad that he was spared to

From Commercial & Financial
New York City
NOV 22 1918

Major Henry Lee Higginson, well known as head of t banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., died unexpected on Nov. 14 following an operation. His death occurre at the Massachusetts General Hospital at Boston, to whic he had been removed from his home following the attac with which he had been stricken earlier in the day. Majo Higginson was in his eighty-fifth year, having been born in New York City on Nov. 18 1834. He was a descendant of Francis Higginson, who came to the United States in 1629 and settled in Salem, Mass. With the outbreak of the Civil War Major Higginson left the banking house of S. & E. Austin of Boston, in whose employ he then was, and entered the war as a Second Lieutenant of Massachusetts Volunteers in May 1861. Four years later he was discharged on the ground of disability (he was wounded in the battle of Aldio), having reached the rank of Major and been brevetted Lieutenant-Colonel.

In 1865 Major Higginson was admitted to partnership in the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. (originally founded in 1848) and later became head of the firm, continuing in that capacity until his death. Major Higginson was also widely known as founder of the Boston Symphony Orchstra, which gave its first concert in October 1881. The organization set a standard of the highest artistic excellence under a line of famous conductors. Some years ago, after the complete separation of the members of the orchestra from the musicians' union, their patron announced thiat his will provided $1,000,000 to perpetuate the organization. Major Higginson relinquished his active connection with the organization in April 1918.

Major Higginson was one of the most generous benefactors of Harvard University. In 1891 he presented to the University the athletic ground known as Soldiers' Field as a memorial to the friends of his youth who gave their lives in the Civil War. In 1899 he provided $150,000 for the building of the Harvard Union, a club to which all members of the University are eligible. Besides being a member of the Boston and New York Stock Exchanges, Major Higginson was identified with numerous industrial organizations. A statement in behalf of the Boston Exchange, issued on Nov. 15 by its President, Philip W. Wrenn, said:

Major Higginson was the oldest member of the Exchange, joining it on Jan. 2 1868. In earlier years he was active in all its affairs, and in later years, whenever emergencies of any kind rose in the Street, he was an active participant, and most helpful in his counsel.

A silent period was observed on the floor of the Exchange at the time of Major Higginson's funeral.

LIFE
New York City
NOV 27 1918

Two Old Men

HENRY MILLS ALDEN died in New York on October 7th; eighty-three years old.

Henry Lee Higginson died in Boston November 15th, eighty-five years old.

Two remarkable men they were; associated only in the circumstance that they lived their lives well through, died not far apart, and will be long remembered in the cities they lived in.

And both of them were men of national reputation, one as a writer, and especially as the editor for fifty years of Harper's Magazine; the other as a banker and Harvard benefactor, and as the author and maintainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Alden rocked a cradle for American literature and never let any likely infant perish if he could possibly help it. He was a humane and lovely person with rumpled hair, and had in him the heights and depths of knowledge and of sympathy. For sixty years he read manuscripts most of his time, and always with a mind that hoped for the best. The Magazine was his garden and its contributors his plants. He dealt with them according to his duty, tending some with pride and others with compassion, and gathering more or less thriftily what grew on them. There never was a magazine editor like him, and will not be another, not even in the new era, when all geese are to be swans.

Nor will there be another Major Higginson. Why do bankers reek so with sentiment? Major Higginson was full of it, and so, lately, was Mr. Morgan. There was that in the Major that was like Mark Twain's "Buck Fanshaw," who, though not himself a religious man, took his spanner and went down and disallowed the roughs from interrupting at the Methodist meeting house. The Major probably was religious, but he was a good contender, and would rather fight for the truth in the open than have it brought around in a bag and left peaceably at the back door.

He was born in New York. He fought from Boston in the Civil War. He struck oil in Ohio in the sixties, and turned back to Boston, and was a banker the rest of his life, and played the fields of Harvard with golden showers every spring and hired and furnished forth a first-class string band to play for Boston. So a man

From The Nation
New York City
NOV 22 1918

Henry Lee Higginson

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON, who died in Boston on November 14, had long been known as the foremost citizen of Boston and one of Harvard University's chief benefactors. He was a notable financier, a devoted citizen of the Commonwealth, a princely patron of music; and yet to us he primarily conjured up visions of the brilliant group of young Harvard men many of whose brief careers are recorded in the Harvard Memorial Biographies—Wilder Dwight, Lucius Sargent, Robert Gould Shaw, William D. Sedgwick, James Savage, the Putnams and Lowells, and a host of others who gave their lives to free the slave, although they had everything to lose—position, family, means, all that goes to make life pleasant. There were, of course, other groups, both North and South, of similar readiness to sacrifice all—but these Harvard men stand out because of their historic names and because so many of them served in the Harvard regiments, notably the Second and Twentieth Massachusetts Infantry and the First and Fifth Cavalry.

Of the first of these Henry L. Higginson was one of the organizers. It was in the First Cavalry, to which he was promoted, that he took part in the brilliant but futile and costly charge at Aldie, Va., in which he received the deep sabre marks that lent distinction to his countenance; he left the regiment only when illness compelled, and it was to the memory of those who failed to return with him that he dedicated in touching inscription the Soldiers' Field at Harvard, the great playground for undergraduates so many of whom have recently sacrificed their young lives in the belief that it was for as sacred a cause as that of 1861. The lapse of time detracts nothing from the record of the elder generation. We have to question more and more how much of real freedom Appomattox won; we now see more clearly than ever before the futility of all wars in composing deep-seated human differences. But one could not deny if one would the ardent patriotism and the purity of motive of Major Higginson and his comrades, or fail to admit the charm and the pathos of their part in our history.

Unlike many, Major Higginson was no one of those who had to make his military record his stock in trade, and he speedily became one of the most potent influences in the world of finance. There was something Spartan in his simplicity and accessibility; his personal example was always of the best, and from generations of men and women of gentle breeding he had inherited the knowledge of how to use wealth well. Of his many benefactions the greatest is his gift in 1881 of the first American orchestra to be organized on a European basis. We have much older orchestras, but these were at that time on what may be called almost an amateur basis. Major Higginson wanted an orchestra like the best of the German organizations, composed of a permanent band playing together year in, year out, and doing nothing else. He brought over such notable conductors as Gericke and Nikisch, who gave weekly concerts during the winter season and speedily built up one of the best orchestras in the world. Abroad, the state has provided this need of the public; in America it is the privilege of the well-to-do, and surely no one ever carried on such a princely undertaking in a more self-effacing way than Major Higginson. It was always "the Boston Symphony" and never "Major Higginson's orchestra." The amount of the huge deficits he concealed until a few years ago; the total must now be much more than a million, yet he has made permanent provision in his will for the orchestra.

It was not only Boston that profited; in the large number of cities which the orchestra visited many devout lovers of music rose up to call its founder blessed. If one could measure the part of the Boston Symphony in furthering the work of American musical education, it would be found that it had figured notably in the development of orchestras in all the cities which possess them. It is not necessary to employ bronze or marble to commemorate Major Higginson. It will be enough to add a tribute to the stone at the entrance to Soldiers' Field and to place upon the Boston Symphony's programs—"Founded by Henry L. Higginson."

In the civic life of Massachusetts he will be sorely missed, and in State Street as well. Yet he, like Andrew Carnegie, belonged to an era that has ended. Men are, of course, largely the creatures of their environment, and too often its slaves when old age comes to them. Though Major Higginson's name was a synonym for personal probity, yet he could not perceive that we are on the verge of a new day, or appreciate, for instance, the righteous public wrath that followed the wrecking of the New Haven Railroad. He felt it a shame to criticize the elder Morgan because of that event, and he himself defended the Mellen régime. It must have seemed monstrous to him that he should live to see the hour when not merely stockholders, but railway employees should demand control of management and refuse longer to abide by the wisdom of Wall and State Streets. The times had slipped away from him; but if times change, the rugged personal virtues of Henry L. Higginson could not. As he saw his civic duty, he ever lived up to it.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Literary Digest
New York City
DEC 20 1918

THE UNREMEMBERED BAND

THE WILL OF MAJOR HIGGINSON did not become public knowledge until much laudatory ink had been used in long obituary notices which might have struck a lower key in some musical quarters if its contents had been known. For it was confidently expected that the founder and generous supporter through many years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had left at least a million to provide for its future welfare. Before troubles arose over the now happily deported Muck, it was known that Major Higginson intended such a provision. It did not appear in the will, however, and what mention was made of the orchestra seems in the nature of a skeptical challenge of its vitality. It is, in fact, put on probation in the matter of owning its instruments. Mr. H. T. Parker, the well-informed critic of the Boston Transcript, makes the situation clear:

EGIMENT."
ed years, who resisted
. Frick.

"As was to be expected, Mr. Higginson's will makes no mention of the endowment with which he once purposed to secure the future of the Symphony Orchestra. When the band passed from his hands, he counted himself free from obligation of maintenance, and even declined, if common report is to be trusted, to share in the subscriptions that met the deficit of last year. Indeed, had not the wiser counsels of close friends finally prevailed, the probability was that he would have dispersed the orchestra in the summer of 1918, so bitterly did he resent the tumults and disorders into which the anti-German moods of war-time plunged it; so firmly did he believe that, reorganized and differently controlled, it could never regain its old perfection. The bequest that he had often promised, publicly and privately, was seemingly revoked, while certainly his mistrust of the new régime continued to the end. Else he would hardly have directed one of his executors to hold as trustee various scores and instruments for three or five years and then decide whether the new Symphony Orchestra has been wisely enough managed and held to sufficiently high standards to deserve and receive them. Like most musically minded men of his generation, and the more for long association with German conductors, Mr. Higginson could hardly conceive of an orchestra, or, indeed, of the whole art of music, other than in German terms. Being a man of worldly and musical experience, he was unlikely ever to have made the absurd remark attributed to him in his war-time chagrins—that only German conductors could read a score. Deep in his mind and heart, however, was mistrust of all other conductors and of any régime but his at Symphony Hall. He transferred the orchestra to the present trustees; but, naturally in a man of his years, temperament, and experiences, the conviction remained unaltered. So also do various ironies."

A Boston dispatch to the New York Sun gives a few more details concerning the particular part of Major Higginson's will that deals with the orchestra:

"The Higginson library of music, which includes the scores used by the Symphony Orchestra, and musical instruments, are given in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of the trustees, with instructions to allow the orchestra to use the scores and instruments free of charge if Adams so desires.

"The will provides that in not less than three nor more than five years the trustee must either turn the music and scores over to the Symphony Orchestra or sell them. In his will Major Higginson wrote: 'I hope the trustees will be guided by the manner in which the orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards.'"

From Spur
New York City
DEC 1 - 1918

Copyright by Harris & Ewing

CARTER GLASS AT

Leaving the executive office before resigni the office of accept the app intment of the late Se

Although the will of Henry L. Higginson does not bear out his understood promise of a million-dollar bequest to perpetuate the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there is still hope that a like provision may have been made in some other way by the founder of this organization. In any event, it is inconceivable that the orchestra which for thirty-seven years was the hobby of Boston's "first citizen" will not endure. It has had a strong corporate board of trustees behind it since Major Higginson let it go out from his personal control two years or so ago and no doubt it will be the pride of Boston for many years to come, the while it travels around at intervals to add to the musical joy of New York and other cities. And so long as its life continues, it will be a dignified monument to the memory of the great banker and philanthropist who was a devoted amateur of music to the end of his life.

From Commercial & Financial
New York City
NOV 22 1919

Major Henry Lee Higginson, well known as head of t banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., died unexpected on Nov. 14 following an operation. His death occurre at the Massachusetts General Hospital at Boston, to whic he had been removed from his home following the attac with which he had been stricken earlier in the day. Majo Higginson was in his eighty-fifth year, having been born in New York City on Nov. 18 1834. He was a descendant of Francis Higginson, who came to the United States in 1629 and settled in Salem, Mass. With the outbreak of the Civil War Major Higginson left the banking house of S. & E. Austin of Boston, in whose employ he then was, and entered the war as a Second Lieutenant of Massachusetts Volunteers in May 1861. Four years later he was discharged on the ground of disability (he was wounded in the battle of Aldio), having reached the rank of Major and been brevetted Lieutenant-Colonel.

In 1865 Major Higginson was admitted to partnership in the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. (originally founded in 1848) and later became head of the firm, continuing in that capacity until his death. Major Higginson was also widely known as founder of the Boston Symphony Orchstra, which gave its first concert in October 1881. The organization set a standard of the highest artistic excellence under a line of famous conductors. Some years ago, after the complete separation of the members of the orchestra from the musicians' union, their patron announced thiat his will provided $1,000,000 to perpetuate the organization. Major Higginson relinquished his active connection with the organization in April 1918.

Major Higginson was one of the most generous benefactors of Harvard University. In 1891 he presented to the University the athletic ground known as Soldiers' Field as a memorial to the friends of his youth who gave their lives in the Civil War. In 1899 he provided $150,000 for the building of the Harvard Union, a club to which all members of the University are eligible. Besides being a member of the Boston and New York Stock Exchanges, Major Higginson was identified with numerous industrial organizations. A statement in behalf of the Boston Exchange, issued on Nov. 15 by its President, Philip W. Wrenn, said:

Major Higginson was the oldest member of the Exchange, joining it on Jan. 2 1868. In earlier years he was active in all its affairs, and in laters years, whenever emergencies of any kind rose in the Street, he was an active participant, and most helpful in his counsel.

A silent period was observed on the floor of the Exchange at the time of Major Higginson's funeral.

LIFE

ss New York City NOV 27 1919

Two Old Men

HENRY MILLS ALDEN died in New York on October 7th; eighty-three years old.

Henry Lee Higginson died in Boston November 15th, eighty-five years old.

Two remarkable men they were; associated only in the circumstance that they lived their lives well through, died not far apart, and will be long remembered in the cities they lived in.

And both of them were men of national reputation, one as a writer, and especially as the editor for fifty years of Harper's Magazine; the other as a banker and Harvard benefactor, and as the author and maintainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Alden rocked a cradle for American literature and never let any likely infant perish if he could possibly help it. He was a humane and lovely person with rumpled hair, and had in him the heights and depths of knowledge and of sympathy. For sixty years he read manuscripts most of his time, and always with a mind that hoped for the best. The Magazine was his garden and its contributors his plants. He dealt with them according to his duty, tending some with pride and others with compassion, and gathering more or less thriftily what grew on them. There never was a magazine editor like him, and will not be another, not even in the new era, when all geese are to be swans.

Nor will there be another Major Higginson. Why do bankers reek so with sentiment? Major Higginson was full of it, and so, lately, was Mr. Morgan. There was that in the Major that was like Mark Twain's "Buck Fanshaw," who, though not himself a religious man, took his spanner and went down and disallowed the roughs from interrupting at the Methodist meeting house. The Major probably was religious, but he was a good contender, and would rather fight for the truth in the open than have it brought around in a bag and left peaceably at the back door.

He was born in New York. He bought from Boston in the Civil War. He struck oil in Ohio in the sixties, and turned back to Boston, and was a banker the rest of his life, and played the fields of Harvard with golden showers every spring and hired and furnished forth a first-class string band to play for Boston. What a man! So

From The Nation
New York City
NOV 22 1919

Henry Lee Higginson

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON, who died in Boston on November 14, had long been known as the foremost citizen of Boston and one of Harvard University's chief benefactors. He was a notable financier, a devoted citizen of the Commonwealth, a princely patron of music; and yet to us he primarily conjured up visions of the brilliant group of young Harvard men many of whose brief careers are recorded in the Harvard Memorial Biographies—Wilder Dwight, Lucius Sargent, Robert Gould Shaw, William D. Sedgwick, James Savage, the Putnams and Lowells, and a host of others who gave their lives to free the slave, although they had everything to lose—position, family, means, all that goes to make life pleasant. There were, of course, other groups, both North and South, of similar readiness to sacrifice all—but these Harvard men stand out because of their historic names and because so many of them served in the Harvard regiments, notably the Second and Twentieth Massachusetts Infantry and the First and Fifth Cavalry.

Of the first of these Henry L. Higginson was one of the organizers. It was in the First Cavalry, to which he was promoted, that he took part in the brilliant but futile and costly charge at Aldie, Va., in which he received the deep sabre marks that lent distinction to his countenance; he left the regiment only when illness compelled, and it was to the memory of those who failed to return with him that he dedicated in touching inscription the Soldiers' Field at Harvard, the great playground for undergraduates so many of whom have recently sacrificed their young lives in the belief that it was for as sacred a cause as that of 1861. The lapse of time detracts nothing from the record of the elder generation. We have to question more and more how much of real freedom Appomattox won; we now see more clearly than ever before the futility of all wars in composing deep-seated human differences. But one could not deny if one would the ardent patriotism and the purity of motive of Major Higginson and his comrades, or fail to admit the charm and the pathos of their part in our history.

Unlike many, Major Higginson was no one of those who had to make his military record his stock in trade, and he speedily became one of the most potent influences in the world of finance. There was something Spartan in his simplicity and accessibility; his personal example was always of the best, and from generations of men and women of gentle breeding he had inherited the knowledge of how to use wealth well. Of his many benefactions the greatest is his gift in 1881 of the first American orchestra to be organized on a European basis. We have much older orchestras, but these were at that time on what may be called almost an amateur basis. Major Higginson wanted an orchestra like the best of the German organizations, composed of a permanent band playing together year in, year out, and doing nothing else. He brought over such notable conductors as Gericke and Nikisch, who gave weekly concerts during the winter season and speedily built up one of the best orchestras in the world. Abroad, the state has provided this need of the public; in America it is the privilege of the well-to-do, and surely no one ever carried on such a princely undertaking in a more self-effacing way than Major Higginson. It was always "the Boston Symphony" and never "Major Higginson's orchestra." The amount of the huge deficits he concealed until a few years ago; the total must now be much more than a million, yet he has made permanent provision in his will for the orchestra.

It was not only Boston that profited; in the large number of cities which the orchestra visited many devout lovers of music rose up to call its founder blessed. If one could measure the part of the Boston Symphony in furthering the work of American musical education, it would be found that it had figured notably in the development of orchestras in all the cities which possess them. It is not necessary to employ bronze or marble to commemorate Major Higginson. It will be enough to add a tribute to the stone at the entrance to Soldiers' Field and to place upon the Boston Symphony's programs—"Founded by Henry L. Higginson."

In the civic life of Massachusetts he will be sorely missed, and in State Street as well. Yet he, like Andrew Carnegie, belonged to an era that has ended. Men are, of course, largely the creatures of their environment, and too often its slaves when old age comes to them. Though Major Higginson's name was a synonym for personal probity, yet he could not perceive that we are on the verge of a new day, or appreciate, for instance, the righteous public wrath that followed the wrecking of the New Haven Railroad. He felt it a shame to criticize the elder Morgan because of that event, and he himself defended the Mellen régime. It must have seemed monstrous to him that he should live to see the hour when not merely stockholders, but railway employees should demand control of management and refuse longer to abide by the wisdom of Wall and State Streets. The times had slipped away from him; but if times change, the rugged personal virtues of Henry L. Higginson could not. As he saw his civic duty, he ever lived up to it.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Literary Digest
New York City
DEC 20 1919

THE UNREMEMBERED BAND

THE WILL OF MAJOR HIGGINSON did not become public knowledge until much laudatory ink had been used in long obituary notices which might have struck a lower key in some musical quarters if its contents had been known. For it was confidently expected that the founder and generous supporter through many years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had left at least a million to provide for its future welfare. Before troubles arose over the now happily deported Muck, it was known that Major Higginson intended such a provision. It did not appear in the will, however, and what mention was made of the orchestra seems in the nature of a skeptical challenge of its vitality. It is, in fact, put on probation in the matter of owning its instruments. Mr. H. T. Parker, the well-informed critic of the Boston Transcript, makes the situation clear:

EGIMENT."
ed years, who resisted
. Frick.

"As was to be expected, Mr. Higginson's will makes no mention of the endowment with which he once purposed to secure the future of the Symphony Orchestra. When the band passed from his hands, he counted himself free from obligation of maintenance, and even declined, if common report is to be trusted, to share in the subscriptions that met the deficit of last year. Indeed, had not the wiser counsels of close friends finally prevailed, the probability was that he would have dispersed the orchestra in the summer of 1918, so bitterly did he resent the tumults and disorders into which the anti-German moods of war-time plunged it; so firmly did he believe that, reorganized and differently controlled, it could never regain its old perfection. The bequest that he had often promised, publicly and privately, was seemingly revoked, while certainly his mistrust of the new régime continued to the end. Else he would hardly have directed one of his executors to hold as trustee various scores and instruments for three or five years and then decide whether the new Symphony Orchestra has been wisely enough managed and held to sufficiently high standards to deserve and receive them. Like most musically minded men of his generation, and the more for long association with German conductors, Mr. Higginson could hardly conceive of an orchestra, or, indeed, of the whole art of music, other than in German terms. Being a man of worldly and musical experience, he was unlikely ever to have made the absurd remark attributed to him in his war-time chagrins—that only German conductors could read a score. Deep in his mind and heart, however, was mistrust of all other conductors and of any régime but his at Symphony Hall. He transferred the orchestra to the present trustees; but, naturally in a man of his years, temperament, and experiences, the conviction remained unaltered. So also do various ironies."

A Boston dispatch to the New York Sun gives a few more details concerning the particular part of Major Higginson's will that deals with the orchestra:

"The Higginson library of music, which includes the scores used by the Symphony Orchestra, and musical instruments, are given in trust to Charles Francis Adams, one of the trustees, with instructions to allow the orchestra to use the scores and instruments free of charge if Adams so desires.

"The will provides that in not less than three nor more than five years the trustee must either turn the music and scores over to the Symphony Orchestra or sell them. In his will Major Higginson wrote: 'I hope the trustees will be guided by the manner in which the orchestra is conducted and the prospects of its continued existence in accordance with high standards.'"

From Spur
New York City
DEC 1 - 19

Although the will of Henry L. Higginson does not bear out his understood promise of a million-dollar bequest to perpetuate the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there is still hope that a like provision may have been made in some other way by the founder of this organization. In any event, it is inconceivable that the orchestra which for thirty-seven years was the hobby of Boston's "first citizen" will not endure. It has had a strong corporate board of trustees behind it since Major Higginson let it go out from his personal control two years or so ago and no doubt it will be the pride of Boston for many years to come, the while it travels around at intervals to add to the musical joy of New York and other cities. And so long as its life continues, it will be a dignified monument to the memory of the great banker and philanthropist who was a devoted amateur of music to the end of his life.

Copyright
CAR Leaving the before resign accept the tive office
the office of ment of he late Se

MAJOR HIGGINSON DEAD

End Came Suddenly Following an Operation

Long Leader in Philanthropy and Business

Was Regarded as Boston's Premier Citizen

Widely Known as Great Friend of Harvard

Also as Boston Symphony Orchestra Founder

He Was a Veteran of the Civil War

Senior Member of Lee, Higginson & Co.

Major Henry Lee Higginson, Boston's most representative citizen, died on Friday evening at eight o'clock, in a private ward at the Massachusetts General Hospital, where he was taken after a sudden attack of illness in the morning at his home in Commonwealth avenue. On Friday afternoon Major Higginson underwent an operation, from the effects of which he failed to rally. His attack was an unexpected recurrence of an old trouble for which, last winter, he underwent treatment at the same hospital, where he remained for several weeks.

Born in New York City

Henry Lee Higginson, banker and philanthropist, was born in New York city on Nov. 18, 1834, the son of George and Mary Cabot (Lee) Higginson. He was a descendant of Francis Higginson, who came to the United States about 1629, settling in Salem. Brought up in Boston, where his family resided in his boyhood, Mr. Higginson matriculated at Harvard College in the class of 1855, but left before graduation, to enter the counting house of S. & E. Austin of Boston. With the exception of one year abroad (1856) devoted to the study of music in Vienna, he remained with this firm until the outbreak of the Civil War.

Commissioned second lieutenant of the Second Regiment, Massachusetts Volunteers, on May 28, 1861, Mr. Higginson was promoted to a first lieutenancy on July 8, and was transferred to the Cavalry Oct. 31, when he was commissioned captain of the First Regiment, Massachusetts Volunteer Cavalry. He was promoted to the rank of major on March 26, 1862. On Aug. 9, 1864, he was discharged for disability, having received four wounds in the battle of Aldie. He was brevetted lieutenant colonel on March 13, 1865, for gallantry and meritorious service.

Member of Old-Time Banking Firm

After his war service, Mr. Higginson returned to Boston and again entered the banking business. The firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., with which he was so long connected, was originally Lee & Higginson, formed in 1848 for the transaction of the brokerage of investment securities. The original partners were John C. Lee and George Higginson. In 1853 Henry Lee and George C. Lee were taken into partnership and the firm name was changed to Lee, Higginson & Co. An exchange account was opened with Messrs. Baring Brothers, London.

On Jan. 1, 1865, Henry L. Higginson was admitted to the firm as a partner. He was sent to the Stock Exchange to be there daily, under George Lee's tutelage. With the coming of Mr. Higginson, various changes in business were made, and soon Francis L. Higginson was admitted to the firm.

Soon after the big fire of 1872 the firm moved its offices to 44 State street, retaining, however, its former old offices. Throughout various changes in partnerships Henry L. Higginson had remained as a dominating leader in the firm's affairs and interests. Several changes were made from time to time with the admission and withdrawal of other partners. Some of the changes were caused by death. Major Higginson realized that this banking house had a foundation of character, and he never allowed this foundation to weaken, or the firm to lose its well-deserved reputation for integrity and patriotism.

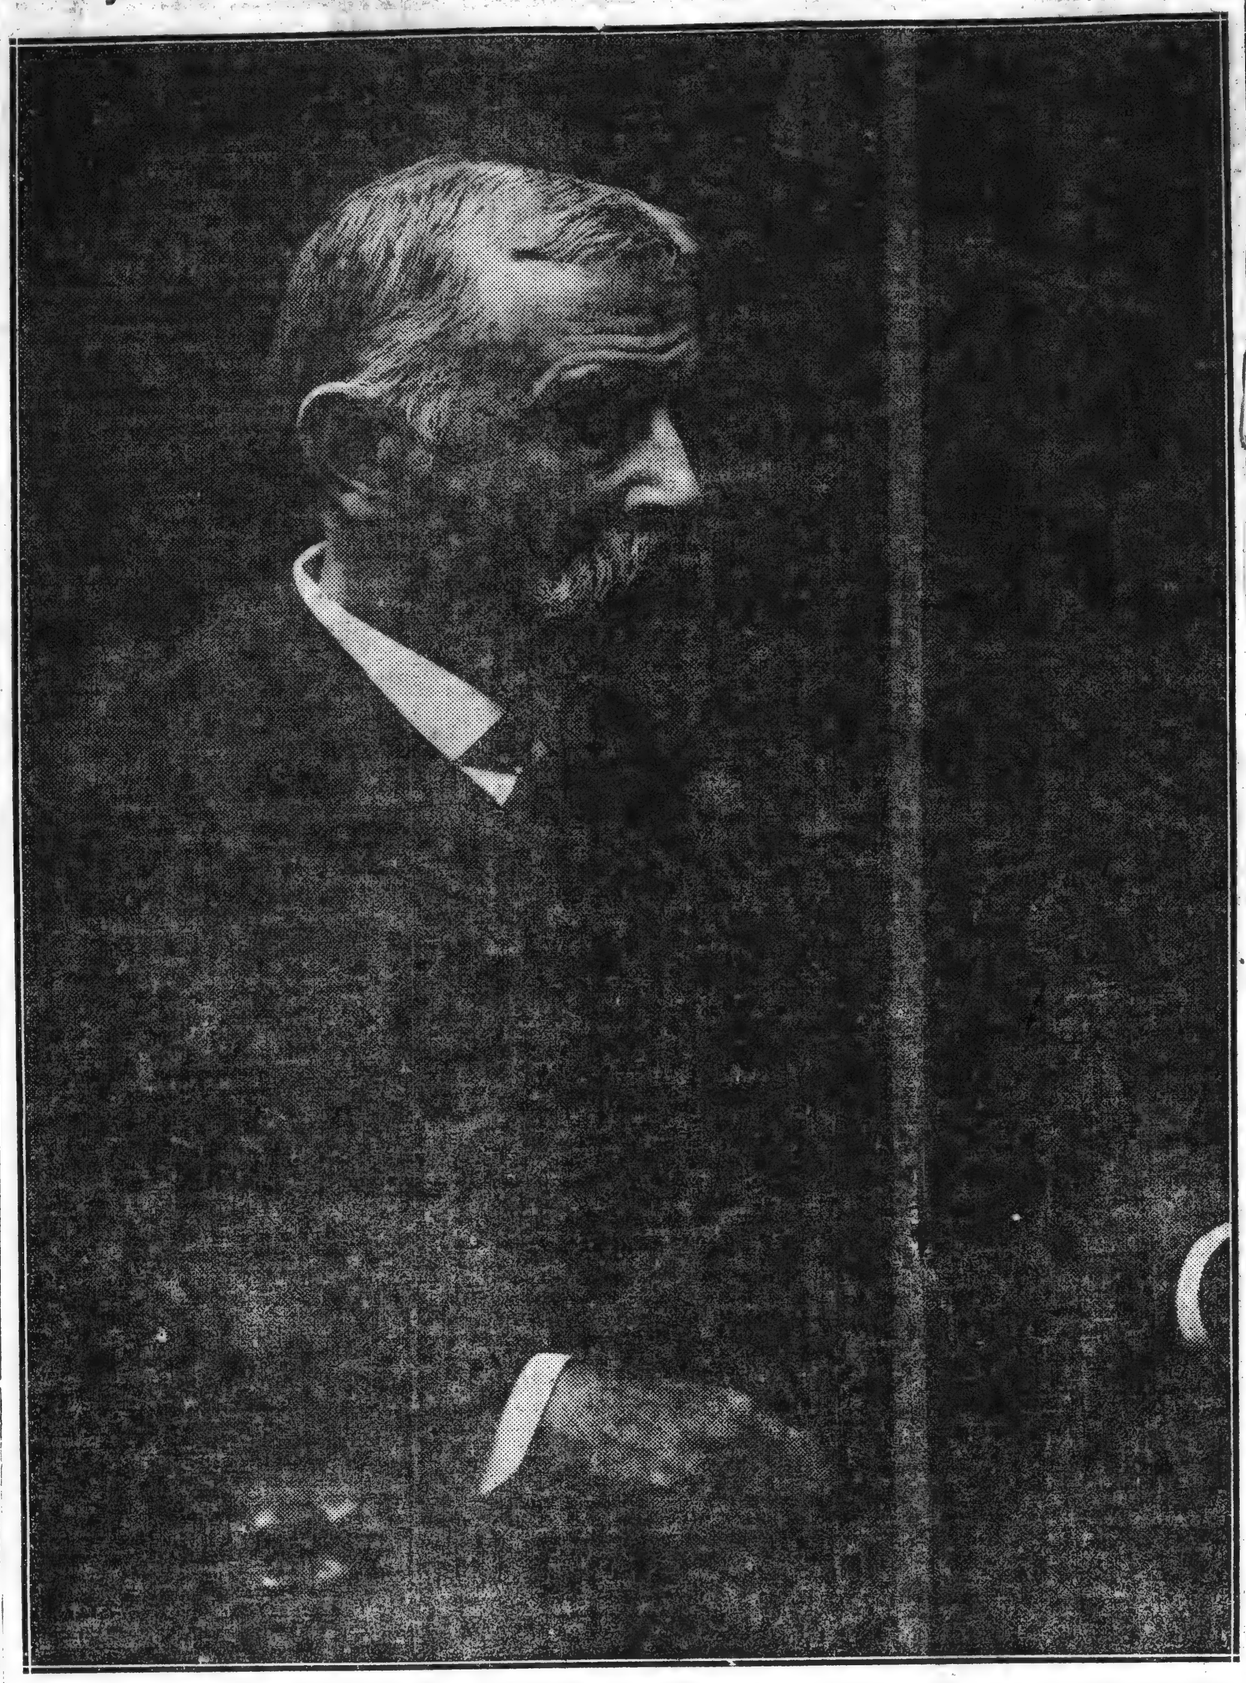
Founded Boston Symphony Orchestra

Aside from his banking business Major Higginson had numerous other interests. His sponsorship as the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had made him inernationally known, as this was his most

Continued on Page Seven

TAKE BELL-ANS BEFORE MEALS
and see how fine good digestion makes you feel.
—Adv.

Major Higginson---Benefactor of His Fellows



(Photo by Notman)

Henry Lee Higginson—Nov. 18, 1834—Nov. 14, 1919

conspicuous public service. The orchestra, which gave its first concert on Oct. 22, 1881, not only has contributed in an unusual degree to the richness of Boston's musical life, but has set a standard for artistic excellence throughout the United States, and even the world. Through the support of Major Higginson the organization became a permanent one, with inducements offered which brought together the best artistic ensemble of its kind ever known in this country. Under such noted conductors as Georg Henschel, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Wilhelm Gericke, Dr. Karl Muck, Gustav Fiedler, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, its presentation of the great classics as well as its introduction of new compositions of merit has played a most important part in the musical history of Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and other cities throughout the East, where regular series of concerts are given every season.

Had Numerous Business Interests

Other activities which in past years have occupied Major Higginson's time and cooperation have been as vice president of the Provident Institutions for Savings, as president of the New Boston Music Hall and of the Gauley Coal Land Company, also as an officer of the Smuggler Union Mining Company, American Telephone & Telegraph Company, General Electric Company, New England Exploration Company, Ashburton Mining Company, Cherry River Coal Mining Company, Marysville Dredging Company, Marigold Construction & Store Company, Contention Mining Company, American Foreign Securities Corporation, Rolfe Mining Company, Submarine Signal Company and other corporations. He had served as a trustee of the Carnegie Institution in Washington, the New England Conservatory of Music and the Franklin Union. He was at one time a member of the Rapid Transit Commission.

His Club and Other Affiliations

He belonged to the Bunker Hill Monument Association, Franklin Foundation (and was a member of its board of managers), the Harvard Union, of which he had been president, the Military Training Camps Association and was honorary president of the Public School Association.

He was a member of the Massachusetts Historical Society, and a life member of the American Academy of Political and Social Science. He belonged to the Tavern Club, the Harvard Club, in Boston and in New York, and in the last-named city was a member of the Knickerbocker Club.

Fellow of Harvard

In his association with Harvard University, he had been a Fellow of the Corporation. His benefactions to the university include the athletic grounds known as "Soldiers' Field," which he presented as a memorial to his friends who died in the service of their country: General Charles Russell Lowell, Colonel Robert Gould Shaw, Colonel James Savage, Jr., Colonel Edward B. Dalton, Lieutenant Stephen George Perkins and Lieutenant James Jackson Lowell. He also endowed the university, in 1899, with the sum of $150,000 for the erection of the Harvard Union, a clubhouse for all members of the university, "to counteract the influence of exclusive cliques and extravagant living."

Married Miss Agassiz in 1863

On Dec. 5, 1863, Major Higginson married Miss Ida Agassiz of Cambridge.

many years they have made their winter home at the Agassiz, at 191 Commonwealth avenue, and their summers have been spent at West Manchester on the North Shore, where the estate is known as "Sunset Hill." The celebration of the golden anniversary of the marriage of Major and Mrs. Higginson was a notable event in 1913, at their Boston home. There were present Miss Georgina Lowell, who had been bridesmaid at the marriage half a century before, and also C. C. Jackson, who at the wedding served as Major Higginson's best man. The anniversary was marked by a reception in the afternoon, with a small dinner party in the evening, with only the members of the family present, together with Miss Lowell and Mr. Jackson. Major Higginson's sister, Mrs. Parkman Blake, was among the few present, also the son of Major and Mrs. Higginson, Alexander Henry Higginson, and his wife from South Lincoln. Major Higginson is survived by his wife and his son, also by his sister, Mrs. Blake, formerly Mary Lee Higginson.

The funeral of Major Higginson will take place on Monday at twelve o'clock at Appleton Chapel, Cambridge. Tuesday next Nov. 18, will be the eighty-fifth anniversary of his birth.

SENIOR ON STOCK EXCHANGE

Brokers to Honor Major Higginson's Memory by Silent Period During Funeral Monday

Philip W. Wrenn, president of the Boston Stock Exchange, in behalf of the members of the Exchange, issued the following statement:

"Major Higginson was the oldest member of the Exchange, joining it on Jan. 2, 1868. In earlier years he was active in all its affairs, and in later years, whenever emergencies of any kind rose in the Street, he was an active participant, and most helpful in his counsel."

There will be a silent period on the floor of the Exchange at the hour of Major Higginson's funeral.

Benefactor of His Fellow Men

By Governor Calvin Coolidge

THE death of Major Henry L. Higginson has removed a man who has been for years a commanding figure. In public service and private philanthropy a benefactor of his fellow men; in character an example to be followed with reverence, in attainments preeminent among associates of commanding importance. An uncompromising patriot, the advocate of every good cause, a man whose work, whose memory, whose principles will endure.

MAJOR HIGGINSON DEAD

End Came Suddenly Following an Operation

Long Leader in Philanthropy and Business

Was Regarded as Boston's Premier Citizen

Widely Known as Great Friend of Harvard

Also as Boston Symphony Orchestra Founder

He Was a Veteran of the Civil War

Senior Member of Lee, Higginson & Co.

Major Henry Lee Higginson, Boston's most representative citizen, died on Friday evening at eight o'clock, in a private ward at the Massachusetts General Hospital, where he was taken after a sudden attack of illness in the morning at his home in Commonwealth avenue. On Friday afternoon Major Higginson underwent an operation, from the effects of which he failed to rally. His attack was an unexpected recurrence of an old trouble for which, last winter, he underwent treatment at the same hospital, where he remained for several weeks.

Born in New York City

Henry Lee Higginson, banker and philanthropist, was born in New York city on Nov. 18, 1834, the son of George and Mary Cabot (Lee) Higginson. He was a descendant of Francis Higginson, who came to the United States about 1629, settling in Salem. Brought up in Boston, where his family resided in his boyhood, Mr. Higginson matriculated at Harvard College in the class of 1855, but left before graduation, to enter the counting house of S. & E. Austin of Boston. With the exception of one year abroad (1856) devoted to the study of music in Vienna, he remained with this firm until the outbreak of the Civil War.

Commissioned second lieutenant of the Second Regiment, Massachusetts Volunteers, on May 28, 1861, Mr. Higginson was promoted to a first lieutenancy on July 8, and was transferred to the Cavalry Oct. 31, when he was commissioned captain of the First Regiment, Massachusetts Volunteer Cavalry. He was promoted to the rank of major on March 26, 1862. On Aug. 9, 1864, he was discharged for disability, having received four wounds in the battle of Aldie. He was brevetted lieutenant colonel on March 13, 1865, for gallantry and meritorious service.

Member of Old-Time Banking Firm

After his war service, Mr. Higginson returned to Boston and again entered the banking business. The firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., with which he was so long connected, was originally Lee & Higginson, formed in 1848 for the transaction of the brokerage of investment securities. The original partners were John C. Lee and George Higginson. In 1853 Henry Lee and George C. Lee were taken into partnership and the firm name was changed to Lee, Higginson & Co. An exchange account was opened with Messrs. Baring Brothers, London.

On Jan. 1, 1865, Henry L. Higginson was admitted to the firm as a partner. He was sent to the Stock Exchange, to be there daily, under George Lee's tutelage. With the coming of Mr. Higginson, various changes in business were made, and soon Francis L. Higginson was admitted to the firm.

Soon after the big fire of 1872 the firm moved its offices to 44 State street, retaining, however, its former old offices. Throughout various changes in partnerships Henry L. Higginson had remained as the dominating leader in the firm's affairs and interests. Several changes were made from time to time with the admission and withdrawal of other partners. Some of the changes were caused by death. Major Higginson realized that this banking house had a foundation of character, and he never allowed this foundation to weaken, or the firm to lose its well-deserved reputation for integrity and patriotism.

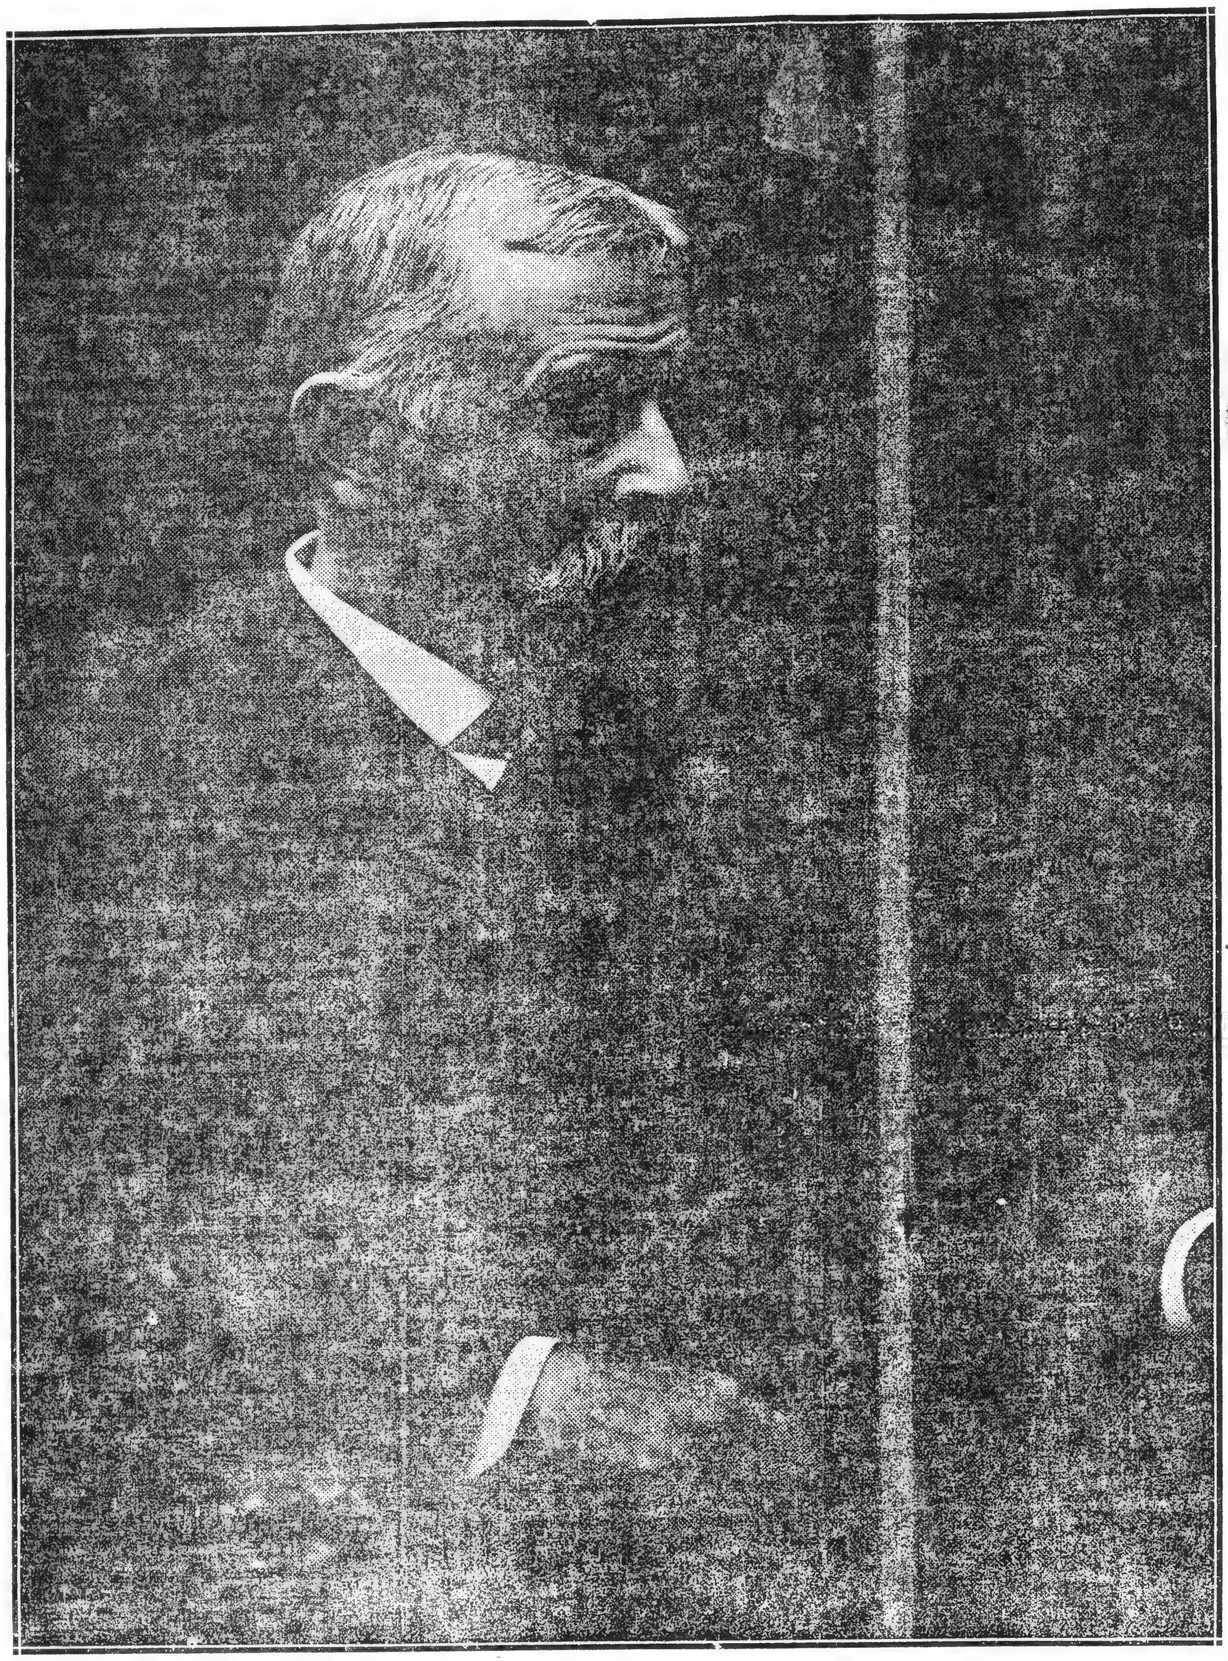
Founded Boston Symphony Orchestra

Aside from his banking business Major Higginson had numerous other interests. His sponsorship as the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had made him internationally known, as this was his most

Continued on Page Seven

TAKE BELL-ANS BEFORE MEALS
and see how fine good digestion makes you feel.
—Adv.

Major Higginson---Benefactor of His Fellows



(Photo by Notman)

Henry Lee Higginson—Nov. 18, 1834—Nov. 14, 1919

conspicuous public service. The orchestra, which gave its first concert on Oct. 22, 1881, not only has contributed in an unusual degree to the richness of Boston's musical life, but has set a standard for artistic excellence throughout the United States, and even the world. Through the support of Major Higginson the organization became a permanent one, with inducements offered which brought together the best artistic ensemble of its kind ever known in this country. Under such noted conductors as Georg Henschel, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Wilhelm Gericke, Dr. Karl Muck, Gustav Fiedler, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, its presentation of the great classics as well as its introduction of new compositions of merit has played a most important part in the musical history of Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and other cities throughout the East, where regular series of concerts are given every season.

Had Numerous Business Interests

Other activities which in past years have occupied Major Higginson's time and cooperation have been as vice president of the Provident Institutions for Savings, as president of the New Boston Music Hall and of the Gauley Coal Land Company, also as an officer of the Smuggler Union Mining Company, American Telephone & Telegraph Company, General Electric Company, New England Exploration Company, Ashburton Mining Company, Cherry River Coal Mining Company, Marysville Dredging Company, Marigold Construction & Store Company, Contention Mining Company, American Foreign Securities Corporation, Rolfe Mining Company, Submarine Signal Company and other corporations. He had served as a trustee of the Carnegie Institution in Washington, the New England Conservatory of Music and the Franklin Union. He was at one time a member of the Rapid Transit Commission.

His Club and Other Affiliations

He belonged to the Bunker Hill Monument Association, Franklin Foundation (and was a member of its board of managers), the Harvard Union, of which he had been president, the Military Training Camps Association and was honorary president of the Public School Association.

He was a member of the Massachusetts Historical Society, and a life member of the American Academy of Political and Social Science. He belonged to the Tavern Club, the Harvard Club, in Boston and in New York, and in the last named city was a member of the Knickerbocker Club.

Fellow of Harvard

In his association with Harvard University, he had been a Fellow of the Corporation. His benefactions to the university include the athletic grounds known as "Soldiers' Field," which he presented as a memorial to his friends who died in the service of their country: General Charles Russell Lowell, Colonel Robert Gould Shaw, Colonel James Savage, Jr., Colonel Edward B. Dalton, Lieutenant Stephen George Perkins and Lieutenant James Jackson Lowell. He also endowed the university, in 1899, with the sum of $150,000 for the erection of the Harvard Union, a clubhouse for all members of the university, "to counteract the influence of exclusive cliques and extravagant living."

Married Miss Agassiz in 1863

On Dec. 5, 1863, Major Higginson married Miss Ida Agassiz of Cambridge. For many years they have made their winter home at the Agassiz, at 191 Commonwealth avenue, and their summers have been spent at West Manchester on the North Shore, where the estate is known as "Sunset Hill." The celebration of the golden anniversary of the marriage of Major and Mrs. Higginson was a notable event in 1913, at their Boston home. There were present Miss Georgina Lowell, who had been bridesmaid at the marriage half a century before, and also C. C. Jackson, who at the wedding served as Major Higginson's best man. The anniversary was marked by a reception in the afternoon, with a small dinner party in the evening, with only the members of the family present, together with Miss Lowell and Mr. Jackson. Major Higginson's sister, Mrs. Parkman Blake, was among the few present, also the son of Major and Mrs. Higginson, Alexander Henry Higginson, and his wife from South Lincoln. Major Higginson is survived by his wife and his son, also by his sister, Mrs. Blake, formerly Mary Lee Higginson.

The funeral of Major Higginson will take place on Monday at twelve o'clock at Appleton Chapel, Cambridge. Tuesday next, Nov. 18, will be the eighty-fifth anniversary of his birth.

SENIOR ON STOCK EXCHANGE

Brokers to Honor Major Higginson's Memory by Silent Period During Funeral Monday

Philip W. Wrenn, president of the Boston Stock Exchange, in behalf of the members of the Exchange, issued the following statement:

"Major Higginson was the oldest member of the Exchange, joining it on Jan. 2, 1868. In earlier years he was active in all its affairs, and in later years, whenever emergencies of any kind rose in the Street, he was an active participant, and most helpful in his counsel."

There will be a silent period on the floor of the Exchange at the hour of Major Higginson's funeral.

Benefactor of His Fellow Men

By Governor Calvin Coolidge

THE death of Major Henry L. Higginson has removed a man who has been for years a commanding figure. In public service and private philanthropy a benefactor of his fellow men; in character an example to be followed with reverence, in attainments pre-eminent among associates of commanding importance. An uncompromising patriot, the advocate of every good cause, a man whose work, whose memory, whose principles will endure.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Music's Great Debt to a Patriotic American

There has never been a greater or wiser benefactor of music than the late Maj Higginson. He was a generous and discriminating giver to many causes, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra remains his noblest achievement, as it was perhaps the one he himself most valued.

A passage from a letter he wrote from Vienna in 1857, during the two years he spent there studying music, shows his attitude as a young man:

"As every one has some particular object of supreme interest to himself, so I have music. It is almost my inner world; without it I miss much, and with it I am happier and better."

Quotation from an "Account of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, dictated by Maj Higginson in 1911, completes the story of how he came to make his great gift to this city. He explains that the hope of seeing an orchestra in Boston, which should play as well as the great orchestras of Europe, dates from his student days.

"After two years," he continues, "it became clear to me that I had no talent for playing or for composition; that there was, in short, no soil in which to cultivate a garden, and so I came home to the troubles of 1860 and the Civil War. That war taught a great many men that if we were to have a country worthy of the name we must work for it, educate it, as well as fight for it, and this duty lay upon every individual citizen."

Not until 1880 did his business success become great enough to make it possible for Maj Higginson to attempt to realize his dream of a Bostoh orchestra. He reckoned in advance on an annual deficit of $20,000, even if the undertaking should prove successful, and the estimate was very nearly correct.

He once remarked that he might have retired from business in 1880 instead of starting an orchestra. If selfish ease and comfort instead of public service had been his aim he certainly would have done so. Although he, with rare wisdom, never from first to last interfered with either conductor or manager in routine details, his was always the responsibility for the broad aims of the orchestra and he invariably bore the brunt of all criticism and gave the credit for all successes to the musicians.

In the speech he made at Mr Gericke's first leavetaking to an audience of friends at the Tavern Club, May 24, 1889, he made his attitude plain. Referring to the "Rush Seats," then as now sold on Fridays for a quarter each, he said: "Several times, when I have faltered in my plans for the future, I have taken heart again on seeing the crowd of young, fresh schoolgirls, of music students, of tired school teachers, of weary men, of little old ladies leading gray lives not often reached by the sunshine, and I have said to myself 'One year more, anyway.' To us all come—hours, days, weeks of suffering and of sadness. Even boys and girls know this early and know it late. At these times music draws the pain and relieves the suffering.

"Considering these things, can I have done harm by the concerts? Are they not worth while, even if they have cost me years of work and worry? What are we made for? We are all bound in our day and generation to serve our country and our fellow-men in some way. Lucky is he who finds a fair field for his work, and when he has put his hand to the plow he may not lightly turn back. He may not too easily say 'Enough, I am weary.'"

The very many who, like the present writer, owe a large part of what joy and peace they have found in life to music heard at Boston Symphony Concerts can never now show their gratitude to the founder. They can only hope to attain in their own lives a little of his clear-sighted spirit of patriotic service.

Nor will they be misled by those who deem patriotism and Americanism to consist in tumult and shouting rather than in modest, persevering service. Some people reserve their patriotism for display in time of war. Maj Higginson remained a patriot in times when wars were remote from the public mind.

First and last, he believed that only the best music was good enough for American audiences, and he did more than anyone else has yet done to give it to them. Let us strive to deserve his faith in us.

Tran

TEEN PAGES—TWO SEC

MOURN MAJOR HIGGINSON

Friends Pay Tribute of Simple Solemnity

Appleton Chapel Thronged at the Services

Dr. Crothers Conducts Unadorned Ritual

Selection by Symphony Orchestra Group

Hymns Sung by Harvard Vested Choir

Students Bear Body Through the Yard

Burial Takes Place in Mount Auburn Lot

Learning, culture, business paused for a moment today to pay tribute of respect to a man who had been their exemplar and benefactor—Major Henry Lee Higginson. In Appleton Chapel at Harvard, where the services were held, there gathered an assemblage of mourners that was representative of all that is best in Boston and Harvard life. Leaders and students of the university, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which he founded and nurtured, representatives of the Loyal Legion, men from State street, where he was so long a commanding figure, and a host of others indicative of the widespread interests and influence of Major Higginson gathered there to do him honor.

The services were severely plain. Resting before the chancel was the casket, covered by the Stars and Stripes for which he fought in the war for the Union. Upon the flag was his sword and a simple laurel wreath. Flowers, from friends, clubs, organizations of various sorts, were retained at the door of the chapel, though a few were banked beside the chancel. On the altar at the centre and at the reading desk were other laurel wreaths and the flags of the United States, of Massachusetts and of Harvard occupied their customary places.

Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, D. D., minister of the First Church, which faces the main entrance to the Harvard Yard, conducted an unadorned ritual consisting of Scripture reading, a Psalm, prayer and benediction, interspersed with a selection by a group of Symphony Orchestra players and two selections by the Harvard vested choir.

While the company of friends that tested the seating capacity of the chapel were being shown to places by the ushers, Professor Archibald T. Davison, the university organist, played two choral preludes by Brahms, a sonatine by Bach and the 19th Psalm. After the service he played the Bach prelude in B minor.

The ushers were Barrett Wendell, Jr., Philip S. Sears, F. L. Higginson, Jr., F. S. Goodwin, George Higginson, Jr., J. J. Higginson, Charles Jackson, A. D. Weeks, Jr., R. G. Shaw, 2d, Graeme Haughton, George Agassiz, Max Agassiz, Rodolphe Agassiz, Fred Cabot, Frank Lee and H. L. Morse.

Harvard Fellows Bearers

The honorary pallbearers were President A. Lawrence Lowell, President emeritus Charles W. Eliot and the other members of the Harvard Corporation, Dr. Henry P. Wolcott, Thomas Nelson Perkins, Bishop William Lawrence, Charles Francis Adams and John F. Moors.

Within the church the body bearers were Barrett Wendell, Jr., Philip S. Sears, F. L. Higginson, Jr., George Higginson, Jr., J. J. Higginson, Charles Jackson, R. G. Shaw 2d and Rodolphe L. Agassiz.

Outside the chapel the bearers, undergraduate students of the university, were Fifield Workum, '20, president of the Crimson; Norman S. Walker, '20, captain of the hockey team; John N. Borland, '21, of the crew; Wendell Davis, '21, captain of the crew; Myles P. Baker, '22, of the Crimson staff; R. Keith Kane, '22, of the football team; Charles C. Buell, '23, captain of the freshman football team, and Malcolm Forbes, '23.

The service began with the reading by Dr. Crothers of selected passages from the Scriptures, after which a group of thirty-two players from the string section of the Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, played the Largo from the concerto for strings in D major by Handel. Dr. Crothers then read from the Psalms, and the Harvard vested choir of about forty voices sang the final chorus from the cantata, "Sleepers Wake," by Bach, beginning, "Let every tongue adore him." This was followed by a brief prayer, the university hymn by the choir, and the benediction.

Students Carry Casket

At the conclusion of the services the casket was escorted down the aisle by the group of eight ushers and at the door was taken by the undergraduate bearers, and, followed by the honorary bearers, was carried to the front of University Hall. Meantime, a large number of the students formed on either side of the walk and stood with bared heads during the passage of the body. The university bell on Harvard Hall was tolled as the casket was placed in the hearse and taken out of the yard through the Johnston Gate to Mt. Auburn cemetery.

At the grave in Mt. Auburn Cemetery Dr. Crothers read a few verses of Scripture just before the casket was lowered. Beside the grave stood Mr. and Mrs. Alexander H. Higginson, son and daughter-in-law of Major Higginson, and Major Higginson's widow. Near the head of the grave stood President Lowell and President Emeritus Eliot and a short distance back the members of the corporation were grouped together.

At the rear of the lot was a long line of forty artillerymen from Forts Banks, Andrews and Warren in Boston Harbor, under command of Lieutenant Flagg. As soon as the body had been lowered, the

Continued on Page Eight

Bostyn

HENRY
ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK

MOURN MAJOR HIGGINSON

Continued from Page One

men fired a triple volley, and as the detachment stood at attention a bugler from the Loyal Legion sounded taps.

All the company then retired leaving the family alone and when the floral remembrances, including numerous laurel wreaths, were brought they were placed about the grave.

Business Suspended on Exchange

As a tribute to Major Higginson, who had been the oldest member of the Boston Stock Exchange, trading was suspended on the floor of the exchange for five minutes at the noon hour, when the funeral began. There was a similar mark of respect on the Boston Curb Exchange. The Stock Exchange was represented at the services by former Secretary George L. Lord, former President Walter Jackson and B. Nason Hamlin.

All classes at Harvard were suspended and at Boston Latin School, from which Major Higginson was graduated with the class of '51, the class work was ended at noon.

DR. ELIOT PAYS TRIBUTE

He Tells of the Reasons That Led to Selection of Major Higginson as a Member of the Harvard Corporation

President Emeritus Charles W. Eliot of Harvard said today of Major Higginson:

"His chief direct service was that he served as a Fellow in the Corporation for twenty-six years, 1893-1919, with the utmost punctuality, assiduity, and devotion, and with high intelligence. Why was he chosen a member of the Corporation? Not because he was a successful banker and broker on State street. Far from it. He was chosen because he was as fine an exemplar of the patriot citizen soldier as there was in the country or the world; because he had given the University two great gifts, one the Soldier's Field on which he hoped that manly sports of many kinds would be generously cultivated through long generations of Harvard youth, and on which he erected a monument to youthful friends of his who fell in the Civil War, and the Harvard Union where he hoped that democracy and good fellowship among Harvard students would be forever cultivated; because he had proved himself to be the most successful promoter of good music that Eastern Massachusetts had ever known; and because he was the intimate friend of Alexander Agassiz, a great naturalist and a great administrator in varied fields, who had already served two terms in the Corporation, the last of which closed in 1890; and because the Corporation of that day knew no better example of the public spirit and courage which had made New England what it then was. The expectations and purposes with which the Corporation of 1893 elected Major Higginson a member of the board were completely fulfilled."

"FRIEND HAS GONE FROM US"

President Lowell Says of Major Higginson, "He Was Much Loved, Because He Loved Much"

President A. Lawrence Lowell of Harvard, in a statement concerning Major Higginson, says:

"In Major Henry L. Higginson the university has lost a councillor and benefactor, the students a friend. Ever mindful of their welfare he gave them the Union and Soldiers Field.

"Outside the university he created, and for years at his own expense maintained the Symphony Orchestra. Without holding public office he was always quick to serve the public, and unsparing in his denunciation of public wrong. Many will feel that a friend has gone from us for he was much loved, because he loved much."

MEMORIAL MEETING TONIGHT

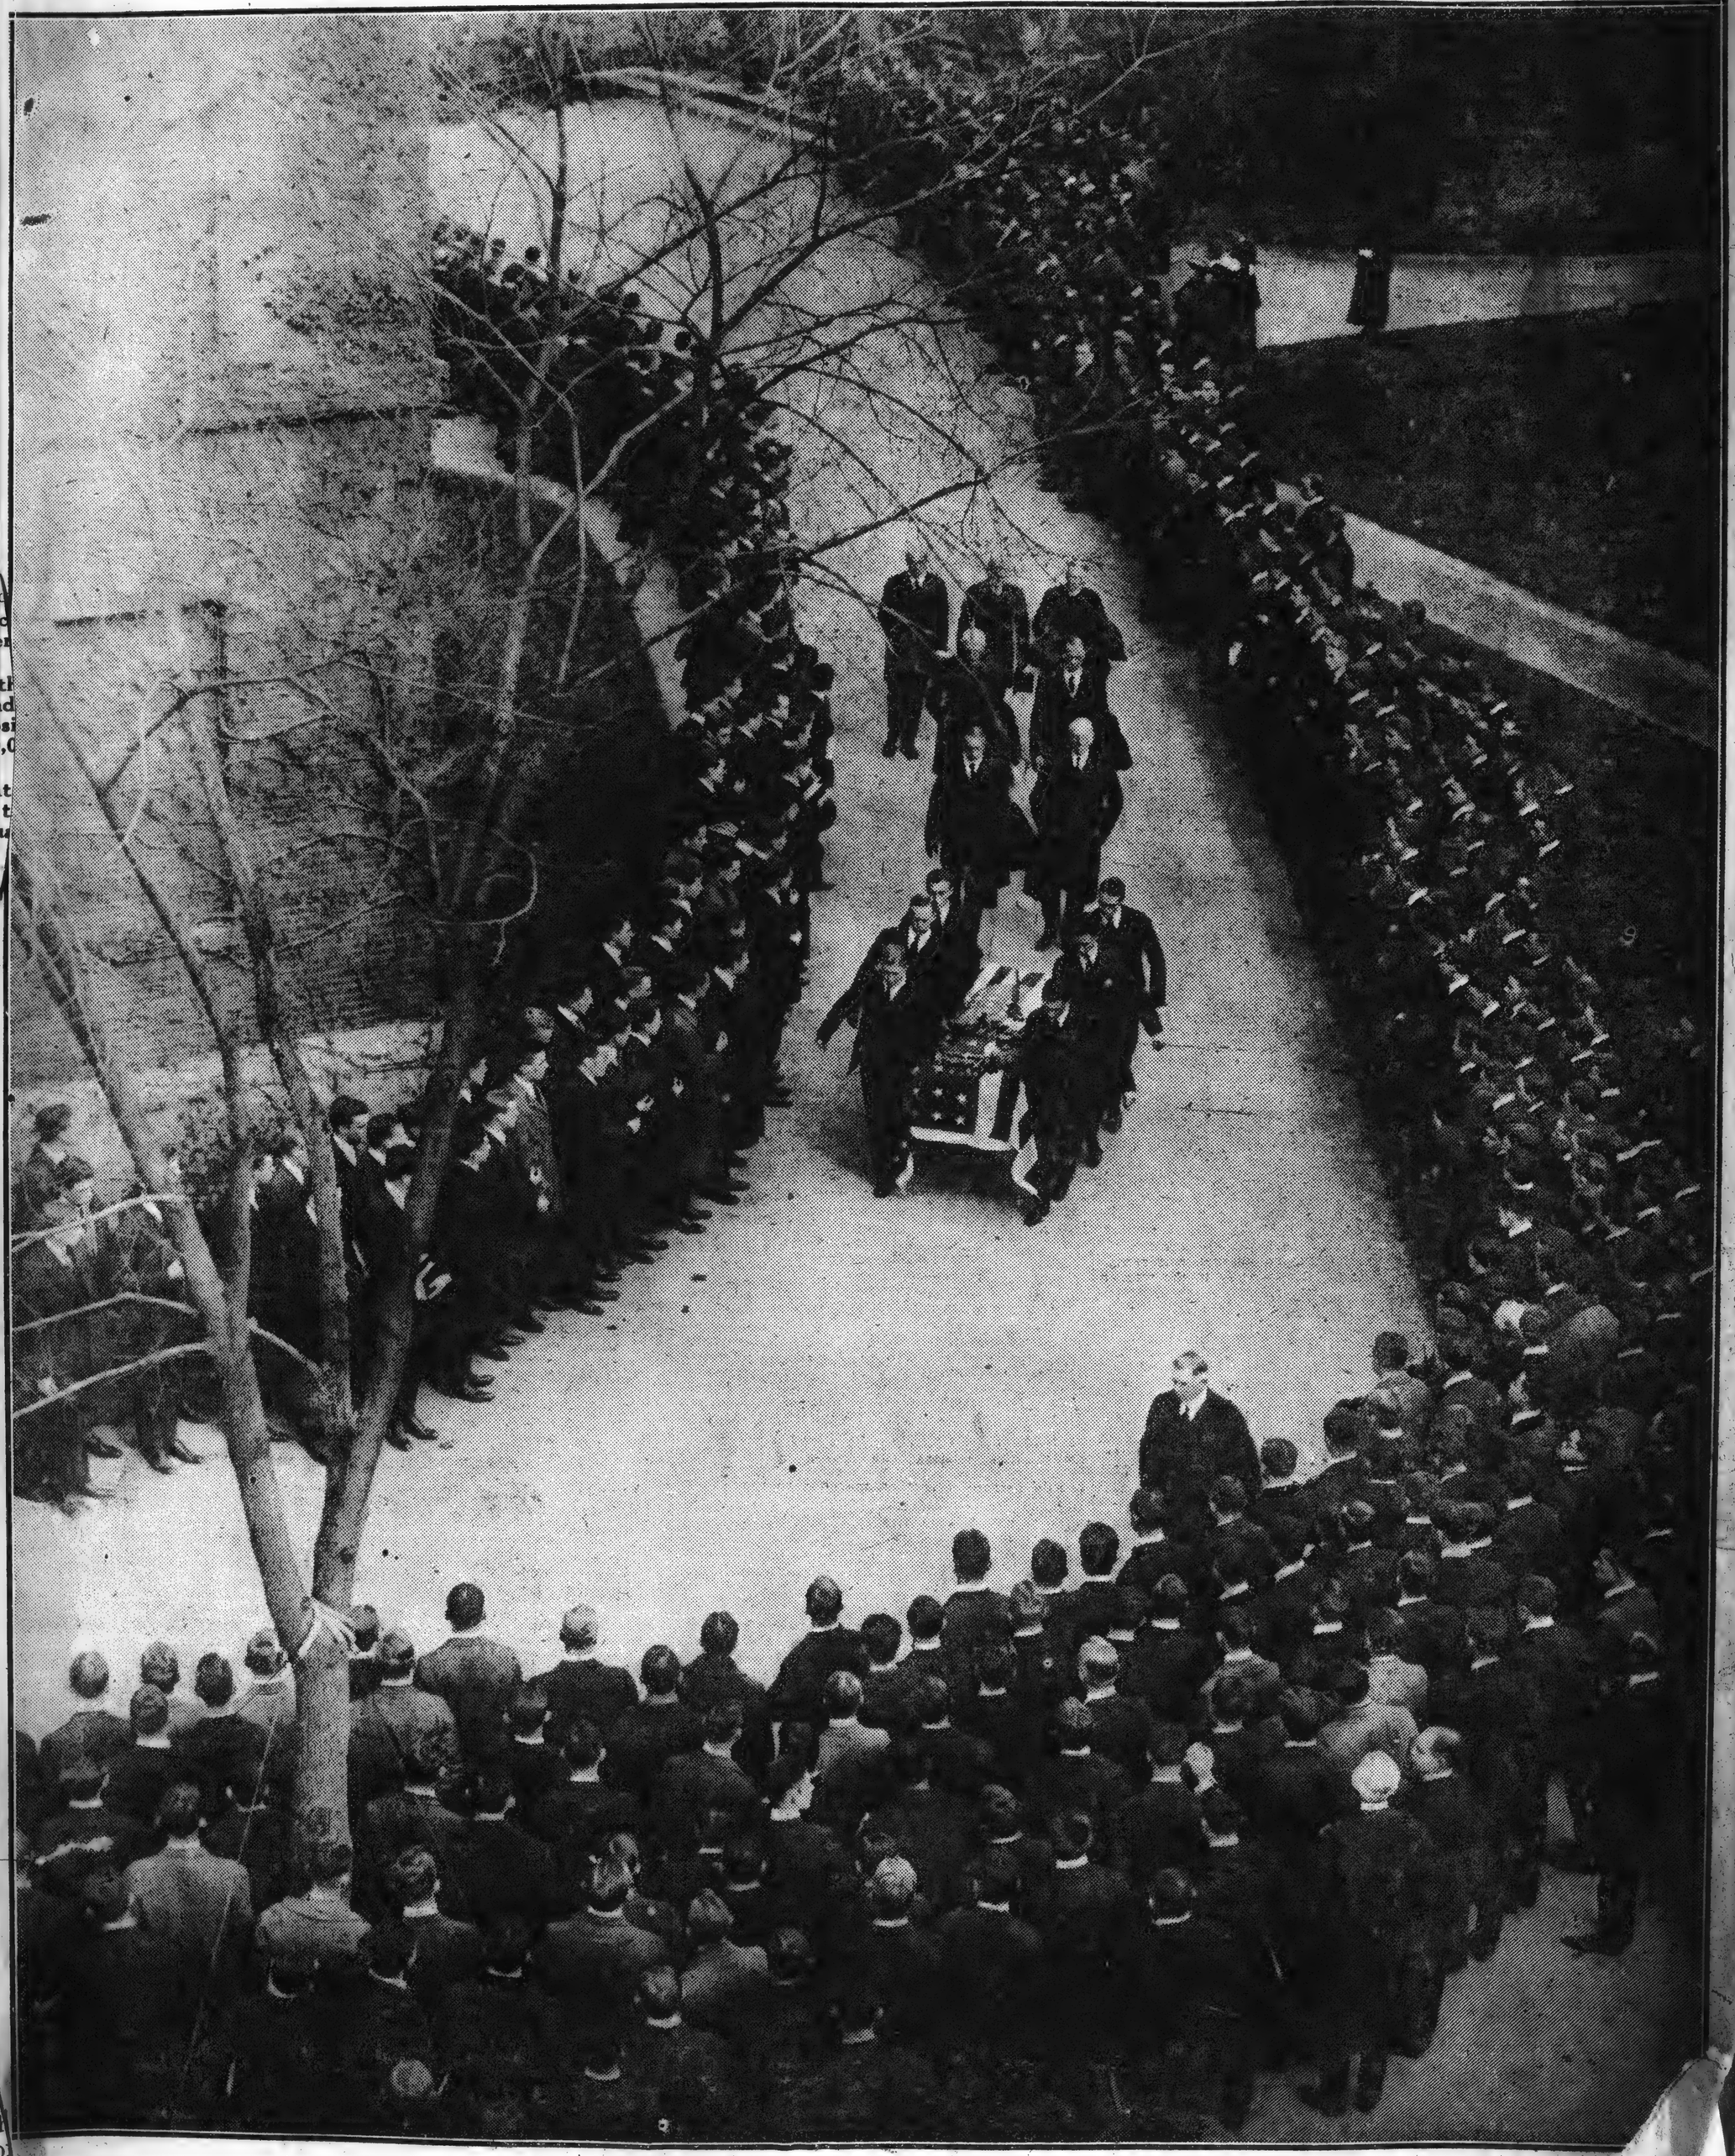
President Lowell and Others to Speak on Major Higginson at Harvard Union

As a tribute to Major Higginson, a memorial meeting will take place this evening in the Harvard Union at eight o'clock to which members and friends of the university will be welcome. President Lowell and others will speak on the life of Major Higginson and on his philanthropy which gave the university Soldiers Field and the Harvard Union.

[214]

The Funeral of Major Henry L. Higginson

"From the Age That Is Past to the Age That Is Waiting Before"



Symbolic Feature of Funeral of Major Henry L. Higginson

Harvard Students Bearing Body Through Lane of Honor From Appleton Chapel to University Hall

[215]

The Funeral of Major Henry L. Higginson

"From the Age That Is Past to the Age That Is Waiting Before"

Symbolic Feature of Funeral of Major Henry L. Higginson

Harvard Students Bearing Body Through Lane of Honor From Appleton Chapel to University Hall

[215]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

om
RIBUNE,
New York City NOV 30 1919

A Princely Music Patron

By H. E. Krehbiel

In so far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been an integral and decidedly stimulating element in the musical life of New York for nearly a generation, the death of its founder, promoter, patron and "sustainer," as Mr. Philip Hale called him, is a matter deserving of more attention than could be paid to it in an obituary of the man. Major Henry Lee Higginson was born in New York City, and, although a citizen of Boston during nearly all the years of his long life, he remained associated with our city in business affairs from the time when he entered upon his career until his death. That relationship, however, was never felt by the general public. As for the music lovers of the metropolis, even they knew him only as he was embodied in the Boston orchestra. It chanced that he sometimes appeared among the local listeners to a concert—as when circumstances compelled a change of location for the concerts, or he felt a desire to observe the attitude of the public toward the organization—but on these occasions his presence in the room was known only to his personal acquaintances who happened to see him occupying a seat among the inconspicuous many. Nothing that he said or did was calculated to draw attention to himself, and I fancy that one of the most grievous of the many grievous moments which the incident that clouded the end of his life brought upon him was that in which he broke his habitual silence about the affairs of the orchestra and defended an act for which he was in no wise responsible. What caused the pain was the fact that he could do nothing else without stultifying a course of conduct which he had pursued for thirty-six years, and which in all that time had made for artistic righteousness. He could make contracts with the musicians, confer with his manager about matters of business, pay the deficit incurred year after year, but he could not, because he would not, interfere with the artistic administration of the conductor.

That principle he laid down with the foundation-stone of the orchestra, and from it he never swerved. In upholding it during the scandal precipitated by the failure of Dr. Muck to begin a concert in Providence with "The Star-Spangled Banner," in the beginning of the musical season of 1917-'18, he was forced to appear in the public eye as a defender of the man whose sentiments were inimical to the country which he passionately loved and which he had devotedly served, and this must have torn his heart the more since it seemed to bring his own patriotism in question. But he was made of stern stuff. He did not flinch, and those who knew him knew that in his defense of Muck he was a thousandfold truer patriot than Muck's artistic companions at Seal Harbor, Me., during the preceding summer, who, nominally friends of the United States, were sympathizers with Germany, but when the issue of war was joined made haste to "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee" that thrift might follow fawning. Now that the sorrows and cares, the overwhelming disappointment which the incidents of the war brought upon him, are past, so far as he is concerned, it can not be sufficiently emphasized that the act of the conductor was one of which Major Higginson knew nothing at the time, and that even Dr. Muck was ignorant of the request of the ladies of Providence until after the concert. That he stanchly stood by his conductor as long as he believed him innocent of wrongdoing toward the United States was in obedience to his moral nature, and I can scarcely conceive of a greater bitterness than he must have felt when he learned not only the things which made Muck accept the protection of internment at Fort Oglethorpe, but also the fact that the man whom he had befriended and defended with wonderful unselfishness had been false even in his personal attitude toward his benefactor.

Higginson as a Music Student

So far as I can learn what might be called the sentimental part of the story of Major Higginson's devotion to the orchestra which must remain his monument, though he dissociated himself from it in his lifetime and left no provision for its perpetuation in his will, has never been told. The two concerts of the orchestra in Boston on November 21 and 22 were announced on the program as "In Memory of Henry Lee Higginson, Founder and Sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." There was nothing of a commemorative or funereal character in the music, which consisted of Schubert's Symphony in B minor, Brahms's Concerto in B flat for pianoforte, and Beethoven's C minor Symphony. The compositions were probably peculiarly dear to the heart of the dead man, and therein may have lain the reason for their choice. The implication lies near, but I do not know. In the annotated program Mr. Hale printed the announcement which Major Higginson published in April, 1881, telling of the establishment of the organization, short excerpts from a historical sketch written by the late W. F. Apthorp on the occasion of the thirtieth anniversary of the orchestra, in September 1911, and a still shorter tribute to the dead man from Mr. Hale himself. In this tribute it is said: "Major Higginson, as a young man, studied music and formed a musical taste, but he did not allow his own taste to dictate a program." Then follow some words of apt and eloquent appreciation, but couched in the conservative tone which their object might have approved had he been willing to approve of anything spoken to his glorification. Major Higginson did not emblazon his public monuments with laudatory legends. All of them bodied forth his loves, however, and none more sturdily than the Symphony Orchestra. He was a benefactor of Harvard University. As a youth he studied there but did not complete the course. He made essay in commercial life, but found it not to his taste. He had something of the artistic temperament and a love for music persuaded him that he ought to adopt it as a vocation. What field ought he to enter I doubt if he knew. He dreamed of being a conductor, possibly a composer. He went to Vienna and formed friendships with men who distinguished themselves in various ways—with Julius Epstein, who became professor of the pianoforte at the Conservatory; with Boehm, the violinist; with Müller von Eichholz and his brother, who became so fanatical a devotée of Johannes Brahms that on the death of that great composer he bought the farmhouse which he had occupied at Ischl and with its contents, down to the floors hallowed by the touch of the feet of genius, stocked the Brahms Museum at Gmunden; with Professor Grün, and Hillmesberger. These were young men then and their associations were not always marked by artistic strivings. In the personal effects left by Major Higginson I make no doubt there are evidences of financial help given to one or the other of them for which their artistic help was not always an equivalent. He studied counterpoint and pianoforte and probably learned enough of the science and art of music to steady the musical taste of which Mr. Hale made mention.

Genesis of the Boston Orchestra

When he had put aside his youthful ambition and become a successful banker, Major Higginson's love for music blazed up in creative potency. Boston had been dependent for orchestral music upon the Harvard Musical Association and occasional visits by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra for seventeen years. Major Higginson did not think the public or the art well served, and when admiration for Mr. (now Sir) George Henschel took possession of his soul in 1881 he published his purpose permanently to establish an orchestra on a new and progressive system. Henschel was a thorough musical artist, an admirable singer (albeit one with a bad voice), a fair composer, an accomplished, intellectual, serious-minded gentleman. No doubt Major Higginson overestimated his ability as a conductor, which was the qualification most needed for the new undertaking. The fact is he had little or no experience in the field. But he embraced the opportunity to learn and after three years of the training which Major Higginson's enthusiastic approbation made possible he was a much finer musician than when he first visited America. Moreover, he had confirmed Major Higginson in his lofty purpose. There was much caviling with his work, but a new spirit had been awakened in Boston.

Mr. Henschel conducted the orchestra for three seasons and then returned to Europe. He may have carried away with him some questionings touching the amount of good which he had done in Boston, but no doubts at all concerning the benefits which Boston had conferred upon him. I am glad to set that down to his credit. In the early summer of 1884 or 1885 I spent an afternoon with him at the home of one of his friends in a beautiful old house overlooking the Hudson. We talked about music, of course, and I asked questions about Major Higginson's undertaking. Mr. Henschel was enthusiastic in its praise, but laid much more stress on what the orchestra had done for him than on what he had done for the orchestra. "I had little or no experience in conducting when I took the appointment," he said, "and I shall never forget what it did for me. I learned more in six months in Boston than I would have learned in as many years in Germany." That was good to hear. Many foreign artists have enjoyed American hospitality since and have repaid it by calumnies concerning the state of musical culture which they found in the principal cities of the States. I once challenged Felix Weingartner to repeat the things which he had just spoken at a public dinner concerning popular appreciation of symphonic music in New York in the article which he said he intended to publish in "Die Musik" on his return to Berlin. He promised, and he printed an article on America, but I looked in vain for anything even remotely hinting at the encomium which his lips had voluntarily uttered. That was characteristically German. When the Männergesangverein of Vienna visited us fifteen or twenty years ago the conductor, who was also a critical writer for a Viennese journal, spent his time in beer drinking at Commerse, and on his return home had not a word to say about New York's musical institutions, but scoffed at the art taste of Americans and said their appreciation of music was summed up in admiration of Creatore and his band. Creatore had been an object of diversion to the musical public of America a season or so before, and at that very moment his laughable calisthenics were evoking wild enthusiasm in German cities. Richard Strauss was no better than his Viennese confrère.

The Coming of Gericke

When Henschel would no longer serve Major Higginson imported Mr. Gericke—imported him, by the way, on the advice of Epstein, who must always live in grateful memory, not only for that act but also for having turned the activities of Mme. Sembrich from the pianoforte into the song field. Gericke was then assistant conductor at the Imperial Opera at Vienna and conductor of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde—a post afterward filled by no less a man than Brahms. Gericke was young, enthusiastic, conscientious, energetic, a stickler for precision, an artist with a keen and highly developed sense of euphony, a good deal of a martinet, but the best man in the world, as it appeared, to lay the foundations for the finest band in the world, as I believe the Boston Orchestra became under his training and that of Nikisch, who followed him in five years. Now Major Higginson's policy of giving his conductor a free hand in everything bore fine fruit. Mr. Henschel had been content with such personal material as he could find in Boston; he built on the foundations of the Harvard Musical Association. In Mr. Gericke's second season (1885-'86) he brought fifteen artists from Europe to recruit the orchestra, replacing incapable men, at the head of them Franz Kneisel, then a stripling, but already an ideal concert master. Gericke and Kneisel had their will with Major Higginson. They had but to recommend and he fulfilled their wishes. A case in point: For the sake of sonority, and possibly uniformity in quality of tone, the string players of the Vienna opera all played on instruments made by one luthier—Lemböck. Not all had good viols, and it was thought that even old Italian instruments, effective in solo work and in small rooms, did not fill the bill when there was a large ensemble in a large hall. So the men were provided with new instruments by an Austrian maker. The matter was brought to the consideration of Major Higginson, who ordered that the experiment be tried forthwith. He wrote to Professor Grün, who selected fifty violins, violas and violoncellos from the stock of a maker named Zach and they were sent to Boston. The cost to Major Higginson was $6,000. After a trial the experiment was abandoned and the useless instruments went into the lumber room of the music hall, where, I believe, they still repose. Perhaps they will become the property of the orchestra under the will of Major Higginson.

Cancellation of Contract

Other experiments added to the annual losses which the orchestra incurred. After Mr. Gericke's term of five years had expired Major Higginson tried to secure Hans Richter as his successor. Richter hesitated, accepted, went to Leipsic to sign the contract to avoid complications and costs in Austria, signed, hesitated again and then declined to come. In haste Paur was engaged in his place, the contract being for five years, with an option of five more. Paur's usefulness was exhausted at the end of the first term, and it cost Major Higginson $10,000 to again fill the position for Gericke, necessarily rare, [illegible] now.

[216]

The twenty-first annual show of the American Society of Miniature Painters, now open at the Arden Gallery, is everything but thrilling. One contributor, this year as in many other years, Miss Laura Coombs Hills, rises to a striking plane. Her "Miss Consuelo Bates" is a flashing performance, a piece of masterful technique. From time to time we come upon miniatures here in which her free brushwork is successfully emulated. Miss E. B. Decker, Miss S. L. Marks, Miss Mabel R. Welch, Miss M. B. Willson, all have the merit of really painting their portraits, not stiffly drawing them. But the group of such emancipated craftsmen is not too large. The bulk of the work shown is smooth, capable, polished, and yet, on the whole, without distinction. We are glad to note a lessening of the tendency to make he miniature what it can seldom be, an elaborately pictorial affair. Miss M. B. Smith's "Miss Countrymen," with ts numerous books in the background, hows the danger of crowding too uch into a tiny composition.

The Arden Gallery shows along with he miniatures a quantity of American ottery, a good deal of the space being ccupied by examples of faïence from he Durant kilns. It is well made, andsome wear. more impressive in olor than it is in form, though some f the larger platters and vases have beauty of contour matching the rich laze. On a table by itself there is a mall exhibit of the Pewabic ware produced by Mrs. Stratton, of Detroit. his has a quality which deserves ore conspicuous exploitation. The ce Taddeo dares not refuse.

In the next scene Isabella is summoned to the apartment of the Bey ut she has taken the others into her onfidence and they hide in various arts of the apartment. When Mustafa enters Taddeo exasperates him y not withdrawing at the proper sig al. Isabella suddenly calls in Elvir om the adjoining room and confront ustafa with her.

Then Isabella's plot unfolds. Mustafa is induced to become a member the order of the "Pappátaci," an aginary society, whose members live life of gluttony and sensuality. is appeals to Mustafa. They de de him into performing a series of upid ceremonies of initiation and mpel him to sit mumbling and eat, totally blind to the fact that while is thus sitting idly by, Isabella, idoro and Taddeo are making their ape. When he discovers the detion it is already too late and he ides to take Elvira back.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

BANKER AND MUSICAL PATRON.

Few American millionaires have had so romantic a career as the late Major Henry Lee Higginson. He entered Harvard University in 1851 with the class to which Phillips Brooks and Alexander Agassiz belonged, but ill health forced him to quit after two years. After spending a few years in a Boston counting house he went to Europe, where he studied music, mostly in the "semi-Asiatic city of Vienna," as Wagner called it. Here he "worked hard and economized hard," as he wrote to his father. He also went to Rome, and there, he wrote, "I took about eight lessons of a capital master, and I used to enjoy intensely the singing, to his accompaniment, my exercises and some little Neapolitan songs. My reasons for studying harmony are manifest. I cannot properly understand music without doing so; moreover, it is an excellent exercise for the mind. . . . My money may fly away, my knowledge cannot." A friend of his, referring to the fact that he was going to study music for a few years, wrote: "With immense good sense he sees that he will be far more of a man and no less of a merchant when he has duly cultivated the best gift nature gave him"—good advice for many wealthy Americans.

"What is money good for, if not to spend for one's friends and to help them?" he wrote to his father in 1857. "You've done so all your life—let me do so too while I can, for it is in me to be a close man, a miser." Instead of a miser he became a Mæcenas; not for his native city, New York, but for Boston, his adopted home. On his return in November, 1860, he joined the army, in which he rose to the rank of major and brevet lieutenant-colonel. In 1865 he "struck oil" in Ohio and soon prospered so much that he was able to become a part-be elected, show the Radical Socialists carried only ten seats.

Complete returns from 206 constituencies show the Conservatives, Nationalists and Moderates carried 191 seats and the Extremists 15 seats, the Moderates gaining 46 and the Extremists losing 16.

Results of the elections thus far known show that among the winning candidates are 70 Republicans of the Left, 17 Radicals, 10 Radical Socialists, 11 Republican Socialists, 5 Unified Socialists, 5 Progressives, 8 Liberals and 8 Conservatives.

The Republicans of the Left gained 7 seats and lost 4, the Radicals gained 6 and lost 5, the Radical Socialists gained 1 and lost 15, Republican Socialists gained 2 and lost 2, the United Socialists gained 2 and lost 8, the Progressives gained 7, the Liberals gained 7 and the Conservatives gained 2.

HOW PROMINENT CANDIDATES FARED.

Louis Lafferre, Minister of Instruction, was also among those whose terms expire and who were defeated, as were M. Colliard, Minister of Labor; Victor Augagneur, former Minister of the Navy, and Gen. Charles Mutaud, former Governor of Algeria.

Three deputies whose terms expire will have a second term and 25 deputies whose terms expire were beaten, of whom there were 3 Left Republicans, 12 Radical Socialists, 2 Republican Socialists and 8 Unified Socialists.

Among those known to have been elected are André Lefevre, former Minister of Finance; Aristide Briand, former Premier; M. Abel, Governor-General of Algeria; Capt. André Tardieu, Minister of Blockade and Invested Regions; Albert Favre, Under-Secretary for the Interior; Emanuel Brousse; Prince Murat; Alexander Blanc, and Leon Abrami. Among those known to have been defeated are Victor Dalbiez, Anatole de Monzie, Pierre Renaudel, Pierre Brizon, Henry Howe's valuable historic volume on the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Major Higginson soon found he had civilian use for his training as an army officer. At the end of the first year the players tried to dictate to him in regard to the policy to be pursued. Their delegate laughed when he said the concerts would go on according to his plans and that it was only a question who would play. But when the men discovered what sort of a man they were dealing with, they nearly all of them came back meekly and obediently, consenting to play only under his conductor. The same firmness was shown by him in refusing to unionize his orchestra. He absolutely declined to give up control as to number of rehearsals, pay for musicians, engagement or dismissal of players, as long as he was paying a large subsidy. "We pay more," he said, "ask entire control of the men, and see to it that they are well paid, have pensions, and also get outside work if possible; therefore the union cannot benefit them."

Another important occasion on which he insisted on having his own way was when he called on musical Boston to provide a better auditorium for his orchestra than the unsatisfactory old Music Hall. He announced that unless he could have better hall for his concerts they would cease. The hall was built. His good judgment in purely musical matters is illustrated by a remark made by Dr. Muck when he first came to Boston in the autumn of 1906; he "did not hesitate to rank the Boston Orchestra with the best in Europe, and commended especially the wisdom of securing French musicians for the wood instruments, Germans for the brasses and many Austrians and Americans for the strings." It is interesting to recall now something else Dr. Muck said when the Kaiser allowed him to come over here. He "attributed this consent entirely to the Emperor's regard for America." The Kaiser wanted it, as we now know, as a part of the world he was after. How Major Higginson, in consequence of the Muck intrigues, came to give up the patronage of his orchestra is too recent history to need relating now. It will live without him, for he made it famous; he spared no labor and expense to make it so. It was to him, as he once remarked, what steam yachts, racing stables, libraries and art galleries have been to other men of wealth.

ESTABLISHED 1851
NOV 23 1919
From Times
New York City

A FOUNDER'S WORK

By RICHARD ALDRICH

IT is something of a phenomenon when a leading American financier, the head of a great banking house, dies and his death is deplored, first and foremost, in all the obituary notices of him, as a loss, not to the financial strength of the country, but to the musical world. There is something encouraging in that, after all; the fact that the great material success of Major Higginson's life is put below the great spiritual success; and the fact that the reputation and the work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are more widely known, and, shall we say, more widely admired, than those of Lee, Higginson & Co., admirable as they are. It may easily be believed that Major Higginson himself would have had it so; and that he set more store by what he accomplished through his famous orchestra than through his banking interests.

It was said by Major Higginson that the orchestra was to him his yacht, his racing stable, his library, his art gallery. But it was more than that; there are not many yachtsmen or racing men whose life is so closely bound up in that as to most of them their avocations, as Mr. Higginson's was bound up with his orchestra. It was a part of his life, and a very important part; one which was more than an amusement to him, something on which he spent much time, thought, active endeavor, and much of that wisdom and judgment and skill in knowing and handling men which raised him so high in the business and civic life, not only of the community in which he lived, but of the country. Furthermore, though his orchestra was so much a part of his life, it was of the essence of his wisdom and judgment that he knew just where his function as Maecenas ended and where that of his conductor began. To this was due much of the success of his undertaking with the orchestra. He knew much about music, but he knew that, with all his knowledge, he was an amateur, and that dabbling of an amateur in any art brings disaster. It is a piece of wisdom that still has to be learned.

A paper that he prepared concerning his plan for the orchestra, quoted in Mr. Howe's book about the institution before the plan was launched in 1881, sets forth his ideas about the orchestra, and among other things his own place and the limitations of his functions in the scheme. The conductor, "in my opinion," he writes, "should select the musicians when new men are needed, select the programs, subject to the judgment or criticism of myself or my representative, conduct all the rehearsals and concerts, rule over the orchestra and the soloists, whom he should also engage, and generally be held responsible for the proper production of all his performances. * * * I do not like Wagner's music"—this in 1881, be it remembered—"and take little interest in much of the newer composers, but I should not like to bar them out of our programs. * * * But, of course, anything unworthy is to be shut out."

It is doubtful if Mr. Higginson ever found much occasion to subject the conductor's choice of programs to his own judgment or criticism, or to that of any "representative" of his own. He always upheld the hands of his conductors and met their wishes in a way that often entailed great and extravagant expense. An instance of this is given in an article about the Boston Orchestra, published in The Century Magazine a few years ago. There was once one of Mr. Higginson's conductors, it is there related, who thought that the tone of the violins—the greatest glory and strength of the organization—would be improved if all the players had instruments of the same make and quality, instead of such as each individual had chosen or been able to possess himself of. Nothing would do, therefore, but that he should send to Germany and import for a score or more of his violinists a set of expensive violins by one maker. The results were not what were expected, and most of the instruments were soon packed away in the store room, gathering dust. And it is pretty well known that in the building of the Symphony Hall, the present home of the orchestra, most of the financing, though nominally carried by a company, approached in one way or another close to Mr. Higginson's pocket. The existence of the old Music Hall was threatened, and the continued existence of the orchestra required a new one.

What the orchestra cost Mr. Higginson in time and trouble, in annoyances great and small, in perplexities, in demands upon his patience, wisdom, and sense of justice, nobody, perhaps, will ever fully know. The greatest trials that came to him were, of course, those that gained so much publicity during the war, and they were grievous. But his path for more than a generation before that was not wholly a smooth one. He was always accessible to his players, in his busy hours and out of them, and they seldom showed any hesitation in coming to him as to a friend, counselor, and guide, in large and small matters, including the investment of their earnings so as to produce an immediate large fortune.

It seems superfluous to remind any music lover of the great debt the whole country owes to Mr. Higginson for what he did with the Boston Orchestra. It influenced the standard of orchestral performance, setting it at a pitch that was perhaps never thought of before; and to the example of his orchestra is no doubt due in part, perhaps in large part, the foundation of the numerous orchestras that now exist in many of the large cities of the country that had none before. He might truly have said, "I have done the State some service, and they know it"; and every lover of music in it, who has many times of right risen up and called Henry L. Higginson blessed, has felt that a benefactor was gone, a great force for good dissolved, when he departed.

* * *

In accordance with the new plan adopted by the Philharmonic Society, the programs of the afternoon concerts this season are to be entirely different from those of the previous evening's concerts, instead of repeating them, as has been the immemorial custom of the society. Or, rather, the immemorial custom was to repeat the program of the afternoon concert, which in former days came first, at the evening concert; the afternoon concert having at one time been called a "public rehearsal"; and in times not wholly vanished from the memory of living people was really a rehearsal, when the conductor did not hesitate to stop the orchestra and begin again a passage that did not satisfy him. This institution of the "public rehearsal," for which tickets came to be sold as for a separate series of concerts, was itself an evolution of an older plan.

There were two classes of members in the old Philharmonic—associate and subscribing members; at one time in the early days there was for a short time a professional membership, created to enable professional musicians to hear the concerts at half the regular price, but this was soon abolished. The associate members had the privilege of attending three, and sometimes even more, rehearsals for each concert. This privilege of familiarizing themselves with the music about to be played, and gaining thereby greater edification and enjoyment from the concert itself, was valued so highly by the associate members that the list increased rapidly, and that of subscribing members, whose privileges extended only to attendance on the concerts, began to dwindle.

The associate membership was abolished after the thirty-second season; practical difficulties arose from the presence of so large an audience at the rehearsals. Some might wonder what would become of a privilege under present arrangements of being present at the "last three rehearsals" for any given concert. Time is very pressing in these days and union rates for rehearsals are onerous. However that may be, it is interesting to note that the course of evolution has at last brought about the complete severance of any relation between the afternoon and evening concerts of the Philharmonic Society; of any "pairing" of them, as there used to be.

Most of the other great orchestras in this country, and some other countries, keep up the custom. The Boston Symphony Orchestra stopped calling the pair a "rehearsal" and "concert," as they had been called from the beginning in 1881, in the midst of the season of 1915-16, and began calling them "afternoon and evening concerts."

Major Higginson's original plan was that the public rehearsals should be in fact rehearsals. In the paper mentioned above he writes: "As regards public rehearsals, the conductor should be instructed that he is to drill his orchestra and correct it and to cause it to repeat again and again during these just as during any rehearsals, and in no way to regard them as concerts." But this did not long continue, if it ever was seriously put into practice. The "rehearsals," with their audiences, became afternoon concerts, much frequented by students because of their cheaper prices. There were a few occasions when the conductor was not satisfied with the performance of a piece at the "rehearsal" and withdrew it from the program for the following evening concert. For the Philadelphia Orchestra the two concerts have been a "pair" for many years, if not from the beginning, and so have the concerts of the Chicago Orchestra.

NOV 16 1919

MAJOR HIGGINSON, BANKER, DIES AT 84

Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra and Noted for Philanthropies.

GALLANT RECORD IN WAR

End Comes in Hospital Few Hours After Operation for Old Trouble.

Special Despatch to THE SUN.

BOSTON, Mass., Nov. 15.—Major Henry Lee Higginson, banker, philanthropist and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead, following an operation at the Massachusetts General Hospital.

The death of Major Higginson, who was in his eighty-fifth year, was a shock to his many friends as the banker and head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. had been engaged actively in business up to a few days ago.

On Friday he was taken from his home on Commonwealth avenue to the hospital. His condition became so serious that an immediate operation was deemed necessary. He died at 8.30 o'clock last night, but the news was not made public until to-day. The cause was a blood clot on the brain, according to his physician, Dr. F. G. Balch.

The Major did not regain consciousness from the time ether was given to him. He complained a few days ago of a recurrence of the trouble for which he underwent an operation last winter.

Funeral services will be held Monday noon in Appleton Chapel at Harvard University, where Major and Mrs. Higginson were married more than fifty years ago.

The funeral will be simple in accordance with the wishes of Major and Mrs. Higginson. The nephews and nephews-in-law of Major Higginson will be the pall bearers. Members of the Harvard Corporation will serve as honorary bearers.

The Loyal Legion will contribute a flag to drape the coffin and a legion bugler will sound taps at the grave in Mt. Auburn Cemetery. Members of the Harvard Club will attend the funeral in a body.

"First Citizen" of Boston.

Major Higginson, among the great bankers, as among the Colonial families of New England, signally illustrated all that was oldest, most firmly established and most devoted to tradition and distrustful of change. Of late years many Bostonians liked to style him their First Citizen. For a long time his indorsement, or his firm's, of a man or an institution was all the surety conservative New Englanders would ask.

In 1916 he was the nestor of the Boston men who unsuccessfully fought against the appointment of Louis D. Brandeis to the Supreme bench. But the country at large knew him best as the creator and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from which he withdrew shortly after the arrest and internment of the conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. He never made any comment on Muck's plight after Federal officials acted. Previously he had been his stanch and indignant defender in the face of popular agitation in half a dozen cities.

But to be conspicuous personally in the daily news was always Major Higginson's aversion. He considered it notoriety and a thing to be avoided by a gentleman. His many philanthropies really were done by stealth. In 1904, when his son, Alexander H. Higginson, figured in divorce proceedings and was sued by a Kentucky beauty of 19, it was known that the inevitable publicity peculiarity intensified the elder Higginson's pain.

Orchestra Founded in 1881.

He founded the orchestra, "the greatest string band in the Western Hemisphere," and unsurpassed in the other, thirty-eight years ago. Its first concert was given October 22, 1881. Major Higginson's interest in it was purely that of a devoted amateur of music. It was always a money loser, and there were seasons when the deficit reached $50,000. Its excellence has come not only from the individual merit of the players and the long experience of most of them together, but also from the great ability of its conductors, who have included Georg Henschel, Nikisch, Paur, Dr. Wilhelm Gericke, Gustav Fiedler and Dr. Muck, the last named irreproachable as a musician whatever is true of him otherwise.

The Boston Symphony was the first prominent orchestra in this country to be established on a permanent basis. Societies of music lovers in New York and elsewhere followed Major Higginson's lead. In December, 1903, he came into conflict with the Musical Union, which during a New York engagement ordered twenty players of the orchestra to take out union cards or quit. At the time there were union musicians in the organization already, and if its patron knew the fact he tolerated their membership. But when it came to a virtual demand for a closed shop he put his foot down hard.

"It seems," he said, "that unionizing is being carried a bit far when musicians enter into it. I have made several contracts with my players, and they know what they can and cannot do. I expect no trouble from them. All there is about it is that if this takes ten minutes extra from my time the Symphony in Boston will stop. Just as soon as players tell me they cannot do what I require I will tell them, 'There's the door.'"

Perpetuated in Will.

He carried his point, for not only did the twenty men affected by the ultimatum decline to join the union but the seventy-seven who were members soon resigned. At the time Major Higginson said that if he was allowed to carry on the work of the orchestra as he wished its life would not end with his death. In 1913 he justified this promise, letting it be known that his will contained a $1,000,000 bequest to perpetuate the orchestra.

"It is my desire," he said, "to have the orchestra benefit all the people. That was my early ambition in founding it. I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot."

The storm which centred about Dr. Muck began in the autumn of 1917, when it was charged that the German conductor had refused to play "The Star Spangled Banner" at a concert given in Providence. The immediate result was a threat of violent trouble in Baltimore, whither the orchestra was going, should the refusal be repeated there. The agitation against Muck was taken up in New York.

Major Higginson broke his habitual silence with two extended statements. He said the whole thing was a teapot tempest, that the anthem had not been included in the symphony programme for Providence solely because it was outside the artistic composition of such programmes, that the request for it to be played was not communicated to the conductor or the orchestra before the concert and that neither Muck nor himself ever had refused the anthem to an audience.

Stood by Muck to Last.

He mentioned that Muck was not a Prussian, completely absolved him of any disloyalty and explained that the Baltimore contract had been broken because the police there had forbidden the concert. He said, however, that he never had threaetned to disband the orchestra unless the protests ceased. It was the newspapers which would disband it, if anything did, he said.

In March, 1918, when the orchestra was about to play in New York, a number of subscribers, led by Mrs. William Jay, tried to persuade Major Higginson to retire Dr. Muck, at least during the Carnegie Hall and Brooklyn Academy engagements. His flat reply was that Muck was to conduct and that the concerts would not be cancelled. The proprietors of Carnegie Hall said they were held under contract and powerless, and the city authorities declined to intervene. Meanwhile, it had been announced that the orchestra would open all future concerts with the anthem, which was done at the two in question, and they passed off quietly. So far the only open charges against Muck were that he was an enemy alien and had expressed his devotion to the Kaiser and his contemptuous enmity toward Americans. But ten days later, in Cambridge, Muck was arrested by Department of Justice agents, and early in April he was ordered interned. It is said that the charge, to which he owned that of being an alien enemy, was mild and technical compared to others withheld from publication.

Reports that the future of the orchestra itself was precarious had been current all through the trouble. On April 28 Major Higginson announced that he was "done," having severed all connection with his creation, but that he had reconsidered an intention to disband the players. The orchestra passed into the hands of a corporate board of trustees.

His Farewell Address.

Major Higginson delivered a farewell address at a concert given May 4. He said:

"My friends: The Boston Symphony Orchestra was set up from the conviction of my youth that our country should have great and permanent orchestras. In Europe I had seen the pleasure and comfort of such orchestras, and it seemed my duty and was my aim to give our country the best music possible.

"To achieve this object it was necessary to give the conductor the sole artistic responsibility as an essential to success and then to require of him and his men a high and ever higher standard. To win that standard nothing has been spared and the aim never forgotten, and in this season our orchestra has reached our high water mark.

"The concerts were offered to the whole public, but my chief wish and hope was to meet the needs and satisfy the longings of the many people leading quiet or busy lives and having little enjoyment; and, furthermore, to help in the education of the student of music.

"To me the concerts have been a great joy, not only because of the lovely music but chiefly because of the refreshment and enjoyment of the multitude of people unknown to me who, leading grave lives, have needed this sunshine; and this year it is they who have written me a mass of warm letters full of gratitude for the past and of urgent requests for the future. To these unknown friends and all of our audiences far and wide I offer my heartiest thanks. Thus the faith and the vision of my youth have been justified.

"I had hoped to have carried on the concerts during my lifetime, but this war has brought up many troubles, and among them the problems of the orchestra during this season which have exhausted my strength and nerves. Therefore my part in our orchestra ceases to-night, except for the popular concerts of this year.

"The conductors, the members of the orchestra, and the office management have done their work exeellently from first to last, and have deserved the warmest thanks and praise."

Native of New York City.

Like a valedictorian, as he was, he then turned and addressed the players, bidding them farewell as their comrade. He concluded by bespeaking, from the audience and the public, support for the orchestra under its new control.

In November, 1918, a souvenir book containing the signatures of 4,000 patrons of the concerts during the orchestra's entire existence was presented to him on his eighty-fourth birthday. A letter from Dr. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard, took up the first vellum page.

Major Higginson was born in New York city November 18, 1834, a son of George and Mary Cabot Lee Higginson and a descendant of Francis Higginson, who settled in Salem in 1629. The family removed to Boston and there the future banker was brought up. He entered Harvard in 1855, but left to enter a counting house after three years. With this firm, S. & E. Austin, he remained until the civil war began, except for a year abroad, 1856, which he spent in the study of music in Vienna.

In 1861 he was commissioned Second Lieutenant in the Second Massachusetts Volunteers. By the following October he had risen to a Captainey in another regiment. He was promoted to Major early in 1862, and in 1864 was breveted Lieutenant-Colonel for gallantry. In August, 1864, he was discharged for disability, having received four wounds. He has sometimes been called Colonel of late years, but usually Major, to distinguish him from Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson during the lifetime of the latter.

He always took great pride in his war record, and a story about him is that he had in his house a room filled with war relics, where once a year he slept, campaign fashion, on a blanket spread on the floor, wearing his old service uniform.

During his service and while in Boston on leave in December, 1863, he married Miss Ida Agassiz, daughter of the eminent biologist, Louis Agassiz. The son above referred to was their only child.

Immediately after the war, with two friends, he bought and tried to manage a cotton plantation in Georgia. The exton to enter the banking house of Lee, Higginson & Co. After Henry Lee's retirement in 1897 Major Higginson became virtually head of the firm. He was admitted to the Boston Stock Exchange in 1868 and to the New York Stock Exchange in 1876.

In 1891 he gave to Harvard an athletic field, the famous Soldiers Field, as a memorial to his friends who had died in the service, these including Charles Russell Lowell, Robert Gould Shaw, James Savage, Jr., Edward B. Dalton, Stephen George Perkins and James Jackson Lowell. In 1899 he endowed the university with $150,000 for the erection of the Harvard Union.

He was elected a member of the Harvard corporation in 1893 and a trustee of the Carnegie Institution at Washington, D. C., in 1902.

In a work of biographical reference his only allusion to his musical interest, an allusion which has stood unchanged for years, is "Devoted a considerable sum to organize a symphony orchestra at Boston."

[217]

NG POS
ew York City
NOV 22 191

Soldier---Financier---Humanist

Major Higginson's Greatest of All Gifts to the Community Is the Boston Symphony Orchestra

By Edward H. Clement

THE late Major Higginson, whose death occurred on November 14, used to invite the New York critics to come to Boston on important occasions. The last time this was done was when Dr. Muck was to give what proved to be a sensational production of Liszt's "Faust" symphony. Years ago, half a dozen of us went up to attend the début of a new conductor for his Boston Symphony Orchestra—I think it was Nikisch. When we arrived at the station, having, as usual, paid our own fare and charged it to our paper, we were told that we were to meet Major Higginson at a certain restaurant. At once we had visions of a free lunch made up of caviar, terrapin, canvasback duck, artichoke salad, Camembert, and champagne; for wasn't our host a millionaire? Well, he came, and we sat down and talked about orchestras and conductors, and no cocktail was forthcoming. Finally, slowly and painfully, we reached the simultaneous telepathic conclusion that we were expected to order our own sandwiches and beer and pay for them. We did so, feeling wiser if not better men. In spite of this highly ethical treatment, we all wrote favorably about the new conductor; which proves that musical critics are not as black as painted.

Once I got a letter from the Major. It was so peppery that it made me sneeze. It came about in this way: Another millionaire, Seth Low, knowing that I was an intimate friend as well as an admirer of America's foremost composer, asked me to come to his residence. There he showed me a circular asking for contributions to help MacDowell, who was suffering from the brain disease which ended his life in 1905, after several years of helplessness. Mr. Low himself had put his name down for $1,000 and Andrew Carnegie had signed for another thousand. Though Mr. Low was no longer Mayor of New York, he was a very busy man, and so he asked me if I would try to get some more signatures. I said I would try, and I wrote eloquent letters to several prominent millionaires who were supposed to be interested in music. Not one of them gave a cent. Somewhat discouraged, I decided to try Boston. Naturally, Major Higginson came into my mind first. I didn't tell him about my lack of success in New York, but appealed to him as a well-known musical Mæcenas, and that sort of thing. I wish you could read his reply. I saved it but cannot put my hand on it this moment, because my library has just been moved. He was a sufferer from gout and I imagine the East wind helped to dictate that letter. The substance of it was that I ought to be ashamed of myself to appeal to him, who was already spending a fortune in behalf of music in America, when I was living in a city crammed with millionaires. I felt snubbed once again, and tried no more of the very rich, but with the aid of Victor Harris and other good friends I succeeded, nevertheless, in raising a helpful sum in smaller contributions.

* * * *

On the editorial page, last Monday, I referred to certain military traits of Major Higginson which enabled him to meet emergencies. An amusing instance of this trait may be added here: On one occasion a famous foreign pianist, who had been engaged as soloist, demanded payment in advance. He was informed that if he wasn't willing to wait for his check till Saturday afternoon the piano solo would be dropped from the programme and the audience told why. The pianist promptly agreed to wait. The same tactics were SOLDIER of the War for the Union, financier, scion of a Puritan stock distinguished for many generations in New England history, trustee and manager of vested interests, millionaire and humanist at once—Major Henry Lee Higginson has been for more than a generation past, and will be for generations to come, best known and revered for his unparalleled gift to this community—and to the country—of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Not for the munificence of this gift, not for its mere outlay and continual outgo in money and financial responsibility, was this gift precious in the spirit of its giving and in its fruits—but, rather, in its signifying that the reproach of America—that it is absorbed in merely material interests, monopolized by money making and ignorant of, and indifferent to, the finer things of the spirit, to the fine arts and to the culture of the Old World—this reproach was to be lifted and an ever-flowing source of the noblest and purest of musical art provided for us. It so happened that in the same year that the Boston Symphony Orchestra came into its own here under Henry Lee Higginson's princely patronage, the present writer became editor of the Transcript. Though it is nigh two score years ago, now, it seems but the other day that the young editor received a note from Major Higginson—not one of those "letters to the editor" that the public are so familiar with from his pen—but a pencilled scrap of a note in which was easily to be scented a coming tip to the public of some importance.

The Symphony concerts had at that time been under way for a season or two, the major manfully footing the deficits, as he had expected and planned to do. The then fashionable and popular young Georg Henschel, hitherto simply a baritone singer equipped with the racial mental capacity, artistic taste in dramatic expression beyond the ordinary, had been awarded the directorship perhaps for the purpose of giving the concert social vogue but Georg Henschel, with all his rare accomplishments and gifts, was without experience as an orchestra conductor, and it was necessary for Major Higginson to go to Europe to choose a successor.

A Million in His Will

The office of Lee, Higginson & Co. on State Street has always been rather a peculiar one for haute finance; indeed Major Higginson himself has described it as a "republic, run on democratic principles"—something different from the icy crypts in which great Bostonians of other days on State Street have received their clients, in the traditional "dignified and stately" manner calculated to impress the applicant for credit with the privilege even of an interview. Major Higginson was seated behind a simple rail to guard him from the general public with only the window-pane of the sunny side of the street between him and the passing throng on the sidewalk. A description of this front office published some years ago describes the "plain old-fashioned rooms, the calm courtesy of the partners, the quiet conduct of business which are as much of a contrast to the hectic atmosphere of the bucket shop, broker's office as can be imagined; imperial projects have been launched in sical organizations of various degrees of importance, such as the Germania, the Mendelssohn Quintette, the Philharmonic and the Harvard Musical Association, had done creditable work in their day and a well-educated musical public was ready and waiting. With something of the State Street brusquerie and sense of power, Major Higginson had summarily indicated the junk shop for all that was left of these when he took the stage with Henschel—whose extraordinary luck in receiving an orchestra and the unheard of salary of $12,000 on which to learn the business of conducting, created no small amount of envy and prejudice among musical contemporaries. It was a fortunate chance that there happened to be in the orchestra at that time Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Svecenski, Mr. Roth, Mr. Giese, the Adamowski brothers and Mr. Schuecker! and that artists like Pourtau, who was lost in the sinking of the French liner, and Mr. Longy, were soon added. Mr. Higginson's first attempt to supply a conductor of eminence, worthy to train and head a band of such virtuosi, resulted in the calling of Mr. William Gericke, whom he had seen conducting the Imperial Opera at Vienna as Richter's colleague; and three years of his perfecting drill and dignified leadership followed. American life proved to be a little too strenuous for Mr. Gericke's taste, however, and he returned after the season 1888-89 to the quieter atmosphere of Vienna. Next came the romantic Nikisch, the conductor of the municipal opera house of Leipsic. For three years he delighted Rostor with his original, daring and intensely subjective style of conducting. He was, in the judgment of so good a critic as Richard Aldrich, "a man who, with certain exaggerations and affectations, is illuminated by the living flame of genius." His picturesque, tumbled shock of poetic hair, about which he sometimes consulted members of the orchestra as well as the greenroom mirror, is still vividly remembered. But Nikisch proved to be undisciplinable; and his manner of "getting through" was characteristic. He refused to make a certain tour with the orchestra and by anticipating the date for quitting sacrificed some $10,000 or $12,000. Major Higginson remarked to the present writer that Nikisch evidently thought even less of money than he himself did, to sacrifice so much in a fit of temper, or something equally temperamental and incomprehensible to Mr. Higginson. After Mr. Nikisch's contract had been cancelled in 1893, Dr. Hans Richter was booked for the succession, as the great Viennese conductor happened at the moment to be in revolt against intriguing court circles, and was reported to be disgusted and ready to leave Vienna. He actually signed a contract with Mr. Higginson and was expected in Boston, but an imperial decoration promptly soothed his ruffled dignity and he calmly ignored the American contract and never turned up here. So after Nikisch came Mr. Paur, then Max Fiedler, and finally Dr. Karl Muck. Both Gericke and Muck returned to this country for second terms under Major Higginson's régime. For the thorough training of the orchestra a due share of the credit should be given to the distinguished concert-masters, Franz Kneisel and Willy Hess. Their fine taste and industry in drill and the influence of their example with the men brought the band to the marvellous perfection that has made it world-famous.

Organized Pension Fund

Major Higginson had organized the orchestra under individual contracts with the players, the rank and file signing originally for twenty-nine weeks at from thirty to thirty-five dollars a week. The chief players might at the same time be receiving annual salaries of $5000 or more with engagements for several years. Mr. Higginson also organized a pension fund; and truth to say, the ties with which this pension was expected to bind the beneficiaries was the very cause of certain of the more distinguished players cutting loose. One of them said to the writer: "My father quit Germany for just such organization intended to take away his liberty, and his son is not going to stand it." Major Higginson's position as to trade-unions was and Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianists, and the Italian conductor, Toscanini, formerly conductor of the Metropolitan Opera. The choice fortunately fell on an equally eminent French conductor, M. Rabaud, Parisian leader of opera, and composer, who has been elected member of the Institute in Paris since his arrival in Boston, a distinguished honor for the Orchestra as well as for its conductor.

Maj. Higginson's Family

Although Major Higginson was born in New York (Nov. 18, 1834), his family is of the old Massachusetts and Essex County Puritan stock which came over with the first immigration, in England's troublous times of the Commonwealth, when part of the campaign against the high-handed attempts of the Stuarts to crush Englishmen's liberties and which culminated in the cutting off Charles I.'s head, was organized and carried on in our old towns on Massachusetts Bay. A long line of honored divines and public-spirited men have made the name "Higginson," though not exactly beautiful or euphonious, revered in all New England, and "familiar in our mouths as household words." Colonel Thomas Wentworth Higginson, for example, the poet and preacher and abolitionist and radical reformer, was Major Higginson's cousin and like him inherited characteristics from the Brookline grandee of the eighteenth century, Stephen Higginson (1743-1828), who was the most distinguished merchant prince of his day and lived in great state as a country gentleman in his seat a few miles out from town. Henry Lee Higginson entered Harvard in 1851 but did not complete his course and had no degree until the honorary one bestowed on him late in life. It has been remarked that "the Higginson line has drawn into its life influences from the whole history of New England—the stringency of the Puritan, the loyalty of the colonists, the fervor of the patriot, the ardor of the philanthropist, the devotion of the soldier, the patriotism of the citizen." Henry Higginson did not take so kindly to college studies as he did to music and when he quitted Harvard it was to take up the study of the 'cello in Vienna. It was the taste and musical culture then and there nurtured that found expression, in the days of his maturity and abundant means, in the Symphony Orchestra. His golden jubilee of married life with a daughter of the great Agassiz (Miss Ida Agassiz) was celebrated in 1913 at their apartment house, 191 Commonwealth avenue. At this golden wedding the presence of the bridesmaid and best man at the wedding fifty years before was a notable feature, Miss Georgina Lowell and Mr. C. J. Jackson. They were the special guests at the dinner, and the hosts were showered with congratulations by mail and telegraph and gifts and flowers. A pretty feature of the reception was the trooping into the festivities of the grand-nieces of the couple led by their only grandchild, Henry, son of Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Henry Higginson of South Lincoln, all dressed in costumes of peasant children, and bearing fruits, vegetables and flowers of the harvest season. The grandson recited a congratulatory poem written for the occasion. Included in the family luncheon at midday were the major's son and his wife, the brothers and sisters and all the nephews and nieces and grand-nieces of the host and hostess to the number of about forty.

Henry Lee Higginson's Personality

"Brusque of manner, independent of speech, unassuming, everything that a manner book would ignore—H. L. Higginson is a gentleman," said one of his contemporaries, writing twenty years ago. "A delicacy of feeling, restraint, ready perception, calm self-possession, deference given and demanded—such are the qualities which what we call civilization has produced, which are the servants of a strong individuality, and which are soon apprehended by one who has the faculties of appreciating such things. Impertinence or presumption would fare hard with Colonel Higginson; a spade is a spade with him when the occasion for a definition arises, and he is capable of heat and passion and invective when righteous wrath is ap-was justly proud, but is also a vivid picture of the heroic part played by Boston's old families in the war to save the Union.

How He Received Scars

"You don't know—as we are not aware until some generous recognition of our true positions melts us—in what a state of tension we are existing. Truly our lives have grown haggard with excitement; every family you know, as well as thousands you do not, has sent forth its sons to the war, and in almost every family is a vacant chair and a portrait upon the wall of the husband or the darling son gone forever.

"In my own family, my only brother left six children and their mother to lead his regiment, and with him went my wife's brother Edward, and Charles Dabney, whom you know. They were besieged in Washington, N. C., for twenty days by over ten times their number, my brother commandant of the fort with 1200 men and three gunboats to defend it, and I had the ghastly honor of hearing his death hawked about the streets by the newsboys; but a merciful Providence at last rescued them and they are safe at home once more, their hour of service over. Two of my brothers-in-law are still in service, one of my four nephews, Henry Higginson, major of cavalry, is just off his bed, having recovered from two sabre cuts on his head, and had a ball extracted from his backbone, which the rebels fired at him as he lay on the ground. His brother James came back from Berlin, where he had been studying, was taken prisoner at the same battle, where he was leading his company, and has lain in Libby Prison since the 17th of June.

"Frank Higginson, a young senior from Harvard, was the oldest officer but one in Bob Shaw's regiment after the bloody assault on Fort Wagner. Cabot Russell, my cousin, one of my brother Frank's sergeants, later a captain in Shaw's regiment, was wounded or killed at the same assault, for we cannot learn of his fate from the rebels into whose hands he fell. Wendell Holmes, another cousin, has been wounded three times and has risen by 'death and promotion' from lieutenant to lieutenant colonel.

"James Lowell, another delicate little lamb, was severely wounded at Ball's Bluff and killed at Malvern Hill, a Christian martyr; his brother Charles commands our Second Cavalry and will command our army if the war lasts long. Their sister, a delicate, frail young girl, has been for nearly two years a nurse in a Washington hospital, and their mother spends her days at the Sanitary Commission, as do many of our matrons and young girls.

"Another young cousin, Sumner Paine, was killed at Gettysburg, near Port Hudson; his brother Wilder at Antietam; Willie Forbes is major under Charles Lowell and a splendid fellow he is. Theodore Lyman, our eccentric comedian, has returned from Europe, and left his wife and child to go upon General Meade's staff.

"This very day I have written two letters to express my vain sympathy with the fathers of two young soldiers, both of them, like Putnam and Lowell, scholars and gentle youths who, after struggling against malaria and exposure and wounds, have fallen, one in an attack on the rifle pits of Fort Wagner and the other killed by the murderous host at Vicksburg.

"In one of our Massachusetts regiments there are but half a dozen of the forty officers who composed the roster at first."

The House of Lee, Higginson & Co.

Major Higginson celebrated his fiftieth anniversary as a member of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., Jan. 2, 1918, being then the senior partner. The event was observed modestly at 44 State street and it was on this occasion that the major remarked, quoted above, that the house was a republic; "We are a republic," he says, "there is no head of the firm. Everybody has his say, and one man's word is as good as another's. What would my partners think if the 'old man' should set up his say above the others?" Although in his 84th year, Mr. Higginson was at his office at 9 o'clock, and according to his daily habits stayed until after 3 o'clock. After speaking of the admission of Mr. Charles Fairchild to the firm in '74, and the retirement in '84 of his brother, Francis L. Higginson, "as he preferred to manage his own affairs rather than those of the firm, and disliked the worry of business, Major Higginson dictated the following sketch in working through its men and its women. The house has also been ready at all times to take up national questions; to express decided opinions on these national questions always with loyalty to the Federal Government, and has done the same thing with regard to the State government and the city government. It has always tried to act promptly in case of any disaster whether small or great, and has hoped to do its share.

"The firm from the beginning has been essentially a republic—a democracy. There has been, strictly speaking, no head to the firm, the younger men having as much to say with regard to the management of the business as the senior members of the firm."

Major Higginson's Writings

Major Higginson, while he made no pretension to scholarship or literary ability, or public speaking, was nevertheless master of a trenchant, easy, naturally graceful and effective style of writing and speaking, and he loved to throw in his word to the public when and where it would do the most good. On one Sunday he even occupied the pulpit of Rev. Herbert S. Johnson's Warren Avenue Baptist Church. Major Higginson on that occasion talked discursively of men and things and ascribed "such success as he had had" to hard and constant work, making and holding friends, and to strict economy. The speaker praised the savings bank as honestly managed charitable institutions and advised his hearers to patronize them. A good example of his articles on public questions frequently appearing in the newspapers of late years, is that on "The Need of Preparedness" which was published in October, 1915. In that article his farsighted forehandedness have been amply vindicated, as the opening paragraphs of it will show:

At last our nation seems to be awaking to the fact that we have fallen behind the times and are not ready to meet the world on its own terms and in every respect. Within fifty years the world has changed greatly and has advanced and improved in material ways. Busy with our daily work, content with our own results and, therefore, careless of other nations' progress, we have fallen behind and are not ready for everything. Following our people, the national administration has closed its eyes to the world's progress, and has been content with our own ways and conditions. At last our administration sees the dire need of getting ready to keep the peace, and our advocates of peace will do well to urge with vigor on our Congress the need of prompt and large action in preparation to meet the world on every path, and to meet it successfully on its own terms.

Within fifteen months the world has met a great surprise, and unless we Americans take to heart the lessons of the European struggle we shall suffer terribly and fail in the race. It is idle to suppose that all nations are content with their own lot and, therefore, will not look with longing eyes on our properties and seek to curb our belief in the freedom which we hold so dear and for which we have fought, hoped, prayed and lived.

We have far and away a larger amount of gold than any other nation, and at the end of the war every European nation will need gold. Our supplies of gold and munitions of war lie chiefly near the Atlantic coast, and an enterprising enemy can easily seize and ravage our coast. It may be said that other nations do not know our coast, yet we allow officers of foreign nations to live in our midst, to study our coast and our internal conditions, to organize cabals against our industries, and to inform themselves about our weak points.

Saw Need of Preparedness

In our innocence we have trusted that no nation would harm us, and that we could live happily and peacefully with all the world, and that we could meet the world without the knowledge and the preparation which other nations have acquired. We cannot reproach our Government, for we citizens have been blind, and have demanded none of these things, and the Government has followed the people. Following our habit, "we guessed that it would be all right," and now do we see our folly? We see now many horrors of which fifteen months ago nobody dreamed, and to which we may be subjected. Let us study our lesson and mend our ways.

But, naturally enough, the best bit of respected, enjoyed, loved him in unusual measure; for he had words and thoughts of service and of affection toward them all—the boys and girls, the old men and women—the unfortunate and the prosperous."

His Last Illness

It was on June 18, 1919, that Major Higginson underwent a serious operation at the Massachusetts General Hospital. The operation was reported by the surgeon to have been successful, and though his condition at its conclusion was grave it was not regarded as critical. He had been in ill health for some time. But the contest with such conditions, and under the handicap of eighty-four years, so long and heroically maintained, has been a credit to his sound constitution and stout, courageous will, and temperate habits, and well-ordered life.

who was already spending a fortune in behalf of music in America, when I was living in a city crammed with millionaires. I felt snubbed once again, and tried no more of the very rich, but with the aid of Victor Harris and other good friends I succeeded, nevertheless, in raising a helpful sum in smaller contributions.

On the editorial page, last Monday, I referred to certain military traits of Major Higginson which enabled him to meet emergencies. An amusing instance of this [illegible] may be added here. On one [illegible] engaged as soloist, demanded payment in advance. He was informed that if he wasn't willing to wait for his check till Saturday afternoon the piano solo would be dropped from the programme and the audience told why. The pianist promptly agreed to wait. The same tactics were employed with the representative of a piano house who had been furnishing the instrument used at the concerts. When he was informed that the orchestra would no longer put the usual big sign on the instrument advertising the maker, he threatened that no piano would be provided. "Very well," he was told, "the piano solo would accordingly be omitted, and the reason would be announced to the audience." The dealer immediately came to terms.

With this autocratic firmness in business matters the Major united an extremely conciliatory and obliging attitude in matters artistic. "All the catholicity possible seems to me good," he said. "I do not like Wagner's music and take little interest in much of the newer composers, but I should not like to bar them out of our programmes." When the Bayreuth master died a special Wagner concert was given in memoriam.

The conductors were allowed to have their own way in regard to programmes, make-up of the orchestra, etc., the only curb on them being the critics. That those gentlemen did not neglect their privilege of fault-finding was amusingly shown by a correspondent of the Transcript who suggested that instead of importing a conductor from effete Europe the critics should be engaged in turn to conduct the concerts. "It is safe to say we shall at last have an exact musical embodiment of the ideas of Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart and Mendelssohn. We shall hear, for the first time, everything played in the exact tempi intended by the composer (heretofore only known to himself and the critics), and shall learn the true value of a thirty-second note as differentiated from a dotted sixty-fourth."

By HENRY T. FINCK

Europe to choose a successor.

A Million in His Will

The office of Lee, Higginson & Co. on State Street has always been rather a peculiar one for haute finance; indeed Major Higginson himself has described it as a "republic, run on democratic principles"—something different from the icy crypts in which great Bostonians of other days on State Street have received their clients, in the traditional "dignified and stately" manner calculated to impress the applicant for credit with the privilege even of an interview. Major Higginson was seated behind a simple rail to guard him from the general public with only the window-pane of the sunny side of the street between him and the passing throng on the sidewalk. A description of this front office published some years ago describes the "plain old-fashioned rooms, the calm courtesy of the partners, the quiet conduct of business which are as much of a contrast to the hectic atmosphere of the bucket shop, broker's office as can be imagined; imperial projects have been launched in this place with as little fuss as the natural forces exert in their progress." The Major began his chat that day without any preliminary flourish or ominous intimations. He simply said in the most ordinary tones of quiet conversational chat: "I'm going to Europe in a few days, and I want to deposit with you, as editor of the Transcript, a bit of a secret, to be used at your discretion in certain eventualities. I want you to know, and through you if the occasion arises the public of Boston and the country, that if anything happens to me while on this trip or hereafter, the Symphony Concerts will go on just the same." It was a startling announcement, and the listener was fain to murmur some conventional and confused phrases to the effect that it would be a pity if Boston secured this endowment of its Orchestra at the cost of Major Higginson's going down in his ship to the bottom of the sea. "No, it is not that," said the Major, in his quiet and deliberate, and democratic and debonair manner. "You know this is an extra-hazardous business I am engaged in. What I have today may be gone tomorrow. If I live to come back from this trip, and stay here on State Street, as is most likely, there is always the chance that I may not be able some day to meet the $20,000 to $50,000 deficits that have occurred so far at the end of each year and are likely to continue. But if I should not come back, I want you to understand, and be able to assure the public, that the concerts will go on forever."

Major Higginson did not at that time, however, name any definite sum as having been set aside by his will to maintain the Orchestra; but this omission was supplied in the announcement made six years ago (to be exact, April 20, 1913), that he had left in his will $1,000,000 for the maintenance of the orchestra. "It is my desire," Major Higginson then said, "to have the Symphony Orchestra benefit all of the people; that was my early ambition in founding it, as I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interest is a poor specimen of a citizen. Each year there is a deficit; originally I reckoned on a deficit of $20,000 a season, but there have been seasons when the deficit reached $50,000."

The Orchestra's Evolution

The soil had been preparing and the field ripening for this great musical new departure here in Boston, for a century or so—at least from the first performance of Handel's "Messiah," by a chorus, which later became the Handel and Haydn Society, at a peace jubilee to celebrate the treaty of Ghent after the war of 1812. Various musical societies followed, and the Harvard Musical Association, founded in 1837, gave a series of concerts for many years. Then came the Cecilia, the Apollo Club, the Boylston Club, the Philharmonic Society, the Kneisel Quartet, the Kneisel Club, the Longy Club, the Adamowski Quartet, the Adamowski Trio, the Listemann Concerts, the Boston Orchestral Club, the Boston Festival Orchestra, the Boston Promenade Concerts, the Boston Opera House Company, the Boston Opera Company, the Boston Grand Opera Company, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra, the Boston Philharmonic Society, the Boston Philharmonic Club, the Boston Philharmonic Quartet, the Boston Philharmonic Trio

TY MOURNS EATH OF H.L. HIGGINSON

Leaders in Public and Private Life Join in Tribute

FUNERAL MONDAY IN HARVARD YARD

Philanthropist Failed to Rally After Simple Operation

The funeral of Henry Lee Higgin-, one of Boston's foremost citizens the last half-century, who died riday night, will take place tomor-row, the ceremonies marked with the ame simplicity with which his life was identified.

He will be buried as a soldier—in the uniform of a civil war major. The cas-t will be borne in the mid-forenoon om the home at 191 Commonwealth av-enue to Appleton Chapel in the Harvard University y.rd. There, at noon, in the place where, almost 56 years ago, he was married, will take place the formal funeral service. The body will be taken thence to Mt. Auburn cemetery for in-terment in the family lot.

Flag-Draped Casket

The body will not rest in state at the chapel, but will merely be placed within the entrance to await the service hour. An American flag will drape the casket, and on its surface will rest his sword nd a simple wreath of roses.

The service will be conducted by the ev. Dr. Samuel M. Crothers, pastor of he First Parish Church, Cambridge. elected musicians from the Boston Sym-ony Orchestra and a section of the arvard choir will supply the funeral usic. The Rev. Dr. Crothers will also onduct the brief committal service at the cemetery. As the body is lowered into the grave a bugler from the Loyal egion will sound taps.

Announcement of Maj. Higginson's eath cast the city and state into gloom. He had died suddenly at the Massachu-s General Hospital at about 8:15 Fri-night. The announcement, however, did not come until yesterday morning.

A blood clot in the brain is assigned as the direct cause of death. It was probably due indirectly, however, to the ordeal of an operation which he had undergone during the late afternoon. This was supplementary to an opera-tion for bladder trouble about a year ago.

Family at Bedside

At his bedside when he died were his wife and his only child, Capt. Alex-ander H. Higginson. They had accom-panied him to the hospital in the early afternoon and had remained there until after the operation. They left the hos-pital with the assurance of the operat-ing surgeon, Dr. F. G. Balch, that the operation had been successful.

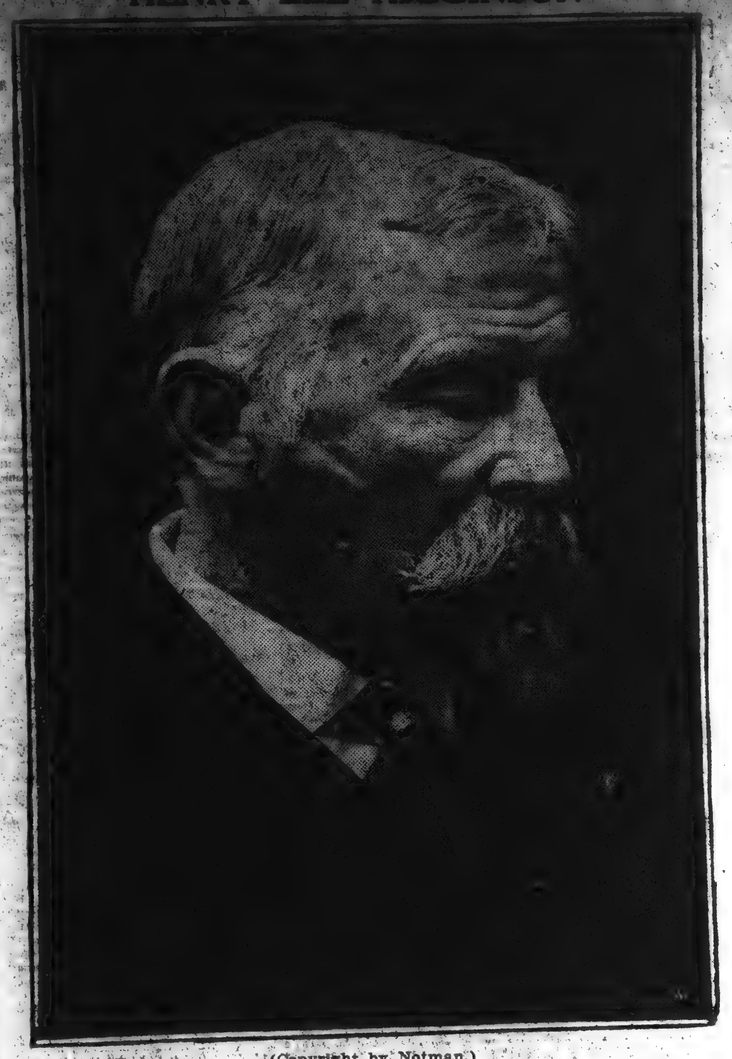
Mrs. Higginson returned to the home at Commonwealth avenue and Capt. Higginson to his home at South Lin-coln. Barely had he reached his home when a telephone message called him back to the hospital. He called for his mother and they reached the hospital ward about 10 minutes before the end came.

Maj. Higginson would have been 85 years old had he lived until next Tues-day. He was regarded as the dean of American financiers, succeeding to this title at the death of the late J. Pier-pont Morgan. The banking house of Lee, Higginson & Co., of which he was the head, is one of the most powerful in the world.

It was not his position as a banker, however, which records his chief fame. He stands out most conspicuously as a benign figure in the modern history of Boston. An aristocrat of fine and gra-cious personality, he was, first of all, a patriot and a citizen—a citizen of Boston.

The activities of his life inspired the oration of the community. He was philanthropist, patron of the arts and indefatigable toiler in the interests of public welfare. His philanthro-pies have Soldiers Field and the Har-vard Union as leading monuments; the Symphony Orchestra, an insti-

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON



(Copyright by Notman.)

SOLDIER, BANKER, PHILANTHROPIST AND LEADING CITIZEN OF BOSTON, WHO DIED FRIDAY NIGHT

Boston Mourns Death of Henry Lee Higginson

(Continued from Page One)

tution of his own creation, stands as a tribute to his lifelong devotion to music, and his public benefactions are repre-sented in ways too diversified for com-plete enumeration.

City Shows Its Grief

As soon as Maj. Higginson's death be-came known Mayor Peters ordered all the flags of the city at half mast until after the funeral. Messages of con-dolence began to pour in upon the fam-ily, many of these bearing names of in-ternational prominence.

The funeral service tomorrow will gather the most distinguished represen-tatives of every phase of activity in the city and state. The members of the Harvard corporation, of which Maj. Higginson was a member, will be the honorary pall bearers. President A. Lawrence Lowell of Harvard Univer-sity, whose message of condolence was one of the first of those received at the Commonwealth avenue home, hastened back from Vermont to be present at the funeral.

The funeral ho r will be recognized in solemn manner by all the institutions and organizatio with which he was associated. The Boston Stock Exchange, of which Maj. Higginson was the oldest member, will observe the funeral period as a silent hour. Activities in all de-partments of Harvard University will be suspended for an hour while the service is in progress. The Harvard clubs of Boston and New York, to both of which he belonged, will have large official delegations in the funeral as-sembly.

End Came Suddenly

The keen regret which the community felt at the announcement of Maj. Hig-ginson's death was intensified by its sud-denness. The vigorous health and energy which had been his all his life were but slightly impaired by his advanced years.

During the last year he had been gradually yielding up his practice of appearing daily at his office, but his resignation of business activities was not for indulgence in inactivity. It gave him opportunity to prolong the daily walks which were his favorite recreation and permitted him to devote himself more fully to affairs of current public interest. Only a little more than a week ago he had made a short address at the hearing in City Hall on the question of widening Tremont and Boylston streets by taking strips from the Common—his comment on the question exemplifying the wise and broad-minded counsel which he always brought to bear upon topics of public discussion.

It had been his custom recently to visit the banking house on State street about two or three times a week. One of these visits was on Friday morning, a few hours before he went to the hospital.

The trouble which decided him to sub-mit to the operation gave him only slight distress and little apprehension. The distress was so slight that, although his wife and son took the elevator, he walked down the four flights from his apartment to take the limousine which was to convey him to the hospital.

Maj. Higginson Known Best for Philanthropy

Henry Lee Higginson, known all over the country for his straight thinking on public questions, his simple directness of speech, his many contributions to so-cial uplift and his sturdy Americanism, was born in New York city on Nov. 18, 1834, the son of George and Mary Cabot (Lee) Higginson. He was a descendant of Francis Higginson, who came to America about 1629 and settled at Salem.

Mr. Higginson spent his boyhood in Boston, and at the age of 17 entered Harvard University with the class of 1855, but left before graduating to join the business firm of S. & E. Austin of Boston. With the exception of a year devoted to the study of music in Vienna, he retained his connection with the Austin counting house until the out-break of the civil war. At the first call for troops he offered his services to the government, and on May 28, 1861, he was commissioned second lieutenant in the 2d infantry of Massachusetts volunteers. On July 3 he was promoted to a first lieutenancy. He was transferred to the cavalry arm of the service Oct. 31, and commissioned captain of a troop in the 1st Massachusetts. He was promoted to major March 26, 1862, and at the battle of Aldie, where he showed great gallantry, he was severely wounded, re-ceiving two pistol wounds and three saber cuts, a scar of the latter being borne as a badge of honor until the day of his death.

On March 13, 1864, he was brevett Lieutenant-colonel, U. S. V., and serv until July on the staff of Maj.-Gen. Ba low of the 1st division of the 2d arm corps. On Aug. 9 he was discharg for disability resulting from the woun received in battle. With his wife an two friends he bought and managed cotton plantation near Savannah, Ga upon his return from the civil war.

Enters Banking Business

This experiment failing, he entere the banking house of Lee, Higginson Co. of Boston, and when, in 1897, Henr Lee relinquished the leadership he be came the virtual head of the firm. He became a member of the Boston Stock Exchange in 1863, and the New York Stock Exchange in 1878.

Soon after the big fire of 1872 the firm moved its offices to 44 State street. Throughout various changes in partner ships Henry Lee Higginson remained as a dominating leader in the firm's affairs and interests. Several changes were made from time to time with the admis-sion and withdrawal of other partners. Some of the changes were caused by death. Maj. Higginson realized that this banking house had a foundation of character, and he never allowed this foundation to weaken, or the firm to lose its well-deserved reputation for integrity and patriotism.

Maj. Higginson's first notable enter-prise, for the benefit of the public as well as to gratify his chief passion, was in the world of [illegible] cal culture of Boston and catering to its taste by providing a higher class of musical entertainments than were ever before known in the city of his youth and manhood.

It was in 1881 that he undertook, at his personal financial risk, to be respon-sible for the expenses of a series of 20 orchestral concerts of the highest order, and a like number of public rehearsals, and at unprecedentedly low prices. The old Harvard Musical Association had shrivelled to nothing, and to take its place there was a newly formed Phil-harmonic Society, supporting an orches-tra upon the basis which was the only one possible under existing conditions. Its purposes were sincere, but it cheer-fully retired from the field when Maj. Higginson made known his intention.

George Henschel, a clever young bari-tone singer, a man of unusual intelli-gence and force, a musician through and through, although without experi-ence in wielding the baton over large orchestras, was chosen conductor. Al-though not their ideal leader, he did well in the pioneering work of the new orchestra.

Beginning of the Concerts

The first concert was on Oct. 22, 1881. The purpose was at first to make it minister specially to listeners of limited means. The best seats cost 50 cents, and at the public rehearsals there were places at 25 cents. But the concerts at once became not only popular but fash-ionable. To meet the competition for seats an auction sale for choice of places was instituted at the beginning of every season. This called for the criticism that it tended to restrict the popular privileges and increase the re-liance upon wealth and fashion, but the answer is that year after year and week after week audiences have been limited only by the size of the audito-rium.

This was not the fact from the very start, neither were the concerts a finan-cial success. But Maj. Higginson was undaunted. The Symphony orchestra was his pride and almost a part of his begin. It was almost his only pastime, and he gave to it the same passionate devotion as other wealthy men render to yachting, golf, the automobile and foreign travel. He determined that it should not lack financial support, and he supplied all deficiencies from his own purse.

For 25 years from 1881 there was a margin of profit in only one year. In one year the deficit was only $2000, in another it ran up to $52,000, and as late as 1904 it was no less than $40,000.

The spirit in which he met this ex-pense was illustrated in his reply to a man who was discussing the establish-ment of a similar organization in Lon-don, to whom he said, "Don't worry about the bills. You don't worry about your wine bills, your cigar bills or your wife's dressmaking bills; you must treat your orchestra in the same way."

Maj. Higginson once declared it was necessary for him to leave $1,000,000 in his will for the maintenance of the Bos-ton Symphony orchestra in view of the annual deficits. He said it was his de-sire to have the orchestra benefit all of the people and that that was his early ambition in founding it.

Building of Symphony Hall

In 1893, when the very existence of the Symphony orchestra was threatened by the proposed destruction of old Music Hall, the site of which had been granted to the rapid transit scheme, Maj. Hig-ginson interested a number of wealthy citizens in the project of building a new hall, and raised $400,000 for the purpose. The site was secured, Symphony Hall built, and it was formally opened Oct. 15, 1900. Through his efforts the use of Music Hall for the regular concerts was secured in the interim, so that there was no interruption to the entertain-ments. On the occasion of the trouble regarding Dr. Muck, Maj. Higginson placed the entire case of members of the orchestra who were of foreign birth before the department of justice.

Later he turned over the support of the orchestra to a committee of public-spirited citizens. All German citizens who were connected with it were dis-charged and a French conductor was in-stalled.

His Gifts to Harvard

Although not a "son of Harvard," in the full sense of being a graduate, he held the university in warmest love and highest veneration, and to it his money supplied two gifts which will forever keep him in memory. These were pre-sented in the most unostentatious and impersonal way possible, each denoting his abhorrence of notoriety as well as his patriotism and his esteem for higher education.

It was his experience in the war and the memory of those who fought with him, which led him to express the wish that his first gift to Harvard should be called "Soldiers Field," and that it be "marked with a stone bear-ing the names of some dear friends—alumni of the university and noble gentlemen—who gave freely and eager-ly all that they had or hoped for to their country and to their fellowmen in the hour of great need—the war of 1861 to 1865—in defence of the republic."

Thus it was that the field devoted to Harvard athletic sports bore on its en-trance gate an inscription written by James Russell Lowell, and containing a patriotic verse by Ralph Waldo Em-erson, and these names: James Sav-age, Jr., Charles Russell Lowell, Ed-ward Barry Dalton, Stephen George Perkins, James Jackson Lowell and Robert Gould Shaw—friends, comrades, kinsmen, who died for their country."

At its dedication, June 10, 1890, the generous donor delivered an address in which his noble spirit flashed forth in these words: "What do the lives of our friends teach us? Surely the beauty and holiness of work and of utter unselfish, thoughtful devotion to the right cause, to our country and to mankind. On you, and such as you rests the burden of carrying on the country in the best way. . . .

"In your games there is just one thing that you cannot do even to win success. You cannot do one tricky or shabby thing. Translate tricky and shabby—dishonest, ungentlemanly. The Prince-ton and the Yale fellows are our brothers. Let us beat them fairly if we can, and believe that they will play with clubhouses at Oxford, Cambridge and Berlin Universities. Then in 1899 came the announcement of Maj. Hig-ginson's gift of $150,000 to build the Harvard Union. This was not only an evidence of his devotion to his alma mater, but of his admiration for those who gave their lives for their country, for it was a memorial to Harvard men who died in the Spanish war. Not only that, it was built, as he said at a meet-ing in Sanders Theatre, Nov. 13, 1899, "to offset the habits of exclusiveness and of luxury in living which hurt our democratic university."

Other Philanthropies

Maj. Higginson's philanthropy was expressed in a multitude of ways, but the greater number of his benefactions were never known to the public. Of those which because of their public in-terest and importance could not be con-cealed, the following are some ex-amples:

At the time of the coal famine in 1902 he contributed $10,000 toward the relief of suffering, was placed at the head of a citizens' committee which established 15 small distributing stations, and induced large dealers to keep coal-bag wagons on the street, in order to supply small quantities to the people in poor circum-stances. He also proposed the importa-tion of 10,000 tons of Scotch coal for Bos-ton, offered to pay 10 per cent. of the cost, and help get more if necessary—the plan being to sell it out in small quantities at any price which the mayor (the late P. A. Collins) might set.

He aided in the establishment of a pension fund for the benefit of the Sym-phony Orchestra members.

In 1905 he contributed $100,000 toward the $1,000,000 endowment fund of the American Academy in Rome.

He was interested in a vital way in so many public interests that in 1902 he was chosen as the only representative from New England on the board of 15 trustees of the Carnegie Institute at Washington, which had been endowed by its founder with $10,000,000.

Maj. Higginson served for many years as a trustee of the New England Con-servatory of Music, and in 1906 he was chosen president of the managers of the Jamestown exposition.

He joined in the movement for a per-manent memorial to Maj. Walter Reed, the discoverer of the yellow-fever mos-quito.

In remembering Harvard he did not forget what was once known as Har-vard Annex, and in June, 1906, he placed in the campus of Radcliffe College a beautiful granite fountain in memory of Josephine Shaw Lowell, the wife of the late Gen. Charles Russell Lowell, and a volunteer nurse in the Union army after her husband's death.

Notwithstanding his brevet rank of colonel, he preferred that of his actual military service, and was always known as Maj. Higginson, the sole title borne by him until 1882, when Harvard Uni-versity conferred upon him the honorary degree of master of arts, which was supplemented by Yale at its bicentennial anniversary with the degree of doctor of laws. Later in life he served several years as one of the five fellows of Har-vard College.

Other activities which in past years oc-cupied Maj. Higginson's time and co-op-eration have been as vice-president of the Provident Institutions for Savings, as president of the New Boston Music Hall and of the Gauley Coal Land Com-pany, also as an officer of the Smug-gler Union Mining Company, American Telephone & Telegraph Company, Gener-al Electric Company, New England Ex-ploration Company, Ashburton Mining Company, Cherry River Coal Mining Company, Marysville Dredging Com-pany, Marigold Construction & Store Company, Contention Mining Company, American Foreign Securities Corporation, Rolfe Mining Company, Submarine Sig-nal Company and other corporations. He had served as a trustee of the Carnegie Institution in Washington, the New England Conservatory of Music and the Franklin Union. He was at one time a member of the rapid transit commission.

Other Affiliations

He belonged to the Bunker Hill Mon-ument Association, Franklin Foundation (and was a member of its board of man-agers), the Harvard Union, of which he had been president; The Military Train-ing Camps Association, and was honor-ary president of the Public School Asso-ciation.

He was a member of the Massachu-setts Historical Society, and a life mem-ber of the American Academy of Politi-cal and Social Science. He belonged to the Tavern Club, the Harvard Club in Boston and in New York, and in the last-named city was a member of the Knickerbocker Club.

On Dec. 5, 1863, Maj. Higginson married Miss Ida Agassiz of Cambridge. For many years they made their winter home at the Agassiz, at 191 Commonwealth avenue, and summers were spent at West Manchester on the North Shore, where the estate is known as "Sunset Hill." The celebration of the golden an-niversary of the marriage of Maj. and Mrs. Higginson was a notable event in 1913, at their Boston home.

In November, 1914, students and alumni of Harvard University paid Maj. Higgin-son a great tribute on the occasion of his 80th birthday. The reception was held in the Harvard Union, of which the guest of honor had been president since the day of its organization, and among the speakers were Dr. Charles W. Eliot, Bishop Lawrence and Capt. Charles E. Brickley of the football team.

Seldom have two distinguished men of such advanced age, both keen and ac-tive, been seen together as those recent occasions which brought together Maj. Higginson and Dr. Eliot.

Maj. Higginson was also, on the occa-sion of his 80th birthday, tendered a semi-public reception at the Copley-Plaza Hotel, which was attended by many distinguished men.

His individuality appeared in everything he did and said. Those who knew him did not have in mind so much the things he had done as what he was himself. Very few men have meant so much to the college and the commu-nity in the last few years.

In any important question of right and wrong he spoke out simply and vigorously. The major was one of the men we always like to bring into con-tact with the young men at the college, because he gave them something no one else could give them. There is no telling how many students he helped through college. One of his customs, for which he will long be remembered, was to invite students to his home to dine each Thanksgiving.

He was a most generous and public-spirited man.

JOHN F. MOORS

No member of the Harvard Corpora-tion could have contributed more to the university than Maj. Higginson contrib-uted. Soldiers Field and the Harvard Union are conspicuous evidence of his generosity. His addresses accompanying these great gifts are among the gems of American literature.

No man ever felt more sympathy for the young men in college than he felt. He liked to be with them and to feel himself one of them, and they in turn always felt inspired by his example. He never let anything take precedence of the service of the corporation, where judgment, sympathy and experience were of the utmost value.

At least two generations of Harvard men have looked up to him as an ideal of a soldier, a citizen, a friend, a superb lover of music and a generous supporter of all good causes.

BISHOP WILLIAM LAWRENCE

In Maj. Higginson's death his near-est friends are grateful for his release from weariness, deep as is their sense of loss. He was of the noblest of men, modest, simple, full of courage, never a master, always a servant of others. Ser-vice was his joy. Nation, commonwealth, city and Harvard are the finer for his life, and all will hold his memory in ten-der and proud reverence.

[220]

IN MEMORY OF A GREAT CITIZEN

The Bela Pratt bust of Major Henry Lee Higginson—Born in New York city, 1834; student at Harvard University; soldier in the Civil War; for half a century a banker in Boston; founder and sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; donor of Soldiers' Field and the Harvard Union; distinguished for his public and philanthropic interests; died in Boston, Nov. 14, 1919

(This bust is reproduced from a Copley print, copyrighted by Curtis & Cameron, Publishers, Boston)

The John Singer Sargent Portrait of Major Higginson. Said he at the dedication of Soldiers' Field on June 10, 1890: "What do the lives of our friends teach us? Surely the beauty and holiness of work and of utter, unselfish, thoughtful devotion to the right cause, to our country, and to mankind"—words that fit the life of the man who spoke them.

(This Painting is Reproduced from a Copley Print, Copyright by Curtis & Cameron, Publishers, Boston)

FILMED AS BOUND

IN MEMORY OF A GREAT CITIZEN

The Bela Pratt bust of Major Henry Lee Higginson—Born in New York city, 1834; student at Harvard University; soldier in the Civil War; for half a century a banker in Boston; founder and sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; donor of Soldiers' Field and the Harvard Union; distinguished for his public and philanthropic interests; died in Boston, Nov. 14, 1919

(This bust is reproduced from a Copley print, copyrighted by Curtis & Cameron, Publishers, Boston)

The John Singer Sargent Portrait of Major Higginson. Said he at the dedication of Soldiers' Field on June 10, 1890: "What do the lives of our friends teach us? Surely the beauty and holiness of work and of utter, unselfish, thoughtful devotion to the right cause, to our country, and to mankind"—words that fit the life of the man who spoke them.

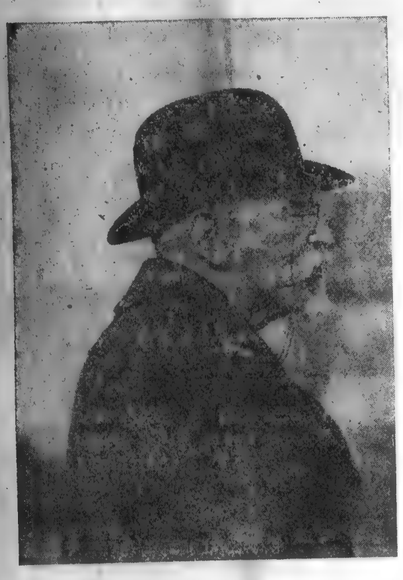
(This Painting is Reproduced from a Copley Print, Copyright by Curtis & Cameron, Publishers, Boston)

FILMED AS BOUND

rd Crimson

ONDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1919. PRICE 5 CENTS.

UNIVERSITY MOURNS LOSS OF ITS GREATEST FRIEND AND BENEFACTOR, MAJOR HIGGINSON



Major Henry Lee Higginson '55.

SERVICE TODAY IN HONOR OF DONOR OF SOLDIERS FIELD

MARSHALS OF VARIOUS CLASSES SELECTED AS HONORARY PALL-BEARERS.

MEMORIAL MEETING TONIGHT

Major Henry Lee Higginson '55, Fellow of the Corporation, donor of Soldiers Field and the Union, and throughout his long and useful life friend and benefactor of the University, died on Friday night at 9 o'clock.

The funeral will be held today at Appleton Chapel at 12 o'clock. The coffin will be carried by undergraduates from Appleton Chapel to the hearse in front of University Hall through a double line of students, who will assemble to pay their last tribute to Major Higginson. This evening a memorial meeting will be held at the Union, at which President Lowell and others will speak.

Twelve O'Clocks Suspended.

During Major Higginson's funeral this noon classes and lectures in all departments of the University will be suspended from 12 until 1 o'clock. The services will be conducted by the Reverend Samuel McChord Crothers, S. T. D., '99, of the First Unitarian Church of Cambridge. The President and Fellows of the University will act as honorary pallbearers. The actual pallbearers, until relieved by the undergraduates, will be the nephews of the late Major Higginson. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play during the service and the University Choir will sing.

Owing to the limited size of Appleton Chapel, it is doubtful if there will be room for many of the undergraduates at the service itself. The student body will, however, form at 12.15 o'clock sharp outside of Appleton Chapel in a double line, reaching from the chapel door to the front of University Hall. Through the lane thus formed the undergraduate pallbearers will carry the casket and place it in the hearse.

As a final tribute, the memorial mass meeting held in honor of Major Higginson will take place at the Union at 8 o'clock this evening. Members and

MAJOR HIGGINSON ASSUMED ANNUAL SYMPHONY DEFICIT

Patron of Music Once a Student Abroad in Vienna.—Among First to Volunteer in '61.

Major Higginson was born on November 18, 1834, and passed his early years in Boston, entering Harvard with the class of 1855 at the age of 17. He left College before completing his course to enter a business firm in Boston. He remained here, with the exception of a year spent at Vienna in studying music, until the outbreak of the Civil War, when he promptly volunteered his services.

In 1881 he undertook his first philanthropic work, assuming the financial responsibility for a series of 20 orchestral concerts at unprecedently low prices. This was the beginning of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He had intended that the concerts should be open to people of very limited means, and as a result during the first 25 years there was only once a margin of profit. But Major Higginson met the deficit each year with unquestioning readiness.

His experience in the war and the memory of his comrades in arms led him to request that his first gift to Harvard should be called "Soldiers Field.' On June 10, 1890, he presented the playing-

(Continued on page two).

NOTED HARVARD MEN HONOR MEMORY OF MAJOR HIGGINSON

PRES. A. LAWRENCE LOWELL.

In Major Henry L. Higginson the University has lost a councillor and benefactor, the students a friend. Ever mindful of their welfare he gave them the Union and Soldiers' Field. Outside the University he created, and for years at his own expense maintained, the Symphony Orchestra. Without holding public office he was always quick to serve the public and unsparing in his denunciation of public wrong. Many will feel that a friend has gone from us, for he was much loved, because he loved much.

PRES. CHARLES W. ELIOT '53.

His chief direct service was that he served as a Fellow in the Corporation for twenty-six years, 1893-1919, with the utmost punctuality, assiduity, and devotion, and with high intelligence. Why was he chosen a member of the Corporation? Not because he was a successful banker and broker of State Street. Far from it. He was chosen because he was as fine an exemplar of the patriotic citizen-soldier as there was in the country or the world; because he gave the University two great gifts, one the Soldiers Field, on which he hoped that manly sports of many kinds would be generously cultivated through long generations of Harvard youth, and on which he erected a monument to youthful friends of his who fell in the Civil War, and the Harvard Union, where he hoped that democracy and good-fellowship among Harvard students would be forever cultivated; because he had proved himself to be the most successful promoter of good music that Eastern Massachusetts had ever known; and because he was the intimate friend of Alexander Agassiz, a great naturalist and a great administrator in varied fields, who had already served two terms in the Corporation, the last of which closed in 1890; and because the Corporation of that day knew no better example of the public spirit and courage which had made New England what it then was. The expectations and purposes with which the Corporation of 1893 elected Major Higginson a member of the Board were completely fulfilled.

WALTER R. SPALDING '87.

Professor in the Department of Music.

What Major Higginson did for the social and athletic aspects of College life is so prominently before us in such concrete forms as the Harvard Union and Soldiers Field, that we often overlook the great influence exerted by his foresight and generosity in the development of music—that art which, although it appeals so elementally to all human beings, is often difficult to estimate, just because it is so elusive and mysterious.

The facts are that, through the generosity and artistic judgment of Major Higginson over a course of more than 50 years, America has been enabled to have one of the leading orchestras in the whole world. Competent critics from the Continent have often considered it to be the finest; undoubtedly there is no finer.

The Symphony concerts, both those given in Boston and at the Sanders Theatre, have generated a love for good music in the lives of innumerable alumni and undergraduates. There is little doubt that music is going to bear an increasingly more and more important part in bringing together all classes of our

Major Higginson Assumed Deficit

(Continued from page one).

fields to the University in memory of "James Savage, Jr., Charles Russell Lowell, Edward Barry Dalton, Stephen George Perkins, James Jackson Lowell, and Robert Gould Shaw—friends, comrades, kinsman, who died for their country."

His second gift came as the result of a desire expressed by a number of alumni that there should be some form of a club at Harvard which should be open to every member of the University. In answer, in 1899 came the announcement of Major Higginson's gift of $150,000 to build the Harvard Union. The building was erected partly to honor the men who died in the Spanish War and partly "to offset the habits of exclusiveness and luxury in living which hurt our democratic University."

(Continued on page six).

Major Higginson Assumed Deficit

(Continued from page two).

During the last years of his life he did signal service as a Fellow of Harvard University.

Sidelights on Life of Major Higginson

Brusque of manner, independent of ich, unassuming, everything that a nner book would ignore—Henry L. igginson is a gentleman," said one of s contemporaries a generation ago. A delicacy of feeling, restraint, ready perception, calm self-possession, deference given and demanded—such are the qualities which what we call civilization has produced, which are the servants of a strong individuality, and which are soon apprehended by one who has the faculties of appreciating such things.

"Impertinence or presumption would fare hard with Major Higginson; a spade is a spade with him when the occasion for a definition arises, and he is capable of heat and passion and invective when righteous wrath is appropriate.

"Yet for gentle courtesy, for thoughtful kindness, for hidden generosity, for big benefactions, from a right hand to which the left, with all the world, is an absolute stranger—still more for a manly sentiment which has, on some occasions, escaped its control and exulted itself in romantic enthusiasm—Higginson stands the very embodiment."

* * * *

Harvard Club dinner a few years ll live for years in the memory who attended. Charles Francis of presidential stock and Major on were seated at the same It was a memorable occasion for sent to hear these two famous ngage each other after the nd informed the assembled t he had lately had occasion that if he did not do so thrash him.

exclaimed Adams, but Mr. ctually

The fighting qualities of Major Higginson were early exhibited. In the days of his youth Boston Common was the scene of "terrible snowball battles" between the North End boys and Beacon Hill boys. Major Higginson was prominent in these strenuous youthful games of strategy and strength and was always in the forefront of the snowball bombers.

* * * *

"Hulloa, Higgy; how are you?" shouted the venerable Horace Furness to him at a Harvard commencement not many years ago. "No one else but you and Adams call me by that name now," sighed the major.

* * * *

His interest in athletic sports never waned. He was a strong believer in outdoor life for boys and girls. In 1911 he startled the opponents of Sunday sports by appearing before a legislative committee to urge that the parks and playgrounds be opened for Sunday play.

* * * *

The great financier and noted soldier was also a humanist. Most people know only of unparalleled gift to the community and to the country—the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He gave to every worthy cause. He gave to many educational institutions and to many charities.

* * * *

At the time of the coal famine in 1902 he contributed $10,000 toward the relief of suffering. He was placed at the head of a citizens' committee that established 15 small distributing stations. He induced large dealers to keep coal-bag wagons on the street to supply small quantities to the people in poor circumstances. He also proposed importation of 10,000 tons of Scotch Boston, offered to pay 10 per

In the fall of 1907, when the public was disturbed and uncertain about the future of financial conditions, he advised both large and small investors to "withdraw money from the savings banks and invest it in good stocks—not on margins, but by buying them outright and paying for them."

* * * *

He was chosen as the only representative from New England on the board of 15 trustees of the Carnegie Institute at Washington, which had been endowed by its founder with $10,000,000.

* * * *

Upon the formation of the new stock exchange his subscription was $300,000; but he was such an infrequent visitor to the institution which he helped to create that he was unknown to many of the younger operators, and amusing mistakes were often made by them.

One day he stepped upon the floor to buy some stock for one of the firm's regular customers, and when he had made the purchase the young broker who sold it stepped up to him with pencil and pad and asked: "What is your name, sir?"

He informed the young man that the purchase was made in the name of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., but this did not satisfy. The broker said: "Yes, of course; but it is necessary for me to know your name."

The quiet reply was: "I am Mr. Higginson."

The shouts of laughter from the oldtimers discomfited the broker.

* * * *

It was once remarked that the "Higginson line has drawn into its life influence from the whole history of New England—the stringency of the Puritan, the loyalty of the colonists, the fervor of the patriot, the ardor of the philanthropist, the devotion of the soldier, the patriotism.

* * * *

Major Higginson on Jan. 2, 1918, celebrated the 50th anniversary as a member of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., being then a senior partner. On this occasion the major remarked: "We are a republic, there is no head of the firm. Everybody has his say, and one man's word is as good as another's."

* * * *

While he made no pretension to scholarship or literary ability or public speaking, he was nevertheless a master of the trenchant, easy, graceful and effective style of writing and speaking. He delighted to express his views on timely topics.

* * * *

Major Higginson was an outspoken man. If he had something on his mind he was not afraid to tell it. In 1911 he urged that the rich distribute their wealth before their lives ended. One of his sayings was: "Selfishness is the great sin of which we all are in some degree guilty."

Some of his sayings are the following:

"Remember that the idle and indifferent are the dangerous classes of the community."

"No single person amounts to much: it is altogether that we count."

"The only lasting satisfaction anyone gets out of life is what he does for other people."

"Everywhere we see the signs of ferment, questions social, moral, mental, physical, economical. The pot is boiling hard and you must tend to it, or it will run over and scald the world."

"Your success depends, not on talents, but on will."

"Think of your job and not of yourself."

"The only asset anybody has is character."

[227

rd Crimson

ONDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1919. PRICE 5 CENTS.

UNIVERSITY MOURNS LOSS OF ITS GREATEST FRIEND AND BENEFACTOR, MAJOR HIGGINSON

Major Henry Lee Higginson '55.

SERVICE TODAY IN HONOR OF DONOR OF SOLDIERS FIELD

MARSHALS OF VARIOUS CLASSES SELECTED AS HONORARY PALL-BEARERS.

MEMORIAL MEETING TONIGHT

Major Henry Lee Higginson '55, Fellow of the Corporation, donor of Soldiers Field and the Union, and throughout his long and useful life friend and benefactor of the University, died on Friday night at 9 o'clock.

The funeral will be held today at Appleton Chapel at 12 o'clock. The coffin will be carried by undergraduates from Appleton Chapel to the hearse in front of University Hall through a double line of students, who will assemble to pay their last tribute to Major Higginson. This evening a memorial meeting will be held at the Union, at which President Lowell and others will speak.

Twelve O'Clocks Suspended.

During Major Higginson's funeral this noon classes and lectures in all departments of the University will be suspended from 12 until 1 o'clock. The services will be conducted by the Reverend Samuel McChord Crothers, S. T. D., '99, of the First Unitarian Church of Cambridge. The President and Fellows of the University will act as honorary pallbearers. The actual pallbearers, until relieved by the undergraduates, will be the nephews of the late Major Higginson. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play during the service and the University Choir will sing.

Owing to the limited size of Appleton Chapel, it is doubtful if there will be room for many of the undergraduates at the service itself. The student body will, however, form at 12.15 o'clock sharp outside of Appleton Chapel in a double line, reaching from the chapel door to the front of University Hall. Through the lane thus formed the undergraduate pallbearers will carry the casket and place it in the hearse.

As a final tribute, the memorial mass meeting held in honor of Major Higginson will take place at the Union at 8 o'clock this evening. Members and

MAJOR HIGGINSON ASSUMED ANNUAL SYMPHONY DEFICIT

Patron of Music Once a Student Abroad in Vienna.—Among First to Volunteer in '61.

Major Higginson was born on November 18, 1834, and passed his early years in Boston, entering Harvard with the class of 1855 at the age of 17. He left College before completing his course to enter a business firm in Boston. He remained here, with the exception of a year spent at Vienna in studying music, until the outbreak of the Civil War, when he promptly volunteered his services.

In 1881 he undertook his first philanthropic work, assuming the financial responsibility for a series of 20 orchestral concerts at unprecedently low prices. This was the beginning of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He had intended that the concerts should be open to people of very limited means, and as a result during the first 25 years there was only once a margin of profit. But Major Higginson met the deficit each year with unquestioning readiness.

His experience in the war and the memory of his comrades in arms led him to request that his first gift to Harvard should be called "Soldiers Field.' On June 10, 1890, he presented the playing-

(Continued on page two).

NOTED HARVARD MEN HONOR MEMORY OF MAJOR HIGGINSON

PRES. A. LAWRENCE LOWELL.

In Major Henry L. Higginson the University has lost a councillor and benefactor, the students a friend. Ever mindful of their welfare he gave them the Union and Soldiers' Field. Outside the University he created, and for years at his own expense maintained, the Symphony Orchestra. Without holding public office he was always quick to serve the public and unsparing in his denunciation of public wrong. Many will feel that a friend has gone from us, for he was much loved, because he loved much.

PRES. CHARLES W. ELIOT '53.

His chief direct service was that he served as a Fellow in the Corporation for twenty-six years, 1893-1919, with the utmost punctuality, assiduity, and devotion, and with high intelligence. Why was he chosen a member of the Corporation? Not because he was a successful banker and broker of State Street. Far from it. He was chosen because he was as fine an exemplar of the patriotic citizen-soldier as there was in the country or the world; because he gave the University two great gifts, one the Soldiers Field, on which he hoped that manly sports of many kinds would be generously cultivated through long generations of Harvard youth, and on which he erected a monument to youthful friends of his who fell in the Civil War, and the Harvard Union, where he hoped that democracy and good-fellowship among Harvard students would be forever cultivated; because he had proved himself to be the most successful promoter of good music that Eastern Massachusetts had ever known; and because he was the intimate friend of Alexander Agassiz, a great naturalist and a great administrator in varied fields, who had already served two terms in the Corporation, the last of which closed in 1890; and because the Corporation of that day knew no better example of the public spirit and courage which had made New England what it then was. The expectations and purposes with which the Corporation of 1893 elected Major Higginson a member of the Board were completely fulfilled.

WALTER R. SPALDING '87.

Professor in the Department of Music.

What Major Higginson did for the social and athletic aspects of College life is so prominently before us in such concrete forms as the Harvard Union and Soldiers Field, that we often overlook the great influence exerted by his foresight and generosity in the development of music—that art which, although it appeals so elementally to all human beings, is often difficult to estimate, just because it is so elusive and mysterious.

The facts are that, through the generosity and artistic judgment of Major Higginson over a course of more than 50 years, America has been enabled to have one of the leading orchestras in the whole world. Competent critics from the Continent have often considered it to be the finest; undoubtedly there is no finer.

The Symphony concerts, both those given in Boston and at the Sanders Theatre, have generated a love for good music in the lives of innumerable alumni and undergraduates. There is little doubt that music is going to bear an increasingly more and more important part in bringing together all classes of our fields to the University in memory of "James Savage, Jr., Charles Russell Lowell, Edward Barry Dalton, Stephen George Perkins, James Jackson Lowell, and Robert Gould Shaw—friends, comrades, kinsman, who died for their country."

Major Higginson Assumed Deficit

(Continued from page one).

His second gift came as the result of a desire expressed by a number of alumni that there should be some form of a club at Harvard which should be open to every member of the University. In answer, in 1899 came the announcement of Major Higginson's gift of $150,000 to build the Harvard Union. The building was erected partly to honor the men who died in the Spanish War and partly "to offset the habits of exclusiveness and luxury in living which hurt our democratic University."

(Continued on page six).

Major Higginson Assumed Deficit

(Continued from page two).

During the last years of his life he did signal service as a Fellow of Harvard University.

Sidelights on Life of Major Higginson

"Brusque of manner, independent of ...ch, unassuming, everything that a ...nner book would ignore—Henry L. ...iggins on is a gentleman," said one of ...s contemporaries a generation ago. A delicacy of feeling, restraint, ready perception, calm self-possession, deference given and demanded—such are the qualities which what we call civilization has produced, which are the servants of a strong individuality, and which are soon apprehended by one who has the faculties of appreciating such things.

"Impertinence or presumption would fare hard with Major Higginson; a spade is a spade with him when the occasion for a definition arises, and he is capable of heat and passion and invective when righteous wrath is appropriate.

"Yet for gentle courtesy, for thoughtful kindness, for hidden generosity, for big benefactions, from a right hand to which the left, with all the world, is an absolute stranger—still more for a manly sentiment which has, on some occasions, escaped its control and exhibited itself in romantic enthusiasm—Higginson stands the very embodiment."

* * * *

...Harvard Club dinner a few years ...will live for years in the memory ...who attended. Charles Francis ...of presidential stock and Major ...on were seated at the same ...It was a memorable occasion for ...esent to hear these two famous ...sinage each other after the ...ad informed the assembled ...at he had lately had occasion ...ems that if he did not do so ...would thrash him.

..."I'll see," exclaimed Adams. ...come off, but Mr. ...that "Bully

The fighting qualities of Major Higginson were early exhibited. In the days of his youth Boston Common was the scene of "terrible snowball battles" between the North End boys and Beacon Hill boys. Major Higginson was prominent in these strenuous youthful games of strategy and strength and was always in the forefront of the snowball bombers.

* * * *

"Hulloa, Higgy; how are you?" shouted the venerable Horace Furness to him at a Harvard commencement not many years ago. "No one else but you and Adams call me by that name now," sighed the major.

* * * *

His interest in athletic sports never waned. He was a strong believer in outdoor life for boys and girls. In 1911 he startled the opponents of Sunday sports by appearing before a legislative committee to urge that the parks and playgrounds be opened for Sunday play.

* * * *

The great financier and noted soldier was also a humanist. Most people know only of unparalleled gift to the community and to the country—the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He gave to every worthy cause. He gave to many educational institutions and to many charities.

* * * *

At the time of the coal famine in 1902 he contributed $10,000 toward the relief of suffering. He was placed at the head of a citizens' committee that established 15 small distributing stations. He induced large dealers to keep coal-bag wagons on the street to supply small quantities to the people in poor circumstances. He also proposed ...importation of 10,000 tons of Scotch ...Boston, offered to pay 10 per ...

In the fall of 1907, when the public was disturbed and uncertain about the future of financial conditions, he advised both large and small investors to "withdraw money from the savings banks and invest it in good stocks—not on margins, but by buying them outright and paying for them."

* * * *

He was chosen as the only representative from New England on the board of 15 trustees of the Carnegie Institute at Washington, which had been endowed by its founder with $10,000,000.

* * * *

Upon the formation of the new stock exchange his subscription was $300,000; but he was such an infrequent visitor to the institution which he helped to create that he was unknown to many of the younger operators, and amusing mistakes were often made by them.

One day he stepped upon the floor to buy some stock for one of the firm's regular customers, and when he had made the purchase the young broker who sold it stepped up to him with pencil and pad and asked: "What is your name, sir?"

He informed the young man that the purchase was made in the name of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., but this did not satisfy. The broker said: "Yes, of course; but it is necessary for me to know your name."

The quiet reply was: "I am Mr. Higginson."

The shouts of laughter from the oldtimers discomfited the broker.

* * * *

It was once remarked that the "Higginson line has drawn into its life influence from the whole history of New England—the stringency of the Puritan, the loyalty of the colonists, the fervor of the patriot, the ardor of the philanthropist, the devotion of the soldier, the patriotism.

* * * *

Major Higginson on Jan. 2, 1918, celebrated the 50th anniversary as a member of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., being then a senior partner. On this occasion the major remarked: "We are a republic, there is no head of the firm. Everybody has his say, and one man's word is as good as another's."

* * * *

While he made no pretension to scholarship or literary ability or public speaking, he was nevertheless a master of the trenchant, easy, graceful and effective style of writing and speaking. He delighted to express his views on timely topics.

* * * *

Major Higginson was an outspoken man. If he had something on his mind he was not afraid to tell it. In 1911 he urged that the rich distribute their wealth before their lives ended. One of his sayings was: "Selfishness is the great sin of which we all are in some degree guilty."

Some of his sayings are the following:

"Remember that the idle and indifferent are the dangerous classes of the community."

"No single person amounts to much: it is altogether that we count."

"The only lasting satisfaction anyone gets out of life is what he does for other people."

"Everywhere we see the signs of ferment, questions social, moral, mental, physical, economical. The pot is boiling hard and you must tend to it, or it will run over and scald the world."

"Your success depends, not on talents, but on will."

"Think of your job and not of yourself."

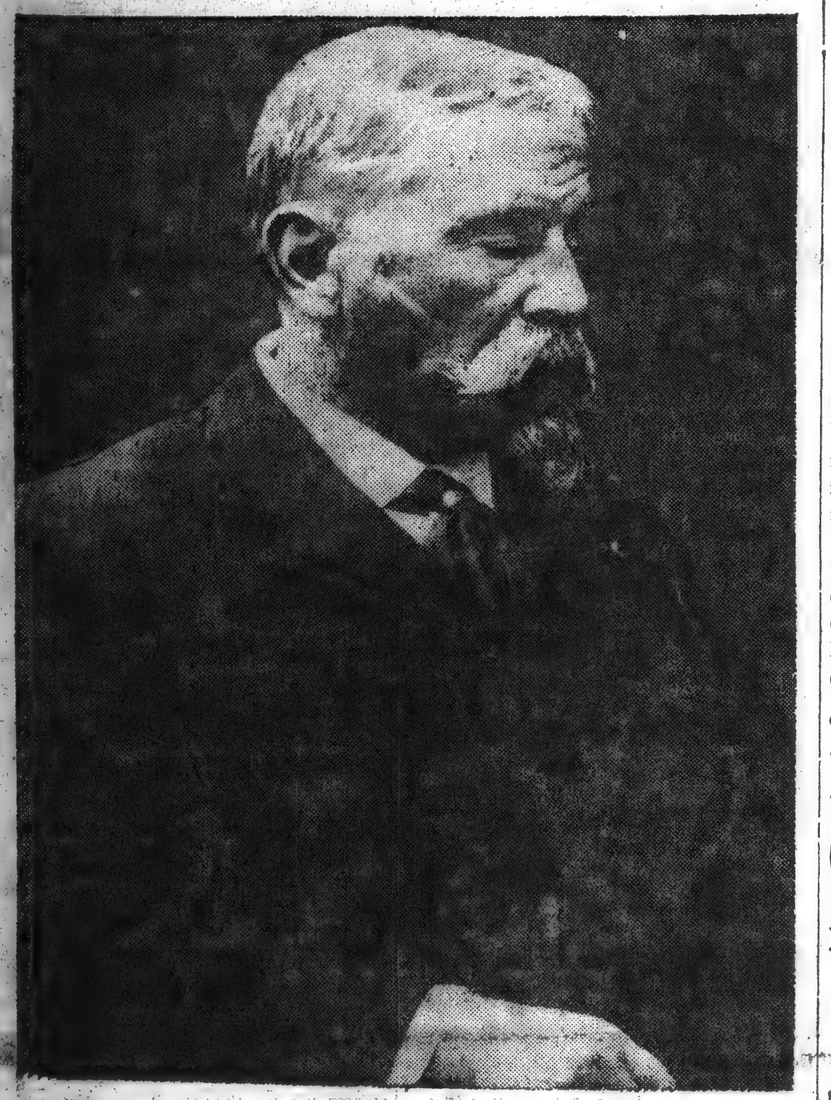
"The only asset anybody has is character."

[227]

SUND

SIMPLE RITES FOR HIGGINSON

To Be Buried in Uniform, With Flag and Sword, on Coffin— Nephews Body Bearers



MAJOR HENRY L. HIGGINSON,
Who died at the Massachusetts General Hospital following an operation.

The funeral of Major Henry Lee Higginson, dean of Boston bankers, head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., gallant Civil war cavalryman, devotee of music and art, founder and patron of Boston Symphony Orchestra and a long leader in local philanthropy, will take place tomorrow at 12 o'clock at Appleton Chapel, Cambridge. The Rev. Samuel M. Crothers of the First Parish Church, Cambridge, will conduct the service.

Major Higginson will be buried in his military uniform. On the coffin will be only a laurel wreath, the Stars and Stripes and his sword.

The members of the Harvard Corporation will be the honorary pallbearers and the body will be carried from the chapel by his nephews. The burial will be in Mt. Auburn. In accordance with the wishes of Major Higginson the services will be simple.

Continued on Page 16—First Col.

Continued From First Page

The Harvard Choir and 40 or 50 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will provide the music.

RECITATIONS SUSPENDED

In recognition of his having been a student at the college, of his services as one of the Fellows of the college, of his many notable benefactions to that institution and of his life-long interest in his alma mater, all recitations at Harvard University will be suspended tomorrow.

Major Higginson died Friday evening at 8 o'clock at the Massachusetts General Hospital from the effects of an operation. In the morning he suffered a sudden attack of illness at his home on Commonwealth avenue and in the afternoon he underwent an operation, from the effects of which he failed to rally.

Had he lived until Tuesday, he would have been 85 years of age.

Major Higginson is survived by his wife, who was a daughter of Louis Agassiz; a son, A. Henry Higginson of Lincoln; a brother, Francis L. Higginson of Boston and Wenham, and a sister, Mrs. S. Putnam Blake of Boston.

Remarkable Type of Man

Major Henry Lee Higginson was a remarkable type of man. He was a patriot of the exemplary order, financier, millionaire, orator, writer, trustee and manager of vested interests, high-minded citizen, patron of art, friend of education and a philanthropist.

Scion of a Puritan stock that had been distinguished since the early days of the Colonies, he was deeply interested in the artistic education of the people. The greatest of all his gifts to the people of Boston is the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A few years ago, recognizing that his span of life might at any time come to a close and that his favorite plan for the musical education of the people might thereby be defeated of its purpose, he arranged in his will to leave the sum of $1,000,000 for the perpetuation of that historic institution.

Tou

"It is my desire," he then said, "to have the Symphony Orchestra benefit all the people; that was my early ambition in founding it, as I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interest is a poor specimen of a citizen. Each year there is a deficit in the business affairs of the orchestra. Primarily I reckoned on a deficit of $20,000 a season; but there have been seasons when the deficit reached $50,000."

To Meet Annual Deficit

It was to meet this annual deficit and to insure the continued service of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the interest of popular musical education that Major Higginson established in his will a provision for the use of a million dollars.

Henry Lee Higginson was born in New York City on Nov. 18, 1834, the son of George and Mary Cabot (Lee) Higginson. He was a descendant of Francis Higginson, who came to this country in 1629, settling in Salem. He was reared in Boston, where his parents moved in the early days of his youth.

At the age of 17 years he entered Harvard in the class of 1855, but left before graduating to enter the counting room of a local business house. Though he had determined upon a business career, he decided to devote himself also to music and to round out his education in a manner fitting a family socially and intellectually distinguished.

At the age of 22 years he went to Vienna to study music. While there he associated much with musicians of note and determined that he would give to his home city an orchestra that would vie in excellence with the best orchestral playing in the world.

Plans for Orchestra

With youthful ambition and community pride he concluded to give to Boston an orchestra whose business should be its sole business, not depending for its support on other activities nor on the whims and play of popular favor. He returned to Boston with fruitful plans for the execution of his fond ambition and throughout his long life in an exemplary manner he carried out this purpose.

He remained with his business house until the outset of the Civil war and then he offered his services to the government. On May 28, 1861, he was commissioned a second lieutenant of the Second Regiment, Massachusetts Volunteers. On July 8 he was promoted to the rank of first lieutenant and on Oct. 31 he was transferred to the cavalry. He was commissioned captain of the First Regiment, Massachusetts Volunteer Cavalry.

TON SUNDAY POS

On March 26, 1862, he was promoted to major. At the battle of Aldie he displayed great gallantry. He was severely wounded, receiving two pistol wounds and three sabre cuts. A scar of the latter he bore to the time of his death as a distinguishing mark of valor on the field of action.

Disabled by Wounds

He was brevetted lieutenant-colonel on March 13, 1864, for gallantry and meritorious service. He served on the staff of Major-General Barlow of the First Division of the Second Army Corps. On Aug. 9, 1864, he was discharged for disability, resulting from wounds received in battle.

At the conclusion of the war Mr. Higginson returned to Boston and again entered the banking business. Despite his rank of colonel, he preferred the title of major, the rank he held during his actual military service.

On Jan. 1, 1865, Major Higginson entered as a partner in the banking house of Lee, Higginson & Co. Throughout various changes in partnerships, Mr. Higginson remained as the dominating figure of this great institution. Under his direction it has had a notable career. It has had much to do with the starting and financing of many of the most stable of American enterprises. It has launched enterprises that required capital amounting at times to more than a billion dollars.

It launched the old Calumet mine, before the consolidation of the Calumet & Hecla. It floated tthe bonds of the Boston Terminal Company, that at first amounted to $12,000,000. Prominent among the other concerns it helped finance are: Bell Telephone, the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe and the Union Pacific railroad; the bonds of the Connecticut railroad, the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy; the Bangor and Aroostook railroad; the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company; some $5,000,000 of the securities of the Walter Baker Chocolate Company.

Besides it financed the transfer of the Boston and Providence railroad and the consolidation of the Thomson-Edison and Edison Electric companies.

Internationally Famous

In addition to his banking interests Major Higginson had many other concerns. He became internationally famous as the founder and sponsor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was his most conspicuous public service.

At his own personal financial risk, he undertook to be responsible for the expenses of a series of 20 orchestral concerts of the highest order and a like number of public rehearsals. All at unprecedented low prices. Major Higginson said that in the interest of good music he wished to establish in Boston a "full and permanent orchestra, offering the best music at low prices such as may be found in all the large European cities, or even in the smaller musical centres in Germany."

The first concert was on Oct. 22, 1881. The best seats cost 50 cents and at all the public rehearsals there were seats at 25 cents.

For 25 years from 1881 there was a margin of profit in only one year. In one year the deficit was only $2000, in another year it amounted to $52,000, and in 1904 it was not less than $40,000.

Major Higginson personally met all these deficits. To those who concerned themselves in this annual loss, he used to say: "Don't worry about the deficits; you don't worry about your wine bills, your cigar bills, nor your wives' dressing bills."

Symphony Hall Built

In 1893, Major Higginson interested a number of wealthy citizens in his project of building a hall for the orchestra. He raised $400,000 for the purpose. The site was secured, Symphony Hall built and it was formally opened on Oct. 15, 1900.

Through the support of Major Higginson the orchestra became a permanent one. With inducements, often of a very costly nature, he brought together the best artistic ensemble of its kind in this country. Its presentation of the great classics as well as its introduction of new compositions of merit has played a most important part in the musical history of Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and other cities throughout the East where the orchestra gave regular series of concerts every year.

Major Higginson was noted for his interest in Harvard. Though not a graduate from Harvard that institution in 1882 conferred upon Major Higginson the degree of master of arts. Later in life he served several years as one of the five fellows of Harvard College.

His benefactions to the college include the athletic grounds known as "Soldiers Field," which he presented as a memorial to his friends who died in the service of their country during the Civil war: General Charles Russell Lowell, Colonel Robert Gould Shaw, Colonel James Savage, Jr., Colonel Edward B. Dalton, Lieutenant Stephen G. Perkins and Lieutenant James Jackson Lowell.

Built Harvard Union

He also endowed the university in 1899 with the sum of $150,000 for the erection of the Harvard Union, a clubhouse for all members of the university, "to counteract the influence of exclusive cliques and extravagant living."

Major Higginson never aspired to public office. Yet he was at all times deeply interested in the questions of the day, and in his letters to the press and in his addresses on the platform, enunciated the highest principles for civic right doing.

He was commander of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States, president of the Harvard Union for many years, and member of the Board of Fellows of Harvard College. He belonged to the Bunker Hill Monument Association, Franklin Foundation, the Military Training Camps Association, and was honorary president of the Public School Association. He was a member of the Massachusetts Historical Society and a life member of the American Academy of Political and Social Science. He belonged to the Tavern Club, the Harvard Club in Boston and New York, and was a member of the Knickerbocker Club of New York city.

PAY TRIBUTE

Friends and Associates Join in Praising His Character, Both in Public and Private Life

Friends and associates of Major Higginson in business, musical, educational and political circles joined yesterday in paying tribute to his public and private integrity, his generous spirit and his unswerving patriotism.

"The death of Major Henry L. Higginson has removed a man who has been for years a commanding figure," said Governor Coolidge. "In public service and private philanthropy a benefactor of his fellow men; in character an example to be followed with reverence; in attainments pre-eminent among associates of commanding importance. An uncompromising patriot, the advocate of every good cause, a man whose work, whose memory, whose principles will endure."

"His death is Boston's sorrow," said Mayor Peters. "The place he leaves vacant cannot be filled, and more and more will Boston realize this as time goes on. Major Higginson was too well loved by people in every walk of life for words of mine to add anything to his memory, but it will always be our privilege to remember him as a geat patriot, a loving friend and a noble American."

T, NOVEMBER 16,

The Harvard Corporation, of which Major Higginson was long a member, made a statement saying that "it is particularly as the friend of Harvard that he will be remembered. He gave the Harvard Union, which for many years has been useful as a common meeting place for Harvard men and as a great club to which all members of the university are eligible. He also gave Soldiers' Field to the university. His services as a fellow of the corporation were too many and valuable to recount."

Recitations and classes will be suspended from 12 to 1 on Monday at Harvard during the funeral in Appleton Chapel.

Philip W. Wrenn, president of the Boston Stock Exchange, said: "Major Higginson was the oldest member of the exchange, joining it on Jan. 2, 1868. In earlier years he was active in all its affairs, and in later years, whenever emergencies of any kind rose in the street, he was an active participant and most helpful in his counsel."

The exchange will be silent for an hour during the funeral.

Police Commissioner Edwin U. Curtis said: "The city and State have certainly lost an eminently useful and public-spirited citizen, who always gave without stint of his time and means to any undertaking for the good of the community. He should not be, and will not be, soon forgotten."

FOR SAVING COMMON

One of Major Higginson's Last Public Acts Was His Appearance Before Board of Street Commissioners

One of the last public acts of Major Henry Lee Higginson was his appearance on Nov. 5 in defence of the integrity of Boston Common at a hearing before the street commissioners on the proposal to widen Park, Tremont and Boylston streets. He advocated a more careful study of traffic conditions before the Common should be sliced.

In a letter to Chairman O'Callaghan, dated Nov. 7, offering many suggestions for the relief of traffic congestion, he said: "Really the best thing that could be done would be to give the police more power, give them whistles, and require them to enforce the law. It makes no difference who breaks the law; let that person be fined."

Other suggestions he made were to prohibit all parking on narrow streets, the widening of Charles street from Cambridge bridge to Beacon street, a new street the width of Causeway from the North station to the corner of Cambridge and Charles streets, and a widening of Eliot street to the South station.

[223]

GGINSON FUNERAL TO BE SIMPLE

Services Monday in Appleton Chapel, Where He Was Married

AMERICAN FLAG ONLY DECORATION

Death Was Caused by a Clot of Blood on the Brain

In tribute to the memory of Major Henry Lee Higginson, financial, academic and artistic circles all over the city will suspend activities tomorrow noon while the funeral services are being conducted in Appleton Chapel, Harvard College.

All exercises and recitations at Harvard will shut down until the close of the services; flags on public buildings will fly at half-staff, and the Boston Stock Exchange will observe a silent period during the hour set for the funeral.

The arrangements are extremely simple, in accordance with the wishes of the family; flowers will be omitted, and the casket will be decorated only with an American flag contributed by the Loyal Legion and a laurel wreath. Members of the Harvard Corporation will be honorary pallbearers, and the casket will be borne by nephews and nephews-in-law of the deceased. Members of the Harvard Club will attend in a body.

Rev. Dr. Samuel M. Crothers of the First Parish (Unitarian) Church of Cambridge will officiate. It was in Appleton Chapel that Major and Mrs. Higginson, who was Ida Agassiz, were married more than a half century ago. Burial will be at Mt. Auburn, where a bugler will sound taps."

BLOOD CLOT WAS FATAL.

Major Higginson died on Friday night about 8:30 p. m., following a minor operation performed by Dr. F. B. Lund, the family physician. Death was caused, not by the operation, but by a blood clot on the brain. Major Higginson last Winter underwent an operation for a trouble which recurred last week. Up to two days before his death he had appeared in complete health, and next Tuesday would have been his eighty-fifth birthday.

While he was known and honored in many walks of life, as soldier, scholar, philanthropist, financier, author, speaker and patron of the arts, as far as the founder and for thirty-two years the financial support of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that bears Higginson became internationally known. The orchestra gave its first concert October 22, 1881. From its inception, it has been maintained on the highest traditions of musical art.

No expense was spared by its founder to keep its quality unscathed by commercialism.

In every year but one there was a deficit, ranging from $2,000 to $52,000, which Major Higginson met from his private purse. The orchestra was known throughout the world as "an orchestra of virtuosi."

UPSET BY MUCK CASE.

Major Higginson maintained his sponsorship until the revelations concerning Dr. Karl Muck, which resulted in his internment and deportation as an active enemy alien. In bitter disillusionment, Major Higginson then turned over his interests in the orchestra to a board of trustees. Some years ago, before the beginning of these troubles, it became known that he had provided in his will a fund of $1,000,000 to maintain the orchestra perpetually.

As a member of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., of State street, he was known in financial circles throughout the country. He was a native of New York, where he was born November 18, 1834, a descendant of Francis Higginson, who settled in Salem in Colonial days.

Henry Lee Higginson was educated in Boston and entered Harvard, but left to engage in business, later spending a year studying music in Vienna. He entered the Civil War as second lieutenant and attained the rank of major in 1862. Wounded four times, he was discharged for disability, and breveted lieutenant-colonel for bravery.

After the war he returned to the banking business. Meantime, before his discharge, he had married Miss Agassiz, the daughter of Professor Louis Agassiz of Cambridge. Mrs. Higginson, their son, Alexander Henry Higginson of South Lincoln, and one grandchild, son of the latter, survive him.

Alexander was married first to Rosamond Tudor, who divorced him and married W. Starling Burgess. He later married Jean Calducci, a musical comedy actress.

Although Major Higginson did not complete his Harvard course, he was awarded the honorary degree of Master of Arts years later, and Yale conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Laws.

To enumerate his many public services would be to recapitulate in large measure the history of Boston and its institutions. He gave Soldiers Field to Harvard University, as a memorial to his friends who had died in the war. He gavet he university $150,000 for the erection of the Harvard Union. He was at various times in his career a member of the Harvard Corporation, a trustee of the Carnegie Institute, an advocate of preparedness, a life member of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, vice-president of the Provident Institution for Savings, a director of the American Telephone and Telegraph ompany, of the General Electric Company, a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music and of Franklin Union; a member of the Massachusetts Historical Society and many other organizations.

KNOWN FOR HIS CHARITY.

He organized the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra, in aid of retired musicians. At the time of the coal famine, in 1902, he gave $10,000 for relief work. He subscribed $100,000 toward the $1,000,000 endowment fund of the American Academy in Rome, in 1905. Back in 1898 during the Spanish War he gave his personal check for $10,000 to help equip the hospital steamship Bay State for its mission to Cuba. He gave a fountain to Radcliffe College, and subscribed $300,000 on the establishment of the Boston Stock Exchange.

Probably his last public appearance was at the recent hearing on the proposal to slice the Common, which Major Higginson did not favor. He was well known as a speaker on many public questions.

On the news of his death, Governor Coolidge, Bishop Lawrence and Mayor Peters were among the first to pay tribute to his life and services.

MAJOR HENRY L. HIGGINSON, financier and philanthropist, who died following an operation.

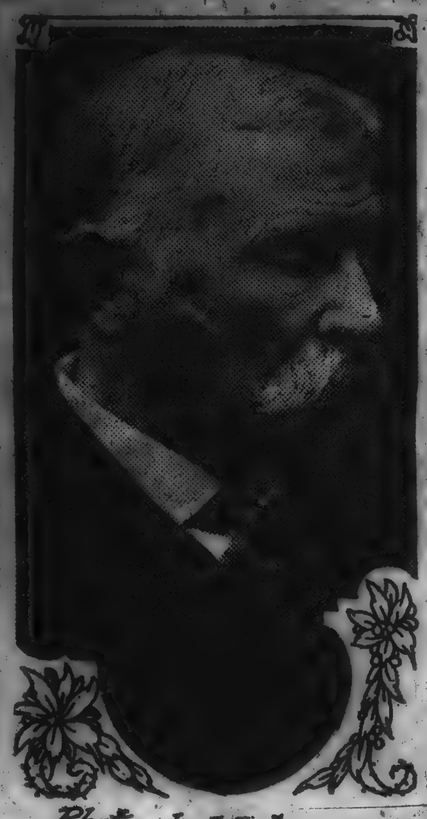

Photo by Notman.

BENEFACTOR OF BOSTON MUSIC

Major Higginson Shared Enjoyment of Art With Fellow Citizens

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

The most public-spirited citizen of Boston was one of its chief musical benefactors. Henry Lee Higginson studied music in Vienna. He said of music, in those student days:

"It is almost my inner world; without it I miss much, and with it I am happier and better."

He studied piano, singing, harmony and counterpoint. It is indicative of his liberal nature that when he became a successful broker he desired to share his enjoyment of the art with all his fellow-citizens.

In 1880 orchestral matters in Boston were the occasion of a sharp conflict. John S. Dwight and the Harvard Musical Association fought for conservatism in orchestral programs, and Berlioz, Wagner and Liszt represented to them the world, the flesh and—so forth. But another coterie, containing such men as Bernhard Listemann, Louis Maas, John Orth, William H. Sherwood, etc., fought for the modern school and less classical pabulum. Both sides had their orchestras, both giving concerts, with programs of generally opposite character—and both were losing money by the process.

STARTED SYMPHONY IN 1881.

It was at that time, in 1881, that Major Higginson (he won this rank splendidly in the Civil War), determined to give Boston something permanent in orchestral music, something that should be both classical and modern in its programs, an organization that would enable its members to avoid trying to eke out a scanty income by playing at balls, picnics and parades.

It will readily be seen that this was to be a benefaction not only to the public but to the musicians as well. In order not to antagonize either of the two existing orchestras (which soon gave up the ghost), he chose Saturday night for his concerts, a night which up to that time had been avoided for entertainments of almost all kinds—a relic of the old Puritan custom which began the Sabbath on that evening. The great series of concerts was begun October 22, 1881, preceded as at present by an afternoon public rehearsal.

Mr. Higginson was well seconded by his first conductor, Georg Henschel, who was both classical and radical in his tastes, and who gave programs that would be considered models even today. But the first great drillmaster of the orchestra was the second conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, who infused new blood into the organization, adding to its members many young European artists who subsequently grew up with the orchestra and made it absolutely homogeneous, which had never been the case with an American orchestra before.

WISE AND FAR-SEEING.

Mr. Higginson extended his influence into the field of chamber music, and out of Mr. Gericke's reformed orchestra grew the Kneisel Quartet, which was sustained during its early seasons by his generosity.

The subsequent history of the Symphony Orchestra and its succession of great conductors is well known. Today America has many famous orchestras and string quartets, but the first model for these were the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel quartet, and both of these owe their existence to the wise and far-seeing beneficence of Major Henry L. Higginson.

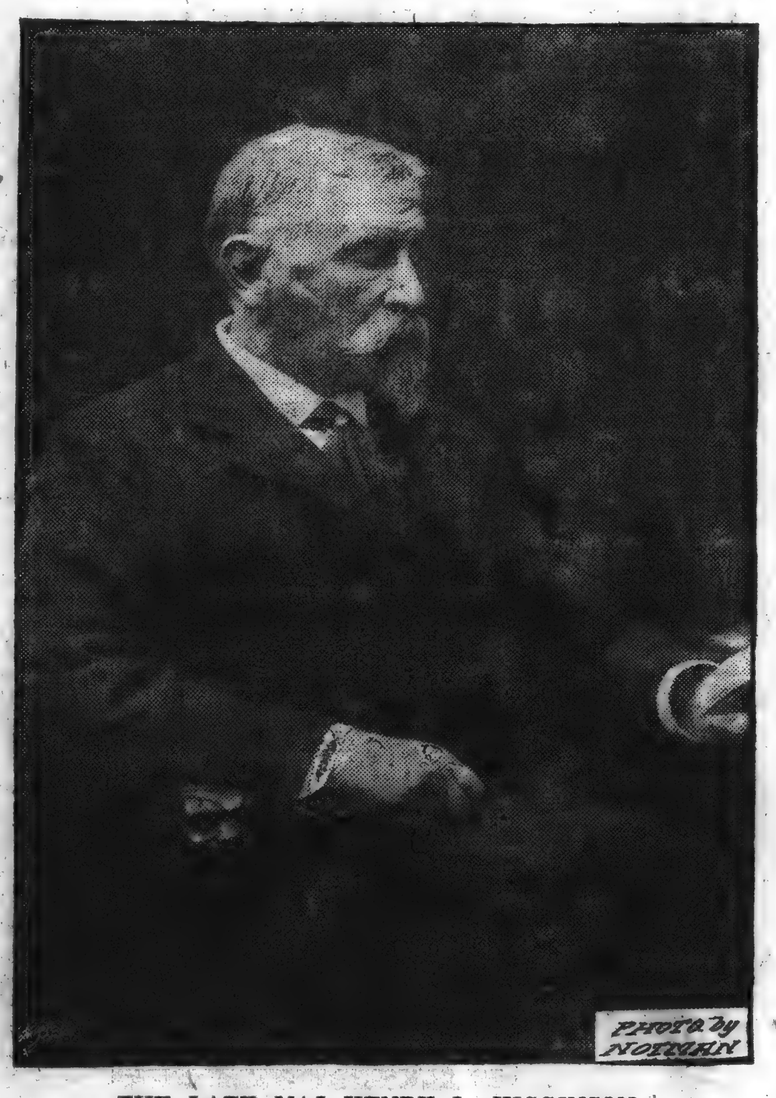

PHOTO BY NOTMAN

THE LATE MAJ HENRY L. HIGGINSON

Maj Henry L. Higginson died at 8:30 last night at the Massachusetts General Hospital. He was in his 85th year.

Yesterday afternoon he was taken to the hospital and late in the day it became necessary, because of the seriousness of his trouble, to operate o nhim. His condition became rapidly worse and he died early in the evening.

Henry Lee Higginson was born in New York City, Nov 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a countinghouse. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

In 1890 Maj Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

Mr Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net venue; in every other year until his death Mr Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket.

One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at 25 cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The Symphony Orchestra Mr Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

[224]

HIGGINSON FUNERAL TO BE SIMPLE

Services Monday in Appleton Chapel, Where He Was Married

AMERICAN FLAG ONLY DECORATION

Death Was Caused by a Clot of Blood on the Brain

In tribute to the memory of Major Henry Lee Higginson, financial, academic and artistic circles all over the city will suspend activities tomorrow noon while the funeral services are being conducted in Appleton Chapel, Harvard College.

All exercises and recitations at Harvard will shut down until the close of the services; flags on public buildings will fly at half-staff, and the Boston Stock Exchange will observe a silent period during the hour set for the funeral.

The arrangements are extremely simple, in accordance with the wishes of the family; flowers will be omitted, and the casket will be decorated only with an American flag contributed by the Loyal Legion and a laurel wreath. Members of the Harvard Corporation will be honorary pallbearers, and the casket will be borne by nephews and nephews-in-law of the deceased. Members of the Harvard Club will attend in a body.

Rev. Dr. Samuel M. Crothers of the First Parish (Unitarian) Church of Cambridge will officiate. It was in Appleton Chapel that Major and Mrs. Higginson, who was Ida Agassiz, were married more than a half century ago. Burial will be at Mt. Auburn, where a bugler will sound taps."

GOOD CLOT WAS FATAL.

Major Higginson died on Friday night at 8:30 p. m., following a minor operation performed by Dr. F. B. Lund, the family physician. Death was caused, not by the operation, but by a good clot on the brain. Major Higginson last Winter underwent an operation for a trouble which recurred last week. Up to two days before his death he had appeared in complete health, and next Tuesday would have been his eighty-fifth birthday.

While he was known and honored in many walks of life, as soldier, scholar, philanthropist, financier, author, speaker and patron of the arts, as well as the founder and for thirty-three years the financial support of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that bears Higginson became internationally known. The orchestra gave its first concert October 22, 1881. From its inception, it has been maintained on the highest traditions of musical art. No expense was spared by its founder to keep its quality unscathed by commercialism.

In every year but one there was a deficit, ranging from $2,000 to $52,000, which Major Higginson met from his private purse. The orchestra was known throughout the world as "an orchestra of virtuosi."

UPSET BY MUCK CASE.

Major Higginson maintained his sponsorship until the revelations concerning Dr. Karl Muck, which resulted in his internment and deportation as an active enemy alien. In bitter disillusionment, Major Higginson then turned over his interests in the orchestra to a board of trustees. Some years ago, before the beginning of these troubles, it became known that he had provided in his will a fund of $1,000,000 to maintain the orchestra perpetually.

As a member of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., of State street, he was known in financial circles throughout the country. He was a native of New York, where he was born November 18, 1834, a descendant of Francis Higginson, who settled in Salem in Colonial days.

Henry Lee Higginson was educated in Boston and entered Harvard, but left to engage in business, later spending a year studying music in Vienna. He entered the Civil War as second lieutenant and attained the rank of major in 1862. Wounded four times, he was discharged for disability, and breveted lieutenant-colonel for bravery.

After the war he returned to the banking business. Meantime, before his discharge, he had married Miss Agassiz, the daughter of Professor Louis Agassiz of Cambridge. Mrs. Higginson, their son, Alexander Henry Higginson of South Lincoln, and one grandchild, son of the latter, survive him.

Alexander was married first to Rosamond Tudor, who divorced him and married W. Starling Burgess. He later married Jean Calducci, a musical comedy actress.

Although Major Higginson did not complete his Harvard course, he was awarded the honorary degree of Master of Arts years later, and Yale conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Laws.

To enumerate his many public services would be to recapitulate in large measure the history of Boston and its institutions. He gave Soldiers Field to Harvard University, as a memorial to his friends who had died in the war. He gavet he university $150,000 for the erection of the Harvard Union. He was at various times in his career a member of the Harvard Corporation, a trustee of the Carnegie Institute, an advocate of preparedness, a life member of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, vice-president of the Provident Institution for Savings, a director of the American Telephone and Telegraph ompany, of the General Electric Company, a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music and of Franklin Union, a member of the Massachusetts Historical Society and many other organizations.

KNOWN FOR HIS CHARITY.

He organized the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra, in aid of retired musicians. At the time of the coal famine, in 1902, he gave $10,000 for relief work. He subscribed $100,000 toward the $1,000,000 endowment fund of the American Academy in Rome, in 1905. Back in 1898 during the Spanish War he gave his personal check for $10,000 to help equip the hospital steamship Bay State for its mission to Cuba. He gave a fountain to Radcliffe College, and subscribed $300,000 on the establishment of the Boston Stock Exchange.

Probably his last public appearance was at the recent hearing on the proposal to slice the Common, which Major Higginson did not favor. He was well known as a speaker on many public questions.

On the news of his death, Governor Coolidge, Bishop Lawrence and Mayor Peters were among the first to pay tribute to his life and services.

MAJOR HENRY L. HIGGINSON, financier and philanthropist, who died following an operation.

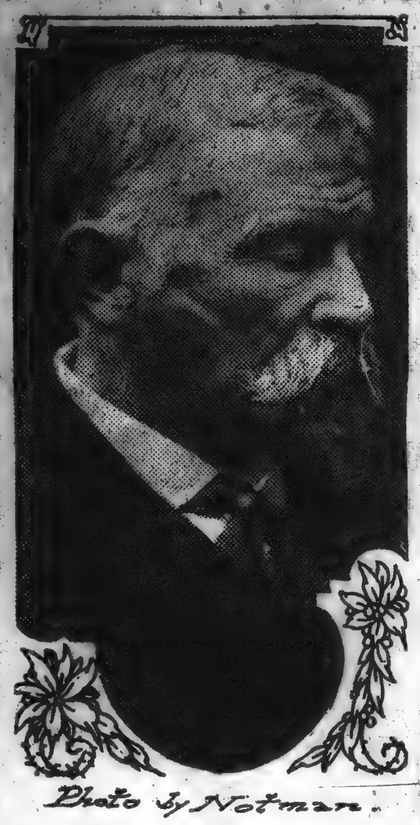

Photo by Notman.

BENEFACTOR OF BOSTON MUSIC

Major Higginson Shared Enjoyment of Art With Fellow Citizens

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

The most public-spirited citizen of Boston was one of its chief musical benefactors. Henry Lee Higginson studied music in Vienna. He said of music, in those student days:

"It is almost my inner world; without it I miss much, and with it I am happier and better."

He studied piano, singing, harmony and counterpoint. It is indicative of his liberal nature that when he became a successful broker he desired to share his enjoyment of the art with all his fellow-citizens.

In 1880 orchestral matters in Boston were the occasion of a sharp conflict. John S. Dwight and the Harvard Musical Association fought for conservatism in orchestral programs, and Berlioz, Wagner and Liszt represented to them the world, the flesh and—so forth. But another coterie, containing such men as Bernhard Listemann, Louis Maas, John Orth, William H. Sherwood, etc., fought for the modern school and less classical pabulum. Both sides had their orchestras, both giving concerts, with programs of generally opposite character—and both were losing money by the process.

STARTED SYMPHONY IN 1881.

It was at that time, in 1881, that Major Higginson (he won this rank splendidly in the Civil War), determined to give Boston something permanent in orchestral music, something that should be both classical and modern in its programs, an organization that would enable its members to avoid trying to eke out a scanty income by playing at balls, picnics and parades.

It will readily be seen that this was to be a benefaction not only to the public but to the musicians as well. In order not to antagonize either of the two existing orchestras (which soon gave up the ghost), he chose Saturday night for his concerts, a night which up to that time had been avoided for entertainments of almost all kinds—a relic of the old Puritan custom which began the Sabbath on that evening. The great series of concerts was begun October 22, 1881, preceded as at present by an afternoon public rehearsal.

Mr. Higginson was well seconded by his first conductor, Georg Henschel, who was both classical and radical in his tastes, and who gave programs that would be considered models even today. But the first great drillmaster of the orchestra was the second conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, who infused new blood into the organization, adding to its members many young European artists who subsequently grew up with the orchestra and made it absolutely homogeneous, which had never been the case with an American orchestra before.

WISE AND FAR-SEEING.

Mr. Higginson extended his influence into the field of chamber music, and out of Mr. Gericke's reformed orchestra grew the Kneisel Quartet, which was sustained during its early seasons by his generosity.

The subsequent history of the Symphony Orchestra and its succession of great conductors is well known. Today America has many famous orchestras and string quartets, but the first model for these were the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel quartet, and both of these owe their existence to the wise and far-seeing beneficence of Major Henry L. Higginson.

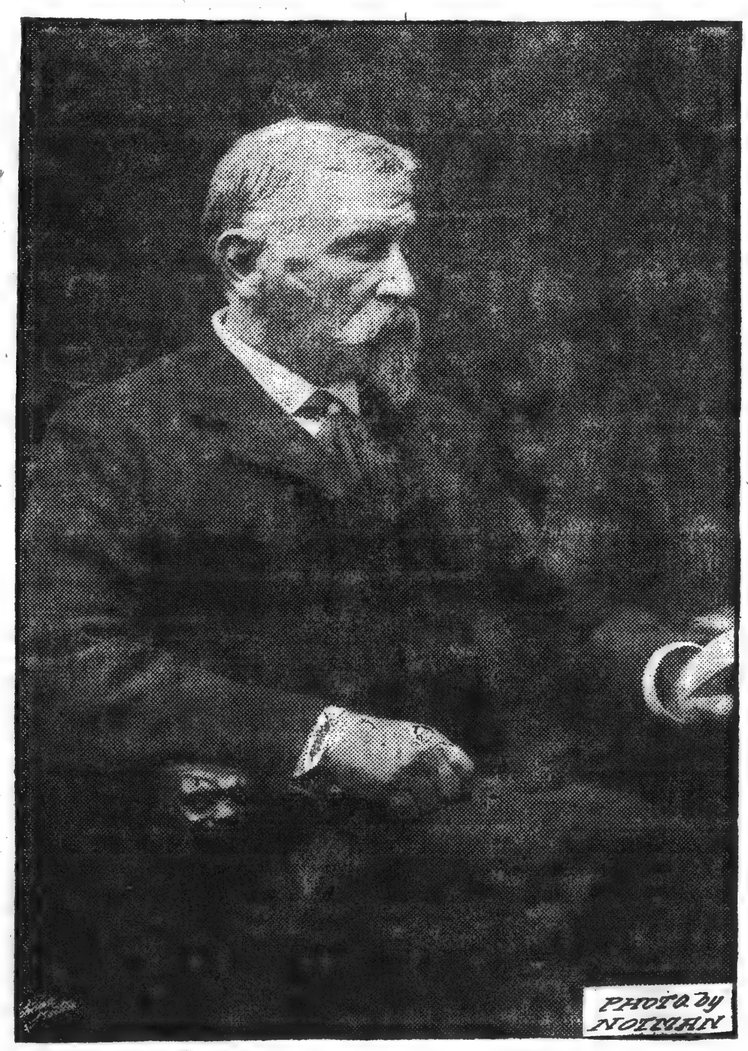

PHOTO BY NOTMAN

THE LATE MAJ HENRY L. HIGGINSON

Maj Henry L. Higginson died at 8:30 last night at the Massachusetts General Hospital. He was in his 85th year.

Yesterday afternoon he was taken to the hospital and late in the day it became necessary, because of the seriousness of his trouble, to operate o nhim. His condition became rapidly worse and he died early in the evening.

Henry Lee Higginson was born in New York City, Nov 18, 1834, but spent most of his life in Boston. He studied at Harvard, but left before completing his course to enter a countinghouse. In 1856 he went to Vienna, where he studied music for a year. He served for three years in the Civil War, was several times wounded and was discharged for disability in 1864, with the rank of major and brevet lieutenant colonel. Returning to Boston, he entered the banking business and for many years headed the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co.

In 1890 Maj Higginson presented to Harvard, as a memorial to Harvard men who were killed in the war, Soldiers' Field, the athletic grounds on a part of which the Harvard Stadium now stands. Nine years later he made a gift of $150,000 to the university for the erection of the Harvard Union. Since 1893 he had been a member of the Harvard Corporation and became well known to the students through his frequent addresses to them. He was awarded the degree of Master of Arts by Harvard and that of Doctor of Laws by Yale.

Mr Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881. In the years that followed he obtained the services of expert players from the musical capitals of Europe and engaged conductors of the first rank who gradually developed the organization until it became one of the foremost orchestras of the world. Only in one or two years did the concerts yield a net venue; in every other year until his death Mr Higginson made up the deficit from his own pocket.

One of his announced purposes in founding the orchestra was to provide first-class music for people of small means, and from the start he arranged that several hundred seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsals should be sold at 25 cents each. These "rehearsals" in later years came to be concerts in full form.

The Symphony Orchestra Mr Higginson considered his hobby rather than a philanthropy. He once said that it was to him what a yacht, a racing stable, a library or an art gallery were to other men of wealth.

[224]

FUNERAL TOMORROW OF MAJ HIGGINSON

To Be Held in Appleton Chapel at Harvard

College to Honor Benefactor, the Founder of Symphony Orchestra

The death of Maj Henry Lee Higginson, head of the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., frequently called "Boston's foremost citizen," which occurred on Friday evening at Phillips House, Massachusetts General Hospital, caused widespread sorrow throughout the city.

Maj Higginson would have been 85 years old on Tuesday. He was active until the very end of his long life, having been at his office last Wednesday.

He did not become really ill until Friday morning, when he was taken to the hospital. An operation, supplementary to one performed last Winter, was resorted to in the afternoon, but he failed to rally from it and died about 8 p m.

The funeral of Maj Higginson will be held tomorrow noon in Appleton Chapel at Harvard University. All recitations there will be suspended during the day.

Maj Higginson leaves his wife, who is a daughter of the late Louis Agassiz; a son, A. Henry Higginson of Lincoln; a brother, Francis L. Higginson of Boston and Wenham; and a sister, Mrs S. Parkman Blake of this city.

Supported Symphony Orchestra

Maj Higginson's first notable enterprise, for the benefit of the public as well as to gratify his chief passion, was in the work of perfecting the musical culture of Boston.

It was in 1881 that he undertook, at his personal financial risk, to be responsible for the expenses of a series of 20 orchestral concerts of the highest order, and a like number of public rehearsals, and at unprecedently low prices.

The Symphony Orchestra was his child. He determined that it should not lack financial support, and he supplied all deficiencies from his own purse.

For 25 years from 1881 there was a margin of profit in only one year. In one year the deficit was only $2000, in another it ran up to $52,000 and as late as 1904 it was no less than $40,000.

In 1883, when the very existence of the Symphony Orchestra was threatened by the proposed destruction of old Music Hall, the site of which had been granted to the rapid transit scheme, Maj Higginson interested a number of wealthy citizens in the project of building a new hall, and raised $400,000 for the purpose. The site was secured, Symphony Hall built, and it was formally opened Oct 15, 1900.

It was his experience in the war and the memory of those who fought with him which led him to express the wish that his first gift to Harvard should be called "Soldiers Field," and that it be "marked with a stone bearing the names of some dear friends—alumni of the university and noble gentlemen—who gave freely and eagerly all that they had or hoped for, to their country and to their fellow-men in the hour of great need—the war of 1861 to 1865—in defense of the republic."

In 1899 came the announcement of Maj Higginson's gift of $150,000 to build the Harvard Union as a memorial to Harvard men who died in the Spanish War. Not only that, it was built, as he said at a meeting in Sanders Theatre Nov 13, 1900, "to offset the habits of exclusiveness and of luxury in living which hurt democratic university."

A Gallant Soldier

Henry Lee Higginson, banking king of Boston, a philanthropist, gallant soldier, devotee of music and art, and a generous supporter of a multitude of projects for the uplift of humanity, was as unobtrusive as he was public spirited, as unselfish as he was busy, courteous and open, and at the same time self-centered and independent in thought and action.

He was born in New York Nov 18, 1834, and was reared in Boston. At the age of 17 he entered Harvard College with the class of 1855. He did not graduate, although in after life he became one of the most liberal benefactors of that university.

He went to Vienna to study, associated much with professionals and amateurs, heard what orchestral playing might be in the hands of accomplished musicians under constant training of great conductors, and promised himself that he would give to Boston an orchestra on a higher plane than all its culture had ever known; an orchestra whose business should be its sole business; one which should not be dependent upon the caprice of the public, or limited in its scope by conservatism.

Then came the Civil War. At the first call for troops he offered his services to the Government. On May 25, 1861, he was commissioned second lieutenant in the 2d Infantry Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers. On July 8 he was promoted to a first lieutenancy. He was transferred to the cavalry arm of the service Oct 31, and commissioned as captain of a troop in the 1st Massachusetts. He was promoted to major March 26, 1862, and at the battle of Aldie, where he showed great gallantry, he was severely wounded, receiving two pistol bullet wounds and three saber cuts, a scar of the latter being borne as a badge of honor until the day of his death.

On March 13, 1864, he was brevetted lieutenant colonel, U. S. V., and served until July on the staff of Maj Gen Barlow of the 1st Division of the 2d Army Corps. On Aug 9 he was discharged for disability resulting from the wounds received in battle.

Notwithstanding his brevet rank of colonel, he preferred that of his actual military service, and was always known as Maj Higginson, the sole title borne by him until 1883, when Harvard University conferred upon him the honorary degree of master of arts, which was supplemented by Yale at its bicentennial anniversary by the degree of doctor of laws. Later in life he served several years as one of the five fellows of Harvard College.

Maj Higginson's business career was entirely with the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co, of which he was a member from the time of its foundation and its virtual head after the death of the senior partner.

Never Aspired to Public Office

Maj Higginson did not aspire to public office nor even to official position in the institution with whch he was connected unless there was a duty to perform or good to be accomplished. Perhaps those most gratfying and congenial to his taste were that of commander of the Massachusetts Commandery of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States; the presidency of the Harvard Union, which he held for years, and the membership of the Board of Fellows of Harvard College.

While Maj Higginson appreciated the heroism, loyalty and deprivations of the soldiers of the Civil War and the sufferings of the widows and orphans of those deceased, he and many other Grand Army veterans, led by such men as Hazard Stevens and Thomas L. Livermore, protested against the Sherwood Service Pension bill, which was before Congress for many years, on the ground that no additional pensions should be established except for honorably discharged soldiers, who were disabled and in absolute need.

In March, 1908, he organized the Harvard Club of Boston. His contribution to the building fund was $150,000. He was made the first president, and was reelected several times.

Maj Higginson was an eloquent and instructive speaker.

On Feb 12, 1909, he presided at the celebration of the 100th anniversary of Abraham Lincoln's birth, before a throng which filled Symphony Hall, and made one of the principal addresses.

He was chairman of the Massachusetts commission on the exposition at Jamestown in 1908.

In 1908, he was one of seven men who contributed a total of $35,000 for the expenses of the Tuberculosis Congress in Washington.

In February, 1911, on the organization of the Council of the Boy Scouts of America, he was chosen president.

In November, 1914, students and alumni of Harvard University, paid Mr Higginson a great tribute in Harvard Union on the occasion of his 80th birthday.

Maj Higginson was also, on the occasion of his 80th birthday, tendered a semipublic reception at the Copley-Plaza Hotel, which was attended by many distinguished men.

From the first days of the World War Maj Higginson gave freely of his time and energy for the country. Experts of his firm worked zealously in the Liberty Bond campaigns.

Maj Higginson's patriotic addresses to students of Harvard and the public generally in Sanders Theatre on recent Memorial Days, gave evidence of his intense Americanism and profound loyalty to his native land.

For years he had provided an annual banquet for all Harvard graduates who served in the Civil War. After these he made memorable addresses, in which he asserted that to die for one's country was preferable to living when it suffered disgrace or defeat.

In a letter written by Maj Higginson, Nov 7, to Chairman John J. O'Callaghan of the Street Commission, two days after the hearing before that body on the proposal to slice the Common, he offered these suggestions:

"First: The street traffic men can do much better than the former policemen, who did not use the whistle. The street traffic men should have the power to send to the police office at once anybody who breaks their rules. In London if a cabman or a teamster disobeys the police, he is taken right in and fined on the spot.

"In all the more important [illegible]

"If a good street or streets were made from the North Station, Charlestown, etc, to the West End, the South End or South Boston, is there any reason why the heavy teams should not be obliged to takes those routes? If they could keep moving along without delay they would accomplish more than they do at present. Probably from Charlestown and thereabouts it would be easy to reach Atlantic av in some way, and perhaps the best way would be right through Quincy Market and so down. That was the plan 25 years ago and might have been carried out.

"The Beacon-st sidewalk next to the Common is almost useless and at any rate superfluous. The same is true of the sidewalk in Charles st next to the Garden. This space could be used for parking automobiles, or the mall of the Common in Charles st could be used for parking automobiles.

"Charles st ought to be widened from the Cambridge bridge to Beacon st and should be made the same width as Charles st between the Common and the Garden.

"It would not be difficult to make a street from the North Station the same width as Causeway st there straight through to the corner of Cambridge and Charles sts. The street need not be straight, although it would be better so. There are plenty of buildings there of little value which would have to be destroyed and a good business street made.

"I think the tracks should be taken off Washington st, but plenty of people do not think so.

"Perhaps a few more mounted men, who should keep moving up and down in the main streets and see that vehicles move when ordered to do so would be useful. In some cities much smaller than ours passengers are obliged to cross only at the crossings and if they cross elsewhere they are fined for infraction of the law. Of course this would be vexatious, but what of it?

"Why should Park st be a two-way street? For foot passengers it would be easy to make a passageway from School st through Province st under the old Music Hall to Winter st, through Winter pl into Temple pl. That was planned 20 years ago under Mayor Matthews, and it really caused the building of Symphony Hall. At that time Mayor Matthews felt quite sure the measure would go through; therefore, to give the city a good music hall Symphony Hall was built.

"But really the best thing that could be done would be to give the police more power, give them whistles, and require them to enforce the law. It makes no difference who breaks the law; let that person be fined.

"By the way, I suppose that if little pieces were taken off the Common—and it seems to me no great matter—it would not cost the city anything except repaving the street right there. I suppose that Eliot st would better be widened to the South Station. Given a good street through Charles st to the North Station or through Eliot st to the South Station, vehicles would move on quickly."

STRIKING LATEST PICTURE OF BANKER PHILANTHROPIST

MAJ HENRY L. HIGGINSON,
Who Died Just Before Reaching His 85th Birth Anniversary.

WIDESPREAD GRIEF OVER MAJ HIGGINSON'S DEATH

The widespread grief over the death of Maj Higginson is well illustrated by the following expressions:

Gov Coolidge—"The death of Maj Henry L. Higginson has removed a man who has been for years a commanding figure. In public service and private philanthropy a benefactor of his fellowmen, in character an example to be followed with reverence; in attainments preeminent among associates of commanding importance. An uncompromising patriot, the advocate of every good cause, a man whose work, whose memory, whose principles will endure."

Mayor Peters—"I am greatly shocked at the sudden death of Maj Higginson. His death is Boston's sorrow. The place he leaves vacant is one that [illegible] always be our privilege to remember him as a great patriot, a loving friend and a noble American."

Police Commissioner Curtis—"The city and State have lost an eminently useful and public-spirited citizen. He always gave without stint of his time and means to an undertaking for the good of the community."

Pres Francis J. W. Ford of the City Council—"The city has suffered a great loss in the death of Maj Higginson. In fact, his philanthropy extended far beyond the limits of our city, and there was no more public-spirited citizen in the whole city. His interest was always felt in the matter of civic improvement, and his advice much sought after by those interested in the progress of our city."

Philip W. Wrenn, president of the Boston Stock Exchange, in behalf of the members of the Exchange, issued this statement:

"Maj Higginson was the oldest member of the Exchange, joining it on Jan 2, 1868. In earlier years he was active in all its affairs, and in later years, whenever emergencies of any kind rose in the Street, he was an active participant, and most helpful in his counsel."

Dr Lemuel H. Murlin, president of Boston University—"I have always regarded Maj Higginson as an embodiment of the finest type of the New England patriot, business man and gentleman. He was a public benefactor, and his life and experience can be an inspiration to the young manhood of America."

Bishop William Lawrence—"In Maj Higginson's death his nearest friends are grateful for his release from weariness, deep as is their sense of loss. He was of the noblest of men, modest, simple, full of courage, never a master, always a servant of others. Service was his joy. Nation, Commonwealth, city and Harvard are the finer for his life and all will hold his memory in tender and proud reverence."

LeBaron Russell Briggs, dean of Harvard University—"Maj Higginson's individuality and personality were his most striking characteristics. His individuality appeared in everything he did and said. Those who knew him did not have in mind so much the things he had done as what he was himself. Very few men have meant so much to the college and the community in the last few years."

TREMONT STREET METHODIST CHURCH MEMORIAL TODAY

Memorial exercises in honor of seven members of the Tremont Street Methodist Church who died in the service will be held this afternoon at 2:30. Miss Edith M. Ambrose, R. N., representing the American Red Cross in France, will present the names of the honored dead. Scriptural reading will be by Rev Kelly Jenness; a memorial address by Hon Frank H. Pope and remarks by Howard B. Wing, chairman of the memorial committee. Miss Evelyn Stewart will sing, assisted by a quartet. George Henry Carnes is organist.

The memorial committee consists of Howard B. Wing, Francis P. Luce and Miss Minnie L. Upton. The ushers will include Lieut John E. Tucker, Donald I. Evans, Geoffrey E. Plunkett, and naval representatives from the battleship Florida.

LAST TRIBUTE PAID TO MAJ HIGGINSON

Simple Service Held in Appleton Chapel

Casket Carried Through Lane of Harvard Students

Impressiveness and simplicity characterized the funeral of Maj Henry Lee Higginson, which took place yesterday noon in Appleton Chapel, Cambridge, where the Major and Mrs Higginson were married nearly 56 years ago. The coffin containing the body of Maj Higginson was placed transversely at the foot of the chancel in Appleton Chapel, draped in a beautiful silk American flag, with a wreath of honor upon it.

The chapel was filled with an unusual gathering, numbering almost as many women as men, in which were included many of the most distinguished persons in Boston. Rev Samuel M. Crothers of the First Parish Church of Cambridge conducted the service, while in the choir loft the organ and the Harvard Choir were supplemented by a group of musicians from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the institution which Maj Higginson founded and supported for so many years.

A choral prelude by Brahms, a selection by Bach and Marcello's setting of the 19th Psalm were played on the organ at the opening of the service. Dr Crothers read portions of the Psalms, the orchestra played the largo movement from Handel's Concerto in D minor, Dr Crothers read once more and the choir sang Bach's choral, "Sleepers, wake." The minister read the formal prayer, and the service closed with the singing of the university hymn by the choir, a great chorus of male voices.

As the coffin was borne from the chapel to the hearse long ranks of Harvard undergraduates formed a lane, through which it had to pass. The college bell on Harvard Hall tolled as the solemn procession passed between these ranks of students.

The ushers at the funeral included Barrett Wendell Jr, Philip S. Sears, F. L. Higginson Jr, F. S. Goodwin, George Higginson Jr, J. J. Higginson, Charles Jackson, A. D. Weeks Jr, R. G. Shaw 2d, Mr Graeme Haughton George R. Agassiz, Maximilian Agassiz, Rodolphe L. Agassiz, Fred Cabot, Frank Lee and H. L. Morse.

The bearers were Barrett Wendell Jr, Philip S. Sears, F. L. Higginson Jr, George Higginson Jr, J. J. Higginson, Charles Jackson, R. G. Shaw 2d and Rudolphe L. Agassiz. Behind them leaving the chapel were Pres Lowell and Pres Eliot, Dr Walcott, Nelson Perkins, Bishop Lawrence and Charles Francis Adams, the honorary pallbearers

Only the honorary pallbearers, with the members of the family and a few friends went to Mt Auburn Cemetery with the body. Near the grave were stationed 40 artillerymen from Fort Warren, Fort Banks and Fort Andrews, under Lieut Flagg. They fired three rattling volleys—the soldier's goodnight—after the reading of the commitment service by Dr Crothers, and a bugler, hidden in the background, sounded taps.

W. Emmons of the senior class, as chief marshal of the students for the funeral service, introduced the speakers.

Life Sketch by Dr Eliot

Dr Eliot drew a brief sketch of the life of Maj Higginson. He told of his friendship with the financier and philanthropist at Boston Latin School, saying: "Maj Higginson never permitted others the liberties of his schoolboy friends. I met him one day at University Hall in a most perturbed mood. He was highly indignant because an eminent Boston citizen had slapped him on the back and commended him for his aid to the Symphony. 'What right had he to compliment me?' said Maj Higginson. It was an example of his extreme modesty and reticence."

Dr Eliot told of the musical education of the major in Vienna and of the accident to his eyes which prevented him from teaching or studying further. He spoke of his enlistment at the outbreak of the war, although he had had no training either of a military or athletic character.

"It was his marriage to the daughter of Louis Agassiz, however, that was the most complete turning point of his life," the speaker continued. "Through his father-in-law he gained an intimate acquaintance with Alexander Agassiz, famous not only as naturalist, but as an expert in complex business affairs.

"Maj Higginson believed in the highest education possible, and, furthermore, he advocated as complete an attention to the development of the body. He combined this faith in athletics with his extreme loyalty for his friends who were killed in the Civil War, and erected Soldiers Field to their memory. The Harvard Union, where we are at this moment, is a monument to his interest in a perpetuation of a free and cordial democracy.

Given Degree Late in Life

"It is a curious thing to me, and still inexplicable, that Maj Higginson was never given a degree at this university, of which he was not a graduate, until he was nearly 60 years of age. Then he received his Mastership of Arts. It was equally remarkable that he was never elected to the board of overseers or even named. In 1896, however, he was given the highest honor possible, when he was chosen as a Fellow of the university.

"He advocated at Harvard all that which tended to encourage liberty, patronizing athletics, social intercourse and all voluntary movements in the development of music. In the 10 annual concerts at Sanders Theatre we have a gift which will commemorate his aim in giving Boston the Symphony Orchestra, for in that gift he had at heart the needs of the students.

"Friendliness, I should say, was the most noticeable characteristic of our friend who has gone, and we must never forget the strong expectation which he had of good from God and men, and of his firmness and great spirit in fighting every evil he met."

As a Soldier and Fighter

Judge Frederick Cabot commented upon Maj Higginson's quality of intimacy. "He made you feel," said the judge, "whenever you came in contact with him that you meant something to him.

"I shall always think of him as a soldier and a fighter. His was a life and a continuing life for all of us. In a letter to a young man about to leave for the front he said: 'Don't get rich. Don't seek office. The most useful citizen is he who is least noticed.'

"Maj Higginson ascribed the motive for his support of the Boston Symphony not to his love of music, but to his love for his country. For he was confident in his reliance in the beauties of this life, of things we see and hear. When he saw other countries being instructed in these beauties in a systematic way the desire seized him to give his own country something as good, if not better."

Pres Lowell concluded the memorial meeting by reading extracts from personal letters.

"Never have I known a man with more force in championing the things he thought were right," said Pres Lowell. "He was utterly modest, yet he also had perfect trust in his own thoughts and carried them out with fixed purpose. The nature of his force was artless, yet there are in these letters instances of a great literary style, great in its very straightforward simplicity. He was intense, too, in all he thought. You couldn't come near him without understanding to some extent what was going on in his mind. His was a combination of brave emotion and strong simplicity. His character was strong and elemental, like the style of his letters."

HARVARD MEMORIAL TO MAJ HIGGINSON

Dr Eliot, Pres Lowell and Judge Cabot Speak

Meeting Attended by 200 Students and Scores of Friends

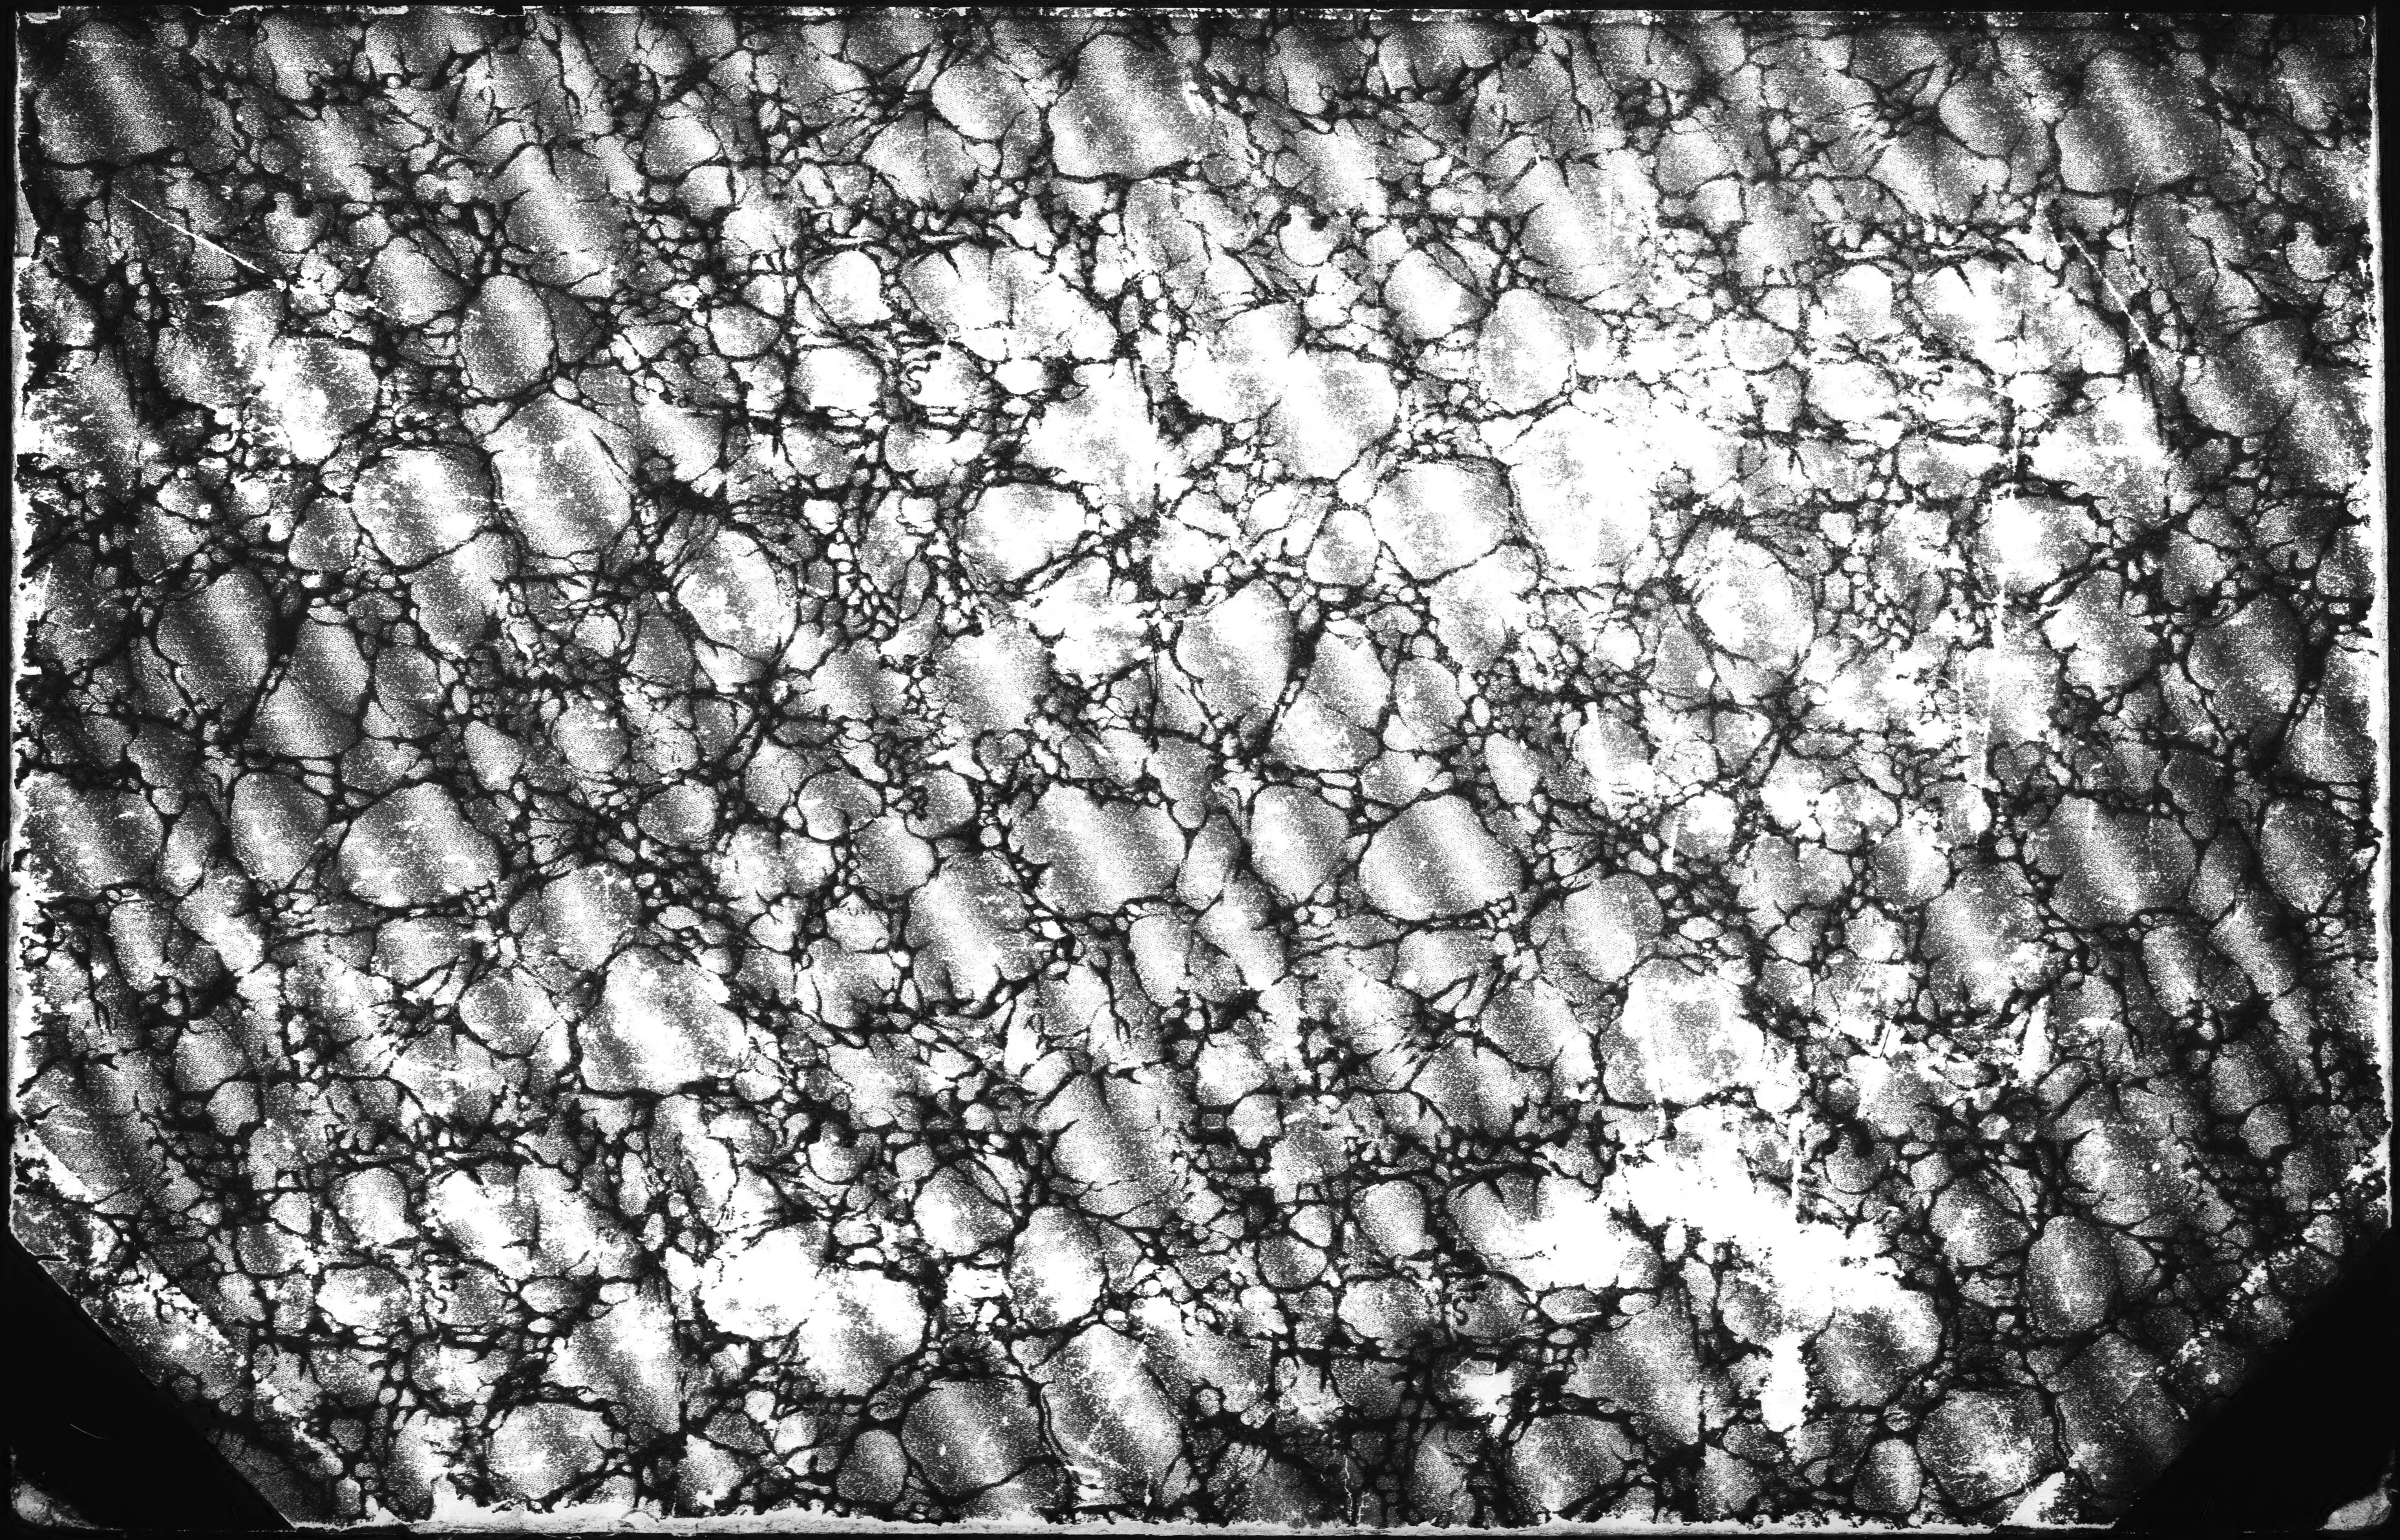
Two hundred students of Harvard University and a score of friends of Maj Henry Lee Higginson gathered at the Harvard Union last night in a memorial meeting. The addresses of Pres Emeritus Charles W. Eliot, Judge Frederick Cabot and Pres Lowell brought to a close the day, which had been devoted to the memory of Harvard's eminent son.

Among those who attended the impressive meeting were Prof George L. Kittredge, Dean LeBaron R. Briggs and others of the Harvard [illegible]

[225]

BLANK PAGE

[226



END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND